Assembly Business

George Savage

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Members will have been saddened to learn of the passing of George Savage, a former Assembly Member for Upper Bann. I had the pleasure of knowing George from working together during the first mandate from 1998 and subsequently on his return to the House in 2007. He was quiet and unassuming and did not seek the spotlight but worked behind the scenes diligently on behalf of those he represented. He was a fundamentally pleasant and decent man, and you could always do business with him, even on difficult issues. I think that that has been reflected in the warm tributes that have been paid to him since his passing from across the political spectrum in the House.

I want to take this opportunity to extend my personal condolences to his family circle and to all his party colleagues on their sad loss. As we have done on such occasions in the past, I will call a representative from each of the parties to speak for up to three minutes to pay tribute to our late friend and colleague. I will allow around 30 minutes for tributes and, if there is enough time remaining after all the parties have spoken, I may be able to call other Members who rise in their places to say a few words. The House will now pay its respects.

Mr Nesbitt: Two Saturdays ago, I was honoured to attend Craigavon Civic Centre for the installation dinner for the current mayor, Colin McCusker. I was struck by the number of people, from all parties, who remarked on how sad it was that illness had prevented George Savage from attending that evening's celebration. Those were timely remarks. George's funeral took place on Friday in Donaghcloney, and I know that the family was comforted by the very large number of people, representing all sectors of our society, who attended that day. It will be a tough week for Joy and the family, and I hope that they will take some comfort from the fact that we are paying tribute to George in the Chamber today.

George Savage was an Ulster Unionist stalwart, a man who loyally and faithfully represented the party in the upper Bann area for decades. He was a long-standing member of Craigavon Borough Council and was twice elected mayor, serving as first citizen in the mid-1980s and again in 2005-06.

He also served two terms as an MLA here at Stormont. He was elected first in 1998 and again in 2007. The first time, of course, was the original mandate of this Assembly, when he joined a brave and courageous team at Stormont, trying to make it work.

He also found time to put on the uniform and serve in the Ulster Defence Regiment during some of the darkest days of our Troubles. Those are the facts. Behind facts, of course, lies the person. George Savage was, indeed, an Ulster Unionist to his backbone and a proud Orangeman. A farmer by profession, he became a knowledgeable member of the Agriculture Committee. George was also a tireless worker for his constituents and was held in high esteem by political friend and foe alike. He was described by the SDLP's Dolores Kelly as a decent, hard-working and well-respected man, and by John Dallat as a gentleman who gave his full commitment to making the Assembly work. Many Assembly staff with no connection to party politics have gone out of their way, in recent days, to make clear their sadness at the news of his passing.

I cannot help but pause, at this point, to reflect that George was one of the original 28 Ulster Unionist MLAs elected in 1998 to Parliament Buildings to try to give meaning to the Belfast Agreement. It is a sad and sobering thought that he is the sixth member of that team to pass away. This year, alone, we have bade farewell to David McClarty, Sir John Gorman and Sam Foster, following the early losses of Tom Benson and junior Minister James Leslie. Now, sadly, it is the turn of George Savage. Our thoughts are with his family and many friends. He will be greatly missed in Upper Bann and much further afield.

Mr Moutray: I count it a great privilege to be afforded the opportunity to take part in this tribute to my friend and colleague, not only in the House but for some 13 years on Craigavon Borough Council. George was a quiet, unassuming, affable and mildly spoken person who was not given to rash words even in the heat of debate. He treated everyone the same, no matter what their station in life. His commitment to constituents was second to none. For nearly 40 years, he was an elected representative who was always approachable and contactable, even in his farmyard, as was often the case. His love of farming and country life was known far and wide.

Such was George that his friendship spanned beyond these shores. He was influential in the linkage between Craigavon Borough Council and Ballina in County Mayo. George made many lasting friends as a result, and he attended festivals in Mayo on a yearly basis. George was a giant in agriculture. He farmed extensively near Donaghcloney. He served as Deputy Chair of the Agriculture Committee and on the Northern Ireland Drainage Council, and chaired the SOAR rural partnership.

Some year ago, I was in the south of England and, in a second-hand shop, I picked up a book that referred to the Savages being resident in Donaghcloney for some 300 years. I gave the book to George on my return and he was delighted because he was, justly, proud of his ancestry. He was also proud of his family: of Joy; of his sons Kyle, George and Nigel; and of their families.

Last Tuesday, George would have been 50 years married to Joy. His son Nigel spoke eloquently on Friday about the saving faith that his father had. I trust that, in the days that lie ahead, that will help sustain the family. They have the knowledge that it is, truly, absent from the body but present with the Lord. I extend sincere condolences on behalf of the DUP to Joy, Kyle, George, Nigel, their families and the Ulster Unionist Party on the passing of a real gentleman. Thank you.

Mr O'Dowd: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. I first got to know George Savage in 1997, when I joined Craigavon Borough Council. In Craigavon and, indeed, across the North, 1997 was a very difficult year, with tragedies on all sides of the community and intense conflict on our streets, which was reflected in our Craigavon Borough Council debating chamber. In that atmosphere, it would have been perceived to be difficult to engage or make friends with a unionist, but, in George's case, it was not. George and I come from opposite poles; George was a former UDR soldier, an Orangeman and a proud Ulster Unionist. He knew that I was an Irish republican, but in no way did that come between us being able to engage with each other on a personal or a constituency level to assist our constituents across the board. I learnt a lot from George Savage in terms of not only his determination to represent his constituents but how to work as a team player across the council chamber to achieve what was best for the people of Craigavon. Despite all the pressures that we were under in Craigavon over many years, we did that quite often.

When I heard that he was ill and that he had passed away, it came as quite a shock because he was always out and about. I often met him in this Building, even after he had retired as an MLA. He was still up here lobbying and representing his constituents and the rural community and ensuring that their voice was heard. A tribute to him especially is that the new generation of Sinn Féin councillors on Craigavon council — I think of our current deputy mayor, Catherine Seeley, and our group leader, Gemma McKenna — speak very highly of George as well. Those are new young councillors going into Craigavon council. As the deputy mayor said the other night, she was often late for a council meeting because George was outside the chamber telling her stories. He made an impact across the generations.

My deepest sympathy to his family and to Joy. Without doubt the greatest loss is to his family, but the rural community and Craigavon have also lost a great champion. I wish them well.

Mrs D Kelly: On behalf of the SDLP's Assembly and parliamentary group and our local councillors in Craigavon, we place on record our sincere sympathy to Joy and to George's sons, daughters-in-law and grandchildren. I had the privilege of serving for many years on Craigavon Borough Council with George when he played a role as mayor and another as deputy mayor, and I served on numerous committees with him. George was, foremost, as others have said, a family man. He had a long and enduring good relationship not only with his wife and family but with his mother; he often talked about his mother, who lived to a great age.

I was deeply vexed when I heard the nature of George's illness only a few weeks ago, and I was deeply saddened at his sudden passing. George was a decent, hard-working family man. He is one who, in 1998, remained true and resolute in his support of his then party leader, David Trimble, as he made a great compromise to make a better future for everyone in our society. He never wavered in his support nor in his conviction that what he was doing was the right thing.

George, as others have said, was not afraid of building cross-border links; he had a great relationship, as Mr Moutray said, with the communities in Ballina. I know that they, too, will miss him greatly, especially the energy and commitment that he brought. It is only a few months ago that I facilitated a meeting between George and our Environment Minister. George was an employer in the local area, and he had ambitious plans for future development. I hope that those will not be lost; I am sure that his sons will try to realise their father's ambitions.

I saw a great tribute at the funeral; people from right across the community turned out in their hundreds to pay tribute to George. His loss will be felt, as others have said, right across the community, but it will be felt most around the family hearth. My sincere condolences to the Ulster Unionist Party, which has lost a true friend, and to his family and the wider community.

Mr Lunn: I am conscious of the fact that everybody who has spoken so far probably knew George Savage better than I did. I knew him as a colleague here in the last mandate just for four years, and I got to know him fairly well. I am impressed that there have been such fulsome tributes from what you might call political opponents. It says a lot about George, the man and the politician, that even, dare I say, John O'Dowd from Sinn Féin can pay such a tribute to an Ulster Unionist. That is very good to see.

12.15 pm

George was a gentleman. The word "gentleman" has been used so often, but it does not do any harm to repeat it: he was polite and he was calm. He was the Mayor of Craigavon twice, which was quite an achievement. He was the sort of solid citizen that nobody ever said a bad word about, and why should they have, because he was good man. He was a good family man, a good neighbour and a good politician. He was quiet in his way, fair enough, but a lot of us are quiet in our ways and are just as effective. He will be sadly missed.

I know about his history now: he was a member of the UDR, an Orangeman and a farmer. It was one of his Masonic colleagues who told me, about a month ago, that he was not well at all, but it still came as a big shock that he passed away so quickly.

He was a solid citizen and a solid Ulster Unionist, with a good history in politics and a good history in life. So, on behalf of the Alliance Party, I send our condolences to Joy, his wife, and his three sons, Kyle, George and Nigel, and to the Ulster Unionist community. He will be sadly missed.

Mr McNarry: Like most, I knew George Savage for a long, long time. Throughout that time, it was a pleasure to talk to him, have dealings with him and listen to him. He was an outstanding character — “character” being the operative word — about whom you could say, “He did what it says on the tin.” That was specifically George’s way of doing business.

I have heard my former colleagues in the Ulster Unionist Party use the word, “stalwart”, which in this case is very apt. I offer my sincere condolences to them for the loss that they must feel. There must be a tremor going through George’s former constituency and among the people who knew him: he loved them as much as they loved him.

For someone like me, who held him in the highest esteem, these occasions are extremely sad, as they are for us all. It seems that over such a short period, we have been paying tributes, and properly so, in this House to others who have left us. That has become commonplace, but nevertheless I am very pleased that the Assembly allows and dedicates moments like this for Members to make fitting tributes to people, particularly people like George, who will be missed.

He is, as you said Principal Deputy Speaker, our late friend and colleague, and I am sure that his wife, Joy, and his family will receive the message loud and clear of how we held him in such high regard in the Northern Ireland Assembly.

Mr Allister: I first got to know George Savage not through politics but in another walk of life. Some years ago, the Savage family went through a very traumatic experience when one of George’s sons was brutally assaulted. I, in my role as counsel, had the privilege of representing the Savage family in the subsequent litigation. I met George, Joy and the son in question frequently over that period, and I found George to be everything that has been said of him: a true gentleman, a man with deep concern for his family and a man with whom it was a pleasure to work.

As an MEP, I had some interchange with him in pursuit of agricultural issues, and there too he was most diligent in all that he did.

So, it was with sadness that one learned of his passing. To his wife and family, I convey my condolences and those of my party. To his party, to which he undoubtedly was a very faithful servant, I, too, express condolences on the loss of someone whom it was good to know.

Mr B McCrea: George was a friend of mine. I look back on our interactions with much fondness. There was always a sense of humour with George when you were speaking to him. You sometimes had to wait a little while to discover exactly what he was going to tell you, but there was always the great finger that was raised, which indicated that he was about to say something. I was talking to Joy about it. She said that people sometimes asked how he got that finger. Apparently, a tractor managed to run over it, and, George being George, he just put a bandage on it and carried on. That was the mark of the man. He was very self-effacing, did what had to be done and got on with things.

People here have tended to talk about him being a gentleman and somehow non-controversial. I remember with fondness that he did get his own way through having a particular way of doing things. Even when we had the Belfast Agreement coming up, he told me how he had influence with people who might not have been in the mainstream. He said that he thought that one of the big contributions that he had made was that he was able to talk to people whom others would not talk to.

On such occasions, I am mindful of the family. Those of you who know the family well will know that Joy is facing not just one but two challenges. It is my great hope that things improve with Kyle, who is not particularly well. Joy is one of those amazing women. You talk about great men, but behind every great man there is arguably an even greater woman, and Joy is certainly that.

The Savages made a wonderful contribution to our society. George made a great contribution to the Assembly. When you get to the end of your life, all that you can really do is to look back and have others say, “He did well”.

George Savage, a gentleman and a friend, will be sadly missed. I offer my condolences to his family.

Mrs Dobson: It is always hard to join the House on these occasions. However, this afternoon, it is doubly difficult when we are paying tribute to a personal friend and party colleague.

My thoughts and prayers are with Joy, Kyle, Nigel, George Jnr, George’s seven grandchildren and his entire family circle. They have lost a loving husband, devoted father and doting grandfather. The community of Donaghcloney and Waringstown has lost a lifelong friend, neighbouring farmer and committed politician.

As was said, above all, George Savage was a good and decent public servant, serving the constituents of Upper Bann on these very Benches and always staying true to the core values of the Ulster Unionist Party, putting his constituents and the community above all else. George stood fast and firm to our values.

My first memories of George are as a neighbouring farmer when, after my marriage, we moved to Waringstown and set up home. Back then, any time that I had the privilege to chat to George, politics was never mentioned. I believe that that sums up George. He was always asking how my son Mark was keeping, and then the topic changed to beef prices and farming. He was a man who put people above politics.

The high esteem in which George was held in the community was evident on Friday when Donaghcloney village came to a standstill. I was proud to join the community in mourning, a community quietly paying their respects and saying goodbye to one of our own.

George was a loyal Ulster Unionist, a member of the loyal orders, a former soldier of the Ulster Defence Regiment and a people’s politician, here and on Craigavon Borough Council, and George was so much more than that. He was a loving husband, father and grandfather. He was a quiet man of integrity and honour. On visiting the family’s home, I was told by George’s son Kyle how much the hundreds of sympathy cards and tributes on social media meant to the family. I know that the tributes this afternoon will add to that. He will be sorely missed by all our numbers.

Mr Anderson: Thank you, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker, for allowing me the opportunity to pay tribute to my good friend and colleague Councillor George Savage. George was indeed one of life’s true gentlemen and someone whom I held in the highest regard. He was highly respected in all walks of life, especially within the agriculture and farming industry.

I knew George for many years, but it was not until I was elected to Craigavon Borough Council in 2001 that I really got to know him. We shared many conversations on a wide range of issues, especially on matters affecting the rural community. Being a rural dweller myself, it was always good to have someone like George to call upon when seeking advice on rural and farming issues. I know that I can say without fear of contradiction that George was truly a champion of the rural community, not only throughout Craigavon, where he served as mayor on two occasions, but here in the Assembly, where he served two terms as an MLA for Upper Bann.

George was never one to shirk responsibility and that was very evident in the service that he gave to many organisations throughout his lifetime. He was chairman of Donacloney Primary School's board of governors and a former director of Glenavon Football Club. He was involved in the Mid Ulster Football Association, did charity work with the Buddy Bear Trust and gave many years of service to the loyal and Masonic orders, to name but a few.

George also served with distinction in the Ulster Defence Regiment, in what was a very dangerous and testing time for many serving in our security forces during the Troubles. However, first and foremost, George was a family man. He was happiest at home with his family, working on the farm and enjoying the outdoor life, having often done a day's work before most of us had got out of our bed. George's wife, Joy, often said that she never knew anyone who could change from farm overalls into a business suit as quickly as George could.

At George's funeral service on Friday past, the family minister referred to some of George's trademarks. Those of us who had conversations with George will have heard him say many times, "I know a man", with that famous pointed finger. Today, I can say that I knew a man — a man I was honoured and privileged to have known; a man much respected and highly regarded; a man called George Savage.

George will be greatly missed in his community but most of all by his family. To his wife, Joy, to whom he was married for 50 years, to his sons George, Nigel and Kyle and the entire family circle, and also to his Ulster Unionist Party colleagues, I extend my sincere sympathy and condolences. George's family faces difficult days ahead without their loved one, but they can be comforted to know that George is now safe in the arms of Jesus.

Mr Gardiner: I rise in support of all those who have paid tribute to a former colleague and friend of mine, Mr George Savage. I was privileged to be with George just prior to his death. I got another phone call from his son to say, "Look, you better come out, Sam. Dad's going". I got out, but I was a wee bit too late. Words are not sufficient to pay tribute to George or to talk about the man and his character. He was a great man, very sincere, who was dedicated to his work with his three sons on the farm and to his wife, Joy. I was privileged to serve on Craigavon Borough Council with him on the several occasions when he was mayor, and also privileged to serve in this House with George.

George's word was his bond. At the funeral, people could not get into the Methodist church. There were hundreds upon hundreds of people there to pay their tribute to the great George Savage. I offer my sympathy and condolences from my family to Joy and her three sons. He is safe in God's keeping.

Mr Poots: Without repeating what everybody else has said, I would just like to say that George Savage was a decent, honourable gentleman and a pleasure for all of us to do business with. I called with George around three weeks ago, and we had a good time together. Dr Paisley had just passed at the time, and I was able to tell George of the high regard that Dr Paisley had held him in. Dr Paisley was Chair of the Agriculture Committee while George was Deputy Chair, and I know that Dr Paisley leant on George a lot for advice, as someone working at the coalface. I trust that it was some comfort to George, even at that time, to be told of the high regard in which he was held even by someone of Dr Paisley's standing.

My sympathies go to George Jnr, Kyle and Nigel, and in particular to Joy, who has lost a dear husband.

Retirement of the Speaker, William Hay MLA

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I would like to advise Members that I have received a letter from the Speaker. He expresses his appreciation for the good wishes that have been sent to him from across the House and beyond but has decided that his focus needs to be on his return to health and that it is unrealistic that he will be able to return to exercise the functions of Speaker in the immediate future.

The Speaker is disappointed that he is not in a position to come to the House to announce this himself, but he has informed me in writing that he has decided to proceed with his intention to retire. He will resign as a Member with effect from 12.00 noon on Monday 13 October 2014. In accordance with section 39(2)(b) of the Northern Ireland Act 1998, he will cease to be the Speaker at that time. A copy of the Speaker's letter will be placed in the Library. Following receipt of the letter on Friday, I visited the Speaker and passed on the best wishes of Members.

When a vacancy arises in the Office of Speaker, Standing Order 6 requires the Assembly to proceed to elect a Speaker "as soon as may be". A copy of the Speaker's letter will be forwarded to the Business Committee, and it will be for it to schedule an election for a new Speaker. The Speaker's authorisation, under Standing Order 5(2), for me to exercise all his functions relating to the proceedings of the Assembly, will remain in place until his resignation takes effect next week.

I think that that covers the most immediate operational questions that might come to mind, but Members may seek further clarification from the Business Office.

While we are all sorry about the circumstances of today's announcement, I know that I speak on behalf of the Deputy Speakers and the whole House in wishing the Speaker well in future and thanking him for the dedication and service that he has given the Assembly in the role of Speaker over the last seven years.

I will therefore encourage Whips to consider arrangements for how to formally pay tribute to the Speaker so that the Business Committee can consider those tomorrow for the Order Paper of next week. Let us move on.

Mr Weir: Further to that, I appreciate that arrangements will then be made for a more formal occasion, but I think it appropriate simply to place on record, on behalf of my party and as someone who has served with the Speaker on the Business Committee and the Assembly Commission, my thanks to him for the role that he has performed. It is also appropriate that the House acknowledges its desire to see the Speaker — the soon to be former Speaker — recover and be in the most robust health as swiftly as possible.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Let me just remind the House that I have made arrangements and advised the Whips to consider how best we can pay tribute to a man who justly deserves that. I think that the most appropriate way to do that is to return, upon reflection of today's announcement, to the matter next week. That would be the appropriate opportunity for all Members of the House, if they so desire, to pay tribute to a remarkable servant of this institution. If that is acceptable to Members, we should move on to the next business.

Committee Business

Committee Membership

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: This is the first of three motions on Committee membership. As with similar motions, it will be treated as a business motion. Therefore, there will be no debate.

Resolved:

That Mr Edwin Poots be appointed to the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development; that Mr Sydney Anderson replace Miss Michelle McIlveen as a member of the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development; that Mr William Humphrey replace Mr Sammy Douglas as a member of the Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment; that Mr Nelson McCausland replace Mr Stephen Moutray as a member of the Committee for Education; that Mr William Irwin replace Mr Sammy Douglas as a member of the Committee for Employment and Learning; that Mr Stephen Moutray replace Mrs Brenda Hale as a member of the Committee for Regional Development; that Mr David McIlveen replace Mr George Robinson as a member of the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister; that Mr George Robinson replace Mr David McIlveen as a member of the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety; that Mr Edwin Poots, Mr Sammy Douglas and Mr Paul Frew replace Mr William Humphrey, Mr Sydney Anderson, and Mr Jim Wells as members of the Committee for Justice; that Mr Sammy Douglas replace Mr Trevor Clarke as a member of the Committee for Social Development; and that Mr David Hilditch and Mr Robin Newton replace Ms Paula Bradley and Mr Mervyn Storey as members of the Committee on Standards and Privileges with effect from Monday 6 October 2014. — [Mr Weir.]

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Order. The next item on the Order Paper is the second motion regarding Committee membership. As with similar motions, it will be treated as a business motion, and there will be no debate.

Resolved:

That Ms Rosaleen McCorley be appointed as a member of the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety; that Mr Chris Hazzard replace Ms Rosaleen McCorley as a member of the Committee for Justice; that Mr Phil Flanagan replace Mr Chris Hazzard as a member of the Public Accounts Committee; that Mr Chris Hazzard replace Mr Mitchel McLaughlin as a member of the Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment; and that Mr Raymond McCartney replace Mr Mitchel McLaughlin as a member of the Committee for Finance and Personnel. — [Ms Ruane.]

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The next item on the Order Paper is the third motion regarding Committee membership. As with similar motions, it will be treated as a business motion and there will be no debate.

Resolved:

That Mr Roy Beggs replace Mr Leslie Cree as a member of the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister; that Mr Leslie

Cree replace Mr Michael McGimpsey as a member of the Committee for Culture, Arts and Leisure; that Mr Michael McGimpsey replace Mr Roy Beggs as a member of the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety; and that Mr Roy Beggs replace Mr Michael Copeland as a member of the Public Accounts Committee. — [Mr Swann.]

Executive Committee Business

Education Bill: First Stage

Mr O'Dowd (The Minister of Education): I beg to introduce the Education Bill [NIA38/11-15], which is a Bill to provide for the establishment and functions of the Education Authority; and for connected purposes.

Bill passed First Stage and ordered to be printed.

Private Members' Business

National Crime Agency

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Order. The Business Committee has agreed to allow up to one hour and 30 minutes for this debate. The proposer of the motion will have 10 minutes to propose and 10 minutes to make a winding-up speech. One amendment has been selected and is published on the Marshalled List. The proposer will have 10 minutes to propose the amendment and five minutes to make a winding-up speech. All other speakers will have five minutes.

Mr Irwin: I beg to move

That this Assembly condemns the increasing number of illegal activities being carried out by organised criminal gangs; notes police assessments of over 140 such gangs operating in Northern Ireland; and calls for the implementation, in full, of the National Crime Agency to help deal with this problem, which is particularly prevalent in border areas.

The need for the National Crime Agency (NCA) to have full powers extended to cover Northern Ireland is recognised by many interested parties, most notably and obviously the British Government, the agencies responsible for administering justice and the courts and those involved in policing. Of course, we in the DUP strongly support that extension. As someone who represents a border constituency, I am well aware of the impact that criminal gangs have on our rural communities by creating victims of crime and the negative impact on the rural economy. We have seen audacious attempts by such gangs to carry out all sorts of crimes, including the exploding of ATMs on the forecourts of garages, the laundering and selling of illegal fuel, the stealing to order of valuable machinery and the worrying trend in the theft of cattle and the illegal slaughter and sale of those animals in the Republic and certain areas such as south Armagh. Those incidents illustrate the need to have at our disposal the expertise and assistance of the National Crime Agency. As we all know, the criminals respect neither borders nor victims in their illegal pursuits.

The work that the NCA is involved in not only relates to the crimes that I have outlined but importantly has a significant role in the area of Internet-based crime. Members will be aware that the United Nations Committee on the Rights of the Child has expressed its strong views on the protection of children online. The UN committee is rightly concerned, as we all should be, about the lack of NCA powers in Northern Ireland, which means that the Child Exploitation and Online Protection Centre is not fully operational here at this time. The entire House should be alarmed about that issue alone. Our children are at much greater risk due to the fact that the NCA is not operational here. I challenge the nationalist parties to explain to the public why they have adopted a negative stance on its implementation here given the UN report and its ramifications. The protection of our children is hugely important and completely necessary and urgent, especially with regard to the Internet and how our children are protected from those who prey on young people online.

I certainly feel that the issue is directly affecting a very broad range of people, from the rural farmer who has valuable machinery stolen to order to those involved in the detection of online crime, such as the serious and sickening issue of child pornography. The National Crime Agency is a body that Northern Ireland simply cannot do without. It operates in other regions of the UK and, at a time when our policing budgets are under severe pressure, it makes complete sense to allow the PSNI to have the necessary assistance of the NCA to carry out its investigative duties. I also believe that the ability to seize assets is vital in the fight against these gangsters, who currently think that they are untouchable.

The reluctance of Sinn Féin and the SDLP to accept the necessity of allowing the NCA to operate and the PSNI to avail itself of its expertise in the fight against crime internationally means that Northern Ireland and its citizens are at a severe disadvantage. The two nationalist parties continually bleat about equality, but, once again, the calls for equality fall short of ensuring that our communities have the very best security and that the organisations tasked with protecting communities have the very best intelligence and powers at their disposal. The nationalist parties have hollow concerns over the accountability of the NCA, yet the organisation is already subject to rigorous scrutiny from Committees in Parliament, such as the Home Affairs Committee, as well as the Office of Surveillance Commissioners and the Investigatory Powers Tribunal. The public have the right to approach these and many more bodies to question any outward operation of the NCA. Representing a border constituency, I have a desire to see criminality and its effects on innocent victims —

Mr A Maginness: I wonder whether the Member will give way.

Mr Irwin: I will.

Mr A Maginness: The Member talks about all sorts of bodies looking at the NCA. Will he tell the House what accountability measures exist presently in relation to the NCA? Please describe to the House the accountability to the Chief Constable and the Policing Board?

Mr Irwin: The accountability measures are mainly based in the UK. Certainly, I have no fear of any accountability measures —

Mr A Maginness: Will the Member give way again?

Mr Irwin: I will.

Mr A Maginness: I am asking the Member particularly about accountability measures in Northern Ireland, not in Westminster or the UK, as you put it.

Mr Irwin: There seems to be real reluctance from the Member and his party. Many people in Northern Ireland will be concerned that the Member and, indeed, his party want to let gangsters roam free and behave as they will. They are burying their heads in the sand if they believe that that is not happening. It clearly is, right across Northern Ireland. Police sources reckon that there are approximately 140 of these gangs. It is sad that we cannot get the terms to tackle those criminal gangsters.

Mr Givan: Will the Member give way?

Mr Irwin: I will.

Mr Givan: The Member will know that the Member for North Belfast is a very well educated man and very capable in his job. Does the Member share my concern that the SDLP and Sinn Féin are providing the obstacle to the Police Ombudsman being able to hold the NCA to account — currently for non-devolved matters and, into the future, for devolved matters — and that the SDLP and Sinn Féin are preventing the Chief Constable from being given primacy for the NCA's activities in Northern Ireland? They are the ones who are stopping accountability, as opposed to this party.

Mr Irwin: I thank the Member for his intervention. I agree with him absolutely. Representing a border constituency, I have a desire to see this criminality and its effects on innocent victims significantly stamped out. We have the chance to greatly increase the PSNI's capacity for dealing with it.

I urge the House, on behalf of the victims of such crime, to reconsider the matter and move quickly towards its implementation.

Mr G Kelly: I beg to move the amendment:

Leave out all after "calls for" and insert

"statutory provision to be made so that all members of the National Crime Agency on operational duty locally are subject to the same accountability mechanisms and bodies that govern the work of the PSNI and its officers."

Beidh mé ag labhairt in aghaidh an rúin seo. I will speak against the motion and for the amendment.

Let us make very clear some of the myths and, at minimum, exaggerations being pointed out here. The NCA already operates in the North on non-devolved matters. That means things like immigration, customs-related crime, fuel laundering and smuggling, which are some of the things that Mr Irwin mentioned. In a way, the core issues are simple, and he pointed them out. The first one is accountability, which was crucial to Patten, crucial to us and crucial to the new beginning to policing. I will return to assets recovery a bit later.

Why do we not want them to be unaccountable? Because our history has demonstrated what unaccountability does. Back in those times, you had a force within a force; you had shoot to kill; you had state agents involved in crime, right up to and including murder; you had confessions beaten out of people going through interrogation centres; and you had a police force — not a service — that acted as front line troops and was involved in collusion and corruption. If you want to know why we are so strong on the issue, the history and the evidence shows why. Let me say this: more recently —

Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice): Will the Member give way?

Mr G Kelly: No. You will have your chance to come back.

More recently, some ex-RUC people who left and got away from the accountability measures brought in by Patten came back in through the retire/rehire revolving door. We have seen that that was much abused in terms of where they were, which created a huge difficulty. At least some of them left specifically because there were accountability mechanisms there, so that they would come back as temporary workers and not be police officers, and then they went back to the old habits of non-accountability. I think that unionists are hankering back to the old situation, and, when there is an opportunity to move forward, they will not take that up.

Mr Humphrey: Will the Member give way?

Mr G Kelly: No, I will not give way.

You will also know that unionists signed up to Patten and eventually, after a long debate, to the transfer of those powers in 2010. Another myth that unionists are promoting — this debate came up close to a year ago — is that the pursuit of organised crime has ceased. Nothing could be further from the truth. The NCA cooperates with an Garda Síochána, the European law enforcement agencies, Interpol and other law enforcement agencies. This question needs to be asked: is the NCA refusing to give information or to cooperate with an Garda Síochána or any other force? The answer to that is no. Most importantly, is it refusing to give any of the information or cooperation that the PSNI needs? No, it is not. On child exploitation, which was mentioned, on drugs trafficking, on cross-border smuggling, on human trafficking — on all those accounts — the answer is no, because they are given the cooperation that is necessary to bring to book the people who are destroying our society. A perfect example of that quite recently was the finding of £100 million worth of drugs on a ship off the coast of Ireland, which the NCA was involved in and an Garda Síochána then moved on. They did not have to do that. It was an Garda Síochána who had the accountability mechanism there. [Interruption.] Maybe the hecklers will keep quiet, and I will get on with it.

I have spoken to Keith Bristow, and I know that he wants further cooperation: why would he not? I know that he wants further powers. In a certain way, people who are offered further powers always want them. Maybe that is fairly normal, except if you are in the DUP. Recently they were offered more powers similar to those that have been offered to Scotland and other places, but they seemed to refuse them. Specifically, Keith Bristow wanted the power of police officer for those in the NCA — incidentally, excluding himself. Of course, the British Home Secretary can sort that out. All she has to do is make them accountable to all the mechanisms. If they want the powers of a police officer, make them as accountable as all other police officers are in this jurisdiction in the North.

Mr Ford: Will the Member give way?

Mr G Kelly: No, I will not. [Interruption.] Folks, you will have your chance to come back on all this.

What are the unionists and, indeed, the British Home Secretary afraid of? If they agree that our police officers should be accountable — they have agreed to that — what is the problem? Why not make NCA officers accountable also? It is one of the things that I cannot understand, except that you may not agree to police officers themselves being accountable and that you want to go back to the past when that was the case.

Asset recovery is raised again and again. In this instance, the Justice Minister — I am sure that he will speak about it when he gets up — has the power to deal with asset recovery. My party and, I believe, other parties put it to him well before that power ceased last October, I think, that he could have a bespoke process of asset recovery that would take the assets of those involved in serious and organised crime who are destroying our society. He has refused and continues to refuse to go down the road of having an asset recovery process that can be used here.

Mr Ford: Will the Member give way?

Mr G Kelly: You are going to get up later, so by all means speak then.

Sinn Féin is up for asset recovery from those involved in serious and organised crime.

There is absolutely nothing to fear from accountability. I really do not understand what you are afraid of. The Member spoke about the ombudsman: the easy answer to that is that that will be involved if we can get the full suite of accountability mechanisms, which was agreed in Patten and should be brought in here. Our experience is that if you leave the loophole — there is a mass of empirical evidence — it will be abused, and that is what we are trying to avoid in this case.

I support the amendment. We should be united, not divided, in arguing for the necessary accountability measures.

Mr A Maginness: Although I disagree with the motion, I welcome the opportunity to debate this important issue and put the facts on the record. First, the SDLP is not opposed in principle to the NCA; we would welcome its resources and so forth. Certainly, we are not opposed to opposing criminality, whether it is organised criminality at an international level, at a national level or whatever. We are vigorously opposed to any form of criminality and welcome resources to deal with it.

Last week in the Chamber, we debated Kincora, and there was almost unanimity on the need for an investigation of that. It was widely accepted in the Chamber that the abuse that took place in Kincora was, in fact, covered up by the intelligence services. It highlights the need for the accountability that was dodged and avoided at St Andrews in relation to the intelligence services, and now it is a timely reminder to the House that the issues that arose in the debate on Kincora last week are relevant to this debate as well. Of course, we are not dealing with the intelligence services —

Mr Humphrey: Will the Member give way?

Mr A Maginness: Let me get on a bit. We are not dealing with the intelligence services per se, but we are dealing with an organisation that styles itself as the FBI of the UK. In those circumstances, you need special rules and regulations to deal with the accountability of that force in relation to Northern Ireland. We know the history of a force within a force, the misuse of the RUC by the intelligence services, the misuse of agents and so forth. We want to avoid that happening again, and we will be robust in defending that position. We do not need any lectures from people on dealing with criminality — we are firm on that — but there must be accountability.

Mr Humphrey: I am grateful to the Member for giving way. He is not frightened of debate, and I welcome that. You talk about resources being applied to dealing with the issue before the House. The last time we debated the issue in the House, the SDLP said that it had concerns — I understand that you are articulating them now — about accountability. You were going to have meetings with the Secretary of State and with the Justice Minister. I ask you this, in all sincerity: how regular have those meetings been? Are you making progress in dealing with the issues that you are concerned about?

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mr A Maginness: I am pleased that the Member has raised those issues. There was a very helpful letter from the Minister of Justice in relation to the NCA. That is no secret. In that, a number of issues were raised in it. I am not going to disclose what discussions we have had with the Minister of Justice or, indeed, with the NCA or the Chief Constable, but I will characterise our engagements with all those people as very positive. However, there are still issues to be addressed in relation to accountability. Until those issues are firmly tied down, we will not be supportive of the NCA, in operational terms, in Northern Ireland. I think that that is wise counsel. I do not believe that that is being thran or obtuse or trying to frustrate the rule of law. We know the history; we are right. We are going to get this right, and it is the right approach.

Mr Campbell: I thank the Member for giving way. He is outlining the concerns. He says that progress is being made and that helpful meetings have been held. Does he understand, however, that, while all those meetings are taking place, international criminal gangs are operating here in Northern Ireland, some of which could be prevented from doing so if we had the full implementation of the NCA? Does he accept and understand that?

Mr A Maginness: What I am saying to the House and what I understand very clearly is this: there is a problem with organised crime. We have to address that, and we will. We have PSNI resources here addressing it but not as fully as we want. However, as soon as there is agreement on the accountability measures that we have suggested, we will move towards that. The point I make and emphasise to the House is that, given the experience that we have had, we have got to tie these things down firmly and clearly. It is not right for people to simply say, "Well, look, there's the NCA. We've got parliamentary Committees looking at the NCA, and we've got the Home Secretary and so forth". We cannot accept that. It must be internal to Northern Ireland. The operations of the NCA must be subject to the PSNI and the Chief Constable and accountable to the Policing Board.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is up.

Mr A Maginness: That is the appropriate approach. That is what we want to see happening.

Mr Dickson: Will the Member give way?

Mr A Maginness: Yes.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Thank you. I call Mr Tom Elliott.

Mr Elliott: Thank you, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker. I am not going to give way to Mr Dickson at this stage.

I believe that the secret is in the name: National Crime Agency. It appears that the two nationalist or republican parties are opposed to it simply because it is a UK national crime agency. What could be wrong with trying to curtail, cut out and stop crime? I am not sure what the argument is about.

1.00 pm

I heard Mr Maginness and others talk about accountability. Let us not forget that, a number of years ago, they approved the devolution of justice here with SOCA in place. The NCA will have much more accountability than SOCA had, so I do not see what the problem is with allowing an organisation to manage itself in Northern Ireland to beat international crime. This is not just about local criminals and localised crime but about international crime. This is about crime that is going on throughout the world that we can do something to stop. Criminals will see Northern Ireland as a back door to the United Kingdom and a back door to Ireland to carry out their criminal activities, and, my goodness, have we not seen plenty of it in Northern Ireland with fuel smuggling, fuel laundering, and contraband cigarettes and alcohol? Why do people not want to curtail that? Why do people not want to stop human trafficking and to use the NCA as a mechanism for doing that? I do not see why people do not want to do that. I do not see why people want to try to curtail the process.

On accountability, I understand that the NCA would not have the powers of a constable in Northern Ireland. I recognise that the two nationalist parties were willing to jump on board with Haass and approve a historical investigations unit. As I understand it, that would have been a stand-alone police force in Northern Ireland separate from anything that you have in the Police Service of Northern Ireland. Were there going to be accountability mechanisms there? I never heard any of the nationalist parties argue for that in the Haass talks, not once. So, I think that people need to get real.

Mr Attwood: Will the Member give way?

Mr Elliott: The only argument that I hear against this from the nationalist parties is that they do not want the National Crime Agency because it is part of the UK. What have you to fear? I will give way to Mr Attwood.

Mr Attwood: For the record, the Haass proposals said that the new arrangements would be accountable to the Police Ombudsman and the Policing Board. We opposed that, because we believed that the new arrangements proposed under Haass should have their own, separate accountability mechanisms. So, yes, we did make the argument. Maybe on those occasions you were not listening very carefully.

Mr Elliott: Mr Attwood is accepting that it was going to operate separately, outside the Police Service of Northern Ireland. He is then concerned that the NCA has accountability mechanisms to the Police Service of Northern Ireland. What does he want? He cannot have it every way. He seems to want his cake and eat it, but, unfortunately, no matter what argument he puts forward, this is because it is a UK national crime agency. That is the reality of it. They just do not want anything that is British in Northern Ireland. Let us get of rid it all. Let us not have it here because it is a UK-established force. I say this to those Members who do not want it: what are you afraid of? Is it maybe because it will investigate some of the criminal activities that maybe some Members in the House have a relationship with? I do not know. Maybe they will tell me. There should be nothing to stop the National Crime Agency from operating to its full potential in Northern Ireland. I think that nationalists and republicans are using excuses, and that is all that it is.

Mr Dickson: I welcome the debate, and I want to make it very clear that we are supporting the motion and opposing the amendment.

The motion does give us an opportunity to debunk some of the myths and, indeed, fears that have been created around this particular organisation. There is absolutely no doubt that the absence of a fully functioning National Crime Agency is negatively impacting on our ability to deal with serious and organised crime. Clear, precise and statistical evidence is available and has been since the National Crime Agency came into being on 7 October 2013. What bit of "Since 2013, you have had time to sort all of this out" do you not understand?

Mr A Maginness: What about accountability?

Mr Dickson: I will come on to accountability.

The Justice Minister has said that there is now clear evidence of a major gap in our ability to tackle serious crime. We are not isolated or immune from these problems in Northern Ireland. There is, as others have said, people trafficking, extortion, money laundering, robbery, drug smuggling and many other serious crimes going on. There are people in this House who, by their actions, are assisting all those crimes to take place. Let us not put too fine a point on it: there are people in this place who are assisting and allowing those crimes to proceed against our citizens in Northern Ireland. Shame upon you.

There are international issues that require an international response, and the purpose of the NCA is to connect our neighbourhood policing to our national policing and our international crime-fighting agencies. The effect of the NCA not operating was explained in more detail recently by the Minister when he told us that there are examples involving child abuse, money laundering and drug importation where the responses were arguably less effective than they could have been had we been able to join up right from the very ground, from neighbourhood policing through national policing in Northern Ireland and right across the UK, reaching right across Europe and beyond its borders.

We have seen an effect on asset recovery. The police are unable to target the assets of criminals. That is less money that is being taken off criminals. We know that the proceeds of that go to communities, but the important thing is that many criminals can only be dealt with effectively by hitting them where it hurts, and that is quite often in the pocket. We are facing international criticism, as has been referred to, with the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child having expressed strong concerns about the absence of necessary powers to effectively address child exploitation.

Our police resources are under strain, and we have all heard the debate around the Budget in recent days. The effect of that and the failure to introduce the NCA has been to skew resources to the PSNI that could have been met nationally by the NCA. You are effectively making us pay for things that other people in the rest of the United Kingdom are having paid for them through the NCA. There is a serious and urgent need for a solution.

While it appears to me at least that Sinn Féin is beyond the pale in this debate, it is disappointing that the SDLP has still not been able to come up to the mark when it comes to acknowledging what has been done and what has been achieved since the agency came into force in 2013. They have fears and concerns, but I believe that they have been addressed and that now is the time to accept that they have been addressed. You cannot have everything and you will not get everything, but the time has come to accept that what is on offer is not only the best for all the citizens in Northern Ireland but substantially more than in many other regions in the rest of the United Kingdom.

Let us be absolutely clear what has been offered. The NCA cannot use constabulary powers without the approval of the Chief Constable. The director general can be called to attend the Policing Board, making him answerable on how its annual plan is to be implemented, taking account of the Northern Ireland policing plan. The Police Ombudsman's remit will cover all functions of the NCA, and the Criminal Justice Inspection's role will be extended. It is therefore nonsensical for parties to suggest that there is lack of accountability. There is more accountability here than in any other part of the United Kingdom.

Mr Campbell: I thank the Member for giving way. I am glad that he is outlining the degree of accountability that exists. It is just unfortunate that the mover of the amendment has absented himself from the Chamber. He outlined the exact opposite and said that there is no accountability.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Member has almost a minute left.

Mr Dickson: I wholeheartedly agree with Mr Campbell. Indeed, it is increasingly looking like a deliberate plan to oppose the NCA in all circumstances rather than to accept —

Mrs D Kelly: Will the Member give way?

Mr Dickson: I would have except that the Speaker has only given me one minute and I need to finish this.

It is looking like a deliberate plan to oppose the NCA and its operation in Northern Ireland in all circumstances. Members now need to show maturity and recognise the significant package that is on offer. I encourage Mr Maginness and others to weigh up what is now being offered. You are not going to cross every t and dot every last i when it comes to this. What is on your shopping list is not necessarily on everybody else's shopping list. There are many in the community —

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is up.

Mr Dickson: — who will ask, after this debate, why the SDLP is acting so unreasonably and not picking up on what has been offered to defend all our citizens, which is the introduction of the NCA.

Mr Givan: Tomorrow is the first anniversary of the National Crime Agency. Unfortunately, the only people celebrating will be the criminals involved in human trafficking, drug dealing and some of the vilest crimes that they can inflict on our people in Northern Ireland. People should remember who benefits most from the inability of the SDLP and Sinn Féin to deal maturely and responsibly with the issue. It is no surprise that Sinn Féin cannot do so, but the SDLP is letting down the people of Northern Ireland because of its inability to step out from the shadow that Sinn Féin cast upon it. For too long, they have kowtowed to Sinn Féin on a whole range of policy matters, and here they are doing exactly the same when it comes to policing.

Mr A Maginness: Will the Member give way?

Mr Givan: I will give way to Mr Maginness.

Mr A Maginness: As a simple matter of history, the SDLP joined the Policing Board in 2001; and, in 2007, Sinn Féin joined the Policing Board in the wake of the SDLP and on the basis of the good work that the SDLP had done to build up the PSNI. That is history, so we are not in the shadow of Sinn Féin whatsoever.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mr Givan: Ever since Sinn Féin eclipsed the SDLP in electoral terms, the SDLP has done nothing to try to differentiate itself from the largest nationalist party, and it is time that it started to do that.

Members have highlighted the fact the NCA will not have constabulary powers unless the Chief Constable grants it those powers. The new beginning to policing that Sinn Féin and the SDLP talked about included the Serious Organised Crime Agency continuing to function. The devolution of justice allowed the Serious Organised Crime Agency to continue to function, but now that SOCA has been dismissed and the NCA has come in, they want to revisit all of this and wind the clock back.

Mr Byrne: Will the Member give way?

Mr Givan: No, I will not give way again; I want to make some progress.

Either the two parties got it wrong in the first place and should admit that they got it wrong when they set up the Policing Board and those structures, or they are misleading people by the arguments that they are making here today. Members need to be very serious about this issue because we are talking about serious crime.

Sinn Féin and the SDLP often use the United Nations to advance their progressive, as they deem them, human rights policies. Yet here we have the UN highlighting a serious concern about the rights of children, and they just dismiss what it has to say. I am not usually an advocate of the United Nations, but, on this occasion, it is right. Members who usually support the UN should take some cognisance of what it has to say.

Then we have the PSNI budget and the strain that it is under. Mr Kelly, who is no longer here, interestingly, refused to engage in debate and has now run away, not for the first time, from the debate. He and Mr Maginness continually talk about the cost of policing Twaddell, for example, and yet here we have Westminster wanting to pay for policing in Northern Ireland. However, the nationalist parties are saying that they do not want Westminster to pay for that. When it comes to welfare reform, Westminster needs to open up the coffers and give them the money. They want Westminster then, but when it comes to policing, they do not want the support of a national body. They would rather that the PSNI, which does not have the resources or, let us be clear, the same expertise and specialism as the National Crime Agency in dealing with matters of human trafficking and child exploitation —

Mr Newton: I thank the Member for giving way. My point specifically relates to the point that he is making about the lack of information. Does he agree that, had the unfortunate people in the Tilbury docks incident not created a row and the container had completed its journey, it is unlikely that the information would have been available within the PSNI to pick up, arrest and take before the courts those now alleged to have been involved?

Mr Givan: I agree. The Member brings us back to a very important point: we are talking about human lives. This is not some technical bureaucratic matter; it is about the impact on real people through not being able to effectively tackle those who are involved in serious organised crime.

As Members rightly highlighted, the NCA currently operates in Northern Ireland but is not subject to the levels of accountability that Members would want. Again, I was not a proponent of setting up the Police Ombudsman's office, but that office would, under these proposals brought forward by the Minister, be able to hold the NCA to account on devolved and non-devolved matters.

There has got to be a point at which people realise that there is a compromise on the table. I would suggest that the compromise nearly goes too far, but we do not always get everything that we want. Members need to recognise that this is as good as it is going to get. There will not be any point in the NCA being in existence if Members want to thwart its ability to tackle crime.

We need to bring this matter to a conclusion. I ask the Minister to bring forward the legislative consent motion (LCM) that is necessary. If he cannot do it, I will work with the Alliance Party and one of its members to bring an LCM to this House. Let us have the debate and let us have the vote on this issue. I trust that Members would not abuse the petition of concern if it came to that point.

Mr Lynch: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. I oppose the motion but support the amendment.

Let me deal with the first part of the motion:

"That this Assembly condemns the increasing number of illegal activities being carried out by organised criminal gangs".

Sinn Féin totally supports that part of the motion. We have consistently condemned criminal activity. Communities have a right to live in a safe environment, not to be impacted upon by these criminal gangs and to feel secure and safe in their homes. However, communities and citizens must be protected through the oversight and accountability of law enforcement agencies. This is the crux of the issue. The NCA, fully implemented in the North of Ireland, will, in effect, be accountable to the Home Secretary and not the Policing Board.

As recently as last week, the Minister responded to my colleague Raymond McCartney on the issue of tackling serious crime, and on making the NCA effective and, most importantly, making it accountable. The Minister said nothing to explain why he believes that all members of the NCA should be subject to the same accountability structures as all members of the PSNI.

Mr Ford: Will the Member give way?

Mr Lynch: No. You will have your say, Minister.

No real claim has been made to date to demonstrate that policing serious and organised crime will be ineffective if the NCA is not fully implemented.

Mr Newton: Will the Member give way?

Mr Lynch: No. If your name is down, you will have your five minutes.

Indeed, there has been opposition to the present NCA model from former senior officers. In reading part of the motion, one would be led to believe that, unless the NCA is not fully involved in this part of Ireland, society will be left to the complete mercy of these gangs. What is the role of the PSNI in tackling organised criminal activity? This is a service that has a budget of almost £1 billion and 7,000 personnel. On the other hand, in the South of Ireland, an Garda Síochána polices four-fifths of this island with a similar budget and under 12,000 personnel. It has to deal with similar organised activity.

The parties opposite argue that, if the NCA is not established in full, there will be limited access to NCA intelligence. That is not true. The previous Chief Constable, Matt Baggott, in answering a question from Pat Sheehan at a Policing Board meeting about whether there would be any restrictions on information-sharing between any of the law enforcement agencies on these islands, answered with an emphatic no. As my colleague Gerry Kelly said in his speech, only last week, we had a good example of this type of sharing of information, where the gardaí arrested a number of criminals off the coast of Cork and captured one of the biggest hauls of cocaine ever in these islands. This was a joint task force involving the Air Corps, revenue services, naval services and the gardaí.

Mr Liam Peakin, the head of the Irish Customs Drug Watch and Law Enforcement department, said afterwards that they have the resources to tackle major drug dealers and that it was an international intelligence-led operation that involved agencies outside Ireland.

Mr Campbell: Will the Member give way?

Mr Lynch: No. That confirmed the point that Matt Baggott made to Pat Sheehan last year. During the arrests and seizure in Cork, the guards were in total control of the operation on Irish soil. There is no bigger crime than trying to land £100 million worth of cocaine in this country, North or South.

I want to close on the aspect of the motion that calls for the full implementation of the NCA to:

"help deal with this problem which is particularly prevalent in border areas."

I live close to Monaghan, Cavan and Leitrim and meet senior PSNI officers regularly. There is no evidence that major organised crime is greater in that region. One of the organised activities in the area is livestock and farm machinery theft. Only last week —

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is almost up.

Mr Lynch: — the gardaí were successful in an operation against those who are involved in that in County Monaghan, using information from the PSNI. The law enforcement agencies on the island of Ireland are capable of tackling serious and organised criminality without the full involvement —

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is up.

Mr Lynch: — of the unaccountable NCA.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is up. Thank you.

Mr Poots: It was an interesting line that the previous Member who spoke took. He seemed to support cuts to policing and railed against everything that was suggested last week about the pressures that police would be put under. He has made it very clear that Sinn Féin thinks that we can do with considerably less police and the services they provide in Northern Ireland. I am interested in hearing that argument develop over the next number of days.

The Assembly does not often bring good news to people, but good news is going out today. There is good news for fuel launderers, cigarette and alcohol smugglers, drug barons, pimps, human traffickers, gangmasters, fraudsters, those who are wrecking our environment through illegal dumping and, of course, the paramilitary organisations. They are getting that good news free and gratis from none other than Sinn Féin — we would well expect them to give them that good news — and the SDLP. They are hiding behind a fig leaf of accountability, but, behind their fig leaf, all we see is nakedness. They have no real substance to their argument, and all those whom I named will be better off as a consequence of their activities.

Mr Wilson: Will the Member give way?

Mr Poots: Yes.

Mr Wilson: I am sure that the Member is not surprised that Sinn Féin wants to protect criminals, especially since most of the criminals who have been referred to were probably their compatriots not so long ago. Does he find it surprising that the SDLP is complicit in that protection of criminals in Northern Ireland and is allowing them to walk away with ill-gotten gains and terrorise the communities in which they operate?

Mr Poots: I know that the public will be hugely disappointed. For a considerable period of time, the SDLP have positioned themselves as the stooges of Sinn Féin. They will never separate themselves from Sinn Féin on any of the big issues. They are like rabbits caught in the headlights.

Mr Byrne: I thank Mr Poots for giving way. Would he accept that it is virtually impossible to run a family-owned private business in parts of Belfast in the pub trade, the fuel business or in amusement arcades? We have the abuse of an official mechanism known as the national charities registry. Fronts for paramilitaries on both sides have become legitimised and a blind eye is being turned to that. We want the NCA to be effective in that regard as well as on the other issues and to have real accountability.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Member has an extra minute

Mr Poots: Of course I agree with the Member. That is why we want it to happen. That is why we need it to happen. The Member has stated very clearly that the current arrangements are ineffective. Meanwhile, the SDLP are wringing their hands and saying that they cannot change it because we do not have as much accountability for the NCA as we have for the PSNI. It is not that we do not have accountability. It is that we do not have as much accountability as we have —

Mr Byrne: Will the Member give way?

Mr Poots: — no, I am not giving way again, Mr Byrne — with the PSNI. We really need to move ahead with this, and the SDLP needs to look at themselves and who they are lining up with on this. They are lining up with Sinn Féin and all of the other people that I named at the start. The SDLP needs to reconsider their position. If they have genuine concerns, get them dealt with and let us move on. This business of carrying on and on and on, and delaying, delaying and delaying is brilliant news for all those criminals and gangsters out there.

Mr Frew: I thank the Member for giving way. May I ask a question about the SDLP fighting for accountability? Does the Member know how accountable accountability is? At what cost will that come when we look at criminals who will be able to infiltrate Northern Ireland?

Mr Poots: Accountability is certainly being placed on a pedestal well above actually catching criminals. The public are fed up. I remember, when I was Minister of the Environment, going to Newry and Mourne District Council, and it was fed up with having to clean up the aftermath of fuel launderers who left materials and toxic waste dumped at the side of the road. The council had to spend £1,000 a ton to get rid of it. They are fed up with it. The public are fed up with people having fuel laundering plants dismantled, but nobody ever appearing to be arrested. Who is operating these fuel laundering plants? We need to go after these people in a serious way and ensure that all of the tools are used to tackle it.

The public are fed up with illegal dumps across Northern Ireland, and we do not have that specialist service and support from the National Crime Agency. The public are fed up with the human trafficking that is taking place; with the young girls that are being brought into prostitution and who are being used and abused; with the people who are working in the back streets as cheap labour for gangmasters. We need all the resource that we can get to support us.

George Hamilton made it abundantly clear last week that he does not have that resource. There is the opportunity for us to introduce additional resource to Northern Ireland. There is the opportunity for those people to be held to account —

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is almost up.

Mr Poots: — in a number of different ways. Get on board, and let us get this organisation in here and get its help.

Mr Attwood: Whilst he did not realise it, Mr Poots has just made my argument. He went on and on — rightly — about illegal fuel dumps. He said, "Sign up to the NCA, because that will deal with it." Explain, then, why, despite the efforts of the PSNI, SOCA and other agencies on this island, virtually nobody has ever been before a criminal court in relation to such matters? If you want us to support the NCA, it has a responsibility to us — to everybody — to prove that it will go after fuel launderers.

The biggest waste dump in the history of these islands lies two miles outside Derry, on top of the River Faughan. Those responsible for it got £50 million out of that dump. It will cost £110 million to clean it up, and that is independent of any leachate that is likely to gush into the River Faughan and the River Foyle, and yet —

Mr Newton: Will the Member give way?

Mr Attwood: Not to you. I will give way to other people. [Laughter.] He knows why. That Member knows why.

Yet the police knew nothing about it. The Serious Organised Crime Agency knew nothing about it. It was not on the radar of the organisation that David Ford chairs, namely the Organised Crime Task Force. Nobody knew about the biggest waste dump in the history of these islands. So we have asked the NCA this: convince us that those responsible for that — the organised crime on the island of Ireland — will never again be able to get away with something like that. Show us that all those private arrangements that SOCA enters into — probably not many — are approved by the High Court and that that will become the rule of thumb of the NCA. That is the way to deal with organised crime — by going after all of those involved and ensuring that there are no no-go zones when it comes to organised crime.

Let me explain. [Interruption.] You might laugh. I will give way to you if you have any questions.

1.30 pm

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Mr Attwood, I may not be able to award you an extra minute if you take interventions. The same goes for Members who speak after you. I am bound by the Business Committee's ruling on the timing of the debate. It is your choice.

Mr Attwood: I was not aware of that ruling. I will check the Speaker's rulings, as I have tended to do.

Let me deal with the issue of the SDLP approach. When it was right to move on policing because the accountability threshold was sufficient, we moved on policing. Why is accountability so important? It is not technical, which is how Mr Givan referred to it. Accountability is the method of ensuring that an organisation accounts for its practices. In that moment, you win community confidence. Any police officer, NCA official or anybody involved in crime enforcement will tell you that community intelligence is at the heart of good attacks on crime. By having proper accountability, you have the mechanisms to ensure that, when the community has doubts, it can have confidence and, when the community has confidence, it provides information and intelligence to the crime agencies, including the NCA.

Paragraph 13 of the Minister's paper says that the Police Service, by giving agreement to operations, becomes accountable to the board for that activity. Does that or does that not mean that all the board's accountability mechanisms — public sessions, private sessions, special committees, section 59 and section 60 requests and all the other arrangements of policing that the SDLP negotiated — will be in place in respect of the NCA? Paragraph 10 of the paper says that the NCA will be required to secure the agreement of the PSNI prior to commencing covert investigations. Does that or does that not mean that all agents involved in that activity will be subject to PSNI requirements? If the PSNI says that they are vetoed, will that mean vetoed, rather than vetoed to a degree? Paragraph 25 is the elephant in the room. Is it credible in this day and age for a Home Secretary, by order, to say that the NCA shall deal with counterterrorism, that there is no role for the Executive or the Policing Board in the North, with all our experience —

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is up.

Mr Attwood: — with the security agency and policing in the past? I ask those questions to represent our concerns.

Mr Nesbitt: The Home Secretary established the National Crime Agency in 2010. Its purpose is:

“to lead the UK's fight to cut serious and organised crime.”

I repeat: “the UK's fight”. According to the NCA, serious and:

I repeat: “the UK's national security”. It is an organisation designed to have national and international reach. It is meant to have:

“the mandate and powers to work in partnership with other law enforcement organisations to bring the full weight of the law to bear in cutting serious and organised crime.”

The problem is that the national reach is restricted here in Northern Ireland. The NCA does not have the same mandate and powers in Northern Ireland as in the rest of the United Kingdom. The problem is that it cannot bring the full weight of the law to bear on criminals based here. Those dedicated to child abuse or child exploitation or those who make a twisted living from cybercrime, drugs and the rest find Northern Ireland an attractive place to base themselves.

The NCA is designed to respond on a 24/7 basis. It has three tools in its armoury: it conducts its own operations, it provides operational and specialist support to its partners and it provides clear national leadership that ensures that the UK's law enforcement makes the best of its collective resources. Given that we all woke up this morning to the latest example of how our Budget is broken, with the cuts in the events budget, what responsible politician would not want the full resources of the NCA in play in Northern Ireland? Who, other than the organised criminals themselves, could object to the PSNI being able to call on the expertise of such a body? It is not as if the PSNI has access to the same expertise and specialist knowledge within its own ranks. Even if it did, only last week, the Chief Constable laid out starkly the seriousness of the situation facing the PSNI and its service delivery, following the latest round of budget cuts. Speaking on Thursday, George Hamilton made it clear that the cuts would make the PSNI “unrecognisable”. He said that he had been pushed into a “virtually impossible” position and that there would be fewer officers, longer waiting times for non-emergency calls and possibly compulsory retirements. Quite simply, the PSNI and Northern Ireland plc need the National Crime Agency. If it is OK for the NCA to lift suspected child abusers in England, Scotland and Wales, why is it not OK for them to do it in Northern Ireland? Why do they have to ask the Chief Constable to eat into his overstretched resources to make those arrests in this part of the United Kingdom?

Opposition to the NCA has been couched in terms of concerns about oversight arrangements, but many people — not all of them unionist — have grave concerns that that opposition is rooted more in a nationalist ideological opposition to a UK-wide body operating in this part of the United Kingdom. As Mr Elliott reminded the House, when the proposals for dealing with the past were brought forward by Richard Haass, nationalists seemed happy for a new, separate police force operating here called the historical investigations unit (HIU). That would have been utterly unaccountable to the PSNI. It would have been OK for the HIU to do its own thing but not the NCA. Opponents may argue that there was more chance of the NCA and the PSNI investigating the same individuals at the same time for different reasons, but no one can tell me that there was not a chance that the HIU and the PSNI would also have investigated the same individuals at the same time, each ignorant of the other's intent and therefore each capable of derailing the other's investigation.

The bottom line is that Northern Ireland and its people do not enjoy the same protection as the rest of the United Kingdom, and that is not acceptable. Police assessments state that there are 140 gangs operating in Northern Ireland. The Ulster Unionist Party wants to see the PSNI given access to every possible resource as it works day and daily to fight crime and protect our people. There is no question whatsoever that opposition from the SDLP and Sinn Féin is severely limiting how much the NCA can do in Northern Ireland. On that basis, we reject the amendment and support the motion.

Mr Ford: I welcome the fact that we have the motion before the House today, as I am glad of the opportunity to share with Members the difficulties being faced by law enforcement agencies because of the ongoing situation with the non-operability in the devolved sphere of the National Crime Agency.

As has already been highlighted — Mr Givan referred to the first birthday being tomorrow — the NCA came into operation on 7 October last year, and we have still to reach agreement on its powers extending fully here with appropriate accountability mechanisms.

I have been having talks in recent weeks with most of the Executive parties on the proposal paper that I put forward. There is a significant gap in our law enforcement ability, as anyone who read the Chief Constable's recent comments in the 'Belfast Telegraph' would have seen. It concerns me, as Justice Minister, that we do not have access to the skills and expertise that are available from the NCA and are not easily available to the PSNI. These are not issues of minor crime; they are issues of serious and organised crime both in Northern Ireland and with a reach across these islands and the world.

Recent PSNI figures estimate that 140 to 160 organised crime groups are active in Northern Ireland and there are 800 active criminals. We have had descriptions from different parts of the House of the impacts of organised crime, whether it be drug dealing, fuel laundering, waste dumping or the increasing problem of cybercrime, on which there is a very limited pool of expertise to tackle it at the highest level. We all know, because we discuss it frequently in the House, the damage that human trafficking does: it destroys lives. Northern Ireland is both a transit country and a destination for many traffickers. I believe that the PSNI does an excellent job, but there is no doubt that, once criminals start operating across jurisdictions and international boundaries, as many crime groups do, it needs the support of the NCA, just as the Irish authorities — we had a list from Mr Lynch of all the Irish authorities involved — benefited from that support from the NCA recently when they seized the yacht carrying a significant amount of cocaine. The amount seems to inflate as the debate goes on. I am not sure that it has reached £100 million yet, but it was a significant and serious issue. There is a certain irony that an Garda Síochána can benefit from the full cooperation of the NCA to deal with arresting the occupants of a yacht off the waters of County Cork while some Members of the House will stop the PSNI getting the full benefit. What is even more ironic is that Gerry Kelly, who is, of course, not present in the House, managed to highlight that as one of the specific issues. If I were Gerry Kelly, I would not have scored an own goal like that.

On a resource level, there is absolutely no doubt that, at a time of increasing pressures, the PSNI must be able to tap into the resources that the NCA can provide to undertake or assist in operations. If the PSNI cannot access those resources, we will see officers being redeployed from the crimes that they should be dealing with in the purely devolved, local criminal sphere to deal with the organised issues. NCA officers are currently sitting in Belfast doing back-office work for police services in England, Wales and Scotland because they are not allowed to be operational here. That, at a time of increasing pressures, is utterly ridiculous.

Many Members will have seen the paper that the Chief Constable circulated after he received it from the director general of the National Crime Agency. The paper looked at some of the issues for which we have simply not got the resources that we need to deal with organised crime. I highlighted that at Question Time last week, but let me refer to just a few of those points. Operation Notarise, the UK-wide operation against online child abuse, could not get direct support from NCA officers in Northern Ireland. The PSNI had to carry out the duties that were performed by NCA officers elsewhere, on the basis that the Child Exploitation and Online Protection Centre has been absorbed into the NCA. That is where the UK-wide expertise is, yet those officers cannot be operational on the ground in Northern Ireland. We had an issue of money laundering using pre-payment cards where there was serious need for a complex financial investigation, which, again, is part of the NCA's expertise, but it could not be provided.

Mr Attwood highlighted the issue of the largest waste dump found, I think, anywhere on these islands, on the banks of the Faughan. The NCA was unable to continue the assistance that SOCA gave in the early stages with financial investigations, because it was a devolved issue and the NCA could not continue to provide that support.

Mr Poots: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Ford: I will give way.

Mr Poots: Mr Attwood was also responsible for an organisation called the Northern Ireland Environment Agency (NIEA), which had a key role to play in that. For him simply to place the blame on the National Crime Agency, which did not have the powers to act, is wholly spurious.

Mr Ford: What I want to see —

Mrs D Kelly: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Ford: Aw, come on. [Laughter.] I want to see all the relevant agencies joining together in the way that the NIEA was able to send people to the next meeting of the Organised Crime Task Force to discuss some of those issues. Unfortunately, that assistance could not continue. I give way.

Mrs D Kelly: Thank you, Minister. What is totally spurious, of course, was Mr Poots's allegation. As the Minister will know, it was Mr Attwood and the NIEA that highlighted that waste dump, and the NIEA brought to bear its full powers on that.

Mr Ford: Yes, but the point that I am trying to make about joining up is that the NIEA had the duty to identify it, because that is its specific role, but the financial expertise was best available from SOCA, which was then absorbed into the NCA, and that expertise could not continue from within the NCA. We will call that a score draw between Mrs Kelly and Mr Poots.

One other issue that I highlighted last week was the NCA requiring PSNI assistance to search the homes of suspected drug dealers. Other serious incidents under way meant that the PSNI could not respond as quickly as it had hoped in circumstances that may have led to evidence being removed. If the NCA had operational officers here, that work would have been carried out by them. We have already seen the issue of the PSNI losing officers to cover work that the NCA would do otherwise, but in terms of priorities and the difficult pressures that the PSNI is under, as the current budget changes come through, it becomes increasingly difficult for the PSNI to do what is its responsibility, without also carrying out the NCA's responsibility, and to provide the services that our people expect.

1.45 pm

I mentioned it earlier, but let us repeat it: the NCA is the UK centre of expertise in many areas around cybercrime and, in particular, child exploitation online. Those areas cause huge concerns to the people of Northern Ireland. They are areas where the NCA can give arm's-length advice and assistance. The kind of line that was coming from the Sinn Féin Benches was that they can help and they can provide the information. Sure they can, but they cannot put operational officers on the ground — the people who have the direct experience — to go in and investigate what is happening. They have to pass the information on to the PSNI, and the PSNI then has the obligation to carry things through, whereas the expertise and the information reside with NCA.

Of course, one of the key issues is around civil recovery, on which there was a noticeable reluctance on Mr Kelly's part to take any intervention, because it is really the intervention to target the assets of local criminals. That has been lost since 7 October last year. It has not been hampered or reduced and nor does it require additional resources — it has been lost. Mr Kelly spoke about the idea of setting up a separate body for Northern Ireland. Gee, look at the successes we have had on legislation in this place around contentious issues. We have just introduced the Education Bill about three years later than it should have been introduced. If education is contentious, heaven spare us from what would happen if we were required to do separate legislation for our own bespoke body. There is a body that is capable of carrying out civil recovery: the NCA. It is operational in England, Wales and Scotland, and it needs to be operational here to tackle the organised criminals who seek to secrete assets in Northern Ireland.

Mr Wilson: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Ford: I will give way.

Mr Wilson: Does the Minister also accept that setting up a separate body involves additional cost? It still means that there has to be liaison with another body and that is where the gaps in effectiveness fall in dealing with crime that is seamless across international borders.

Mr Ford: Agreed entirely. I was trying to get on and not mention everything, but I am sure that, to the people we represent, the idea of criminals living with their assets secreted in Northern Ireland in lives of luxury, in the middle of what this society is going through, is utterly unacceptable. It is not just people living the life of luxury; it is luxury derived from the misery of other people. At the moment we are doing nothing to tackle it in this jurisdiction. Those are reasons why I believe that we must get the issue of the NCA resolved urgently.

Mr Givan: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Ford: Briefly.

Mr Givan: Is the Minister able to quantify the millions of pounds — just so that we can crystallise the issue for the public — and the extent to which criminals are benefiting and have that money in their back pocket? It would appear that it is not just the millions of pounds they have in their back pocket; it is Sinn Féin and the SDLP as well.

Mr Ford: In brief, the figures show that, last year, there was something like £19 million under investigation in Northern Ireland. This year, it is down to eight-point-something million pounds. I do not have the figures immediately in front of me, but those are roughly accurate.

The proposal that I put forward involved detailed work with the Home Office, the NCA, the Northern Ireland Office, the PSNI and others. In my view, it set out extensive accountability arrangements in line with local requirements and represents a sound and final proposal to enable progress. It represents a realistic, achievable framework. The question is what sort of society we want. Do we want to hamper law enforcement when there is a sensible package available for help?

We had a lot of naysaying in the debate. I will come on to some of the comments that were made by Mr Attwood in particular in a moment, but there was a lot of naysaying from Sinn Féin with absolutely nothing specific. Indeed, Gerry Kelly, in saying nothing at all specific, showed such confidence in his argument that he did not accept a single intervention from any other Member during his 10 minutes. That is an indication of a man who has real confidence in the argument that he is putting forward — real confidence that he has got it right and can deal with interventions from anybody else.

If the situation is not resolved soon, we will have to make arrangements to fill the gaps, because we will have to accept failure. I do not believe that the Assembly should accept failure in this area. I trust that all Members will agree to the motion, and I will certainly oppose the amendment as it is currently formulated, because I believe that it is flawed.

The law already has many different requirements for the NCA because it is a body in Westminster and accountable to the Home Secretary. I will take a quick intervention.

Mr Campbell: The Minister talked about taking steps to fill the gaps. Has he any idea of the cost implications of those measures?

Mr Ford: I think that the technical term is "quite horrific".

The amendment refers to accountability. Let us unpack this and look at what we have. We have the accountability of the NCA to the Policing Board. The director general is required to attend meetings of the Policing Board on request; to consult the board on, and seek its prior consent to, his plans; and to take account of the board's policing plan. The NCA could not exercise constabulary powers or covert investigation powers without the agreement of the Chief Constable. Let me repeat that: the NCA could not exercise those powers without the agreement of the Chief Constable, and the Chief Constable is accountable to the board.

Unlike SOCA, all the NCA's functions, as highlighted earlier, would be subject to investigation by the Police Ombudsman. There would be, through the Police Ombudsman, accountability for all devolved, non-devolved and civil recovery issues. In addition, Criminal Justice Inspection would cover the NCA, as would Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Constabulary (HMIC). So let us not pretend that there is insufficient accountability. I believe that the accountability certainly exceeds that in the rest of the UK and, arguably, in some areas, that of the PSNI.

Mr Attwood made three specific points relating to the paper that I circulated earlier. Let me just respond briefly. He referred to paragraph 13, where it is clear that the accountability of the NCA is to the Chief Constable and the board. Paragraph 10 deals with covert operations and makes it clear that they would be only by agreement with the Chief Constable and subject to the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000 (RIPA) and the Police Act 2000. Mr Attwood also referred to paragraph 25. I believe that the Department of Justice is bound by annex E to the St Andrews Agreement, which clearly shows how that would be carried through. Indeed, the suggestion from the Home Secretary is that an issue of national intelligence would be carried through only for England and Wales. So there are very clear points there. However, I am grateful that Mr Attwood — unlike Sinn Féin Members — at least put forward some specific concerns and that there has been engagement with the SDLP. I trust that we will very shortly wrap up those final issues.

I also had concerns when I first heard of the Home Secretary's plans for the NCA. That is why I sought and achieved many changes in its operations, and significant discussion has been going on. However, we are now at the end of the road. It is time that Members accepted that we have a good deal. We should resolve these final issues that need to be tweaked; reject the amendment; and pass the motion and the LCM to ensure that we get the benefit of NCA to protect the people of Northern Ireland.

Mr McCartney: Beidh mé ag labhairt in aghaidh an rúin agus ag tabhairt tacaíochta don leasú. I support the amendment and opposed the motion. Let me say first that Gerry Kelly was called away on an urgent matter. I notice that others who made contributions also left the Chamber, but the Minister did not draw any inference from the fact that Alex Attwood was not here.

Mr Ford: Will the Member give way?

Mr McCartney: I have five minutes, and I am not giving way.

Mr Ford: Alex Attwood apologised to me.

Mr McCartney: Gerry Kelly did not apologise to you, perhaps because he did not have the chance to do so, but I noticed that you drew no inference from the fact that Alex Attwood was not here, nor did you say that he had apologised to you. I find you very defensive on this issue. At the core — [Interruption.]

Mr Wilson: You still have a rubbish argument

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr McCartney: At the core of the debate is accountability, and it is very interesting that most of the Members who spoke today ignored it or tried to suggest that the demand for accountability was not realistic. I think that the Minister said that it was not realistic. It is realistic, and the reason is that, as we know from history and now from current practice, one of the fundamental building blocks of the positive changes made to policing in order to ensure that we did not repeat the mistakes of the past was proper and effective accountability.

I noticed that, when Tom Elliott was speaking, he made some reference to the sort of idea that because it is called "National", the opposition that is coming from Sinn Féin and indeed, as he said, the SDLP was for that result, but I think that he forgot to accept that, if the secret is in the title, it is also in the title of the Assembly that we are in. This is a legislative Assembly. We make legislation for the people whom we represent. That is what we will do. We will make legislation that is relevant to the experience of the people whom we represent. Other people can ignore that. Other people can look to other places to get their lead. We will not. We will be consistent in everything that we do. I notice that Stewart —

Mr Wilson: Will the Member give way?

Mr McCartney: No. I have already said that I have five minutes and I will not get any extra time. It is limited as it is. That, to us, is the core matter. Indeed, even when the Minister was speaking, I think that he accepted that the standards of accountability have made the PSNI a police service that now enjoys the support of people in the North of Ireland. He accepts that the NCA will not be subject to the same level of accountability.

Mr Ford: Will the Member give way?

Mr McCartney: No, I will not give way because —

Mr Ford: On a point of order, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker. Is it in order for a Member to state what somebody else said inaccurately and then refuse to take a point of information?

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: It is, in fact, a matter for the Member speaking as to whether they give way. Hansard will satisfy everyone as to what was said and who said it.

Mr McCartney: Perhaps Hansard will record what was said and also what was said when I asked that question during last week's Question Time. I asked the Minister whether the NCA was subject to the same accountability mechanisms as the PSNI and he told me that it was not. Maybe, sometimes, when people speak, the metamorphosis comes out and you hear it in a different way. That is what I heard this afternoon and it is what I heard last week. That is what I am saying. If the Minister wants to contradict that, he can. Are those who are operating in the field, in operations and carrying out investigations, subject to the exact same accountability mechanisms as all PSNI officers? Is it or is it not the case? Silence, as Father Ted once said — [Interruption.]

Mr Ford: Will the Member give way?

Mr McCartney: If you want, I will give way, yes. [Interruption.]

Mr Ford: Sorry, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker, I was so shocked that any member of Sinn Féin was actually giving way in this debate that I thought it was yet another rhetorical question. I am grateful to the Member for finally getting round to the point of accepting that there is an issue for debate. Of course, somebody who is a member of the National Crime Agency does not have identical accountability mechanisms to those which apply to members of the PSNI, but I have listed all the ways in which they are as close as they can be given that it is a UK-wide body. I listed the accountability mechanisms to the Policing Board, the ombudsman, CJINI, HMIC and everybody you could think of.

Mr McCartney: I suppose that now when the Minister has been asked to reflect on the point of order, he will reflect on whether he actually agrees with what I said despite the fact that he said that I misquoted him. It is very simple. People can call it a fig leaf. They can call it whatever they want. We will not sign up to any body that does not have the same accountability mechanisms as the PSNI. We will not allow the failings of the past to be repeated and revisited here. That is our job. That is our task. That is what we are elected to do. We make no apology for that, nor will we allow inferences or snide remarks to deflect us from what we do. We are here to represent the people who put us here. There will be proper accountability for all policing structures in the North while Sinn Féin has the powers to do anything about it. Go raibh míle maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Question Time will commence shortly. We will conclude the debate after Question Time. Members may take their ease while we change the top table.

Oral Answers to Questions

Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister

Social Investment Fund: East Antrim

1. Mr Hilditch asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister how East Antrim is benefitting from the social investment fund (SIF). (AQO 6737/11-15)

Mr M McGuinness (The deputy First Minister): A LeasCheann Comhairle, with your permission, I will ask junior Minister Jennifer McCann to answer the question.

Ms J McCann (Junior Minister, Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister): East Antrim is part of the northern zone. A number of projects were prioritised in the northern zone area plan. Indeed, contractors are on site at one of those capital projects, the Causeway rural and urban network capital project, which is the development of a charity hub in Coleraine. In addition, a key revenue project, employment fuel poverty, has just received a letter of offer. That project, worth £1.8 million, will help insulate homes and reduce heating costs in deprived areas in the 10 current council areas across the zone, including in East Antrim. Details of all projects prioritised in the funding allocation for each of the nine investment fund zones are available on the OFMDFM website.

Mr Hilditch: I thank the junior Minister for her answer. The East Antrim area probably did not benefit terribly well from the capital projects. Will there be opportunities in the future to avail of the social investment fund, particularly given the financial difficulties we face, now and in the future?

Ms J McCann: As I said, to date, there are 23 projects, with a total commitment of £34.4 million, across all the social investment zones. As of 1 October, a further 12 projects, valued at £18.8 million, are at final-stage approval. Of that, £12.3 million is for capital projects, and it is expected that those projects will soon be issued a letter of offer as well. There is certainly a further strand of SIF money coming soon.

Mr McMullan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. What opportunities exist to ensure that the social investment fund adds value and complements other Executive initiatives?

Ms J McCann: We all acknowledge that working in silos does not work, and, yet, for too long, that is really how business has been done. The social investment fund cannot operate in isolation and must integrate and add value to other key policies and initiatives. For example, SIF projects will need to align with the Executive's child poverty strategy to help alleviate poverty among our communities. We are all too aware of the expected projected rise in child poverty levels, and family poverty levels more generally, due to austerity cuts, which are unacceptable. We want this money to make an impact and address evidenced, objective need where there is a clear deficit. There are also clear links to neighbourhood renewal, education, regeneration and employment programmes, and investment and other initiatives in rural and urban areas. SIF provides a real opportunity to bind those projects together and enhance outcomes, while addressing the gaps that exist.

Victims: Individual Needs Reviews

2. Mr Campbell asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister, in relation to the independent assessment of the Victims and Survivors Service's individual needs review, carried out by the Commissioner for Victims and Survivors in 2013, what degree of importance was found to be placed on the need for entirely truthful admissions from people who were involved in illegal activities when the service considered individual needs reviews. (AQO 6738/11-15)

Mr M McGuinness: The individual needs review process was established to assess the needs of individual victims and survivors as defined under the Victims and Survivors Order 2006. The process was informed by the key areas of need identified by the Commission for Victims and Survivors in its comprehensive needs assessment.

The purpose of the review was not to extract admissions of any kind from the individuals who presented at the Victims and Survivors Service. Therefore, in delivering the process, the service operated a clear policy of confidentiality for any information provided during the review and ensured that every client completed a declaration to confirm their understanding of the process.

Last year, the Commission for Victims and Survivors commissioned an independent assessment of the Victims and Survivors Service. As part of that, the service has been asked to produce proposals for a new assessment process, and discussions are ongoing. Any process must take account of the sensitivities involved and the need to ensure that victims and survivors are not subject to unnecessary questioning, while still ensuring that the relevant information is secured to make an informed decision, in line with governance requirements.

Mr Campbell: I appreciate the need for entirely innocent victims not to be subjected to unnecessary questioning. However, given that there are those who are not so innocent, such as the deputy First Minister himself in the distant past, how does he feel about owning up to the atrocities that he engaged in as part of a truth recovery process to try to help bring others forward into 2014 with an understanding that people with blood on their hands are prepared to own up and accept the part that they played in the past?

Mr M McGuinness: The definition of a victim is very clear and has been set down in legislation since 2006.

Mr Nesbitt: The deputy First Minister will know that two schemes under the individual needs review that are most favoured by the bereaved — respite breaks and education and training — have both been suspended due to lack of funds. What assurances can he give the House that those funds will be secured under October monitoring, which, I believe, is £3 million, to get to the point where those schemes are back in play?

Mr M McGuinness: The Member is absolutely correct. The schemes are of huge importance to victims and survivors. In our previous Question Time, I made it clear that we intended to deal with that during our agreement in relation to October monitoring. Hopefully, that will be dealt with shortly.

Mr Milne: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. In the independent assessment, what is the time frame for the implementation of the recommendations?

Mr M McGuinness: In total, there are something like 70 recommendations — 55 from individual reports, and a further 15 from the commissioner's covering advice. Of those, ownership for 52 lies with the Victims and Survivors Service, and ownership for seven lies with OFMDFM. The Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety has responsibility for two, and the remaining nine have joint ownership. Some 47 of the 70 recommendations have been fully implemented, and 17 have been partially implemented. All the recommendations are due to be implemented by March 2015. Progress against the implementation of the recommendations is monitored monthly via the monthly victims and survivors update meeting. We will continue to ensure that whatever action is taken in respect of the recommendations and, in particular, any others relating to direct victims services not only happens but that they are the right actions that have the desired impact.

Mrs D Kelly: In relation to the support given to victims groups such as WAVE, there were issues around the number of pages in application forms that individuals had to complete. Has any flexibility or consideration been given to the concerns raised by those organisations?

Mr M McGuinness: That has been the subject of controversy for some time. There can be no doubt that the Victims and Survivors Service has taken on board the criticisms that have been made of the difficulties presented, and we await the outcome of its deliberations on how it intends to proceed with that.

Public Appointments: Gender Balance

3. Ms Boyle asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister what action they are taking to improve the gender balance in public appointments. (AQO 6739/11-15)

Mr M McGuinness: We are committed to achieving greater diversity in public appointments consistent with the overall principle of selection on merit as a means of ensuring effective public bodies. We recognise that some sections of our society are under-represented on the boards of public bodies, and we are working to encourage greater participation from those groups. Our officials have put in place several measures to raise awareness of public appointment opportunities amongst women and members of other under-represented groups. That is an important step in encouraging them to apply.

Secondly, officials have improved the processes for public appointments aimed at making them more accessible and encouraging greater participation. Some of the steps taken include the establishment of an interdepartmental public appointments forum to share best practice across Departments, including increasing diversity. Independent advice will be provided to the forum by a senior academic with considerable experience in equality and diversity issues, producing the twice-yearly 'All Aboard' publication, which gives details of public appointment opportunities arising over the next six months, and circulating upcoming appointment opportunities to an extensive mailing list of several hundred individuals and organisations, including private and voluntary sector women's groups interested in receiving information on public appointments.

Departments will interview larger numbers of applicants for appointments. Appointment plans will include diversity guidance, which has been developed by the public appointments forum. Rather than making generic appointments, posts are filled to address specific skills in order to build effective teams, and Departments are developing alternatives to established criteria such as better use of presentations.

Ms Boyle: I thank the deputy First Minister for his detailed response, and I commend his Department for what it is doing to address female representation on public bodies. What are the current statistics for female representation on public bodies?

Mr M McGuinness: The recently published public appointments annual report for 2012-13 shows that of a total of 1,050 applicants for public appointments in 2012-13, 317, which is 30%, were women. Of the total number of people appointed in 2012-13, 291, which is 40%, were women. That is a very welcome increase on the 29% in 2011-12. At 31 August 2014, women held 37% of the total number of appointments held. While some progress has been made towards greater diversity, it is clear that further work in raising awareness and encouraging more women to apply for public appointments is needed to ensure an improved gender balance on public bodies.

Mr P Ramsey: Further to Michaela's question, does the deputy First Minister believe that there should be a change in legislation to ensure that groups other than women are included? I attended an all-party group on visual impairment this morning. People who are visually impaired account for only 1% of public appointments across Northern Ireland, and there is discrimination against disabled people generally. Would the deputy First Minister like to comment on that?

Mr M McGuinness: The Member, as do all other Members, knows that in order to get answers we have to have the agreement of the First Minister and the deputy First Minister. I appreciate the Member's point, which is a good one. It challenges us all on the levels of representation that there are for diverse groups in society. I will undertake to have a conversation with the First Minister to see whether more can be done, although I already indicated in my answer that we are not just talking about increased representation for women. We are looking at how other people in society can feel distant from decision-making and at how we, as a Department, can ensure that we are putting in place processes that can create far greater representation across the spectrum.

Jobs: Londonderry

4. Mr Eastwood asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister whether their Programme for Government 2011-15 commitment of promoting 1,670 jobs in Londonderry in 2013-14 was achieved. (AQO 6740/11-15)

Mr M McGuinness: The Programme for Government 2011-15 includes a commitment to develop the One Plan for the regeneration of Derry, incorporating the key sites at Fort George and Ebrington. Job creation is one of the key priorities of the One Plan, and that is reflected in the milestones and outputs identified for each year of the Programme for Government period. For 2013-14, the programme set a target of 1,670 jobs promoted through the public, community and private sectors, and we are pleased to report that the total number of jobs promoted for 2013-14 that have been identified to date is 1,683. That figure is an estimate based on inputs from all Departments, from Derry City Council and from Ilex's analysis of the impact of the City of Culture.

The jobs to be created have been achieved through small business start-ups and expansions, support from Invest NI and as a result of the City of Culture year. It includes two major inward investments by Fujitsu and Convergys, which together account for over 500 new jobs. I commend all businesses that have created jobs in the city during a very difficult economic period. At the same time, I recognise that much more work still needs to be done.

Mr Eastwood: I thank the deputy First Minister for his answer. We all know that there is a difference between jobs promoted and jobs created and people getting paid to work in those jobs. How many actual, real jobs have been created in the financial year?

Mr M McGuinness: The important thing to remember is that jobs promoted is, effectively, a guarantee of jobs, given the commitments made by different companies, but over a period. These are not jobs that are put in place immediately, but they are not promises; they are firm commitments that are having a very important impact on the employment situation in a city that badly needs jobs created.

2.15 pm

One of the key issues for the One Plan is to create jobs in the city. That is also possibly the biggest challenge, given the current economic climate. Interdepartmental groups set interim one-year targets to align with the One Plan catalyst programmes, and each Department reports back through OFMDFM to the strategy board.

As I said, the jobs target for 2013-14 was 1,670. That target was set in 2010 and was based on a number of assumptions about future development. Among the major inward investments negotiated in 2013-14 was investment by Fujitsu. As the Member will know, the First Minister and I met Fujitsu in Japan, and 192 jobs were then created. Of course, we met Convergys when we were in the United States. It is creating 333 jobs. As well as that, I know that a lot of work is taking place under the auspices of Invest NI. Whilst Invest NI cannot direct companies on where to locate, I think that there is a recognition that, given the difficulties that exist in the north-west, not only in the Derry area but in Limavady and Coleraine, that area needs to be tackled. That is one of the reasons why the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development made a decision to relocate to the north-west.

Obviously, we are continually looking at opportunities to bring jobs to the city. Just last week, the First Minister and I met a potential investor. It looks very promising, and, if it comes to pass, as I expect it will —

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Minister's time is up.

Mr M McGuinness: — there will be further job announcements in the time ahead.

Mr Wilson: How many of the 1,600 jobs which currently deliver welfare benefits to other parts of the United Kingdom are located in Londonderry? Does the deputy First Minister have any concern that 1,600 public sector jobs could be lost to Northern Ireland? Or, is he more concerned about Sinn Féin's pursuit of power in the Irish Republic than about jobs for people —

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member has asked his question.

Mr Wilson: — in Northern Ireland?

Mr M McGuinness: I hear the nonsense propagated regularly that Sinn Féin's position on the welfare cuts, which are very ruthless and of which more are promised as a result of last week's Conservative party conference, is all to do with the development of Sinn Féin in the South. That is like saying that we do not care about our neighbours or increased levels of child poverty or low-paid workers whose tax credits are being threatened. Of course, we could get into the politics of "whataboutery". People talk about it costing £40,000 a night to police Twaddell Avenue. That is £280,000 a week. Over 12 months, it is a figure of some £12 million, which could, quite easily, employ 200 new nurses or 200 new teachers.

Ms Maeve McLaughlin: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the deputy First Minister for his response, and I welcome the additional focus and the focus on Derry and the north-west. What progress is being made in relation to the Ebrington and Fort George sites?

Mr M McGuinness: A development framework for the Ebrington site was completed in March 2014. It, ultimately, supported an additional 1,800 jobs in the city and an additional gross value added of £42 million. The framework will, shortly, be submitted for outline planning permission. Current developments on the site include a two-storey underground car park and enabling platform, which have just been completed. Many Members who pass that way on their way to Stormont will have seen that. Commercial opportunity is approved for a further two buildings, and a proposal is being developed for a maritime museum and renovation work to develop a digital and creative industries hub.

The North West Regional Science Park, which I had the privilege of officially opening just a couple of weeks ago, is the first development at Fort George. It was completed recently. On opening, the facility will be 80% occupied, which exceeds its target. The focus there will be on research, development and innovation. I think the fact that the science park is of a regional nature will be a major attractor to that site. It was very encouraging to hear the people associated with the project saying that they envisage a substantial extension to the science park in the time ahead.

So, I think that that, coupled with the many and very exciting expressions of interest that there are in Ebrington, clearly shows that the potential of Fort George and Ebrington to deliver many, many more jobs is very real indeed.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I remind Members to make sure that their mobile phones are not causing interference to the sound system.

Victims and Survivors Service: Budget

5. Mr McCarthy asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister for their assessment of the impact that budgetary reductions to the Victims and Survivors Service will have on victims and survivors across the community. (AQO 6741/11-15)

Mr M McGuinness: A LeasCheann Comhairle, with your permission, I will ask junior Minister McCann to answer this question.

Ms J McCann: We fully acknowledge that the needs of victims and survivors have to given high priority, and we will continue to work to ensure that they are. We are committed to ensuring that the victims and survivors' budget is protected, and, to that end, we have a bid for £1.3 million in additional funding in October monitoring. We have raised the issue directly with the Minister of Finance and are confident that the budget will be protected at the same baseline — £11.3 million — as in the previous financial year. However, we are also aware that there has been an increase in the number of victims and survivors coming forward to the service.

To protect front line services, and in line with the levels of efficiency savings being sought from our Department and its arm's-length bodies, the Victims and Survivors Service is seeking a 4.4% reduction in administration and in funding to groups. The Victims and Survivors Service has been working with groups to help them find the efficiencies needed, and the service itself has been able to make efficiencies in its running costs to mitigate the impact on its front line services. We remain optimistic that a bid for additional funding for the Victims and Survivors Service will be successful in October monitoring. Funding for victims' services has increased over recent years, with £50 million being allocated for victims during this budgetary round.

Mr McCarthy: I thank the junior Minister for her response. Can she, on behalf of the deputy First Minister, explain why he and the First Minister decided to reduce disproportionately funding to the Victims and Survivors Service by somewhere between 15% and 20% while the Department saw a reduction in its budget of 1.4%?

Ms J McCann: As I said in my answer, there have been efficiency savings of 4.4% right across all arm's-length bodies. Unfortunately, the bid that was made in June monitoring was not met, and that is why we are very optimistic that it will be met in October monitoring. Therefore, the funding cuts that you are talking about had to be implemented in the previous period. We are committed to ensuring that funding is protected for the services that are being delivered to those victims and survivors who need them.

Mr Hazzard: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. When does the Minister envisage a new Victims' Commissioner being appointed?

Ms J McCann: As the Member will be aware, the Commissioner for Victims and Survivors, Kathryn Stone, left her post on 12 June 2014. Our officials are currently working through the processes to appoint a new commissioner. The appointment will be regulated by the Commissioner for Public Appointments and will follow the code of practice for ministerial appointments. The process will be taken forward by HR Connect, and advertisements recently appeared in newspapers. The closing date for applications was 12 September 2014, and interviews will take place in the week commencing 13 October. The Victims and Survivors Forum was consulted on the skills and qualities needed for the role, and that was taken into consideration when finalising the necessary skill sets for the incoming commissioner. I know that the Member will be aware that, as this is a live recruitment process, it is not possible to comment any further.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I remind Members that supplementary questions should link to the original question, which was about budgetary reductions.

Mr A Maginness: The junior Minister has underlined the need for reductions in costs, and so on. Is maintaining and sustaining a service, particularly one that serves as a respite for victims and survivors, not so important that it should remain unaffected by any sorts of cuts? You are sending out the wrong message to victims and survivors if you continue a policy of reduction in cost.

Ms J McCann: The real source of the financial difficulties that we are in today is the result of the Tory Government reducing the block grant from 2011 in real terms by £1.5 billion. We are facing into year four of those cuts, and we will see that being the case with all sorts of funding. I agree with you about victims and survivors funding being crucial. I have met a number of organisations and, indeed, individual victims along with junior Minister Bell in recent days, and we have to look at where those services are being cut, but we also have to remember that this is a result of the Tory cuts to the block grant and is the type of thing that we are seeing being played out and cascading down to impact on vulnerable people and vulnerable groups in our society out there.

Childcare

6. Mr Brady asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister how they are taking forward the co-design process in the development of childcare. (AQO 6742/11-15)

Mr M McGuinness: LeasCheann Comhairle, with your permission, I will ask junior Minister McCann to answer this question also.

Ms J McCann: We are engaging with the main childcare stakeholders in a detailed co-design process to develop the content of the full, final Bright Start childcare strategy. To date, that has included one-to-one consultation meetings with the childcare sector, all of which are now completed. Childcare strategy development workshops involving all the main stakeholders will explore further the emerging key themes and issues. The first of those took place on 3 October. Following the workshop stage, the Department will publish a consultation document setting out policy proposals for childcare. Consultation will include public consultation events and a request for written responses. We aim to launch our consultation before the end of the year based on the responses received during consultation, and we will liaise with the OFMDFM Committee and develop the consultation document into a final strategy for publication following approval by the Executive.

Mr Brady: I thank the Minister for her answer. Can she outline how the dual aims of child development and childcare solely for reasons of the labour market will be taken forward under the banner of a childcare strategy?

Ms J McCann: Early years interventions and quality childcare, including school-age childcare, are widely accepted as critical factors in a child's development. It is internationally recognised that quality, child-centred activity in a safe place can promote positive interpersonal relations, develop cultural awareness and complement educational provision. An important aim of the Bright Start childcare strategy is therefore to support the development of children and young people and to enable children and young people from all backgrounds, including those most deprived, to avail themselves of life opportunities.

It is not just children who benefit from childcare. Childcare is also a critical enabler to help parents into work, move families out of poverty and help break the cycle of intergenerational deprivation. Supported by an affordable, flexible and accessible childcare sector, parents can access work, improve their workplace skills and their employability or continue to be economically active. Therefore, along with its child development aims, the childcare strategy will aim to ensure that no parent who wants or has a need to work or to undertake work related to training or study will be prevented from doing so by a lack of childcare.

Mrs Overend: As the Executive have rightly put the economy at the heart of their activities, what plans are in place to help local businesses, especially small businesses, that will lose out on National Insurance breaks when the childcare voucher scheme is done away with next autumn?

Ms J McCann: We have already had a number of discussions about the childcare voucher scheme and have met some of the organisations. Indeed, I think that, this week, I am meeting one of the organisations that has raised that issue with us. We will look, as part of the Bright Start strategy, at all areas. I know that the initial stage in the first 15 actions was basically around school-age children and the social economy model, but we are keen to look at all sorts of aspects of childcare that will affect people.

The voucher scheme is part of the Westminster Childcare Payments Bill, and there is a discussion ongoing. We had a meeting last week with members of the Committee in relation to that, and we are very open to meeting again and discussing how we can liaise with the Committee and other interested bodies to see in what way we can take anything forward in our future strategy on that.

2.30 pm

Mr Deputy Speaker: That is the end of listed questions. We now move on to topical questions. Question 8 has been withdrawn.

Talks: Irish Government Role

1. Mr A Maginness asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister to assure the House that there will be an active, substantial and sustained role for the Irish Government in the Secretary of State's proposed talks on a number of issues, including the Assembly. (AQT 1541/11-15)

Mr M McGuinness: The Member has been around these negotiations as long as I have and is well aware that the Irish Government were involved during the Good Friday negotiations. He is also well aware that the Irish Government were involved during the discussions leading to the St Andrews Agreement and during the discussions on the transfer of power of policing and justice at Hillsborough not so long ago. I think that this is much ado about nothing. I see that the leader of the Ulster

Unionist Party is in the House. He was the one who raised this here. I think that it is very disappointing and very unfortunate that people try to score a political point on a matter of such great importance.

These discussions will involve both Governments, and they will be watched very closely in Washington, both at the State Department and at the White House. There is a huge responsibility on all of us to play a positive and constructive role in an attempt to find a way through the vexed issues of the past, parades, flags, symbols and emblems, and the budgetary challenges that we, as an Assembly and Executive, face. We will do that only if people approach these subjects in a responsible frame of mind. I think that the comment made by the leader of the Ulster Unionist Party was totally irresponsible.

Mr A Maginness: I thank the deputy First Minister for his reply. He referred to the United States Government. Does he envisage any role for the United States Government during the talks?

Mr M McGuinness: Principally, the discussions will involve both Governments and all the parties, with appropriate representation from the Assembly, certainly all the major parties. The role of the United States Government will probably be along the lines of the one that they played in the Good Friday, St Andrews and Hillsborough agreements, all of which were very important. The contribution made by the United States to our peace process and to the agreements that we have made has been absolutely invaluable. I do not know whether I envisage them sitting at the table, which was not the case during the three previous negotiations. I would have no objection to it — none whatsoever — but everybody would have to be comfortable with that. I think that everybody recognises that, whatever way this pans out, there will be very proactive State Department involvement in the discussions.

Budget Cuts: FM/DFM Discussions

2. Mr Campbell asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister what discussions they have had in the past seven days to prepare for the cuts to budgets that will inevitably follow because the agreement that the deputy First Minister reached with the First Minister has been superseded by instructions from the deputy First Minister's leader in Dublin. (AQT 1542/11-15)

Mr M McGuinness: This is another fallacy that has been promoted over the last number of months. Nothing could be further from the truth. Never at any stage of any dialogue between advisers in my side of OFMDFM and the DUP side of OFMDFM did the First Minister and I sign off on any agreement about how we would deal with these matters.

We have been involved in important discussions recently. We met the Irish Government on Friday and I met Theresa Villiers on Thursday. These matters were discussed. We also met Alex Salmond in Scotland and were criticised for doing so by the Alliance Party, even though we had very important discussions to agree a trilateral meeting between ourselves, Scotland and Wales, given what everybody agrees have been the very profound implications of the fallout from the Scottish independence referendum. Nobody is under any illusions about what the agenda of the upcoming talks will be.

The First Minister and I met our finance officials and Minister of Finance where they recorded, to our dissatisfaction, the fact that, in the course of the last four years since the Tory-led Administration came into place, that the block grant has been ruthlessly cut each year. On top of that, we have the welfare reform cuts, so we are facing very serious issues in regards to budgetary matters.

Mr Campbell: The deputy First Minister indicated a series of discussions that he has held, but has he given any indication, given that there will be cuts whether welfare reform is introduced or not, whether through him or his counterpart in Dublin, as to what the extent of those cuts will be whichever way the cookie crumbles?

Mr M McGuinness: All of that remains to be seen, given that we are hopefully going to enter into very serious discussions that will include the budgetary situation. The First Minister and I are absolutely agreed that the way in which the British Government have dealt with our block grant, ie, by steadily reducing it over the last four years, is a subject for a big debate between us and the British Government.

Attacks: OFMDFM Condemnation

3. Mr Douglas asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister to join with him in condemning all recent attacks, including those in the Fountain estate in the Maiden City, racist attacks in south Belfast and, in particular, the attack last Friday in Convoy in County Donegal. (AQT 1543/11-15)

Mr M McGuinness: Without hesitation. Before I was even asked the question, I made it absolutely clear during the course of the North/South Ministerial Council meeting that I was absolutely appalled at the burning of the Orange hall in Convoy. It was not until later in the day that I learned that an attempt was made to burn a Presbyterian church and that the buck eejits responsible went into the church and attempted to burn a bible. That on top of the recent attempt to burn the Orange hall in Newtowncunningham, as well as the racist attacks that the Member mentioned and, of course, the attack on Padraig McShane's house in north Antrim, are all very serious matters that could conceivably have resulted in the loss of life.

There is a responsibility on all of us to make it absolutely clear that there is nothing political about any of this, but there is everything criminal about those behind these attacks, whether those attacks are on churches, GAA premises, individuals, homes or defenceless people who come from other parts of the world to live amongst us. It has to be unreservedly condemned by all of us. We all need to be seen to be giving real leadership in confronting those who are responsible. The police have a big job to do, and I would appeal to everybody in society, including people in County Donegal, that if they have any scrap of information whatsoever about the bigots who were involved in these attacks, they should without hesitation bring that both to the Gardaí and the PSNI.

Mr Douglas: I thank the deputy First Minister for his response. Are there ways in which this Assembly can reassure those communities, particularly those communities that feel very isolated, apart from urging those with information to pass it to the Garda Síochána or to the PSNI?

Mr M McGuinness: When these attacks happen, we need to be clearly seen to stand with those who are attacked. I feel a particular sympathy for people who come from foreign shores and do not have any friends, or have very few friends in the community, for how isolated they must feel when their car is burned or their homes attacked.

There is a huge responsibility on all of us to be seen to be standing alongside those people. Similarly, after the recent attack on the Orange hall in Newtowncunningham, I was very pleased that Pádraig Mac Lochlainn, our TD for the constituency, was there in full support of the Orange Order in the area.

I come from a part of the North where there are good relationships amongst the community; among the Apprentice Boys and the local community in Derry. There is great respect and tolerance for cultural traditions in that city. When I see events taking place in the hinterland of that city that are an attempt to fracture the building of those good relationships, I am horrified. I get very angry. We all need to consistently challenge ourselves to see what more we can do. However, we certainly must be seen to be standing together against racism and sectarianism.

Ministers: Judicial Reviews

4. Mr Byrne asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister whether they agree that it looks bad for the Executive and the Assembly when one Minister takes another Minister to the High Court, especially one who has carried out his duties in relation to the publication of the Belfast metropolitan area plan, including consultation with his colleagues. (AQT 1544/11-15)

Mr M McGuinness: The Minister of the Environment made his decision in relation to the Belfast metropolitan area plan (BMAP). Over the weekend, that was challenged publicly by the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment. Essentially, the case will find itself before the courts in the context of a judicial review. It is very disappointing that it has come to this. However, from our perspective and without breaking the confidentiality of what is discussed at Executive meetings, as the decision made by the previous Minister of the Environment was effectively supported by the new Minister of the Environment, we were all very conscious that we were heading towards some sort of challenge. Undoubtedly, that will now be played out in the courts.

Mr Byrne: Will the deputy First Minister accept that, after 14 years of discussions, the DRD gave the green light to the Minister of the Environment to proceed? Surely, we are in a process in which the Assembly and the Executive have to demonstrate collective political responsibility. [Interruption.]

Mr M McGuinness: I think that I will try to answer that question. That is my job today.

I reiterate what I said — it is disappointing that it has come to this. A Minister has made a decision, there is a question of the Executive responsibilities of individual Ministers, but there is also an issue, as you correctly stated, of the whole approach of collective responsibility of the Executive. We all have to recognise that we are in a five-party coalition in which different parties with Ministers on the Executive have different approaches to subjects. On occasions, it is very hard to get agreement on very challenging issues.

A short while ago, the First Minister and I met our Programme for Government team to go through our Programme for Government commitments. It is amazing the level we have reached in the agreement and in the implementation of those commitments. Of course the media do not talk about that; the media talk about the issues that overshadow all the good work that happens in the Executive and the Assembly.

There are issues out there that are challenging and that have not been resolved. We will undoubtedly face into trying to resolve some of them in the period ahead.

Mr Deputy Speaker: That is the end of questions to the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister.

2.45 pm

Culture, Arts and Leisure

Irish Language Spend

1. Mr Wilson asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure to outline the total planned departmental spend on Irish language projects in 2014-15. (AQO 6751/11-15)

Ms Ni Chuilín (The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure): I thank the Member for his question. My Department has planned to spend approximately £3,850,000 on Irish-language projects in the 2014-15 financial year. This figure includes £3 million — [Interruption.]

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. I ask Members to desist from conversation on the Benches.

Ms Ni Chuilín: This figure includes £3,462,107 that has been allocated to Foras na Gaeilge for the 2014 calendar year. Funding is also available from departmental mainstream projects that have an Ulster-Scots, Irish-language or cultural dimension that cannot be separated from the primary funding objectives.

Mr Wilson: I thank the Minister for her answer. What reductions will she make in the Irish-language budget this year as a result of the 6% reduction in her budget, due to her party's decision not to implement welfare reform and, therefore, cause reductions in budgets across the board?

Ms Ni Chuilín: I have no plans to reduce any budgets for the Irish language or Ulster Scots this year.

Ms McCorley: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as a freagra. An dtig leis an Aire a rá linn, mar gheall ar an rath atá ar Líofa, an dtearna gníomhaithe Albainis Uladh stocaireacht uirthi ag iarraidh tionscnamh den chineál céanna? An mbeadh sí sásta rud éigin a thabhairt chun tosaigh?

Given the success of Líofa, has the Minister been lobbied by Ulster-Scots activists for a similar type of initiative, and has she considered bringing something like that forward?

Ms Ni Chuilín: I have not been lobbied by Ulster-Scots activists in relation to bringing forward a similar Líofa-type project to Ulster Scots. Since September, when Líofa was launched, I have asked the Ulster-Scots Agency and the ministerial advisory group (MAG) on Ulster Scots to bring forward a similar programme. I believe that that would add value to what they do. The MAG Ulster-Scots Academy is facilitating a partnership with other sectoral bodies. Ulster Scots has strong community links with lifelong learning elements, and I thought that there was an intention to bring something forward in a vein such as that. However, all main sectoral bodies are participating in the work on a collaborative basis. Despite that, there seems to be almost a reluctance to bring a similar initiative forward. I have made it clear that it does not necessarily have to be on the Ulster-Scots language, because I understand that there is no agreed standard. However, I am keen to see some programme or similar initiative based on culture and heritage.

Mr Byrne: Does the Minister accept that the Líofoa project has been very successful for people involved in promoting the Irish language, and are there plans to extend it, given that there is a growing participation among groups?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I thank the Member for his supplementary question and absolutely agree with him. At the minute, well over 7,500 have signed up to Líofoa. The original target that was set in September 2011 was 1,000 for 2015. That was surpassed by December that year. We then set another target for 2015 again. That was surpassed and set for 5,000. That was again reset at 10,000, given the popularity. We will extend it where the demand is there. I hope to meet some of the other organisations and groups that have expressed an interest in Líofoa and bringing it forward, and that includes on an all-Ireland basis. I am certainly happy to extend the programme where the demand is.

Mr Allister: The Minister has already made and announced some cuts in respect of other aspects. Why is it that she is making this boast that, when it comes to efficiency savings in the North/South bodies, such as the language body, she refuses to make them? Now she is refusing to even entertain efficiency cuts that her party, by its actions, is imposing on the rest of government.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member has asked his question.

Mr Allister: Why does she think that that particular sector should be immune from cuts? Is it not just typical of the financial anarchy that she is presiding over?

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member has asked his question.

Ms Ní Chuilín: First, it is not a boast; it is just a statement of fact. There has been a strong reluctance, and indeed a refusal, on my behalf, to bring additional efficiencies to the language bodies as high as 4-5% in addition to what was already agreed.

That would have a particularly huge impact on Ulster Scots. I say with some confidence that the majority of those are from the Protestant, unionist and loyalist community. It is ironic that an Irish republican is protecting the interests of the Protestant, unionist and loyalist community when an elected representative who claims to represent that community wants me to wield the axe on the people who need it most.

Lambeg Drumming

2. Mr Anderson asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure what support her Department provides for Lambeg drumming. (AQO 6752/11-15)

Ms Ní Chuilín: I thank the Member for his question. Funding from my Department is available through the Ulster-Scots Agency and the Arts Council. In 2013-

14, Lislea Lambeg Drumming Club received £1,500 through the Arts Council's musical instruments for bands programme. In 2014, the Ulster-Scots Agency, through its financial assistance scheme, has allocated £7,750 towards tuition for Lambeg drumming groups. In addition, groups can apply to the Arts Council's lottery-funded small grants programme for tuition and music classes.

Mr Anderson: I thank the Minister for her response. I am here to try to drum up some support for the drumming fraternity. Maybe you are aware that Lambeg drumming is a big thing in County Armagh and throughout my constituency of Upper Bann. It is also very much to the fore in the local Orange lodges —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Can we have a question, please?

Mr Anderson: — in that constituency. Can the Minister tell me what more she and her Department can do to give more finance and resource? How will the Ulster-Scots Agency be affected by the cutbacks?

Ms Ní Chuilín: The Member was in the Chamber when I answered the question from the Member for North Antrim about additional cutbacks to the Ulster-Scots Agency. I certainly appreciate the work that bands do, particularly in the community and in rural communities, where, more often than enough, the bands are the community and help to bring people forward. It is about demand. If there is a demand, the agencies, which, in this case, are the Arts Council and the Ulster-Scots Agency, will bring forward additional bids. That has not been the case thus far, so there needs to be a head of steam built up in terms of the demand for it. It would be different if it were done in isolation, but the Lambeg drumming club in Lislea has received some small awards from different forms of funding. That seems set to continue.

Mr McMullan: Go raibh maith agat. Will the Minister give a breakdown of funding presently available to bands?

Ms Ní Chuilín: The Arts Council's musical instruments for bands programme provides grants from £500 to £5,000 for the purchase of instruments. That scheme is available to formally constituted bands based in the North. Funding is also awarded by the Arts Council through its lottery-funded small grants programme for band-related activity, which includes equipment and tuition. For items over £10,000, funding is available from its equipment programme. Bands can also apply for funding for musical tuition from the Ulster-Scots Agency through its financial assistance scheme.

Mr Dallat: I thank the Minister for her answer. I am sure that she will recall that one of the most successful groups in Northern Ireland in recent years was called Different Drums. Will the Minister give serious consideration to encouraging the integration of not just the drums but the accordions, pipes and everything else so that we can all enjoy the music together?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I certainly will. The Walled City Tattoo was the culmination of two cultures and communities coming together and celebrating each other's culture with inclusivity, respect and diversity through dance, song and music. If ever there was an example of what we need to do more of, that is one of them.

Mr Swann: I thank the Minister for her answer. I am not letting the Member for Upper Bann steal all the glory; there is a great Lambeg drumming tradition in North Antrim as well, and they are better drums.

Minister, your Department gives support to the Ulster pipe and drumming schools. Would you consider such an appeal from the Lambeg drumming associations as well?

Ms Ní Chuilín: The Lambeg drumming associations have received funding from the Arts Council, the Ulster-Scots Agency and the ministerial advisory group. As I said to the Member for Upper Bann, if there is a demand for additional funding based on evidence of need, the agencies will happily consider that. It is good to see that the Lambeg drumming associations have such widespread support throughout the House today.

Arts and Culture Strategy

3. Mr McKay asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure whether she has any plans to bring forward a strategy for the arts and culture, similar to the Sport Matters strategy for sport. (AQO 6753/11-15)

Ms Ní Chuilín: I thank the Member for his question. I have asked that an arts strategy akin to the Sport Matters strategy be brought forward to increase attendance and participation in the arts whilst contributing to an inclusive society and a stronger economy. The strategy will aim to complement the developing tourism sector, promote the creative industries and underpin the value of community arts and festivals.

It is time that the full benefits and value of the arts to individuals, communities, the economy and wider society are acknowledged and recognised. A draft strategy proposal will be brought forward for public consultation during 2015, and I look forward to meaningful and innovative collaboration and engagement with all stakeholders, including ministerial colleagues, to develop that strategy.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Again, I ask Members to desist from having conversations that disturb those who wish to listen to answers from the Minister. I will remind Members once more, after which I will name those who are interfering.

Mr McKay: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I welcome the work that the Minister is doing in this area, as someone who knows well the link between tourism and the arts in my constituency. What does the Minister see as the future role for the arts in the North? How can we make them more inclusive and open to people from all backgrounds?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I want the arts to be seen as something that can be enjoyed by everyone across our society and something that can be valued and appreciated by everyone. I also want the arts to be seen as a serious and important career choice for children and to be recognised through education and employment structures.

I also want the arts to be valued as a contributor to health, the economy and, indeed, the whole notion of citizenship. In the economy, I want to see arts that produce the best for people at national, international and local level, including visitors and potential visitors who will see our arts offering as a reason to come here and, more importantly, a reason to return to the island.

Arts have a lot to offer, but in this House some see them as a luxury rather than a right. Until we get to the stage where the need for the arts is recognised across the Executive and across the parties, they will constantly be placed at a disadvantage by some.

Mrs McKevitt: In her reply, the Minister talked about stakeholders. What stakeholders does her Department consult in developing policies? How often is the database held by the Department updated?

Ms Ni Chuilín: I thank the Member for her question. The last strategy for the arts was done in 2001, which, I am sure she will agree, is far too long ago. Back then, the strategy was called Face to Face.

I signed off very recently on terms of reference. There will be full public consultation, which will start in early spring of next year. The consultation will happen in the normal way, but I would like to go out to arts groups, communities and individuals that I have been lobbied by to give them an opportunity to feed in, because a lot of people who work in the sector have a lot to offer but do not often get the opportunity to input into Government strategies. It is really important that we make sure that we go across as many of the communities as possible. So, we should use places such as libraries, schools, residents' groups, community groups and anywhere where there is possible access to the community to make sure this is as broad and inclusive as possible.

Mr McCausland: Within any strategy for the arts and culture, there will be a number of important key organisations. One of those is undoubtedly the Ulster Orchestra. Will the Minister acknowledge the financial issues concerning the Ulster Orchestra and give a commitment to ensuring that it is sustained to play its continued important role in our cultural infrastructure?

Ms Ni Chuilín: The term, "brass neck", comes to mind, but we will say nothing. I value the role of the Ulster Orchestra, but, as the Member will know, I cannot give a commitment to bail-out the Ulster Orchestra or plug the gap that it is experiencing. However, I am really keen to ensure that the Ulster Orchestra continues and that enough stakeholders and sponsorship are brought to the Ulster Orchestra and am happy to assist it. As the Member may be aware, I have plans to meet the Ulster Orchestra very soon, and I look forward to hearing what plans it has to meet the deficit in its budget.

Boating Infrastructure

4. Mr B McCrea asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure whether her Department is considering the introduction of an annual fee for boat users to fund and improve boating infrastructure. (AQO 6754/11-15)

Ms Ni Chuilín: I thank the Member for his question. Responsibility for the management, maintenance, development and restoration of inland waterways for recreational purposes lies with Waterways Ireland, one of the six North/South implementation bodies.

There are currently no plans to introduce an annual fee for boat users. Waterways Ireland operates a charging structure for a variety of services to users of the waterways across the Waterways Ireland network. Those vary from £1 for passage through a lock on the lower Bann to €153 for winter moorings along the Shannon.

Mr B McCrea: Does the Minister think it appropriate that luxury boats should be able to travel without paying a fee when, for example, a car has car tax? Given the lack of capital investment in the waterways, that might be an appropriate way in which to raise the necessary revenue to spend on the infrastructure.

Ms Ní Chuilín: I think that there is a myth that anyone using the waterways has a luxury boat or yacht. Maybe the Member's friends have luxury boats and yachts, but the people whom I have spoken to on the waterways the length and breadth of the island do not. Waterways Ireland's by-laws are out for consultation. It is looking at fixed penalties, speed limits, respectable mooring and responsible parking. From time to time, people cruise up and down the length of our waterways in much smaller and respectable boats but certainly not in anything substantial.

Mr Humphrey: During the Committee's recent visit to County Fermanagh and Waterways Ireland's lovely offices that cost £13.5 million, the chief executive admitted to the Committee that she is having to make choices as to whether to fund some of the jetties that are about to collapse into the lough. What influence can the Minister have — or the tourism Minister, but I ask this in specific regard to your own portfolio — in ensuring that we have investment in the proper infrastructure for those who are tourists, especially those tourists who travel to Northern Ireland to fish and use our waterways?

Ms Ní Chuilín: It is really important that we — in this case, it is Waterways Ireland — manage our budgets appropriately. The cost of the running, maintenance and upkeep of the premises will have been in the original outline business plan.

Are there things that Waterways Ireland could do? It has said, or it has been reported, that it has space and could lease out some of that space to accrue some money that it could spend. There are many things, I am sure, that it could do. Dawn Livingstone is a very responsible chief executive who is more than aware of the potential of tourism and what Waterways Ireland would like to do if given even small amounts of money. Modest investments have gone a long way and accrued a lot of benefits, particularly in rural areas around the waterways. I have no doubt that the chief executive of Waterways Ireland will bring that to our attention at the next sectoral meeting.

Mr Lynch: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Can the Minister give an update on the plans to restore the Ulster canal?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I thank the Member for his supplementary question. The main project was due to commence, and the financial situation, particularly with the Irish Government, put a halt to that. Rather than waiting on the money to be brought in all at once, we are starting to look at options. The Member is aware that there is an inter-agency group set up around the Ulster canal. He raised that through previous correspondence and at meetings.

I am meeting Ms Heather Humphreys, the new Minister for Arts, Heritage and the Gaeltacht, next week to look at ways in which we can start work and start looking at bringing a phased approach to the restoration of the Upper Lough Erne to Clones part of the Ulster canal.

Sport: Greater Participation

5. Mr Hazzard asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure how she is promoting greater participation in sport and physical activity for older people, young women and people with disabilities. (AQO 6755/11-15)

Ms Ní Chuilín: I thank the Member for his question. Since 2009, Sport NI has invested funding of almost £48 million towards increasing participation levels across our population through a variety of programmes.

Since Active Communities began in 2010, opportunities have been provided to over 175,000 young people, almost 135,000 females, just over 30,000 people with a disability and over 27,000 older people. Examples of other promotional activity include funding for programmes such as Active Awards for Sport, Active Clubs, boxing investment programmes and ongoing investment in sporting facilities that are developed to encourage participation by all members of local communities.

A range of activities is also provided by other partners involved in promoting opportunities in sport and recreation. Those partners include the sports governing bodies, such as the GAA, rugby and the IFA, and public bodies such as the Public Health Agency and the Environment Agency. Outdoor Recreation and other leisure organisations such as angling clubs have also been included.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I call Jo-Anne Dobson. Apologies, I call Chris Hazzard.

Mr Hazzard: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for her answer. Will she provide an overview of how Sport Matters targets have helped to increase participation among the elderly, women and, indeed, the disabled?

Ms Ní Chuilín: The Sport Matters implementation group looks at the progress — certainly for the period from October to September 2013 — and has recorded progress against each of the targets. The target to increase participation rates amongst older people by 6% is deemed to be on track, with the achievement of an increase by 9%. The target to increase participation rates amongst women by 6% is also on track, with an increase of over 17% so far. The target to increase participation rates amongst people with a disability by 6% is deemed to be on track, but with some delay. In comparison to the Sport Matters strategy, they are certainly on track. I hold the view that the progress is good, but, certainly in the case of disabilities, we are doing well but need to do more.

Mrs Dobson: Does the Minister agree with me that multiple benefits accrue from involvement in sports, not least promoting physical and mental well-being and social inclusion, which all support the health service by reducing demand on cardiovascular, diabetes and obesity services, to name only three?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I wholeheartedly agree with the Member. It is really important. As well as looking at obesity and healthy hearts, we also have the whole area of mental health and healthy minds. Increased sport and physical activity have tremendous health benefits, particularly for older people, who are, at times, forgotten. Looking at tailor-made, bespoke programmes for them is really important, because not only does it keep them active, it keeps them mentally active. The social inclusion brought forward by some groups that have a sporting and leisure dimension has been proven to be very successful. For all of those reasons that I have outlined — I am sure there are more that the Member and I could mention — investment for sport is really important, particularly for those targeted areas of women, older people and those with disabilities.

Mr Dunne: Does the Minister recognise the need for greater participation by all in sport, and does she agree that the better use of shared facilities between schools and local government would make a positive contribution to that?

Ms Ní Chuilín: Absolutely. Last year or earlier this year, the Minister of Education and I launched guidelines for better sharing of facilities. The guidelines have been in circulation since last year but the idea has been there for decades. The Member may be aware — I am aware from my constituency and the evidence from other constituencies — that there were lots of reasons put up by schools in particular for not opening the gates past 4.00 pm. I think that we have all seen through that. Now schools and boards of governors are willing partners, and the new super councils will be willing partners as well, because, apart from not having the capital investment to build the facilities at the end of each corner — to be flippant about it — it is much better when we share facilities. Not only will the investment be used to better effect but it will actually help to accrue additional investment in the future when there is a better joined-up approach. It will help with sustainability and maintenance of schools.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Minister's time is up.

Ms Ní Chuilín: It will also help people to feel part of the community when they are not outside looking in at facilities that they cannot use.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Questions 6 and 12 have been withdrawn.

Capital Projects: South Down/Newry and Armagh

7. Mr Rogers asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure whether her Department has identified opportunities for capital projects in the South Down and Newry and Armagh constituencies for inclusion in the 2015-16 budget. (AQO 6757/11-15)

Ms Ní Chuilín: My Department is considering a number of opportunities for capital investment in the South Down and Newry and Armagh constituencies: for example, a proposal is being developed to build a new Armagh city library; and the Armagh Planetarium and Armagh Observatory have registered a requirement for new CCTV equipment and maintenance works. No capital budget exists, as yet, for 2015-16. When the Executive make investment allocations in due course, those and other projects will be considered for funding in light of departmental priorities and the available budget.

Mr Rogers: I thank the Minister for her answer. The south-east coast master plan includes proposals for the development of sports and leisure facilities throughout the towns of South Down. What input has your Department into those proposals?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I have heard of different master plans in different council areas. Certainly, I am happy to write to the Member on the specifics. Needless to say, in the north-west, we have partnered with the Coleraine, Dungiven, Limavady and Derry City councils. I hope to have the same approach across the new council areas. I think that it is a better spend when different agencies, stakeholders and others bring their purses. I will enquire about the south-east coast master plan and write to the Member with details.

Mr Boylan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabaim buíochas leis an Aire as a freagra. I thank the Minister for her answer. Minister, that is welcome news about Armagh, but can you update us on the planned refurbishment of Crossmaglen library? Go raibh míle maith agat.

Ms Ní Chuilín: Work is being led and undertaken by Newry and Mourne District Council. Crossmaglen library is a part of the local community centre, and the council is upgrading the centre's facilities, which, in turn, helps the library. The council is carrying out some small-scale improvements to the library at a cost of £52,000. Libraries NI, which leases the library space from the council, is paying for the work from its resource and maintenance budget and has informed the public of what is happening. During the closure, a temporary mobile library service has operated from the square at Crossmaglen. The library is expected to reopen in approximately a month's time.

Mr Humphrey: I thank the Minister for her answers thus far. She will be aware of Ardaluin Regeneration Trust, which does great work in Ardaluin House in Newcastle, County Down. Many kids from constituencies such as ours have travelled there and will continue to do so from right across Northern Ireland. If there are any extra moneys available in her Department, extra funding — or indeed funding — for equipment or capital investment it would be very much appreciated by the trust because it is pretty much a voluntary activity. People give of their time and talents.

Ms Ní Chuilín: I am familiar with the trust and with the Member's involvement through the work of the Scouts. Other youth and community groups have also visited the premises and availed themselves of those services over decades. I am not aware of any current funding application, but I am happy to make enquiries and copy the Member into correspondence.

T: BUC: Sport

8. Mr G Kelly asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure how she will ensure that areas of multiple deprivation are included in the Together: Building a United Community sports programme. (AQO 6758/11-15)

Ms Ní Chuilín: The cross-community youth sports programme, led by my Department, will seek to deliver a meaningful and sustained impact on good relations through the power of sport. Alongside that, the programme will seek to promote equality and tackle poverty and social exclusion.

It is important that the programme is delivered in areas of multiple deprivation, as these often experience significant conflict and interface tension. That is reflected in the fact that two areas selected for the pilot scheme in 2014-15 are areas of multiple deprivation. The roll-out of the programme will seek to identify other suitable areas, rural and urban, to maximise opportunities for young people.

Mr Deputy Speaker: That is the end of our time for listed questions. We move on to topical questions.

Irish National Cycling Championships 2015

1. Mr McAleer asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure whether she agrees that Omagh playing host to the 2015 Irish National Cycling Championships is a remarkable achievement by Omagh Wheelers Cycling Club and will be a great boost for cycling in the area. (AQT 1551/11-15)

3.15 pm

Ms Ní Chuilín: I am aware that there was certainly a proposal by Omagh. I am happy to again meet the Member to discuss that further. I believe that competitions and events in cycling and sport and physical activity in particular are to be welcomed. I am particularly delighted when they take place in rural areas. The Member and other Members in this House have often complained that a lot of funding, particularly for sport and physical activity, is based in cities.

Mr McAleer: Go raibh maith agat. Does the Minister feel that her Department can play a role in helping to maximise the sporting, social and economic benefits of that competition for Omagh and the wider area?

Ms Ní Chuilín: In short, yes, but that does not mean to say that the Member can then walk in and expect to get the initiative funded. I am certainly disappointed to hear the Enterprise Minister's comments that events will no longer receive funding. I certainly hope that the Omagh riding initiative is not one of them.

Funding Cuts: Cultural and Sporting Events

2. Mr Weir asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure, in light of the reduction in funding for a range of events across Northern Ireland, most of which are cultural or sporting, what additional assistance her Department can provide. (AQT 1552/11-15)

Ms Ní Chuilín: The Member will certainly be aware that, in 2010, the Events Company transferred from DCAL to DETI. That investigation is still ongoing. That is with the regret of even the Enterprise Minister, other Executive colleagues and I. Having even just listened to media reports this morning, I am quite shocked and disappointed that events funding, particularly for tourism, has certainly been scaled back, if not ceased. I will certainly have discussions with my officials and local councils to see what additional funding they can bring forward because it is important that we ensure that those initiatives continue.

Mr Weir: I appreciate the response and the fact that there are constraints on budgets. Does the Minister have any suggestions as to how, either through her Department or arm's-length bodies, they can, at least, give some degree of assistance in kind to those events, which may not be a direct financial contribution, but can perhaps ease the burden in other ways?

Ms Ní Chuilín: Certainly, the skills and experience that DCAL officials and even officials from the arm's-length bodies have in relation to helping people to prepare business plans and possibly attract funding and sponsorship is there. If the Member has any specific examples or requests, I am more than happy to receive them, but let us be clear: what we do not need is a cut in one Department that another Department is expected to pick up. That is not happening either.

Sport Matters

3. Mr McMullan asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure to comment on how the new super-councils will implement the Sport Matters strategy, ensuring full inclusion, particularly in relation to the provision of facilities for the disabled. (AQT 1553/11-15)

Ms Ní Chuilín: I thank the Member for his question. I am sure that he was here when we discussed the Sport Matters strategy earlier. It is important that all councils in their current and future configurations are not only part of the Sport Matters implementation group, but actually implement the Sport Matters strategy, particularly in relation to disabilities. Those people need our help more than most. I would be very keen to ensure that the new super-councils play their role as robustly as the old ones did.

Mr McMullan: I thank the Minister for her response. Given that some of the councils appear reluctant to implement the new strategies for sport for the disabled, can she raise that with the Sport Matters implementation group? Go raibh maith agat.

Ms Ní Chuilín: I will actually go further than that. I will ask for an update, certainly from the councils, on the implementation of their disability strategies. I am happy to provide the Member with an update of those when I receive them. As well as that, I will certainly raise it at the next Sport Matters implementation group meeting.

Athletes: Parity of Esteem

4. Mr Allister asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure what progress there has been in attaining parity of esteem for all Northern Ireland athletes to enable them to compete for the national team of their choice rather than their being prevented from competing for the UK if they are attached to Northern Ireland to an all-Ireland governing body. (AQT 1554/11-15)

Ms Ní Chuilín: Certainly, in the first instance, athletes who compete in competitions, regardless of the configuration, are the responsibility of the governing body. That is not the responsibility of Sport NI and is certainly not the responsibility of DCAL.

Mr Allister: It is regrettable that the Minister cannot even afford support for the principle of parity of esteem. She mentioned Sport NI. Will she address the discriminatory practice in Sport NI whereby it refuses to fund any group that is attached to a GB governing body if there is an alternative all-Ireland governing body? Will she address that basic discrimination?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I certainly refute the Member's allegation that Sport NI is implementing discriminatory practices. In the past, the Member and other Members have made allegations about some bodies, and the arm's-length bodies in particular. He needs to bring forward the evidence.

Ulster Folk and Transport Museum

5. Mrs Cameron asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure for her assessment of the reduction in public attendance at the Ulster Folk and Transport Museum. (AQT 1555/11-15)

Ms Ní Chuilín: I am not aware that there are significant reductions. However, I am happy to query that with officials and copy the Member in to correspondence.

Mrs Cameron: I thank the Minister for her answer. Something was published on that in the local press recently. Maybe, when the Minister has been briefed on it, she will see that there has been a drop in numbers. If so, what might National Museums Northern Ireland do to reverse the trend of reduced visitor numbers to what is a very important part of our cultural wealth in Northern Ireland?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I appreciate the tone in which the Member has asked the question. I have seen things about the museums sector in the press before that, upon investigation, have proven to be unfounded. However, in the spirit of the tone of the question, I am happy to bring it forward to officials, and particularly to the museums sector, to try to find out exactly what is happening. I am happy to write to the Member on that.

Museums: Visitors

6. Mr Gardiner asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure how many local authority museums there are in Northern Ireland and how many visitors they receive. (AQT 1556/11-15)

Ms Ní Chuilín: There is a difference between the independent museums, some of the private and voluntary museums, and those in public ownership. That is a fairly detailed question, and the Member will appreciate that I do not have the figures to hand. However, I am happy to write to him with them.

Mr Gardiner: I thank the Minister for saying that she is going to write to me. Are there any plans to merge local authority museums with the restructuring of local government?

Ms Ní Chuilín: Certainly not at this stage. When I was asked to transfer some functions to local government, museums, the planetarium and others were down the list. I refused to do that until I was convinced that local government was in a state to implement not just the services but access for everybody, and to do it on the basis of equality.

City of Culture: Legacy

7. Mr McQuillan asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure, given her plans to filter down the legacy of the UK City of Culture to larger towns like Limavady and Coleraine, how she plans to filter it down to smaller towns like Garvagh, Castlerock and Kilrea. (AQT 1557/11-15)

Ms Ní Chuilín: I see that as being, in the first instance, a matter for the council. I do think that small towns and villages have been somewhat overshadowed by bigger towns and cities. If I had the investment to go to every corner of every small town, village or hamlet, I would make it, but we live in the real world. We have made investment through local government and will continue to do that. However, that is on the basis that it caters for all ratepayers and citizens and not just for some.

Mr McQuillan: I thank the Minister for her answer. Does she agree it is important that smaller towns as well as larger towns feel the benefit of the legacy?

Ms Ní Chuilín: Absolutely. The Member will be aware, through his relationship with Limavady Borough Council, of the Stendhal Festival in Limavady. That is a very, very small festival in comparison with the City of Culture in Derry, but it has a very significant impact. It receives a small amount of money. The people in that area, and the people who visited, were delighted to see that such a small place received government attention. That is the way it should be.

Sporting Events: Mid Ulster

8. Mrs Overend asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure whether she is aware that the UK Ireland Junior Open was successfully held recently at Killymoon Golf Club, and considering the excellent facilities in Mid Ulster, including the Mid Ulster sports arena, what she is doing to ensure that those facilities have a good crack of the whip at hosting any such future events. (AQT 1558/11-15)

Ms Ní Chuilín: The Member should be aware that responsibility for hosting events and events promotion is with DETI. However, I do not shirk from my responsibility. Events need to be brought right across, as much as possible, and that includes Mid Ulster. Does the new council have any plans to bring forward events? Other councils have approached me about the potential for events and for working in partnership with the Arts Council, the museums sector and the Sports Council, so I am happy to hear from the Member if she has any specific plans.

Mrs Overend: I thank the Minister for that. Given the excellent competition in Cookstown and the fact that the Open Championship is to be held in Royal Portrush very shortly, what is the Minister doing to work with the ETI Minister to encourage more sporting events to come to Northern Ireland?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I have continued and, at times, increased the awards to governing bodies, including the Golfing Union of Ireland. As well as that, through the GAA, rugby, soccer and others, I have met the IFA in particular about bringing competitions here, which includes going across the North — junior competitions, as well, because it is important that we inspire children and young people. It is really important that we still look at opportunities regardless of whether they are in Belfast, the city of Derry, mid-Ulster or wherever. If there are any firm proposals — because, at this stage, it is notional or speculative — I am happy if firm proposals are brought forward not just to the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment but to me, and we will give them due consideration.

Windsor Park

9. Mr Lunn asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure for an update on the redevelopment of Windsor Park, given that, according to yesterday's 'Sunday Life', Linfield and Crusaders have settled their differences about that issue. (AQT 1559/11-15)

Ms Ní Chuilín: I do not read the 'Sunday Life' — I know; shame on me. I was not aware of the story yesterday or of the stories previously that have been printed in those newspapers. I am happy to report that the soccer family — the soccer community — is getting on with it despite having differences previously. It is all working to try to provide and compete for new facilities for each of their clubs. I am not aware of any animosity or ill-feeling as a residue from anything previously.

Mr Lunn: I think that there was some difference of opinion between Crusaders and Linfield, which has now been resolved. Is the Minister satisfied that the concerns of the other Irish League clubs based in the Belfast area will be properly addressed as the saga goes on?

Ms Ní Chuilín: Actually, it is not a saga. If I were to respond to every piece of speculation in the newspapers, particularly some of the Sunday newspapers, I would spend my Mondays and Tuesdays trying to get clarification, to be sitting on Wednesday and Thursday none the wiser. I think that the Member's question is whether local clubs are going to be supported. The answer is, as best possible. In relation to the amateur league in particular, it is important that it gives full inclusion opportunities, and, in turn, that it works with clubs that are involved in the Irish Premier League and works with other partnerships, including schools, community groups, youth clubs and all the rest to make sure that there is greater participation. I think that some of the alleged animosity in the past has been about a perception that some clubs are going to do far better than others without even going through a process in the first place.

Funding Cuts: British Open

10. Mr Attwood asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure to advise the House on any potential consequences for the funding package promised to Royal Portrush Golf Club and the Royal and Ancient Golf Club (R&A) for hosting the British Open in Portrush, given the recent comments about the withdrawal of funding for tourism-related events. (AQT 1560/11-15)

Ms Ní Chuilín: I thank the Member for his question. He will be aware that that is in the bailiwick of DETI, but I am happy to forward a copy of Hansard not only to the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment — the tourism Minister — but to the Executive. On receipt of any response or reply, I will copy it to the Member.

Mr Attwood: Does the Minister agree that there needs to be certainty, not doubt, in respect of the proposed hosting of the British Open, not least because the R&A might read Hansard and might look at events in the North and begin to wonder whether it is coming or not. Is there not a need to tie this down so that, whatever the budgetary situation in the life of the next mandate, the funding package promised to Royal Portrush and R&A is guaranteed?

Ms Ní Chuilín: In short, yes, I think that it is important that it is confirmed and that it is tied down. Even just going by what I heard this morning, big ticket items and big public items like that seem a bit more secure than the Cathedral Arts Festival, the Festival or Fools, Féile an Phobail or all the rest. It is important that we get the detail of what is at risk, what is going ahead and what will not get any money at all.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I ask Members to take their ease for a few moments as we change the personnel at the Table.

3.30 pm

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Dallat] in the Chair)

Assembly Business

Mr Newton: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. I wish to apologise for not being in my place during topical questions to the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure on Tuesday afternoon of last week.

Mr Deputy Speaker: That is noted, thank you.

Private Members' Business

National Crime Agency

Debate resumed on amendment to motion:

That this Assembly condemns the increasing number of illegal activities being carried out by organised criminal gangs; notes police assessments of over 140 such gangs operating in Northern Ireland; and calls for the implementation, in full, of the National Crime Agency to help deal with this problem, which is particularly prevalent in border areas. — [Mr Irwin.]

Which amendment was:

Leave out all after "calls for" and insert

"statutory provision to be made so that all members of the National Crime Agency on operational duty locally are subject to the same accountability mechanisms and bodies that govern the work of the PSNI and its officers." — [Mr G Kelly.]

Mr Campbell: In winding up I will quickly go over some of the issues raised by a succession of Members. It was a comprehensive debate, which was moved by my colleague, Mr Irwin, who outlined the extent of areas where full implementation of the agency would be of considerable assistance.

Mr Kelly of Sinn Féin proposed the amendment, and he mentioned, as did a number of Members, the tens of millions of pounds' worth of drugs — the Minister of Justice said that that figure seemed to vary depending on which report you read — that were seized off the coast of the Republic of Ireland. However, the irony seemed to be lost on Mr Kelly that that was done with the assistance of the National Crime Agency, the full implementation of which his party resists here.

Mr Alban Maginness stated the SDLP's position of total opposition to criminality, and he mentioned Kincora. He did not relate how that was in keeping with the debate, but I am sure that he will come round to that at some point. Mr Elliott talked about the name of the National Crime Agency and said that the SDLP and Sinn Féin's response might, in part, be because of the term "National".

Mr Stewart Dickson outlined some of the evidence that the failure to fully implement the NCA was limiting the ability to counter crime. He also mentioned an issue that was referred to several times in the debate, which was the failure now to be able to proceed around asset recovery. Mr Paul Givan raised another issue that was also mentioned several times, which was that, previously, the Serious Organised Crime Agency did not appear to instil the same ire, opposition or total objection on the part of the SDLP and Sinn Féin, yet it had less accountability than the National Crime Agency, which I would have thought was a fairly relevant point.

Mr Lynch talked about budget queries and, without irony, about the drugs haul off the coast of the Republic of Ireland.

I presume that Mr Poots was talking, maybe not tongue-in-cheek but certainly he was using irony overload, when he said that the inability to fully implement the National Crime Agency was a good news day for criminals. Of course, he was absolutely right to do that.

Mr Attwood mentioned the maintenance that the SDLP needed to have of further accountability mechanisms. Mr Nesbitt said that the Home Secretary had overall responsibility for national security, and, again, he mentioned the HIU, which was and is unaccountable in the way that the Police Service here is accountable to the Assembly, yet it does not garner the same opposition that, for some reason, the NCA does.

In responding to the debate, the Minister mentioned a number of issues, one of which was human trafficking. Another was online child abuse, which, hopefully, will concentrate the minds of Members when they come to vote on the issue. He also talked about the targeting of criminals' assets. In an intervention, after he had said that we would have to fill the gaps, as he put it, if we did not proceed to fully implement the NCA, I asked him what the costs of that would be. He said that they would be "quite horrific". Those costs are in addition to welfare reform, the penalties and the IT system, and we are being told by the Justice Minister that costs that will be incurred by those who object to the NCA will be "quite horrific". He also said that SOCA was less accountable than the NCA.

Mr McCartney, who made the winding-up speech on Sinn Féin's amendment, used an ominous term. I took a very close note of his terminology. He said, "We will not allow" the NCA to be implemented without the same accountability measures as the Police Service here. I want to move to my own comments in summary, but the "we will not allow" comment from Sinn Féin means that we will all be faced with the quite horrific bill that the Justice Minister talked about.

That is one thing; the implications and cost implications, severe as they are, need to be taken account of. In addition to that and on a separate magnitude, we have outlined, right across the debate, the extent of the problem. I think that everyone accepts that full implementation of the National Crime Agency in Northern Ireland will not be a panacea. It will not mean that, within a few weeks or a few months, all the criminal gangs and international gangs that have connections here will be wiped off the face of the earth. However, it is absolutely clear to the Policing Board, the Chief Constable, the Justice Minister and most Members that failure to implement the National Crime Agency will certainly mean that those criminal elements — those well-organised criminal gangs — will be better prepared to carry out their illegal activities. There are people on the Benches opposite who can help stop them but are deliberately choosing not to do so. When constituents bring to us complaints about online child abuse and its being manipulated from overseas, we will, unfortunately, know where the buck stops. It will be with those who are prepared to say, "We haven't got our mechanisms in place as yet to stop it". When drug trafficking, fuel laundering and all the other issues that need some form of input from the NCA come back to haunt Members, it will be those who have prevented the full implementation of the National Crime Agency who will have to carry the can.

Much mention was made of the case within the past fortnight of the yacht that was seized off the coast of the Irish Republic. With the assistance of the National Crime Agency, the Government of the Irish Republic were able to apprehend the yacht and, as a result, save thousands of people's lives. What happens if the next yacht is identified off the coast of Londonderry, Ballycastle or Larne? What happens then? What happens if there are thousands, millions or maybe tens of millions of pounds of illegal drugs on board a vessel off the coast of our shores and we are told, "We've got sufficient resources in place to deal with some things, but that's an operation that will require the NCA"?

Are people going to stand on ceremony in the Chamber and say, "We would like a little more accountability, please"? Is that what they are going to say as mothers, fathers and grandparents say, "What about the future of our children being put in jeopardy because some people are standing on ceremony over the implementation of an agency that can help to fight this criminal activity?" It is time for people to call a spade a spade. It is time to step up to the mark, to implement this agency and to engage in real terms with the fight against those who deal in death with our children and our vulnerable sections of our community.

Deep Geothermal Energy

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow up to one hour and 30 minutes for the debate. The proposer will have 10 minutes to propose the motion and 10 minutes to make a winding-up speech. All other Members who are called to speak will have five minutes.

Mr Flanagan: I beg to move

That this Assembly notes the potential that deep geothermal energy has to meet the heating and electricity needs of thousands of households; recognises the potential it has to reduce our reliance on fossil fuels; and calls on the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment to ensure that appropriate legislation and incentives are in place to support the development of this industry.

Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I start with a word of congratulations to Mr McCrea on his recent appointment. I look forward to working with him in the future.

We need to move away from our over-reliance on fossil fuels and make the most of the opportunities that present themselves to us in the form of clean, green and sustainable sources of energy. Geothermal energy is an environmentally friendly, sustainable energy source that should be an integral part of the mix of energy sources we have.

Certain parts of the North are very well suited to that type of energy generation, particularly the Mourne, parts of the north coast and County Antrim and parts of south-west Fermanagh, ironically where drilling was proposed for fracking. Geothermal energy works in a very simple way. Geothermal power requires no fuel except for pumps. It is therefore immune from fuel cost fluctuations. However, the capital costs associated with it are very significant, and drilling accounts for over half the costs. The exploration of deep resources entails significant risks. For that reason, we need to ensure that this clean, green industry is supported. Personally, I am keen to see this work being taken forward by an arm of the state, by a company established to search for and extract natural resources in the interest of all our citizens and not to serve a small section of shareholders in multinational companies.

The opportunities present themselves from the resource itself. There is plenty of heat in the centre of the earth, and the deeper you dig the hotter it gets. The core is about 4,000 miles beneath the surface and can reach temperatures of over 4,000°C. Part of that heat is left over from the earth's formation about four billion years ago. The rest comes from the constant decay of radioactive isotopes inside the earth. From hot springs, geothermal energy has been used for bathing for tens of thousands of years and for space heating since ancient Roman times. It is now better known for electricity generation.

In 1892, America's first district heating scheme, in Idaho, was powered directly by geothermal energy. It was copied in Oregon in 1900. In the 20th century, demand for electricity led to the consideration of geothermal power as a generating source. Prince Ginori Conti, from Florence, tested the first geothermal power generator on 4 July 1904. It successfully lit four light bulbs.

William Thomson — better known as Lord Kelvin — who was actually born in Belfast, invented the heat pump in 1852. In 1912, Heinrich Zoelly patented the idea of using it to draw heat from the ground, but it was not until the late 1940s that the geothermal heat pump was successfully implemented. In 2012, around the world, over 11,000 megawatts (MW) of geothermal power was online across 24 countries. An additional 28 GW of direct geothermal heating capacity was installed for district heating, space heating and agricultural and industrial processes across the world by 2010.

Geothermal energy is cost-effective, reliable, sustainable and environmentally friendly, but has historically been linked to areas near tectonic plate boundaries. Recent technological advances have dramatically expanded the range and size of viable resources, especially for applications such as home heating, which opens the potential for widespread exploitation. Geothermal wells release greenhouse gases that are trapped deep within the earth, but these emissions are much lower per energy unit than those of fossil fuels.

As a result, if widely deployed in place of fossil fuels, geothermal power has the potential to help mitigate global warming. The earth's geothermal resources are, theoretically, more than adequate to supply humanity's ever-growing energy needs. However, only a very small fraction may be profitably exploited. Drilling and exploration for deep resources is, indeed, very expensive. Forecasts for the future of geothermal power depend on assumptions about technology, energy prices, subsidies and interest rates. Deep geothermal energy development is a highly developed industry that contributes to the renewable energy mix in a large number of countries worldwide. The use of geothermal energy is most developed in volcanic regions and countries, such as America, the Philippines, Indonesia, Mexico, Italy, New Zealand and Iceland. They all produce significant quantities of electricity from geothermal power.

However, there has been renewed interest in the use of deep geothermal energy in non-volcanic regions, with Germany, Austria, France, Denmark and the Netherlands all showing significant development of their resources, mainly for combined heat and power and direct heating and cooling purposes. We lag behind some of our EU counterparts, who have adopted and supported deep geothermal heat development due to the significant benefits of deep geothermal energy. The geothermal potential of the northern part of this island has been extensively described in numerous studies completed between the 1970s and 1980s and in 2005 and 2008. Based on these studies, the total stored energy is roughly 490 GW of thermal capacity. However, not all of the energy stored can be economically exploited.

GT Energy, one of the leading organisations in this field, estimates that under the policy framework discussed in a document it sent to the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment, 81 thermal MW of geothermal energy could be developed by 2020. That represents significantly less than 1% of the stored energy here. However, 81 thermal MW could equate to approximately 31.5% of the current outstanding renewable heat target of 1,300 thermal GW by 2020. GT Energy believes that this is achievable and is supported by international experience in places such as Paris, where, in the 1970s, over 240 thermal MW were installed over 13 years — an addition of 18 thermal MW a year.

Additionally, in Germany, since the introduction of a development framework in 2001, over 21 thermal MW have been installed annually.

A report for the Renewable Energy Association found that a fifth of these islands' electricity needs could be met through deep geothermal energy. However, arguments have been made that that will not happen unless DETI provides the necessary structure and incentive to kick-start that exciting sector. A number of the towns identified as having a high geothermal potential already have a developed gas network or are listed as towns where future expansion of the gas network is planned. Those towns include Coleraine, Ballymoney, Ballymena, Antrim, Magherafelt, Cookstown and Dungannon. As long as legislation exists that supports the protection of the gas industry, uncertainty will remain for the ability of geothermal projects to progress through feasibility to development. That statute obligation is a major barrier to the deployment of deep geothermal energy and other forms of renewable electricity and heat generation.

As part of the solution that it has put forward, GT Energy has urged the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment to install a separate tariff for deep geothermal and to separate it from ground-source heat pumps, which it sees as insufficient to incentivise development. It wants to see a tariff at a suitable level to stimulate the development of the deep geothermal sector. It also wants deep geothermal installations assessed on a case-by-case basis, where proposed projects coincide with an area that is an existing or future gas connection.

If we are serious, as many claim, that we want to move to a low-carbon future, we need to make the most of the opportunities presented by clean, sustainable and renewable sources of energy. The potential for —

Mr Allister: Will the Member give way?

Mr Flanagan: I certainly will.

Mr Allister: I am just wondering whether I am hearing the Member correctly. Is he not the one in the House who purports to be the champion against deep drilling? Has that not been the entire basis of his opposition to fracking? Am I hearing him correctly that he is now advocating deep drilling to whatever depth is necessary in order to tap into geothermal? Are there no bounds to Sinn Féin's contradictions?

Mr Flanagan: Will the Member give way? [Laughter.]

Mr Allister: It sounds as if what he is advocating — geothermal — is neo-fracking.

Mr Flanagan: I thank the Member for giving way. I thought that he was going to keep going until all my time was up. There is a huge difference between geothermal energy and hydraulic fracturing. If the Member thinks that the two things are the same, he really needs to read more.

Mr B McCrea: [Interruption.]

Mr Flanagan: The main difference, Mr McCrea, who spoke from a sedentary position, is that gas is —

Mr B McCrea: Will the Member give way?

Mr Flanagan: No, because I have only a minute left.

Mr B McCrea: I will not take as long.

Mr Flanagan: I do not care.

The main difference is that gas is not sustainable, no matter how many times we get a policy document from the Department telling us that it is. Gas is not a sustainable form of energy.

As the Member raised the issue of fracking, it would be wrong not to reflect on the announcement last week by the Enterprise Minister of her decision not to give Tamboran another extension to its petroleum licence, or its licence for fracking, as it was more commonly known. In terms of supporting the renewable industry and moving us towards our challenging targets for renewable heat and electricity in the future, it was the right decision, and it is a welcome one. However, it is important to point out that it does not reflect a road-to-Damascus conversion by the Minister as she has yet to say that she is opposed to or against fracking. The rationale behind the decision was solely based on timing; the fact that Tamboran cannot get the work done in time to meet the clearly legislated deadlines in its licences played a huge part. Perhaps the fact that there is a big election coming next year may have played an equally big part.

Mr Dunne: I welcome the opportunity to speak on the motion today. I think that we all recognise the ever-increasing costs of energy, with almost 70% of our householders still depending on home heating oil as their main form of heat. We all recognise the need to explore all viable options for providing alternative energy sources.

Energy costs are consistently cited as one of the main challenges for businesses here. Energy is a very important issue that affects everyone across Northern Ireland. Therefore, it is imperative that we continue to look at all possible options to ensure that we maximise our potential in developing and improving our energy supplies. It is also important that we continue to keep focused on meeting DETI's 2020 renewable energy targets of generating 40% of energy from renewables. Renewable energy has a key role to play as an alternative energy source, and it is something that must continue to be developed.

4.15 pm

Not only is a strong, indigenous and sustainable energy sector vital for the economy, job creation and security of supply, it is also in the best interests of consumers. Supporting further growth in the sustainable energy sector will mean that Northern Ireland is much less reliant on the importing of fossil fuels and thus less exposed to volatile international prices. However, we must be realistic about the form of renewable energy we can provide here.

The UK does not have the resource potential of volcanic regions like New Zealand and Iceland, but in some locations underground temperatures have limited potential for deep geothermal projects. Therefore, we should give due consideration to the potential of geothermal energy. However, we cannot ignore the significant challenges that exist in this field, not least the financial investment that will be needed to make any project viable and realistic.

Any deep geothermal projects would require all of the necessary planning and environmental impact assessments to be carried out and considered. The depth of the bore holes required would be somewhere between 2,000 and 3,000 metres. That is the depth required to get temperatures in the region of 150°C to 200°C. Water is then injected to ensure fracturing of the rock. Hydrofracturing sounds like fracking to me. Cold water is then pumped down and brought back to the surface as hot water and can be used for electricity generation or district heating schemes.

Mr B McCrea: I thank the Member for giving way. I did not quite hear his point, and he may wish to reiterate it, about fracking and the fact that when you put the water down you have to frack the rock. Does it not sound very like fracking to you?

Mr Dunne: Yes, to clarify for the Member, that is exactly what I said: it sounds like fracking to me. We have got to be frack about it, [Laughter.] it is hydrofracturing — fracturing the rock with hydraulic pressure.

There are shallow ground-source heat pumps being used in Northern Ireland that have benefited from the Northern Ireland renewable heat incentive scheme. I welcome the range of renewable technologies being supported through the Department's strategic energy framework, with a range of renewable electricity and heat technologies all eligible for such support.

To help create sustainable high-value jobs in the renewable energy sector, develop the green economy, which we are all so keen on, and enhance security of supply, it is vital that the Executive do all in their power to ensure that the proposed North/South electricity interconnector is progressed as soon as possible. There is no doubt that renewable energy can have economic and environmental benefits whilst reducing our exposure to volatile fossil fuel prices and helping us to achieve further energy independence in Northern Ireland.

We note the potential of deep geothermal energy to meet some of our heating and electricity needs. However, we have to be realistic about the challenges and barriers that exist in that field. There is room for further research and investigation on geothermal energy to allow it to become part of our energy mix.

Mr McKinney: I welcome the opportunity to contribute to today's debate. I reaffirm the SDLP's support for the development of deep geothermal energy as part of an integrated approach, with the hope that it can positively impact on our over-reliance on fossil fuels and attempt to satisfy our ever increasing energy demands.

As Members are well aware, we are too heavily reliant on imported fossil fuels for our everyday energy needs, and with demand and price ever increasing, we must act now to avoid an energy crisis in the near future. It is clear that, as the prices of fossil fuels increase, so does fuel poverty, which affects the most disadvantaged. Recent reports estimated that some 300,000 households here are experiencing fuel poverty.

In an attempt to curb that, we must be innovative and strategic in utilising alternative, sustainable and renewable sources of energy that will enable us to meet the Executive's targets of achieving 40% of our electricity from renewable sources and 10% of our renewable heat by 2020.

Although we have made some progress over the past number of years, more needs to be done. In that regard, we must stand united in tackling climate change and driving the green agenda, as was suggested, to meet those targets. This is also about creating partnerships, and, in that sense, we must work closely not only in our own Departments but with our colleagues in the Republic to ensure the effective and efficient sharing of resources, with the possibility of cross-border interconnection. The approach taken must be part of an all-Ireland initiative so that consumers, North or South, can benefit from increased sustainable energy supplies at a competitive price. Deep geothermal energy certainly has the potential to be part of that initiative.

I would agree that, following the studies that have been conducted, the process has significant potential here, especially in some of the areas suggested. If the developments in Southampton, along with other models in western Europe, are anything to go by, deep geothermal energy has the potential to provide a large amount of renewable heat and electricity. It will also effectively help with reducing carbon emissions, addressing climate issues, providing employment and economic benefits to local companies and, most of all, driving down prices for the everyday consumer.

Deep geothermal energy is not without its limitations, and it is those that we must overcome. Perhaps the greatest issue facing deep geothermal energy in providing heat and electricity for countless homes is the time that it would take to develop and establish such a system here. As the Cambridge Economic Policy Associates (CEPA) report highlights, the establishment of a system is highly unlikely to happen before 2020, and it will even take a few years for exploration to begin beforehand. Do we have a timetable to push that further and faster?

Deep geothermal energy requires a long-term approach, with further planning, study, consultation and execution required if it is to have a significant impact. A road map must be developed. In that sense, it is unlike other sources of renewable energy that have been tried, tested and established in this region, such as harnessing wind, solar or biomass.

There remain other obstacles to overcome before we could even get going. For instance, we must be progressive in tackling high initial capital investment. It has been asked whether the renewable heating incentive is fit for purpose, so we must work closely to ensure that the proper financial provisions and incentives are in place to provide a competitive market and to attract investment for further growth. After all, it is estimated that it costs just over £3 million for every borehole drilled for exploration and that one plant — in Ballymena, for example — would cost £30 million to develop.

We must also take all steps necessary to limit the geological risk inherent in deep geothermal energy exploration. Further impact assessments are needed, and those must be continuous during exploration and the potential establishment of deep geothermal energy plants to limit any potential negative impact on the environment. In that regard, until we overcome the hurdles of deep geothermal energy, the motion remains narrow, as it will not have any significant impact on our energy demand in the near future. It is only through future planning, proper regulation, further consultation and providing proper financial incentives to investors that the scheme will become a reality and be delivered. Therefore, as the search continues for the most viable alternative to coal, oil and gas, we must also ask ourselves what are the alternatives that can have an immediate impact and strengthen our national grid. We have already seen much debate and consternation surrounding fracking, as has been touched on. Sinn Féin has said no to fracking but —

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is almost up.

Mr McKinney: — where are the alternatives that can make a significant, immediate impact on our energy demands nationwide?

Mrs Overend: I support the motion. The general public might be somewhat bemused that the Assembly, in the grip of a budgetary crisis that, if not resolved, could result in the collapse of institutions, is clearly debating a take-note motion. That said, in Northern Ireland, energy, particularly the price of energy, is one of the most important issues out there. At the very least, at the end of this debate, the Members present will be better informed about one of the technologies that could help solve our energy challenges and help meet our renewable targets.

Deep geothermal energy is an emerging renewable energy technology that has the potential to help reduce our over-reliance on imported fossil fuels. Deep geothermal plants work by pumping water down to rocks about 5 kilometres below the surface that are at high temperatures of around 200° centigrade. Once there, most of the water turns to steam and is then pumped back up and converted into geothermal electricity using a steam turbine. When cooled, the water can also be reused to produce more geothermal energy on demand, with — it is claimed by green energy enthusiasts — the potential to deliver one third of the UK's heat demand, if heat networks were installed.

The strategic energy framework of 2010 states:

All parties on the Executive signed up to the ambitious target in the Programme for Government to achieve that target. I believe that we are on about 14% at present. It is not just about creating security of energy supply and literally keeping the lights on; it is also about adapting to and militating against the harmful effects of climate change for future generations. The document states:

“There has been considerable commercial interest in the development of deep geothermal heating schemes in recent years and DETI is aware of the importance of financial incentives and an effective regulatory framework to the promotion of emerging renewable energy sectors such as geothermal energy, and will work with the Geological Survey of Northern Ireland to assess the best methods to implement these in a timely manner.”

Studies have been carried out on the geothermal potential in Northern Ireland, with a number of towns identified as having the conditions to be potentially suitable for deep geothermal heating networks. Previous studies have examined the potential geothermal resource in Northern Ireland. In 2005, a study that used both measurements from existing bore holes and model geothermal temperature maps identified areas where deep geothermal heating schemes could be possible. Temperatures of around 90° Celsius were measured at a depth of 2,300 metres in the Rathlin Bay area on the north coast, and higher temperatures of up to 165° Celsius were modelled at 5,000-metre depths in other areas. That study was supplemented by a 2008 report commissioned by Action Renewables, which sought to determine where deep geothermal schemes may be viable by assessing potential heat demand and geothermal conditions. Six towns have been identified as having the appropriate geothermal conditions and the necessary heat demand: Ballycastle, Bushmills, Ballymoney, Ballymena, Larne and Antrim. I hope that the Minister will tell us the latest situation regarding the potential for exploiting the potential of geothermal. I am sure that the residents of the six towns just mentioned will be very interested indeed.

On 1 July this year, the all-party group on renewable energy received a presentation from GT Energy. The presentation mentioned Ballymena and Antrim and associated feasibility studies. However, both projects are apparently on hold due to a lack of financial and regulatory support. Perhaps the Minister will clarify the attitude of the Department in her summing up.

There have been studies, reports and consultation documents, but still, as it stands, no projects have been forthcoming. However, a word of caution: in the strategic energy framework document, the Department estimated that the combined cost of renewable electricity installations together with the cost of the grid investment necessary to meet the 40% target could be between £49 and £83 per household on an annual basis at current prices. When we talk of government grants and incentives for renewable energy schemes, we should not forget that it is the consumer and taxpayer who end up paying through their energy bills.

The policy of the Ulster Unionist Party on energy is that we need to diversify our supply. Onshore wind is not the only option when it comes to renewable energy —

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is almost up.

Mrs Overend: — and we should not put all our eggs in one basket. Necessity is the mother of invention and —

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is up.

Mrs Overend: — other emerging technologies should be part of our energy mix in the future.

Mr Lunn: I am happy to support the motion. It is fairly limited and just asks for appropriate legislation and incentives to support the potential development of the industry. That is fair enough. I must confess that I have listened with interest today to the various experts on the topic; it is not something that I know much about. I listened to Professor Flanagan, Mrs Overend and Mr Dunne with interest.

4.30 pm

I think that we are moving in the right direction. A geological survey and other evidence tell us where the hotspots are. We have heard them mentioned several times. They are certainly around County Antrim, particularly north Antrim, and perhaps into south Derry. I know that the Committee has already looked at this area in some detail, so we are in no doubt about the potential.

There may be some time pressures. We are in a long-term project to try to improve our energy supply, costs and prices, but we could find ourselves competing with other parts of the UK. Extraction will, effectively, be a private enterprise, and, at least in part, we need to know how to prioritise the areas of opportunity around County Antrim because the same investors who might be looking there will also be looking at the Grampians, Cornwall, Yorkshire or other areas where potential exists. So we need to make it attractive for investors. That is all that the motion asks. We should be in no doubt that we need to deliver on energy costs and supply in this country. What we have at the moment is far too fragile and too dependent on others.

I heard the discussion about the comparison with fracking. Again, my lack of knowledge will come to the fore, but it seems to me that it is really not the same thing. Both involve a hole in the ground, but, beyond that, I cannot see how pumping water down a hole so that it heats up and pumping it back up again is the —

Mr Frew: Will the Member give way?

Mr Lunn: Absolutely — inform me.

Mr Frew: This is a point of information for the Member. First, a borehole has to be drilled. Water then has to be pumped down and go through fractured rock at about 120°C before coming up through a second borehole to hit onto a motor or generator. So, to all intents and purposes, it will have to go through fractured rock.

Mr Lunn: Yes, I understand that, but I still do not think that it has the potential for as much destruction to the environment in terms of producing gases. That is what fracking is all about. I would certainly be prepared to give it a fair wind. It is worthy of more exploration. Look at the countries around the world that have gone with this: are Iceland or New Zealand regarded as environmentally unfriendly? I really think that we should look at this very seriously and not accept that it is just another form of fracking, because I do not believe that it is.

Inevitably, when the time comes, if we ever get round to it, there will be a lot of local opposition. You can already see it forming here. That will happen not least because, if we go ahead with this sort of exploration, it will be in some of our most scenic locations. I wonder whether the proposers of the motion, and indeed everybody else here, are prepared to commit to supporting exploratory drilling without seeking local political gain. Let us face it: every time that we have had an environmentally friendly energy proposal — wind turbines, waste incinerators, hydro schemes and wave power — a head of steam, if I can say that, has built up in opposition to it. I wonder whether that will happen again, even if it is proven that this is liable to be comparatively environmentally friendly.

I would like to hear more from the Minister about incentives already available and any further potential incentives, given the obvious lack of potential for committing extra funding just now.

I will leave it at that. As you can tell, I am not convinced one way or the other, but I think that it is certainly worthy of further exploration.

Mr Frew: I am grateful for the chance to speak in the debate, which is a very important one for moving forward. There is no doubt whatsoever in my mind that we will need a greater mix of energy generation in the future. That is a no-brainer, and we have to be prepared for that. We certainly cannot lump all our eggs in the one basket that is wind power. It is simply not reliable enough. Until we get to a point at which we have the storage capacity to save energy, we need to have as wide a mix as possible.

With that mix comes all sorts of responsibilities. We will definitely need our own domestic energy supplies. Deep geothermal energy may well be one of those answers. We should explore the possibilities of getting that up, out and to the public so that they can have a real, tangible benefit. Hopefully, we will also reduce energy costs indirectly.

What amazes me here today is Sinn Féin. Its members are meant to be the guardians of the environment, the people who fought the good fight against fracking in Fermanagh and were against all holes being bored in that beautiful countryside. I ask this question: why is it OK to test, explore and drill in my constituency of North Antrim but not in Fermanagh? Is it the case that the proposer of the motion is simply saying, "Right, OK — we are not going to have fracking in Fermanagh, but why not have boreholes all over the place in North Antrim? Why not let them pick up the tab and take on the burden of responsibility when it comes to fuel mixes?" That is basically what this sounds like today.

Mr Flanagan: I thank the Member for giving way. Maybe he was not listening, but I said that there was actually potential for that in Fermanagh as well, so it is not as though I am opposed to boreholes in my own area. The Member will be well aware that this is not going to happen in his constituency because of the protection that is afforded to the gas industry and because a gas network is enabled in the parts of the constituency where this is a viable runner. That is blocking it.

Mr Frew: Some who listen to this would even argue that the motion would be classed as sectarian because of the interest of north Antrim and of course Fermanagh with regard to fracking. What is the difference between fracking for shale gas and fracking for geothermal energy? I will quote from the Department of Energy and Climate Change's geothermal energy report, which states that deep geothermal power:

"is generally created when cold water is pumped down one borehole, heated up as it moves through fractures in hot rocks (at temperatures over 120°C) and returned to the surface via another borehole to drive an electricity-generating turbine."

Now, the key words in that are "fractures in hot rocks". They are the key words. I am not opposed to the exploration of new energy mixes. Is Sinn Féin actually coming to the realisation now that this will have to be looked at? Is it coming to the realisation that we cannot rely on the existing sources of energy as they are now? Will that spirit generate itself into helping to push forward the other main key issue in all of this, which is interconnection? Will Sinn Féin push hard for the North/South interconnector in order that we have a greater mix of power being generated on this island to support the people of Northern Ireland and to also have connection to the greater UK, the British Isles and Europe?

This is a party that has, for so long, been one of no progress. I would love to see the day that it gets on board and actually tries to do something positive for the people of Northern Ireland. We can all bury our head in the sand and say that we do not like that; it is too risky or too dangerous. Let us explore it and see what benefits it will bring people. Let us see it getting on the ground because it is the only way that people will benefit from it and be able to have a greater degree of flexibility in their energy costs and resource. It will help and aid businesses. I am glad that Sinn Féin is starting to realise that we need this.

Mr Attwood: A couple of hours ago, the Minister, other people and I were in west Belfast to acknowledge the work of Delta Packaging. It now has 250 people supplying headline businesses in Europe and other places. Terry Cross, the chair of the board, made the point that his business model was beginning to address obviously the issue of recycling. I know from other conversations that his business model is trying to address the issue of renewables.

I make that point because, whatever the difference might be around whether there is frack-free thermal energy, the purpose of the debate should be whether we in Northern Ireland are going to recognise that our economy, if it is to be sustainable and thrive, has to have a niche market profile in the global conditions, one of which is what Terry Cross was talking about a couple of hours ago: whether the profile of our industry for recycling and renewables gives us a competitive advantage. I make that point because, whatever about thermal energy, unless we in Northern Ireland shape our energy mix and go down the road of renewables in a much speedier way, we will lose our space in the global market.

Whatever about thermal energy, Mr Frew, as I have said many times before, the biggest economic opportunity this island has is not just in our wind but in our wave and tide. That is where science and engineering are at their most advanced stage, and that is where the biggest opportunities exist. If we are to compete in the global market, if we are to one day be energy sufficient, if we are to one day export to national and international grids, it is around wind, wave and tide that we will be able to first build that business model and that energy model. That needs imagination, and my concern about the shape of current government strategy is that there is not enough imagination to scale up in the way that we can. We have the imagination. As I always say, 30 miles from here, in Strangford lough, is the world birthplace of modern tidal power. The world birthplace of modern tidal power sits in one of the most protected waters in Europe. You can be imaginative, you can be world leading and you can do it in a way that protects the environment. That, in my view, is the real issue in the debate. Whatever about thermal energy mixing in with wind, wave, tide and solar, do we have the imagination, do we put the money in and do we have the capacity to live up to that challenge? That is why I ask the Minister, given the current consultation on the Northern Ireland renewable obligations certificate when it comes to solar PV, whether she has a view on reducing, as outlined in the consultation, the ROC payable in that regard from 4 to 1.6. If the ROC was reduced to a level of 1.6, then, in a moment, the solar PV industry would be dealt a crushing blow.

Mr Frew is wrong: whether there is a frack-free model of thermal energy — Mr Agnew from the Green Party will talk about that, I am sure — you miss the point. The point is that, whether you frack or not using thermal, it is about whether you can do it safely and responsibly. The evidence in respect of hydraulic fracking is that it has not been done responsibly in America. The safety issues around where the gas goes and what the health impacts are —

Mr Frew: Will the Member give way?

Mr Attwood: I will give way.

Mr Frew: Does the Member agree that nobody here is suggesting that we go down a route where we do unsafe fracking of any sort to get any sort of energy resource? No one in this room has even suggested that.

Mr Attwood: I note that comment, but, until last week, you might have drawn different conclusions from the current Minister's viewpoint. The Minister went to the Middle East — I think it was to Oman, but I might be corrected on that — and issued a statement saying that fracking was being done OK there, so why can we not do it in Fermanagh?

Mrs Foster (The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment): On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker.

Mr Attwood: The point is that —

Mr Deputy Speaker: I will take a point of order. The Member will resume his seat.

Mrs Foster: The Member might like to reflect on what he has just said, Mr Deputy Speaker. At no time did I mention fracking in the Middle East.

Mr Attwood: I think that the public record will say otherwise. If I am wrong, I will correct the record. However, I recall the Minister, on one of her investment trips, saying that if fracking was being done safely in another place it could be done safely here.

I am glad that there has been a change of heart. Whatever the motivation, whether it is the imminence of the Fermanagh Westminster election or whether it is a genuine change of heart, I welcome it, but do not confuse fracking that might relate to thermal with hydraulic fracking for gas, where there are health, safety, water and seismic consequences.

4.45 pm

Mr Wilson: I have no doubt that the Member who proposed the motion has great knowledge of the whole idea of geothermal energy. He knows all about being put under pressure and then having steam coming out of your ears. Anybody who listened to 'Nolan' this morning will know all about that. He is right: the deeper you dig, the hotter it gets. As Nolan dug into his knowledge of the events budget and welfare reform, he certainly got a lot hotter, and people got a lot more light as to how little Sinn Féin knows about some of the issues that it debates.

This has been an interesting debate. We are seeing turnarounds and contradictory positions already. On one hand, the defenders of the Fermanagh countryside against the ravages of fracking now say that fracking is OK on certain occasions. Mr Attwood now seems to be converted to renewable energy. This was the man who said that, if there had been a waste-to-energy plant for Belfast, he would have stopped it. He stopped the Rose Energy project, but now he is converted to renewable energy.

Mr Attwood: Will the Member give way?

Mr Wilson: Yes, I will give way.

Mr Attwood: Check the record. Unlike in your time in the DOE, the profile of approvals for wind turbines, both commercial scale and farm-located, was far in excess of anything that you achieved. Where there were environmental consequences that were too grave in respect of energy plant, of course I refused it. Would any other position be responsible?

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mr Wilson: That was the SDLP's contribution to energy in Northern Ireland. The fuel poor have had imposed on them some of the most expensive forms of energy that we could have. It is three and a half times more costly than what is generated at Kilroot or Ballylumford. I do not think that that is a record to be proud of, especially when 42% of people in Northern Ireland live in fuel poverty.

Let us look at the issue. First of all, we have a proposal that we should have a form of energy that requires fracking. People can deny it all they want, but 'The Economist' said that "geothermal is the new fracking". It involves drilling vertical wells up to 12,000 ft deep, then horizontal drilling, then putting water and chemicals under pressure, and the pressure and the chemistry shear the deep, hot rock. Shearing or fracking, it is all the same. Of course, Sinn Féin now supports it in places like the Mourne, Rathlin and Lough Neagh. What is significant about all those areas? They are tourist areas. In those tourist areas, you will have boreholes, drilling rigs, pumping stations and maybe even a power station having to be built close to the well in areas where tourists —

Mr Agnew: Will the Member give way?

Mr Wilson: Yes, I will give way.

Mr Agnew: How many wells on average does fracking require, and how many wells on average does geothermal require?

Mr Wilson: The whole idea of fracking is that you go down through one well and then you have lots of branches off it. All you have on top of it is a barn-like structure that is no bigger than a farmer's barn and can be integrated into the countryside. The impact would be far less than having to dig a hole in the ground, with another one coming up and a power station on top of it. There is a huge difference. Not only has Sinn Féin now been converted to fracking, but it has no concerns about these installations being in tourist and agricultural areas.

The third thing is that this has been presented as a panacea.

Mr Flanagan said that people need to read more. I think that if he had read the NICVA report he might not have got into the trouble he did this morning, mind you. If he would even read the DETI document, he would know that 0.5% maximum of our energy can be produced in this particular form. We are still going to be reliant on the main source of energy that this society depends on: fossil fuel. Indeed, a well to release gas is likely to produce far more energy to produce electricity than a well that goes down to release hot water. Of course, it will be much cheaper than geothermal energy as well.

In a country where we are looking, first of all, for reliable and cheap energy that will meet our needs for the future, to come up with this idea that you can turn your back on fossil fuels and on drilling for natural gas underneath the surface and that you can rely on geothermal power, which even at the best estimate will produce one two-hundredths of our energy needs —

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is almost up.

Mr Wilson: — just shows the nonsense that Sinn Féin's energy policy is.

Mr Agnew: Thank you, Mr Deputy Speaker. And now for something completely different.

Geothermal energy is a clean, reliable source of energy; it is a renewable source of energy that we can access in Northern Ireland. Unlike fossil fuels, as the previous contributor said, it is not finite and it is not running out any time soon. It is renewable, so if we are talking about energy security, let us not talk about today or tomorrow but about the long term.

I question some of the previous contributor's figures. Geothermal energy has the potential to meet up to one third of our renewable heat targets by 2020, so it can make a significant contribution to producing heat. Those of us who have read and understand the science know that we need to move away from our dependence on fossil fuels. Unlike what the previous contributor may claim, we need to tackle climate change because it is caused by human activity and only the actions of human activity can stop irreversible climate change.

As things stand in Northern Ireland, we do not provide sufficient support for geothermal energy for it to be exploited. It is a new form of technology in the UK, although, as has been pointed out by other contributors, it heats up to 90% of homes in Iceland.

Mr Wilson: I thank the Member for giving way. Would he accept that when he talks glibly about not giving enough support to geothermal energy, what he is really saying is that the hard-pressed electricity consumers already, through their bills, provide subsidies to the industry, so putting up their energy bills?

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member has an additional minute.

Mr Agnew: The former Minister will be well aware that there is no energy to speak of being produced in Northern Ireland that has not to be subsidised in some shape or form. For example, we are giving £32.5 million to the gas industry to bring gas to the west, so we are subsidising energy and we will do so. The question is this: which energy should we subsidise? Which energy will provide the best long-term solutions in terms of security of supply, sustainability and price for the consumer?

Renewable energy is the only form of energy that can tick each of those boxes. We need to look at each technology, but we also need to start from the basic principle that renewable energy is the way forward. That is where I take on Mr Flanagan's point. I suspect that one of the problems with geothermal energy is not to do with some of the distraction that has been created around the idea of fracking but the fact that the Department has a statutory duty to promote the gas industry. To incentivise the exploitation of geothermal energy would be a threat to the gas industry because, of course, it wants gas to be our main form of heating. The potential of renewable heat through geothermal energy is a threat to the gas industry and, therefore, it could be argued that the Department would not meet its statutory duty.

Clearly, we need legislation to regulate geothermal energy and I have argued for the regulation of the other industries. Equally, the renewables industry should be a responsible industry and it should be regulated, but we also need to change the legislation that gives priority to gas. By virtue of the fact that we have a renewal heat incentive and renewable obligation certificates, we are acknowledging that we need to move away from fossil fuels and that we need to incentivise renewables. If we start from that basis, the statutory duty for gas no longer stands any justification in Northern Ireland.

I come now to the point that was raised about whether this is fracking. Fracking can be part of the process in geothermal. It can, but it is the exception rather than the norm. The vast majority of geothermal exploitation across the world has not involved hydraulic fracturing. Where it does not involve it, we do not need to have this debate; where it does, we need to look at it. The question of hydraulic fracturing is a question of risk and benefits. What are the risks of fracking for gas? The risks are the possible release of methane and the contamination of water through the chemicals used. During the debate, somebody said that the same issue of bringing water back up to the surface would be required in the geothermal process. That is not the case. It is a closed-loop system, so we do not have the huge pools of contaminated water that you would have with gas fracking.

I will answer the question that Mr Wilson did not answer. It was proposed to have thousands of wells: 1,200 across Fermanagh and thousands across Ireland, north and south across the border, to frack that area. You would need one to three wells for a similar geothermal process. So, it does not involve the industrialisation that we would have seen if we had fracked Fermanagh. I should have started by welcoming the Minister's decision to terminate Tamboran's licence.

Mr Wilson: Will the Member give way?

Mr Agnew: I do not have time; apologies. The differences are marked, but there are benefits. As I said, there is a cost-benefit analysis. The costs of geothermal are less, and the benefits are much better, because we get a clean, green fuel without carbon emissions beyond the process of extraction.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is up.

Mr Agnew: We get much greater benefits. We get a long-term, clean, green, reliable renewable source of energy.

Mr B McCrea: Mr Deputy Speaker, rarely have I heard such twaddle or such uneducated, uninformed, misinformed information from these Benches. You sit and say, "This is not fracking" or "This is fracking by another name". I invite you to read a book that you will find in the Library. It is by one Daithí McKay. I am not sure if it is the same Daithí McKay, but he was a chief scientific officer. The book is 'Sustainable Energy — Without the Hot Air'.

One thing that I want to understand is what Fintan Warfield has to say about it all. Come on. What does Fintan Warfield have to say? I cannot ask him, because I do not know the Sinn Féin mayor of South Dublin County Council personally, but maybe Members here do, because that council has given full planning permission for all of this. It has had an entire seismic report done of the Dublin/Newcastle basin to see whether it can go through and to see if it is possible. Full planning permission was granted in January 2011, and, since then, there has been nothing.

Mr Flanagan: Will the Member give way?

Mr B McCrea: I do not think I will, because the Member was not quite so generous when I wanted to come in earlier. I ask him to get his facts right. I will address this to Mr Agnew as well, because I am a chemical engineer, and I chair the all-party group on science and technology. We have had quite a few discussions on this issue, including discussions with experts who came from across the water to talk to us about the issue. It does not seem possible to me to bore three or four kilometres down into the ground without cutting across aquifers or other fault lines, which may release methane or radon, particularly if you are in the geological hotspots driven by granite. You are going to do exactly the same thing that you were going to do with fracking.

I cannot understand why we have the hypocrisy in this place to say, "We oppose fracking because we don't know what it might do" and then say, "But geothermal might be OK".

5.00 pm

Mr Agnew: I thank the Member for giving way, and I have a couple of questions for him. You do not release radon; you bring it to the surface, which fracking has the potential to do but geothermal does not. No water is produced, unlike in fracking, so that is another difference. Does the Member accept that there are two types of geothermal energy? There are the enhanced geothermal systems that require fracking and the normal geothermal system that requires no fracking.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mr B McCrea: I am tempted to respond with "Will the Member give way?", because that was something of a speech. Let me quote something from the body of evidence in the research paper. This was said by a representative of the company that are going to do it. He said that there are two types:

"they are drilling into granite which has no water in it and they are pumping water down into the granite to create an artificial aquifer."

That will put pressure on the systems. He then said:

"In Northern Ireland, we are drilling into existing aquifers ... which are, in essence, sponge layers of rock, buried three or four kilometres deep".

The real issue in all these matters is that, if you do not have sound geological data, you should not proceed. However, where you have it, you can do it safely. That is the real problem with the whole argument. People expound on emotion and do not look at the facts. They do not come down and see what the science says. Of course, if it is not safe, you do not do it, but, where you have scientific evidence that it is safe — as it apparently is in the South Dublin with its Sinn Féin mayor — you should give full planning permission and get on with it. I come to this issue —

Mr McMullan: Will the Member give way?

Mr B McCrea: Yes.

Mr McMullan: When the Member mentions the planning permission given in South Dublin, does he know exactly what he is talking about when he mentions geothermal heating and the type that it is? Perhaps he can tell the House that. Secondly, can I ask the MP for East Antrim how many applications have been made for geothermal heating schemes in his constituency?

Mr B McCrea: I am not sure that you are allowed to redirect your questions through me to other people. If you feel that you are in the Chair, fair enough. There is a touch of debating hydrofracking there, I think, where we have gone down and gone across.

The information that I see here is on the website. Take this document and have a look at GT Energy to see what it has said about drilling in Newcastle. I got excited for a while, because I thought that it was Newcastle, County Down, but it turned out to be Newcastle, County Dublin. I read on, and I looked at what it said. There is a full seismic analysis, and full planning permission has been granted. The information is all there for the Member to have a look at.

Other places have tried this. Southampton has a geothermal system operating, but one of the issues that arises is that it is only part of the solution. Even there, it produces only 17% of the heating input to the district heating system, so you need to have some integrated form of dealing with the issue. The big thing that I really want to say is —

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is almost up.

Mr B McCrea: The reason why I will not be so hard is that I would like people to start saying yes for a change. That is what got the anger in all of this.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is up.

Mr B McCrea: People who said no, no, no are now saying yes. For goodness' sake, we have to do something.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is long gone.

Mr B McCrea: Trust the science, and, please, let us do something together.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Mr McCrea, resume your seat, please. The debate has certainly generated a lot of steam, some of which I was not able to control very well.

Mrs Foster: I welcome the opportunity to respond to the motion on geothermal energy for heating and electricity. It is important that we look at both those elements, and that goes back to a point that Mr Agnew raised in his interjection just a few minutes ago. It is a pity that we did not have a pump available today in the Assembly, because we would have got quite a lot of hot air. I think that you recognised that, Mr Deputy Speaker.

In pursuing the Executive's targets of 40% renewable electricity and 10% renewable heat by 2020, we have put forward a framework that is technology-neutral. That allows the market to bring forward the most cost-effective renewable energy technologies. That is a very important consideration — Mrs Overend also made the point — as we are asking consumers to contribute to costs through their electricity bills. I am pleased that we are well on track to deliver our interim target of 20% renewable electricity by 2015. Contrary to what Ms Overend said, our figures are in for last year — April 2013 to March 2014 — and show that we had 19.5% of our electricity from renewable sources, so we are very close to the 20% target that we were to hit by 2015.

Deep geothermal energy, both for power and heat, is a low-carbon sustainable resource that has the potential to play a role in our future energy mix, although, at present, it does not feature in our energy mix. Power generation requires higher geothermal temperatures than for heat, and it remains a very capital-intensive technology. Whilst there is some potential, there is less so than in the more volcanic regions such as Iceland, North America and New Zealand. Nevertheless, electricity generation from deep geothermal energy is eligible for incentives, although you would think, hearing some of the people in the Assembly today, that there are no incentives available. There are incentives available in the form of renewables obligation certificates, although, as I have said, no schemes have come forward thus far.

Mr Agnew: I thank the Minister for giving way. Can she explain why the incentive of two ROCs set in Northern Ireland is considerably below that in GB?

Mrs Foster: I wanted to take up this point in relation to Mr Attwood's solar PV consultation, which has just closed. As the Member will know, we put forward the appropriate ROCs depending on the evidence that comes forward to us in consultations, and that is certainly the case for the solar PV. It has been an evidence-based consultation. I have been very clear with the industry that, if they have evidence that requires us to intervene in the fashion that we have been intervening in, they need to bring us that evidence. It is back to Ms Overend's point that incentives have to be paid for by the consumer and, if we are over-incentivising solar PV or, indeed, any other technology, we are doing a huge disservice to our consumers.

Can I just clear up the issue about Oman and fracking? As if I would talk about fracking in Oman. They do not need to frack in Oman. Actually, I was talking about Qatar, if the Member wants to go back to the actual discussion that we had. I said that the gas that they found off Qatar had made it the richest place in the world. I never mentioned fracking. I said that they had a fabulous natural resource there and that is what they were using. Mr Attwood needs to get his facts right before he comes to the House and accuses me of things like that.

The ROCs mechanism will close to new applicants from April 2017, and large-scale renewable electricity generation, including deep geothermal, will then be supported under the UK-wide feed-in tariff with contracts for difference.

Energy from ground sources already plays a role in heating our homes and businesses through the renewable heat incentive. Ground-source heat pumps utilise shallow geothermal and are already in use to heat many local businesses and homes. Examples are the new library at Queen's University and the Lyric Theatre. The Northern Ireland non-domestic renewable heat incentive scheme provides incentives for businesses to install geothermal heating systems through the tariffs set for large ground-source heat pumps. Whilst there are none installed to date, I look forward to seeing suitable projects come through under the RHI in due course.

Much has been made across the way of our statutory objective to promote the gas industry. That objective does not impair the future development of deep geothermal energy, as the RHI does not differentiate by geography. A renewable installation in a gas area will receive the same incentive payments as an equivalent installation in a non-gas area, and the development of the natural gas market and the increase of renewable levels are both essential for Northern Ireland to enjoy a more diverse, secure and sustainable heat market.

I was interested to hear Mr Flanagan's comments in relation to the natural gas market. First of all, he was opposed to gas for the west; then he came online and said that he was in favour of gas to the west; and today we are hearing again that he may not now be in favour of gas to the west. His constituents, particularly those in Derrylin, will be interested to hear his comments today.

Mr Flanagan: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker.

Mrs Foster: No, thank you. My current assessment is that —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Point of order.

Mr Flanagan: I want to clear up the allegation that the Minister just made. Neither today nor previously have I said that I was opposed to the gas network being extended. Perhaps the Minister, in her infinite wisdom, will come to the House prepared with facts instead of making silly allegations.

Mrs Foster: The record of the House will show very clearly that, in the past, you thought that — [Interruption.]

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Minister will resume her seat, please. I remind Members not to make remarks from a sedentary position. I also remind Members that courtesy and good nature are the key hallmarks of the Assembly, so there is no need for any vocabulary that is otherwise.

Mrs Foster: Mr Deputy Speaker, I remind the Member that he thought that the gas pipeline to the west was some sort of Trojan Horse for fracking in the south-west of Fermanagh. He is on record as saying that, so I do not know what he is talking about. In relation — [Interruption.]

Mr Deputy Speaker: I am sorry, Minister, I have to ask you to resume your seat again.

My remarks to Mr Flanagan apply equally on this side of the House: no talking from a sedentary position.

Mrs Foster: In relation to Mr Agnew's point that we are providing —

Mr Frew: I thank the Minister for giving way. Despite Phil Flanagan's opposition and despite him being at odds with his party policy, would the Minister like to elaborate on the difference that gas to the west would make to businesses there?

Mrs Foster: Gas to the west is hugely anticipated by businesses there, particularly by those that are very energy-intensive, such as some of our agrifood companies and the former Quinn glass factory.

In any event, I want to move on. Mr Agnew said that we were giving incentives to the gas pipeline to the west. We are giving a one-off grant of £30 million for gas to the west. Last year alone, the renewable industries received over £50 million in subsidies. That is an annual figure, and the money comes from consumers. We need to be honest with people and say that that is the case instead of trying to hide away from the matter.

I recognise that the lack of legislation and corresponding regulatory system may be a potential barrier to the development of deep geothermal energy in Northern Ireland. Of course, we all know that stable and effective regulation is necessary for investor confidence, as is underground access for directional drilling. That issue came up in Fermanagh, and people were concerned about it. Geothermal legislation is desirable, but it is not an issue that I am in a position to address now. The rest of the UK is looking at geothermal legislation. There is nothing in place at the moment, but I understand that the coalition Government want to introduce legislation in 2015 on directional drilling below 300 metres both for geothermal and for oil and gas. I understand that, although the Republic of Ireland has —

Mr B McCrea: Will the Minister give way?

Mrs Foster: Yes, very quickly.

Mr B McCrea: Minister, will you clarify whether there is an issue with the ownership of the land when you go below 300 metres? Is that the issue that needs to be addressed?

Mrs Foster: No, the issue that needs to be addressed relates to when you go down and then across. There is some concern about ownership, and people have the right not to consent to that. We need to discuss that.

The Republic of Ireland has prepared a geothermal Bill, but there is no timescale for its introduction.

I mentioned the difference between district heating systems, which use shallow geothermal and sometimes go through porous rocks, and electricity. I did so because the generation of electricity from enhanced geothermal systems would require the drilling of boreholes to between 3 and 4 kilometres and a form of fracking. Anyone who listened to 'Talkback' last Wednesday will have heard an expert from Keele University point out that geothermal energy means fracking granite, not just shale gas. There is an element of fracking, and we have to be honest with ourselves and say that. Frankly, we cannot have a hysterical reaction every time that fracking is mentioned, with people going into a tizzy about it. We need to look at the science, the facts and the evidence.

I will finish with the ending of the Tamboran licence. Some of us do take decisions on evidence; some of us do look at the science; and some of us do look at the facts. I know that some Members opposite may have difficulty with that. Some of them seem to live in their own special little world. However, I took that decision on the evidence that was in front of me, and it was all about the facts. When this is all over, that will be abundantly clear to everyone in the House.

5.15 pm

Mr Hazzard: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank my party colleague Phil Flanagan for bringing this timely motion to the House. I am thankful for the opportunity to speak on what is a very important issue.

We are discussing the need for a sustainable energy supply, the effects of fuel poverty and the negative effects of the destructive exploitation of the earth. I was fortunate enough — or unfortunate enough — to see at first hand in Brazil this summer the results of extensive and thorough logging and the effect that it is having on a precious rainforest habitat. It is only when you see the effects that humans can have on the earth that a light is shone on the issue. That is certainly what it did for me.

Where do we turn today with this motion? I think that the Member for South Belfast has made it clear that, as an island, we need to have an all-Ireland approach to this. I ask the Minister to make sure that this issue is put on the agenda of the North/South Ministerial Council and work with her colleagues in the South to ensure that the issue is taken forward.

As has been outlined by various Members, Ireland has a productive mix of geological settings from the powerful seas around us to the high winds and the granite rock formations, such as the Mourne, that may hold great potential for such geothermal systems. It is only right that we start to examine and explore to see what potential that geothermal energy could have for us.

Mr B McCrea: Will the Member give way?

Mr Hazzard: Yes indeed.

Mr B McCrea: I am interested in his point about cross-border work. The GT Energy report states that, now that planning permission has been granted in south Dublin, the only thing that they are waiting for is for RECIT, which is their equivalent of investment in renewables, to give them some sort of incentive. Given that the Member's party has representation, not only in south Dublin but in the Dáil, what has he done to make sure that the all-Ireland aspect of this is furthered? It appears to me that they are ahead of us and not behind us.

Mr Hazzard: I thank the Member for his intervention and indeed for his recent interest in Dublin City Council politics. The Member was unable to update the House as to what type of system this was. I am aware that this may involve the sea like the application at Larne, although it may be geothermal energy from the sea base, which is different from what most of us are referring to today. However, I will come back to that point later on.

We hear plenty about the need to rebalance our economy, which is right, but we also need to do the same with our energy mix. We need to do that in a sustainable way. The point that Alex Attwood made was very important as well. As a Member for South Down, I see at first hand the very imaginative approach taken in what has been done at Strangford lough with tidal wave energy. This is exactly what needs to take place.

I will outline some of the points made in the debate today. Mr Flanagan talked about the need for a more green and clean energy mix to really start to explore the opportunities that we have. He gave a far-ranging historical background to the issue of geothermal energy and talked both of the dangers and the opportunities in energy consumption, but also outlined that DETI needs to provide structure and actively demonstrate support for a renewable energy mix. I suppose that that is at the crux of what we are saying here today: enough of the noting and acknowledging that there may be potential; let us see some structure and a legislative base on which to move forward.

Gordon Dunne said that energy was an important issue for everybody, and that renewable energy is becoming increasingly important but that we need to have sustainable growth. Fearghal McKinney talked about an integrated approach being needed to reduce over-reliance on fossil fuels. Sandra Overend questioned the timing of the motion, which I was slightly disappointed at. As I outlined at the start, there are very few issues that are more important than the future sustainability of the earth and of fuel poverty and our energy supply. It is a timely motion at any time of the year. She went on to say that there is a need to tackle those issues and outlined the problems of fuel poverty and tackling climate change.

Trevor Lunn said that we are moving in the right direction and that we need to deliver on energy costs and supply. He also said that it is an issue worthy of exploration. Again, I was slightly disappointed with Mr Frew's contention that the motion may have been sectarian. I do not think that there is anything about the motion today that is sectarian and I am sure that the Member would want to take that back. He went on to talk about the need to have a varied and good energy mix.

As I outlined, Mr Attwood talked about the need for a competitive advantage and the fear of losing space in a global market. That can be seen with the strength of Marine Scotland and what it is doing with tidal wave energy in Orkney. We need to embrace that in Ireland. We are a small island that is surrounded by tidal power and we need to harness that power going forward. I used the word imagination, and we need to lock into that.

We learned that Sammy Wilson listens to 'The Stephen Nolan Show'. He also said that geothermal energy is somehow being presented as a panacea. I want to dispel that. No one is suggesting that geothermal energy, or any particular source of energy, will be a silver bullet in itself: it will not. We will need a mix. That is the way forward.

Mr Agnew talked about geothermal energy being clean and reliable. He compared it especially to fossil fuels and said that it is not running out. This is about a long-term vision, and the Assembly needs to look at it. We are not talking about this month, next year or even, for the most part, the next decade. This is about looking decades into the future and growing a sustainable fuel supply that we can all tap into.

Mr Frew: I thank the Member for giving way. Whilst he is right about the mix, it will have to be balanced by the costs of renewable energy, which will trundle down to our people. Unlike welfare reform, has Sinn Féin costed that out?

Mr Hazzard: I thank the Member for his intervention. I certainly do not have a costed paper for geothermal energy in front of me. That is what we are asking for. Let us move it to a space in which we can see the hard evidence and facts, so that we are able to build that sort of opportunity that, as an Assembly, we can all —

Mr Wilson: Will the Member give way?

Mr Hazzard: Go ahead, yes.

Mr Wilson: Would the Member accept that some costs have been done and that the Department of Energy and Climate Change in the United Kingdom has worked out that the emphasis on renewable energy will add 40% to fuel bills by 2030?

Mr Hazzard: I thank the Member for his intervention. These interventions do not get to the point. What is the cost of not doing it? What will be the cost to our environment and our future if we do not look at renewable energy? We have to look at that.

Mr B McCrea: Will the Member give way?

Mr Hazzard: No, I have given way for the last time. Thanks very much.

Mr B McCrea: You did not quite go —

Mr Hazzard: Yes.

Mr Agnew went on to say that geothermal energy has the potential to comprise one third of our renewable heat targets by 2020. That is not an insignificant amount. Most importantly, he outlined some of the differences between hydraulic fracturing and geothermal energy. It is very important to bear those in mind.

We are looking forward to moving from noting and acknowledging the potential of geothermal energy to putting it on to a proper legislative footing. Even the Minister recognised that a lack of legislative opportunity acts as a barrier to utilising all the potential. It is important that we have that recognition by the Minister that a lack of legislation is a destabilising factor in the process.

Let us move beyond noting and acknowledging the potential to seizing the opportunity. Let us give people the potential to harness this very important energy.

Resolved:

That this Assembly notes the potential that deep geothermal energy has to meet the heating and electricity needs of thousands of households; recognises the potential it has to reduce our reliance on fossil fuels; and calls on the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment to ensure that appropriate legislation and incentives are in place to support the development of this industry.

Adjourned at 5.23 pm.

Northern Ireland Assembly

Tuesday 7 October 2014

The Assembly met at 10.30 am (Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Beggs] in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

Sue Ramsey: Resignation

Mr Deputy Speaker: Before we begin our business, I wish to advise the House that the Speaker's Office has received a letter from Miss Sue Ramsey, giving notice that she intends to resign as a Member of the Assembly with effect from 3 November 2014. The Speaker's Office has notified the Chief Electoral Officer in accordance with section 35 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998.

Ministerial Statement

North/South Ministerial Council: Plenary Session

Mr M McGuinness (The deputy First Minister): Thank you, a LeasCheann Comhairle. In compliance with section 52C(2) of the Northern Ireland Act 1998, we wish to make the following statement on the eighteenth meeting of the North/South Ministerial Council (NSMC) in plenary format, which was held in Dublin on Friday 3 October 2014. The Executive Ministers who attended the meeting have agreed that we can make this report on their behalf. Our delegation was led by the First Minister, Peter Robinson MLA, and me. In addition, the following Executive Ministers were in attendance: Minister Farry, Minister Foster, Minister Hamilton, Minister Ní Chuilín, Minister O'Dowd, Minister O'Neill, Minister Wells, junior Minister Bell and junior Minister McCann

The Irish Government delegation was led by the Taoiseach, Enda Kenny TD, who chaired the meeting. The following Irish Government Ministers were also in attendance: Tánaiste and Minister for Social Protection Joan Burton, Minister for Foreign Affairs and Trade Charles Flanagan, Minister Noonan, Minister Donohoe, Minister Humphreys, Minister Reilly, Minister of State English, Minister of State Nash and Minister of State Phelan. Following reshuffles in both Cabinets, a number of new Ministers were welcomed to the Council.

As has been the case in recent times, there was a strong focus on financial and economic matters at the meeting. We had a good discussion on the employment situation in both jurisdictions and measures to encourage job creation. These included discussions on actions to build trade links with developing markets, attracting foreign direct investment and issues relating to banking, in particular lending to small and medium-sized enterprises. Progress locally on the disposal of the portfolio of the National Asset Management Agency (NAMA) was welcomed by Ministers. We also discussed economic and budgetary challenges facing both administrations and measures aimed at rebalancing our economy. We took the opportunity to recognise and welcome the success of the Giro d'Italia cycling event, which secured widespread global media coverage. We also noted the opportunities for tourism and trade through the hosting of all-island events, and we agreed to continue to cooperate on a joint bid for the 2023 Rugby World Cup.

Discussions then moved on to European matters. We were updated on the current situation with respect to the INTERREG IVa and Peace III programmes. Both programmes are fully committed, and the challenge will be to ensure full expenditure by the end of 2015. Progress on the development of the new INTERREG V and Peace IV programmes for the period 2014–2020 was also discussed. The Council noted that the draft programmes had been submitted to the EU Commission by the deadline of 22 September 2014. We noted several other new European programmes that may present opportunities for cooperation to maximise the drawdown of EU funding to the island, and we agreed that they should be further examined. That is particularly worthwhile; European funding is an important resource, and we should be doing all we can to maximise it. We also reviewed other EU-related developments.

The Council noted that discussions on sectoral priorities have now taken place following the decisions taken at the last NSMC plenary in November 2013 and NSMC institutional in January 2014. The discussions focused on efforts to support economic recovery, job creation, and ensuring the best use of public funds and the most effective delivery of services for citizens. We agreed that it had been useful to review progress and identify opportunities in the existing agreed work programmes, and we noted that a report on other priorities identified during the ministerial discussions will be brought to the next NSMC institutional meeting.

The next item on the agenda was the north-west gateway initiative. We noted the conclusion of the consultation process that had been carried out with regional stakeholders relevant to the north-west gateway initiative. The Council also noted the views of the north-west gateway initiative regional stakeholders on the directions and priorities for the north-west region, including the desire for a renewed and strengthened strategic focus endorsed by both Governments. We agreed that further consultation with relevant Departments should be undertaken on the issues identified during the consultation process. The Council also reaffirmed its commitment to a future meeting of Ministers and officials in the north-west to consider strategic approaches to the development of the region.

The Council then noted the progress report prepared by the NSMC joint secretaries on the work of the North/South bodies and in the other NSMC areas for cooperation. It welcomed the following key developments: cooperation is continuing on strategic transport planning throughout the island; opportunities for further cooperation have been identified in developing the strategic road network of the island; enhancing connections to the north-west of the island; the future enhancement of the Enterprise service; driving a shift to public and more sustainable modes of transport and the potential for shared cross-border public transport services in border areas; and the development of cross-border greenways.

At the NSMC health meeting in April, Ministers were informed that the business planning process for the radiotherapy unit at Altnagelvin was progressing, with work almost complete on finalising a memorandum of understanding and a service level agreement for the operation of the unit. Since that meeting, contracts have been finalised, and building work started on site in July. An app to allow smartphone and tablet access to the North/South child protection hub was launched by Childlink in February 2014.

Both Agriculture Departments continue to work closely on the policy options arising from the reform of the CAP. A joint workshop on educational underachievement was held in Armagh on 25 March 2014, and proposals to scope a cross-border pilot in support of leadership development involving existing groups of principals in both jurisdictions was agreed.

The contract for the all-island research study into the issue of airborne pollution from residential solid fuels, particularly smoky coal, has been awarded. Both Enterprise Departments and InterTradeIreland are working to encourage support for research and innovation activities, and they recognise that there is potential for North/South collaboration to increase the drawdown of funding. At their meeting in January, Ministers welcomed the establishment of the Horizon 2020 steering group and the appointment of the NI joint chair to the US-Ireland R&D Partnership, both of which are positive developments in that area.

At the special EU programmes meeting on 30 May 2014, as I have already mentioned, the Special EU Programmes Body (SEUPB) reported that all available funding under Peace III and INTERREG IV had been committed.

The second phase of the multimedia consumer campaign by Safefood to target childhood obesity is focusing on the importance of exercise in tackling overweight and obesity in children.

The Loughs Agency in partnership with Co-operation Ireland has developed the Foyle river ambassadors citizenship scheme. It is a pilot youth leadership project that brings together young people from across Derry city in a personal development and citizenship programme, the theme of which is to promote the recreational and educational activities provided on the river.

Foras na Gaeilge has selected the six new lead organisations, operating on an all-island basis, to take forward the new funding arrangements for delivery of its strategic priorities. The Ulster-Scots Agency recently awarded over £300,000 to organisations to promote and deliver Ulster-Scots music and dance. Plans to restore the Upper Lough Erne to Clones section of the Ulster canal are being pursued by the Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure and the Department of Arts, Heritage and the Gaeltacht.

Official figures and sentiment showed a positive year of tourism growth in 2013. "The Gathering Ireland 2013" and Derry/Londonderry UK City of Culture 2013 were cited as successes by the vast majority of those in the industry. Trade and industry feedback on 2014 prospects and sentiment are generally positive.

We acknowledged the ongoing work on the reform of the North/South bodies' pension scheme, including recently approved amendments to ensure that the scheme complies with employment legislation and best practice in both jurisdictions and to increase employee contributions. We also noted the current position on a North/South consultative forum.

The Council approved a schedule of NSMC meetings proposed by the joint secretariat, including an NSMC institutional meeting in autumn 2014 and the next NSMC plenary meeting in December 2014.

Mr Nesbitt (The Chairperson of the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister):
I thank the Minister for the update on the meeting. On financial and economic matters, I ask the Minister about InterTradelreland and the proposed cut in its budget of, I believe, £1.2 million, £400,000 of which was from the Executive and £800,000 from the Dublin Government. That would represent well over 10% of InterTrade's budget.

My question is twofold. First, why such a big cut when the Executive's commitment is to put the economy first? Secondly, what is the Minister's assessment of the impact on InterTrade's work programme and economic development, North and South?

Mr M McGuinness: InterTradelreland has, as many people know, been a tremendous success in encouraging all sorts of collaborations and business enterprises on the island.

The whole issue of financing the North/South bodies is obviously critically important against the backdrop of the severe budgetary difficulties that we and Dublin face. The financial memorandum is there as a key document on the financial and accountability framework to which the bodies operate. Therefore, it is important that it remain current and reflect best practice.

The review has been ongoing for some time, but I understand that, with a little bit of effort, it is now at a stage at which it could be completed relatively quickly. It is important that officials, North and South, work together to ensure that working constructively and on a timely basis enables them to progress and complete that important review as quickly as possible.

The Member is right: there are difficulties in how we move forward with the bodies. It is important that each of the North/South bodies, like all other public bodies, delivers its objectives and programmes efficiently, particularly in the current fiscal climate. In that context, and given the pressures on public finances in both jurisdictions, the two Finance Departments agreed a further minimum cash release and efficiency savings programme of 4% in 2014, culminating in 12% over the period 2014-16.

Each body must deliver those minimum savings of 4% per annum, but each could go further if required or if agreed by the sponsor Departments. The resulting proportionality of funding, North and South, linked to the assessed benefit of the activities of the body to each jurisdiction, should also be kept under review.

Mr Moutray: At a time of budgetary cuts, many of them due to Sinn Féin's ludicrous position on welfare reform, can the deputy First Minister outline the levels of cuts that he will support in relation to the North/South Ministerial Council?

Mr M McGuinness: In the answer that I gave to the leader of the Ulster Unionist Party, I covered the agreements that have been made by both Finance Departments in relation to the bodies. Given that, no doubt, during the course of this session, people will refer to my party's position on welfare cuts, I just want to quote from a speech made yesterday by a British Government Minister, Vince Cable, who said:

"The Tories are ideologically obsessed by cuts, because they see it as a way of destroying public service and the welfare state, which they detest."

It is a very revealing comment from a British Government Minister about how cuts in Britain, not alone here, are beginning to impact on the most marginalised, disadvantaged and poorest in society.

Ms McGahan: Can the Minister give us any information on the development of the new INTERREG and Peace programmes?

Mr M McGuinness: Obviously, a considerable amount of work has been done on that and agreements have been reached in recent times. The draft Peace IV and INTERREG Va programmes were submitted to the European Commission on 22 September 2014, which is in line with the regulatory deadline. Further negotiation will now take place between DFP, the Department of Public Expenditure and Reform and the Commission to agree final programmes. It is expected that negotiation with the Commission will last up to six months.

The NSMC will have the opportunity to consider both programmes before they are approved and open for calls. I know that there is an awful lot of interest in the community about how that is going to affect programmes in the time ahead. It is now clearly with the Commission and that will be an important negotiation, the outcome of which will have to be approved by the NSMC.

Mr Attwood: Given that the biggest issues on the agenda appear to have been financial and economic matters, given the scale of organised crime on the island of Ireland and mindful that the biggest illegal waste dump ever in these islands is two miles outside Derry, and that those responsible have £50 million out of that criminality, will you and the First Minister approach the Dublin Government about having a conversation at the next NSMC meeting about the threat of organised crime and waste crime on the island of Ireland?

Mr M McGuinness: I have no hesitation whatsoever in accepting that both jurisdictions face real challenges from organised criminals, North and South — people who are involved in all sorts of activities, much of which does enormous environmental damage locally. The Member cited what was a disgraceful practice outside the city of Derry.

In the cross-border movement of waste, the 2013-14 waste repatriation programme has been completed successfully. There is continued joint cooperation between jurisdictions on enforcement action. Of course, we welcome the ongoing work of the NIEA and other authorities, North and South, in their contribution to combating fuel laundering and dealing with the environmental impact of the waste generated as a consequence of that illegal activity in order to protect the environment and human health. A lot of work is being done between Departments and police services, North and South. If more work can be done — I note the comments of the Member — we will certainly take that into consideration at the next meeting of the NSMC.

Mr Lyttle: The First Minister and deputy First Minister recently received a letter from individuals in America expressing concern that the peace process is losing its power to inspire children with a vision of a shared future.

Therefore, in relation to discussions around the Peace programme at this session, what outcomes of the multimillion-pound EU peace and reconciliation programme III can the deputy First Minister point to in order to encourage us and what are the key aims of the EU peace and reconciliation programme IV?

Mr M McGuinness: First of all, the issue of a letter from America — certainly not that letter from America — did not come up during the NSMC meeting. I always welcome the interest of people who have made contributions to our peace process over many years. Of course, we are all very conscious of the challenges that we face in relation to the issues that are out there, which will hopefully be addressed during what needs to be a very genuine process of negotiation to resolve them and give further momentum to a process that certainly up until now has caught the imagination of the world, including many in the United States of America. I will not dwell much on that.

The 2007-2013 Peace III programme has a total budget of €333 million and is fully committed. Peace III has achieved its entire EU spending targets to date. The total programme expenditure to the end of August 2014 was €247 million against an EU target of €250 million by the end of December 2014. The 2015 target will represent the full programme budget. It is vital that EU income is maximised. The SEUPB must now manage the portfolio of projects to successful conclusion within the eligible programme time frame.

INTERREG IVa has a budget of €256 million. Eighty-eight projects have been issued with a letter of offer. That programme is now fully committed. INTERREG IVa has exceeded all of its annual expenditure targets to date. Meeting spending targets for 2014-15 will be challenging, but DFP is monitoring the situation closely and working with the SEUPB to manage the risk and ensure that no EU income is lost.

There will also be a process of developing the new Peace and INTERREG programmes for 2014 to 2020. They have been submitted, as I have said, in line with regulatory practice. Negotiation is ongoing.

Mr Spratt: In relation to the North/South bodies pension scheme and the ongoing work on that, can the deputy First Minister tell the House when that work is likely to end and when best practice of both jurisdictions in employment and increase to pension contributions by employees will take place?

Mr M McGuinness: We obviously welcome the agreement at the North/South Ministerial Council meeting on 30 May 2014 to increase employee contributions with effect from 1 July 2014. Those increases apply only to members in the North pending the decision of the Labour Court in the South. The changes will help to ensure the sustainability of the pension scheme. We note that the wider reforms are on track for implementation in April 2015. We encourage the finance Departments and the bodies to work together to ensure that the changes are implemented on schedule.

Mr McMullan: Go raibh maith agat. Can the Minister give us any detail of the discussions regarding Horizon 2020?

Mr M McGuinness: An ambitious and challenging target of €145 million for the North under Horizon 2020 has been agreed by the Executive as part of the new innovation strategy. All the Northern contact points have now been put in place, meaning that there are now seven thematic experts housed in Queen's University and the University of Ulster with a regional remit for support under Horizon 2020. Invest NI continues the role as our contact point for SMEs given the continued focus of both the Commission and our Executive on encouraging SME participation in competitive EU funding programmes. A specific contact point for the agrifood area has also been put in place in the Agri-Food and Biosciences Institute (AFBI). DETI is currently developing a new Horizon 2020 strategy that will identify our priorities in future areas for action. There is an ambitious and challenging target of £145 million for us under Horizon 2020, and that has been agreed by the Executive as part of the innovation strategy.

It is important to say that, at the meeting, it was recognised that Horizon 2020 offers huge potential for us to collaborate on a North/South basis to improve success rates in accessing this funding stream. InterTradeIreland is currently developing a strategic action plan for Horizon 2020. That is being prepared with the support and agreement of the all-island steering group for Horizon 2020. The strategic action plan sets out past performance under FP7, North/South, and maps that across onto Horizon 2020 for areas of greatest potential success.

Mr Ó hOisín: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an LeasChéad Aire as a ráiteas. I thank the deputy First Minister for his statement. Will he give us some more detail on the development of the north-west gateway initiative?

Mr M McGuinness: We noted at the meeting the conclusion of consultations with regional stakeholders in the north-west on the current relevance of the north-west gateway initiative to the needs of the region. That was a useful exercise that provided a great deal of information and insight into the needs and aspirations of stakeholders in the north-west. Taking account of the views expressed by regional stakeholders, we have asked that further consultation now be undertaken with the relevant Departments on the issues identified in the course of the consultation. Thereafter, we remain committed to a meeting of relevant Ministers and officials in the north-west to consider the future strategic approach to the development of the region. Just recently, I was privileged to officially open the new regional North West Science Park at Fort George. That is a very important development on that site and will, along with Ebrington, in the time ahead be an area where new jobs, which are badly needed in that area, are created. The linkages to the Letterkenny Institute of Technology are also important in the development of the science park. That is an example of how we can successfully work very positively and constructively together.

Mr Eastwood: I thank the deputy First Minister for his statement and his answers thus far. He talked about the north-west gateway initiative and mentioned the links with Letterkenny IT. Will he expand on what discussions were had around the very necessary expansion of Magee university in order to meet some of the difficulty around the unemployment crisis?

Mr M McGuinness: The One Plan sees the expansion of higher education in Derry as key to the city's regeneration. The number of undergraduate places in our two universities has increased by 1,210 during this Assembly period. An additional 377 higher education places have been created in our further education colleges. The University of Ulster received 652 places and has undertaken to deploy those at Magee. Due to budgetary pressures, financial support to the higher education institutions has been reduced by 3.95% in the current academic year. The strategy board in Derry has commissioned an economic appraisal for the expansion of Magee. Should the appraisal make the case that the campus should be expanded, the Employment and Learning Minister has undertaken to submit a bid for the expansion in the next comprehensive spending review. We understand that, at present, the University of Ulster is working on an economic appraisal for a new teaching block at Magee. Once that is completed and approved, it will be eligible to receive capital funding.

The future of Magee is of major importance and significance for the people of the north-west. Recently, I met a number of very important stakeholders, many of whom believe that Magee will only really flourish when it becomes, at some stage in the future, an independent university. We have not got to that point yet, but I certainly think that there is a strong argument that DEL and the university authorities recognise the responsibility that they have to contribute to the development of a university that will make a major contribution to the lifestyle of people in that area.

A number of years ago, in the company of the university authorities, I was part of an announcement for a major expansion of the university, which did not come to pass. That was disappointing, and I have to say that I have been very critical of the university authorities over that.

11.00 am

Dr McDonnell: I thank the Minister for the dialogue and discussion so far. I will stick with the north-west gateway initiative: what action can the deputy First Minister take to ensure that the commitments reached will be implemented speedily, including strengthening the strategic focus on the north-west, and to ensure that there will be an early meeting with Ministers and officials? I am specifically concerned about the A5, which is vital to that area. Is the plan to develop the A5 properly still afloat or has it sunk?

Mr M McGuinness: In an earlier answer, I made it clear that there is a commitment to a meeting of relevant Ministers and officials in the north-west to tackle all the issues that clearly relate to the north-west gateway initiative. Minister Kennedy was not at the meeting, so the A5 project was not discussed in detail, but it was raised. In the context of that initiative, we advised the Irish Government on the current position with the project. We are all very familiar with the present difficulties that arose out of the judicial review, which dealt with 12 points of objection, 11 of which were overruled and one of which was upheld.

At present, the Minister for Regional Development is processing, through others, an approach to satisfy the courts on the habitat objection that found favour with the judge. There is a lot of confusion in the north-west on the reasons why the A5 people are making the case that there is no commitment from the Executive. Nothing could be further from the truth. The Executive and the North/South Ministerial Council are absolutely committed to the A5. It was stopped not by the Executive but by the courts. An additional complication was the fact that the Irish Government, during the process of trying to move the project forward, told us that they had to take a decision to withdraw substantial funds from the project. So, the difficulties with the A5 were not presented by this Executive.

Mr Allister: I suspect that the deputy First Minister will not be much interested in this point, but maybe the First Minister will take it up. When this jamboree of self-congratulation about the worth of North/South cooperation was going on in Dublin on Friday, back in Belfast, not for the first time, the chief coroner of Northern Ireland was protesting the lack of cooperation from the gardai on the inquest into the Kingsmills massacre.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Will the Member —

Mr Allister: Did anyone think to raise that on the fringes of the conference with the Taoiseach —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. Will the Member direct his question —

Mr Allister: Or is that something that is just —

Mr Deputy Speaker: I ask the Member to take his seat.

Mr Allister: — to be swept under the carpet?

Mr Deputy Speaker: I ask the Member to take his seat.

Mr Allister: What is your problem, Mr Deputy Speaker?

Mr Deputy Speaker: That question was clearly not related to the statement.

Mr D McIlveen: My apologies that I was a little late into the Chamber this morning. The deputy First Minister mentioned small and medium-sized enterprises. One of the primary issues that SMEs raise about the drawdown of funds is that it is so cumbersome that it nearly prohibits them from applying. The deputy First Minister mentioned a specific contact for the agrifood industry, which we welcome. However, when it comes to other small and medium-sized enterprises, such as manufacturing and engineering companies, what does he propose that they can do to receive support from the Department in drawing down such vital funds?

Mr M McGuinness: The Member raises an important issue, which the First Minister and I addressed during our previous visit to Brussels when we met Máire Geoghegan-Quinn. She, on foot of that conversation, held a number of meetings in the North specifically for the purpose of advising small and medium-sized enterprises how they could more readily access funds from Europe and make what was a complicated system much more straightforward.

We now have a new Commission in place and will have to continue to do that work with the commissioner who replaced Máire Geoghegan-Quinn. It is certainly an issue, and we think that we can increase the drawdown of funds if we can ensure that our small and medium-sized enterprises have an ongoing relationship with the European Union. We hope that we can continue with that work, which is a process of education vis-a-vis the knowledge base that small and medium-sized enterprises need to have to access Europe. That can frighten a lot of people off, but, when explained, we have seen over the last while an increased desire among small and medium-sized enterprises to engage with Brussels.

Executive Committee Business

Insolvency (Amendment) Bill: First Stage

Mrs Foster (The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment): I beg to introduce the Insolvency (Amendment) Bill [NIA39/11-15], which is a Bill to amend the law relating to insolvency; and for connected purposes.

Bill passed First Stage and ordered to be printed.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I ask Members to take their ease while we change the top Table.

(Mr Principal Deputy Speaker [Mr Mitchel McLaughlin] in the Chair)

Private Members' Business

Roads Maintenance

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow up to one hour and 30 minutes for the debate. The proposer of the motion will have 10 minutes to propose and 10 minutes to make a winding-up speech. All other contributors will have five minutes.

Mr Dallat: I beg to move

That this Assembly notes with concern the failure of the Department for Regional Development to adequately fund the roads infrastructure maintenance budget; further notes that this lack of funding will result in job losses or reduced working hours for contractors and suppliers; calls on the Minister for Regional Development to assess forensically his departmental budgets to highlight areas of non-essential spending where savings can be made; and further calls on the Minister for Regional Development to work with his Executive colleagues to institute a comprehensive annual budget process that provides a more transparent breakdown of the allocation of resources.

I am pleased to present this motion to the Assembly today. I am particularly pleased that the Minister for Regional Development is present and look forward to hearing his response and, of course, the contributions of other Members.

Members may be interested to know that it is almost five years to the day since Professor Martin Snaithe, a leading authority in the field of structural maintenance and road condition assessment, presented a report of his findings on the state of the 25,000 kilometres of roads in Northern Ireland. The roads Minister of the day, Conor Murphy — you may remember him — welcomed the report, claiming:

"The condition of the North's roads is of vital importance to the economy and it is essential therefore that the road network is properly maintained to provide a safe and efficient road network."

Professor Snaithe's report highlighted the case for significantly enhanced investment to carry out much-needed maintenance repair work across the roads of Northern Ireland.

In its findings, the report recommended that the overall structural maintenance budget should be increased to around £108 million per annum, which was considerably lower than that in England or Wales and about the same as in the Republic. In the intervening years, the road maintenance budget has relied on monthly monitoring rounds to a great extent to squeeze money out of the Executive to shore up what is, without doubt, a deteriorating situation when, clearly, the findings of Professor Snaithe are long forgotten.

On the last day of July, our present Minister, Danny Kennedy, hit us with the bombshell that his budget was under considerable strain and that that would have an impact on the delivery of front line services to the public. This, according to the Minister, would include such services as street lighting repairs, road maintenance, grass cutting, gully cleaning and the maintenance of traffic signs and road markings. He went on to say:

“Naturally this will have a detrimental impact on external contractors who provide these services across Northern Ireland.”

Mr Kennedy concluded by warning us that he could not rule out curtailing winter services later this year. Certainly, Danny Kennedy was telling us that hundreds, even thousands, of people working in the various divisions of road maintenance and improvement would lose their job and that the companies that employed them would face potential bankruptcy because they would not have the regular income to make repayments on the new plant and machinery acquired in the expectation that they would have continuous work in the foreseeable future.

I will be surprised if there is no mention of welfare reform, but, before anyone gets carried away with that, I need to remind Members that our approach to road maintenance was fatally flawed long before the current Tory Government decided to rob the poor. In doing my research for the debate, I decided to go back in time to find out if things were done any better before the establishment of the Assembly, and my focus dwelled on the period of the Roman empire. Regrettably, the Romans did not get as far as this country to build their roads, which, in other parts of the world, have lasted for thousands of years. Yes, Principal Deputy Speaker, we had other visitors in the meantime: William and James came here, but they are remembered for crossing rivers, certainly not for building roads. Following the period of the Roman empire, many of the brilliant roads that they built disappeared during what some people might call the Dark Ages, when little or nothing was achieved; indeed, some roads were actually dug up. I seriously ask myself this question: are we now in another dark age when the current network of roads has been allowed to fall into disrepair to such an extent that some of them will become too dangerous to use? Anyone who reads Professor Snaith's report, which I referred to earlier, can reach no conclusion other than that we are sleepwalking into a future in which we will create a legacy of neglect that puts us on a par with those who allowed the wonderful Roman roads to become a legacy that no longer exists.

The motion is not simply about criticism of the shortfall in funding in road maintenance; it calls for a comprehensive annual budget process that provides for a more transparent breakdown of the allocation of resources. The point I wish to make is this: whether there are issues relating to welfare reform or not, there is an urgent need to reform how road maintenance is planned and budgeted for. It is my wish that that is where the focus of this debate is concentrated, because we cannot go on depending on monitoring rounds to fund critical road maintenance. That is failing and building only a legacy of neglect that a future generation will have to pick up some time. That is very wrong.

Recently, our Minister said that it takes 20 years from inception to the completion of a new capital project. I know that the people of Dungiven will immediately reject that claim, given that they have been waiting 40 years for a bypass. Anyway, let us say that it takes on average 20 years to put the finishing touches of tarmacadam on a new road. I wonder, seriously, how long it takes to destroy a road through lack of maintenance. You do not have to take my word for it. The Department, from its own findings, will tell you that there are already serious problems building up that will eventually result in massive amounts of money being needed to be spent shoring up roads that are already undermined through lack of routine maintenance. Of course, money is not the whole issue. Yes, I know that most road deaths are caused by human error, but there is no doubt that poorly maintained roads contribute to death and serious injury, particularly during the winter months, when, as our Minister has already warned us, he may have to curtail expenditure.

11.15 am

Getting to a conclusion, I wish to return briefly to the Romans to clarify a point. The Romans were not the first race to build good roads. Much of the expertise was copied from previous races, and I ask this question: are we going to learn from the past, or will we be part of a new Dark Ages that allows good roads to decline to such a state that they cease to exist and are no more? Will a new generation at some time in the future rediscover them, just as the Roman roads were rediscovered and, indeed, built over? The current Minister deserves the support of the Assembly to put in place a system that avoids the stops and starts that contractors and workers have had to live with. It is fast getting to a situation where some of the contractors may well go to the wall. No one expects the Minister to have the wisdom of Claudius, who conquered Britain — we certainly do not want him poisoned — but he needs the support of the Assembly to fundamentally change the way that we conduct our road maintenance.

Cutting corners on road maintenance to balance the books is only stacking up trouble for the future. As it stands, every road can expect to be resurfaced every 102 years on average. That is from departmental figures. Many roads are already undermined due to poor drainage. There is a massive bill every year for compensation for personal injuries and damage to vehicles. Road deaths are again on the up and up. People who did this work are on notice as we speak that they will be joining the unemployment register. We must not sit on our hands while our roads crumble under our feet.

Mr Clarke (The Chairperson of the Committee for Regional Development): I welcome the opportunity to speak on the motion in my role as the Chair of the Committee for Regional Development. It was timely that, at my first meeting as Chair, the Committee received a briefing on the October monitoring round. This was the first time formally that the outcome of the June monitoring round was presented to the Committee. Of course, members will have been aware of the outcomes because the Minister had previously detailed them through the press through the use of, quite frankly, very emotive pronouncements during the summer and in the House. I will not use this ploy; rather, I will support the thrust of the motion by stating the facts as they are.

First, the overall annual budgetary requirement for just maintaining our roads is, as I think has been said, £133 million. That £133 million is to keep our roads as they are and to keep them in a condition where it was reported that, in 2009, 46% of the trunks roads were below the UK skidding resistance investigatory level. Almost half of the roads were assessed as being unsafe. On top of this, there was a substantial backlog in respect of the structural maintenance programme that currently stands at approximately £830 million. In a meeting that I had with the departmental permanent secretary and his senior management team last week, I was advised that for every pound below the £133 million required to maintain the network another £1.60 would be added to the backlog. On the basis that the starting budget for roads maintenance this financial year was £56 million, with £20 million or so being allocated in June, we currently have a deficit of £57 million, and this adds another £90 million to that backlog. Again, the condition of our roads is starting to decline.

At this point, I hasten to add that, between June 2011 and January 2014, the Minister and his Department made 72 bids in the monitoring rounds and the Executive honoured almost 62% of those bids. The Minister is on the record as saying that, in the past three years, the Department has been very successful in funding road maintenance. Of course, this success has coincided with funding being available, which we all know now is not necessarily the case.

The welfare penalties have impacted on all Departments. DRD differs slightly in the way that its budget is allocated, with the in-year monitoring rounds being used to top up the departmental budget rather than allocations being provided at the beginning of the year. That process, of course, was collectively agreed at the Executive, of which the Minister is a member, and, indeed, in his departmental business plan, he described that approach as strategic and a valuable opportunity to secure additional funding. As stated, the Minister and his departmental officials agreed that with the full knowledge of the audit report on structural maintenance in 2000 and despite the comments of the then chief executive on the 2009 annual report:

"I am concerned that the level of funding made available to Roads Service for structural maintenance is insufficient to maintain the network in a satisfactory condition on an ongoing basis."

The Department has recognised in its business plan that less funding being made available during the in-year monitoring process might have an impact on its ambitions as set out in the plan. It is difficult, therefore, to reach any conclusion other than that the Minister and his departmental officials went for the soft touches when applying for his portion of the welfare penalties.

Mr Easton: Will the Member give way?

Mr Clarke: I will.

Mr Easton: Will the Member agree with me that the cut to the maintenance budget is quite serious and that maybe the Minister's Department could have looked at other avenues to try to find funding through his Department such as savings to the £3,000 worth of taxis that his Department uses or looking at reducing the fuel costs of £2.4 million for the Northern Ireland Transport Holding Company and, indeed, the Translink reserves of £25 million? Surely there is room for savings there that could have helped without making these cuts.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mr Clarke: Thank you. I will cover some of those points as I speak on.

Nowhere in his business plan is there a suggestion that footway and carriage maintenance, cutting grass on verges, gully emptying, road marking, traffic light maintenance or the suspension of external contractors for street lighting are departmental ambitions. They are not, but they are easy and emotive and that is why they were chosen. There was no forensic analysis of the departmental budget lines and no assessment of the severity of the risk, and I think that Members will appreciate that those points were all raised when we had the briefing two weeks ago. The Department would easily have seen the cost increase in public liability claims and payouts that result from not cutting the budget but removing these essential services. They will have also seen that, for every million they have removed, between 13 and 22 specialist jobs will be lost to the sector, and that will hinder the recovery should the budgets become available in future.

My colleague referred to Translink. One of the interesting things that turned up in that monitoring round when we talked to the Department was that the accounts showed a cash balance of £56 million. Of course, that was reported in Hansard on 2 July 2014. My predecessor, Mr Spratt, had suggested in the past that there was a cosiness in the Translink/DRD relationship, and I have to say that I saw that during the October monitoring briefing. Yes, they need £15 million for in-year payments and are projecting a £9 million loss, but that still leaves a £33 million cash balance.

In closing, I will maybe make a few remarks as a member of the DUP —

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Sorry, your time is up.

Mr Clarke: OK.

Mr Lynch: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. I support the motion. As the proposer said, the condition of the roads in the North is of vital importance to the economy, and, therefore, it is essential that the road network is properly maintained to provide a safer network. That is what all our constituents expect. As an elected representative from a rural area, I find that roads are one of the key issues that come to our attention on a daily basis. I have a continual list of roads needing upgrade and repair in Fermanagh, and, when a network is complete, other roads become priorities. I must acknowledge that quite a lot of money has been spent on the county over the last number of years, because there has been sizeable success in the monitoring rounds for the Department. I must add that they have been done to a high standard by the local Clarke's group. However, that is in the past, and we find ourselves in a different funding environment with budget constraints today.

I do not want to wade into the debate on how this has come about. The reality is that the block grant has been reduced. As a result, we had the Minister's statement at the end of July when we were in recess. It stated that there would be a:

"severe impact on the delivery of frontline services to the public. This will include services such as street lighting repairs, road maintenance, grass cutting, gully cleaning and maintenance of traffic signs and road markings."

Mr Beggs: Will the Member give way?

Mr Lynch: I will.

Mr Beggs: Does the Member acknowledge that policy decisions that he and his party have taken have contributed to that?

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mr Lynch: Thank you. I said that I was not getting into the debate on why the budget was reduced.

The Minister went on to say that that would:

“have a detrimental impact on external contractors who provide these services”.

The question is this: did the Minister simply take the soft option — I think that the soft option came up a number of times in Committee — and cut front line services and target the external contractors who provide those services across the North of Ireland?

Mr Clarke: Will the Member give way?

Mr Lynch: I will.

Mr Clarke: I know that the Member does not want to get into the depth of the argument on this — I acknowledge that they were a soft touch — but does he not accept that his party's position on welfare reform has left this Department and other Departments in a very difficult position in trying to find the £87 million? Yes, as I said, those may have been a soft touch, but, if your party would face up to the reality of welfare reform, that would be £87 million that Departments would not have to find.

Mr Lynch: I thank the Member for his intervention. Again, I am not getting into that debate, but you cannot conflate the issue of welfare cuts and the reduction in the overall block grant.

When the monitoring round was discussed at the Committee a number of weeks ago, officials told us that the Minister had no option but to make the decision that he did. When I asked them to detail the risk assessment process that the Department undertook in prioritising and drawing together the proposed bids, the answer was that the Department took all the money that it could out of other areas before it got to the contractors. Will the Minister take this opportunity to elaborate on what that process involved before they reached the contractors?

The Department was aware that funding restrictions and pressures were coming down the track, yet the contractors were not advised or engaged with before the Minister made his decision. I have spoken to some of the employees who have been put on notice and to the contractors, who said that, if the Minister had engaged, outlined the funding difficulties and reached an agreed reduction — that is, a percentage reduction — they could have planned a way forward for their staff and plant hire. The fact that the Minister totally ceased funding does not make sense. Why did the Minister not take that approach? The contractors are reasonable people who recognise that there are funding pressures. The recurring theme during the Committee meeting was that he took the easy option, as I said at the outset. Minister, your officials said that other options were considered, although little detail was forthcoming. You may want to respond to that and elaborate on what those options were. I spoke to people who will be paid off as a result of the Minister's decision, and they are people with real livelihoods and families.

The resource budget for small maintenance works is a small percentage of the Department's overall budget. I have no doubt that, if a thorough trawl had been undertaken, the savings could have been found elsewhere without job losses and without causing safety issues for the public.

Mr Beggs: There is a fatal flaw in the motion, in that it is targeted at DRD rather than at DFP and the whole budgetary process. I must admit that I welcome the comment made by the proposer of the motion, who said that he recognised that failings in the Budget process have contributed to this.

Planned road maintenance minimises the risk of accidents and the long-term cost of the upkeep of our roads. Expensive, repetitive temporary patching can often result in increased costs as opposed to the regular, planned resurfacing of roads. As others have indicated, there is also the problem of potholes and the increased risk of compensation claims against the Department.

11.30 am

Mr Clarke: Will the Member give way?

Mr Beggs: I have just started.

In a recent answer, the Minister indicated that the structural maintenance budget needed to maintain the current roads standard and prevent deterioration is £133 million a year. Looking at previous figures, you will see that in 2008-09, and again in 2010-11, the funding was between £63 million and £88 million. In 2011-12, it increased to £120 million, and, in the following year, it was £110 million. In the last financial year, £130 million was spent on structural roads maintenance. I commend the Minister and the Executive for that significant increase in funding up until the current year.

When considering the motion today, I think it is important that we recognise how the current and previous Finance Ministers have largely allocated the funding to roads maintenance on the capital and resource sides. The increased funding was delivered largely as a result of increased in-year monitoring, money that was passed to Roads Service for structural roads maintenance as a result of failures to spend by others. The Department, working closely with contractors, could react quickly to make use of that funding and improve our roads infrastructure; and therein lies one of the current problems that contributes to the significant reduction in maintenance being carried out and to the funding of contractors. The June monitoring round was, of course, delivered late, at the end of July, limiting the time and ability to react to those decisions. While the bidding was for £77 million, capital funding of only £12 million was received. On the resource side, the DRD indicated that it could probably spend an additional £48 million, yet only £5 million was received.

Why do I highlight this? It is clear that, with tighter budgets in these current times, less funding from in-year monitoring can be expected in future. This approach can no longer continue if we wish to maintain our roads. The Budget approach of 2011 has clearly failed to account for this change, and other pressures have emerged in other Departments such as Health. However, the Finance Minister and the DUP and Sinn Féin, who lead the Executive, have refused to reprofile such issues in an annual Budget process.

We then, of course, have welfare reform, which is costing £87 million this year and will cost £114 million next year.

When the proposers of the motion and Sinn Féin decide to oppose welfare reform, they are deciding to apply cuts to a wide range of issues including Roads Service and including the very contractors that they indicate they wish to support. Those cuts can be traced back to that.

Mr Clarke: I thank the Member for giving way on that particular point. The previous Member who spoke said that people are losing their jobs because of these cuts, but what they are not recognising is the number of jobs that will be lost because of the non-implementation of welfare reform, which will have a much greater impact. While this situation is bad, it impacts on a small number of jobs. The impact of welfare reform will be much greater through jobs lost. The party opposite fails to recognise that.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mr Beggs: Thank you. I concur with much that the Member said.

As a result of that £87 million cut and the reduction in in-year monitoring, we did not receive any additional money that had previously been expected. In fact, the Finance Minister announced a 2.1% in-year reduction across a broad range of Departments, with a further 2.3% to come. That is the worst possible way to manage any Budget: to distribute money, plan resources and then, at the last minute, four months into the financial year, change direction. At that time, many contracts will have been signed, employment levels will have been determined and, I suspect, there would be very few options available. That is the worst possible way to run a Budget and it is something that we must not repeat in the forthcoming year. We should be sorting out the Budget for next April now by taking decisions. If Members wish us to adopt their views on welfare reform, they ought to reflect that in policy and expenditure decisions.

In cutting Roads Service expenditure, the subcontractors have borne the burnt. One aspect of the motion that I can agree with is that the Executive need to have a more transparent annual Budget process. Of course, it is Sinn Féin that stopped that. It was their Minister — the Education Minister — who refused to go with it. So, the reason why we do not have a transparent and easily understood Budget process is Sinn Féin. That is further evidence of voodoo economics and further meaningless motions that they appear to be backing. What we need is a timetable when these —

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Your time is almost up.

Mr Beggs: — transparent processes will be put in place so that we can make better use of our limited funds.

Mr McCarthy: I, first, thank Mr Dallat, Mr Byrne and Mr McGlone for bringing this very important issue to the Floor. On behalf of the Alliance Party, I support the motion. I welcome the Minister's presence in the House. I sincerely hope that he and his Department will be able to secure the funding to provide a decent roads maintenance programme. That, in turn, will assist contractors to do the work and, thus, prevent the loss of jobs.

I want to pay tribute to all those who are engaged in providing better and safer roads throughout Northern Ireland. It can be a pretty tough job being out there in all weathers. They do very necessary work, not always with the blessing of the travelling public. Repairing roads can be a dangerous profession, with traffic whizzing past and always in a hurry, without regard for the safety of staff who are engaged in that essential work.

Like all other Members, I was disappointed a few weeks ago when Minister Kennedy informed the public that his reduced budget would result in potholes on our roads network not being repaired and, of course, street lights not being repaired because of a lack of money for replacement light bulbs. What has this place come to? Northern Ireland cannot afford to keep our streets lit, as we cannot afford a few bulbs here and there. If it were not so serious, it would almost be a joke.

As a former member of the Committee for Regional Development, I attended a meeting a couple of weeks ago at which senior officials painted a very gloomy picture about funding shortages. That was despite the fact that DRD got some extra £12 million from the June monitoring round.

Our roads simply have to be maintained. The last thing any Member wants is to see further road deaths as a result of lack of maintenance or, indeed, whatever else. At this point, I am sure that Members will join with me in offering our deepest sympathy to the latest victim of our roads, a young man from Bangor called Mr Barbour, who lost his life on the road between Greyabbey and Ballywalter only last weekend. We are all too aware of the increased number of fatalities on our roads, and those simply cannot continue. We must always seek to make improvements where necessary.

At the Committee meeting I referred to, the senior officials went over the consequences of the Department not benefiting from the October monitoring round. All the Committee members were disappointed at the decision not to renew the contracts of contractors, who, as Mr Dallat informed the Assembly, are engaged in work on footway and carriageway maintenance, grass cutting, environmental works, gully emptying, road marking and traffic signals. Those are the basics that keep the roads at least half safe, and all that work is vital to ensuring road safety in all our areas.

Another important aspect of keeping our footways and roads safe is the gritting schemes that are carried out during the winter. Even those operations may now be cancelled. We all know of the outcry, some years ago, when the main streets in our towns were not gritted during the heavy snow.

Much depends on the outcome of the October monitoring round. We know of the huge demands on all the Departments, but let us hope that there is a fair distribution of whatever funds are available. We also have concerns about the annual Budget process, but, as we are now into the last year of that, we can accept it and a more transparent breakdown of the allocation of resources.

I thank Mr Kennedy and Stanley Lamb and Stephen Duffy from the Roads Service section offices for the new works that have been completed in the Strangford constituency, particularly in the Ards peninsula, where the roads had been neglected for so long. There is, however, one thing that I must express disappointment at. The Minister and Mr Lamb did not invite me or my Alliance colleagues to a photo shoot at the recent start of work on a footway on the Old Shore Road in Newtownards. We have campaigned for that footpath for years. We are delighted that it has gone ahead, but we might at least have had an invite from the Minister when he went to cut the first sod.

When other things are happening in our constituency in future, he might take a minute or two to invite those who have been campaigning for years for them. It seems from the local press that other people jump in and take the credit.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Your time is up.

Mr G Robinson: Throughout Northern Ireland, the population is learning about the real-life impact of irresponsible decision-making by some parties, as we face having only urgent road repairs and limited street-light maintenance, which are absolute necessities, particularly at this time of year. I thank all the Roads Service staff and contractors who do a sterling job in the maintenance of our roads and street lighting. The impact will be severe and could cost the Department for Regional Development extra legal fees for claims due to the restriction in road repairs. I hope that those who have created some of the financial uncertainty by refusing to agree to welfare reform will be mindful of the consequences of their action. It is a disgrace, when Northern Ireland is putting forward all its good and positive points to attract new employment opportunities, to see our road infrastructure being denied the investment it so greatly needs to ensure that improvement and repair works are carried out. We must always remember that our incoming investors look for a good road infrastructure, so it is not a positive image for Northern Ireland.

Another concern that has been expressed to me has been the financial position when it comes to road gritting and snow clearing. Those are life-saving requirements and are therefore essential. We can all hope for a milder winter so that the roads budget is protected from that point of view.

The Minister has talked of how much stress his budget is under, and, I believe, he has already assessed forensically his budget to see where savings can be made. Does he have any reserves that he could use to offset some of the roads pressure or return to the central pot for redistribution to other needy Departments during October monitoring?

Mr Beggs: Will the Member give way?

Mr G Robinson: Yes.

Mr Beggs: Will the Member acknowledge that having in-year, last-minute cuts is the worst possible way to run a budget? It should be planned in advance, issues should be resolved, and this should not be repeated. Otherwise there is a possibility of similar issues occurring in this Department and other Departments.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mr G Robinson: That is a matter for the Executive. The Executive, in the main, do a good job.

Mr Clarke: Will the Member give way?

Mr G Robinson: Yes.

Mr Clarke: The Member who made the last intervention made a point about how bad in-year monitoring rounds were. However, does it not sound a bit hypocritical for the Member to defend his Minister, given that the Minister has already defended the good use of in-year monitoring and the valuable contribution that it makes? He is on record as saying that.

Mr G Robinson: I agree entirely.

The Minister is having to reduce front line services to keep within his budget. Are the sponsors of the motion suggesting that the Minister should make people unemployed to meet budget targets? Let us sort the entire Budget problem out maturely, once and for all and on behalf of all our electorate.

When it comes to instituting a comprehensive annual budget process by DRD, is the party of the signatories to the motion aware that, due to the Budget crisis they have helped to create, all Executive Ministers are having to make savings in their Department? I have some sympathy with the Regional Development Minister and find this debate distasteful, as it could be seen as political posturing rather than as a serious attempt to break the deadlock and ease the financial pressures on Departments. Despite my reservations, I support the motion.

Mr Ó hOisín: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. Beidh mé ag labhairt i bhfabhar an rúin seo inniu. I welcome the opportunity to address the motion and to speak in its favour. Unlike others, I do not believe it to be meaningless, nor do those who work in the industry.

When Professor Martin Snaith, in October 2009, presented his independent report to the Committee for Regional Development, it was widely welcomed, including by the then Minister, Conor Murphy. He recognised the centrality of the road infrastructure and its upkeep to the North's economy. The professor recommended an increase of £108 million to bring expenditure up to a level comparable with the rest of Ireland to some £4,300 per carriageway kilometre, which is still somewhat short of what is spent in England and Wales. However, by June 2012, it was still estimated that the budget for maintenance was some £50 million short of what was required to maintain the structural integrity of the road network in its current condition.

Mr Beggs: Will the Member give way?

Mr Ó hOisín: Yes.

Mr Beggs: Will the Member explain whose fault it is that the budget is £50 million short of achieving the target to maintain our roads?

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mr Ó hOisín: If the Member looks at the withdrawal of the block grant, he might find some answers there.

By July of this year, Minister Kennedy warned about the impact that a reduction in the budget would have on services such as street lighting repairs, road maintenance, grass cutting, gully cleaning and the maintenance of traffic signs and road markings. Since then, many of us have been lobbied by many in the industry, including the Quarry Products Association (QPA), contractors and others. I commend them for that lobbying. They work on short-term contracts, often delivered at times of the year when a quick turnaround on the spend is required, and not necessarily in the best weather for the job. The industry works on low profit margins and often requires a large and flexible workforce to carry out the maintenance.

One thing that we are sure of is that maintenance of the road network is vital to the safety of commuters and travellers. Unfortunately, as of yesterday, we have seen a dramatic increase in deaths on the roads over the same period last year. Indeed, even on our best-maintained roads, we still see seemingly unexplainable and unimaginable accidents and carnage. I came on such a scene as I travelled on the M2 yesterday evening and was shocked at the extent of that accident.

A reduction in investment will have an economic impact, locally and regionally. Indeed, I recall the huge impact earlier this year that the demise of KPL had in my town, the wider County Derry area and further afield. Luckily, at that time, other contractors were able to take up the slack, and many subcontractors were relieved that their work could continue. No such slack exists at this time.

The motion rightly calls on the Minister:

"to assess forensically his departmental budgets to highlight areas of non-essential spending".

The identification of those cuts, as per the July statement and since, however, outlines making savings on items that are essential for safety on the roads infrastructure. That is not a prudent or wise move. As well as the human cost, many more millions will be spent on personal injuries compensation and damage to vehicles. Indeed, in answer to a recent question that I put, I was told that 15,000 claims had been made in the last five years, 55% of which were successful. I support the motion and ask this: what price safety?

Mr Dunne: I also welcome the opportunity to speak on the motion. As an MLA, I listen daily to genuine concerns about DRD road issues. Road maintenance, footpaths, weeds and street lights are amongst the most common issues raised with me throughout my many years as an elected representative for North Down. Ratepayers, who are also taxpayers, expect those services to be maintained to proper standards and to have safe and serviceable roads in our constituencies.

Since the June monitoring round, when Minister Kennedy confirmed an additional £12 million for the structural maintenance of roads and funding that, I understand, was for the development of the Belfast transport hub, there seems to have been a significant shortfall in the resources budget. The decision influenced many external contractors who were carrying out much of the DRD maintenance work. In return, DRD brought in its own in-house contractors to take over the work that other contractors had been doing. However, in a number of cases, they have struggled. In the case of grass cutting, they have struggled to carry out the statutory five cuts a year on the main carriageways, such as the A2 Bangor dual carriageway. Eventually, the third cut was recently completed by DRD in-house contractors.

Mr Ó hOisín: Will the Member give way?

Mr Dunne: Yes, will do.

Mr Ó hOisín: Does the Member also recognise that, particularly in rural areas, either one cut or no cuts were made this year? That caused concern, particularly at traffic junctions.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mr Dunne: I appreciate that, as I represent a partially rural area. I am very much aware that there are areas where the grass has not been cut at all. However, I understand that DRD has different criteria and standards for rural and urban areas.

I made a point about DRD taking on the work of contractors. I wonder how cost-effective that decision was when you consider the overtime involved and the weekends that DRD staff have worked and continue to work to meet the demand for services such as grass cutting. Every year, we struggle to get the grass cut five times on the A2 Bangor dual carriageway. This year, there were serious road safety issues, and local farmers had to cut sections of grass to create an appropriate sight line for entering their farms. Those were serious road safety issues and need to be addressed as a priority.

The Minister could see that the decision to cut the resource budget would have maximum impact on the public across all our constituencies. Other relatively small-scale and often non-essential capital schemes that would have had less impact on ratepayers could have been considered, but I understand that the Minister cannot flex between his capital and resource budgets. Surely, though, stalling some small capital schemes would have made more sense.

Street lighting continues to be another major issue as the winter months approach. I have seen for myself that contractors often need only one man with a lift to do the work, but DRD in-house workers often require two or three operators to carry out the same job. I wonder how efficient that is and how real savings will be made in the long term. It is unacceptable that fewer than a quarter of the street lights reported out over the last few months have been repaired. As mentioned, winter gritting and snow clearance are other major issues of concern to elected representatives. Will they be prioritised? Are we prepared for a harsh winter? What services does DRD have available under its present budget?

Despite this dark picture, some positive work has been carried out. As an elected representative, I continue to work regularly with local section engineers and officers who work hard in difficult circumstances. In the North Down area, we have seen positive resurfacing programmes locally, and parts of the A2 Bangor dual carriageway have been resurfaced. A number of residential areas have had new footpaths and street lights, and their roads have been resurfaced. We appreciate the work done and the fact that it is carried out to a good standard. I put it on record that, in the main, the work done by our contractors is to a good standard, and residents certainly appreciate that. However, the public rightly expect these services to be delivered and not to be left in the dark.

Mr McAleer: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank those who tabled the motion. I represent a rural constituency, and we all know well that infrastructure is very important in rural constituencies because most accidents and fatalities occur on rural roads. In areas such as West Tyrone, which I represent, many are employed by contractors who carry out maintenance and other types of work on the 25,000 miles of infrastructure throughout the North.

The Minister's sudden announcement at the end of July or the beginning of August about works on street lighting, gullies and grass trimming came as a shock. It instilled fear among certain sections of the community, particularly the older and more vulnerable, who had the idea that the lights were going to be switched off. Like all Departments, DRD is expected to trim its budget. There is a very strong view that maintenance is one of the most important aspects of DRD's work because of the implications for road safety. It seems to have been hit quite hard, and there is certainly a view that the subcontractors who were laid off at short notice were a soft touch.

Mr Beggs: Will the Member give way?

Mr McAleer: Go ahead.

Mr Beggs: Will the Member indicate how he would have made savings at this late stage in the financial year, given that in-year cuts were required as a result of his party's policies?

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mr McAleer: Thank you for that. Members who spoke previously indicated areas where there is surplus money that could be used. We talked about Translink, for example. It is important to say that, rather than sniping from the sidelines and trying to get a debate on welfare cuts going, Members have been invited to bring the issue of welfare cuts to the House to have a discussion about it. Feel free to explain to your constituents your apparent willingness to slash hundreds of millions of pounds out of the welfare budget, which will affect the working poor —

Mr Clarke: Will the Member give way?

Mr McAleer: — and the most vulnerable in our community. Perhaps that is what you should do, rather than sniping from the sidelines during debates such as this one today.

Mr Clarke: Will the Member give way?

Mr McAleer: I am not going to give way, OK?

Before I was interrupted, I was saying that the plans are considered to be very short-sighted. It is widely accepted by experts that planned maintenance is cheaper than reactive techniques such as patching. Indeed, we will face more public liability claims, which will have economic implications.

Going back to the contractors issue, it is important to say that a lot of them were given just days notice to terminate works. This is people's livelihoods that we are talking about. We just cannot turn on and off people's livelihoods like a tap; that is not possible. A lot of the contractors have invested heavily in equipment and the upskilling of workers, so it is very unfair to expect to just turn them off at short notice. Going back to the point that was made a second ago, areas have been outlined in the DRD budget where funding could be got at instead of attacking the maintenance budget.

I congratulate the Members on bringing the motion before the House today. I will —

Mr McMullan: I thank the Member for giving way. Does he agree that the party across there that talks about budgets gave no consideration to rural isolation and the problems that that causes? This will further add to those suffering from rural isolation. It would be interesting to know how the party will feed into the review that will take place through the ARD Committee on the question of rural isolation.

Mr McAleer: I thank the Member. I was just in the process of concluding my remarks.

Mr Eastwood: This is a very important motion in front of the House today. We brought it because we believed that the impact of the cuts were very serious in terms of the economy. We have heard about the issues around road safety and the future budgetary concerns that will arise from the fact that we have not done the work now. I am glad to support Mr Dallat and his very eloquent history of how road networks across Europe came about. He talked about the great work done by the Roman empire. Some of us here will ask, "What have the Romans ever done for us?". In some constituencies across the North, such as mine, we really understand the benefit that good roads would have for our economy, so we ask, "What have this Government ever done for us?". We are still waiting — Mr Dallat mentioned this — for the Dungiven bypass, the A5 and a proper dualling system from Derry to Belfast. Without those important pieces of work, we will never, above and beyond any current budgetary crisis, meet the needs of the people in our areas because far too many of them are not able to contribute to the economy or soften some of the blows of the cuts because the jobs just do not exist to allow them to do that.

This particular decision is understandable in a way, but it is short-sighted. What is not done today will have to be done at some point. We are looking at a false economy. Contractors are being put out of business, and people are being put out of work. We are also looking at potential road safety issues. However, before he stands up, I agree with Mr Beggs: the problem is not just about welfare reform, although I will talk about that if you want; it is about the budgetary process that we have here, which does not make very much sense. The last time the budgetary process was debated, which was at the beginning of this mandate, we proposed that we would have a system that would look year on year at the budgetary process and interrogate the Budget on a rolling basis.

12.00 noon

For me, that would be a much more transparent way of looking at how we allocate our people's resources. We would like to see a zero-base budgetary process where we could look at every programme at issue and make sure that Ministers justify how they spend our resources.

We would also like to see the Public Accounts Committee working in the same way as the Public Accounts Committee at Westminster, where they are able to properly scrutinise and interrogate the work of Departments on a permanent basis. That would be a far better way of looking at the budgetary difficulties that we have.

At the end of the day, it does not make very much sense for one Minister to be told that they have to take this amount off and another Minister to be told that. We need to look at these things in the round and if a crisis does arise, then we can look at it in the best way possible. We can find efficiencies, rather than what has been happening. I am not accusing this Minister of it, but what has been happening is that because of the political debate around welfare reform, issues like the expansion of Magee have been floated as not now going to happen, even though that was never proposed in the Programme for Government. Things like that are being floated as a political tool to try to pressurise others.

Let me put it on the record: the reason we oppose welfare reform, and the reason we are going to have to, as a whole and as a society, oppose what the Tory Government are planning to do if they get into power again, is because what is happening here is not cuts to just Danny Kennedy's budget. It is going to be cuts to people's very livelihood. Money is going to be taken out of the pockets of the most vulnerable in our society because the Tory Government who are here today and the one who could be here after the next election blame poor people for poverty — they blame poor people for poverty, and they give tax cuts to richer people.

That is the situation we are in and are going to be in unless everybody around this Executive —

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Will the Member bring his remarks to a close?

Mr Eastwood: — and this Assembly gets together and stands up to them, because I have seen people around here talking about walking out of Government over far less.

Mr Kennedy (The Minister for Regional Development): Mr Principal Deputy Speaker, I thank you for chairing what has been an interesting debate. I listened carefully to 10 Members. I want to say at the outset that people at home, I think, will perhaps have a greater understanding and see clearly the reasons why I have made decisions. I will outline, as part of this presentation, why I and my party will be opposing this motion.

People will understand clearly that you cannot spend what you do not have. As a result of the June monitoring exercise — which concluded, as we know, at the end of July, and that in itself speaks volumes — I no longer have, and therefore I can no longer spend. It gives me no pleasure to see contractors put on pause, and it does not please me to see the implications for employees and their families. I do not want the public to receive a lesser service, but that was the inevitable consequence of the June monitoring cuts — something, of course, that I did not vote for.

As I say, people at home will understand the need to budget. These have been difficult years for many, with real pressures on household budgets. The public know that you must pay your compulsory bills first: your rent or mortgage, your heating and your electric. Some people save on the areas where they can. Maybe they no longer can afford satellite or cable TV, maybe make fewer phone calls, buy fewer clothes or even buy more basic food. Government is no different. There are areas in which we simply cannot make savings and areas in which we can.

I absolutely assure the sponsors of this motion and others that I have already looked forensically at my budget. That is nothing new — I have been looking at it forensically as an ongoing process since I took office, and there are a number of real problems with the approach adopted by the Executive when they considered June monitoring at the end of July.

The first problem is that the savings requested were not on proper notice; that meant that we did not have proper time to prepare. It therefore limited the options available to Ministers and Departments.

I remind the House that some savings actually cost. We might all like the most fuel-efficient boilers for our homes, but they come at an upfront cost, with our savings being made through reduced bills over a number of years. Likewise in a Department, for example, internal redundancies may be made as opposed to pausing work issued to contractors. Both save money, but one comes with an upfront cost that must be planned for and must be paid for.

To date, roads maintenance, grass cutting, gully emptying and street lighting repairs were sensibly undertaken by a mixture of internal and external staff. I deliberately retained a mixed economy, but June monitoring called time on that option. We need to remember that the savings asked of Ministers and Departments could and should have been spread over the four-year period to provide more money for the likes of health.

For the person at home, June monitoring felt like being told halfway through your usual monthly spend that you had to give part of your salary back and just do your best with the bills. It is not a sensible way to operate. It would understandably provoke anger, knowing that you could have coped better had you been told at the beginning of the month, but it makes you even angrier when you know that it could have been spread over a much longer period. The way that DFP and the Executive handled June monitoring is making cuts deeper than they need to be. It made cuts take place in areas that might have been better protected had we been given proper notice.

The second problem is more specifically related to my Department, often referred to as the valve Department or, as I refer to it sometimes, the mop Department. I call it the mop because we are often asked to clean up other Departments' messes. When they fail to spend and money is returned, the Department of Finance calls on DRD. The absence of opportunity to bid for returned funding is a huge problem for my Department, which has been deliberately underfunded by the centre to provide the rest of the Executive with cover and to prevent money being returned to Westminster. With funding certainty, better value for money could be achieved; for example, by allowing more resurfacing work to be done in the summer months.

A fundamental realignment of Executive budgets is therefore necessary. However, that can be achieved only through a mature debate that considers the relative priorities of all Departments. That has still not taken place, and, for me, that is unacceptable.

Having commenced the year with a significant shortfall in funding, I submitted bids of £48·4 million resource and £130·3 million capital in June. Those are additional sums that could and, in my view, should have been spent on regional development this year. With only £5 million resource being allocated for concessionary fares and £26·3 million for a range of capital projects, huge pressures still remain.

Importantly, capital allocations cannot be used for resource purposes. I have to continue to stress that, because there seems to be either an ignorance or an unwillingness to face that fact. Capital allocations cannot be used for resource purposes and will not allow me to reinstate roads and street lighting maintenance activities. Those are resource accounting and budgeting restrictions that all Ministers have to operate under. I am simply unable to use capital funding to meet the running costs of repairing potholes and street lighting. Of course, that is of little comfort to the public, who may understandably ask how capital projects can continue but the running costs of maintaining our infrastructure cannot.

Unlike others, I have sought to manage my budget. To meet the 2·1% running costs reduction applied at June monitoring and in preparation for a 2·3% reduction at October monitoring, I conducted a robust forensic analysis. At the start of the year my Department's running cost baseline was deliberately underfunded by the Executive at just over £344 million. Expenditure in 2013-14 was £381 million, making DRD again reliant on monitoring. Over the last three years I have been working to deliver savings, not least with Northern Ireland Water.

By the end of the Budget 2011-15 period, NIW will have delivered over £35 million of public expenditure savings.

Let me say that I also make no apology for my strong support of the concessionary fares scheme. This year, the scheme cost £9 million more than its central allocation. It is more expensive because it is so popular. I have to say that the concessionary fares should never have been forced to be the subject of monitoring bids; they should be fully funded by the Executive. They should not be politicised by some simply to put pressure on an Ulster Unionist Minister. Our older citizens deserve better than that.

Mr Dallat: Will the Member give way?

Mr Kennedy: No. I have to make progress.

Rail services in the UK and the Republic of Ireland would not be possible without a running costs subsidy from government. Locally, the subsidy has been gradually reducing with passenger growth. I have further reduced it by £1 million. In the light of the baseline reductions that I have faced, I have further reduced the fuel duty rebate to Translink by £1·3 million. Those reductions in funding mean that, this year, the company is required to work to an increased deficit of over £9 million funded from its reserves.

I have to say that there has been much interest in and quite a lot of ignorance of the reserves held by Translink. Translink is no different from any private company: it must maintain a level of cash in order to meet its working requirements. Translink is not some piggy bank to shake when we are short. I have stretched Translink. There is not a cosy relationship between the Department and Translink, but its accounts must reflect a going concern over any three-year period. I again make no apology for protecting over £9 million of grant funding for rural transport, transport for the disabled and the Rathlin ferry.

I have looked carefully at my Department's admin budget, the majority of which relates to staff salaries. Reductions in permanent staff numbers cannot be achieved quickly or without significant investment by the Executive in a Northern Ireland Civil Service-wide scheme, but I have made reductions of £2·5 million in admin funding. I have done that through a range of measures including robust vacancy management, a reduction in temporary workers and applying downward pressure to overtime. I have also identified further measures to release £3·1 million, including funding that was previously held for Translink and public transport authority funding.

The steps that I have outlined have provided almost £8 million of funding towards the baseline reductions. No area of my Department has been beyond scrutiny. I have looked carefully at the running costs that are necessary to manage, maintain and develop our road network. Of the £125 million of funding available to me to meet annual running costs, over £100 million is contractually or otherwise committed. It cannot therefore be cut in-year. That includes £40 million to meet public-private partnership (PPP) contractual commitments; almost £12 million for energy costs for street lighting and traffic signals; £10 million for parking enforcement, charged car parking services and Strangford ferry services; £5 million for the maintenance of traffic signals; £19·2 million for the management and maintenance of road drainage infrastructure; £4·5 million to meet public liability obligations; £1 million for the new street lighting carbon reduction commitment; over £4 million for fuel and fleet maintenance; £2 million for essential tools and supplies; and over £2 million to meet unavoidable charges from other public bodies. Limited options remain available to me to realise a further £7 million of budget reductions. Do not tell me that I have not looked forensically at the issues. I have protected street lighting inspection, testing and emergency repairs, winter services to ensure roads are gritted this winter and operations —

Mr Clarke: Will the Member give way?

Mr Kennedy: No. I have to make progress. It is time to listen.

I have protected operations and maintenance supplies. [Interruption.] No option remained —

Mr Clarke: There is £33 million left in Translink.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr Kennedy: No option remained other than to put our external contractors on pause for general road maintenance and the repair of street lights that fail unless they pose an electrical hazard to the public. In taking those measures to manage a 4·4% reduction, I have sought to minimise the risks to public safety and the economy. None of the decisions that I have had to take has been of my own making or desire. None of the decisions has been taken lightly or without the forensic examination of all the options.

12.15 pm

I listened carefully to the presentations made by the 10 Members who spoke. Mr Dallat, who opened the debate, reminded us of what the Romans did for us and of the Emperor Claudius. I am more reminded of Julius Caesar — it is not quite Shakespeare — and “Infamy, infamy, they've all got it in for me” from the Carry On film.

These decisions have not been taken lightly. They are important decisions, and I realise the impact they have on small firms, many of them struggling to get contracts. Options were narrowed down, given the time limit available to me. Mr Clarke thinks that we were going for soft touches. I have explained through this statement the essentials that we had to and sought to protect and where we have to go to find realistic savings. There is also the issue of welfare reform. Two parties in the Chamber today conveniently ignore the impact that that is having, not only on my budget but on Executive budgets generally.

There were other contributions. I thank Mr Beggs for reminding us that the monitoring process and how we conduct our Budget is a matter that needs review and urgent change. Whilst I can welcome outcomes from monitoring periods, as I have done in the past, I see that there is an underlying and fundamental problem with the way we shape our budgets.

Mr McCarthy talked about the impact in his area. He thanked everybody, except me, because apparently I did not invite him to some photo opportunity, which the Alliance Party so much enjoys. I thank George Robinson for his sympathy, if not his vote. Mr Ó hOisín, again, refused to take on board —

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Time is almost up.

Mr Kennedy: — the criticisms of and the impact of welfare reform.

These are the facts that I have had to deal with. This is the real world of DRD.

Mr Byrne: I thank all 10 Members who have partaken in the debate, and I thank the Minister for being here. I ask this question: why is the Minister opposed to the motion, given that we are trying to be helpful to him and the Department? Maybe there are certain intricacies in there that are more difficult to understand than is apparent.

We brought the motion to the House because, with the onset of the winter that may lie ahead, there is serious concern among the public about what might happen to the condition of roads. People are concerned about whether there will be gritting or lack of maintenance of the roads and, as a result, increased road deaths. As the winter months approach, we face the life-threatening neglect of our road infrastructure. The underfunding of structural maintenance will have severe consequences for the sustainability and safety of our roads, with knock-on effects on our economic competitiveness. It is an essential area that simply cannot afford to be insufficiently funded in the way that it has been.

Many Members who spoke referred to the fact that roads maintenance has largely been funded from monitoring rounds for the last three or four years. It is welcome that some attempt has been made to tackle the backlog in road maintenance, but, unfortunately, that has been done via the monitoring round process. That raises this question: why do we continue with the monitoring round process and the funding of budgets like the DRD budget for roads in such a way? There has to be a fundamental review of that. That is the reason why this party has, for so long, advocated a year-by-year Budget assessment re-evaluation, to make sure that there is more effective public expenditure on the issues that matter to people.

Mr Dallat: I thank the Member for giving way. Does he agree that the core element of the motion is that the stop-start way of financing the Department is wrong?

Our Minister Danny Kennedy, who normally displays a high level of intelligence, has completely missed the point of the motion. Instead of opposing it, he should be enthusiastically endorsing it.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Interventions should be short, as you know.

Mr Dallat: When in this Assembly do you get opposition parties applauding a Minister from another party, and he rejects it?

Mr Byrne: I thank the Member for his statement. It reinforces what I said earlier about the confusion that I also have about the Minister and his party's position on this issue. However, as I said, maybe not everything is fully apparent to us. It is obvious, however, that the budgetary process is at the heart of the problem. Look, the reality is this: people drive cars. When they buy a car, they pay car tax, VAT and excise duties. Our motorists paid £927 million in fuel duty between 2011 and 2012, providing 18% — that is, £76 — more revenue per person annually than the UK average. That is what we have for a very rural environment. Motorists have, quite simply, been ripped off. The average car tax is £250 per annum. The average road tax for a 40-foot lorry is £1,200 per annum. So, the question is this: why is the road user who is paying tax being so handicapped in relation to the quality and condition of the roads?

Mr Beggs: Will the Member give way?

Mr Byrne: Yes, indeed.

Mr Beggs: Will the Member acknowledge that that fund does not go to the Department for Regional Development, and it is, in fact, the Department of Finance and Personnel that determines the budget that is given to the Minister to spend?

Mr Byrne: I do recognise that, however — [Laughter.] The point, Mr Beggs, is this: it is reinforcing the budgetary process and the allocation of moneys. As a public representative in a rural area of West Tyrone, where people greatly rely on road transport because we do not have one mile of railway, I know that people feel very angry that they are paying all that duty and taxation relating to their car, lorry or van, but they are getting very little in return.

We also feel that there is such a lack of balance in the Department for Regional Development's expenditure on roads. We feel very annoyed about that. We feel that the A5 road has been sacrificed. However, the A8 was a priority, and there was no problem about EU directives. These are the real issues that affect people.

Road deaths are an apparent and real issue for many people. Mr McCarthy referred to the fact that there was a road death involving a Bangor man over the weekend, and Mr Ó hOisín referred to an M2 accident yesterday. Let us be clear: before the last general election, I had more representation from people about potholes and damage to cars and wheels than on any other issue. Thankfully, the potholes have largely been solved over the past three or four years with the monitoring round moneys, and I commend the Minister for prioritising that road maintenance work that has been done.

Mr Clarke: Will the Member give way?

Mr Byrne: Yes, indeed.

Mr Clarke: I am listening closely to the Member. Whilst we support the motion, it is more about the forensic analysis of the Minister's budget and how some of us see it as an easy touch. The Minister will defend that. I accept the point about safety, and I think that is why I can support the motion. However, when you are addressing the rest of your comments, Mr Byrne, will you tell the House how your party can prop up Sinn Féin on welfare reform and what weight you are adding to that in respect of safety, potholes and all the other issues that are raised in all our constituency offices? It is your party that is helping to prop up Sinn Féin to prevent welfare reform coming to the House.

Mr Byrne: I thank Mr Clarke for his comments, but all I can say to him is that we are propping up nobody. We are standing up for the public at large. I do not want the welfare issue to be flogged to death. For the past three or four weeks, it has been flogged to death, and it is not the real issue. The real issue is the overall budgetary process, the budgetary allocations and the budget going forward, which begs the question about this regional economy: do we want to have an economically viable, sustainable economy into the future? Those are the real issues that we will have to start examining going forward. The reality is that there will be cuts in the Budget from the Treasury. We have heard that. Until we make this region more economically sustainable, these are the sorts of problems we are going to face.

It is a fact that road safety issues and road fatalities are intertwined with the economic competitiveness and efficiency of this region. If we go back to a situation where we add to an £800 million roads maintenance backlog, it will be a disaster for the future. I accept that Mr Kennedy has said that he has analysed critically his Department's spending. He says that the cuts that he had signalled in July were inevitable and that they were the soft-touch cuts that were more amenable to immediate decision-making.

Mr Kennedy: I did not say that.

Mr Byrne: The Minister said, or at least I understood him to say, that the process he was —

Mr Kennedy: Will the Member give way? This is important.

Mr Byrne: Yes.

Mr Kennedy: At no stage did I regard these as soft-touch cuts; they are not. They are the inevitable consequence of the financial position that I have been placed in as a result, not only of June monitoring but of the overall economic situation, including the issue of welfare reform.

Mr Byrne: I accept the sentiments of what you were saying, Minister, but the reality is that you said that there were some things that you could cut because of the long-term financial implications involved. You said that DFP landed you with this difficulty in June and that there was no time to properly examine or scrutinise the situation. That was the same for all Departments. I recognise that and sympathise with the Minister in that regard but it goes back to the budgetary process.

Many Members took part in the debate, and there were some common themes, including the welfare issue being kicked around once again. There is genuine concern among all Members about street lighting, footpaths, grass cutting, the repair of roads and smaller capital schemes that are crucial for the overall state and condition of our infrastructure.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is almost up.

Mr Byrne: I would like more time to go through all the issues that different Members have raised, but there were a number of common themes. There is a genuine concern among all Members about roads maintenance going forward. We will have to examine how it can be addressed in a better way to make sure that our road users, who are paying a lot of taxes, are not ripped off any more.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is up.

Resolved:

That this Assembly notes with concern the failure of the Department for Regional Development to adequately fund the roads infrastructure maintenance budget; further notes that this lack of funding will result in job losses or reduced working hours for contractors and suppliers; calls on the Minister for Regional Development to assess forensically his departmental budgets to highlight areas of non-essential spending where savings can be made; and further calls on the Minister for Regional Development to work with his Executive colleagues to institute a comprehensive annual budget process that provides a more transparent breakdown of the allocation of resources.

Mr Allister: On a point of order. I wish to refer the House back to the incident during the Ministers' statement on the North/South Ministerial Council. I ask that the House might examine why I was gagged and why it was that one Member was allowed to pass way outside what was in the statement to ask questions about dumping, but when it came to this Member asking about something that was allegedly outside the ambit of the statement, I was immediately gagged at the behest, I have to say sadly, of the Clerk at Table. Why did that Clerk not equally give advice in relation to the other Member?

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Order. I reject that as a point of order. I happened to be in the Chamber at that time and what I quite clearly witnessed was that the Deputy Speaker pointed out that you had digressed from the debate and the subject matter in hand and he asked you to resume your seat, which you defied. That is something that I intend to revisit after this sitting.

Mr Allister: Further to that point of order, can you explain why the other Member, who equally digressed, was not called to order and why only this Member was called to order? That is the point.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I will review those parts of the debate that I was not personally witness to, and that includes the subject matter that you have just discussed. However, I have pointed out to you something that I know you, perhaps more than many other Members, are very acutely aware of, which is that you cannot defy the Speaker when the Speaker asks you to resume your seat.

That is a very serious issue. I think that it is a bit rich that you think that you can raise points of order about earlier issues. I am taking exception to it. Let me warn you that I intend to study that very carefully.

Mr Spratt: Further to that point of order, I ask you to examine the comments made by the Member who has just spoken on the integrity of a Clerk of the Assembly in giving advice to the Speaker. That, in my view, is totally out of order. Will you examine that? It has been commented on before. Will you look at whether it is in order for the Member to make such comments?

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I reiterate: I will examine the record. I am not accepting that the Member raised a valid point of order. I think that, in the presentation of it, he may well have raised other issues that should be considered.

The Business Committee has arranged to meet immediately after the lunchtime suspension. I propose, therefore, by leave of the Assembly, to suspend the sitting until 2:00 pm, when the first item of business will be Question Time.

The sitting was suspended at 12.31 pm.

On resuming (Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Dallat] in the Chair) —

2.00 pm

Oral Answers to Questions

Education

Mr Deputy Speaker: We will start with listed questions. Questions 6 and 8 have been withdrawn.

Schools: Maintenance Backlog

1. Mr Givan asked the Minister of Education to outline the measures being taken to address the maintenance backlog in the schools estate. (AQO 6765/11-15)

Mr O'Dowd (The Minister of Education): As Minister of Education, I have continually highlighted the need for significant investment in our schools estate to tackle the high backlog in maintenance. I am acutely aware of the importance of ensuring that the schools estate is appropriately maintained to prevent unacceptable deterioration of the buildings and to ensure that our young people and teachers have a learning environment that is fit for purpose and safe for use. Due to budget pressures, the maintenance budget has been reduced this year. However, I have ring-fenced some capital budget for facilities improvement schemes that should assist in improving the condition of the schools estate. The initial maintenance budget allocation for this year was £17 million. In June monitoring, I allocated an additional £5 million. Furthermore, £15 million of capital has been earmarked for facilities improvement projects. Over the last three years, a total of £134 million has been spent on school maintenance.

Mr Givan: I am sure that the Minister will be aware of the many millions of pounds that need to be spent on the planned maintenance backlog. Can he assure the House that concerns about the health and safety of the young people in these buildings will be a priority and that the estate will not deteriorate to such an extent that their health and safety is put in jeopardy?

Mr O'Dowd: I thank the Member for the supplementary. Yes, there is prioritisation in the maintenance programme. The money for the maintenance backlog is to make good the work necessary to bring school buildings back to their condition when built. The maintenance backlog includes any urgent work to address health and safety issues and avoid the serious deterioration of the fabric or services to the building. I add the caveat that many of our schools are of a significant age, and I can assure you that we improve those buildings rather than restoring them to their original state.

Over this last number of years, we have invested significant amounts. The maintenance backlog figure comprises the elements that deem conditions to be category 1, which is very poor, or category 2, which is poor. Health and safety is paramount in these matters, and we have made significant improvements to many schools across the schools estate through the school maintenance programme. I will continue to make money available to that and to make bids to the monitoring rounds for maintenance budgets. In fairness to the Executive, we have been quite successful with those over this last number of years.

Mr Rogers: I thank the Minister for his answers thus far. Minister, given the strong emphasis on factors such as floor area and pupil numbers in determining eligibility for minor works, how do you ensure that small schools get the right allocation of the minor works budget?

Mr O'Dowd: The minor works budget is different from the maintenance budget, which is for maintaining the character of a school and tackling health and safety issues. Minor works are about significantly improving the facilities in a school, which may include the addition of classrooms or office or toilet space. Any project costing below £500,000 comes under minor works. There is a formula, and I do not accept that small schools are discriminated against by that. Over this last number of years, we have invested significant amounts in our minor works programme as well as our maintenance works programme.

Mr Swann: The Minister referred to the deterioration of the schools estate and buildings. Nothing deteriorates quicker than an empty building, and the Minister is well aware that Ballee Community High School in my constituency is now empty, and 30 mobile classrooms are being used in surrounding schools. Has the Minister any intention to put Ballee to use as a proper part of the estate?

Mr O'Dowd: Ballee school is the responsibility of the relevant board, which is the North Eastern Education and Library Board. It is up to the board to decide what future uses the school should be put to. I understand that, when it gets to that stage, the first call will be to other education providers to see whether there is an educational use for the school. If not, the call will go out to other Departments, and the process will follow from there. It is a matter for the North Eastern Education and Library Board.

Literacy and Numeracy

2. Mr Attwood asked the Minister of Education to outline his plans to address the problems with literacy and numeracy in primary-school pupils. (AQO 6766/11-15)

Mr O'Dowd: The results of the progress in international reading literacy study (PIRLS) and trends in international mathematics and science study (TIMSS), which were published in December 2012, showed that a high proportion of our P6 pupils were performing at the highest levels of proficiency in reading and mathematics. It is clear from those international studies and our own inspection evidence that the characteristics of a good school are being embedded in our system. The policies that we have been implementing in recent years are working, and our young people are reaping the benefits.

Count, Read: Succeed, the literacy and numeracy strategy, makes it clear that teachers and school leaders are best placed to identify pupils requiring additional support and the most appropriate action to meet pupils' needs. However, we know that many children face barriers to fulfilling their potential, and more needs to be done to ensure that every pupil leaves primary school with adequate literacy and numeracy skills. The Learning to Learn framework recognises the importance of delivering high-quality education services for children before and in the first years of compulsory education.

Funding has been allocated to specific programmes to further improve outcomes in literacy and numeracy, particularly focusing on disadvantaged pupils. I also focused on the important role that parents and local communities can play in addressing educational underachievement. The Education Works campaign, the community education initiatives programme and the extended-schools programme are all aimed at delivering positive educational outcomes.

Mr Attwood: I thank the Minister for his information so far. Given the welcome moneys that you announced last week in respect of barriers to early learning, could you confirm what discussions you have had with the Health Minister in relation to ensuring that, once a language acquisition problem has been identified, there are sufficient therapists in schools to respond to those in need?

Mr O'Dowd: I have had no discussions to date with the current Health Minister, but I did have regular discussions with the previous Health Minister, Minister Poots, about a wide range of programmes, including programmes that his Department is involved in through Delivering Social Change and regular programmes of the Health Department. I can assure the Member that my officials and the Health Department officials meet on a regular basis to discuss such initiatives and how we can support each other in ensuring the well-being of the young people we serve.

Mr Newton: Where there are problems with numeracy and literacy and a school is therefore deemed not to meet the standard and goes into intervention, what is the minimum level of support that a principal might expect from the education and library board or the Department of Education?

Mr O'Dowd: The first responsibility for ensuring numeracy and literacy levels at a school rests with the principal and the board of governors of that school. They are the first anchor in ensuring that education is being provided appropriately to the young people in that school. Schools will enter formal intervention for different reasons, and, when that happens, different aspects of the coursework or curriculum being delivered in the school are called into question. It will depend on which elements of the curriculum are being called into question and where the weaknesses are in the school, whether that be in classroom teaching or leadership in the school. So, in short, the support will be delivered on the basis of the needs of the school. There is no one-size-fits-all approach in these circumstances. It is about the support that the school requires, but the first responsibility lies with the principal and the board of governors to deliver the education in the school.

Mr Sheehan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as a fhreagra. Could the Minister give us an update on the Delivering Social Change programme, which is aimed at improving levels of literacy and numeracy in our schools?

Mr O'Dowd: The Delivering Social Change programme has proven very popular and, in my opinion, very effective in delivering change in our education system and delivering for the young people it serves. In recruitment, for the entire programme, 266·3 teachers are in post — I am not sure how they work out the 0·3 — out of a total of 269 planned posts. That is 165 in post-primary schools and 100 in primary schools. So, there are a significant number of additional staff being deployed in schools. They are working to a plan that is agreed between the school and the education and library board. That is being delivered effectively. We hope to carry out an evaluation of that programme in the months ahead. That, of course, will depend on finances being available at that time. At this stage, I am focused on ensuring that services are being delivered in the classroom rather than the evaluation of those services being delivered in the classroom, but it is important to evaluate it at some stage in the near future.

Initial reports are very positive in that it has had a significant impact on our young people. The scheme is very popular with schools.

Mr Nesbitt: I thank the Minister for his answers to date. During those answers he talked about the importance of the role of parents. Does he accept that grandparents may also have an influence both on parents and pupils? If so, what programmes are in place to tap into that valuable resource?

Mr O'Dowd: In the most recent Education Works campaign, we focused on the role of the broader family — not just the immediate parents or guardians — whether that is siblings, aunts and uncles or, indeed, grandparents of those children, because they are a valuable resource for any family and a valuable resource in the community. We encourage the family unit, including grandparents, to become involved in a child's education, not a specific individual within the family unit.

Male Teachers

3. Mr Anderson asked the Minister of Education for his assessment of the proportion of male teachers in primary schools. (AQO 6767/11-15)

Mr O'Dowd: The proportion of male teachers in primary schools has remained fairly constant at around 15% since 2010. The reasons for the relatively low proportion of male teachers in primary schools are complex and not unique to our system. There is a perception that women are more suited to teaching young children. Societal attitudes and the focus on child protection issues may also discourage males from entering the profession, particularly in the primary sector.

However, I continue to encourage the providers of initial teacher education (ITE) to take steps to address the issue. They are ensuring that males are well represented in publicity materials for courses and are targeting all-male schools, and male groups in mixed schools, for careers talks and presentations. As a result, the proportion of males enrolling in primary ITE courses has increased from 17.4% in 2008-09 to 20.4% in 2012-13.

Mr Anderson: I thank the Minister for that response. Will he outline the extent to which he is working with the Minister for Employment and Learning on a cross-departmental basis to help to address the gender imbalance in our primary schools?

Mr O'Dowd: As you know, we are involved in a joint review of our careers services. Clearly, one of those careers is teaching. We have been working closely with DEL on the programmes to which I have referred, and it is through DEL that initial teacher education is provided. In particular, we have been working closely to ensure that the colleges are going out and speaking to young males in post-primary schools who are at the stage of deciding career pathways. We have seen some success with that, with a 3% rise in the past four years. I would like to see that rise again. However, as I noted in my commentary, there are societal attitudes around this that are required to change, and there is also a role for my Department and the Minister for Employment and Learning. However, we are working together on it.

Mr D Bradley: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as a fhreagra. Does the Minister agree that there is a need for a high-profile campaign to increase the representation of males in the primary-school workforce?

Mr O'Dowd: Gabhaim buíochas leis an Chomhairle as a cheist. I agree that a high-level publicity campaign would prove beneficial. Publicity campaigns cost money, and unfortunately at this stage our advertisement budget across the Executive has been curtailed to allow us to deliver services to the front line. Therefore, I will not be providing such a campaign in the near future, unfortunately.

Mr Hazzard: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Will the Minister outline the benefits that increasing the number of male teachers would bring to the system? With that in mind, what is DE doing to achieve that?

Mr O'Dowd: I think that it is important that our young people in primary schools come into contact with responsible adults of all genders. Look at the learning patterns of young males in particular: if they have a male teacher in the classroom, someone whom they can look up to and someone to aspire to as a responsible male in their life, then that will assist them in their learning journey. Primary-school education is a very rewarding career pathway for anyone. It is vital that we allow and ensure males to feel comfortable in entering primary-school education and that they know that they have a valuable role to play in primary-school education. They must also know that their presence in the classroom can and does motivate young boys to do better in education. I know that many young people have responsible male adults in their lives, but we have to accept that that is not always the case in our society.

2.15 pm

Mrs Dobson: What plans does the Minister have to help our newly trained teachers who are still unemployed to find employment, irrespective of their gender?

Mr O'Dowd: The primary objective of the Delivering Social Change programme, which I mentioned in response to Mr Sheehan earlier, was to improve numeracy and literacy and educational outcomes for our young people in schools, but it was also to allow newly qualified teachers to have real-time teaching experience in schools. That project has been successful.

Our education budget continues to face significant pressures. We have seen a reduction in teaching staff over the past four years in our schools estate, and, as education budgets continue to face pressures, I suspect that we will continue to see a reduction of the teaching workforce in our schools. It is a very difficult time for all teachers, but particularly for newly qualified teachers. I will continue to push the Delivering Social Change programme forward, and I will continue to push the education budget at the Executive table, but, at this moment in time, our budgets remain very constrained, and I do not expect an increase in employment in education any time soon.

School Starting Age

4. Mr A Maginness asked the Minister of Education when he will introduce some flexibility in the school starting age. (AQO 6768/11-15)

Mr O'Dowd: The foundation stage curriculum is designed to allow teachers the freedom to ensure that very young children should be allowed to learn at their own pace, reflective of their individual needs. For certain children in specific circumstances, there may be reasons why a child may be considered not ready to start school. It is for that reason that, following meetings with the Association of Teachers and Lecturers (ATL) and associates, I agreed to look at options for introducing a degree of flexibility in certain circumstances around the compulsory school starting age here.

There is no flexibility in current legislation that would allow parents to defer their child's entry to year one, and the introduction of any form of flexibility would require a change to primary legislation. Officials are now working to finalise the detailed arrangements that arise as a consequence of making such a change. I have instructed my officials to complete this work as quickly as possible. I expect a consultation to be launched this autumn, and I have asked that these changes be in place by September 2016. This is a tight and challenging timetable and is subject to Assembly approval of the necessary legislation.

Mr A Maginness: I thank the Minister for that answer. I think that many parents will be reassured that the Minister and the Department are on track to introduce legislation that will help to create flexibility. A further issue that I wish to raise with the Minister is that some children who attend school and who are young for their years, as it were, underachieve. Has the Department done any work on that particular problem?

Mr O'Dowd: Again, I return to the comments that I made in response to the original question: the foundation stage curriculum is designed to allow teachers the freedom to ensure that very young children should be allowed to learn at their own pace. It is about individual teaching for the individual child in the early stages of their educational development. I have accepted that there are some children who, for whatever reason, are not ready to start primary school at the required legislative age as set out currently, and that is why I propose to make changes to legislation, although it will ultimately be up to the Assembly to approve.

Our primary-school curriculum is designed to allow teachers to teach to the individual pupil rather than setting out a pathway that instructs them to teach a class at the same level, at the same time and at the same progress. We allow the professional judgement of our teachers to fit the curriculum to the child rather than the other way around in order to help those children in school who, for whatever reason, find the curriculum challenging.

Ms Maeve McLaughlin: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. What measures can be or are being taken to ensure that the proposed changes will not have any unintended negative consequences for schools?

Mr O'Dowd: That is one of the reasons that the work has taken slightly longer than I first expected. When you start to change the school starting age for some children, it may have an impact on preschool and primary school provision. The question also has to be asked about whether it will have an impact on the leaving age for post-primary schools and so on. My officials have spent considerable time going through the relevant legislation and policy documents to ensure that, when we go out to consultation, as many of those questions as possible will have been answered and that we give the public and Members a full picture. As I said, it will then be up to the Assembly whether it agrees with the legislative proposals.

Miss M McIlveen: I welcome the Minister's comments about flexibility. That has been raised with me in my role as an MLA. Will he expand on whether any criteria will be set against that? There is flexibility and there is flexibility.

Mr O'Dowd: I am not proposing an open book, whereby parents can state that they do not believe that their child is ready to start school and therefore will not start until the next year. I am interested in some examples in councils in and around the Scottish borders and in some English councils, where they have brought in criteria that allow children to start school a year later. However, that decision is assessed against criteria.

I have not finalised the criteria that I will put out to consultation. They will be example criteria, and, if others have ideas, I am more than willing to listen to them. It is important that we get the legislation right and get agreement on it through the Assembly. There are examples out there. I will propose a number of those examples in the consultation, and, if others have any other ideas, I am open to listening to them.

School Transport

5. Mr G Robinson asked the Minister of Education to outline what assistance he can provide to prospective pupils wishing to travel from Coleraine to Limavady schools, including the provision of suitable bus transport. (AQO 6769/11-15)

Mr O'Dowd: The current rules governing the home-to-school transport policy are laid down in departmental circular 1996/41, as amended, which is available on the DE website in the section dealing with transport. The policy requires education and library boards to make such arrangements as they consider necessary to facilitate the attendance of pupils at grant-aided schools. Eligibility is determined by two qualifying criteria: distance and suitable school.

Under the policy, transport assistance will be provided only to pupils who have formally sought and been unable to gain a place in all suitable schools within the relevant eligibility distance of their home. That is two miles for primary age pupils and three miles for post-primary pupils. There are six categories of schools within the definition of "suitable school": controlled and other voluntary schools; Catholic maintained schools; integrated schools; Irish-medium schools; denominational grammar schools; and non-denominational grammar schools. If a pupil is eligible, the ELB will decide the most appropriate form of assistance to provide. That may take the form of a seat on a Translink bus, an ELB bus or a private operator bus, a private operator taxi or a monetary allowance.

As Coleraine to Limavady is a main arterial route, the most appropriate form of transport assistance is likely to be a Translink sessional ticket — a bus pass — although each case is considered individually. The ELB response will be dependent on the number and distribution of pupils travelling to a particular school and will take account of the possible interactions that exist with public bus services.

Mr G Robinson: I hear what the Minister has said. Does he agree that the choice of school can be an important influence and factor in a child's educational attainment?

Mr O'Dowd: Sorry, I missed some of that, Mr Robinson. Would it be possible for you to repeat the question?

Mr G Robinson: Does the Minister agree that the choice of school can be an important influence and factor in a child's educational attainment?

Mr O'Dowd: It depends on the reasons for choice. We have several different sectors out there. The main concern for me, as Minister of Education, is that, regardless of which school or sector a parent or pupil chooses, it should provide a high-quality education and look after the educational well-being of pupils.

Ms Sugden: Further to the Minister's decision to amalgamate Coleraine High School and Coleraine Academical Institution, does he have any plans to work with the Department for Regional Development to provide suitable bus provision and infrastructure for the proposed new school?

Mr O'Dowd: I am not aware of all the transport issues surrounding the case that you referred to. However, first and foremost, I would encourage the schools or the interim board of governors to engage with Translink and other service providers in the area to see what transport facilities are in place and to engage with the education and library board to discuss transport facilities in the area, eligibility etc.

Mr Kinahan: I thank the Minister for his answers so far. When it comes to transport charges in the future, will he promise that he will not place some form of transport charge on children travelling to voluntary schools in Belfast?

Mr O'Dowd: I assume that the Member is referring to one of the issues raised as part of the transport review that I commissioned. I have received a copy of the report, and I am studying the part that relates to transport provision going into the future. I am not in a position to respond to any of the recommendations in that report at this stage, although they cover the issue of charging all pupils. It does not specifically refer to one sector or area. All those matters will be dealt with fully when I publish the report and make a statement to the House in due course.

Rossmar School, Limavady

7. Mr Ó hOisín asked the Minister of Education for an update on the redevelopment of Rossmar School, Limavady. (AQO 6771/11-15)

Mr O'Dowd: Following approval of the Rossmar economic appraisal in October 2013 by my Department, a professional team was appointed to progress the design of the new 100-pupil school building. The Western Education and Library Board is discussing the level of accommodation to be provided, and an addendum to the economic appraisal will be submitted to my Department for consideration by mid-October 2014. It is anticipated that the new build will begin on site towards the end of August 2015, with completion by March 2017.

Mr Ó hOisín: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as an fhreagra sin. I thank the Minister for his answer. I am aware that the accommodation requirement has gone to the Department, but will the Minister acknowledge that Rossmar School and other schools in the area for which construction projects have been announced wait with anticipation, as does the construction industry locally?

Mr O'Dowd: Yes. It is quite a journey from the announcement of a new build to the start of construction. Each site and school throws up its own complexities. With Rossmar, while there were some hiccups at the start, we are making good progress and are working towards a start date of August 2015. So, all the major hurdles have been crossed.

I am also aware of the interest of the construction industry in my school-building programme. For different reasons, they want to see sites opened up to ensure that construction workers are on site, that jobs are there and that finances are going into the economy. While that is not the primary responsibility of my Department in this case — my primary responsibility is to provide new facilities for schools — I welcome the fact that investment by my Department assists the construction industry and the wider economy.

Mr Campbell: The Minister has been down at Rossmar School. I welcome the fact that by this time next year we should be well on our way to a new school being finished there. Has account been taken in the preparation of the capital programme required there of any likely change in the first year or two in the number applying to be accommodated in the school?

Mr O'Dowd: In the preparation for a new school build, projected entry numbers are taken into consideration as best they can be. They will form part of the deliberations of the Western Education and Library Board and of my Department before final approval is given for the size of the school. If the Member has any specific information that he believes would be valuable in our deliberations, sharing that with my Department or the Western Education and Library Board would prove beneficial.

School Bus Safety

8. Mrs Cameron asked the Minister of Education, following the accident involving a school bus in Castlederg, what action has he taken to improve safety whilst travelling on school buses, including the wearing of seatbelts. (AQO 6772/11-15)

Mr O'Dowd: First, I am sure you will agree with me how relieved we all are that no pupils were seriously injured or killed in last week's bus collision. That was largely due to the fact that a high proportion of the children were, thankfully, wearing seat belts. As I confirmed at last week's safe transport awareness conference in Stormont, I view safety as the main priority in the provision of home-to-school transport policy.

Existing safety standards are already of a high level, following the implementation, since 2007, of a number of key safety measures by my Department, the education and library boards and Translink. They include not seating three children to two adult seats; no standing on school-designated services except in exceptional circumstances; and all designated school services to be fully seat-belted. Board vehicles and board-contracted private hire vehicles have been compliant for a number of years with all those measures, as pupil numbers are matched to vehicle capacities. Schools are also regularly reminded by ELBs and DE of the importance of the use of seat belts. The latest letter issued in January this year, and a further letter is being prepared by my officials.

2.30 pm

Mr Deputy Speaker: That ends the period for listed questions. We move to topical questions. Topical question 8 has been withdrawn.

Education Budget: Block Grant Reductions

1. Ms Boyle asked the Minister of Education to detail the cuts imposed on his budget over the past four years as a result of British Government reductions to the block grant. (AQT 1561/11-15)

Mr O'Dowd: In the settlement of the Executive Budget for the period 2011-15, the resource budget was cut by £125 million, as compared with 2011. That translates into a £255 million cut or 13.6% in real terms. Late in 2011, around November, I met the First Minister, the deputy First Minister and the then Finance Minister and outlined to them the impact that losing £255 million would have on resources in education. They agreed that we could not travel forward on that trajectory, and I secured a further £120 million for the education budget. However, as I have said in answer to several questions, we still face significant budgetary pressures in education. They are curtailing the services that we deliver, and they are stopping services expanding, including the employment of vital front line staff in our classrooms.

Ms Boyle: I thank the Minister for his response. Will he confirm whether those cuts predate any potential fines linked to the Tory-led coalition's plans to cut welfare spending? Go raibh maith agat.

Mr O'Dowd: The current resource budget for 2011-15 was set on the basis of a block grant from the Treasury of approximately £10 billion and distributed among Departments. When that was done, the current Welfare Reform Bill was not dreamt of or heard of. Although welfare reform was being brought through the Assembly under the auspices of the then Labour Government and the then Social Development Minister, the current Welfare Reform Bill was unheard of. The cuts to services and the job losses in education have everything to do with the coalition Government's economic policy, and the continued implementation of that policy will have a detrimental impact on all our public services.

Capital Build Projects: Dungannon

2. Ms McGahan asked the Minister of Education for an update on the capital build projects for St Patrick's Academy, Dungannon and Edendork Primary School. (AQT 1562/11-15)

Mr O'Dowd: The project for St Patrick's Academy is progressing well, with a notice in the 'Official Journal of the European Union' for construction tenders, published in September 2014. It is hoped that, in this case, construction will commence on site in 2015. My officials are actively engaged in taking forward the Edendork Primary School project. To date, a site search has been completed by Land and Property Services, and suitable sites have been identified for the location of the new school. The next stage will be the preparation of a technical feasibility study to address the suitability of those sites, and that information will be utilised to inform the economic appraisal.

Ms McGahan: Go raibh maith agat. I thank the Minister for his response. Will he detail the wider benefits of those capital build projects to the local construction industry and the community in terms of social clauses?

Mr O'Dowd: As I said in answer to a previous question, while my primary responsibility is to provide new facilities for schools, I am acutely aware that the significant investment that I have made over this last number of years is having a beneficial impact on the construction industry and, therefore, the economy. The UK Contractors Group estimates that, for every pound that I invest in new builds as a Minister, there is a positive impact on the economy of £2.84. Every pound that I generate creates another £2.84 towards the economy. I welcome that. In the case of St Patrick's Academy in Dungannon, the estimated cost of £27 million, applying the multipliers, will result in an estimated potential investment to our economy of £77 million. In the case of Edendork Primary School, £4 million, again using these multipliers, will benefit the local economy by somewhere in the region of £11 million. Not only do the schools benefit from this; certainly, the construction industry also benefits, as does our local economy.

ICT: School Reliance

3. Mr Rogers asked the Minister of Education for his view of the claim that the relentless march towards a greater reliance on ICT, without adequate support and technical back up, is eroding staff morale in schools. (AQT 1563/11-15)

Mr O'Dowd: We have to get the balance right. ICT is a reality. It is becoming an increasing reality in every aspect of our daily life, so it is only right and proper that we use it in our school environment as a learning tool and a subject in its own right. We have support mechanisms in place for our teachers. Some schools decide to invest in packages from their own budget, as they are perfectly entitled to do, and have brought in various devices to assist children to learn. I always caution them that that is OK, as investment in devices is a good thing in many ways, but they also need to invest in a training programme to ensure that they maximise the use of such devices.

Mr Rogers: I thank you for that. Minister, do you not think that smaller rural schools are particularly under added pressure because they have limited hardware and space to put computers but also lack fast broadband?

Mr O'Dowd: The issue of fast broadband is a matter for other Departments. A number of those Departments are involved in programmes that are delivering broadband services to our rural communities. We provide quite a significant package to schools through the C2k programme. Over this last number of years, we are well advanced in the investment that we have made in computer equipment and connectivity for our schools compared with other education Departments across these islands. We have certainly taken into account the needs of small rural schools moving forward, but the broadband issue is for other Departments.

Schools: Local Provision

4. Mr Nesbitt asked the Minister of Education how many primary-school-age children are forced to bypass the campus of their local school to attend school elsewhere because they are unable to secure a place locally. (AQT 1564/11-15)

Mr O'Dowd: No, not as I stand here at this exact moment. However, I will provide the Member with as much information as possible.

Mr Nesbitt: I appreciate the Minister's candour. Constituents come to me annually as families to say that this is happening to them in Newtownards and Comber. The child wakes up, can see the local school out of a bedroom window but cannot get a place and has to travel somewhere else. Those parents are greatly frustrated because they believe that your party policy is that children should attend their local school. What can you do for them?

Mr O'Dowd: A number of factors come into play in this issue. They include, first and foremost, the school's enrolment policy and how the local primary school and its board of governors have decided they will operate that enrolment policy. If their top priority is that children in the immediate vicinity of the school should gain entry to it, should a child be looking through the bedroom window and saying that they have not got in to that school? That is a matter for the board of governors. If a school has an entry policy or entry criteria and finds that there is still a significant demand on the school, it can ask for an increase in its yearly intake for one year only. It can come to my Department and present a case that it needs to allow x number of pupils into the school for a stated reason. My Department will deliberate on that, and, where it agrees that the school has presented a valid case, permission will be given for those numbers.

If that is happening regularly, the school should bring forward a development proposal that calls for the school to be expanded by x amount of pupils, which would be decided on in consultation with the school and its managing authority. Such a development proposal would go out to eight weeks' consultation, and it would then come to me for a final decision. If it fits in with area planning, and the school shows that there is a required demand for an increase in places, I will approve the increase. The first port of call should be the school to ask it about its entry criteria.

Single Education Authority

5. Mr McCartney asked the Minister of Education to outline the savings that will come from the single education authority contained in the Bill he introduced yesterday. (AQT 1565/11-15)

Mr O'Dowd: While the final business case has yet to be submitted to the Department of Finance and Personnel for its inspection and approval, it is estimated that the savings will be similar to those forecast for the education and skills authority (ESA), which were in and around £185 million over its first 10 years.

Mr McCartney: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as an fhreagra sin. I thank the Minister for that answer. We know that the target is 1 April 2015, which is when the new councils will kick in. What would the impact be if the Bill were not introduced and made law by that time?

Mr O'Dowd: The driving force behind the Bill and the single education authority is the looming deadline of the review of public administration and councils, which, as you said, is 1 April 2015. The current legislation sets out that our education and library boards are connected to the councils through legislation. If the councils are no longer in place, they are no longer legal entities as envisaged in the education and library Bills. There is then a serious question mark about the locus of any boards that continue after that.

There is an onus on the Assembly, my Department and Ministers to make a decision about the way forward for education. The new body is not ESA; it is a single education and library authority based on the 1986 Order that modernised the education and library boards. This is the best way forward at this time. Future Education Ministers and Executives may wish to return to ESA and use this legislation as a platform to build on, but the Assembly and the Executive need to make a decision and move forward with the Bill, give certainty to the education structures and our teachers, support staff and education and library board workers on the shape of the body for a considerable period. If in the future someone wishes to return to ESA, so be it.

Looked-after Children

6. Mr G Robinson asked the Minister of Education to advise the House of any progress on the policy for looked-after children. (AQT 1566/11-15)

Mr O'Dowd: I have instructed my officials to bring forward a policy for looked-after children, which they are working on. I will keep the Education Committee and the House informed about the policy's progress.

Mr G Robinson: The need to improve the educational outcomes of looked-after children is an area of concern. What assistance is being given to teachers to help them to identify and address the sometimes complex needs of those children?

Mr O'Dowd: That is without doubt. One of the driving forces behind my decision to formulate a policy specifically for looked-after children is because of the educational challenges that they face. Educational outcomes for many of our looked-after children are far from what they should be, particularly given that many are in the care of the state, and there is a responsibility on the state to ensure that their educational outcomes are good.

During the recent common funding formula changes, I changed the formula to increase funding for looked-after children going into schools. I think that that has been received positively. My Department, the boards and I are working more closely with the Health Department and social workers to ensure that looked-after children are properly identified and that their needs are put in place in a plan. There was some initial slippage, but communication and discussions between my Department and the Health Department have greatly improved, and progress is being made.

2.45 pm

Early Years: Funding

7. Mr McMullan asked the Minister of Education whether his recent announcement of additional funding for early years settings will assist children to overcome barriers to education. (AQT 1567/11-15)

Mr O'Dowd: Yes, and this goes back to a number of questions for oral answer on how we improve educational outcomes for young people. We have to start at the earliest stages of a child's development, and I have made available £200,000 for 94 non-statutory preschool settings in 2014-15. That is based on the extended schools principle already in place in primary schools. I think that it will be a welcome addition to the funding for those settings and assist them in delivering extra-curricular and curricular activities for the children whom they look after.

Regional Development

Mr Deputy Speaker: Questions 1 and 2 have been withdrawn.

Cycle Park Network

3. Mr McMullan asked the Minister for Regional Development whether he plans to extend the cycle path network into rural towns and villages. (AQO 6782/11-15)

Mr Kennedy (The Minister for Regional Development): On 27 August, I published the draft bicycle strategy for Northern Ireland for a 12-week period of public consultation. An ongoing series of public consultation events will end in the middle of November and includes a number of events in rural areas.

My strategy recognises that there are differences between using a bicycle in an urban area and a rural area. It clearly states that we will continue to make provision for the bicycle in rural areas where opportunities arise, especially where there is demand.

Once the bicycle strategy is finalised, a delivery plan will be prepared. This plan will be subject to a rural-proofing exercise to ensure that the needs of rural communities and areas are considered as part of the policy development process. I look forward to the Member's response to the consultation.

Mr McMullan: I thank the Minister for his response. Has his Department engaged with its counterpart in the South to look at cross-border cycling provisions?

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member for his supplementary. We are looking at areas where we can learn from each other or compare schemes. That level of cooperation, and the potential for it, are there. I have not yet had an opportunity to discuss this at ministerial level with my new counterpart, but I think that there are areas where shared information would be of use. I am hopeful that we can make progress on that.

Mr Swann: Minister, what prospects are there for securing EU funding for cycling projects?

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member for his supplementary. This relates to my response to the previous question. There is that potential for cross-border projects, such as the Newry to Dundalk project and, in County Armagh, the project along the Ulster Canal. My Department is working with various Departments and district councils to explore the opportunities for EU funding.

It is early days in this process, but I am hopeful that we will be able to secure funding for sustainable transport projects, including walking and cycling projects. Officials continue to work with colleagues in Scotland and the Republic of Ireland to secure funding for cycling infrastructure, including greenways and the Waterside hub in Londonderry.

Mr Campbell: I appreciate the Minister's support for the proposals and the intention behind them, but will he examine, where practicable, the possibility of coordinating cycleways with newly placed 20 mph traffic zones, particularly in urban areas, to minimise traffic accidents and their impact on pedestrians?

Mr Kennedy: I thank the Member for his supplementary question. I think he makes an important point. My ambition is such that I want to see improvement to the overall existing infrastructure. It is not simply a matter of planning with new schemes. I think the existing infrastructure is quite weak in many ways. The cycling lobby — if you like — continues to make representations, which I am very sympathetic to. Of course, those issues are not without cost, and it is important that I feel that I have the political support going forward in securing much-needed finance for schemes of that nature.

Mr Lyttle: The Minister recently announced drawbacks in relation to roads maintenance connected with budgetary reductions. Are they likely to impact on cycle network maintenance also?

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member. I know that he is a keen cyclist. I think that he has been newly appointed to the Committee for Regional Development, and I look forward to a positive contribution in relation to all those issues. I want to emphasise my desire for a cycling revolution as we go forward. Yes, there are short-term funding issues that we need to be aware of, but on the wider aspects of it and our wider ambitions, we should not lose sight of where we want to go to improve the infrastructure, new and existing, and to encourage more sustainable modes of transport that will enable people to feel safe as they cycle, or, indeed, as they walk through our urban areas, but also our rural areas.

Roads Maintenance

4. Mr Wilson asked the Minister for Regional Development to outline the value of contracts for roads maintenance that are dependent on additional resources being allocated to his Department in the October 2014 and February 2015 monitoring rounds. (AQO 6783/11-15)

Mr Kennedy: The value of my Department's resource contracts for roads maintenance that are dependent on additional resources being allocated is some £12.5 million. The following activities will be affected: footway and carriageway patching; grass cutting and environmental maintenance; gully emptying; repair of street lighting outages; road marking maintenance and renewal; and traffic sign maintenance and replacement.

When bidding in October, a deduction has to be made for the value of work that could be delivered within the available time. The value of the February 2015 bid will largely be dependent on the outcome of October monitoring making further allowances for what could be delivered by the year's end. Roads maintenance works are undertaken by external contractors and my Department's operations and maintenance staff. Therefore, any additional requirement is a combination of what is required to allow my operations and maintenance staff to operate efficiently plus what is required to pay external contractors.

Mr Wilson: I can understand the importance to the finances of the Executive of having contracts that can soak up money if it becomes available at the last moment, but does the Minister not agree that such core areas of his Department should not be financed on the basis of a hope, on a wing and a prayer that money might become available in monitoring rounds? Why has he organised the financing of those projects in that way, rather than have them as part of his core budget where he can be assured of the money?

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member for his supplementary question. I am slightly curious in that, in the not-too-recent past, he was Finance Minister and operated the system that I have inherited and have tried to make best use of. The Member was not in the House for the debate on the financial position, particularly the pressures on my resource budget, which took place this morning. We had 10 contributions in all, all of them — with the exception of one, that of Mr Beggs — critical, but no one provided ideas or alternative solutions. Indeed, had he been here, he would have heard my assertion that I do not believe that that is the way to do business with the Budget generally or specifically for regional development and road and transport issues. I think that we would be better to plan at the earlier stage for the amounts that we should and are entitled to receive. That would give us more value for money and more bang for our buck. I am glad that, now that he is out of office, the former Finance Minister recognises that.

Ms Boyle: Go raibh maith agat. What proportion of the cuts is from outside contractors and what proportion is from Roads Service staff? How much money is involved?

Mr Kennedy: I have indicated that the cutbacks for the savings that we have had to make have principally had to be directed against the use of external contractors. Of course, that does not come without impact on those businesses and indeed those employees. These are not decisions that I have taken lightly or that I would want to have made but, at the time, almost halfway through the financial year, these cuts were imposed. Frankly, it is bonkers that any Department should be asked to effect savings of this nature at that point in time. It highlights the fundamental flaw in the way in which budgets are arranged and confirmed, as well as the issues that have compounded that, ie the controversies over welfare reform. All these issues are in play. I found myself having to deal with a situation. The only course of action that was available to me was to cut back the use of external contractors. I will continue to bid in the remaining monitoring rounds, and I will continue to remind Executive colleagues of the impacts that these cutbacks are having.

Mr D Bradley: Go raibh míle maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as a fhreagra. How does the Minister ensure that health and safety standards are maintained under the current funding regime?

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful for the supplementary question that the Member has asked. Clearly, I have to be aware of the issue of health and safety. It is the paramount issue with regard to how we continue to protect people in both the work that we do and the way in which it is done. My operations and maintenance staff will endeavour to keep the road network in as safe a condition as possible, but they have only the resources to complete around three quarters of the total routine maintenance workload on roads. Again, in the case of street lighting outages, in-house staff can complete only a much smaller percentage of the overall workload. I consider that to be a serious issue, and I have asked my officials to seek formal legal advice on it.

Bus Station: Banbridge

5. Mrs Dobson asked the Minister for Regional Development for an update on the provision of a bus station for Banbridge. (AQO 6784/11-15)

Mr Kennedy: I thank the Member for her question. The design process was completed at the end of August 2014. To ensure that some off-street car parking was retained by Transport NI, Translink has been trying to acquire a small corner of land from an adjacent landowner. The negotiations for this piece of land are ongoing. The site is leased to a local well-known retailer but is privately owned. This necessitates Translink having to get agreement from the retailer and the owner. The retailer that leases the site has agreed to the layout supplied by Translink.

The current design plan is based upon the use of most of the car park at Kenlis Street — some 53 of the 74 available spaces. Given that there is some uncertainty about the landowner's intentions, Translink has proactively discussed with Transport NI an alternative option to the potential use of nearly the full car park. It is my intention that work can begin on the project in 2015.

3.00pm

Mrs Dobson: I thank the Minister for his answer and welcome the action that he is taking to progress the project. It is the first time that the people of Banbridge will have a bus station, a facility that has been lacking in the town for far too long. Does the Minister agree that this is an example of the Ulster Unionist Party listening to the real priorities of people in Banbridge and, through this and other projects, holding good to its promise to deliver?

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member for her supplementary question. I pay tribute to her for her doggedness in pursuing this. It is a very important issue, not only to the people in Banbridge, particularly those who use public transport, but to people in the wider area, given the important network that Banbridge serves in that part of Northern Ireland. The Member is right. I take considerable pride that, having listened to the representations made by Banbridge council and other representatives over the years, including herself, we are at last beginning to see progress. I am determined that we will continue with that. I hope very much that the Ulster Unionist Party will get the credit that it duly deserves.

Mrs D Kelly: I look forward to the cutting of the sod next year. That is really what we are hearing.

Minister, you said that there would be a loss of car parking places. There was hope that there would be an extension of the number of places throughout the North for park-and-ride. Therefore, are any additional facilities planned to offset the spaces that will be lost to Banbridge bus station?

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member for her encouragement to see the scheme brought successfully to a conclusion. Who knows, she may even get an invite to the sod cutting. [Laughter.] We got into trouble earlier with Kieran McCarthy, who objected that the Alliance Party had been overlooked on a previous occasion.

The issue of park-and-ride is an important one Province-wide, not just in the Banbridge or general upper Bann area. We are always looking at opportunities to improve those facilities, because we see the benefit to the travelling public of providing such facilities. If the Member has particular sites that she wants to pass on for us to investigate, I am happy to hear from her.

Mr Anderson: I thank the Minister for those responses. Any of our towns in upper Bann getting a bus station certainly has to be welcomed, and I welcome anything going into Banbridge. However, there are other major towns in upper Bann, Minister. Much lobbying has gone on in the likes of Portadown and, I am sure, Lurgan. Can you tell us what future there is for those towns? I am sure that you and your Department well know the lobbying that has gone on for bus facilities. I just want to say that I and others in my party were at the forefront of lobbying for bus facilities in Banbridge.

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member for his question. Success has many authors; failure is an orphan. I assure him, and Members from other constituencies, that we are seeking to improve the overall infrastructure for the travelling public by upgrading stations, be they bus or rail stations. We have had some success in that. Members will remember Ballymoney and Antrim as examples of that. So, we continue to roll those forward. Some of it is largely dependent on finance. As I said earlier to his party colleague, we would be very pleased indeed to see you and your party put your money where your mouth is. I remind the Member that talk is cheap, but it takes money to buy whisky.

Flooding: Fermanagh

6. Mr Flanagan asked the Minister for Regional Development to outline the preparations in place to deal with the potential flooding of roads in Fermanagh following his decision to reduce the level of gully-emptying in that area. (AQO 6785/11-15)

Mr Kennedy: As the Member will be aware, to meet pressures in my Department's resource budget, I had to take difficult decisions to stop issuing new work instructions to external contractors for routine maintenance activities, including gully-emptying. In the Fermanagh area, gully-emptying on urban and main roads was carried out by an external contractor, with operations and maintenance staff providing the service on the minor road network.

Operations and maintenance staff will endeavour to fill the gap left by the unavailability of contractor resources. However, that will mean that service levels will be reduced to around three quarters of normal. All gullies in the area were cleaned as normal before the cuts were imposed, and I am hopeful that the area should remain fairly free of drainage problems in normal circumstances in the short term. My operations and maintenance staff will endeavour to prioritise gully-cleaning and dealing with known flooding area problems. We seek to prioritise those areas to ensure that they are protected as far as we can. If flooding does occur, operations and maintenance staff will be deployed, as resources permit, to deal with any problems that may arise across the county.

Mr Flanagan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for his answer. He said that he had to take difficult decisions, but I challenge him and say that he took the easy decision. That was the easy cut to make. It would have been much more progressive for the Minister to say, "We are going to stop giving the redcoats a handout to give people a fine for parking in our town centres" —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order, please. You are well off the question.

Mr Flanagan: Does the Minister accept that the decision not to carry out gully-cleaning leads to road safety issues, where there is now water lying on the side of our roads, and people travelling on our roads at speed will end up in a hedge on the other side of the road by accident as a result of hitting lying water?

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member. I respectfully say to him that I am not sure that he is in a position to lecture on economics, given his performance on 'The Stephen Nolan Show' yesterday. [Laughter.] He seemed to have a serious issue understanding finances —

Mr Flanagan: You are certainly well away from the answer now.

Mr Kennedy: — and how finance works.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I remind everyone that it is my function, and no one else's, to chair the meeting. Continue, Minister.

Mr Kennedy: I will not accept that I took soft-option decisions at the end of July. If the Member had been present for the earlier debate and had any knowledge of or interest in it, he would have heard a full and detailed explanation. Rather than the Member fulfilling his ongoing desire to fill the airwaves and social media with his views, it might pay him to listen a little more.

A8: Belfast to Larne

7. Mr Beggs asked the Minister for Regional Development for an update on the estimated completion date for the A8 Belfast to Larne dual carriageway. (AQO 6786/11-15)

Mr Kennedy: The £130 million, 14-kilometre long A8 dualling scheme is 25 months through its 34-month programme. Construction is progressing very well and is approximately 75% complete. To date, approximately two million cubic metres of earthworks material has been excavated, including over 500,000 cubic metres of rock. The road-paving operation is continuing, with around 180,000 tons of material laid to date. All eight bridges along the route of the scheme are now substantially complete, and three of the eight structures are open to two-way traffic. It is expected that the new A8 dual carriageway will be open to traffic by the end of May 2015. Landscaping work will continue until December 2015.

Mr Beggs: The investment will improve transport linkages from the port of Larne to the M1, the M2 and throughout Northern Ireland, and even into the Republic of Ireland and the trade that exists between there and Scotland and the north of England in particular. I hope that new jobs will develop in the Larne area. Can the Minister outline what health and safety improvements we will see for road users as a result of the investment, and what will be the effect on journey time to the port of Larne?

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member for his supplementary question, and I pay tribute to him and the lobbying that he undertook to ensure that the scheme has finally been brought forward. It has been a long time in the making.

Indeed, his father was a very strong advocate and supporter of this particular scheme. I see it as having huge potential, not just for the port of Larne but for the economic regeneration of, and better connectivity to, that area of Northern Ireland. I am sure that that will improve business opportunities and I am very hopeful that we can move forward on that basis and that it will improve the economic lot of the people who live and work there.

Mr Clarke: There are benefits from the A8 and everyone should welcome that. Will the Minister outline the additional cost of bypassing Ballynure? How much would have been saved by keeping it on line?

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member for his supplementary question. I congratulate him on his recent appointment as Chairperson of the Committee for Regional Development and I pay tribute to the former Chairperson, Mr Spratt.

I have to say, respectfully, that we are past the issue of the Ballynure bypass and the route chosen. Careful consideration was given to all those issues at the time, including through the public inquiry, and I am satisfied and optimistic that, when the scheme that we are bringing forward is completed, people will see and understand the full benefits.

Mr McAleer: Go raibh maith agat. Along with fellow Committee for Regional Development members, I visited that site last week and looked enviously at the wonderful carriageway. Speaking to the contractors, I was intrigued by some of the complicated environmental issues that had to be dealt with, including rerouting a river from its traditional route. Were any particular lessons picked up from that scheme that might be applied to other large-scale schemes such as the A5 scheme and others in future?

Mr Kennedy: Thank you for your question. I will resist the temptation to infer that you may have learned more about traditional routes and about not seeking to change them on a political, rather than a road-building, basis; we will not talk about that. We have been very careful to ensure that environmental issues have been dealt with. I am satisfied that they have been given proper consideration and that, perhaps, even the additional expense incurred as a result of such environmental changes was worthwhile and worth bearing with in terms of the overall benefits to the wider community.

Roads Maintenance

8. Mr Anderson asked the Minister for Regional Development for his assessment of the likely impact of cuts to the roads maintenance budget. (AQO 6787/11-15)

Mr Kennedy: As you will be aware, following the announcement on June monitoring, my Department's resource budgets that are used for the day-to-day maintenance of the road network have been cut. As a result, I have had no option other than to stop issuing new work instructions to our contractors, who currently undertake around one quarter of our essential work in the following areas: footway and carriageway patching, including potholes, grass cutting and environmental maintenance; gully emptying; road marking maintenance and renewal; and traffic sign maintenance and replacement.

As I said, my Department's in-house operations and maintenance staff will endeavour to keep the road network in as safe a condition as possible. However, as they have only the resources to complete around three quarters of the total workload, they will not be able to provide the service that the public would expect in normal circumstances. In addition, I have been left with no funding to pay contractors for the repair of street lights that fail, unless they pose an electrical hazard to members of the public. Currently, 7,900 street lights are out across Northern Ireland and outages are rising at a rate of around 1,000 a week. My operations and maintenance staff are dealing with outages on a priority basis but they have only around one quarter of the resource required to provide normal service.

These have been difficult decisions to take, but they are necessary to try to protect areas such as winter service, where withdrawal of our work would have an even greater impact on the Northern Ireland economy and the public. I realise that these measures impact on contractors, road users and the public, but I have to make the best use of my Department's limited resources.

3.15 pm

Mr Anderson: I thank the Minister for that very detailed response. He has given us alarming statistics. There are issues that need to be addressed urgently. Does the Minister agree that a failure to repair potholes and similar road defects and damage, mainly on the small, rural roads, would, and does, lead only to more accidents and, therefore, more insurance claims and, as such, that it would be prudent to ensure that adequate funding is used to carry out the maintenance and repairs to potholes as soon as they are discovered?

Mr Kennedy: I thank the Member for his supplementary question. I cannot disagree with the sentiments that he expresses. It might well be that I will print the Hansard report of his supplementary question and direct it towards colleagues in the Executive, perhaps, even to his party colleague the Finance Minister, because I believe that the cuts and savings that have to be effected at this time have the potential to cost even more in the future. That does not make good economic sense. So, I welcome the sentiments that he has aired, and I hope that he will follow those through, even with his party colleagues.

Mr Deputy Speaker: That ends the period for listed questions. We now move on to topical questions.

Cycling: Ballymacarrett Walkway

1. Mr Douglas asked the Minister for Regional Development, following the publication of his draft bicycle strategy, to outline any plans that he has to improve the Ballymacarrett walkway section of the Comber greenway at the Holywood arches. (AQT 1571/11-15)

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member for his question. He doggedly pursues this issue; I know that he is also a keen cyclist. I also welcome his support for my vision of increasing the use of the bicycle throughout Northern Ireland. From his cycling experience, he knows, as will others, that the Comber greenway is one of the best pieces of cycling infrastructure that we have in Northern Ireland, and I am very keen to see it developed further.

The draft bicycle strategy picks up the theme of a comprehensive network for the bicycle and highlights the need to create a network of high-quality and direct joined-up routes. My cycling unit has started working on scoping out a bicycle network for the city of Belfast, and it will, undoubtedly, include the Comber greenway. I am keen to ensure that the Comber greenway links more effectively from the area around Holywood arches to the city centre. That would include improved links into the Connswater community greenway in the vicinity of the Ballymacarrett walkway and improvements to the greenway at various points along its length.

Mr Douglas: I thank the Minister for his answer. The Minister may be aware that there are rumours going about that there is the potential for a road to go through that area. Can the Minister confirm his commitment to retaining Ballymacarrett walkway as a walking and cycling route?

Mr Kennedy: I have been made aware of some of the rumours. It is unfortunate that such rumours have emerged. Certainly, under my watch, I have no intention of changing the status. I do not see it in any way other than being a walkway and a cycling highway.

Roads: Gritting

2. Mr Spratt asked the Minister for Regional Development to guarantee that winter gritting will continue, as in previous years, on all designated routes, given that the road gritting programme is the core business of DRD staff rather than external contractors. (AQT 1572/11-15)

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member for his question. It is timely. Of all the services that Transport NI and my Department provide, I think winter services are looked upon as essential. Certainly, this is a challenging budgetary period. Discussions are not yet concluded. He will know that the Executive are to have further discussions, even within the next 24 hours, and they will, presumably, be ongoing.

Certainly, it is my intention to protect winter services because I understand that, whilst there is no statutory obligation to provide them, they are important. The general public expect to see that winter services are provided to the maximum that they can be. That remains my position.

Mr Spratt: I thank the Minister for that answer. The Province has already suffered 62 fatalities this year. Last year, he and I stood in the House during the winter programme having sent our condolences to the family of a man who was killed just outside Saintfield in County Down.

Given that, will he try to ensure that staff continue to look at the weather reports and make sure that gritting takes place? On a few occasions last year, that did not happen.

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member. Clearly, all the fatalities on our roads represent real tragedies to the families involved, and we should never underestimate that. I extend my personal sympathy and that, I am sure, of the entire House to all those who, even in recent days, have lost loved ones as a result of road fatalities. Obviously, investigations take place into each accident or fatality and into the reasons and the causes, so it is not proper for me to comment on that. I think that it is essential that we provide the winter services that people look to and expect but also benefit from. Of course, a salted road does not absolutely mean and ensure that it will remain free from accident. So, it is also essential that due care and attention is taken by road users at every opportunity.

Flooding: Warrenpoint

3. Mrs McKeivitt asked the Minister for Regional Development to provide an anti-flood commitment to the residents of the Clermont Gardens and Charlotte Street areas of Warrenpoint following the opening of a new pumping station by NI Water. (AQT 1573/11-15)

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member for her question. There has been some correspondence through Assembly questions by her on this issue. Obviously, the new scheme that is in place will benefit local householders and local businesses. It is not yet clearly established that the cause of the flooding incident that took place recently in that area was solely the impact of the works that had been carried out. I am still waiting on final confirmation from that investigation, and I will, of course, make that available to the Member.

Mrs McKeivitt: If the pumping station proves effective, Minister, in the Charlotte Street and Newry Street area and it is no longer considered to be at risk of flooding, will your Department support the amendment of the flood maps for the area so that the families who live there and businesses can avail themselves of full protection through their insurance companies?

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member for her supplementary question. Of course, it is an important consideration that, while new waste water treatment works improve the services that are provided on waste and sewage, water supply and all of that, they alleviate but do not completely eradicate the risk of flooding. The Member, I think, will be conscious of that. Nevertheless, I do, of course, sympathise with anyone whose home has been impacted as a consequence of internal flooding. I would not wish that in my house, and I certainly would not want to see it imposed on others. That is why bringing forward schemes is important, not only in the Warrenpoint area but in other parts of Northern Ireland. That is why it is important that we maintained the budget of NI Water going forward so that it can provide and improve the facilities, not only drinking water but waste water facilities, so that we can alleviate the risk of flooding.

DRD: Budgetary Pressures

4. Mr Nesbitt asked the Minister for Regional Development for his assessment of the current budgetary pressures on his Department. (AQT 1574/11-15)

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member for his question. In June monitoring, Executive Ministers, excluding the Health Minister and the Education Minister, were asked to make reductions of 2·1% and 2·3% this year to provide more money for health, to cover the cost of the non-implementation of welfare reform and to patch over poor financial management at the centre of the Executive. The failure to give notice of cuts or to allow them to be planned for over a four-year period has made those cuts deeper than they otherwise might have been and has meant that areas that could otherwise have been protected are now at risk. That has meant, as I have said in answers, that I have had to pause the issuing of work to external contractors, and that has impacted on street light repairs, gully emptying and grass cutting. I do not take any pleasure in having to take those tough decisions, but I have done so in the full knowledge of the potential implications. Let me make it absolutely clear again: I bid for an additional £48 million in resource funding in June, and that funding could have been properly spent in my Department this year. I received less than the shortfall on concessionary fares, and, I have to say, Departments headed by Sinn Féin and DUP Ministers did much better than that.

Mr Nesbitt: I thank the Minister for that answer. I also acknowledge his exchange with Mr Spratt on the winter service. Will he go further and specifically tell the House that the winter service and concessionary fares are red lines for him going forward?

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member for his supplementary question. I could not sustain and could not advocate with due conscience any cuts that would savage the winter service programme or, indeed, affect the concessionary fares scheme. Therefore, I am very happy to signal, as a member of the Executive, that they are red-line issues as far as I am concerned.

Travel: Audiovisual Information

5. Mr Beggs asked the Minister for Regional Development for an update on the provision of real-time audiovisual information to improve the travelling experience of the general public and, in particular, those with visual impairments, especially given that, this week, the Guide Dogs for the Blind Association is celebrating 30 years of assisting those who are blind or have visual impairments in Northern Ireland. (AQT 1575/11-15)

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member for his question. Indeed, it is timely because, just yesterday, in the Long Gallery and at the front of Parliament Buildings, we were able to join with others to celebrate 30 years of Guide Dogs NI. It was a real delight for me to share in that and to witness at first hand the work of the association. I know that the Member has been closely identified with that, as other Members have. On that occasion, I was also pleased to be able to announce that my Department will progress audiovisual services on our Metro bus services. It is hugely important that we make public transport available and accessible to as many people as possible. It is important for positive health benefits and for the reduction of social exclusion. I am proud to be the Minister delivering that important investment in public transport. [Interruption.] Perhaps if that is more interesting, I could listen, too.

Anyway, I am proud to be the Minister delivering that important investment in public transport and in supporting those who are blind and partially sighted.

Mr Beggs: Previously during Question Time, the Minister indicated the significant financial pressures that he and his Department have faced. How has he been able to afford this expenditure?

Mr Kennedy: I thank the Member for his question. I have made it clear to the Regional Development Committee that I plan to use any revenue generated from those who commit moving traffic offences and to reinvest it to support audiovisual systems. I hope very much that the Regional Development Committee will support me in that as we move forward. The provision of audiovisual services on buses will not only benefit the blind or partially sighted, it will be of use to visitors and tourists. I see it as a real enhancement to our public transport system, and it will help many passengers in the years to come.

3.30 pm

Mr Deputy Speaker: Time is up. Members will take their ease while we change the top Table.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Beggs] in the Chair)

Private Members' Business

Victims and Survivors Service: Funding Crisis

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow up to one hour and 30 minutes for the debate. The proposer will have 10 minutes to propose the motion and 10 minutes to make a winding-up speech. All other Members who wish to speak will have five minutes.

Mr Nesbitt: I beg to move

That this Assembly notes the current funding crisis being faced by the Victims and Survivors Service; recognises the grave concern that this is causing for many victims, survivors and support groups, leading to some of them having to close, and the genuine hardships being faced by many victims as a result; and calls on the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister to take urgent action to alleviate this situation.

Perhaps I should begin with what I consider to be a key word in the motion. It is a word often used and abused — crisis. Let me assure the House, in case there is a Member waiting to pounce and accuse the Ulster Unionists of being sensationalist, that we are not using it in any way to try to tug at the heartstrings. We are using its dictionary definition as “a time of great difficulty or danger”. So, question one is this: can the case be made that victims and survivors are facing a time of great difficulty or, indeed, danger? What is the evidence?

First, they cannot rely on the services of the Commissioner for Victims and Survivors. She resigned earlier this year, leaving OFMDFM to seek its sixth commissioner in as many years. Secondly, there is no permanent chair of the Victims and Survivors Service. He resigned earlier this year. Thirdly, there is no chief executive of the Victims and Survivors Service. She resigned earlier this year.

Next is the PSNI, which has made clear that it can no longer afford to run the Historical Enquiries Team. Next is the Police Ombudsman, who said that, because of the cutbacks, he will have to go back to families to whom he made promises about historical investigations and tell them that he is sorry that he can no longer afford to deliver on those promises.

Finally, it is clear that OFMDFM needs to secure over £3 million from October monitoring. Otherwise, it will not be able to fulfil ministerial commitments to victims, survivors and their support groups. I suggest, Mr Deputy Speaker, that the case has been made that this is a crisis in the sense that it is “a time of great difficulty” for victims and survivors.

Often, when talking about dealing with the past, we debate it in terms of truth, justice and acknowledgement. This is a day to discuss other issues, but, for the record, let us mark the fact that the HET and the historical aspects of the Office of the Police Ombudsman are very nearly effectively on hold across the piece. There will be those who will argue that that is a breach of human rights. The Ulster Unionist Party has no difficulty with taking a human rights approach to how we deal with the past, but it is clear in today's environment that that has to be balanced by a resource-based approach. We have to consider what we can afford to do for victims and survivors. One of our criticisms of the Haass process was that there was never any mature debate about the resources that would have been required to implement his proposals on dealing with the past. Until we factor in resource requirements, there will always be a difficulty in that we will disappoint victims and survivors. We will raise their hopes only to dash them through the inability to deliver for them.

I would like to be as positive as possible in this debate. I congratulate OFMDFM for creating what I would describe as a virtuous circle. What do we have? We have a 10-year strategy for victims and survivors; we have expertise in OFMDFM and a funding stream; we have the Commission for Victims and Survivors, which advises the Executive on issues of merit and interest to victims; we have the Victims and Survivors Service (VSS), which is there to administer and hand out funds; and we have the victims' forum, which is there to offer advice, particularly in the first instance, to the commissioner. We have what should be a circular flow, a virtuous circle. Unfortunately, though, it is not working at the moment. The big issue is funding.

When I raised the issue of funding with the deputy First Minister in the Chamber, he seemed to disbelieve me, but I have since received a letter of clarification from him and the First Minister. Last year, in 2013-14, the baseline figure for the VSS was £11.3 million. After monitoring additions, it went up to £12.4 million, according to this letter. Currently, the Victims and Survivors Service is working on £10 million, but a bid of £1.3 million has been made in October monitoring. If successful, they say, this will put it at the same level as the opening baseline allocation for 2013-14. That sounds good, but the fact is that the VSS's projected out-turn for 2013-14 is likely to be £12.8 million, not £12.4 million, and it is currently working on £10 million. That is down over 22% on the projected out-turn for last year. That is 22%, not the 4.4% mentioned in the letter.

The letter refers to a bid of £1.3 million in the category of inescapable bids, but there is a second bid, not mentioned in the letter, in October monitoring. It is a high-priority bid of £1.7 million. The inescapable bid was not met in June, and, if it were to fail again, I suggest that it would be a criminal fault on our part. The victim support programme for groups is already heavily oversubscribed. The VSS has commitments to groups and individuals of £10 million plus £800,000, and there is an additional £350,000 for successfully assessed bids, such as the one in my constituency from Ards Phoenix. Groups that tick all the boxes to secure financial backing and have been told, “Yes, you qualify for support” have also been told, “But there is no money”. We are talking about eight groups and £350,000.

It also means that there is not enough money for the VSS to offer to the bereaved and their children the relief that it wants to through the two schemes that it prefers: respite and education and training. Even if the October monitoring round were to yield that £1.3 million of inescapable bid money, the problem remains, because it will not cover all the ministerial commitments made to the OFMDFM Committee. For example, on phone calls, Ministers committed to maintaining a 24-hour callback to all VSS clients. Currently, some calls are fielded by Access NI. I am glad to have had the support of Committee members last week when we made it clear that this was no way to treat vulnerable people. You cannot overstate how difficult it is for some vulnerable people to pick up the phone. It is not right that they have to go through an intermediary.

Also, some people who had been encouraged to come forward through a scheme approved by OFMDFM in March cannot access any goods or services from the VSS. That will not just sour relations between Ministers and those individual victims and survivors but damage relations with victims' groups — the people who were encouraged to encourage those individuals to come forward, individuals who are now being told that the cupboard is bare.

The bottom line is that the OFMDFM Committee has been given information that makes it clear that, without the full £3 million, OFMDFM feels that the Victims and Survivors Service will be unable to meet the basic needs and demands of victims and survivors. The VSS has been in the planning for 10 years or more, and it was something that I was briefed on in a previous life in 2007-08. However, it is not working, and it is high-maintenance. The current budget forecast for the service is £1.994 million — £2 million to run an organisation that does not have the budget to meet its or the Ministers' commitments and cannot even run a 24-hour telephone service for vulnerable people.

Efficiencies have been introduced. Staff and groups no longer receive training, the Freephone service has gone and schemes are no longer subject to public advertisement. Is that a good thing for victims? That the staff who oversee the processes of the service, which were very heavily criticised by the Committee over the last year or so, are no longer being trained? That there is no Freephone telephone number? That groups are not being trained in the management of money and that people who may be unaware of what they are entitled to no longer receive public adverts? I understand that efficiencies have to be made, but I question whether those are the right areas —

Mr Nesbitt: — in which to make them. The case is beyond doubt: there is a crisis of funding for the VSS. I commend the motion to the House.

Mr Moutray: The Troubles in Northern Ireland wrecked and scarred the lives of tens of thousands of our citizens. Today, many carry emotional and physical scars, with some having to cope with severe physical disability because of the actions of bloodthirsty terrorists. For many, their career was ended, their quality of life significantly reduced and their capacity to support their family limited. Our party has always been and will continue to be committed to ensuring that the innocent victims of the Troubles are not forgotten. However, I find it somewhat ironic that the Ulster Unionist Party has tabled the motion. Look back at when they were in government: the annual spend on victims was around £3 million, in comparison with the £11 million per annum today. That figure speaks for itself in how this party has prioritised victims.

The House must never forget the innocent people who suffered most and continue to suffer. As a party, we have prioritised the needs of innocent victims, and our record clearly demonstrates that we do not run away from the ongoing problems, particularly around the definition of a victim. We also have not compromised on the truth about the past and are making ongoing efforts to obtain special pension provision for the severely disabled.

The Victims and Survivors Service was and continues to be part of a wider infrastructure that has been put in place since devolution in 2007. The Commission for Victims and Survivors is now in its fourth year of promoting the interests of victims and survivors, and the VSS was the final building block of the Department's 10-year strategy that aims to secure a measurable improvement in the well-being of victims and survivors.

Funding for victims' services is at an all-time high. In recent years, owing to the high prioritisation of innocent victims, the First Minister has worked to increase the financial contribution made to the services, which is evident from the £50 million allocated to victims in the current Budget from the Department, Europe and other funding pots. An additional £1.1 million was secured in last October's monitoring round, with other amounts being secured throughout the year.

3.45 pm

Since the restoration of devolution in 2007, we have ensured that funding to victims has more than tripled. The additional services secured have meant that more people are coming forward to avail of services, which in itself is a welcome outcome. However, that has led to an increase in demand, which has led to a need to look at how services are delivered, the need to streamline and ways and means of cutting any fat out of the system.

We have to note the dire financial situation caused by Sinn Féin and its blocking of welfare reform. We see a fine of £80 million this year, so of course budgets will be cut. Front line services will be impacted on if it continues with its wrecking-ball tactics. I want the money allocated by the Department and Europe, and I want it to get to the people who need it. I do not want to see money absorbed into extortionate running costs or administration. I want to see it getting to the innocent victims who still bear the scars.

However, owing to the financial hardships that we are experiencing, the Victims and Survivors Service has been asked to make a 4.4% saving on administrative costs. That has been done in consultation with them and with the regulated framework in place. That is in line with all other arm's-length bodies, and it is aimed at administration costs as opposed to cutting the services provided, as has been indicated by the proposers of the motion.

It is vital that every so often we take stock of the delivery mechanisms and look at how we do things. More victims than ever are presenting themselves to groups that are operating and as individuals to the VSS, and it is important that we address and deal with their needs effectively with as much of the available revenue as possible going to victims.

Despite the wording of the motion, our concern is with the victims, and we do not intend to divide the House on this issue.

Ms McGahan: I support the motion. It is important that we welcome the Assembly's commitment to victims. It was announced that moneys available to victim support services have increased by 50% during the tenure of this Assembly. It should be acknowledged that the Assembly will always want to meet the demand; that is why there is a bid for additional funding in the October monitoring round.

It is important that we look at the complex needs of victims and how we fund those programmes to ensure that victims' rights are protected. In a question to this Chamber, it was identified that, between 2007 and 2011, £33 million was allocated to victims' services. That increased to £50 million in the current Budget. That increase of 50% highlights the commitment to delivering the services needed for victims, and, although budgets are under stress due to the Tory cuts, it also shows that the welfare of victims is still top of the political agenda.

Under direct rule, the budget allocation for victims was £11.8 million. That increased to £33 million in the last Assembly mandate. Since 2011, the budget allocation has grown to its current level of £50 million — nearly five times the budget allocated by the British Government under direct rule.

It is important that victims and survivors have a service that is tailored to their specific needs if we are to bring about the healing that is needed for them to move on from the trauma of the conflict. The Victims and Survivors Service was set up to manage and deal with the issues presented by people affected by conflict. However, many of the individual needs reviews added to the trauma of the victims and survivors and were ordeals for them.

It became clear that the Victims and Survivors Service was not doing what it was designed to do and, while many people have had a positive experience, there were too many accounts of negative, frustrating and humiliating encounters. OFMDFM initiated an independent assessment in November 2013 to look at the delivery of the service through the Victims' Commissioner. The OFMDFM Committee has taken a huge interest in ensuring that the service is fit for purpose. Following the outcome of the independent assessment, the First Minister and the deputy First Minister committed to ensuring that the necessary changes take place and that further proper scrutiny mechanisms are in place to monitor progress on the issue.

It is important to note that there has been an increase in the number of victims coming forward since the establishment of the Victims and Survivors Service. That has led to increased pressures. In that context, the supply of services will need to be looked at. The Victims and Survivors Service has been asked to secure 4.4% of efficiencies from its running costs and from the administration of groups, not from front line services funded under the victim support programme. That is in line with the level of efficiency savings being sought by the Department from its arm's-length bodies and from the Department itself. It is being taken not from individuals' budgets but from groups'. Throughout 2014-15, the Victims —

Mr A Maginness: Will the Member give way?

Ms McGahan: OK.

Mr A Maginness: In a sense, the Member tries to minimise the cuts that are being made to the Victims and Survivors Service, but the reality is that any cut is going to impact on victims and survivors, and that causes real damage and hurt.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Ms McGahan: I do not believe that that is what I was trying to convey. Perhaps if you had listened to what I said, and not to what you thought I said, you might have got the message.

Throughout 2014-15, the Victims and Survivors Service will continue to provide funding to individual victims through the individual needs programme and to victims' groups through the victim support programme. A number of the schemes were opened over the summer to help individuals, including the financial assistance scheme, the care for carers scheme and the support for the injured package. However, the other individual schemes — respite breaks, and education and training — have to be deferred, pending additional resources being secured.

Finally, it is important to note the comments of our deputy First Minister. He said:

"People have to remember that the cutbacks are a direct result of the strategy being adopted by the present coalition Government in London". — [Official Report, Vol 97, No 1, p23, col 1].

He added that, in a meeting with our own finance people, it was stated that, since 2009, there has been no increase whatsoever in our block grant. Go raibh maith agat.

Mr Attwood: Let us stop for a moment and think about this debate and the debate last week. There is actually a point of unanimity in the Chamber, and that is around dealing with the issues of victims and survivors.

Among many proposals that we will make, we propose that, if there is unanimity around Kincora and unanimity around this motion, that should be a point of agreement when we come to the talks that are about to commence over the next number of weeks. We should present to the British Government a united position when it comes to Kincora and the Victims and Survivors Service. We should do that because of the words in the media recently of Damien McNally, a survivor of trauma, who said:

Our answer to Damien and all the other victims and survivors is that, from here, we go into the negotiations with the British Government, and we put centre stage, among many other issues, the past and Kincora, and the past and victims and survivors arising from state violence and the violence of the terror organisations over the past 40 years. Let us at least agree to all of that.

One of the reasons that I put down that marker is this: mark my words, when we go into negotiations over the next while, there will be vested interests that will try to unpick Haass on the past, because the threshold of Haass on the past is far beyond what the vested interests of loyalist and republican organisations and state agencies are prepared to accept or tolerate. The Haass proposals on dealing with the past ask hard questions that require hard answers from those who were in command and control of terror groups, on the one hand, and state agencies, on the other. In the view of the SDLP, during the next round of negotiations, they will seek to unpick the Haass threshold because it is too challenging and too demanding, and it asks too many questions of those who directed terror and state violence over the last 40 years. If we are to live up to the appeal of Damien McNally and many other victims and survivors, we must not allow Haass on the past to be unpicked in the way in which some will conspire to do.

Mrs D Kelly: Will the Member give way?

Mr Attwood: Yes.

Mrs D Kelly: Will he agree with me that we had a very dirty war? I wonder whether all those engaged — all the participants — in that dirty war are really prepared to tell the truth about what they did.

Mr Attwood: What I have just said answers Mrs Kelly's question, which she rightly asks.

It was unfortunate that Mr Moutray tried to reduce the debate, on which we can have unanimity, to one about welfare cuts. However, given that he has raised it, can we take the point and be more constructive? What is the point? It is that one of the arguments that we have to employ with the British Government and which, in my view, was not deployed fully, was that, because of the needs of victims and survivors in the North and the needs of our public generally, arising from state violence and the violence of terror organisations, our profile is very different.

The chief executive of WAVE, Sandra McPeake, said recently, and it has been referred to earlier, that there was a 34% increase in victims and survivors contacting her organisation last year. She said that people as young as seven were contacting her organisation because the trauma of terror and state violence is passing into new generations. What is the consequence of that for us in living up to our responsibilities to victims and survivors? It is to say to the British Government that, when it comes to special provision for those who have been severely disabled — the 550 people who lost limbs or eyes or were otherwise severely disabled — when it comes to welfare need because of the legacy of conflict and that we have increasing numbers of people presenting with trauma arising from the conflict, Northern Ireland is different when it comes to the issue of Budget negotiations. If they want to live up to supporting the needs of victims and survivors of the conflict in this negotiation, let them live up to it when it comes to Budget provision generally and welfare provision specifically. Let us make that a point of unanimity in the Chamber today and a point of argument when it comes to these negotiations.

My final point is this: I ask the First Minister and deputy First Minister to explain how much has been put into corporate expenses and corporate costs of the VSS, and how much has gone into the lives of victims. I also ask the First Minister and deputy First Minister this: why have victims and survivors' moneys not been ring-fenced in the budget of OFMDFM? If the Health Minister makes that call and the Education Minister makes that call, why do the First Minister and deputy First Minister FM not make the —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Will the Member bring his remarks to a close?

Mr Attwood: — exact same call and ring-fence, in their budget, the allocations to the VSS?

Mr Lyttle: I support the motion. I feel exhausted and frustrated on behalf of victims and survivors in Northern Ireland. I will try to play this with as straight a bat as I can, because they are owed that much. Whilst I agree with the motion, its proposers could have had a slightly more humility in recognising the fact that, in fairness to the DUP and Sinn Féin, more has been invested in victims and survivors services than under the Ulster Unionist Party and the SDLP when they occupied the Office of

First and deputy First Minister. In fairness to them, they recognise the progress that has been made in the wider infrastructure that is in place.

The SDLP voted in favour of the June monitoring round allocations that led to the strict financial circumstances that required some of these changes to be made. So, it too is on some shaky ground there. The Alliance Party voted against the proposals for these financial arrangements.

The First Minister said:

“Victims and Survivors are some of the most vulnerable people in Northern Ireland and it is imperative to provide services” that meet their needs. I agree wholeheartedly with that statement, but the test is to see whether reality and that rhetoric meet.

As has been referred to today, in July this year, the Victims and Survivors Service was shocked by OFMDFM notifying it that its budget for the financial year 2014-15 would be cut to £10 million, having had a final expenditure — and I agree with the proposer of the motion in this regard — of £12.8 million for the financial year 2013-14. I understand, and it appears to be the understanding of the proposer of the motion, that that accounts for a 22% reduction in expenditure for the Victims and Survivors Service. That is a significant reduction. It is disproportionate to many of the other reductions that have occurred across the Executive Budget. It begs the question of why other aspects of the Budget have been ring-fenced when a service for what the First Minister called some of the most vulnerable people in our community has not been protected. That does not stack up with the rhetoric of protecting victims and survivors.

4.00 pm

What is the impact of that reduction on victims and survivors? As has been referred to, we have had a cessation of staff training and training for groups, the withdrawal of freephone numbers, and the withdrawal of public adverts that communicated the availability of those schemes to victims and survivors. Under normal circumstances, those might be referred to as efficiencies or administrative costs, but we need to bear in mind that this is a service that has approximately 70 recommendations for improvement further to an independent review of its procedures. Many of those included difficulties with people being aware of the schemes, accessing telephone conversations with advisers, and staff having appropriate training to be able to deal with those victims and survivors. These are cuts that are going against the recommendations for improvements that have been made for the service.

We have also had a cessation in respite breaks, education and training, which means that no services are available for the bereaved or children of the injured. We have also had cutbacks in chronic pain management and psychotherapy treatments. That does not allow the Victims and Survivors Service to have the flexibility to provide for carers, the injured and the bereaved going forward. The consequences are severe. It will attract criticism for Ministers, and it will undermine Ministers' commitment to ensuring that the needs of victims and survivors in our community are met.

The real impact is on approximately 3,000 people across Northern Ireland. It is on bomb victims and people who have been blinded or have lost limbs or have lost loved ones as a result of paramilitary violence. Those people are angry, worried and confused. It is time —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Will the Member draw his remarks to a close?

Mr Lyttle: — for the DUP and Sinn Féin to stop passing the buck to the Victims and Survivors Service and to stop being in denial about the impact of their political decisions on front line services to victims and survivors.

Mr D McIlveen: I welcome the opportunity to speak on this debate today. To be honest, had this debate not been around the very sensitive issues of victims, I am not sure that I, in all conscience, could have supported it. At best, it is a clumsily-worded motion, and, at worst, it is an exploitation of the very people we are trying to protect when it comes —

Mr Nesbitt: Catch yourself on.

Mr D McIlveen: — to dealing with our victims sector.

I hear the barracking from the sides, but I sometimes wonder whether the Ulster Unionist Party is in the same Assembly as the rest of us. On one hand, we have its Minister telling us that he is going to switch off the street lights and take free travel off old people, and, on the other hand, he seems to be completely oblivious to the fact that there are cuts right across the Executive, which have been imposed on us through intolerance and an inability to accept welfare reform across the House.

Mr Nesbitt: Will the Member give way?

Mr D McIlveen: Reluctantly, I will.

Mr Nesbitt: I thank the Member for giving way. Can he name one other arm's-length body under any Department that is facing the 22% cut that is currently being faced by the Victims and Survivors Service? Just one other arm's-length body.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mr D McIlveen: Thank you, Mr Deputy Speaker. I am baffled as to where the figures come from when it comes to these types of motions and debates. As has been highlighted on a number of occasions already, there has been a tripling of the resources to our victims sector since 2007 year on year. On top of that, the very organisation that the proposer of the motion claimed had its funding almost completely cut — the Northern Ireland Phoenix Project — has had funding of £81,000 in the last two years from the VSS.

So, at its core, there is misinformation and a misunderstanding, I believe, of what is happening within the sector.

I really wish that some parties in this Assembly, whenever they get incensed about something, as we all do from time to time, rather than running down to the Business Office and bringing a motion to the Floor of the Assembly that does nothing other than further confuse the groups that have already been experiencing some difficulties, would come and talk to the decision-makers, the ones who are challenged to sort this issue out. You will find that there is a bid for a further £1.3 million in the October monitoring round, which we are cautiously optimistic will be delivered. This is something that we need to bear in mind.

There has been a 4.4% reduction —

Mr Lyttle: Will the Member give way?

Mr D McIlveen: I am sorry. I am just running out of time here. If I do have time, I will bring Mr Lyttle in.

There has been a 4.4% reduction across the majority of Departments. That 4.4% has had to be borne by every body within OFMDFM, including, of course, the Victims and Survivors Service. That has been mitigated, as best as it possibly can be, by dealing with mainly administrative costs. That is where the argument of less awareness comes in. I have to be honest: it does not stack up, because consistently there has been an increase. That is what is putting the additional pressure on this sector — there is an increase year on year of victims coming forward asking for support, and, indeed, we should be giving that support to them. Furthermore, for that criticism to be levelled by Mr Lyttle in particular was quite telling, bearing in mind that the 4.4% reduction to the Justice Department has not been fairly divided between the bodies that are within it, namely the PSNI, which has had over 7% taken off its budget in the coming years. That has been confirmed by the Chief Constable and everybody else involved in the sector.

So, as I say, I struggle with what is behind this motion, other than an attempt to grandstand and scare. Of course, we are used to that in this House. We have to be sensitive to the needs of our victims and survivors. We have to listen to the concerns, and where there are concerns, we have to step up to the mark and deal with them. To deal effectively with those concerns, however, is not to add more confusion, concern and worry than they are already facing.

Mr Hazzard: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I, too, welcome the opportunity to discuss this important issue. As the proposer outlined, these financial restrictions have a disproportionate impact on vulnerable citizens; in this instance, victims and survivors from all sections of society.

A couple of issues are conveniently overlooked by both unionist parties. The first is that their MEP colleagues, Jim Nicholson and Diane Dodds, voted for a cut to the EU budget last year; a budget that gives a huge amount of financial support to local victims and survivors groups.

Secondly, I do not think that you can pick and choose opposition to the effects of austerity. If it is wrong for vulnerable victims and survivors to suffer the effects of austerity, it is equally wrong when it comes to welfare cuts and the extent of cuts to the overall block grant in every section or sector. But we should not become transfixed today on moneys alone. If OFMDFM needs to work to see adequate funds secured, the two unionist parties need to face up to their responsibilities to engage positively on issues relating to the past in the upcoming talks process, for it is they who turned their backs on victims during the Haass proposals.

Mr A Maginness: Will the Member give way?

Mr Hazzard: No, I want to get through this, thanks.

There can be little doubt that current investigative mechanisms addressing the legacy of the past have, for various reasons, impacted negatively on victims and survivors. The HET process, for example, has been deemed to be in breach of the law in how it approached killings by the British Army, and far too many inquests are experiencing difficulties, resulting in serious issues with the length of time it is taking those hearings to be conducted in an article 2-compliant manner. Indeed, the senior coroner, John Leckey, spoke lately about his frustrations. Of course, we have also endured the debacle with the previous Police Ombudsman, Al Hutchinson. Although those issues have been resolved with the new ombudsman, we now face the cuts that were announced by the DOJ last week.

The House should be under no illusion that such inadequacies have inflicted additional trauma on families from every section of our community. Sinn Féin has consistently argued that there needs to be a single mechanism that can deliver to all families, irrelevant of who they are or how harm was inflicted on them. We believe, therefore, that the Haass/O'Sullivan proposals represent the best way forward not merely in addressing the legacy of the past and the harms caused but equally in recognising that inadequate processes, whether by design or through deliberate lack of resources, are also contributing significantly to additional trauma to the bereaved and injured of the conflict.

We also believe that the cost of addressing the legacy of the past should be the responsibility of the British Treasury. I say that in the context of a series of payments made directly from the British Treasury concerning legacy issues within the wider peace process at various times, including, to list some payments, £0.5 billion in severance payments as part of the Patten reforms to policing; a similar payment of £70 million more recently to the Prison Service; £250 million in pensions and other related payments to the RIR; and a £20 million gratuity payment to the RUC Reserve. We believe that, when it comes to the legacy of the past, that approach is the right way forward. I welcome the fact that the Justice Minister, when he appeared before the Justice Committee last week, stated that the Treasury should carry the cost of dealing with the past.

We believe that the British Treasury needs to take responsibility for addressing the mental health effects of the conflict, including supporting the direct needs of victims and survivors who are facing great difficulties. In the words of the Justice Minister, David Ford, last week, "It happened under their watch". Moreover, given that Theresa Villiers indicated that the British Government would be minded to resource the outworkings of the Haass/O'Sullivan talks, surely the House can agree that it is nonsense to fund the addressing of legacy issues through the block grant.

We are content to support the motion. There can be little doubt that there is not enough money in local budgets, including moneys utilised by victims, but, as I said, we should not become transfixed on moneys alone. Victims and the groups that work tirelessly beside them need clarity. They deserve to know the pitfalls that are lurking around the corner, because, to put it quite simply, hundreds if not thousands of lives depend on it. That is why I believe that we need to ensure that contracts to funded groups should continue into the next financial term. In doing so, we can safeguard a continuity of vital support services. Perhaps most importantly, however, we can create the time and space to address weaknesses in the overall strategy for victims. We should be under no illusion that current uncertainty is having an adverse impact on their mental health and well-being. I support the motion.

Mr Spratt: I am pleased to be able to speak to the motion. It is unfortunate that the motion has been brought to the House today, given that the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister will meet the VSS and departmental officials tomorrow to discuss some of these matters. Mr Nesbitt, the proposer of the motion, was right when he said that, when the victims' forum came to the Committee, we were horrified at some of the things we were told by some of the victims and folks who were suffering real difficulties as a result of inaction by the Victims and Survivors Service. The Committee very quickly took the issue to OFMDFM, and, in fairness to OFMDFM and to Ministers, they investigated the matter very quickly. There were some 70 recommendations, and I understand that 47 have been completed.

In the past couple of weeks, we were upset to hear that some of the issues have possibly taken a step back. I would have thought that that was a better way for us to be unified and to deal with those issues in the Assembly. I am glad that Mr Lyttle picked up on funding for victims and survivors and that he recognised that, since 2002, when the Ulster Unionist junior Minister announced only £3 million, that money has increased to £10 million in the past number of years. Only yesterday, the junior Minister indicated at Question Time that the £1.3 million bid in October monitoring was very likely to be accepted. That would bring it up to £11.3 million, which is the same as last year.

4.15 pm

There are a couple of things that we also need to look at. I have raised this consistently in Committee. There has been an increase in the number of people who come forward looking for support for injuries suffered in the past, maybe for chronic pain management and so on. Quite substantial amounts are being paid out, particularly to folks on high-level disability living allowance (DLA) who get some £1,000 a year and another £500 for carers. All of that is being dealt with.

The other issue is that the number of groups in the sector has dramatically increased — by one third. That increase has, in some cases, simply been due to various groups falling out and people going off to start another group. We often hear that, in small areas, many groups offer the same services to the same victims. In due course, all of that needs to be looked at in the round as well.

It is wrong for us to use people injured throughout the Troubles for political purposes, given the very substantial amounts that have come not only from the Department but, as revealed in an answer to an Assembly question, Peace III funding, which allocated £36.7 million to projects that fall into priority 1.2 on acknowledging and dealing with the past. I am pleased that groups in Northern Ireland have been successful in bidding for those funds. There are other funding streams available through the Community Relations Council and the International Fund for Ireland. Indeed, there is also some council funding for groups.

It is imperative that all of us look at the issues that victims are raising. The place to do that is at Committee. Then, as we have done in the past, we can take it to the Department, the Ministers and the service to see how it can best be dealt with.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Will the Member draw his remarks to a close?

Mr Spratt: Let us stop playing politics with victims in the Assembly. It has happened far too often, and, unfortunately, the Ulster Unionist Party has been behind it many times.

Mr Maskey: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I want to make a few remarks in the spirit of how the previous Member to speak concluded his. First, I do not, for a number of reasons, think that it was necessary for the motion to come to the Chamber today at all. Of course, my party has agreed to support it and certainly supports the sentiment behind it.

It is very unfortunate that a number of Members tried to politicise the debate, given that we all know that, in recent times, the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister has been very diligent and robust in examining the situation of the victims sector, not least the problems associated with moving from one system to another. We had the funding issues, which people acknowledged have significantly increased in the past number of years. In Committee, we all took the view that there is an awful lot more that we can and need to do to support the broader victims sector. God knows that we know that there are very many disparities in the sector. I do not want to address any of them. Some Members have already talked about the different categories of victims, as they have been described in the past, with different outcomes. Our job now, in the context of trying to support victims and survivors, is to get them the best service that we possibly can. I look forward to the Minister outlining this afternoon the efforts that have been made in the last number of years, and that will continue to be made, to make sure that we can deliver the best possible services to victims and survivors. As I said, we all understand that they need the maximum volume of quality support and services that we can endeavour to deliver for them.

The proposer of the motion started off by saying that he wanted to be positive, and then introduced quite a number of negatives, not least by trying to excuse himself from walking away from the Haass and O'Sullivan proposals, which, if we had remained united and stuck together — three parties did agree with the proposals — would have given us one hell of a better opportunity to go and get the additional resources that we all agree we need. I rebuke the proposer of the motion for introducing politics into what should be a non-partisan discussion. It is regrettable that that happened. Other Members made their own little remarks and, if any victims and survivors are listening in or read the report of the debate, they will make their own mind up.

Our party is determined to continue to work in the Department, under our leadership opportunity through Martin McGuinness, and through the Committee. Unanimously, across all the parties, the Committee has been resolute in recent times in trying to make sure that the Victims and Survivors Service is fit for the job that it has to do, which is a very difficult and challenging job. We have to try to maximise the resources available for victims and survivors. As I said, I, like other Members, welcome that we have managed to increase the resources. However, we know that the demand continues to increase.

We have to try to continue to monitor whether the services now available are doing the job that they are required to do — there is still much work to do to improve that service — and what additional resources we might need in the time ahead to address the needs of victims and survivors.

By way of illustration, I will deal with one case, which I raised recently at the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister. It involves a lady whose father died when she was 15 years of age. He died as a result of the conflict, in a bar bombing in Belfast. Her brother was shot dead in a sectarian incident. Another of her brothers was seriously injured in the same incident. Yet she, as one of a number of siblings in that family, cannot access any support. That is down to the fact that there is a finite budget, which I fully understand. That is just one sibling in one family, from a range of families, who is disqualified from getting any support at this point — even different levels of support for members of her family — because of the finite budget and the means testing associated with —

Mr Maskey: — accessing resources. Clearly, we all have a job to do — all of us together, across all the parties — to deliver the best services and the maximum resources that we can for those victims and survivors of the conflict who require them.

Mr A Maginness: I do not know what is worse: the false hurt and self-righteousness of the last Member who spoke, the silence of Chris Hazzard, or the excuses put forward by Bronwyn McGahan in relation to the victims and survivors' budget. It seems to me incredible that any of those Members would seek to justify cuts to the Victims and Survivors Service. Whether the cut be 4%, 22% or whatever, it still should not happen. The budget for victims and survivors should be ring-fenced and the service should be improved and enhanced. The problem with the Victims and Survivors Service, which is a great idea and should be a model of excellence, is that it has been dogged by underfunding, in my view, and, in addition, by institutional failings. Those —

Mr Hazzard: Will the Member give way?

Mr A Maginness: Certainly not to the Member who refused — [Interruption.] If the Member wishes —

Mr Hazzard: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker.

Mr Deputy Speaker: I hope that it is a point of order, Mr Hazzard.

Mr Hazzard: Just to clarify exactly what I said in case the Member was not listening —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. That is not a point of order.

Mr A Maginness: If the Member wishes to conduct a debate, he should enter into the spirit of the debate and accept points of intervention so that we can debate these subjects, but of course the Member remains silent and refused to accept my particular point — [Interruption.]

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. All remarks must be made through the Chair.

Mr A Maginness: — during his address to the Assembly.

I go back to the point: there are institutional failings. Kathryn Stone pointed them out in her very detailed report, and those failings remain. Last Friday, I spoke to two victims of the Troubles: one had been injured by a republican paramilitary organisation and the other by a loyalist organisation. Both of them said that problems continue in relation to the service because it is not properly managed. There is no sense of empathy coming from the service to the victims. That is a problem, and it has to be addressed. For example, on the board of the service, there is no representative of victims. There may be good people on the board — I do not doubt that — who are doing their best, but there is no victim on the board. That is an incredible omission. Dealing with victims in a bureaucratic, administrative fashion and developing that culture of dealing with victims is entirely inappropriate. That is what those people said to me, and that is what victims' organisations say to Members of the House. We cannot ignore that. We have to improve the service.

I give credit to the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister for promoting the service and for attempting to act on the report of Kathryn Stone, but an awful lot of work needs to be done. The attitude has to change. It has to move from an administrative organisation to a service organisation — that is clear. We have to ensure that there is proper financing, even in the darkest of austere times and budgeting. We have to guarantee that. We cannot have a stop-start service for victims. You cannot have respite care or educational care and opportunities suspended. There has to be a continuum. If we do not get that across to those who are attempting to provide that service, we are failing the victims —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Will the Member draw his remarks to a close?

Mr A Maginness: — who should be at the very centre of our concerns. I welcome the debate, because it is properly focused on the Victims and Survivors Service. I think that all Members of the House should take note of that.

Mr Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is up.

Mrs Overend: I am grateful for the opportunity to participate in the debate and support the motion proposed by my party leader, Mike Nesbitt.

There are few places in Northern Ireland where the Troubles did not visit and where its effects are not still being felt. Indeed, the constituency that I represent — Mid Ulster — was particularly badly hit by the despicable terrorist campaign. Therefore, it is home to many people who feel the acute effects of that terrible time. Murders were committed by terrorists in virtually every town and village, almost without exception. If I were to list them now, we would be here for a very long time.

In recent years, we have seen significant anniversaries for the Teebane massacre, when eight people were killed and six were left seriously injured, and the murders that took place in Coagh, where three men were murdered in cold blood by IRA terrorists. A long time has passed since those and other terrible atrocities took place, but the grief and pain is still felt by the victims and survivors and their families, especially when one considers that many of those murders have gone unsolved. Indeed, it seems that the terrorist campaign is not long over in Mid Ulster, and we remember the family of the late David Black, who, just over two years ago, was murdered on his way to work in the Prison Service. These are traumas that should never be faced by any person, and because the injuries and bereavements have such a sinister cause they fall on the shoulders of victims and survivors with a heavier weight.

4.30 pm

It is clear that victims and survivors need specialised care and counselling to deal with these traumatic issues, especially as many of them still feel extremely vulnerable. Local victims' organisations provide life-saving services to former members of the security forces, their families and other victims of terrorist violence. The removal of funding from these organisations is having a devastating impact on the individual victims. As has already been said, the cuts are compromising the future status of victims' organisations and their ability to continue to provide vital services. The Mid-Ulster Victims Empowerment (MUVE) project is one such group that is taking up the challenge in Mid Ulster and is providing care in ever more challenging circumstances to the most vulnerable local victims and survivors and their families. I have met members of the group on a number of occasions and have heard at first hand the difficulties that they face on a daily basis just to keep going. They face cuts only months into their first full year of operation. Faced with those cuts, groups such as MUVE will be unable to continue to provide their much-needed services to vulnerable people in Mid Ulster, leaving them to face an uncertain future with potentially devastating consequences for their care.

These groups are already feeling the squeeze, with one group telling me that it felt as if it was facing death by a thousand cuts, as funding is picked apart and withdrawn, bit by bit. To have these groups virtually begging for funding is nothing short of a disgrace, especially when one considers that many ex-prisoners' groups, which played the central role in creating victims, seem to be able to access large amounts of funding with relative ease. Indeed, the Member for Fermanagh and South Tyrone talked about the increasing funding for victim support in comparison with direct rule government times. Seriously, does she not recognise that, instead, a huge amount of money was spent rebuilding Northern Ireland after the long and horrific terrorist campaign by her colleagues in the IRA?

The brave men and women of the security forces who put their own lives and those of their families at risk in countering the terrorist threat over many years have been treated with a lack of dignity and respect by OFMDFM. Why should those who suffered most during the Troubles be asked to pay the price during a time of peace? Surely the needs of innocent victims should be prioritised as a matter of course; they should not find their funding cut or completely removed.

Mrs D Kelly: I want to say a few words in support of the motion and of victims and survivors, who ought to be central in all our thinking, particularly in this debate. As a society we owe a great debt of gratitude to victims and survivors, who, since the signing of the Good Friday Agreement, had remained largely in the background and quite silent on a wide range of matters but were prepared to support the new institutions and the Good Friday Agreement in the hope that their needs would be met.

Over the past couple of days I have read comments from victims who have had some of their services cut, and my heart goes out to them. I see it as a function of OFMDFM, which has a particular responsibility. However, I know from my constituency work, having spoken to victims, that quite often their concerns centre around the security of provision of social housing and of having the adaptations that they require as they age as well as access to health services.

Other Members spoke about the number of victims increasing. Not only are more people coming forward with mental health issues, but there is also the transgenerational impact of the Troubles. We can all see that. Dealing with the past is something that we, as politicians, have to grapple with, and the British Government have a central role in particular, not only in addressing the past but in helping to resource the needs of victims and survivors.

I know that my time is limited, but I did not want to let the debate go without paying tribute to the many men and women who, over the past 30 to 40 years, as workers in the emergency services had to see horrendous sights and attend the murder and maiming of fellow human beings. Often, they are the unsung heroes of the conflict. I pay tribute to them. I am sure that many of them, without being direct victims of the Troubles, suffer from post-traumatic stress. I hope that, if they have needs, they will be included in any assessment of need.

Ms J McCann (Junior Minister, Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister): I am grateful for the opportunity to respond to the concerns regarding the current funding situation for victims and survivors. I can assure Members that addressing the funding needs for victims and survivors is a particularly important matter for us and one that has been and will continue to be given a high priority.

The Victims and Survivors Service was established on 2 April 2012. It is responsible for distributing the funding provided by our Department to individual victims and survivors and to the groups that work directly with them. In making its services available, the service assesses eligibility in accordance with the definition of a victim as set out in the legislation. We fully acknowledge and recognise that the needs of victims and survivors are an important legacy of the conflict. That is why the service was established to help address the needs of that priority group.

At the beginning of the 2013-14 financial year, the opening baseline budget for the Victims and Survivors Service was £11.3 million. We also secured additional funding in last year's October monitoring round of £1.1 million, which increased the funding to £12.4 million. A further £400,000 was secured at year-end, which took the final out-turn for 2013-14 up to £12.8 million, although it should be pointed out that the costs for 2013-14 were temporarily high due to the need to recruit additional client assessors to undertake the independent needs review. Comparable costs for 2014-15 are therefore expected to be lower.

There has been an increase in the number of victims coming forward since the establishment of the Victims and Survivors Service, and that has inevitably led to increased demand for the services. As that demand increases, we need to think about the supply of services and the funding that is available to effectively and efficiently deliver them.

When the June monitoring budgets were delayed, we initially allocated the Victims and Survivors Service a budget of £10 million to enable it to provide support as early as possible into the financial year. Our previous bid for additional resources was not met in the June monitoring round, but another bid has been submitted for the October monitoring round. Whilst the Executive applied a 2.1% reduction in resource budgets immediately in June monitoring and indicated that there would be a further 2.3% reduction in resource budgets in October monitoring, the Executive's June monitoring paper recognised the concerns around resource funding for victims and survivors. The Executive have agreed to return to the issue in October monitoring, with a view to providing additional resources. In the light of that, our Department has made a bid of £1.3 million in October monitoring to restore the service's baseline to £11.3 million, which is the same as the opening budget for 2013-14. In the meantime, the Victims and Survivors Service has been asked to seek to secure 4.4% of efficiencies from its running costs and from the administration of groups funded under the victim support programme. That is in line with the efficiency savings being sought by the Department from all its related arm's-length bodies and the Department itself.

The Department wrote to the Victims and Survivors Service's interim chair to advise the service of its initial allocation for 2014-15 and to set out an agreed policy framework for it to apply operational discretion in the allocation of its budget. The framework indicated that the service should, first, take into account consultation with the victims' forum and the Commission for Victims and Survivors; secondly, continue to protect the victims and survivors with the greatest needs and suffering; and, thirdly, continue to meet the needs of individual victims and survivors.

The need to identify 4.4% of efficiencies has inevitably created pressures, and that has been well documented across all Departments. In the short term, budget reductions will, unfortunately, have a direct impact on the provision of support to victims and survivors.

We are asking that the service look at the administration. We want to enable the priority focus to remain on the maintenance of front line services. It is also working closely with groups and continues to prioritise the needs of individuals to protect those with the greatest needs. To that end, the service is committed to maximising cost savings internally to ensure the minimum impact on its operation through reductions in running and staffing costs.

Following confirmation of its budget on 31 July 2014 and having assessed the information and the next steps, the Victims and Survivors Service wrote to all victim support-funded organisations, informing them of the budget reductions. The service then scheduled meetings with the organisations to discuss their proposals to meet their required efficiencies, and the majority of those meetings have now taken place. I am aware that the Victims and Survivors Service has asked groups to, first, submit details of their proposed efficiencies and, secondly, to state what impact, if any, those savings will have on front line service delivery. Thirdly, it asked the groups to say what impact, if any, the savings will have on the organisation's structure. This information will then be scrutinised and submitted to the Department to assess the overall impact of the funding position.

Throughout 2014 and 2015, the Victims and Survivors Service will continue to provide funding to individual victims through the individual needs programme and to victims groups through the victims support programme. Schemes were opened over the summer to give help to individuals, including financial assistance, care for carers and support for the injured. However, the other individual schemes — respite breaks and education and training — have, unfortunately, had to be deferred pending additional resources being secured. I too have spoken to victims and survivors who have been directly affected by that deferral, and we are looking at that to try to get it sorted out as soon as possible. I am aware of the impact that it has on those individuals and their families.

In moving forward, we will continue to work with the Victims and Survivors Service and the Commission for Victims and Survivors to ensure that the service directs funding to victims and survivors most in need of support and services. Our aim is that, through the implementation of the recommendations in the independent assessment report submitted by the commissioner earlier this year, we will hope to transform the service into a client-centred organisation that is fit for purpose and puts the needs of victims and survivors first. Victims and survivors should receive packages of care that are tailored to their needs and are delivered promptly and professionally. Our vision for the service, as set out in our current strategy for victims and survivors, is to secure the provision of an appropriate range of support services. Victims and survivors' needs are diverse and varied, and we want the service to provide holistic support, including practical needs, and, if this is not immediately possible, to signpost them to an appropriate statutory body. Support should not stop at that point, and victims and survivors should be assisted through the process, where possible by dedicated caseworkers who act as a consistent point of contact.

We recognise the capacity that exists in the sector across all groups in delivering support and health and well-being assistance to victims and survivors. I commend those groups, which have for years delivered those services directly to people directly affected by the conflict. We acknowledge and thank them for their commitment to improving the lives of vulnerable people who have been affected by that conflict, and, in going forward, it is important that we maximise the outcomes for victims and survivors from the resources that are available. I am aware that the commission's review of funding is under way, and I reiterate our focus on getting this right for victims. We thank the previous commissioner for her guidance on this matter, and we look forward to working with the incoming commissioner and the forum in the months ahead as we seek to build on the progress made to date.

I want to deal with points that were brought up during the debate. One of the main issues was in and around the moneys and the budget, because, obviously, that was what the debate focused on. I will come to the real source of the financial difficulties that we have to face across all Departments. We hear daily how this impacts on people in front line services and on people in our communities. The fact is that there has been a reduction in the block grant in real terms, and it has remained static at £10 billion over the years. Some Members have alluded to that. In terms of austerity and cuts to services, that is really what is at the heart of this debate.

4.45 pm

We need to look at a holistic way in which we can take forward how we deal with the legacy of the past and, in particular, deal with the victims and survivors in the way that we have a responsibility to.

Some Members brought up the Haass/O'Sullivan proposals. The compromise proposals that were brought forward had a holistic way of dealing with the legacy of the conflict and with the past. One of those proposals looked at the victims service, not just how it is run on a daily basis but how we can develop it and make it better. So, there are issues there. We have to look at it in the round. One Member mentioned bringing it into the talks that will hopefully be taking place soon and into negotiations.

It is about the budgetary position that we find ourselves in. I do not want to politicise the debate today because it is very important because it concentrates on the needs of victims and survivors. I hope that the House will send out a clear message today that we need to look at the austerity measures that are being implemented and the way that they are affecting services, because it is impacting on the most vulnerable, and who could be more vulnerable than victims and survivors of the conflict?

I am glad of the opportunity to respond to the debate. I hope that I have dealt with most of the Members' concerns, but, if not, I will certainly write to them if they want to ask me any more questions.

Mr Elliott: Obviously, it raises some emotion when we talk about victims, and rightly so. We need to concentrate on the actual victims. Some people here today have attempted to politicise the issue, but we want to bring the focus clearly back to the victims. The financing and monetary aspect of what gets to the victims is essential. I accept the principle, as some people have indicated, that more and more victims, individually and through groups, have come forward in recent years. I accept that. That is obviously a case for additional funding being required or at least that we ring-fence what is already there.

There are very few of us in here, and I would hazard a guess that most of us probably know of victims individually and personally and know them very well. Indeed, many of our families have been affected by the Troubles over the last number of years. I still find it extremely difficult and do not accept the premise that those who created victims and carried out the murders in our society should be put on a level playing field with those who they made victims of. It is extremely unfortunate that we are still in that position. The front line services and the support for those who are suffering must come first and foremost. We need to concentrate our focus on the people who continue to suffer the trauma and injuries of the past years and decades.

I was concerned about media coverage last week in which a whistle-blower criticised OFMDFM advisers and said that interference from OFMDFM special advisers in the Victims and Survivors Service is causing internal chaos and that there is justified anger and frustration among victims of the Troubles. The whistle-blower from the Victims and Survivors Service claims that departmental advisers are treating victims as pawns. The Victims and Survivors Service source said that service delivery is a near impossible task for Victims and Survivors Service staff, with the chaos primarily due to the relationship with OFMDFM. The proposer of the motion, my colleague Mr Nesbitt, highlighted the difficulties in the Victims and Survivors Service and the problems that we have encountered there with so many people leaving their positions and posts, and I am not sure where exactly it is all going.

Somebody from this side said that they supported the proposal of the Victims and Survivors Service, and they gave credit to OFMDFM for bringing forward that service, and I do as well. The problem is that something has gone wrong somewhere in-between, and that needs to be resolved. I did not hear any realistic proposal today to resolve it. I find that to be a major difficulty on this side, and I am sure that it is no different for most Members here today. There is a frustration, and it is not just felt by me as a Member of the Assembly; that frustration is felt by the victims out there in the community.

As constituency representatives, we have people from victims' groups and individual victims coming to us with their queries, and some of their stories are heartbreaking. You hear how they have been excluded almost from society for years and how they have not had fair treatment. The compensation system that was administered during the Troubles was frightfully depressing. Some may have lost a husband. I know personally of a lady who was left with three young children, and she was offered pitiful compensation. That woman and her family were left basically to fend for themselves for decades. What way was that to treat this society's victims? I think that it was pitiful.

I will move on to some of the comments from Members. Mr Nesbitt proposed the motion, which, I am pleased to say, seems to have widespread support, if not a lot of criticism from Members here. However, it appears to be getting widespread support. Mr Nesbitt highlighted very constructively the difficulties in the Victims and Survivors Service. Hopefully, that constructive criticism will bring forward a better proposal and a better way forward. This is not about trying to score political points from the Ulster Unionist Party's point of view. This is about trying to do the best that we can for victims. I hear people laughing and smirking, and I know that Mr Spratt, Mr McIlveen and Mr Moutray were critical of the Ulster Unionist Party, but I suppose that I would not expect anything else. We are well used to that now; they feel that they must criticise the Ulster Unionists at every opportunity.

Mr Spratt: [Inaudible.]

Mr Elliott: Sorry, do you want to intervene? I will give way.

Mr Deputy Speaker: All remarks should be made through the Chair.

Mr Elliott: Mr McIlveen accused us of exploiting a group of people. I will tell you, Mr McIlveen, through you, Mr Deputy Speaker, that if anybody knows about the exploitation of victims, it is your party. Your party brought them to the gates of places where there were talks, to try to stop progress in this Province. Shame on you or anybody who carried out that act.

Mr Spratt: That is the boy who was giving him a lecture a minute ago.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr Elliott: Sorry?

Mr Spratt: Giving a lecture a minute ago.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Would all remarks be made through the Chair, please.

Mr Elliott: Members of Sinn Féin — Ms McGahan and, I think, Mr Hazzard and others — were critical of unionists. All that we are trying to do is to do the best for victims.

Mrs D Kelly: Will the Member give way?

Mr Elliott: That is clearly all that we are trying to do. I will give way.

Mrs D Kelly: Would the Member agree that, over the last couple of days, thedetail.tv website had an excellent report where victims' voices had a platform? Surely this debate has helped with that process and given victims' voices an airing, which many people would perhaps prefer that they did not have.

Mr Elliott: I thank Mrs Kelly for that intervention. I have not seen that particular issue, but I have seen quite a number of productions that have been made by victims' groups, where they have been able to tell their story, and that is a crucial aspect for many victims, although not for them all. However, it is crucial for some of them to tell their story, because people have not listened to them for years. Therefore, that is vital, and if this adds to that opportunity, and if those people want to take the opportunity, that is fine; let them do that. However, behind it all, those who are suffering injury and trauma must get help and support, and we must make sure that they have every opportunity to get the medical attention that they need.

Mr Lyttle said that he wanted to play as straight a bat as possible, but he went on to criticise everybody and every party except the Alliance Party, so I am not so sure how that straight bat was being played. However, he made sure that he had a go at everybody else, although that is his right.

Mr Lyttle: I thank the Member for giving way, and that is a fair point. One of the key issues —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Will the Member draw his remarks to a close?

Mr Lyttle: Does he not have 10 minutes?

Mr Deputy Speaker: Apologies; one more minute.

Mr Lyttle: One of the key issues seems to be the accuracy of the facts. According to OFMDFM figures, the baseline budget for VSS has been reduced from £11.3 million to £10 million. Does the Member agree that that is roughly an 11.5% reduction, and will he offer OFMDFM an opportunity to advise where the figure of 4.4% comes from?

Mr Elliott: I will take the Member's word for that. Obviously, OFMDFM can respond to that in its own good time.

In the debate, we need to focus on the victims. We need to ensure that they have a positive outcome and that they get the best help and support that we can possibly afford them. Let us not turn this into the type of political quagmire that we often get into. Let us support the victims.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly notes the current funding crisis being faced by the Victims and Survivors Service; recognises the grave concern that this is causing for many victims, survivors and support groups, leading to some of them having to close, and the genuine hardships being faced by many victims as a result; and calls on the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister to take urgent action to alleviate this situation.

Mr D McIlveen: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. As a result of over-regulation that was backed by one of the Sinn Féin Members of the European Parliament, 1,000 jobs are in jeopardy in my constituency today. I want to know how we could expedite a motion —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. That is not a point of order. I ask the Member to take his seat.

Mr D McIlveen: Further —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Order. That is not a point of order. The Member may wish to raise it through the Business Committee.

I ask Members to take their ease for a few moments as we change the top Table.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Dallat] in the Chair)

Motion made:

*That the Assembly do now adjourn. —
[Mr Deputy Speaker.]*

Adjournment

Jobs: South Down

Mr Deputy Speaker: The proposer of the topic will have 15 minutes, and all Members who wish to speak will have approximately seven minutes.

Mr Rogers: In line with the current Programme for Government's key goal to develop the Northern Ireland economy, I welcome this opportunity to focus on how the objective is materialising in the constituency of South Down. I thank the Minister for being here to respond.

It is widely recognised that the growth and development of the private sector in Northern Ireland is much needed as we endeavour to build a strong, sustainable economy. Freeing ourselves from the shackles of public sector dependency to realise a more vibrant economic reality is, without doubt, our shared ultimate goal. The local economy in South Down is no different. At the outset, I place on record that this is not a debate centred on handouts or subsidies. It is about ensuring that the constituency of South Down is brought to a level playing field, enabling it to maximise its full economic potential. It is about ensuring that the constituency has access to the economic tools and levers that will allow it to contribute to the long-term economic well-being of Northern Ireland.

We believe that South Down has a distinct role to play in the development of a sustainable Northern Ireland. Magnificent landscapes, a proven culture of entrepreneurship, a highly educated workforce and a reputation for hard-working people are only some of South Down's many strengths. There is, unfortunately, no getting away from the economic realities of this time. We continue to be overdependent on the stimulus brought about by public sector employment and investment. The injection of public money into any constituency continues to be a major economic driver and crucial to the success of that local economy. It is, therefore, imperative that the distribution of public funds is carried out in a way that is fair and equitable.

Due consideration must be given not only to the immediate benefit of any spend but to its potential long-term economic return.

5.00 pm

One such major government spend is public sector employment. Like many places in western Europe, Northern Ireland has traditionally directed the majority of its spending to capital cities. The issue of relocating public sector jobs to peripheral regions has occasioned much debate over recent years. The Bain report of 2007 found that public sector employment in Northern Ireland accounted for 31% of employee jobs and 13% of the overall population. Bain went on to conclude that, on balance, there is a strong case for the movement of some public sector jobs in Northern Ireland. He added that that would help to create a better regional economic balance by encouraging wealth creation and reducing economic disparity. We also believe that relocation has the potential to reduce social deprivation. Therefore, I declare my intention to continue the debate on the basis of the knowledge that the argument has been made and won on the urgent need to relocate public sector jobs fairly.

This year, along with my colleagues from South Down Chris Hazzard and Jim Wells, I had the privilege of hosting an event in Parliament Buildings. Headed up by Down District Council, it was specifically on the issue of public sector jobs in South Down. During the event, Mr Gerry McBride, the assistant director of customer relations at the council, highlighted the fact that Down District Council, along with its partners, was trying to encourage indigenous investment and create jobs in this difficult economic period. Those efforts, he said, could be undermined if the council continued to lose public sector jobs. We lost DVA jobs recently, and the ongoing haemorrhaging of services at Downe Hospital is having a major effect, as is the loss of the tax office in Newry.

Down District Council proposed during its presentation that the district, along with other areas with a low economic activity rate, be designated a preferred public sector development area. The new designation would be non-statutory, but it would be adopted policy for the public sector in Northern Ireland. I add my full support to that sound proposal. If adopted and utilised, it would assist in managing balanced economic growth across all regions. It cannot be right, for example, that departmental jobs are available in south Belfast at a ratio of one job for every 12 people, whilst in South Down the ratio slips to one job for every 227 people.

South Down is the most beautiful constituency in the North, and it continues to bear the brunt of the economic disparities highlighted in the Bain review. With a population of 108,000 recorded in the 2011 census, the latest economic and labour statistics for the region make grim reading. In the 16 to 64 age group, employment is about 66%. The median gross wage in Newry and Mourne is £427, which is 7% lower than the figure for Northern Ireland as a whole; in Down district, it is £341, which is a staggering 25% lower than Northern Ireland as a whole. With figures like that, it is not surprising to learn that Newry and Downpatrick were identified by Professor Bain as places that require investment.

The child poverty unit in the Department for Work and Pensions told us that, in August 2011, there were 4,660 children aged nought to 15 living in poverty in South Down. That equates to almost 20% of the children in our constituency. The statistics on child poverty are not simply numbers that we can allow ourselves to glance past, and any small or limited reference that I make to child poverty can only begin to skim the surface of the chilling reality and the consequences that it has on individual lives. For the purpose of the debate, however, I ask whether the long-term economic well-being of Northern Ireland can be on track when one in four of our children lives in poverty.

Not only has the constituency of South Down been unfairly treated in the distribution of public sector jobs, it has been overlooked by many of our Ministers at the Executive table. Opportunities have been denied that would have allowed South Down to develop and showcase its offering. The first of one or two examples is the Giro. South Down, particularly the Mournes, has proved to be one of the most desirable cycling regions in Northern Ireland. The natural beauty of the landscape, together with the unique contours of the road infrastructure, played a large part in hosting successful events such as the Etape Mourne in 2012. Like many others, I believed that the inclusion of the Mournes on the Giro map was inevitable. I look forward to the legacy of the Giro — the Gran Fondo. Could such an event eventually come here? The Somerset hills have seized the initiative for next year.

The second is the Irish Open 2015. There is no danger of me overstating my excitement and delight that the Irish Open will be played at the prestigious Royal County Down course in May 2015. Once more, I place on record my unreserved appreciation to the official hosts, the Rory Foundation, and to Rory McIlroy himself, whose brainchild it is, for making this dream event a reality. I also thank the foundation for its support for the Cancer Fund for Children and for the beautiful new Daisy Lodge in Newcastle. That is a charitable cause that is close to my heart. That is a true example of Northern Ireland bringing together one of its finest resources — Royal County Down — and one of its finest citizens — Rory McIlroy — and creating a world-class event. Together with the local community, I am eager to ensure that we maximise the potential return of that event in our local economy, but it concerns me that the Executive do not seem to have a joined-up approach to this prestigious event. Recently, I asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure about the support available for groups and for fringe events. She told me that that was the first time she had been asked about that, and I look forward to taking that a wee bit further with her when I meet her in the near future.

Thirdly, I bring to you the most scandalous failure to the people of South Down in the history of the House: the Narrow Water bridge. Each time that project is mentioned, we hear the inevitable blame games beginning, much talk of those from other Houses letting us down and shallow announcements of commitment and support being banded about. Just let me remind you of the figures: South Down was denied €14 million on that occasion. That was at a time when our economy, particularly the building industry, was on its knees.

When we speak of tourism and acknowledge some of the great work that has had the support of the Executive, we are not on the same page as other tourist destinations on this island, never mind further afield. Maybe we have something to learn here. There is a marked difference between how the two kingdoms in Ireland are promoted: the kingdom of Kerry versus the kingdom of Mourne. Take one of the success stories here, namely the Titanic project. That has been a game changer, whereas in South Down we are in the second division. It took millions to create the Titanic project, but the beauty and unique landscape of the Mournes and St Patrick's country is free. Where we differ is in the marketing strategy. The Titanic project's marketing strategy is up there with the best, whereas, despite the best efforts of our local councils, the marketing of South Down is minimal. Take, for example, Saint Patrick's Trail, which starts in Armagh and transverses the constituencies of Newry and Armagh and South Down before ending up in Downpatrick. That project has the economic potential to be our Camino, but we do not even have signs on the motorway to indicate where the trail is. We have the product in the St Patrick's Trail, but again we fail to market it.

What about something like a cable car up Slieve Donard? Oh yes, we are expert at finding reasons why things will not work rather than being open to all the possibilities.

I repeat my earlier statement that this is not a debate that centres on handouts or subsidies. There are numerous examples right around our constituency of success stories, from the sole trader to large-scale employers. Just look at one of those that you are familiar with, Minister: the Kilkeel Strategic Partnership, which supports business development, creates employment and increases tourism opportunities. Local businesses have put their money where their mouth is to create a vision for Kilkeel harbour in 2020. The partnership hosted the First Minister and many of his Executive colleagues, but the project needs a little financial support from the Executive to make the vision a reality.

Far more needs to be done to ensure that South Down is offered a fair chance to address the economic disadvantages it faces. We are primarily a rural constituency. Our farming and fishing industries need ongoing support to market their products and realise the potential of Going for Growth. I acknowledge the improvements in broadband infrastructure, but there are still many “not-spots”, particularly in rural areas.

The announcement of 800 PwC jobs is very welcome, but why are such announcements only ever for jobs in Belfast? Why is that not an option in South Down? How many of the recent job announcements have been about jobs in locations outside Belfast? There is increasing gridlock in the city, whilst our rural areas are allowed to wither. My children, like many others, have had to leave the area to find work. Emigration affects every family. The lack of employment is attacking the social fabric of the countryside. As George Bain indicated many years ago, we need to give our rural dwellers opportunities for local employment if we are really concerned about health and well-being and building a vibrant economy.

The mindset of those placed at senior decision-making levels needs to change. I call on my colleagues from South Down to stand up and join me in sending a message to our Ministers in the Executive and to Westminster that we are united in ensuring that the constituency will receive a fair deal in all decisions going forward. Under our watchful eye, we must collectively ensure that South Down is safeguarded against further disparities. More has to be done to allow the constituency to develop and grow its economic potential. Finally, I ask the House for its full support in moving ahead with an agenda to set up a preferred public sector development area, as I outlined earlier.

Ms Ruane: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Chomhalta Seán Rogers as an ábhar seo a árdú inniu.

I thank my colleague Seán Rogers for bringing this Adjournment debate to the House.

We are all here to support jobs for South Down. The first thing we want is the jobs that are currently there retained. We want public sector jobs and support for the growth of the private sector. We also want to see our small businesses supported. To date, I have to say, there has been an abysmal failure on the part of those in the Executive responsible for job creation. I agree with Seán Rogers about the importance of the location of public sector jobs and organisations in South Down. I pay tribute to my colleague Michelle O'Neill, who has said that she will decentralise the fisheries office. I understand that that is on target for 2015, and I think that it will make a significant difference because we all know how difficult it has been for our fishermen and fisherwomen. That sector has suffered very badly. Michelle O'Neill has also been very proactive in supporting farmers. I welcome that and encourage her to continue to do that.

I am certainly very proud of my record in education and the significant investment that I put in not just in South Down but right across the North of Ireland. During the four years, we put in £500 million in the capital programme alone, and South Down got its fair share of that. As a result of that, we have new schools right across South Down in all the sectors: Irish-medium, state, Catholic maintained and integrated. I welcome that. We should not lose sight of the fact that, when you put new school builds into a constituency, you get jobs on the ground from the companies that are building them and the continuation of employment for teachers and staff. I know that John O'Dowd is continuing that, and South Down has got its fair share in relation to that investment. You just need to look at the number of schools right across the constituency and, indeed, at those on the borders of the constituency and in neighbouring constituencies that service the children and young people of South Down. So we stand on our record.

South Down needs social and affordable housing. Every one of us, every day of the week, gets representation in relation to the lack of social housing. Ministers have failed to invest in social housing, and I do not think that any of us would argue that there has been enough investment in social housing.

It is a pity that the Minister of Health, who is from South Down, is not here today. I hope that he stands on his public pronouncements. I was at meetings with him in relation to the Downe Hospital. He was there arguing the same points as I was arguing, and I look forward to his support for the A&E unit and continued support for the Downe Hospital. The Downe Hospital would not have happened without Sinn Féin; it was Bairbre de Brún who made that decision. Sinn Féin has a strong policy of decentralisation and not just having Belfast and the bigger centres of population getting support. We look forward to Jim Wells. We will give him a couple of weeks in office, and we look forward to him giving the support to South Down that it deserves. Daisy Hill Hospital may not be in the South Down constituency, but it certainly services the people of south Down, and we want to see continued investment there.

5.15 pm

Tourism is a key driver for the South Down constituency. It is an area of outstanding natural beauty; on that I absolutely agree with my colleague Seán Rogers. To date, there has been a failure in investment in tourism. Invest NI is not investing as it should. South Down still does not have proper hotel provision. Accommodation is the biggest spend of any tourist, and yet we do not have proper provision because there has not been proper investment. We do not have the bridge at Narrow Water. We will have it. I and other colleagues are on a group that meets regularly in relation to that.

We need to see cross-border marketing — not the way in which the current Minister is acting, standing with her back to the border and pretending that we do not need to work in an all-Ireland way. Of course we need to be working in an all-Ireland way. The Minister really needs to do a better job on that. Her approach leaves a lot to be desired.

We have a greenway in Mayo that is a phenomenal success. I do not see the support for a cross-border greenway that we should have, and I hope that we do get it. We have one from Omeath to Carlingford, and I would love to see that continuing across the bridge into Newry. Let us try to have a ring of Carlingford lough in the same way as we have the Ring of Kerry.

Broadband was mentioned. People have been contacting me from all areas of South Down, particularly rural areas. They cannot build businesses because they do not have broadband. Why do they not have broadband? Maybe the Minister can tell me. I know that recently — she can sneer and snigger, as is her form —

Mrs Foster (The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment): I was not sneering.

Ms Ruane: — and try to interrupt across the House, but she will have her opportunity to speak. She needs to explain to people who are trying to set up businesses. I recently met someone who wants to set up a farm business. They do not have broadband. They cannot sell on the Internet because they do not have broadband. Their children cannot access it. I look forward to hearing what the Minister is going to do in relation to that.

Small businesses are very critical of the lack of support and the hoops that they are expected to jump through. Small businesses will be the backbone of job creation, and I would love to hear what the Minister will do to protect and support our small businesses.

I agree with my colleague that there is not enough investment in South Down, and we need to see a step change in what Invest NI is going to do and, indeed, I will be interested to hear what our Health Minister is going to do in relation to South Down. Go raibh maith agat.

Mr Hazzard: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I, too, welcome the opportunity to speak in this important Adjournment debate, and I pay tribute to Seán for securing it. In fact, jobs, economy and health in South Down have been debated in recent months, which is good to see.

PricewaterhouseCoopers (PwC) recently published quite a patchy economic forecast for the North's performance as a whole. It is probably relevant to describe the economic performance of the Down district and south Down area as a whole as patchy as well. It is, perhaps, best summed up by the differentials in the ability of Newry Council to attract foreign direct investment compared to Downpatrick.

A lot of work has to be done. It does not all rest at the feet of the Minister, who is here to talk to it. A lot of it requires local solutions. Public services no doubt play an important role in Down, and I too welcome Michelle O'Neill's decision to decentralise public sector jobs. I have been in touch with the Justice Minister to ensure that the future of Downpatrick Courthouse is protected; it plays a central role in the town. However, we do not need to put all our eggs in the basket of decentralisation of public jobs. Although that is important, we need to look at rebalancing our economy in a way that suits the attributes and skills of people in South Down.

What do I think is the potential in South Down? There is no doubt that tourism is one of the main drivers that we need to harness, especially now, with the new councils coming together. For the first time, the Mourne, for example are in one district council area that will be controlled by one tourism department, which is very important. I probably remain to be convinced, though, of the validity of having a cable car up Slieve Donard. I will await the report, but we need imaginative ideas such as that from local sources.

We have very strong arts and crafts and artisan food and drink industries that need support. As has been outlined by Members, we have perhaps the most scenic natural environment of anywhere in the North — indeed, across the island. The link has been made twice already between the kingdom of Mourne and the kingdom of Kerry. There is absolutely no reason that the kingdom of Mourne and the wider south Down area should not be hitting the same tourism figures as the likes of Kerry in the South. Another aspect is the potential for film and TV investment. We already see the great success of shows such as 'Game of Thrones'. We need to be looking to build on that.

Another sector is agriculture. There is huge potential in our agrifood industry. I welcome the impetus that Michelle O'Neill has given to the protection of small farmers and small farming industries. In South Down, and for our hill farms especially, that is very important. What she is doing is great. I also pay tribute to her for the establishment of the Fishing Industry Task Force. That industry, and the North's fishing capacity, is more or less wholly situated in South Down. We engaged with the Minister last year over some of the difficulties with fishing. I am delighted that she established the task force. It is starting to work through a lot of the issues that exist in the industry.

For us to harness the potential of those issues, we need to ensure that the infrastructure at the base is right. We certainly need to look at the area of education, in which there has been great success. We need a greater focus on STEM and on the globalised market for subjects that our kids are doing nowadays. We need to build a sense of entrepreneurship among our pupils in school. To that end, I pay tribute to the former Education Minister for the ideas of the revised curriculum and the entitlement framework. That helps to keep people in education and gives them an understanding that success can be achieved through not just the traditional arts or the traditional professional and public routes into university but through starting an indigenous business locally in South Down.

We also need to see great improvement in infrastructure, especially in transport connectivity. We have gridlock on the streets of Downpatrick. We have what can only be described as a not-fit-for-purpose road from Newry to Downpatrick, which are the two major towns in the constituency. Of course, the Belfast to Downpatrick road is gridlocked in Ballynahinch and Saintfield. Those issues need to be overcome, as does the issue of communication networks. We have already heard about the broadband and mobile coverage. That needs to be seriously addressed, although I do pay tribute to the roll-out of the broadband provision over the next 12 months. We are going to see quite a big difference being made to the ability of local businesses to be able to connect to the World Wide Web.

We also need to harness the potential for all-Ireland infrastructure in South Down. Too often, we used to stare across Carlingford lough at each other and wonder what the other side was doing. With the memorandum of understanding now in place between Louth County Council and Newry and Mourne District Council, we need to build on that. There is no reason that the Cooleys, Slieve Gullion and the Mourne cannot become a premier destination. My colleague talked about the importance of the greenway. There is absolutely no reason that we cannot have a greenway from Carlingford to Kilkeel.

This ties into the wider issue of the need for economic levers. The VAT issue for local hoteliers and the hospitality sector in South Down is very important, as is that of licensing hours. Every year, popular holiday destinations such as Newcastle are forced to shut down over the Easter weekend and turn away people who want to spend money on having a glass of wine with their lunch or dinner, and everything else. We seriously need to address that.

I welcome the chance to have been able to talk about this here today. I agree that public services and the decentralisation of public jobs are important, but we need to be careful not to rely on those as the stimulus for our local economy. They will not be. They play an important part, but we need to ensure that we have a very fertile ground for private entrepreneurship in the area.

Mrs McKeivitt: I welcome the opportunity to discuss jobs, or, maybe more precisely, the opportunity to create and promote jobs, in my constituency of South Down.

We live in a unique part of the world. The Mourne country, with its rolling mountains and sea, is one of the most beautiful parts of Ireland. We are very dependent on certain sectors for employment, and farming, fishing, the construction industry, tourism, shipping and aerospace have taken a heavy hit over the last few years. We need help, and this House can help by ensuring that the VAT rate, for instance for the tourist and hospitality sector, is cut to match the rest of Ireland to give our people who have invested in the industry a chance. It can also help by having a more-targeted focus on our constituency, especially on emerging sectors like the creative industries and renewable energy.

I am delighted that the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment has joined us for the debate. I commend her for tourism initiatives that she and her Department have championed and supported. I speak about projects such as bringing the Irish Open golf championship to Portrush last year and to Newcastle next May, with the real possibility of attracting the British Open here in the near future.

The World Police and Fire Games and Giro d'Italia were major successes, not just for what they generated during the events but for their legacies, the tourism entrepreneurship, new start-ups and business opportunities that grow from the confidence of hosting such global events. But Minister, like Oliver says, we want more.

I am aware that you were well-received at the British Ports Association annual conference hosted by Warrenpoint Harbour Authority in Newcastle last week. Much of the discussion during the two-day conference was about the success of Warrenpoint's first cruise ship in July and the real opportunities that that presents for the whole area, the port and the two young men who arranged for the Saga Pearl II to call in on its way home from Iceland to Southampton.

That exercise, or test, was not necessarily groundbreaking when compared with Belfast or Derry ports' cruise figures, but it proved that Warrenpoint had the capability to accommodate cruise ships. The unique selling points of Warrenpoint were appreciated and with help from the House and your Department, cruise liners on Carlingford lough could be a regular feature. It is something that we would all love to see.

There are many new and exciting opportunities presenting themselves regularly in the south Down region, many of which we do not capitalise on. One close to my heart, which my colleague Seán and others mentioned, was the Narrow Water bridge project. That would have created many construction jobs and boosted a struggling tourism industry. We cannot afford to miss out on real opportunities like that. As a matter of urgency, the south east coast master plan should be examined closely and delivered on.

Mr Hazzard: I thank the Member for giving way. Would she agree that more also needs to be done to include the GAA in tourism events organisations and advertisements? The Member no doubt was at the Down county final at the weekend. We have thousands of people attending these popular events, far more than a weekly attendance at a local soccer match, yet they never appear in any tourism advertisements.

Mrs McKeivitt: Absolutely. The contribution that the GAA brings across Ireland, even across the whole world, is something that we have to recognise. It is an idea that the House should be trying to grow and promote the GAA at all times.

I have spoken about the prospects presented by supporting our creative industries. The star of the acclaimed film 'Philomena', Dame Judi Dench, spent four days filming in Killyleagh, Bryansford and Rostrevor. Rostrevor is also known as Narnia country. C S Lewis, in a letter to his brother, confided explicitly:

"That part of Rostrevor which overlooks Carlingford Lough is my idea of Narnia."

This part of the world should be promoted as a great film location. Not just the community of South Down but also the House should be able to promote that more.

I know that there are budgetary restraints. It is a difficult economic environment and money is tight; so we have to think outside the box in supporting South Down. But one thing I have learned is that when you have the product, you have to be able to sell the brand. We are asking that South Down job creation be put back on the map. We cannot direct the wind but we can adjust the sails.

Mr McCallister: Like colleagues, I thank Mr Rogers for bringing this important debate. I am also grateful to the Minister for attending. I know that she has other pressing issues on the agenda this afternoon.

5.30 pm

Like colleagues, everyone wants to see job creation in our constituency of South Down. We want to see how we deliver that. The main thing is going to be how we get balanced growth. It has been a problem across the entire UK. We have been very London- and south-east-centric and well out of kilter with other regions. How do we develop the region? When we come to the Northern Ireland level, how do we make sure that all of our job creation is not just Belfast-centric or in Londonderry? How do we make sure that creation and innovation spreads out to the various constituencies and regions of Northern Ireland?

We do have things that are going well for us, which we need to tap into and build on. Colleagues have mentioned that. We have a great tradition in the public sector to do that. How do we get the share of decentralised jobs? We do not want to be solely fixed on that. How do we really drive the private sector? How do we use the Minister's Department to work in conjunction with the current councils and the new councils to drive that?

We must look at educational attainment, which has been mentioned. We need to look at that and ask why. Look at the last labour force survey in 2012 and the three council areas that touch on the South Down constituency. For those achieving NVQ level 4 and above, the Northern Ireland average is 27.9; Banbridge is at 21; Down is above it at 36, and Newry and Mourne is below it. For those with no qualifications, Banbridge is above the average. We need to address those issues and failings in our education system. What are we not tapping into? What are we not delivering?

People have talked about higher-value IT jobs. We need to question and address what we are doing in South Down. In answer to a recent question to the Minister, I was told that, in the last three years respectively, Invest NI has secured 28, 12 and seven jobs in South Down. Compare that with some other constituencies. In Lagan Valley it was 12, 71 and one. In Foyle it was eight, 212 and 200. Are we getting our share of balanced growth that we all want to see in South Down? We want to see it in South Down and across Northern Ireland.

Another answer is about tourism accommodation and Invest NI's role in investing that money. South Down's grand total over the last three years is £39,629. That compares to Fermanagh and South Tyrone, at £842,000 and North Antrim at £384,000. What are we not tapping into? I know that in the Minister's reply she may well point out that some of that is demand-led. That is a valid point, but what are we not doing in South Down that is not tapping into it? Are we not getting the linkages between Invest NI, the councils and local businesses to access that funding and make the point that we should tap into it?

Tourism is one of our big drivers. We have the St Patrick's Trail, the Mourne mountains and the Brontë homeland. I would appreciate it if the Minister would give her view on this specific question: are we now in a financial situation that could put Newcastle's Festival of Flight in direct danger because of the cuts to the Tourist Board support that drives that? If we are attracting 80,000, 90,000 or 100,000 people to Newcastle, losing that would have a devastating effect. Also, in the Banbridge district we need to address the failure to secure some of that funding despite applications. Their funding has been very much behind the curve on that. Will the Minister address the Festival of Flight and where we are at, in economic terms, on that?

Farming and fishing are two huge mainstays of the South Down economy and indeed of the Northern Ireland economy. We have to look at how we tap into some of the problems that the industry now faces with the EU sanctions against Russia and the cutting off of certain markets, the replacement of markets and how we find markets. The herring industry in South Down is facing particular difficulties, as I am sure that the Minister is aware. The price of milk is going down as a direct impact. How do we tap into the EU compensation package and make sure that we get that down onto the ground? That will have a huge impact on the South Down economy and indeed the Northern Ireland economy when you spread that out. The Minister will know that agrifood is a huge driver with the Going for Growth strategy.

I also point out that we will be coming to the end of the small business rate relief scheme. It is vital that we find a replacement for that scheme. It has brought into councils like Newry and Mourne District Council something like £3.5 million of savings on business rate relief. We need to look at how we do that and at the difficulties that our town centres, particularly those of our small towns, have faced. We need to look at how we do all of those things to make sure that we have a balanced, joined-up approach to delivering jobs and prosperity to the South Down constituency. I think that we should all be up for that. With the support of the Minister, councils and Members in this House, that is something that we should be keen to deliver on.

Mrs Foster: With your indulgence, Mr Deputy Speaker, before I turn to the important issue of the economic challenges in South Down, I place on record my concern for those people in Lisnafillan in Ballymena who have received the devastating news tonight that their jobs have been lost and that the JTI plant is closing as a direct result of the European directive on tobacco.

There is no doubt that much finger pointing will be done over the next couple of days. My concern is about the many, many families, some of them with two or three members who work in the factory, who have had that news delivered to them tonight. I give them my assurance that I will do all that I can to work with them and JTI to minimise the damage that has been done to the local economy and indeed to the whole of the Northern Ireland economy because, as I pointed out in a letter to Jeremy Hunt just last week, actually, there are 200 companies in the supply chain of JTI, which benefit to the tune of £20 million each year. Now, that is gone. This is a huge story tonight. It is right that the House should take account of it.

Turning to South Down in particular, I know that many in the Chamber share my concern at the recent closure of the driver and vehicle licensing offices in Northern Ireland and the resulting losses at Rathkeltair House in Downpatrick and indeed at the tax office in Newry as well. That was something that the SDLP Members and I had been very much involved in, given my connection with Enniskillen and Mr Bradley's connection with Newry. Unfortunately, that has now come to fruition.

Turning to private sector jobs, for which of course I am responsible along with Invest Northern Ireland: between 2009-2010 and 2013-14, Invest has made some 1,147 offers of support to businesses in the constituency. That amounts to £14 million of assistance and will lead to an associated total investment of some £60 million. The support of Invest has led to the promotion of over 1,200 new jobs, including those from the Regional Start initiative. We very much acknowledge the work that goes on locally with a lot of small businesses and a lot of people who are starting their own businesses across the South Down constituency. I want to thank my official from South Down who is here this afternoon and will have listened very carefully to the points that Members made about Invest NI and small businesses.

Many people in the region have benefited directly or indirectly from the new employment opportunities that are being created by Invest NI. One such company, of course, is Finnebrogue, which is creating 65 new jobs in Downpatrick following an offer of support of £233,000. Another is Clonallon Laboratories Ltd, a Warrenpoint medical supply company — a very innovative company — that I had the pleasure of meeting recently. It provides a wide range of custom sterile procedure packs, surgical instruments and medical supplies to the health care industry and recently won a contract to supply £250,000 worth of procedure packs in Kuwait. I hope that other orders will come from that region in the near future. We were able to help to support seven new jobs in management, administration and production roles in Clonallon, allowing it to build up its capacity to look for those rising sales.

Our help and support extends, of course, beyond job creation, and many programmes and interventions are aimed at improving the overall competitiveness of the economy. In South Down, over the last five years, that has resulted in just under 170 offers of support to help companies to engage in research and development or to invest in improving the skills of their workforce. It was Mr Hazzard who said that it was important that we have an element of self-help and look to the future to make sure that we have the appropriate skills in place. That is very much the case.

We continue to prepare and to make available land for economic development in South Down. Of the 280 acres of land we hold there, 67 acres are available to support economic development in sites like Carnbane business park. That significant investment is a clear demonstration of our commitment to South Down by holding or developing land for industrial use in locations where the private sector is unwilling or unable to do so. We proactively market those sites to foreign and local investors. I have been encouraged by the interest shown by businesses in acquiring land in Carnbane business park, with enquiries received from three businesses about locating to the new lands at the business park. We will continue to work with those interested parties.

As with most regions, South Down has not been immune to the impact of the economic downturn. A number of businesses have either had to reduce their workforce or take an unavoidable decision to close completely. Initiatives like the jobs fund provide support to business owners and new business starts across Northern Ireland. Where one or two jobs are available, we can come in and help to try to sustain jobs and to tackle rising unemployment. We have been proactive in addressing the economic downturn and have sought to provide fast-track support to help companies across Northern Ireland to deliver new jobs on the ground as quickly as possible. In South Down alone, the jobs fund has promoted 223 jobs, with 194 jobs created by March this year. Initiatives like the jobs fund and support for R&D projects encourage companies to bring forward activities that will enable them to compete more effectively and successfully, particularly in markets outside Northern Ireland. We are certainly not complacent about seeking to work with businesses outside our city centres and are engaging regionally to help businesses in more remote locations to grow and to develop.

Invest and our regional delivery partners are actively engaged in work across the constituency to encourage people to think about starting their own business. In the last five years, that has resulted in over 800 new locally owned businesses being set up in South Down. Most recently, Invest has been working with the local councils. The question asked this evening was this: what is it that councils can do to help themselves and to engage with Invest NI? I welcome those comments. As you know, when the new powers move from Invest NI to the councils, they will be more integrated on job creation. There is a real need, therefore, to have that close working relationship between Invest NI and the new councils. I hope that they will take the opportunity. We have been working with the councils, through the local economic development measure, to improve the capability of businesses in the area. That has been a good success. A collaborative approach to job promotion is the best way forward. I have said many times before in the House that, if people just stand back and think that they can leave it to Invest NI to create jobs, it is simply not going to happen. You need the right ecosystem and the right attitude in the area to create those jobs moving forward. I commend the work done with Down District Council, Newry and Mourne District Council and the Chamber of Commerce and Industry to progress those important economic issues.

5.45 pm

A lot of wide-ranging issues were raised today, and I will not get to some of them. The Member who said that the Giro not coming to South Down was a ministerial omission knows that that is not correct. We had many discussions about the issue, and it was the decision of the organisers that they would set the route. I hope that the Member will acknowledge that we had a good meeting on trying to take forward the Giro in the future, which we will continue to do. The Irish Open was mentioned, which is a very exciting opportunity that I look forward to next year. The fact that the Rory Foundation has come in behind the Irish Open opens up a lot of other opportunities.

I have raised the subject of brown tourist signs on the motorway with the Minister for Regional Development on a number of occasions. You will know the old arguments as well as I do. There is an argument that too much information on road signs confuses drivers. I take the view that, on major road signs, there is plenty of room for information, particularly about tourism. DRD and I have just agreed a policy, so I hope that you will see more openness on that matter.

Colleagues and I have been working with the Kilkeel Strategic Partnership. I think that there are huge opportunities there. I am pleased to see the way in which people in Kilkeel, particularly some of the fishermen's organisations, have taken up the opportunity to work with the renewable energy sector there, which I was able to reflect when talking to the British Ports Association at Slieve Donard last week. I commend Warrenpoint Harbour Authority for all the work that it did on that conference. It was a real shop window for the area, and I know, having spoken to the delegates, that they really enjoyed being in Newcastle and Warrenpoint. They were in Narrow Water Castle for one of their events and really enjoyed that as well. For many from the mainland, it was their first visit to Northern Ireland, and they said that they would come back because they really enjoyed not only the hospitality but the conference and what was achieved at it.

I spoke to members of Warrenpoint Port about the development of the marina there. They have achieved planning permission and are keen to seek European funding. It is something —

Mr Deputy Speaker: Minister, you have had 10 minutes.

Mrs Foster: Am I over that? Sorry, I was not even looking.

Mr Deputy Speaker: It is very interesting, but conclude at some stage.

Mrs Foster: I had much more to come. I encourage Members to get behind Warrenpoint marina, which is a really good project and one that could be achieved, unlike the Narrow Water bridge, which unfortunately came out as uneconomic and therein lay the problem.

Ms Ruane: Shame.

Mrs Foster: The Member can say "shame" from a sedentary position. Her nastiness and rudeness never cease to amaze me, but there we are. I am happy to work with Members who want to be proactive and positive about the region rather than sticking their head in the sand.

Northern Ireland Assembly

Monday 13 October 2014

The Assembly met at 12.00 noon (Mr Principal Deputy Speaker [Mr Mitchel McLaughlin] in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

Standing Order 20(1): Suspension

Resolved:

That Standing Order 20(1) be suspended for 13 October 2014. — [Mr Weir.]

Thanks to the Speaker: All-party Motion

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I take this opportunity to extend my personal best wishes to Mr Hay. With the House's indulgence, I would like to say a few words. Members will note that our friend has written to all Members, and I know we share his regret that medical advice does not permit him to be with us today to allow us to pay tribute to him in person. It is probable that most Members will have difficulty remembering the precise circumstances in which he took the Chair and all he had to deal with throughout that period, and he deserves credit for leaving seven years later having retained warm respect throughout the political spectrum represented in the House and beyond.

Hailing from the same city, although he came from Londonderry, William Hay and I were friends for years before we came to the House. All who know him would say that he brought the same natural, pragmatic approach to seek agreement and avoid confrontation, which he used to great effect in Derry, particularly through his essential role in the discussions that delivered the highly successful parades agreement in our native city. He also brought those qualities to the Chamber, and it was absolutely the style that was required at that time.

If some Members think that it is daunting preparing to face the other side of the House during difficult debates, they should consider how it feels to be in the Speaker's Chair on those occasions.

In preparing for predictably difficult debates, he would have had a wise reflection on how best to handle the situation or, in his words, to keep the House between the hedges. For example, if a debate was going to be difficult and he had to take procedural decisions, he personally felt that he should see that through. Even if it meant a marathon session in this Chair, he thought that it would be unfair to ask the Deputy Speakers to carry that particular burden.

William Hay, as we have all found out, is a very difficult man to fall out with, but there were things that clearly vexed him. He would frequently be annoyed if he felt that disrespect was being shown in the House. He would also be annoyed if his efforts to reach agreement to resolve issues were not reciprocated, or if someone clearly was seeking confrontation. Most of all, his sense of fair play would be offended when Members would seek to draw him into party political rows or involve him in issues in which they knew that he either had no responsibility or could not respond to.

We should also mark today the work that William did to have the Assembly reach out and to engage with the wider community. Many of his personal initiatives brought thousands of people through the doors of this Building, and Members know that meeting them was one of the parts of the jobs that he enjoyed best. Every year, he themed his St Patrick's Day dinners, not for Members or the great and the good but for community and voluntary causes. I know that many who came to them had never been here before and deeply appreciated the recognition of their work. Members will know that, in 2012, William hosted an open day to mark 80 years of this Building. Over 5,000 people visited on that one Saturday alone.

Finally, Willie would often sit in this Chair and call for good temper, courtesy and moderation; on occasions, until he was hoarse. These words, ultimately, sum him up as a man: he has served this House magnificently. We wish him a speedy recovery from his illness and a very happy retirement and best wishes for the future.

The Business Committee has allowed up to one hour for the debate, and each Member will have three minutes to speak.

Mr P Robinson: I beg to move

That this Assembly records its appreciation of the great distinction with which Mr William Hay has occupied the office of Speaker; congratulates him on the skilful manner in which he has upheld the dignity of this House; appreciates the wisdom, good humour and patience with which he has presided over its affairs; and expresses its warmest thanks to Mr Hay for his many services to this House; and unites in wishing him a long and happy retirement from the House.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker, I beg to move the motion in my name and that of other leaders of the House. I want to pay tribute to the work of former Speaker William Hay. I think that all of us will appreciate your comments, as someone who came from a very different background to William. Indeed, I have known William literally for decades, and I was convinced when the late Lord Bannside — Dr Paisley as he then was — appointed William to be our nominee for the post of Speaker that he would do an outstanding job. I also knew that doing that outstanding job, because he would regard it as essential to have an air of neutrality, would take him out of the normal party politics. That, in many ways, was a loss for the DUP but a gain for the Assembly.

He was the first Speaker elected by the Assembly. I think that all the others who sat in that Chair were appointed by the Government. William steered the Assembly through what has been a new era of politics in Northern Ireland, and he did so with skill, with good humour and, at times when it was necessary, with firmness. His door was always open to anyone, and, no matter what political party they supported, he dealt with them on an equal basis. Assembly Members placed their confidence in William the day he was elected as Speaker, and I believe that he repaid that confidence every day he was in office since then. As some of my colleagues have discovered to their cost, William has been scrupulously fair and impartial in his role.

The role of Speaker, of course, goes beyond work in this Chamber. You have pointed out, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker, the enormous workload that the occupant of the Chair has outside the sittings of the House, and William's work, I believe, is a service to the community in Northern Ireland and was carried out in an exemplary way.

Indeed, William proved to be a superb ambassador for the Assembly at home and abroad. He has played an essential part in the history of the Assembly. I am certain that everyone in the House wishes him well as he battles to return to full health. We have much to be grateful for, given the manner in which he presided over the House, and we give him our thanks for that role, which is best summed up in the words of the motion, which refers to the "great distinction with which" he carried out that role.

Mr M McGuinness: I, too, rise on behalf of my party to express our deepest thanks and appreciation for the tremendous leadership shown by William in the role of Ceann Comhairle, or Speaker, of the House. I had the privilege of nominating William as Speaker and have never regretted that decision for one minute. He never did anything that would make me regret such a decision, and I think that he has served the House with tremendous distinction, great fairness and incredible impartiality. I think that all of us recall those occasions when he was called on to effectively rebuke members of the party to which he had an allegiance. He was always very approachable, very friendly, very courteous and very civilised, and it was a real honour to do business with him.

Like the Principal Deputy Speaker, I come from the same city as William, and although we had different political allegiances, we always understood that, coming from where we came from, whether we called it Londonderry or Derry, that was our home and the place where we lived. Great efforts were always made by all of us to try to work in the best interests of the city and, generally, when we came to a House like this, in the interests of everybody in the North of Ireland.

Not many people know this, but William worked with my late father in Brown's foundry, an ironworks in Foyle Street in Derry, and the humble beginnings that both he and I came from have stood us in good stead in how we absolutely need to be civilised, courteous and very respectful of everybody in the House. He performed his duties in the House in an exemplary fashion. The way he represented the House outside the workings of the institutions in the Assembly was also exemplary. His contributions to foreign situations, whether in eastern Europe or travelling to represent us in the United States of America, were always done with great distinction. So, I am very proud, on behalf of my party, to say that we have no difficulty whatsoever in endorsing the message of thanks and appreciation to William and to wish him a very speedy recovery from the illness that he is presently battling.

Dr McDonnell: It is without reservation that I, too, on behalf of myself and the SDLP, endorse the motion before us today. I have to admit that it is with some sense of loss that we all approach today's circumstances and feel how unfortunate it is that, due to illness, our beloved Speaker was not able to announce his retirement here in person. We all wish Willie well. We hope and pray that his health improves and that, in due course, his recovery is complete. We want to thank him sincerely for the tremendous job that he did here.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker, I echo your comments that Willie was a very difficult man to fall out with. He worked with all of us, and, even at times when we were disagreeing, he found civil ways of handling disagreement; perhaps civil ways that the rest of us would not have the patience to pursue.

He was always courteous and helpful. Others have referred to his exemplary chairing of the Assembly and to his efforts to bring consensus and stability, as well as to his carrying out the plethora of other duties that attach themselves to the role of Speaker.

12.15 pm

I will leave that and endorse what the two Members who spoke previously said, and, indeed, what you said, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker, and make a few personal comments. To me, Willie Hay was an honest and honourable man in everything that he did and said in his dealings with all of us. He did an outstanding job as Speaker, in every aspect of the job's responsibilities. He was open, honest and fair to all, and, I hasten to add, he was open, honest and fair even to those who were awkward and, at times, unhelpful and uncooperative. I was amazed continuously at how tolerant he was, and it is important to put that on the record. I certainly would not have had the patience.

He was a listener, and his door was always open to give and take advice. Frequently when I bumped into him in the corridor, he would say, "Why don't you come in and have a cup of tea with me? There are a few things that I want to run past you". That was a unique and very useful characteristic. It meant that, in his running and chairing of the Assembly in his job as Speaker, his antenna was sensitive. He was fully aware of the feelings and needs of everybody. In my conversations with Willie, he had a very clear vision of the Assembly's full potential and the potential of devolution to bring about significant progress and prosperity to all our people, particularly the people of a city called Derry.

He worked to develop a North/South parliamentary assembly —

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I remind the Member of the three-minute rule.

Dr McDonnell: — against the odds, and he overcame many obstacles. He hosted so many outreach events here to make the Assembly inclusive. His work in Kosovo and the Balkans has already been mentioned. Bringing the experience of the Assembly to that troubled region was very valuable and worthwhile. I wish him a very rapid recovery and a long and peaceful retirement.

Mr Nesbitt: I rise on behalf of the Ulster Unionist Party to give thanks to Speaker Hay for his years in the Chair and to express some sadness that those years have come to a premature close.

To some extent, the big challenge of the Speaker is to be the embodiment of the Chamber and to hold up a mirror to the other 107 MLAs and have them, to some extent, say, "Yes, you are a proper and true reflection of what I aspire to as a Member of this legislative Assembly", as well as to be an interface between the Chamber and civic society, and a very public face at that.

That is a measure of the gargantuan challenge of being a successful Speaker. Mr Hay rose to that challenge through maintaining the integrity of the Chair and also through an endless pursuit to establish and cement good relations with all Members. He allowed considerable scope on occasion, but he was equally unafraid to make a stand when a stand were necessary. Those who know

Willie Hay will not be overly surprised at that position, because we are talking about a man who does deals — sometimes very difficult deals — honestly and in a manner that allows all the people whom he represents to reap the rewards. I think beyond the Chamber to his key role in the negotiations that made parades disputes a thing of the past in the city that he represented for no fewer than 33 years in council and here at Assembly level.

I had the pleasure of a professional relationship with Mr Hay for many of those years in my former role as a broadcast journalist. He was always an interesting and welcome contributor to television political debates, because he would always try to shift the focus, with the aim of a positive outcome. With the currency of the Chamber at a low, we all have good reason to thank Willie Hay for the dignity that he brought to the position of Speaker. We wish him well. We particularly hope that he recovers sufficiently to be able to take his seat in the House of Lords. I hope that that is a motivator for him as he returns to good health.

At this point, I also want to mention another Member who is resigning through ill health, Sue Ramsey. Ms Ramsey was nothing if not courteous and welcoming when I joined this Chamber in 2011. We both sat on the Enterprise, Trade and Investment Committee, and, in the early years, you could not get a paper between us on what we thought about the importance of the social economy. I know that my colleague Sam Gardiner felt the same about her work on the Health Committee.

The Ulster Unionist Party would like to wish both Sue Ramsey and Willie Hay future good health.

Mr Ford: Mr Principal Deputy Speaker, on behalf of my colleagues, I endorse the remarks made, including most particularly those remarks that you have made from the Chair, of good wishes and thanks to your predecessor in the sense of his once occupying that Chair.

There is no doubt that Willie Hay took on a very difficult task when he became the third Speaker of this Assembly. He was our first elected Speaker, but he proved that being elected to office did not stop him carrying out his duties impartially and fairly. He served this House well in the variety of roles that you have talked about. We all saw him in the Chamber as he sought to control us at times when we needed control. He did so generally with good humour and in a way that defused tension when, otherwise, it was quite possible that debates could have become very difficult.

When people had meetings in his office, he was always keen to ensure that things ran smoothly and everybody was treated well. It is perhaps a measure of the success in the period since 2007 that I think that I was in the office less to see Mr Speaker Hay than to see his immediate predecessor during those difficult times of suspension, but it did not mean that there was any less courteous a reception or any less understanding for the points that I wished to raise. Whether it was, "A quick word with David", or a, "Can I have a chat, Minister?", he was always a model of courtesy and of complete propriety in the way that he conducted his office.

He was also an exceptionally good representative of this Chamber. You mentioned the way in which he opened up this Building and ensured that it was seen as welcoming to many people, not just to the great and the good who normally come to events, but he opened it up as widely as he could to the people of Northern Ireland.

He was always courteous in this Chamber, probably courteous to some who did not deserve it. He was always generous of his time, and he was always a man of integrity. Probably, once or twice, he got things wrong, but we knew that he was doing his best to ensure that this Chamber functioned and could be representative. Sadly, 107 of us probably need to learn lessons from him in the way that we conduct ourselves over the coming months.

There is no doubt that his own roots in Donegal and the work that he did in Derry were very significant in the part that he played in producing a better Northern Ireland, because there is no doubt that, as the man who represented Londonderry in talks about parading in Derry, he had a very significant role. Indeed, not that long ago, someone said to me, "What North Belfast needs is a Willie Hay". Sadly, there is only one Willie Hay. He did his job in his city, and he did it to great effect.

Let us remember him and thank him, not just for what he did as Speaker here, but what he also did for the wider community in Northern Ireland; wish him a good recovery; and trust that, at some early stage, the voice of Derry and Londonderry will be heard in the House of Lords.

Mr Campbell: I am very conscious that this is not an obituary piece, because people keep talking in the past tense. I have probably known William Hay personally for longer than anybody in this Chamber. He was my election agent on a number of occasions, and he and I were both elected to the City Council in Londonderry in 1981. In fact, his mother was also a councillor at that stage and, within a year of our being elected, on the weekend before I was to propose his mother for Mayor of Londonderry, she passed away suddenly. Politics may well have been different otherwise, as, a short time after that, Mrs Hay may well have been proposed as a Member in the 1982 Assembly. As it turned out, I was proposed because of her unforeseen death.

William Hay and I were close colleagues for a very long time and continue to be so.

I was with him in hospital a few weeks ago, and, of course, he was his own self. He was still cracking jokes at anybody who crossed his path, and there was a joke to be had at the expense of anybody who came into the ward, who passed him or who said anything.

On his taking the role of Speaker, I knew that he would set aside whatever distinctions he may have had and that he would adopt and adapt to the role with relish. He did that, as many found to their cost. He adopted his position as the Speaker, and, as we have heard in the tributes thus far and as, I am sure, the concluding tributes will attest, he was and is a remarkable man.

We look forward to him making further progress with his health. We also look forward to the progress that he will make into the House of Lords, hopefully in the next few months. We hope that he will continue to make significant and substantial contributions there. This House will be at a loss with his departure, but another House will gain.

Ms Ruane: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas le William Hay, mar rinne sé obair an-tábhachtach mar Cheann Comhairle an Tionóil seo. I thank and join others in the House in paying tribute to the work that Willie Hay — William Hay; I think of him as Willie — did during his time as Speaker.

I was trying to remember the first time that I met William Hay. I think that it was in 1989, when he was the Mayor of Derry. I had a trade union activist from Nicaragua over at the time, and William Hay met him and very courteous. The next time that I had dealings with William Hay was when I was Minister of Education. He always chaired what were at times very fraught debates fairly and well. I would like to put that on record.

In more recent years, I have worked very closely with him in my position as Whip of my party and as a member of the Assembly Commission, the Business Committee and the North/South Inter-Parliamentary Association, meetings of which have taken place in Dublin and here in Stormont. I enjoyed very much the robust debates in all those organisations. Obviously, we have very different political viewpoints, but the debates were always very courteous and there was a respect for listening to the views of others.

I remember travelling with him to a meeting with the Scottish Parliament's assembly commission with other members of the Commission. That was when I really got to see the William Hay with the dry wit. He was really looking forward to getting home after a busy few days. I really enjoyed his company during those few days and I know that others did as well.

I join others in wishing him a very speedy recovery. We look forward to seeing him again in these institutions.

Mr Weir: When a colleague of mine in North Down Borough Council stepped down, I described the occasion as being the closest he would ever get to being at his own funeral and hearing the tributes without actually being dead. There is a bit of an air to this and, to slightly misquote Shakespeare, I come to praise William Hay, not to bury him.

As others have mentioned, William came here with a wealth of experience. I cannot claim to have the same length of knowledge of him as either of the first two Members from our party who have spoken. I have known William since 1998 and served with him, first, as a Back-Bencher for nine years. His unique background has been mentioned. He is a Donegal Protestant whose political life, particularly as a councillor, was that of serving as a unionist in a city with a majority of nationalists. He brought his wealth of experience to the Chair when he took up the role of Speaker.

Mention has been made of the good humour that he brought to the role and the gravitas and the good order that he sought in the Chamber. At times, we have seen other institutions become bear gardens, and, given our past and the fractious nature of some of the issues that confront us, there was always going to be a danger of the Northern Ireland Assembly descending into one. William Hay has very much been the glue that has held us together to ensure that debates were held in good order. As was mentioned, that meant, from time to time, being tough on particular Members. Many of my colleagues behind me at times experienced frustration with the Speaker. In many ways, that is a sign of the strength of the man: he was prepared to be fair and impartial even if it meant annoying those who had been his colleagues.

The role of Speaker is a little like that of a minister of religion. Some people think that the only role a minister performs is on a Sunday morning with the sermon and the service, but a lot of William's work was behind the scenes in the Speaker's office, where he smoothed over issues that arose. That has led to the smooth running of this place.

I have had the honour of serving with William on the Business Committee and the Assembly Commission, on which he gave sterling service in representing the Assembly to the outside world, encouraging people in Northern Ireland to engage with the Assembly and, on a range of difficult issues, always trying to show patience to different political viewpoints and parties and, when possible, trying to reach a situation in which there is consensus.

This is not the burial of William Hay but an au revoir, because he will move from this place to the House of Lords, where he will be able to bring that wealth of experience and make a solid contribution.

Mr P Ramsey: I thank you, Principal Deputy Speaker, for the opportunity to acknowledge Willie Hay's contribution.

As the SDLP Whip and as a colleague and friend from his constituency, Willie's contribution has been obvious to me. Only for his help, guidance and cooperation, we could not do our job as Whips. As Members said, "honesty" and "honourability" are the key words that the Speaker brings to the table. He brought passion, integrity, dedication and impartiality. As Caitriona Ruane said, he worked tirelessly at times when it was difficult, not only by working at the Assembly Commission and the Business Committee but by helping to bring to the table a working North/South Parliamentary Forum. His relationship with the Ceann Comhairle in Dublin was exceptionally good, and if we did not have that relationship, we would not have the forum. That forum is meeting soon.

There is also no doubt of Willie Hay's immense contribution to his constituency. The last violence in the centre of Derry was in 1999 and caused almost £2 million of damage. At that time, Willie Hay accelerated the process when others were challenging him for what he was doing, namely his engagement with the Apprentice Boys, the loyal orders, other political parties and the community and voluntary sector in the city. That brought reconciliation, resolve and compromise to the parades issue in the city. There is no doubt that Willie Hay will go down in the annals as the one person who inspired and brought people along with him.

I visited Willie at home recently, as other Members have done, and he is not at himself. However, as Gregory said, he still holds the same charm and dry wit. As a good friend, I say to him and Doris, his wife, that I wish him every health and happiness in his retirement. Lord Hay of Ramelton, as he will hopefully be known, will be a champion and advocate for the Derry and north-west areas as he takes up his seat in the House of Lords. On behalf of the SDLP, I wish Willie and his wife, Doris, the very best in the future.

Mr Beggs: I also support the motion. I add my appreciation of the work of Willie Hay not only in the Chamber but, as others said, in the other roles that are outside the administrative aspects of the duties of the Speaker's office. As an Assembly Member and as a Deputy Speaker, I have seen Willie perform those duties, and I have seen things from the other side. We all owe him our gratitude for the work that he carried out when he was in the position of Speaker.

"Due courtesy and moderation" was almost a catchphrase that Willie used frequently and encouraged the Deputy Speakers to use.

They were important because they had a calming role in the Assembly, trying to de-escalate situations for the betterment of the Assembly but also for the rest of the community, because there can be ramifications in the wider community from how we behave in this Chamber.

Willie Hay always tried to resolve issues amicably. Frequently he was successful, but we can be an awkward bunch and it is an impossible task always to do so. But he made every effort to try to do that for the benefit of the Assembly.

As Deputy Speaker, I saw some of the challenges that he faced in the decisions that he had to make. He carried out his duty honourably and wisely. Some Speakers from other devolved Chambers were interested in the different style he used — and, I would argue, the success that that style brought for the benefit of this Assembly. His good humour, as others mentioned, was a key factor. He skilfully managed things and defused situations, avoiding conflict.

I wish Willie Hay a speedy return to good health so that he will be able to enjoy a quality of life and more time with his family, and to contribute elsewhere.

Mr G Robinson: I have had the pleasure of knowing William Hay for over 30 years. Today is a sad day for Northern Ireland politics as William takes a less prominent role in everyday politics. His honesty, integrity, impartiality and humour will be missed by all in this House.

Since I first got to know William, he has never changed from the affable character whose word was his bond and who loved helping others, whether in this Chamber or further afield. Neither he nor I envisaged him taking such a prominent role in Northern Ireland politics, but the challenge came and he successfully stepped up to it.

We are all aware of his reasons for stepping down. I join the chorus of good wishes that follow William into retirement, if we can call it that, as I am sure he will take his seat in the Lords and be an active Member of that place. That does not, however, make up for the loss that this Assembly will suffer as William retires. No offence to whoever will be his successor, but William Hay will be a hard act to follow.

The people of the Foyle constituency have lost a strong and dedicated advocate, but we all acknowledge William's wish to have a slower pace of life. To William, I can honestly say "You will be missed", but I hope his retirement is long as he more than deserves it.

Mrs Cochrane: I echo the comments of those who spoke in acknowledging Willie's role as Speaker. In the Chamber, I always welcomed his fair and balanced approach. Indeed, I had direct experience of him being politically impartial and dealing firmly with a member of his own party when behaviour had been somewhat unparliamentary.

As a member of the Commission, I had direct experience of the work he did as an ambassador for the Northern Ireland Assembly not just in Northern Ireland but further afield. I travelled with him to Kosovo, along with the late David McClarty, a year or so ago. Once I managed to tune into their particular sense of humour, I had a good relationship on a personal level with them, too. We had a positive trip, and the manner in which he conducted meetings with senior members of the Kosovan Assembly and their Prime Minister could not be faulted.

I take this opportunity to wish him well and a return to good health as soon as possible.

Mrs Foster: Mr Principal Deputy Speaker, with the greatest respect to you and your Deputy Speakers, I will miss William Hay in this place. William and I had a very good friendship. We represented constituencies from the west of the Province and always worked closely. Very recently, I was in the city at his request to open a flower festival at Clooney Church of Ireland. He used to call on me to come along to a number of things in the city, and I was more than happy to do so.

He represented his constituents tirelessly. Whether it was the Memorial Hall, St Columb's Cathedral or some small issue up in Irish Street, Willie was there, always making sure that his constituents' voices were heard.

As a Minister, I will, of course, miss William's friendship and guidance. He was, as we heard, a fixer of problems who looked for solutions, and that should not be underestimated. The House will miss that.

As we heard, he had international standing. He went to Kosovo, chaired the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association, had many events here and many people visited this House of ours. Indeed, he opened it in a way that had never been achieved before. A lot of people have been through the doors of Parliament Buildings who would not have been here had it not been for William Hay's insistence that this was to be a place for everybody in Northern Ireland and, indeed, for all our visitors from overseas.

I join colleagues in wishing William, Doris and their family every success. I hope that he has a speedy return to good health, and I am sure that I will still be lobbied effectively, albeit from the House of Lords.

Mr Kennedy: It is an honour and privilege to join others in paying tribute to Speaker Hay. William Hay has had a long and distinguished political career, especially in the north-west, in local government and in the House. I have no doubt that it will continue, hopefully, in the House of Lords.

It would be unwise for anyone to underestimate Willie Hay's political shrewdness and abilities as a political operator. It can honestly and fairly be said that he made a very positive contribution to public life in Northern Ireland, not least as Speaker. We heard about his outreach work. As a Member and a Minister, I found him to be fair, impartial and open-minded. He tried to encourage common sense in the Chamber, which is no mean feat.

He has also been a great ambassador for the Assembly and Northern Ireland, but he was canny. I remember being at a St Patrick's Day White House reception, and Willie and I had sort of manoeuvred into a position close to the podium from which President Obama would address the gathering. Indeed, Willie engaged me as his personal photographer, in the hope that we might get a snap. In the end, we got close enough, and I managed to take a reasonable photograph—I tell the House that it is always advisable to have an alternative career — which Willie, I think, still hangs in his office or home. So, there was that side to him of being politically aware and able to use the situation to not only his advantage but to the advantage of the Assembly.

I thank him for his contribution, wish him well for a speedy recovery and a happy retirement, but I also hope that he makes a positive contribution in the House of Lords.

Mr Allister: My relationship with Speaker Hay had its moments. It was not entirely uneventful, and I do not think for one minute that I was always right and he was always wrong. He had a job to do that was not easy. I, too, had a message to deliver in a cold house for opposition, but I readily acknowledge that William Hay performed the role of Speaker with great sincerity and absolutely to the best of his ability.

I wish to record that, at all times outside the House, whatever had passed within the House, he was courteous and cordial in his dealings with me. That was something of the mark of him.

12.45 pm

It is with regret that I learn that ill health has overcome him at this point. I trust that he will make a full recovery and be able to enjoy participation in the House of Lords. I was thinking that it was just over three years ago, on one of those days when Speaker Hay had heard enough from me — you have all been there — that I dared to suggest to him that his peerage was safe, and so it turned out to be. I trust that he will make a worthwhile contribution there.

Given the bizarre governmental arrangements in the House, the role of Speaker in protecting the primacy of and accountability to the House is very important. There were many occasions when, on prompting, Speaker Hay had to remind Ministers that they should make important statements to the House, not to the media, and that they should answer questions within the time limits of Standing Orders, not months, or even years, later. Sadly, the arrogant disrespect from some Ministers continued in spite of those exhortations. A Speaker needs perhaps to show less deference to Ministers and to remind them that the House is the primary elected forum to which statements of importance should be made and that the rules of the House require questions to be answered when tabled. I trust that the markers —

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is now up.

Mr Allister: — that Speaker Hay put down in that regard will be heeded. I wish him well into the future.

Mr Agnew: I always found William Hay to be a very likeable man. I think that that comes across today in the Chamber. It was not his job to be likeable; he was there to tell us off when need be, but the fact is that he was able to do so and still maintain a good personal relationship with Members here. As has been mentioned, whatever went on in the Chamber was set aside when personal contact was made outside it.

I give my particular gratitude to William Hay because I saw him as a friend to the non-Executive parties. He did all he could, within the rules of Standing Orders and legislation, to make sure that our voice was heard. Whatever frustrations many of us may have about the structures of the Assembly and the voice that it gives to opposition and non-Executive Members, he tried to facilitate them where possible. As we are all well aware, he is not responsible for the structures in which we act.

He brought a dignity to the office, which is important because the Speaker is a figurehead for the Assembly, and what he projects to the outside world is a reflection of the Assembly. Much has been made of the many public events that he hosted and the efforts that he made to make this a much more public Building. I particularly respect that, given that I grew up two miles from this place and had never set foot inside it until I worked here. I am delighted that people in the same situation who are growing up now will find this a much more welcoming and hospitable place than perhaps it was in the past. I thank Mr Hay for his role in facilitating that.

Much tribute has been paid to his manner and his way of seeking to bring agreement. That is why it is regrettable that perhaps the Speaker's office will be muddled when we debate the election of a new Speaker. It is important that it is a dignified role, particularly at a time when there is much loss of faith in these institutions. Bringing the Speaker's office into the remit of party political squabbles would be regrettable. I sincerely hope that will not be the case.

If we wish to pay tribute to William Hay and the role that he played here, we should do so by maintaining the dignity of his office. On behalf of the Green Party in Northern Ireland, I wish William Hay happiness and health in his retirement from this place and success in the House of Lords when he takes his seat.

Mr McNarry: On behalf of UKIP, not only do I say thanks to our former Speaker, I wish him a speedy recovery and time to enjoy his retirement from this place and secondment to another place. I also add my compliments to his staff, who served him well and were part of the service that we received from the Speaker's office.

One of the many compliments that one can give Willie Hay is that he will be missed; he was our behaviour controller in an effective and impartial manner. As a referee, I recall him making only one serious mistake, when he red-carded me and ejected me from this place. The fact that he did so in ruling on a Shinner's complaint still irks me, but I bear no lasting grudge against him.

He was ever the diplomat. He perfected that knack of listening to your beef and leaving you knowing fine well that you were going nowhere, but you really did feel better having had the conversation. As a Chief Whip, I found Willie to be wily, in that, on occasions when a Member sailed close to the wind, he would make it clear to me that the offending Member was treading a reprimand. That was a great trick, which meant that the Member in question inevitably fell out with me, the messenger, and thought that the Speaker was a great fellow all round.

He was, we must say, our elected and official Speaker of the Assembly: a real gentleman, a nice guy. He was nobody's fool; he was shrewd and a blooming good negotiator. He will be a very hard act to follow. He carried out his duties with dignity and with pride taken in the high office that he held, an office that we, in this House, elected him to fulfil. He leaves with our full confidence and genuine thanks for representing all our views when he called us to order. So I say good luck to him, and thanks.

Mr B McCrea: I share with Willie a background as a Donegal Protestant. His family and mine came from Manorcunningham, and we occasionally crossed on those paths.

However, my real memory of him comes more from his open-door policy to this place, which has been touched on by a number of Members. However, I am not really sure that people realise what a profound change it was to make this Building open to the public and to invite in people from all quarters — all parts of Northern Ireland — to come and see the Building for themselves. As a newly elected MLA, I just took that more or less for granted and embraced, with some passion, his wish to bring more people into the Buildings.

I remember that one of the first things that I tried to do was to have a gathering for young people that would end up with a fireworks display. It was something that, I thought, would be quite a reasonable thing to do, only to discover that there was something about Parliament Buildings, fireworks and some guy called Guy Fawkes that meant that such a thing was not really possible, never mind legal. The Speaker himself intervened to help to smooth out those issues, get things sorted out, and a good time was had by all. It was a testament to him; it was typical of the man that he would take such an interest.

I also think that part of his contribution, which has been mentioned by others, is that he did a really excellent job in the city of Derry or Londonderry, depending on what you want to call it. He helped to engender things for the Apprentice Boys and to get cultural recognition for all sides. It is a testament to him as a politician that he was able to do that.

I close by saying that there are a number of us who end up speaking last. It is maybe something about those of us who speak last that, from time to time, we have been in what is known as "the naughty corner", and the Speaker has had occasion to remonstrate with all of us. I was struck by Mr McNarry saying that he had been shown the red card. That is something that I never actually achieved myself.

Mr Campbell: There is time yet.

Mr B McCrea: There may well be time yet, but it is testament to the Speaker's good humour that he would occasionally have a word with me and explain that we might do things in a different way. Of course, you would take that guidance and try to work with him for the benefit of the entire Assembly. For that, I am really grateful.

It is a difficult job, and we want to try to give more representation to those who are not from the main parties. Willie did a very good job in very difficult circumstances. I wish him all the best, a speedy return to health and, of course, congratulations on his elevation to the House of Lords.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly records its appreciation of the great distinction with which Mr William Hay has occupied the office of Speaker; congratulates him on the skilful manner in which he has upheld the dignity of this House; appreciates the wisdom, good humour and patience with which he has presided over its affairs; and expresses its warmest thanks to Mr Hay for his many services to this House; and unites in wishing him a long and happy retirement from the House.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The House will take its ease while we change the top Table.

The Acting Speaker (Mr Gardiner) in the Chair.

Assembly Business

The Acting Speaker (Mr Gardiner): I know that many Members have had the opportunity to pay tribute to Mr William Hay, but I would like to take this opportunity to pay personal tribute to the retiring Speaker. Speaker Hay has set an excellent example for all future Speakers to follow. His unfailing courtesy, his wisdom in difficult situations and his fairness characterised his Speakership. He will be missed by us all, and I will miss him on a personal level. I wish him a full recovery, good health and happy times in the House of Lords. I am sure that the House will echo my sentiments.

Election of Speaker

The Acting Speaker (Mr Gardiner): Before we commence, I remind Members that the election of the Speaker will be conducted using the procedures set out in Standing Order 4. In accordance with Standing Order 4(2), I have taken the Chair as Acting Speaker and will preside over the election. I will begin by asking for nominations. Any Member may rise to propose that another Member be elected as Speaker. I will then ask for the proposal to be seconded by another Member, as required by Standing Order 14. If that occurs, I will then verify that the Member nominated is willing to accept the nomination. There will not be an opportunity for speeches at that stage.

I will then ask for further proposals and follow the same procedure for each. When it appears that there are no further proposals, I will make it clear that the time for proposals has passed. If Members indicate that they wish to speak, a debate relevant to the election may take place in which no Member may speak more than once.

At the conclusion of the debate, or at the conclusion of nominations if there are no requests to speak, I will put the Question that the Member first proposed be Speaker of the Assembly. The vote can be carried only on a cross-community basis. If the proposal is not carried, I will put the Question in respect of the next nominee, and so on, until all nominations are exhausted. Once a Speaker is elected, all other nominations will fall automatically. If that is clear, we will proceed.

Do I have any proposals for the office of Speaker of this Assembly?

Mr M McGuinness: With your permission, I would like to nominate Mitchel McLaughlin as the new Speaker of the Assembly.

The Acting Speaker (Mr Gardiner): Do I have a seconder?

Ms Ruane: Aontaím leis. I second it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr Gardiner): Mitchel McLaughlin has been proposed and seconded. Is the candidate prepared to accept the nomination?

Mr Mitchel McLaughlin: I accept the nomination.

The Acting Speaker (Mr Gardiner): Are there any other nominations?

1.00 pm

Dr McDonnell: I propose John Dallat, Mr Acting Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr Gardiner): Do I have a seconder?

Mr P Ramsey: I formally second that proposal.

The Acting Speaker (Mr Gardiner): Is Mr Dallat prepared to accept the nomination?

Mr Dallat: I accept.

The Acting Speaker (Mr Gardiner): Thank you. Are there any other nominations?

Mr Nesbitt: It is my pleasure to nominate Roy Beggs MLA.

Mr Gardiner: Thank you. Do I have a seconder?

Mr Kennedy: Seconded.

The Acting Speaker (Mr Gardiner): Is Mr Beggs prepared to accept the nomination?

Mr Beggs: I accept the nomination.

The Acting Speaker (Mr Gardiner): Thank you. Do we have any other proposals, Members? A number of Members have indicated that they may wish to speak. I remind them that they may speak only once in the debate. The Business Committee has agreed to allow each Member wishing to speak up to three minutes.

The time for proposals has expired.

Mr M McGuinness: Go raibh maith agat. Thank you for this opportunity to speak on the nomination of Mitchel McLaughlin as the new Speaker of the Assembly. I do so on the basis that this is consistent with the agreement that was made by my party and the then leader of the DUP and First Minister the late Dr Ian Paisley.

I also note that my nomination of William Hay at the beginning of this term of the Assembly was by agreement between my party and the Democratic Unionist Party that William would be the Speaker. In fact, that was an agreement that saw me nominate William as the Speaker, which was seconded by the First Minister.

Mitchel McLaughlin is well qualified to do this job. In the recording of a vote of thanks and appreciation to William Hay, a number of contributors said that he would be a hard act to follow. Indeed, that is absolutely correct, but if anybody can follow William, I believe that Mitchel McLaughlin is certainly well qualified to do so. He is a man of very high intellect. He is always civil and courteous. He is someone who I think has gained a huge level of acceptance right across the House. I think that he is well qualified to do this job.

I know that the eyes of the world — well, maybe not the eyes of the world, but the eyes of the world that we live in — are watching this House today to see whether we will be able to agree on who will be the Speaker of the Assembly going forward to the next Assembly election. I hope that people will honour their word. I hope that the expressed desire of all of us to recognise that the time has come for there to be someone from the republican tradition in the Chair will see the endorsement of this House in the next few short minutes.

Dr McDonnell: I am privileged to be able to speak on the nomination of John Dallat. I have no doubt that, in the interests of inclusiveness and building trust and confidence, the time has come for a nationalist Member of the House to become Speaker. For too long, the Assembly has not been reflective of the population it serves. But, Mr Acting Speaker, it is unfortunate that, whatever agreements were made, they were made to exclude many of us and did not involve myself or my colleagues in the SDLP.

Colleagues should remember that the three principal roles of the Speaker of the House are representational, corporate and procedural. As a representative of the Assembly, the Speaker will receive visitors on our behalf, promote our work, host events for us and open up the Assembly and its activities to members of the public, just as the recently retired Speaker did. Yet, in all the time that the Assembly has operated, we have been represented by only one community — the unionist community — which is not representative enough of the wider community that we all serve. While I do not think, and would not imply, that anyone in the House would dispute the absolute professionalism of our recently retired and beloved Speaker, Willie Hay, it is evident to me and my colleagues in the SDLP that the time has come for a nationalist Speaker in the Assembly.

When considering who would be best placed to represent the Assembly overall as Speaker, as leader of the SDLP, I am very clear that the outstanding choice is our nominee, John Dallat, MLA for East Derry. As a Deputy Speaker, John has served the Assembly and its Members well over the past seven years, showing leadership, integrity, impartiality and good judgement in all that time, and displaying the ability and capacity to take on the role of Speaker, as and when required. His long and dedicated service to the Assembly has given John Dallat wide and comprehensive experience of all the procedural and corporate functions of the office, which he would now fulfil with ease.

At a time when the Assembly and Executive are in crisis, as we head into talks to determine our future, it is even more crucial to have someone of the calibre of John Dallat as Speaker of the Assembly; someone who is not only eminently qualified for the role but who, as a nationalist representative, would ensure that both traditions in Northern Ireland —

The Acting Speaker (Mr Gardiner): Will the Member bring his remarks to a close, please?

Dr McDonnell: — are respected and reflected.

Mr Nesbitt: I recommend to the House Mr Roy Beggs, MLA for East Antrim. In doing so, I have listened carefully and attentively to the powerful arguments made by Members who spoke previously on behalf of their nominees. I hope that, during the debate, all parties will be equally open in presenting their case to the House before inevitably, it would appear, we put matters to the vote.

Roy Beggs is the right man at the right time for the role. The Beggs family, as Members will be aware, have been engaged in public service for a number of decades. Following his father, Roy became an elected representative of the House in the first election in 1998, successfully defending his seat in East Antrim at every election since then. Since the last election, Roy has served as a Deputy Speaker with great distinction. I believe that he has the values and attributes that the House requires at this time, not least an attention to detail and the right temperament; the sort of temperament that we heard described when we were paying tribute to William Hay. That sort of temperament is important. As I said in my previous remarks, we look to a Speaker as somebody who will hold up a mirror in which we will see something of the values that we wish to see expressed by the Northern Ireland Assembly.

We talked about William Hay and his role of interfacing with civic society. In that respect, I remind Members of Roy's work, not least as Chair of the all-party group on the community and voluntary sector. He has that engagement already in his DNA, having represented the House in its engagement with broader society. He also has experience of chairing a number of challenging organisations. While a member of Carrickfergus council, he was also chair of the local district policing partnership.

In conclusion, Roy Beggs has the attributes, experience and commitment to take the House through to the end of the term as its principal Speaker.

Mr Ford: We have just paid tribute to our outgoing Speaker, and a key issue that was highlighted is the need for the Speaker to be seen as politically neutral and to distance himself from his previous party connections. There is no doubt that William Hay succeeded in doing that very well. There is also no doubt that, in recent weeks, Mitchel McLaughlin has clearly prepared himself for the role and has sought similarly to distance himself.

I believe that the deal that was struck at the start of this Assembly's mandate should be adhered to because it is the best way to depoliticise the role of the Speaker to ensure a smooth transition from the outgoing independent DUP Speaker to the current, effectively independent Sinn Féin Principal Deputy Speaker. Regardless of what I say to Sinn Féin on issues like welfare reform or the National Crime Agency, I believe that there is a fundamental issue that the House needs to allow people from all parts of the House to take senior responsibilities.

I must say that I was slightly surprised when Dr McDonnell suggested that Speakers had come only from one section of the community. I am not sure whether my colleagues John Alderdice or Eileen Bell would have seen themselves categorised as unionists in quite that way. When we met after the last Assembly election, there was a clear understanding that the post was to move in this Assembly term. Regardless of William Hay's illness, it appeared that he was determined to be a man of principle and honour and to live up to that. I believe that it is incumbent on those of us who remain to follow through and ensure that that deal is carried through.

I have to say to unionists that we are about to go into a series of talks. One of the issues on the agenda is the structural arrangements and whether the precise architecture of the Good Friday Agreement, whether or not modified by the St Andrews Agreement, is what we need going into the future. One issue that concerns me greatly is the blocking mechanism in the House for so-called cross-community votes, which stops movement forward on so many occasions. If I am saying that, and unionists are using very similar language, they need to realise what blocking Mitchel McLaughlin would do today. It would be a clear reinforcement of why nationalism will wish to retain that blocking mechanism. If we are to move forward, to depoliticise the Speaker and to ensure that we get more workable structures for the future, we should accept that the deal made after the last election should stand.

Mr Attwood: I wish former Speaker William Hay the best. At times, I had differences with the former Speaker, one of which was of a fundamental nature, but I wish him a full recovery and hope that he has a full role in the House of Lords in the fullness of time.

The election of the Speaker today can be a watershed moment. We should measure the next 10 minutes against whether or not it is a watershed moment for the Assembly and for politics. A number of candidates have been nominated, all of whom have their particular values and virtues, but, in the view of the SDLP, more than any other candidate, the election of John Dallat as Speaker would represent that watershed moment. The election of John Dallat would be a renewal of integrity and a recognition of a good public servant.

John Dallat has been a political representative for 37 years. There are people in the Chamber who have not been on this earth for 37 years. Over that time, he has shown insight, wisdom, intellect and judgement. We again say to people before they cast their vote in the next matter of minutes, think again about what John Dallat would represent for politics and for the Assembly.

The SDLP also recognises that there will be a watershed moment in the event that Mitchel McLaughlin is elected Speaker. We will first vote for Mitchel McLaughlin, but we believe that, if that does not prevail, the election of John Dallat should prevail. For too long, issue after issue in the Assembly and in Northern Ireland has been reduced to narrow deals. It has been about the division of spoils rather than the full public interest. John Dallat as Speaker would represent something and someone different.

1.15 pm

Mr Lunn: I support the comments of my party leader and the nomination of Mitchel McLaughlin to the post of Speaker. In doing so, I mean absolutely no disrespect to Mr Dallat or Mr Beggs. I am sure that both would make excellent Speakers, but it seems logical that the new Speaker should come from the largest nationalist party at this time.

I have been listening for quite some time, and I wonder what advice William Hay would give the House. We talked about his sense of fair play and negotiating skills. I am absolutely certain that William Hay would endorse the nomination of Mitchel McLaughlin, not because they both come from Derry or Londonderry but because it is the right thing to do. I hope that the House will follow that argument. I hope that we will confirm a nationalist, hopefully Mr McLaughlin, in the post. As I said, I mean no disrespect whatsoever to the other candidates. They have both been excellent Deputy Speakers, and I am sure that they will continue to be so, but I think that it is the right thing to do.

Mr P Robinson: Last week, I asked the two colleagues who represent my party on the Business Committee, Lord Morrow and Chief Whip, Peter Weir, to seek support to deal with this issue at a later sitting, but, unfortunately, the Committee determined to proceed today.

For me, the issue is easily defined. After a long period, the DUP and Sinn Féin completed negotiations on welfare reform with a package that respected all our interests. It allowed us to give support to the most vulnerable, who depend on welfare payments, while doing no irreparable damage to our public services by paying unnecessary penalties and operational costs. The deputy First Minister and I were both satisfied with that outcome.

The topic of welfare reform has now been put into the talks process that the Secretary of State is convening. Equally, the arrangements and modalities of devolution are on the talks agenda. The election of Speaker and of Ministers will be part of that negotiation as well. The talks are to begin very shortly, so both of these matters can be dealt with together. As we have already completed negotiations and reached conclusions on both subjects, we can ask the Secretary of State to front-load the talks agenda with these items. We are prepared to honour our existing agreements on both matters. So, hopefully, we can have some early success and come back here, perhaps in a week or two, and go through the Lobbies together on both of these matters.

Ms Ruane: Go raibh maith agat. I have to say that it is very disappointing to hear what is being said here today. First, there was never an agreement in relation to the matters outlined by the First Minister and leader of the DUP today. We had an agreement in relation to welfare reform, we had an agreement in relation — Martin McGuinness had an agreement, and it was publicly stated, in relation to Mitchel McLaughlin being elected Speaker.

Trevor Lunn nailed it: what would William Hay think about what is happening here today? The wrong message is being sent out. Even at this stage, I urge the House to think very carefully about what it is doing and what message is being sent out. These are power-sharing institutions and it is very important that we support the power-sharing arrangements. If people vote against Mitchel McLaughlin and against an agreement publicly stated by the leader of the DUP, that will send out the wrong message to the nationalist/republican community. I have to say that it is very disappointing for this side of the House.

Mrs Foster: Thank you very much, Acting Speaker. I listened carefully to the two proposers of the nationalist candidates here today. I am sure that they did not mean this, but what they said was that it was time for a republican or a nationalist Speaker. Of course, the Speaker should not have any affiliations. The Speaker may come from a republican or nationalist background, but, like William Hay, they should leave that at the door of the Speaker's office. However, maybe it portrays more of what they wanted from their candidates today.

Of course, the Member who has just spoken was not at the welfare reform negotiations, so I do not know how she knows what was agreed between the First Minister and deputy First Minister. A clear understanding was reached in those negotiations.

The proposal put this morning, first to the party officers of the Democratic Unionist Party and then to the Assembly team of the DUP, was passed unanimously by all present. I think that the DUP has again shown that our strength and confidence in what we are doing for this country remains very strong. Sinn Féin appears upset that it is not immediately gaining a Speaker in the British devolved Administration, but the leader and First Minister has made it clear that this party will stand by its agreement when the agreements have come to fruition, but that we cannot allow Sinn Féin to break agreements that have been made without sanction or, indeed, to engage in unacceptable behaviour. Every action or inaction will have an opposite reaction or inaction.

People are struggling to understand the morass that Sinn Féin finds itself in in relation to welfare reform, and this morning was another very good example of that. It can be summed up in a simple phrase, "We don't know how much welfare reform costs, and we don't care". That was basically the sum total of a 40-minute interview this morning from Sinn Féin.

Mr Acting Speaker, Northern Ireland deserves better, the House deserves better and the vulnerable people, whom the party opposite says it wants to protect, deserve so much better. So, let us get these issues dealt with. My party, under the leadership of Peter Robinson, will not be found wanting. It is up to others to see whether they will.

Mrs D Kelly: Thank you, Mr Acting Speaker. I had not intended to speak, but, as this afternoon starts to disintegrate, I am left with little choice but to express my dismay and that of my party at what we see as those cobbled-together back-room deals between Sinn Féin and the DUP fall apart so publicly. As we go into talks, there is a warning for anyone in any party who thinks that the two main parties will honour whatever agreements they have made behind doors at the exclusion of all of the parties. However, we can stand, support and hope for a better future. Today, we know that health workers, nurses, midwives and others are on the streets looking to have fulfilled the promises that were made to them in relation to their 1% pay rise, and here we are in the Assembly failing to agree on the appointment of a Speaker.

This is another historic day for Northern Ireland, in the context that so many define it, as a day when we see that the real fault at the heart of the Executive is fractured relationships and back-room and back-door deals. I hope, as we in the SDLP attempt to move society forward to do what is right and best for all the people of the North, that we see an end to the back-room and back-door deals. Let us have some honest engagement and inclusive politics as set out in the spirit and letter of the Good Friday Agreement.

Mr Poots: Thank you, Mr Presiding Officer. I think the party leader has set out very clearly the position and Sinn Féin should look at what is being offered to it as an olive branch. We are in a situation where relationships are not as good as they should be, and that is something for us all to take cognisance of because this House needs to give real and true leadership to Northern Ireland.

We look at others who wish to see this place not working because they would like to fill the void, and therefore Sinn Féin in particular, as we seek to move this issue forward, needs to reflect on its behaviour over the course of the last three years since an agreement was made. It needs to reflect on situations like Castlederg and on situations like Flax Street, where it glorifies those who planted the Shankill bomb. It needs to reflect on its management of situations around welfare reform and other circumstances. That is hitting people hard in Northern Ireland today and leading to redundancies, lay-offs and massive cuts.

This is not the way to do government, and we need people to step up to the plate. We are going into negotiations; let us go into negotiations in good faith. Let us hope that we can resolve this issue quickly, that we can resolve the issues around welfare quickly, and that we can look at how we deal with sensitive issues in our communities and which are causing hurt, hardship and misery to innocent victims of the Troubles. Let us see that we can provide real and true leadership in this Assembly as we move things forward.

Mr McCartney: Go raibh maith agat, Acting Speaker. First, I also send my best wishes to William Hay. I hope that he has a speedy recovery and that he will in the future provide good representation for the people of Derry, which he has done for a long number of years.

I add my words of support for Mitchel McLaughlin. Martin McGuinness outlined very clearly why and how Mitchel McLaughlin would make an excellent Speaker for this Assembly. Of course, I share the disappointment that the Democratic Unionist Party will not honour the public commitment that its party leader made on its behalf. I think that it is very noticeable this morning that not one of the people who was speaking on its behalf in any way suggested that there was not a public commitment. I think that people out there will well remember that commitment, and I think that all that we have heard this afternoon from the Members who have spoken so far was excuse after excuse for a reason for not fulfilling what was a very public commitment.

It is easy to list issues that people feel perhaps should have been delivered that were not. I could mention Long Kesh, which was a Programme for Government commitment, and we could talk about the letter from America. We can all make excuses, but we cannot ignore, nor should we forget, that there was a very public commitment made by the leader of the Democratic Unionist Party, recorded and broadcast to those who wished to hear it, in which he said very, very clearly that he would honour the commitment made by Ian Paisley, the then First Minister and leader of the Democratic Unionist Party, that Mitchel McLaughlin or a Sinn Féin nominee would be the person who would sit in your seat. Therefore, when people leave here today, they should be in no doubt that this was a commitment made and a commitment broken.

Mr Allister: Yesterday marked the thirtieth anniversary of the Brighton bomb, the attempt by the IRA to remove the very top layer of government of this United Kingdom. Today, we have a proposition that a member of a party, Sinn Féin, that, to this day, has not repudiated or condemned but rather has venerated that bombing and that bomber should take the top office in this devolved Assembly within the United Kingdom. Not in my name. That would be utterly offensive and utterly wrong. It would be wrong not just today or next week or the week after that or as some quid pro quo on welfare reform, but wrong per se.

1.30 pm

Someone from that ilk, justifying and refusing to condemn that bombing, to name but one, should not hold the post of Speaker in the House. Of course, more than that, the very candidate is someone who notoriously, on an RTÉ programme, when challenged by Michael McDowell, protested that the murder of Jean McConville was not a crime. To think that someone who held the view that the murder of Jean McConville, a lady torn from the bosom of her family to be tortured and butchered and buried in an unmarked grave for years, was not a crime should be elevated to the post of Speaker of the House. I trust that the House will never stoop that low.

Mr Agnew: Sadly, it appears that today will be another marker in the disintegration of these institutions that we have witnessed over recent weeks and months. This should be a formality. When I was first elected and we elected Mr William Hay, it was a formality; instead, we have seen it being thrown in as another negotiating point between two parties in disagreement. It is making the office of Speaker political and does, in my view, bring it into disrepute to do so.

Further, we have heard the idea that this would be the first nationalist Speaker, and I think that the point was made that William Hay was not a unionist Speaker but an independent Speaker from a unionist background. For as long as we continue to insist on putting so much weight on symbols in this society, we will be forever dogged by squabbles over which symbols and whose symbols take precedence. We need to move on from those petty squabbles; we need to give a dignity to the House and to the Speaker's office. It is right that positions such as that of Speaker are rotated among parties, and perhaps we need to formalise it. There has been talk of the negotiations that are to take place on the future of these institutions, but we cannot put a hold on the responsibilities that we have here until those negotiations take place.

We must ensure that we make these institutions work as best we can in the meantime, because we have a responsibility to the people who elected us to do so. In the negotiations that are taking place, we need to learn the lessons, and the lesson here is clearly that deals done behind closed doors are dodgy deals that cannot be enforced and cannot be open to public scrutiny. My call for transparent dialogue and public engagement to decide the future of these institutions, building on what we did in the Good Friday Agreement, has fallen on deaf ears. Again, we enter a process of negotiations behind closed doors exclusive to parties in the Assembly but, more importantly, excluding members of the public. That is a mistake, and I think that today is regrettable. We should be agreeing a Speaker without this level of debate. It should be a non-political post. Nobody has anything to win —

The Acting Speaker (Mr Gardiner): Time is up.

Mr Agnew: — other than a symbolic win in a war.

Mr Campbell: There is no doubt whatever that the House and the Assembly as a whole have made considerable efforts in recent years in terms of job creation and a whole raft of issues that it has not got the credit for achieving.

What it has got is criticism for the growing deadlock that has emerged. Does anybody here think that the election of a Speaker today will do anything to unlock that deadlock? No one believes that; no one is of that opinion. Unfortunately, the deadlock has grown and is growing.

That is why my party believes that the issues as a whole, including agreements reached between my party and Sinn Féin, whether on welfare reform or the election of a Speaker, should be resolved in the discussions that are about to be held. That would give a greater signal to the wider community that we are determined not to allow the deadlock to continue, because, let us be absolutely clear, there are many in our wider community who congratulated the republican movement when it was forced to cease its violence. There are some in our community who refused to recognise that it did it. We acknowledged that it did it. It does not get congratulated for doing it, but neither is it continuing to do it. We acknowledged that they had moved, but we need to have a consensus on how we move on from here.

The issue can, should and must be resolved in the context of the discussions that are about to be held. It is only in that context that we believe that the impasse and deadlock can be broken.

Mr McCallister: The basis of all Western democracies tends to be the separation of powers between the legislative, executive and judicial branches, yet the role of the Assembly as a legislature is to hold our executive branch of government to account. When looking for a Speaker, that is the role that we should be looking at. We should not be questioning whether the person is unionist or nationalist or what party he or she comes from. We should be looking for someone who robustly defends the House as an institution and robustly wants the House to hold the executive branch of government to the fullest scrutiny. That is something that we lose when we debate these points and almost throw the issue into the mix of the wider political problems that we face.

There is no doubt that I want to see reform here, and I want to see the structures change to provide for an opposition. I want to make sure that this is the last time that we elect a Speaker in this manner. The DUP probably should follow through on its deal and arrangements on electing the Speaker, but, if Sinn Féin had arranged a deal on welfare reform or the Maze, should those commitments also not have been honoured? I am totally opposed to Sinn Féin's position on welfare reform. It is entirely inconsistent with being in government and with the responsibilities that a Government face, but that should not be part of the scramble to get elected to the Speaker's office.

The Speaker should and must be a gift of the Members of the House. It should not be a gift of the executive arm of government. The Speaker should be a gift, and the individual should be elected in a secret ballot by Members of the Assembly, not given out by the Executive Ministers or in a deal made through the talks process to get over the line on welfare and all the other issues that we face, including problems with the Budget. This is not doing the House any good; it is not building confidence in the community out there, which looks to the House and the Executive to provide leadership; and it is not good for representative democracy.

We need to get a Speaker who has the support of all the House. We need to move away from the language of asking whether he or she is a unionist Speaker or a nationalist Speaker. The Speaker should be a Speaker for the House. The Speaker represents the House on occasions and is the highest office holder in the Assembly. That should reflect the position.

Mr Wilson: Thank you, Mr Presiding Officer or Mr Acting Speaker or whatever your position is.

It is a bit unfortunate that this debate today will probably be presented as another example of the inability of the Assembly to get on with its business. However, I dare say that the decision today not to deal with this particular issue is essential if we want this Assembly to get back on track and do the things that are necessary, because we are at an impasse. We are not doing the business that we should be doing, because we are tied up with a Budget that has now been frozen and is being diminished as a result of inaction by this Assembly.

I want to make some things very clear: first, despite what one Member of Sinn Féin said, we have not pretended that there was no deal on the Speakership. That was admitted and accepted by the First Minister in his speech.

Secondly, we have made it quite clear that we will honour any deals that we have made, but that requires all parties in this Assembly to do exactly the same. It is not a case of "You give us one thing and we give you the other". There is no point in our having a Speaker if we cannot resolve the impasse that this Assembly is presently facing. That does not require rewarding Sinn Féin for its intransigence, because this is the unfortunate thing: since this whole process started, Sinn Féin thinks that it can do things without consequence. That may have been the case when it was dealing with the Irish Government, the British Government and the American Government, but it cannot do that here. The real politics of this place is that, unless we work and, when we come to agreements, deliver on them, then this place will not work.

Let me make it quite clear: we will honour whatever deals we have, but that is dependent upon Sinn Féin being prepared to honour the deal that it had — a deal that, in its breaking, has damaged ordinary people in Northern Ireland. The only damage done by our refusal to implement this today is to Mitchel McLaughlin and Sinn Féin's pride. Its breach of agreements is hurting people right across Northern Ireland, and therefore it is essential that we get that sorted out. I trust that we will do that in the talks process.

The Acting Speaker (Mr Gardiner): A new Speaker has not been elected, so it will be necessary to return to the matter at a future sitting. The date on which we will return to the matter will be considered by the Business Committee. In the interim, plenary business will continue and will be chaired by the Deputy Speakers in accordance with Standing Order 4(7). The House will take its ease while we change the Table.

Enterprise, Trade and Investment

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: We will start with listed questions.

Postal Services: Ministerial Response

1. Mr F McCann asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment why she did not respond to the Assembly debate on 29 September 2014 calling for her to raise the issue of cross-border postal services at a forthcoming meeting of the North/South Ministerial Council. (AQO 6820/11-15)

Mrs Foster (The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment): Postal services are reserved to Westminster under paragraph 7 of schedule 3 to the Northern Ireland Act 1998 and are not therefore the responsibility of my Department. The Consumer Council for Northern Ireland is funded by the Department for Business, Innovation and Skills to represent consumers on postal issues in Northern Ireland.

Mr F McCann: I thank the Minister for her answer. Does she accept that the unacceptably high cost of posting items across the border presents an unwarranted and unwanted tax on cross-border economic development?

Mrs Foster: This is a matter that has been taken up by the Consumer Council. As I understand, it is carrying out work in the context of the fact that it has been given these powers by the Department for Business, Innovation and Skills. Of course, it will respond to its sponsor Department when it has carried out that work. I have no doubt that it will also share its work with me and indeed with the Committee.

Mr Dunne: Can the Minister clarify the new role that the Consumer Council has in relation to postal services in Northern Ireland?

Mrs Foster: I have indicated that, since 1 April 2014, the Consumer Council for Northern Ireland has responsibility for consumer representation on postal services in Northern Ireland. Before that, Consumer Futures was responsible. The Consumer Council has taken on this role. As it is a reserved matter, the Department for Business, Innovation and Skills is providing funding of £255,000 to the Consumer Council for 2014-15 to undertake its consumer representation role in respect of postal services in Northern Ireland. As I understand it, its work plan for this year broadly covers three main areas: the launch of the council's new role and responsibilities for postal services; the post office network, which is a very important part of rural life in Northern Ireland; and mail and parcels.

English Visitors to NI

2. Mr McNarry asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment what steps have been taken to increase the number of English families visiting Northern Ireland. (AQO 6821/11-15)

Mrs Foster: Whilst I do not have details of English visitors, there were almost 1.2 million visitors from Great Britain in 2013, which was an increase of 13% on 2012. Great British visitors make up 56% of our total external visitors and are therefore a very important market for us.

Tourism Ireland has been highlighting visitor experiences that appeal to families, such as Titanic Belfast, the Giant's Causeway and Causeway coastal route, as well as our unique National Trust properties. It is using a wide variety of marketing tools to get its message through to GB families, including advertising on television, radio, outdoors, in cinemas, and in national and regional newspapers and lifestyle magazines.

It is important that Tourism Ireland, in my opinion, increases its activity, including in England, for us to see further growth in visitor numbers from Great Britain.

Mr McNarry: I thank the Minister for a very comprehensive and useful answer and speak well of her for the success that she has had in her own particular office and the contribution that she has made to tourism.

I had hoped that she might mention ferry services. In the light of that, would she consider undertaking a review of ferry services between England and Northern Ireland in tandem with a review of how we are attracting that potentially lucrative market in England, as that may give her the figures that I have been looking for?

Mrs Foster: We undertake cooperative marketing with the airlines and the ferry services. We work very closely with the ferry services that are in Larne and Belfast. I am quite happy to share those details with the Member, if those would be useful to him.

Mr Humphrey: I thank the Minister for her answer so far. What will be the impact on the Tourism Ireland budget, given the cutbacks in the Department's overall budget?

Mrs Foster: As you can imagine, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker, I have been looking very closely at the overall budget. As you are aware, we have come to some resolution on the in-year monitoring position. However, we still have to have a draft Budget for 2015-16. Once that happens, I will have more clarity on the issue. Tourism Ireland will face savings and, let us be honest about it, cuts, the same as any other part of my Department. That is done with regret, but it is something that I have to do across the Department.

Mrs Dobson: I thank the Minister for her reply. I am sure she will agree that the key to attracting more visitors from England, or anywhere else, is to promote a positive image of Northern Ireland. In the light of disappointing visitor numbers, does she agree that we need to review the current arrangements, where Tourism Ireland does not treat us as a distinct tourist destination to be marketed in Great Britain?

Mrs Foster: I am aware that there is some unease around the marketing of Northern Ireland in the Great Britain market by Tourism Ireland. I assure the Member that I am looking into that. Over the coming weeks, I hope to meet the chairman of Tourism Ireland to discuss some of the claims that have been made. With regard to tourism figures, we had a good year in 2013 in relation to visitors from Great Britain. The figures were up and, importantly, the spend was up as well. Not only do we have targets for the number of visitors, we have a very stretching target for spend by those visitors who come to Northern Ireland. It is important that we continue to work with Tourism Ireland, the Northern Ireland Tourist Board and other partners to ensure that we get the maximum coverage. Our biggest market is GB, and we should not forget that.

Mr Allister: Did the Minister see a recent press article by the much-respected Kate Hoey on Tourism Ireland's efforts, if we could call them that, in GB on behalf of Northern Ireland? The article was particularly critical as to its inactivity. Does she agree that, unless and until we get the promotion of Northern Ireland within the rest of the United Kingdom into the hands of the Northern Ireland Tourist Board, we will continue to be plagued with this problem?

Mrs Foster: As I indicated to Ms Dobson, I am very aware not only of the claims made by Ms Hoey — I intend to follow up on that article with Ms Hoey and to talk to her about those claims — but of other claims. The Member will not be surprised to know that Tourism Ireland marketing Northern Ireland in Great Britain is not of my choosing. It is something that I inherited from the Belfast Agreement. Certainly, it is something that, I think, needs very close scrutiny. It is something that I will be looking at.

Jobs: FDI

3. Mr Lunn asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment to outline the estimated number of jobs that will be created through foreign direct investment during the current financial year. (AQO 6822/11-15)

Mrs Foster: Invest Northern Ireland offers assistance to new investors to support the creation of new jobs, often over a period of three to five years, sometimes longer. It is the responsibility of the company to create the jobs at a schedule that supports their development and growth. Therefore, Invest NI is not able to meaningfully forecast the likely number of jobs to be created in any year. As of 31 March 2014, Invest NI has promoted 9,108 jobs from inward investors since the start of its current corporate plan in 2011.

Mr Lunn: I thank the Minister for that answer. I understand that the rules in respect of state assistance are going to change. Will the Minister comment on what complexities or challenges that might bring about?

2.30 pm

Mrs Foster: The rules for selective financial assistance and the amount of funding that we can give have already changed. We are still an assisted area in the European Union, but we are now curtailed as to how much repeat assistance we can give to those companies. As the Member will know, companies often came with 20 or 30 people, realised that we had a very good offering here and decided to expand further. If it is a large company, we will not be able to give that selective financial assistance in the future, but there are other ways in which we can support companies. We can look at skills and training in conjunction with the Department for Employment and Learning. We will look at how we can support people with research, development, innovation and tax credits, depending on the sector that we are talking about. So there are other ways in which we can help, but, if corporation tax were devolved to Northern Ireland, we would automatically have a step change as to what we could do.

Mr McGlone: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as a freagraí go dtí seo. The Minister took the question in the direction in which I was going to take it: corporation tax. If and, hopefully, when corporation tax enabling powers come to the local Executive, what assessment has the Minister's Department done on the impact that a 12.5% corporation tax level will have on potential foreign direct investment that could come in its wake?

Mrs Foster: A number of studies have been carried out, not least by the Department and by the Department for Employment and Learning. If we are to have a huge spike in the number of companies that will be looking to Northern Ireland, we will want to ensure that the appropriate skills are available to those companies when they come. The economic advisory group, led by Kate Barker, has been doing some work in that area. We will be able to achieve some 50,000 jobs over a relatively short time, all things being equal. We will be able to provide the appropriate young people and skills that those companies will need. There is no doubt that it would be a huge boost to the private sector in Northern Ireland. We want to rebalance and rebuild.

Mr Anderson: I thank the Minister for her responses so far. What jobs have arrived through foreign direct investment since the beginning of August?

Mrs Foster: We have had a particularly good period. Over the past six months, we have had 1,200 new jobs by just 10 new inward investors. We are not talking about indigenous companies that have decided to expand or companies that are already here. They are new inward investors, and those jobs have come from Puppet Labs; Baker and McKenzie; Proofpoint; Alexander Mann Solutions; and Convergys. Those have all been very good announcements for right across Northern Ireland. We are pleased that those new companies continue to look to Northern Ireland for growth and expansion, many of them for the first time, into the European area.

Mr Flanagan: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as ucht a freagraí. The Minister may be aware of a recently published DEL report looking into labour mobility. One of the challenges that it identifies is the lack of employment opportunities in rural areas and the move towards jobs in Belfast. How does the Minister intend to reverse that trend and ensure that an adequate number of jobs are created in places like Fermanagh and other rural areas, given the Programme for Government commitment to tackle regional imbalance?

Mrs Foster: I have been very pleased to make a number of job announcements in Fermanagh, most recently in G R White and Son in Tempo and Webtech in Enniskillen just a couple of weeks ago. I hope to make further announcements in the near future. It is about working proactively with those companies in the region to ensure that we portray a positive view of the region so that we are attractive to inward investors when they come to look at the area and to have a good product and available people who are willing to be positive about their areas. All that shows that we are moving forward, in particular in the south-west. I look forward to working with the Member to make sure that Fermanagh and the whole of the south-west is promoted in a very positive way.

Ms Sugden: Minister, how effective has the enterprise zone been in encouraging foreign direct investment in my constituency?

Mrs Foster: The enterprise zone in Coleraine has not yet been confirmed by Her Majesty's Treasury. It has been put forward by the Executive to Treasury for designation as an enterprise zone. So, it is too early to determine its impact in the area, but I am sure that those who have been working for the enterprise zone will want to ensure that it is in place as soon as possible.

Rugby World Cup 2023

4. Mr Byrne asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment for an update on the progress of the North/South working group examining the key issues surrounding the hosting of the Rugby World Cup on a cross-border basis in 2023. (AQO 6823/11-15)

Mrs Foster: The working group has prepared a report based on its analysis of the feasibility study meetings with key rugby union officials and other relevant organisations. The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure and I have received copies of the report and are considering it. In agreeing to bid jointly for the 2023 tournament, I will wish to ensure value for money and be convinced of the economic benefits for Northern Ireland.

Mr Byrne: I thank the Minister for her answer. Given that rugby is a fantastic field sport played on an all-Ireland basis and that Kingspan/Ravenhill in Ulster, Thomond Park in Limerick, the Aviva Stadium in Dublin and the Sportsground in Galway are all dedicated to rugby, does the Minister accept that Ireland now has the infrastructure to make a real bid for the World Cup? What can she do with her counterpart in the Republic to try to advance that case with the rugby authorities?

Mrs Foster: It is on record that I am a supporter of Ulster Rugby. I very much want the Rugby World Cup to come to the island of Ireland in 2023. However, as I am sure that the Member would want me to do, I need to ensure that Northern Ireland gets as much out of this event as it possibly can. I will look at the report given to me in the context of making sure that a number of teams are located and based in Northern Ireland for the Rugby World Cup. We recognise that there are more stadiums available in the Republic of Ireland, but that does not mean that we cannot be creative about what we can do in Northern Ireland. If we are to assist in funding the bid, I certainly want to ensure that we get good value for money.

Mr Douglas: I thank the Minister for her answers so far. I am sure that the Minister will agree with me that Kyle Lafferty from Tamlaght in County Fermanagh is a great tourist attraction for Northern Ireland.

I want to ask the Minister about tourist attractions for Northern Ireland in light of recent debate about the tourism events fund. I recently attended Culture Night, which was a fabulous night for Belfast, and the Minister has been to the C S Lewis festival in east Belfast and is a big supporter of EastSide Arts, as is her friend Van Morrison. Will the Minister please give a progress report or an update on the tourism events fund?

Mrs Foster: I thank the Member. If Kyle Lafferty is listening to Question Time, I am sure that he is saying, "I have been called many things in my time but never a tourist attraction". Anyway, I congratulate the Northern Ireland football team on being top of their group. It is a very nice place to be, and we look forward to them continuing that success in tomorrow's match in Greece.

Events funding, of course, has caused a lot of angst, and I am the first to acknowledge that. We are facing a very difficult financial time right across government. Given the current budgetary climate and the knowledge that future years will be very difficult, it was necessary to review the position right across the Department. We need to take account of all the circumstances.

Ordinarily, people would be applying for funding at this time. I have heard some of the arts groups say that their funding has been cut. This application had to be made every year, so, in any year, there was no guarantee that these groups would be able to access funding. On every occasion, they had to apply in a competitive process.

At the moment, we do not have an events fund open call for next year. However, let us see what happens in the 2015-16 budgetary discussions over the next period. I would certainly like some sort of an events fund, but we will have to see whether the money is available for it.

Mr Cree: I would welcome the 2023 Rugby World Cup coming to Ireland, North and South. Does the Minister recognise that, with Northern Ireland now having a voice on the working group, there is an opportunity to emphasise that the Irish rugby team represents both jurisdictions and is not the Republic of Ireland's rugby team. That should be reflected in the Irish Rugby Football Union's attention to things such as anthems and flags.

Mrs Foster: I concur with the Member's view on those matters. It is my hope that the Irish Rugby Football Union will acknowledge the contribution that Ulster makes to rugby, because we make an incredible contribution to the Irish rugby scene. I hope that that is acknowledged in Dublin, as it is in Ravenhill, or the Kingspan stadium, which I have difficulty getting used to calling it, but I will have to get used to. It is a rugby team for both jurisdictions. Therefore, I was keen to ensure that we had proper representation on the working group. I am satisfied that we have that now. Once we have had the chance to consider the report, the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure and I will come together to decide if the current way forward is the best way forward.

Engineering

5. Ms P Bradley asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment for her assessment of the contribution of advanced engineering to the local economy. (AQO 6824/11-15)

Mrs Foster: Advanced, or high-value, manufacturing makes a major contribution to the success of the Northern Ireland economy. My Department encourages and supports businesses that are capable of investing in knowledge-based, innovative technologies and developing capabilities that can ensure they remain internationally competitive and successful, supporting jobs and creating wealth in the economy.

We have many excellent examples of businesses that are investing in world-class facilities to sustain and build on Northern Ireland's strong international reputation and manufacturing heritage. Examples include Bombardier, Schrader Electronics, Magellan Aerospace and Wrightbus.

Ms P Bradley: I thank the Minister for her answer. The Minister mentioned Bombardier. We know that Bombardier announced significant job losses in September. Many of those workers are my neighbours in my community in Newtownabbey. Can the Minister comment on Bombardier and its importance in Northern Ireland?

Mrs Foster: I can indeed. On 10 September, Bombardier announced that it intended to make up to 90 permanent posts and 300 agency-employed staff redundant. That was a huge blow. I do not think that a lot of people realise that the company has six manufacturing sites in Northern Ireland: Airport Road and Airport Road West in Belfast; Dunmurry; Newtownards; Newtownabbey; and Monkstown. Currently, it has a workforce of around 6,300 people, making it the biggest private sector employer in Northern Ireland. It is planned that the redundancies will be implemented by the end of the year.

Despite the impending job losses, it remains encouraging to note that, in the past four years, Bombardier has increased the total workforce by over 1,200 people in Northern Ireland. So, whilst I accept that the announcement that has been made in relation to the restructuring of Bombardier globally is regrettable, Bombardier has a very strong presence in Belfast and continues to play a major role in virtually all the aircraft programmes across the world. I think that that diversity is part of its strength.

Mrs Overend: Has the Minister made any assessment as to how those changes in Bombardier will affect other businesses across Northern Ireland who support Bombardier in the aerospace industry?

Mrs Foster: The Member is absolutely right to reference the supply chain to Bombardier, because Bombardier has 6,300 direct employees, but many, many hundreds of other people are reliant on Bombardier in Belfast. We have a very strong working relationship with Bombardier. Invest Northern Ireland has a client executive embedded with Bombardier, so any changes in relation to Bombardier are fed directly into the system, and we will work with any companies that have difficulties.

I think that around 80 companies, particularly in precision engineering, rely on Bombardier. That is not taking into account the services that are provided to Bombardier; these are just supply chain people. So, yes, any time that there is a reduction in manpower in Bombardier, we look at the wider picture around the supply chain.

2.45 pm

Visa Restrictions

6. Mr Anderson asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment for an update on the steps she is taking to relax visa restrictions to make it easier for tourists to visit Northern Ireland. (AQO 6825/11-15)

Mrs Foster: A new British-Irish visa scheme was launched by the Secretary of State for the Home Office, Theresa May MP, in conjunction with the Republic of Ireland's Minister for Justice and Equality, Frances Fitzgerald TD, on 6 October. This positive development was an action in the G8 economic pact and enables, for the first time, Chinese and Indian visitors to come to Northern Ireland through the Irish Republic on an Irish visa, as well as through Great Britain on a UK visa. This is very welcome news, and Tourism Ireland and Visit Britain will be working very hard to promote the scheme.

Mr Anderson: I thank the Minister for that response. It is certainly welcome news. Minister, can you give an update on what assistance your Department is giving to the international airport to help to encourage the introduction of new routes?

Mrs Foster: As the Member will be aware, direct connectivity into Northern Ireland is one of the priorities for how we grow our tourism numbers, and I am very much committed to increasing Northern Ireland's air connectivity. I have met and continue to meet Northern Ireland airports, and, indeed, I recently met the new managing director of the international airport, Graham Keddie, regarding the airport's route development plans. My officials are also in regular dialogue with our airports and, indeed, last month, we took a Northern Ireland stand at the World Routes conference in Chicago. So, we are out there and looking for new routes. We are trying to be innovative in how we attract those new routes to the international airport and, indeed, routes to the other airports. International connectivity is very much at the top of my agenda.

Mrs D Kelly: Minister, will you join me in welcoming the establishment of a new consul for the Republic of China in Belfast and also in welcoming the fact that the availability and accessibility for visas for travel will be much enhanced for visitors going both ways and, indeed, for the students at our universities?

Mrs Foster: Absolutely. I was unaware that we had a newly appointed consul, so I look forward to meeting him or her in the near future to talk about this because we know that people from China who travel far afield stay for longer and spend a lot of money. Therefore, we want to encourage them to come to Northern Ireland. In the past, there was confusion over whether they could come to Northern Ireland on an Irish visa and what would happen if they had an accident or whatever in Northern Ireland. I think that this clarity is a very strong piece for Tourism Ireland to take forward. If the Member has some knowledge of the consul, I very much look forward to meeting them.

Mr Kinahan: Have studies been done to ensure that, from these visa changes, we will benefit here in the North, especially Belfast International Airport and the city airport, to ensure that we lure people here rather than them always coming via Dublin?

Mrs Foster: I think that it is probably a mixture of both, if you do not mind me saying so, until we get the increased connectivity. Nobody is suggesting at the moment that we will be getting a direct flight from China into the international airport, so we need to work principally with Visit Britain to ensure that we get people to come across and they understand that the visa that they have for the UK covers Northern Ireland or, if they are coming in through Dublin, that they understand that they can come up to Northern Ireland. I think that that is the work that Tourism Ireland has to take forward because, as I said, the Chinese visitors are very important visitors. We want to welcome more of them and hope that they do visit Northern Ireland on their itinerary.

Tax Incentives: TV and Film Industry

7. Mr A Maginness asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment what recent discussions she has had with the British and Irish Governments on the future extent and level of tax incentives for the film and TV industry on the island of Ireland. (AQO 6826/11-15)

Mrs Foster: Following the successful implementation of new tax incentives under the creative industry tax reliefs, the local film and TV industry can benefit from a group of corporation tax reliefs. These include the film tax relief, introduced in 2007; the high-end television tax relief; the animation tax relief, introduced in April 2013; and the video games tax relief, introduced from 1 April this year. My Department, working closely with Northern Ireland Screen and Invest Northern Ireland, was instrumental in securing these new credits, and I believe that the impetus now exists for a truly export-focused screen industry for Northern Ireland.

Mr A Maginness: I thank the Minister for her comprehensive reply. Clearly, this is an area for future development with massive potential. Is there any way in which the industry here could benefit from cooperation with counterparts in the Irish Republic? I think that, in the field of creativity, we have to use all the talents and skills that abound on the island of Ireland.

Mrs Foster: I thank the Member for his supplementary. Indeed, we will want to work with all countries, wherever the people are, so that we can increase our output. As the Member will know, I have increased the budget for NI Screen substantially so that it can take advantage of what is there at the moment. I had a very useful meeting with the director general of the BBC last week when he was over in Northern Ireland to try to encourage him to do more in relation to national output so that we can see more Northern Ireland productions right across the network, because I think that that is very important, too. Indeed, some colleagues from the Republic of Ireland are investing in Northern Ireland. I am thinking particularly of JAM Media in Murray's Exchange in Sandy Row. It came to do some work there to perhaps take advantage of the very good tax relief schemes that we now have in place for making productions.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: That brings us to the end of the period for listed questions, and we now move on to 15 minutes of topical questions. Ms Caitríona Ruane is not in her place.

JTI Gallaher: Job Losses

T2. Mr Hilditch asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment whether the recent proposed job losses at JTI Gallaher will impact much further afield than the immediate Ballymena area, given that she is very aware of workers in his constituency with the BT38, BT39 and BT40 postcodes of Newtownabbey, Carrick and Larne. (AQT 1582/11-15)

Mrs Foster: I recognise that that is the case. One of those interviewed on BBC Radio Ulster on the day of the announcement was from Carrickfergus, as I recall, and he very clearly said that this is not just an issue for Ballymena but for further afield. The travel-to-work distance means that quite a lot of people will be impacted in a circle, if you like, right across the north-east of Northern Ireland. So, I understand that that is the case.

I further understand, having talked about supply chains earlier during the substantive questions, that many companies rely on JTI Gallaher for their businesses. Those companies will also be impacted. So, I have asked Invest Northern Ireland to do some work in and around that to ensure that we know which companies will be impacted by the closure of JTI.

Mr Hilditch: I thank the Minister for her answer. Will she, along with the Minister for Employment and Learning, do everything to ensure that the skills at JTI are not lost to the Northern Ireland economy?

Mrs Foster: Absolutely. The Member and the House will be aware that the Employment and Learning Minister and I have been asked by the Executive to engage with JTI. We hoped that we would be able to go up early this week. However, the company — we have to respect its processes — has others to consult before it speaks to us, and, therefore, it will be later on in the week. We will certainly go to Ballymena. I think that we very much need to engage in a skills audit as the first piece of work and see what we can do to help those affected.

Tourism Events Fund 2015-16

T3. Mr Lyttle asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment how she can justify her recently announced 100% cut to and complete cessation of the tourism events fund for 2015-16, which threatens around 65 organisations across Northern Ireland that contribute to important events and festivals and do much for our tourism, society and economy. (AQT 1583/11-15)

Mrs Foster: It is not a question of justifying a 100% cut to the fund. I wanted to give clarity to people in the sector that we were in a position where we could not find the funding to give an events fund for 2015-16. If that changes in the near future — I very much hope that it does — we will put out a call. However, this is a time of the year when applications would not ordinarily be forthcoming and, therefore, I wanted to give them clarity in relation to the issue.

Mr Lyttle: I thank the Minister for her response. However, she will be aware that this threatens organisations, festivals and events that, for every £1 of funding that they receive, return £3 to our local economy. Can the Minister reassure those organisations that she values and understands the importance of that work to our society and economy and say what specific work she is undertaking to ensure a reinstatement of the fund?

Mrs Foster: The budget discussions will be ongoing from now until the end of October, and, if I can count on the support of my colleagues to put in place, as a priority, the reinstatement of the events funding, then the events funding will be reinstated.

This is about priorities and about making sure that we have the right priorities in place. I will be forwarding the priorities for my Department. I have heard some people say that the international funds should basically be robbed to try to assist the events funding. The first thing to say about that is that the international funds have a letter of offer and contractual commitments, and I am not in the business of breaking contractual commitments. The second thing to say about annual sponsorship is that people apply every year. They apply to the fund, and there is no guarantee of receiving funding every year. Everybody has to apply every year and be assessed alongside all the other applications that come in. So it is a competitive process and while people may say that their funds have been cut, they do not have any funds any year until they apply to the fund.

Economic Recovery: Slowdown

T4. Mrs D Kelly asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment what re-profiling she is doing in her Department to assist businesses during this time of uncertainty, given that she may be aware of reports of a slowdown in the recovery of the economy. (AQT 1584/11-15)

Mrs Foster: I read the Ulster Bank monitoring paper this morning as I was coming up in the car. It said that, for the fifteenth month in a row, we are facing into growth, so I am not sure from where the Member is obtaining her information. I cannot say that Richard Ramsey is ordinarily the person who gives good news, but he continues to give good news from the Ulster Bank. Therefore, I can only take it as an objective analysis.

For the record — it is important to say this — the number of people claiming unemployment benefit has fallen by 12,600 over the last 20 months. That is a good-news story. As well as that, for the ninth consecutive month, we have had a rise in the number of jobs being created, so there is good news out there. Sometimes, I wish that people would try to give confidence, because confidence is the important thing to give to our economy so that people will spend to go forward and create more new jobs.

Mrs D Kelly: I assure the Minister that I did not pluck this out of the air, and there was an acknowledgement in the articles that I read that there has been recent growth. However, this is against the backdrop of public sector cuts and the redundancy schemes that are being discussed and the fact that we are still, by and large, a low-wage economy. My question is this: how is the Minister re-profiling the programme of work for the next six months and the next financial year in the light of the cuts that are threatening her Department and others?

Mrs Foster: Nobody can say that I have not been creating jobs in this economy over this last period. We had an Executive meeting on Thursday night to agree a loan from Her Majesty's Government to try to get us out of difficulties so that we can bring some sort of stability to the economy in Northern Ireland and avert crisis, and the SDLP did not support that. The SDLP felt it better that we should go into crisis rather than try to get stability into the Northern Ireland economy. I would rather have stability in the Northern Ireland economy than crisis at any time.

Mrs D Kelly: Answer the question.

Mrs Foster: I did answer the question.

Energy Costs

T5. Mr Weir asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment what level of difficulty she believes high energy costs are causing, particularly for large companies in Northern Ireland. (AQT 1585/11-15)

Mrs Foster: This is a real issue, and one that I know Members from North Antrim are particularly concerned about, given the news from Gallaher over the past week. I have been working with the Utility Regulator to do some work on energy costs. There is a very net area that I can look at. I cannot look at wholesale costs, and I cannot look at a whole range of other issues. However, in the area that I can look at with the Utility Regulator, we are looking at that at present, and I hope to be able to say something on that in the very near future.

Mr Weir: I thank the Minister for her response. Obviously, we will be coming back to Gallaher with the question for urgent oral answer. What contributory factor did the energy costs have on the Gallaher decision?

3.00 pm

Mrs Foster: The Gallaher decision was more about two huge issues: first, the illegal trade in tobacco items; and secondly, the implementation of the European directive, which has had a huge impact. I will return to that during the Urgent Oral Question, because I think that it is important that Members not currently in the House and the wider community outside understand why JTI Gallaher has taken that decision. Of course, it is up to us to try to work through the consultation process to see whether there is anything that we can do about that decision, but those were the two big impacts.

Broadband: East Antrim

T6. Mr Wilson asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment when is she expecting the report from BT that will indicate exactly where £15 million of investment in improving access to fibre broadband networks across east Antrim will be made, given that many people in that area, which has some of the worst provision, welcomed the Minister's news of that investment. (AQT 1586/11-15)

Mrs Foster: In relation to that fund, we have already received indication that that work will take place in eight phases. I do not have the information in front of me about when east Antrim comes on line, but I am happy to share that with the Member. He is right to say that we have invested hugely in telecoms interventions in the past, and we continue to do so, but, as he will recognise, it becomes more and more difficult to get to those at the edge, if you like, who need help with their broadband.

Mr Wilson: I accept that it is difficult, especially in rural areas, but I trust that investment will be made. Is the Minister aware that there are eight industrial estates across Northern Ireland, two of them in east Antrim, which currently do not have access to fibre-optic broadband? Those are not even being considered in this BT review. Does the Minister think that that is a wise decision in light of her industrial policy?

Mrs Foster: As the Member knows, I can only cajole and try to influence BT on its commercial applications, but he is right to raise the issue of industrial parks. If we are to look at new ways of having inward investors look at industrial parks, then we must have a good offering for them to look at, and that includes having connectivity and broadband accessibility. It is something that I am looking at with Invest Northern Ireland to see whether there are any interventions that we can take.

Ulster Orchestra: Challenges

T7. Miss M McIlveen asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment to comment on the current difficulties and challenges facing the Ulster Orchestra, given that she will be aware of the substantial contribution that the orchestra makes to Northern Ireland. (AQT 1587/11-15)

Mrs Foster: Like the Member, I had the great pleasure of listening to the Ulster Orchestra last Wednesday evening at a BBC concert. It makes a substantial investment in Northern Ireland through its cultural grasp. It engages in a wide range of activities. Actually, when I was looking at JTI Gallaher, it did not escape me that it has been the orchestra's principal corporate sponsor in recent years, so, not only is it facing difficulties with its government funding, it is also unfortunately now facing difficulties in its corporate funding. I am a great supporter of the Ulster Orchestra, and I very much want to see it survive.

Miss M McIlveen: I welcome the Minister's comments. I am aware that the funding of the Ulster Orchestra falls outside DETI's remit, but the Minister will agree that the brand of the Ulster Orchestra is important to the marketing of Northern Ireland. Is the Minister in a position to give any assistance to the orchestra at this stage or in the absence of any help coming from DCAL?

Mrs Foster: I am happy to work collaboratively with the Member and with DCAL in looking at some imaginative ways to help, but the principal funding, as she will understand, will still have to reside with the Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure. I hope that its Minister realises the importance of the Ulster Orchestra to Northern Ireland.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: There may not be time for a supplementary, but I call Mr Joe Byrne.

Inward Investment: North-west

T8. Mr Byrne asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment what progress is being made in attracting inward investment to the north-west, particularly to Strabane, which has suffered greatly from unemployment over the years, and to Derry city, given that there is great concern about having balanced regional development across Northern Ireland. (AQT 1588/11-15)

Mrs Foster: There is, but, as the Member will know, Convergys has announced 333 new jobs for Londonderry, and I was very pleased to be present for that announcement. We are also engaging with others who are currently assessing the city and region for new inward investment. I hope that a good, positive message comes forward from all the representatives in that area to ensure that we can land that proposition and do not blow it away through negativity.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I call Joe Byrne for a quick supplementary question.

Mr Byrne: I thank the Minister for her answer. Does she accept that it is very important that Invest Northern Ireland gives every encouragement to any would-be investor that may be attracted to Strabane or Derry? Does she also accept that the necessary support and the financial backup is vital for potential job creation projects?

Mrs Foster: I could give a very short answer and say yes. However, I will also say that Invest Northern Ireland offers very attractive figures for those who want to invest outside Belfast. If the Member looks at the figures that we have offered to some of the inward investors, he will see that.

Environment

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: For Members' information, questions 1 and 12 have been withdrawn.

Road Fatalities

2. Mr McKinney asked the Minister of the Environment what steps he is taking to address the number of fatalities on roads. (AQO 6836/11-15)

Mr Durkan (The Minister of the Environment): I am extremely concerned by the number of road deaths this year. My sincere sympathy is with all the families and communities affected by those tragedies.

My Department continues to take a range of actions to reduce deaths and serious injuries on our roads. We focus on the principal collision causation factors and the groups that are over-represented in the casualty figures. Those are a key focus of the road safety strategy to 2020. Over 100 of the 224 action measures in the strategy have been completed, and they address issues including changes to road engineering, changes to the driving test, and the setting up of a PSNI collision investigation unit.

My Department has also completed analysis of the reasons for the fall in road casualties in the period 2009-2012. That work concluded that the effects of the recession played some part, directly or indirectly, in the reductions in NI road fatalities in the period. However, based on the available evidence set out in the paper, the economic situation could not be said to be singly responsible.

The effects of the recession appear to have included more fuel-economic driving, which would have seen a reduction in speeding and an overall reduction in distances travelled. The recession may also have led to a reduction in drink-driving. Economic factors could also account for the reduction in young male drivers. In those indirect ways, the recession may have reduced road fatalities, despite counter-factors such as an increase in the age of the vehicle fleet. Previous recessions in Britain have also seen reductions in road fatalities.

I launched two new road safety campaigns this year, which address cyclist safety and inappropriate speed. We are also developing a strategy to improve motorcyclist safety and are taking forward a fitness-to-drive review to consider the factors that increase risks for older road users. I believe that those measures, along with others that are carried out by my Department and our partners, will help to save lives on our roads.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I remind the Minister about the two-minute rule.

Mr McKinney: I thank the Minister of his fulsome answer. My supplementary question touches on the recession, but in another way. What implications would cuts in departmental budgets have for measures to improve road safety?

Mr Durkan: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank Mr McKinney for his question and his supplementary question.

As a Budget for 2015-16 has not yet been agreed, I cannot provide a full assessment of how resource pressures will impact on any area of my Department or on my road safety partners. However, I remain fully committed to working with stakeholders to improve road safety and to reduce casualties and, particularly, of course, fatalities.

Reductions in funding will make a number of activities more challenging, including the creating and airing of road safety advertising by DOE, roads maintenance and improvement by DRD and on-the-ground enforcement by the PSNI and the Driver and Vehicle Agency. The financial situation will require us to continue to work in a joined-up way across government and, indeed, society to do things that make us all, as road users, improve our behaviours. That is a challenge to which my officials and their colleagues in other government and community organisations are already rising, with, for instance, extensive engagement on cycling, motorcycling and enforcement.

Ms Lo: There was a recent cut to the road safety grants programme for the voluntary and community sector, even though letters of offer had been sent out to recipients. That grant has been stopped. Does the Minister recognise that his party's position on welfare reform is leading to cuts in vital services such as road safety?

Mr Durkan: I thank Ms Lo for her question, but it is somewhat misdirected. I recognise the value of the work that organisations carry out through the grant to which she refers. However, I fail to see any correlation between welfare reform, and the current impasse around it, and budgetary positions. It has been well publicised — Ms Lo's ministerial colleagues may have shared this with her — that the decision taken by the Executive just last week on the loan has kicked the welfare reform issue down the road. The cuts associated with the impasse on welfare reform have not been seen yet.

We are all seeing cuts, and I am sure that we all regret that we are seeing them. All Ministers regret any cuts that they have to make in their Department, and I particularly regret any cut that might have a detrimental impact on road safety and put people's lives at risk. However, the cuts are the outworkings of a flawed Budget that was voted for in the Assembly almost three and a half years ago. It was a four-year Budget that was not fit for purpose: it is never possible to vote for a four-year Budget that will still be fit for purpose four years later. However, that has nothing to do with welfare reform and my party's position on it.

Mrs Cameron: I thank the Minister for his answers thus far. In light of the very many fatalities, especially this year, how effective does he deem the very graphic and expensive television adverts, which are part of campaigns to cut road deaths, to be? It is to be seen how effective they are. Does he appreciate that those campaigns can cause families of victims great distress?

Mr Durkan: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank Mrs Cameron for her question. She correctly referred to the high number of deaths this year, which stands at 62. We must bear in mind that, five years ago, we had 115 deaths in one year. Improvements have been made, and we have reduced the number of lives being lost on our roads, although, sadly, that figure seems to be on the way up again this year. One death on the road is one too many.

The reduction that I spoke about — we have gone from being one of the countries in Europe with the most dangerous roads and the highest rates of fatalities, collisions and casualties to being one of the safer countries — is without doubt attributable in some part to the DOE advertising campaigns. I do not claim that DOE road safety advertising should get sole credit for the reductions, but education, enforcement and engineering have all had a role to play in improving road safety.

Our campaigns have played and will continue to play a significant part in our aspiration to work towards zero road deaths. We have extensive evidence that people watch, are aware of and are influenced by our advertising campaigns. I certainly would not sanction expenditure on something if I was not provided with evidence or was not convinced that it represented value for money. Numerous studies have been done over the years that have shown how many lives have been saved through advertising.

As regards the upset that may be caused to families of victims, that is obviously not the intention behind any advert. However, it is important that the ads are hard-hitting, and the evidence suggests that the more hard-hitting they are, the more impact and influence they have on drivers' behaviour.

3.15 pm

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: That was an important answer, but I ask the Minister to respect the two-minute rule.

Mr Boylan: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for his previous answers. Will he outline the extent of the working partnership between his Department and the Road Safety Authority in the South? If there have been any discussions, what were the thematic priorities in addressing road fatalities that arose?

Mr Durkan: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Uasal Ó Baoighealláin as an cheist. I thank Mr Boylan for that question.

There exists a very good working relationship between my officials dealing with road safety and their counterparts in the Republic of Ireland. We share the same roads. Daily, many of our drivers use roads in the Republic, and many drivers from the Republic use our roads, so it is only right and sensible that we work closely on issues of road safety.

At North/South Ministerial Council meetings with the Environment Minister from the South, I raise regularly the need to work closely on issues of road safety. Of particular interest to the Member might be the work ongoing, albeit more slowly than we would like, on the mutual recognition of penalty points in both jurisdictions. That will be a vital cog in closing the gaps in the system for bad and irresponsible drivers who float between jurisdictions, putting people's lives, including their own, at risk in doing so.

The Road Traffic (Amendment) Bill is progressing — well, I hope that it is progressing — through Committee Stage, and the Member will be very familiar with that. Through the Bill, we hope to change the drink-drive limits here to bring them into correlation with those in the Republic. That will reduce or eradicate the grey area that some people exploit wittingly or, in many cases, unwittingly.

Mrs Overend: I note the good intentions behind the Road Traffic (Amendment) Bill, especially to cut the number of young fatalities, but does the Minister accept that what works well in urban areas may not work as well in rural areas? Will the Minister give a commitment that he will listen to the concerns of rural communities about the Bill?

Mr Durkan: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank Mrs Overend for that question and welcome the fact that she recognises the merits of the Bill as it stands. No doubt, it will retain many merits and, hopefully, contain improvements once it has got through Committee Stage and the other stages that it must go through before it becomes law.

At First Reading, concerns were raised by some representatives about some sort of disproportionate impact that the legislation might have on people living and driving in the countryside. I assure the Member that I will take account of all points raised at any stage throughout this process. However, I must make the point that people from rural areas, particularly young males, are over-represented in the casualty figures — not so much as fatalities but as the cause of fatalities, collisions and casualties. There is a historical over-representation of people from and in rural communities.

It is important, of course, that we listen to the concerns raised. It is important that whatever we end up or come out with is workable and enforceable, and it has to be effective. That is my aim.

Rural Dwellers: Non-farming

3. Mr McElduff asked the Minister of the Environment how his Department is engaging with rural communities regarding the right of non-farming rural dwellers to build and live in the countryside. (AQO 6837/11-15)

Mr Durkan: Le do chead, a PhríomhLeas-Cheann Comhairle, glacfaidh mé bomaite sa bhreis leis an cheist seo a fhreagairt. With your permission, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker, I would like a wee bit of extra time for this answer.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: You have already taken it. [Laughter.]

Mr Durkan: I cannot speed.

The Member will be well aware of the background to this issue and that this matter has been subject to considerable examination in the past. As part of the development of planning policy statement (PPS) 21, an independent working group (IWG) was established to consider the issue of non-farming rural dwellers. The group was chaired by Jim Mackinnon, the then chief planner for the Scottish Government, and involved experts from the fields of planning, the environment, rural development and the legal profession, who each brought their individual expertise to the project.

At the time, the IWG reached a number of conclusions, including:

“Planning policy should not create a special category for the non-farming rural dweller. Planning decisions for single houses should not be determined on the basis of kinship, connection or occupation”.

The previous Minister of the Environment again considered this issue as part of his review into the operation of PPS 21. That review reported in July 2013. As part of the review, he met former members of the IWG to hear, at first hand, their expert perspectives on the matter. The advice was reiterated that the term “non-farming rural dweller” is difficult to interpret and define and should not, therefore, be used to create a special category of planning policy.

Notwithstanding the above, Members will be aware that my Department recently consulted upon a draft strategic planning policy statement (SPPS) for Northern Ireland. The SPPS consolidates and, where necessary, updates existing policy provisions set out within the current suite of planning policy statements, including those in PPS 21, ‘Sustainable Development in the Countryside’. As part of this process, I gave an undertaking to this Chamber that the SPPS should adequately meet the needs of current and future generations of farming and non-farming rural dwellers seeking permission to build in the countryside.

My officials are analysing all the responses, which will be carefully considered, and a synopsis will be made available to the Environment Committee. Once this exercise is complete, I will decide on the final policy direction in respect of non-farming rural dwellers and the SPPS overall.

Mr McElduff: Can I have an additional minute for my supplementary? OK. [Laughter.] I thank the Minister for his answer and for his agreeing to meet me and a number of architects and planning advisers from County Tyrone in the near future to discuss this. Ahead of that meeting, can I seek a commitment from the Minister that he will approach with an open mind any new ideas, proposed amendments and proposed improvements to PPS 21, especially if they improve the life chances of rural people who want to live and build in the countryside?

Mr Durkan: I thank the Member for the supplementary question. Indeed, I look forward to our meeting on 28 October. I assure the Member that I will approach that meeting, as I do any and every meeting, with an open mind. I am always willing to hear constructive input and ideas from other Members of the Assembly and from experts in their fields, be they architects or planning agents, and, indeed, from members of the public.

Mr Dunne: I, too, thank the Minister for his contribution in relation to PPS 21. Does he fully recognise the need to amend PPS 21 to allow for some flexibility, so that people brought up in the countryside are included in applications under a measured scheme, but one that gives a chance to families to remain in areas where they were brought up?

Mr Durkan: I thank Mr Dunne for his supplementary question. I recognise the needs and desires that people brought up in a particular area have to remain there. Where possible, provision should and could be made in a policy to accommodate the needs of such people. However, it is worth bearing in mind that PPS 21, as it stands, does offer considerable development opportunities for non-farming rural people wishing to live in the countryside and not just to farmers. I expect a couple of supplementaries to say “not even” to farmers.

Those opportunities include replacement dwellings; the conversion and reuse of non-residential buildings as dwellings; new dwellings within an existing cluster or ribbon of buildings; social and affordable housing schemes; development within designated dispersed rural communities; and a dwelling to meet compelling personal or domestic circumstances. There is certainly no moratorium on building in the countryside for non-farming dwellers. Opportunities exist, but evidently, from the contributions of Members not just today — we had a debate a few months ago on this subject — it seems that sufficient ones do not.

Mr Rogers: Minister, we talk about farmers; what discussions has your Department had with DARD with respect to the idea of an active farmer? How will that inform future planning policy?

Mr Durkan: I thank the Member for his supplementary question. My officials work constantly with their counterparts in DARD on many issues. This is certainly one. In particular, representatives from the Northern Ireland Environment Agency (NIEA) and DARD have a lot of overlap as regards farms and the designation of areas. The Member will be well aware of that; he speaks to me often enough about it.

The definition of a working farm has caused some consternation and confusion when it comes to the interpretation and application of planning policy. Of late, subsequent to a few decisions by the Planning Appeals Commission, it seems that planners have been assessing applications under PPS 21 CTY10 more strictly. They are looking for more evidence of what constitutes a working farm — sorry, it is not that they are looking for more evidence but that the sources of evidence that they are looking for have been reduced. Now, in all bar the most extreme cases, they will require the DARD active farm user number.

Mr Elliott: I thank the Minister for his answers. Given the recent judicial review (JR) decision on a rural planning application in, I think, the Lisburn council area, will that mean that there will be changes from the Department to Planning Service officers on the ground in relation to dwelling applications, whether for farmers or non-farmers?

Mr Durkan: I thank Mr Elliott for his supplementary question. I indicated in my previous answer that the outcome of JRs or Planning Appeals Commission hearings inevitably has a knock-on impact on the interpretation and analysis or assessment of planning applications. Since a recent ruling, I have seen a tightening of PPS 21. It seems to have become somewhat more rigid. That is evidenced by the number of Members here who have brought constituents to me who, six or eight months ago, might have received permission, but, with the new reading of the rules, unfortunately have not. It is worth bearing in mind that there is a balance to be struck. I do not think that anyone would dispute that PPS 21 is much more permissive than its predecessor, PPS 14. However, it is there for a reason. There have to be rules. Any development anywhere, let alone in the countryside, must be sustainable. It is important that, whatever we arrive at through the SPPS, it recognises that. We have a job to protect the countryside as well.

Mr McCallister: Does the Minister accept that there are inconsistencies in the application of the policy throughout Northern Ireland? Does he also accept that some families who get permission to build on a farm location then struggle to raise finance simply because mortgage providers are nervous about the location if ever repossession became an issue?

3.30 pm

Mr Durkan: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank Mr McCallister for his question. I have no doubt that there have been inconsistencies across the North, not only in the implementation of this planning policy but of many others. However, the issue of perceived inconsistencies with PPS 21 has been addressed to some extent by the establishment by my predecessor of a peer review group, which will look at the more contentious or complex PPS 21 applications. That group consists of senior planners from each of the planning divisions. I think that it is a very useful tool for hearing what is going on in different areas and what views planners from those areas bring to the table. It is vital as well that there is consistency right across the board when it comes to the implementation and application of any planning policy.

I have also become aware of difficulties around mortgage applications. Unfortunately, it is not something new. Historically, mortgage lenders have been cautious about things such as occupancy conditions, which are unique, almost, to countryside applications. However, they seem to have got a lot more cautious of late. I have instructed planning officials to intervene or assist applicants, where possible, be it through a letter of comfort or a letter of support to the lending company.

Councillors: Appeals Mechanism

4. Mr G Kelly asked the Minister of the Environment whether there will be an appeals mechanism for councillors in the new councils following an adjudication from the Commissioner for Complaints. (AQO 6838/11-15)

Mr Durkan: Part 9 of the Local Government Act 2014 introduced a new ethical standards framework for councillors. That framework consists of a mandatory code of conduct for councillors, with supporting arrangements for investigation, adjudication and appeals.

Members may recall that, as a result of amendments agreed by the Assembly at the Bill's Consideration Stage and Further Consideration Stage, provisions for a High Court appeal mechanism were introduced into the Local Government Bill. That would provide for any person who is subject to further action by the commissioner as a result of their failure to comply with the code of conduct to appeal against the decision of the commissioner to the High Court if the High Court gives the person leave to do so. The ethical standards framework was brought fully into operation on 2 June this year by commencement order.

Members may recall that, in response to concerns raised by the commissioner about the effect that the introduction of a High Court appeal mechanism could have on his constitutional position, I indicated that I was considering bringing forward a further Bill to separate the investigation and adjudication functions of the ethical standards framework. During the debate on the draft code of conduct on 27 May, I informed the Assembly that I was seeking legal advice to assist in determining whether a new adjudication model would be needed. Following my consideration of that legal advice, I take this opportunity to confirm to Members that I am satisfied that the current ethical standards framework can operate without further amendments and — you will be relieved to hear — there is no requirement to bring forward a further Bill. Therefore, the supporting mechanisms of investigation, adjudication and appeals, as currently provided in the 2014 Act, will not be subject to further change.

Mr G Kelly: Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as a fhreagra go dtí seo. I thank the Minister for his answer up to now. After that explanation, maybe he will tell us how the post of commissioner will be funded. How will the funding be dealt with?

Mr Durkan: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank Mr Kelly for that supplementary question. There has been considerable debate, not only about the functions or role of the commissioner but about how the office will be funded from across the councils. Should it be done on a case-by-case basis, according to the number of cases coming to the commissioner from each council and should councils have to pay on that basis? However, it is my opinion that the money should be top-sliced to pay for it before it goes out and becomes a function.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: That ends the period for listed questions. We now move on to topical questions.

Dunfield Terrace, Derry: Planning Approval

T1. Mr P Ramsey asked the Minister of the Environment, in light of a high-profile campaign by residents in the Dunfield Terrace area of Derry, what the rationale was behind the planners approving that application for housing. (AQT 1591/11-15)

Mr Durkan: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Member for his question — lots. It is not an approval that was reached lightly by the planners in Derry, particularly given the high volume of objections and, indeed, high level of media interest in the application. I took a personal look at it and toiled with it for some time. However, despite the numerous objections and grounds for objection, the planners have arrived at their decision to approve. In reaching that decision, the Department has taken into account the views of statutory consultees, Derry City Council, objectors and supporters and — the key to this — the planning history on-site. From a planning perspective, the Department considers that the principle of housing development on the site has been long established. Detailed design and roads matters, which historically have been the main impediment to some previous applications on the site, were by and large addressed in the application.

I have received regular correspondence from objectors, both in advance of the decision and subsequent to it. I have to say that I am heartened by the maturity that they have shown and with which they have received the decision. They accept that we were bound by policy and by planning history and that any outcome other than approval was extremely unlikely.

Mr P Ramsey: I thank the Minister for his response. There is clear evidence that it has been one of the most controversial sites, given that it is one of the most beautiful landmarks in the city. Is the Minister aware of proposals tabled via the council or via the residents' group for a land swap that might broker a deal that would enable housing to be built elsewhere so that that land would be retained as the beauty spot that it is?

Mr Durkan: Mr Ramsey quite rightly refers to the importance of the site in the city of Derry and its position as a strategic viewpoint for the city as a whole. As I said, I have been in regular correspondence with objectors to the scheme and have therefore been made aware of negotiations between them, the landowner and statutory agencies such as the council. I am not privy to the full detail of those discussions. However, I am aware that the residents remain hopeful of a positive outcome, and I have offered them my support to achieve one.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I call Mr Gregory Campbell.

Strandview, Portstewart: Planning Application

Mr Campbell: Thank you, Principal Speaker — Deputy Speaker. That was nearly a Freudian slip there.

T2. Mr Campbell asked the Minister of the Environment — sticking with County Londonderry rather than the city — whether he has anything to report on the planning application at Portstewart's Strandview, given that he kindly took up my invitation to visit that area, and, in the eight months since he visited the site, there has been no outcome or response from the planners. (AQT 1592/11-15)

Mr Durkan: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank Mr Campbell for that question. I do indeed remember the site visit. I still have the scars.

Subsequent to the meeting that we held with objectors to that development, an approach was made by planning officials back to the developer. It is worth bearing it in mind that the scheme was recommended for approval. However, planners have gone back to the developer to ask him to revisit the scheme, taking into consideration some of the concerns that were raised by objectors. Some of the concerns that they raised were extremely pertinent; some were less so. Bearing it in mind that there are over 6,500 planning applications in the system at a time, as far as I am aware, revised drawings have been submitted. We looked at them and deemed that they were not perhaps sufficiently revised. We are now awaiting or have been in receipt of further revised drawings that will go some way to satisfying residents' concerns.

Mr Campbell: I thank the Minister for his response and his visit on that occasion. It is a picturesque beauty spot, as the Minister knows, given that he has visited the site. Will he ensure that, even with the amended drawings, the capacity for whatever number of dwellings the revised drawings indicate will be looked at in the context of the existing properties that are there and will not run counter to them?

Mr Durkan: I thank the Member for his supplementary question. What I can assure him of — I hope that I already have — is that the concerns of residents were heard that day. As I said, some of the concerns or objections that they raised were more pertinent and had more weight in planning terms than others. Attempts have been made by my Department to, I suppose, get an improved deal for the residents who object to the scheme, but I cannot, at this stage, give the Member any assurances as to how improved that might be.

Social Housing: Enniskillen

T3. Mr Flanagan asked the Minister of the Environment to give an assurance that the former MoD site at Grosvenor Barracks in Enniskillen, which is a 17.2 acre site, with plans for 200 houses, and will transfer to the new Fermanagh and Omagh District Council from 1 April, will be used for social housing and will not be sold off to the highest bidder. (AQT 1593/11-15)

Mr Durkan: I thank Mr Flanagan for his question. I have to plead complete ignorance of the application to which he refers. I always think that it is safer to admit when you do not know the answer to something. I am sure that the Member would agree with me on that. Will the site itself be passed to the council?

Mr Flanagan: Yes.

Mr Durkan: OK. Well, along with the site going to the council, what will go to the council, as the Member will be aware, is the statutory function of planning. Councils will start their own planning processes, that of drawing up their own local development plans. Some councils, while still in shadow form, have commenced that work already. An important part of those area plans will be the designation of sites and zones for social housing. I know that there is acute need for it in many areas across the North, and I am sure that the Member's constituency is no exception to that. The council will have a major if not final say in what that land is zoned for.

Mr Flanagan: I thank the Minister and commend him for his efforts to answer that question blind. I want to tease it out a wee bit further with him. The site is being transferred to the council. Is there any way in which the council can ensure that the site is developed for social housing instead of putting it on the market? For example, will the council be allowed to do a public sector trawl that might include social housing providers? Would they be excluded from a public sector trawl?

Mr Durkan: As I have outlined, the council will ultimately be able to say that that land is zoned for social housing. Unfortunately, it is outside my gift or ability to say that it will ultimately be developed for social housing, though. As the Member rightly identifies, that will require cooperation and collaboration between the council and social housing providers through the Northern Ireland Housing Executive and ultimately the housing builders, which would be housing associations. If the demand exists in that area for social housing — I imagine that it does if it is, in any way, similar to other areas across the North — I cannot think why there would be great difficulty in getting it on to the social housing programme eventually. However, that would be a question for the Minister for Social Development.

Rates: RPA Increases

T4. Mr Dunne asked the Minister of the Environment for further clarification on the new rates billing system under RPA, given that he will be aware of the scare stories in the media last week on the possibility of significant rates increases due to the variation across the new council areas. (AQT 1594/11-15)

Mr Durkan: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank Mr Dunne for the question. I did indeed see the scare stories, as Mr Dunne quite accurately puts it, in the media last week. I wondered where they had come from and what had prompted them arising just last week, after we have come so far down the road towards local government reform. I would be lying if I said that there will not be or have not been issues around rates convergence, but a lot of work has been done and is being done to ensure that the impact of rates convergence on ratepayers in certain areas across the North is minimised. I know that Fermanagh is one area that could see a jump in its rates, and there are others that will see an equally large jump. My predecessor managed to secure £30 million from the Executive to deal with the issue of rates convergence, and DFP is currently finalising what the scheme that will dish out that £30 million to mitigate any detrimental impact of rates convergence will look like.

Mr Dunne: I thank the Minister for his answer. Does he agree, though, that it is important that there is an increase in public awareness of his transitional arrangements to give some assurance to the public that they are not going to be hit with a massive increase in their bill?

Mr Durkan: I thank the Member for the supplementary question. I believe that we have a responsibility. It is not just for me as Minister of the Environment or Mr Hamilton as Minister of Finance and Personnel, as, ultimately, it will be his transitional rates relief scheme as opposed to mine. All Members — those who voted for the reform of local government and even those who might have voted against it — have a leadership role to play and should be doing more to allay concerns, rather than stir them up.

October Monitoring Round: DOE Implications

T5. Mr A Maginness asked the Minister of the Environment to outline the impact and implications of the October monitoring round on his Department. (AQT 1595/11-15)

Mr Durkan: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Member for his question.

My Department currently has a range of actions to deliver in-year 4.4% baseline reductions. They include the following measures: ceasing to fill vacant posts in my Department, which is 167 full-time equivalent posts; ceasing the use of contract and temporary workers; reductions in general admin expenditure across all business areas of the Department; utilisation of an in-year reduced requirement on the ring-fenced coastal communities fund; postponement of planned procurements; curtailing spend on a number of contracts; reducing grants for a range of programmes, unfortunately; and reducing the number of lower-priority environmental programmes funded. I also, unfortunately, have to stop funding to any new projects or initiatives.

My Department has conducted a review of budgets across all business areas, and the measures identified to deliver the in-year cuts are those deemed to lessen the impact on the Department's ability to deliver public services. However, the impact of the cuts on my Department's programmes is magnified because of the inability of my Department to cut local government grants in-year. That means that the impact of such percentage cuts falls disproportionately and unfairly on core departmental programmes. As part of October monitoring, I put forward a bid of £0.9 million to seek the reinstatement of part of the reductions made in June and requested that the local government grants be excluded from any reductions.

Unfortunately, the issue has not been addressed, which means that funding for core departmental work in my Department has been disproportionately and unfairly reduced.

Question for Urgent Oral Answer

Enterprise, Trade and Investment

JTI Gallaher: Proposed Closure

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Mr David McIlveen has given notice of a question for urgent oral answer to the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment. I remind Members that, if they wish to ask a supplementary question, they should rise continually in their places. The Member who tabled the question will automatically be called to ask a supplementary question. I will call Mr Allister, who tabled a similar question, after Mr McIlveen.

Mr D McIlveen asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment what plans her Department has to support workers affected by the proposed closure of the JTI Gallaher factory.

Mrs Foster (The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment): First, I wish to express my sincere sympathy to all those workers who face a very uncertain future over the coming months as a result of JTI's announcement last week. The company has stressed that the decision is in no way a reflection on the manufacturing performance of the local team. In the meantime, Invest Northern Ireland continues to work closely with the company and with the Department for Employment and Learning to ensure that those employees who may be impacted by the outcome of the consultation are offered good advice, help and support at the most appropriate time.

Mr D McIlveen: I appreciate the opportunity to ask this question today, and I thank the Minister for her response. Despite being cheerleaders for the tobacco products directive in the European Parliament, Sinn Féin, locally, appears to be absolving itself of all responsibility for the proposed closure of the factory. Have discussions that you have had with JTI management since the announcement given you any indication as to its exact reasoning behind the proposed closure?

Mrs Foster: I have not had the opportunity to speak to senior management as yet. I indicated to the House earlier that Stephen Farry and I hope to be engaged at the Ballymena plant later this year. The management has said that it has various processes that it needs to go through, so it does not want to break protocol.

I have had the opportunity, as have other Executive Ministers, to speak to the senior trade union people since the announcement. However, I had spoken to management before the announcement, and it indicated two important areas. First, management indicated the growth in illegal trade, which has led to a significant contraction in the tobacco market in a number of key countries, most notably in western Europe.

Secondly, the Member is right to mention the European Union tobacco products directive, which bans the manufacture of all cigarette packs containing fewer than 20 cigarettes and all hand-rolling tobacco pouches of less than 30 grams from May 2016. The reason for that is that 40% of the plant and machinery at Lisnafillan deals with small packs, and they cannot deal with the larger packs that have been imposed from Europe. The company has regrettably taken the decision to move its production to Poland or Romania.

Members and people outside the House will say that Poland and Romania are in Europe as well. Those factories are already equipped with the machinery to be able to deal with the larger packs. They do not have to put in the capital investment that would have been needed at Lisnafillan, so they have decided to move ahead.

Mr Allister: The Minister is doubtless aware of the huge hole that this news will leave in the economy in the Ballymena area and further afield in manufacturing terms, given the significance of Gallaher. As we look forward to try to fill that hole, what assistance can the Minister ensure flows from Invest NI to promoting north Antrim as a site to visit for future potential foreign direct investment, given that the figures to date are quite disappointing, with, in the past half a dozen years, six visits or thereabouts to north Antrim? How can the Minister help to break what seems to be the Belfast-centric monopoly on new foreign direct investment? Can she help in that regard, and will she?

Mrs Foster: Of course, the Member is aware that I was recently on a trade delegation to the Middle East with companies from Northern Ireland, one of which was Wrightbus from north Antrim. Wrightbus has great manufacturing plans for Ballymena. We will continue to support it in that regard. That includes going to areas that the Member may feel that we should not go to, but I make no apologies for going to Saudi Arabia and places like that to try to secure new plans and new programmes for Wrightbus.

The Member mentioned our relationship with north Antrim and Ballymena. There have been significant announcements in north Antrim, not just Wrightbus but Moy Park. Although the Moy Park announcement was made in Dungannon, it has an impact in upper Bann and Ballymena. So, there are announcements being made outside Belfast. I did not think that the Member would join the Sinn Féin chorus for positive discrimination against Belfast, but there we are: we live and learn every day.

Mr Frew: Will the Minister make it a priority, her first objective, to try to persuade JTI Gallaher to retain some of the jobs on the site? We have a very modern, up-to-date cigar factory. We also have a fully refurbished research and development depot that researched tobacco for plants all over the world. Will the Minister reassure the House that she will try everything that she can to retain some jobs and to support the massive pool of subcontractors on the site?

Mrs Foster: I thank the Member for that supplementary. Let me say to him, first, that we will meet management, hopefully this week. I have said to the unions that I am more than prepared to go to Geneva to speak to the management in headquarters there. I am prepared also to go to Japan, if necessary. As it happens, the British ambassador to Japan was in Northern Ireland just last week. He met our colleague, the Member of Parliament for the area. It is hoped that the ambassador will raise the issue of Lisnafillan with JTI management when he returns to Japan in the near future. There is a little time. During the consultation period, we will meet senior management here, and I think that it is important to go to Geneva and speak to management there as well.

In relation to the subcontractors and the supply chain, I have asked Invest Northern Ireland to find out the specific impact that this will have on local firms. We know that 200 local firms subcontract for, or are in the supply chain of, JTI Gallaher, contributing £20 million to the local economy. It is vital that we find out the impact that this will have on them as well.

Mr McKay: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. Minister, the Gallaher workers are some of the most highly skilled manufacturing workers that we have. I have been speaking to some other major manufacturing firms in recent days. Moving forward, they would obviously have an interest in finding employment solutions for some of those employees. What engagement have you had with those firms and the manufacturing industry to find resolutions to the problems that these workers and their families face?

Mrs Foster: It is important to say that JTI Gallaher placed a very strong emphasis on creating transferable skills, and, because of that, we will, hopefully, be able to find accommodation in other manufacturing companies. As Mr Hilditch pointed out in his question to me during Question Time, we are dealing not just with people in north Antrim but with people in south and east Antrim and probably further afield. We will carry out a skills audit of all the employees and then approach other manufacturing companies to assess their needs so that we can match the skills of the people in Ballymena with the skills required across Northern Ireland.

4.00 pm

Mr Swann: Minister, as I am sure you are aware, the announcement on the closure of Gallaher came like a death to the community. Having met with the senior shop stewards on Friday, along with Jim Nicholson, I learned that the main reasons for the factory closure, that they see, are the TPD2 and the illegal trade, as well as the threat of cheaper labour when the production is removed from Ballymena. I may have picked you up wrong earlier, but I will stand corrected. You talked about the removal of the production to Romania or Poland. My understanding, and the understanding of the shop stewards, is that to set up the factory in Poland would take an extensive rebuild. If that is correct, is it not the case that JTI would be breaching European Commission protocols if they have sought state aid? Can the Minister get in contact with our MEPs? I know that she said that she is going to Geneva to meet the management of JTI, but will she also tie in with our MEPs in Brussels?

Mrs Foster: I will certainly tie in with any MEP who is prepared to work for the good of the Gallaher staff in Ballymena and elsewhere. Certainly, some of our MEPs, one in particular, have not been helpful for the future of those Gallaher staff. I think she should join the dots and realise that what she has engaged in has cost those jobs.

As I understood it, the Poland factory has the appropriate machinery to put forward the 40 gram and 30 gram packages that are required under the European directive, as it stands. If I am wrong, I stand corrected, but that is certainly the briefing I was given by the senior shop steward when he came to see us on Thursday. That is the message that I was getting from the MP for the area as well. However, as I say, Stephen Farry and I are hopefully going to meet the management before the end of this week, and we will get complete clarity in relation to those issues.

Mr Wilson: When Caterpillar reduced its workforce in Larne, the Minister gave an undertaking, at that stage, to work with the company to look at its worldwide operations and to find out whether there were things that could be moved to Northern Ireland. Thankfully, employment levels are back at the pre-reduction levels. Has she had any discussions with JTI to see what operations it has worldwide and whether some could be moved to Northern Ireland using, first, the facilities and, secondly, the skills of the workforce here, to at least create some additional employment rather than having the whole place close?

Mrs Foster: Yes, again, those are the sorts of things we will be talking to the management about when we have that meeting later this week and, certainly, when we go to Geneva. To have gone to the parent company to see whether there was anything else we in Northern Ireland could do for the company was a good model. We were able to do work around shared services back offices, for example, with Caterpillar, when they moved to a facility in west Belfast. I think that that is something that we want to explore. A number of staff in Lisnafillan are engaged in research and development. Is there any reason why that could not continue, for example? We will want to have all those discussions, and I look forward to them happening towards the end of this week and, then, further into the next months.

Mr Flanagan: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. I am disappointed at the stance that the Minister and some in her party have taken to peddle company propaganda and to completely ignore the facts that everybody acknowledges exists by focusing on the two issues of illegal trade and an EU directive, and completely ignoring the high cost of energy and other production costs that exist here. Does the Minister accept that a number of global companies are reviewing their position here because of those high energy and production costs? Can she outline what steps she is taking to reduce those costs to try to retain maximum employment here by reducing globalisation transfers out of this place?

Mr Campbell: Not the best man to peddle propaganda.

Mrs Foster: Yes, the facts are always very important in anything that we come to the House to discuss. Therefore, I want to tell the Member that the issue of energy has not come up in any discussions that I have had with this company. I accept that other companies have particular issues in relation to energy, and I am working proactively with those companies to give them an answer. It ill behoves the Member to raise an issue about companies and their costs when the Member does all in his power to cause difficulties in relation to energy policy in the House. Then, he cannot join the dots to know that there are continuing difficulties. If we are going to help businesses with their energy costs, somebody has to pay for it. I know that that is a problem for Sinn Féin, because, like with every good socialist, somebody else pays the bill. Somebody has to pay for anything that happens in relation to energy. That is true. The Members across the way, particularly the lady — well, the Member — continue to tut in the corner. Somebody has to pay, and that is the difficulty that Sinn Féin has with every policy initiative that it brings forward.

Mr A Maginness: I thank the Minister for her very useful answers. Surely it is futile to argue about whether it is cheap labour, whether it is the illegal tobacco trade or whether it is the European directive. The fact is that this is a tragedy for those 900-odd workers who are going to be made redundant. The Minister has about 18 months to two years for the final run-down of the premises at Lisnafillan. Has the Minister any plans to put in place an intensive and extensive programme for both redeployment and retraining of the workers who are presently employed?

Mrs Foster: I do not necessarily agree with the Member that it is futile to look at the decision as to why JTI Gallaher has taken the decision to go into a 90-day consultation period. It is only by looking at the reasons behind its decision that you can try to deal with what is in front of us. If there are some reasons there that we can try to deal with, we may be able to keep some of these employees here in Northern Ireland. Therefore, it is important to look at the reasons behind why it has taken this decision, and that is what I want to explore with the company. Then we will be able to move forward and see whether there is something that we can specifically do in relation to keeping JTI Gallaher here as an entity. It is a very good entity, despite what Sinn Féin would say. It is a very good company to work for. We will see whether we can keep that company here, and, if not, we will see what we can do to help and support those workers in JTI Gallaher, who have, yes, a period of time. There are many other companies throughout Northern Ireland who announced that they were closing on a Friday and people did not have a job on the Monday. These people have at least got some time to try to find new opportunities, and we will do all that we can to assist them.

Ms Lo: Following on from Mr Maginness's question and the Minister's answer, has she any plans to work with my party colleague the Minister for Employment and Learning to see how we can help people to reskill or upskill in order for them to seek employment between now and the closure in 2017?

Mrs Foster: I do not know whether the Member has been in for all my answers, but I have been referencing the Employment and Learning Minister throughout my answers. I said that he and I had been asked by the Executive to go to Lisnafillan to engage with management, unions and staff. We will do that, and, therefore, yes, I do have plans to work with the Employment and Learning Minister.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I call Mr Steven Agnew. [Interruption.] Before moving to the next item of business —

Ms Ruane: On a point of order, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker. Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim mo leithscéal leis an Tionól as gan bheith ann i rith Thráth na gCeisteanna. I apologise to the Assembly because I was not here for one of my topical questions. No disrespect was intended to the Assembly.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Thank you for coming directly to the Chamber to make that clear.

Assembly Business

Extension of Sitting

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I have received notification from members of the Business Committee of a motion to extend the sitting past 7.00 pm under Standing Order 10(3A).

Resolved:

That, in accordance with Standing Order 10(3A), the sitting on Monday 13 October 2014 be extended to no later than 10.00 pm. — [Ms Ruane.]

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: We will take our ease while we change the top Table.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Dallat] in the Chair)

Committee Membership

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): As with similar motions, this will be treated as a business motion, and there will be no debate.

Resolved:

That Mr Michael Copeland replace Mr Roy Beggs as a member of the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister — [Mr Swann.]

Ministerial Statement

October Monitoring Round: Resource Allocations

Mr Hamilton (The Minister of Finance and Personnel):

I wish to present to the Assembly the Executive's conclusions on the resource expenditure element of the October monitoring round. The Executive's consideration of the wider October monitoring round, including the impact on capital budgets, is not yet complete. I will make a separate statement apprising the Assembly on the outcome of the full monitoring round at a later date.

As Members will be well aware, the Executive's resource departmental expenditure limit (DEL) budget in this financial year has been confronted with a range of significant pressures. In the June monitoring round, the Executive agreed to reduce departmental resource DEL by 2.1%, or £77.9 million, to address a number of those pressures. That reduction did not address the £87 million reduction to our resource DEL in 2014-15 for not implementing welfare reform in line with the rest of the United Kingdom. However, it was agreed that the Executive must address that issue in the October monitoring round.

Since June, it has become apparent that a number of Departments face inescapable pressures that cannot be addressed from within their existing resource DEL allocations. Those pressures are in addition to the costs of not implementing welfare reform. My officials have scrutinised departmental pressures, and it has been determined that £125 million of those are genuinely inescapable, with many involving legal or contractual commitments. Failure to address those departmental pressures and the cost of not implementing welfare reform through the in-year monitoring process would increase the risk that the Executive would breach its HM Treasury control total on resource expenditure. Given that addressing those pressures would inevitably require further reductions to departmental resource DEL controls, I believed it crucial that those issues should be addressed as soon as practicable to allow Departments sufficient time to manage the impact on their budgets. In view of that, following Executive discussion last Wednesday, I presented a paper to Executive colleagues on Thursday seeking Executive agreement on a way forward. I am pleased to say that the Executive endorsed those proposals.

The Executive agreed resource DEL allocations totalling £125 million, including £8 million to DARD for tuberculosis compensation; £13.8 million to DETI for Invest NI and sporting events; £60 million to the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety for pressures in the health sector; £29 million to the Department of Justice for PSNI and legal aid pressures; £4.5 million to DRD for concessionary fares; £1.3 million to OFMDFM for the Victims and Survivors Service; £0.8 million to the Northern Ireland Assembly to reinstate its June monitoring reduction; and £7.6 million to the Public Prosecution Service (PPS) for equal pay and casework challenges. Full details are set out in the annexes accompanying this statement.

The Executive exited the June monitoring round with a zero overcommitment on resource DEL. Taking account of the allocations totalling £125 million and the £87 million reduction for non-implementation of welfare reform, the Executive were overcommitted by some £212 million. Given that departmental resource expenditure has already been reduced by 2.1% this year, seeking to address that overcommitment entirely through in-year reduction to departmental budgets would have proved very difficult to manage. Therefore, with a view to easing the impact on departmental resource DEL this year, the First Minister and I sought a solution to our in-year problems in conjunction with the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

We have, as a result, been able to gain temporary access to the national reserves to draw down £100 million to assist the Executive in 2014-15. That amounts to less than 1% of our resource DEL. The Chancellor's letter to the First Minister makes it clear that access to the national reserve comes with a number of conditions, although those are largely consistent with the Executive's existing plans. This is not a question of the Treasury or Her Majesty's Government stepping in to undermine devolution. Rather, at the request of the First Minister and me, they are providing short-term assistance due to particular one-off difficulties that we have faced this year. I want to put on record my gratitude to the Chancellor for dealing with the matter in such an expeditious manner.

4.15 pm

The conditions are, first, that the Executive fully implement the 4.4% baseline reductions as indicated in June monitoring. That has now been agreed. However, as the House will be aware, I would have preferred if those reductions had been agreed during the June monitoring process when there was more time for Departments to plan prudently for reductions. Significantly, no further in-year reductions to departmental budgets are required.

Secondly, the Chancellor fully understands the critical importance of the time constraint confronting the Executive in setting the Budget for 2015-16. The Chancellor requires the Executive to have a credible 2015-16 plan in place before the end of October. Again, I would have preferred if we could have already agreed next year's Budget, but I trust that we will be able to do so in the coming weeks. I think that the Chancellor is absolutely correct to require the Executive to illustrate how we plan to move forward on the basis of a balanced Budget, taking into account all the pressures that we face and how we believe those can be addressed.

The Chancellor is not, as some might have you believe, seeking to control day-to-day spending decisions in Northern Ireland. He does not wish to dictate to the Executive how much funding health should receive or how much money education should get. He is instead, rightly, as the man responsible for all the UK's public spending, keenly interested in Northern Ireland having spending plans that ensure that we live within our means. In the light of that, I will be tabling a draft Budget paper to the Executive in the coming days and hope that it will be agreed before the end of this month.

Both those conditions are entirely consistent with the position that my Department has been advocating on October monitoring and the 2015-16 Budget process.

Thirdly, the Chancellor has confirmed that the £87 million welfare reform adjustment due to foregone annually managed expenditure (AME) savings will now be deducted from the Northern Ireland DEL later this year and that the £114 million deduction planned for next year will also go ahead should there be no progress made with Northern Ireland's welfare reform legislation. That is not actually a condition but a statement of fact from the Chancellor as to the Government's long-standing position.

The Chancellor also makes clear that repayment of this facility will happen in 2015-16. Whilst I accept that that adds to our challenges next year, the Executive have tasked the head of the Civil Service with beginning work on the development of options for reducing headcount in the public sector and further pay restraint. Along with possible political agreement on shrinking the size of Stormont, the savings that such difficult but necessary steps will realise will greatly assist us not only next year but, critically, on a recurrent basis. It is perhaps worth pointing out that, contrary to what one daily newspaper in Northern Ireland stated erroneously, interest is not payable on the loan.

It is important to stress that the Executive have now agreed to the terms and conditions set out in the Chancellor's letter. There cannot therefore be any attempt to renege or reinterpret the conditions. I have attached a copy of the Chancellor's letter to the First Minister to the statement.

The detail of the consequential impact on 2014-15 departmental resource expenditure is set out in the annexes that accompany this statement. As a result, we exit the October monitoring round overcommitted by £25 million on resource DEL. That is a significant level of overcommitment, and I have encouraged all Ministers to make best endeavours to identify reduced requirements in the remaining months of this financial year. That means that it is unlikely that any further bids for funding will be entertained by the Executive in the January monitoring round.

I am pleased to be able to advise the Assembly on what I believe is a workable solution for the challenges facing the Executive's immediate resource expenditure difficulties. However, it is unfortunate that the full implementation of the 4.4% baseline reduction — brought to the Executive in June — has been delayed to this point. That unwarranted delay has only created a more difficult environment for Departments to plan and deliver public services. We also need to be clear that the use of the £100 million facility is only a short-term fix that provides some chance for the Executive to live within adjusted HM Treasury control totals for this year.

We have needlessly squandered £87 million of funding that could have delivered significant benefits in areas like health care but for the political intransigence of some who have put their political aspirations in another jurisdiction above the best interests of the people of Northern Ireland. Opposition to passing welfare reform may well be their democratic right. However, it has, in my view, dubious merit whenever refusal to pass welfare reform legislation because you are trying to protect people already in receipt of welfare is putting people on the dole queue and condemning them and their families to a life on welfare.

I freely admit that this path through our present problems is far from perfect. It is not the all-encompassing agreement on the totality of our budget challenges that I would like to present to this House. Some have suggested that what was before the Executive last Thursday should have been rejected simply because it did not address every single issue. Such criticism is short-sighted.

It was never likely that our deliberations last week would end with agreement on dealing with this year's pressures and next year's Budget and solve the welfare reform issue. However, it would have been a complete and utter disaster if we had let another week pass without dealing with the most immediate and pressing problem that is this year's financial position. Every single day that passed was making living within our 2014-15 Budget less and less likely. The consequences of breaching the block grant would have been multiple and grave. Not only would Her Majesty's Treasury have removed the total of our overspend, which would have been in the range of £200 million to £300 million, from next year's Budget, there was the prospect of an additional penalty being heaped on top.

Issues that are important to this Assembly, such as the ongoing discussions on the devolution of corporation tax powers, would have ceased, and the flexibilities that we are seeking for the continued funding of the proposed community safety college at Desertcreat would not have materialised. It was also possible that HM Treasury would not even have tolerated our heading towards an overspend and could have stepped in before year-end and begun to manage our access to cash on a day-to-day basis. In the inevitable discussions with Treasury that would have followed a breach, I am certain that we would not have escaped without the Treasury's spotlight being shone on our so-called super-parity measures. Each of those possible negative consequences have been avoided as a result of this agreement.

The only alternative to overspend would have been to seek to live within our means by making further, deeper cuts to departmental budgets. Over the past weeks, we have heard loudly and clearly from the likes of the Chief Constable, the Health Minister and other Executive colleagues, about the severe impact that cuts above the 4.4% planned for in June would have had on public services in Northern Ireland. Those additional cuts have now been avoided and a crisis in public services has been averted. In fact, not only have savage cuts been avoided, we have been able to make £125 million in allocations to address many of the most acute pressures in the Departments of Health, Justice, Enterprise and elsewhere.

Those parties who voted against my recommendations last week and who have criticised its contents since need to answer this question: what would they have done instead? Would they breach our Budget and risk the wrath of Treasury, or make cuts of around 8% in-year to departmental budgets and accept the serious consequences that that would have had for public services?

I will not be criticised by those who offer no viable alternative to what is before us today. Nor will I be lectured by Ministers who are so hypocritical that they will welcome additional allocations to their own budgets whilst being absolutely unprepared to vote for the way in which those allocations are funded. That is not fiscally responsible. It is, instead, brazen political opportunism. Will those Ministers who are seemingly so opposed to this deal refuse extra money for their Departments, or will they, as I suspect, be only too happy to benefit from the hard work and courage of others? They can also attempt to explain, if they can, why they voted against £60 million for health, £29 million for justice or £1.3 million for victims' services when each of those areas and others were crying out for help.

To put the matter beyond any doubt, I intend to write to those Ministers who opposed October monitoring at the Executive but were the beneficiaries of allocations last Thursday to confirm that they wish to utilise the loan to ease pressures in their Departments. If they choose not to avail themselves of the benefit that the facility will bring for public services delivered by their Departments, then I will recommend to the Executive in the January monitoring round that those allocations are reversed. Clearly, if they do not wish to take up the allocations made possible by the loan facility, then that pressure on next year's Budget will be lifted.

We have put out the fire in this financial year. Had we not, I would have feared for the future of public services in Northern Ireland. A serious job of work lies ahead in the coming weeks in order to agree a Budget for next year to deal with the range of pressures that our public finances face. We must now, as one, dedicate ourselves to the huge task of agreeing a draft Budget by the end of October. I am up for that challenge and call on everyone in the Executive to similarly commit themselves. On that note, I commend this statement to the Assembly.

Mr McKay (The Chairperson of the Committee for Finance and Personnel): Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I welcome the Minister's statement. I certainly welcome the allocations in it, particularly to front line services: £60 million to Health is £60 million well needed.

I am concerned, though, about the number of inescapable pressures coming from Departments. Those from the Department of Justice and the Department of Health alone take up some £89 million of the money allocated in the October monitoring round. I would like to know how the Minister will deal with the bad habit that some Departments have picked up, coming back again and again for significant amounts of money.

The Minister also mentioned corporation tax, and I am sure that he will have picked up some comments from the British Secretary of State about that issue. Does he believe that the British Government are getting cold feet on that?

Mr Hamilton: I thank the Chairman of the Committee for his welcoming of the statement and the agreement it represents. He is right to acknowledge the allocations, and one of the positive points is that we have been able to make allocations of £125 million. I will come on to the point about inescapable pressures in a moment or two, but we have been able to alleviate the worst pressures that face the Department of Health — not all of them. The £60 million will go on top of the £20 million that was allocated and set aside for the Department of Health in the June monitoring round for a total of £80 million. Of course, I would be in a better position as Finance Minister and the whole Executive would be in a better position if we were not losing over £80 million this year — to the tune of £87 million — on top of the £13 million that was lost last year because of the penalties for non-compliance with welfare reform.

The Member and, I hope, the House will appreciate that many of the inescapable pressures are legal and contractual in nature. One of the best examples, although it is not the biggest, is that of his party colleague the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development, who had a pressure of around £7 million for TB compensation that we cannot legally avoid. Whatever the total is for that in a year, it has to be paid.

I take the Member's point about some Departments always coming back year-on-year with quite large bids. One way that, I hope, we can address that is that, in drafting a Budget in the next number of weeks and agreeing a final Budget, we will have a much more strategic approach to our Budget. Given that next year's Budget will require reductions across the board, we should not fall into our old trap of reducing budgets by an equal percentage but address pressures and seize opportunities where they exist.

I am still hopeful that our negotiations and discussions on corporation tax will bear fruit. We have put forward a very robust case for it — I think that it is a case that has won the argument, in fact — and we are waiting for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to make an announcement by the autumn statement, which, I think, is scheduled for 3 December at the latest. That gives us sufficient time to plan for its implementation before the end of this Parliament.

I do not think that the Government are getting cold feet. I think that they were right and were acknowledging the reality, I suppose, that, if the Executive could not deal with the pressures that we were facing in-year, the pressures that we would have to face in taking £200 million or £300 million out of our Budget to pay for corporation tax would be a bridge too far. That is why the in-year position that has been dealt with by this agreement was a test for the Executive, and I hope that we have shown that we have passed that test. We also have to pass the test in agreeing a balanced Budget for next year and getting things back on an even keel. If we can do that, I am hopeful that we will get a positive decision on corporation tax in the coming weeks.

Mr Girvan: I thank the Minister for his statement. Some of the comments that have had to be made are unfortunate. When and why did he conclude that asking the Chancellor of the Exchequer for a facility of £100 million was the best answer to our current budgetary problems?

4.30 pm

Mr Hamilton: I suppose that I would rather not have been in a position where we had to do what we did and ask for access to the national reserve and a loan of £100 million. In an ideal scenario, that would not have happened. Whilst I acknowledge that the forgone savings of £87 million and £114 million for next year on welfare reform are not the totality of our Budget pressures, it would sure make things a lot easier if we were not squandering that money and were not having that self-inflicted wound imposed on us.

Over the last couple of weeks, it has become increasingly clear to some of us, if not everyone, in the House and to a lot of people outside that our pressures were getting worse and worse in-year, as had been predicted. I thought that we faced two likely outcomes, and the First Minister agreed. One was that Departments would significantly overspend. Members will recall that the head of the Civil Service, in a fairly unprecedented act, wrote to the permanent secretary in Treasury about two weeks ago and pointed out that he believed that we were heading for a breach of our Budget in excess of £200 million. As I pointed out in the statement, the conclusion that the First Minister and I came to was that the consequences of that would have been grave. At the very least, that £200 million would be taken off the Budget next year, but there may have been a penalty on top of that, and issues like corporation tax and Desertcreat would have been taken off the table and not discussed at all. I did not think that that was a viable option and nor did the First Minister.

The only alternative was to make further cuts above and beyond the 4·4% that Departments were planning for. That might have meant cuts in-year, with half the financial year gone, of 8% to Departments, which would have been incredibly difficult for them to administer. That would not have eliminated the risk of overspend; it might have exacerbated the likelihood of overspend, so we would have been back to the first consequence. That is when the First Minister and I concluded that something a little different, more imaginative and a bit innovative was required, which is why we sought the permission of the Chancellor to access the loan facility, which ensured that we do not have to administer cuts above and beyond the 4·4% that Departments were planning for. We can still make £125 million of allocations, and, whilst we have to deal with a £100 million facility next year, that gives us the time to agree a balanced Budget and a credible plan for handling it in the next financial year.

Mr D Bradley: Go raibh míle maith agat. Gabhaim buíochas as an deis ceist a chur. I return to inescapable pressures. The Minister's statement tells us that they often involve legal or contractual commitments. In the case of the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development, tuberculosis compensation is a recurring cost each year. Will the Minister encourage Departments to meet those legal contractual commitments early in the financial year so that they are not dependent on monitoring rounds to meet them?

Mr Hamilton: The Member mentions TB, as I did. My understanding is that the bill for TB compensation this year was in excess of £13 million. That is a lot of money going out the door. Whilst it is necessary to offer some compensation to those whose herds are affected, it is a powerful amount of money to pay in the circumstances, particularly our difficult financial circumstances. It is not the case that we did not expect anything like this to appear: the baseline set for the Department was, I understand, around £5·2 million, so anything over and above that — unfortunately, this was a bad year in the sense that the total bill is around £13 million — meant that the Department was in the terrible position of having to find that money. In more benign financial circumstances, Departments may be able to find that money from within their own budget. A lot of non-inescapable pressures are not being met, and Departments will have to suck it up and deal with that themselves from within their budget. Whilst I would like that to have been the case with many of the pressures that were deemed inescapable, with other pressures that Departments were facing and the fact that there would not be a lot of spare cash lying around this year due to reduced requirements, we had to do something to meet many of the inescapable pressures that were legal or contractual in nature. I can understand that people might feel that we should have had better budgetary management at the start of the year to deal with this. In some cases, there was some budgetary management, but it was not sufficient to cover the totality of the legal or contractual pressure that that Department faced.

At the risk of repeating myself, I hope that in agreeing a draft Budget, if we know that inescapable pressures like that will come up, we deal with those in the baselines of Departments right at the start of the Budget period rather than trying to do that in monitoring rounds and taking money away from other public services.

Mr Cree: I thank the Minister for his statement, which makes for interesting reading. Minister, on the current year — 2013-14 — I was wondering whether you had taken into account or were aware of any accrued or estimated Barnett consequentials that might help the situation. You are talking about hopefully getting the 2015-16 Budget agreed by the end of October: what input will the House have to that Budget and, closely linked to that, to the Programme for Government, which will be different?

Mr Hamilton: We do not anticipate any or many positive Barnett consequentials for the Executive in resource expenditure. It would be nice if there were, and it would help us to a large degree, but I do not anticipate many, and we certainly could not plan on the basis of what decisions might be in the Government's autumn statement. If there were to be any Barnett consequentials, I would expect them, in line with recent Budget and autumn statements, to be more on the capital side. We may get an increase in capital, but that does not help us with the current problems that we face.

In answer to the Member's question on the role of the House in next year's Budget, I do not see that being radically different from its role in the past. Once a draft Budget is agreed and published, which I hope can be done in the next number of weeks — in fact, we have to do it within the next couple of weeks, although I would rather that it had been done several weeks ago, which I pressed for — it will go out to public consultation, and there will, obviously, be a role for the House in that. I am looking at the Chair of the Finance Committee. I hope that the Committee will play the role that it has played in the past of coordinating the response of Committees, particularly on their Department's allocations. In that sense, there will be a role for the House to have an input between the draft and final stages and as a receptacle for the views that will, I am sure, be expressed by many who will be affected negatively or positively by the draft Budget.

Mrs Cochrane: I thank the Minister for his statement. I want to respond to his comments about hypocritical Ministers. Does he not agree that Ministers, whilst receiving resources, still have a right to vote against a process that they do not feel meets the best strategic needs of Northern Ireland, which is similar to DUP Ministers accepting money for their Departments in the first mandate whilst not attending the Executive? Also, looking to the year ahead, can the Minister reassure the people of Northern Ireland that the Executive will be able to make and adopt a strategic approach to the 2015-16 Budget?

Mr Hamilton: Let me pick up the Member's first point on hypocritical Ministers. I think that there are hypocritical Ministers in the Executive, not least some of her party colleagues. Last week, they sat in the Executive and voted against the allocations to their Departments. After crying and crying and crying for weeks for money to meet the very real pressures that their Departments were under, they voted against the way in which the allocations were funded. Not only did they display a degree of hypocrisy in not voting for how the allocations should be funded but they offered no viable alternative. In fact, they offered no alternative at all.

They wanted the money. The Minister of Justice wanted £29 million for his Department. He has received that because of the work, efforts and courage of others. He is, it seems, happy to take that money, but he is not happy with the mechanism to provide that money. That is an unacceptable position for the Minister and others in the Executive to take. That is why I will write to Ministers whose Department has received an allocation in the October monitoring round but who voted against the mechanism by which that money is funded.

If they are so principled and so against the way in which the allocations to their Departments are being funded, it is their right not to take that money. Should they not wish to take up the benefits of the loan facility, I will recommend to the Executive, in January, that the allocations to their Departments are reversed. If they are so principled and do not want to avail themselves of the benefit of the loan facility, they, of course, would not want to take the money that comes from it. I will give them the opportunity not to take the money that the rest of us in the Executive have agreed to allocate and how it should be funded.

[Interruption.]

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Order, please. I remind Members, just in case things might get out of order, that courtesy, good temper and moderation are the keynotes of the Assembly.

Mr Weir: In light of that, Mr Deputy Speaker, I thank you very much for calling me, and I thank the Minister very much for his statement. [Laughter.] In welcoming this very fine statement, can I ask the Minister whether the Executive are still on course to overspend their Budget this year, please? [Laughter.]

Mr Hamilton: As I mentioned in the statement, there is the more technical side of the monitoring round process to go through, and we will do that. In fact, I will present a paper to the Executive next week to deal with any reduced requirements. I do not expect there to be any. We will do any technical adjustments and transfers between budget lines in the normal fashion next week. However, unless there is a huge surprise between now and then, we will exit the October monitoring round with an overcommitment of £25 million. That is incredibly challenging in the circumstances that we find ourselves in, and is, in part, why we sought a larger facility than we received. That is why I impressed upon all Ministers the need to identify any reduced requirements within their Departments very early. It is also why I said in this statement that, even if there are any reduced requirements, it is very unlikely that we will be able to allocate any more in January monitoring because we will be using them to pay our overcommitment.

I am hopeful and optimistic that we will be able to live within our means. I have to say, though, had we not been able to access this facility, I would not have been so confident; in fact, I would have been pretty confident that we would have breached our Budget. What we worked on over the past couple of days ensures that we will live within our means.

Mr Flanagan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire Airgeadais as a ráiteas. I take it that the statement was not agreed by the Executive, because it is one of the most party political statements that I have ever heard, and I thank the Minister for it. On a procedural term, he talks about reducing the headcount in the public sector. Will the Minister detail how that makes financial sense in the short-term, given that people who opt for voluntary redundancy would have to be given an upfront payment? How would that work, given that it takes several years for savings from such a scheme to kick in?

Mr Hamilton: I thank the Member for his initial very complimentary comments about the statement. No plans are in place at the minute in respect of voluntary redundancy schemes or restructuring our broad public sector. The Executive unanimously agreed last Wednesday and ratified on Thursday the decision that the head of the Civil Service and officials go away and look at the range of options that there are for restructuring the public sector. I imagine that that will include — it will include — a voluntary redundancy scheme.

The size and scale of all of that will come out in the wash when the head of the Civil Service and his team do their work on our behalf. It is absolutely the right thing to do. This is not something that we would ordinarily want to be doing, but we are in circumstances of having significantly less public expenditure in Northern Ireland. We all know that, for a host of reasons — real-term cuts in our Budget, the penalties for welfare reform, issues with public sector pensions and so on and so forth — we are already under immense pressure next year. We are looking at a Budget that will be short by several hundred million pounds of what we think is needed. You cannot sustain that, and it looks like that is the way that it will be for a number of years. So, we need to take serious action to live within our means.

One of the ways that you would sensibly do that is by accepting that, if you have less money, you therefore spend less on providing fewer services, which should need fewer people. It is our view that we can save money by having a continued degree of pay restraint and a voluntary redundancy scheme. I particularly welcome the response of the likes of Brian Campfield from NIPSA, who took a very open response to it. He did not rule it out of hand; he said that it was a good idea in the circumstances. Obviously we will have to engage with the unions and do some work over the next number of months.

4.45 pm

The Member is right in terms of benefits accruing over a long period of time. If the Executive can take a decision in respect of a scheme within the next month, it is our view that we can have a scheme in place by roughly this time next year, or maybe a little earlier. That will allow for benefits to accrue next year. One of the conditions that the Chancellor has set down is that we have to have a credible plan to lead towards a balanced Budget. This, obviously, would be part of that credible plan. Once we, as an Executive, have taken a decision on it, I would like to discuss with the Chancellor how such a scheme could be funded so that we can realise the benefits from it as quickly as possible.

Mr I McCrea: Will the Minister outline whether the need for agreement on the draft Budget by the end of this month is an achievable condition for the Executive to meet?

Mr Hamilton: To be perfectly honest, I would have liked to have had a draft Budget out to consultation by this stage. To follow on from the response to Mr Flanagan, there will be very few Departments that will escape next year's Budget without some degree of reduction to their spending position compared with this year. In that sort of scenario, in which Departments are facing quite sizeable reductions, they need the optimum amount of time to plan. I actually submitted a paper to the Executive last December setting out how you would have an ideal Budget process, which would have much broader consultation with the general public and the Assembly. Unfortunately, that was not taken, and we are now in this very shoehorned position. However, I still think that it is achievable.

A lot of work has been undertaken by my Department to hollow out precisely what the situation is in terms of the pressures that we will face next year. That narrows the decisions that we have to take to agree a draft Budget down to some headline issues, such as wanting to protect a Department or some Departments, wanting to take forward a restructuring plan and various other headline issues. The choices that you then have before you are quite limited in terms of how you spend the money that you have. That being said, I am optimistic that, if there is goodwill on all sides, we could have a draft Budget out the door by the end of this month, out to public consultation and agreed in final Budget format at the start of the year. That would give Departments roughly three months to plan for what, in most cases, will be considerable reductions to their baseline.

Mrs Dobson: I also thank the Minister for his statement. I welcome the additional allocation of £60 million to health. Thinking ahead, however, not least with the trusts projecting a £130 million deficit for this year and the Health Department forecasting its pressures increasing to £317 million next year, what realistic chance — Ian McCrea touched on this in the previous question — is there of agreeing the required level of funds for 2015-16 in the next three weeks to meet George Osborne's time frame?

Mr Hamilton: At the risk of repeating myself, I am optimistic that we can do it. I will certainly put in every effort required on my part — my Department will do likewise — to ensure that we have a Budget in place by the end of this month that meets that condition. It is a condition, and the letter is now before the House. However, as I said before, it is a least a month, if not six weeks, later than I would have liked to have had a draft Budget agreed and out the door.

I thank the Member for welcoming the allocation of a further £60 million to the Health Department. Unfortunately, her Minister in the Executive, Mr Kennedy, did not see fit to vote for that allocation of £60 million. It is a matter for him to explain why he did not want that much-needed £60 million going to the Department of Health. That is regrettable, and equally regrettable is his failure to vote for £29 million to alleviate the pressures that the Chief Constable and others have been facing and, indeed, for £1.3 million to victims' services.

That is a matter for the Minister and his party to explain. I accept, as well, that the allocation is not everything that the Department of Health would want, could absorb or could spend between now and the end of the financial year.

To go back to the point about the draft Budget, I think that there is a need for a conversation leading up to the draft Budget and, certainly, leading up to agreement on a final Budget, and also leading up to the comprehensive spending review and the next set of Budgets for future years about strategic issues of health and health funding. I see my colleague the former Minister of Health in the House. He and I have spoken frequently about the need for us to decide, as an Assembly and indeed as a society, about how much we want to spend on health. In a situation where pressures rise at 6% each year, it will not be long before health eats up nearly the entire Budget. We need to take very serious decisions, follow through on the reform plan initiated by Mr Poots, and try to ensure that the people of Northern Ireland get the health service that they deserve.

Mr McQuillan: I also thank the Minister for his statement. I certainly welcome it. How do the Executive plan to repay this loan over the next year, given the pressures that you have just enlightened us about?

Mr Hamilton: I do not run away from the fact that the loan facility exacerbates our problems next year. I would be wrong to say otherwise. The money will come off our baseline, and that process will start this year, much as it will in terms of reducing our Budget by the £114 million welfare reform penalty. Again I make the point that, were we able to reach political agreement on moving that forward, it would not alleviate all the problems that we face, but it would make life a lot easier.

It will be a challenge on top of those other pressures that we face, including a real-terms reduction to our starting position for next year. It will be incredibly difficult, and that difficulty is now added to by the need to repay that facility. In response to Mr Flanagan, I touched on the need for a credible plan and how it will be based very much on a restructuring plan and the realisation of some savings by reducing headcount and by some pay restraint. I hope, too, that we can reach political agreement on reducing the size of Stormont as well so that there will be fewer Departments and fewer Assembly Members, taking down some of that "ugly scaffolding" that somebody once talked about and saving some money on a recurring basis through that.

It will be challenging and difficult. Our challenges are added to by this. However, I still think that, in the circumstances, it was much better that we accessed the facility and dealt with our in-year problems, which were extremely pressing. Had we not come up with this idea and accessed the facility, we would now be on the cusp of a real crisis in public services in Northern Ireland.

Mr Spratt: I thank the Minister for his statement to the House. Is it not hypocritical of some parties to bring debates forward to the House that look for more funding for victims and then, in the very same week, have their Minister vote against £1.3 million allocated to victims?

Mr Hamilton: The Member has used the word "hypocritical". I look to the Deputy Speaker; I do not wish to incur his wrath.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Order, please. I am going to caution Mr Hamilton and, indeed, Members about the little phrase we use: "courtesy, good temper and moderation". "Hypocritical" is just on the balance.

Mr Hamilton: Can I check with you, Mr Deputy Speaker, whether the phrase "two-faced" is OK?

Mr Weir: Double standards.

Mr Hamilton: "Double standards" is the tolerable phrase offered. There are certainly double standards in play on a whole range of issues in respect of the response of some parties to this facility, which has got us out of the problems that we face this year. It has done so without the need for further cuts to budgets and the crisis that there would have been in public spending as a result of them. It has allowed us to make £125 million of allocations, including £1.3 million to victims' services. Whilst I did not participate in it, I was aware of and heard part of the debate in the House last Tuesday. The motion was brought to the House by members of the Ulster Unionist Party; I think that the leader of that party proposed the motion. Yet he sent his Minister into the Executive last week to vote against the very allocation that he called for in the House. The Deputy Speaker may or may not allow me to call it certain things, but I do think that it is double standards and two-faced, on the one hand, to call for such an allocation and then, on the other hand, to vote against the very same allocation when it is proposed at the Executive.

Mr Lyttle: I thank the Minister for his statement, which has revealed to us that the extent of his imaginative approach to the situation is loans, job cuts and pay freezes, and for the imaginative approach of suggesting that we have somehow found ourselves in this situation overnight when asking us what else we would do. When will the Minister and his party show the political maturity to adopt a more strategic approach to the Budget, take difficult decisions and explore and begin to debate fair revenue-raising measures as a way in which to get us out of the financial crisis?

Mr Hamilton: I listen to the Member's comments, and he criticises the way in which we have got ourselves out of the pressing problem that was happening in-year, when we had all the stuff that was being said by the then Health Minister about what would have happened if he had not got the additional £60 million.

I heard the Justice Minister, his party colleague and, more importantly, the Chief Constable talk about how the Police Service of Northern Ireland would be unrecognisable without an allocation of at least £29 million. I am sure that the Minister would have taken more if it had been available. I am not sure whether he is going to take it all or not, given the means by which it has been distributed. I take it very seriously when the Chief Constable talks about the Police Service being unrecognisable as a result of our inability to give him money that he needs.

When I hear that, my response is to come up with a solution to the problem. The Member and his party may not like the solution, but it is a solution. It is a solution that ensures that we do not have to make any more cuts than the 4.4% cuts that were planned for. It is a solution that allows us to make allocations of £125 million to Departments, including his party colleague's Department, the Department of Justice. It is a solution that ensures that we do not breach our Budget and have to deal with the consequences of all of that. I hear the Member criticise, but I do not hear him offering any alternative — none whatsoever. His party leader was quizzed repeatedly yesterday on the BBC about what he would have done instead. He offers no alternative whatsoever.

The Member asks for a more strategic approach. One of the things that sickens me about the discourse around this issue, particularly emanating from the Alliance Party, is the plague-on-all-your-houses argument that the DUP is as bad as Sinn Féin. I put it to the Member, as I said in response to other questions, that I have been pushing for a strategic approach to the Budget from as far back as December last year. That offer was not taken up by Sinn Féin. I have tried, tried and tried again to deal with our in-year problems as early as I possibly can to give Departments, Ministers and officials the certainty that they require. I have been blocked on every occasion by Sinn Féin. Therefore, it is not me and my party that are found wanting when it comes to having a sensible, reasonable, strategic approach to dealing with our financial problems. It is, of course, the fault of the system of government that we have, which is a system of government that, in large measure, we have the Alliance Party to thank for.

Ms P Bradley: I also thank the Minister for his statement, and I especially welcome the £60 million for health. The Minister touched on this in an earlier answer to Mrs Dobson, but will he comment on the extent to which the £60 million allocation, along with the £20 million from the June monitoring round, will deal with the immense pressures faced by the Health Department?

Mr Hamilton: I would never suggest that an allocation of £60 million on top of the £20 million for health — £80 million in total — is going to alleviate all the problems that the Department continues to face in this year. I listened to the previous Minister and I listen to the current Minister, and they have said things to me such as, "If I don't get this allocation, I won't be able to continue to employ locum doctors and locum nurses. The impact of that would be that wards in hospitals would be closed. Indeed, the very viability of some facilities across Northern Ireland would be called into question". When I hear that, I know that we have to act. That is why we came up with the solution that we have before us. It is a good solution in the circumstances that we find ourselves. It allows the Health Minister not to have to proceed with those sorts of drastic, savage, severe cuts in his Department.

5.00 pm

I know and accept, and I hope that the whole House appreciates, that the Minister will still have difficult decisions to make because he did not get the full £160 million that he believes is required. He has only roughly half of that. From conversations that I have had with the Minister, I am assured that the worst of those cuts have now been alleviated because of the Executive's decision to allocate a total of £80 million to the Department of Health this year.

Mr Givan: Bearing in mind your ruling about not calling people hypocrites, Mr Deputy Speaker, the Minister of Justice has certainly been acting as a bit of a curmudgeon over the budget. The Chief Constable has been somewhat begrudging of the additional allocation that has been made to the Department of Justice. Can the Finance Minister explain why he believes that the Chief Constable feels that the £29 million may not be sufficient for the Department of Justice to meet the pressures that face the Police Service?

Mr Hamilton: I would not try to speak for the Chief Constable — I shudder at the thought — but I have to say at the outset that I was deeply disappointed by some of comments that he made at the tail end of last week. I felt that some of his comments were political in tone and nature. If I were to stand before this House and make operational comments about the police, I would be told that I was wrong to do so. I think that the same applies to the Chief Constable's making political comments.

That having been said, I cannot explain why he does not think that it is enough. I suppose that, in a broad sense, no Chief Constable or Minister would think that what they get is enough to deal with all of the problems that they have. The Department of Health is a very good example of that, and I am sure that the Department of Justice is exactly the same. My best guess — in fact, it is not a guess but is based on comments that were made by the Justice Minister to the Executive last week — is that the pressures that he is dealing with in his Department do not just emanate from the reductions that are having to be made in year. I think that it would be incredibly churlish if the Minister of Justice did not accept that he is a better position today as a result of this solution than he would otherwise have been. His Department would have faced close to £50 million of in-year reductions if we had applied the 4.4% reductions in June and October. By getting £29 million back, he is better off than he would have been by a considerable amount. He is seeing only £18 million being taken out of his budget as opposed to close to £50 million. The Minister is in a better position.

Quite why the Chief Constable does not think that £29 million is enough, I do not know. I think that it is because the Minister of Justice has, in my estimation, been cross-subsidising pressures elsewhere in his budget, primarily in legal aid, by taking money away from front line police services. When I listen to criticism from the Alliance Party about my predecessor and me mismanaging the Budget, one has only to look at the justice budget, which, of course, as my predecessor would be able to outline better than I can, has a degree of protection that no other Department has and special arrangements put in place. Over the monitoring rounds since 2012, the Department of Justice, even though it has that degree of protection and all of those special measures, has bid for over £225 million more in resources through monitoring rounds, of which £75.9 million — so, one third of that money that was bid for by the Department of Justice — has been for legal aid.

Whilst I accept that there are reductions and they do put pressure on Departments, it is my reading of the situation that the pressures are not coming from the in-year reductions but are there because the Minister has chosen — up to this point anyway, before he got the allocation of £29 million — to cross-subsidise those pressures by taking money from the police and giving it to legal aid. When I hear criticism about my mismanagement of the overall Budget, I think that there are some others who have questions to answer about the management of their budgets.

Mr Ross: The Finance Minister has acknowledged that the loan from Treasury will not solve all of our problems, but he has rightly said that it will, at least, give breathing space to try to find agreement for next year's Budget. Of course, it is necessary because of the economic incompetence on display from Members opposite, which has been so amply displayed on various radio programmes over the past few days. What is the status of the £87 million and £114 million that was to be taken out of our Budget because of the failure to move forward on welfare reform?

Mr Hamilton: I thank the Member for his question. The fifth bullet point in the Chancellor's letter makes it clear that amendments to the Executive's departmental expenditure limit control totals to be processed at the Supplementary Estimates round, which related to foregone AME savings due to the failure to progress welfare reform, remain as set out in the Chief Secretary's earlier correspondence; that is, minus £87 million in this financial year and a planned minus £114 million in the next financial year. Whilst this agreement has, I think, got us through the problems that we have faced this year — problems that have been exacerbated by the failure of some to live up to reality in respect of welfare reform — the reality of the situation, as confirmed by the Chancellor and despite the fact that some thought that they could dream, wish or plead for those penalties to disappear, is that they have not. They are being taken out of our Budget. Whilst, as I said to other Members, getting that £87 million back, if we could — I believe that, if we make progress, we may be able to — would not solve all our problems, it would certainly make things a lot easier and help us with a significant number of the problems that we face. However, as the Member points out, as long as some Members want to bury their head in the sand on the issue, we will face a further £114 million of reductions next year.

Mr Campbell: I congratulate the Minister and First Minister on negotiating a loan that is interest-free, which sometimes people have forgotten. To summarise the Minister, he indicated that SDLP, UUP and Alliance Ministers voted against the package and were critical of it, without coming up with an alternative to it, but are still going to accept it. Is that a fair summary? Additionally, there appears to be criticism that a more comprehensive deal was not negotiated. Will he explain and elaborate on that?

Mr Hamilton: Mr Campbell's summary of the position of some in the Executive — an indefensible position — is right. From what I have heard in part today and certainly over the weekend I know that he is right that some of the criticism is that we did not have a comprehensive solution to all the problems that we face. I have a degree of sympathy for that argument. This is not, as I said in my statement, an all-encompassing, all-embracing, comprehensive settlement of all the budgetary pressures that we face. That is what I would like. That is the ideal position. It is what I have been pressing for over a number of weeks and months. However, it was not possible. Certainly, last week, I did not think that it was possible, and there was no indication from Sinn Féin that it was up for that sort of discussion and up for agreement on a solution of the totality of our Budget problems. To be honest, whilst they are serious problems that we face, the big problem we faced last week, which has now been averted, was either significant overspend in our Budget and all the consequences that flow from that or having to make cuts to budgets, in-year, in the region of 8%. That would have precipitated all the horror stories and nightmare scenarios that various Ministers, the Chief Constable and others painted for us on TV and radio over the last weeks. I thought that neither of those options was viable and that something else needed to be done. Whilst Members are free to criticise the nature of the facility, its repayment and its terms, as is their right, I do not think that any could deny that we have got ourselves out of the problem that we were facing in the short term and given ourselves some time to deal with the more medium- and long-term problems and challenges that we face.

Mr Wilson: The Minister indicated that the £100 million loan was determined partly by a credible 2015-16 plan being in place before the end of October. Could he give us some idea of what he believes would have to be included in such a credible plan? For example, is it credible to ring-fence 62% of the Budget by guaranteeing the budgets for health and education? Will it require acceptance by Sinn Féin and the SDLP that the cost of their stance on welfare reform will have to be taken off Departments? Will it require recognition that IT costs are coming down the road in 2015-16 because of the failure of welfare reform?

Does he accept that the promises of long-term change in government structures will not be a credible plan —

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Order. That might be a long-term question, but we will leave it at that.

Mr Hamilton: I will try my best to answer all those questions. The Member will know better than anybody else in the House that there is an immense challenge in getting a credible plan and a balanced Budget in place by the end of this month. I assure the Member and the House that significant volumes of work have been done by my Department to have a credible plan and a balanced Budget in place, but the difficulty and the sticking point will be getting the agreement of others to that credible plan and balanced Budget. He is right that tough decisions are required to arrive at that point. The idea that we will find a magic hat and pull a rabbit out of it is laughable. Whilst our economy is doing much better, we have turned the corner with public finances and are in a completely different era. If Members thought that the 2011-15 Budget was tight and difficult, they have not seen anything yet. The 2015-16 Budget is not so much the last Budget of the 2011-15 period; it is the beginning of an entirely new era.

Tough, strategic headline decisions are required by Executive parties, and the Member has identified some of them, including the need to tackle welfare. If we do not do that, the problem will only get worse. I believe that we need to look at issues around the protection of Departments, and a conversation at least needs to be had on the totality of protection of Departments. The Member will recall that, in 2011, the protection offered to the Health Department was not total protection; it was to protect what we might describe as the NHS. Similar conversations need to be had in respect of education, which has benefited from a measure of protection over this financial year that I do not think came with any justification. We need to agree the modalities of a restructuring plan that helps us to live within our means. It will not do it in totality. We also have to accept that there will be significant reductions in spending in most Departments. If Members, particularly the Executive Ministers, can start to get their head around those strategic headline issues and where they stand on all those, we have a very good chance of agreeing a credible plan and a balanced Budget for next year that sets us on the right track for future years.

Mr McCarthy: I must say at the outset that I am very disappointed by the tone of the Minister's responses to questions. When you start to use derogatory language and call people names, it seems that the argument has been lost. Perhaps the Minister, along with the First Minister, is now starting to regret taking the £100 million or even asking for it, which will clearly come off next year's allocation. Does the Minister agree that a more sensible approach to borrowing is to make an investment for the future or to create breathing space for reforms? How does the decision that the Executive took to borrow £100 million from the Treasury meet either of those tests?

Mr Hamilton: I regret nothing about what we have done, and I regret nothing about what I have said today. Everything that I have said today is factual. I do not regret having produced, alongside the First Minister and with the agreement of the Executive, a solution to the problems that we faced. I say to the House and to the Member that what he would have regretted — more to the point, what his constituents and my constituents would have regretted — would have been if we had taken no action. If we had lived in the la-la land that the Alliance Party occupies and thought that we could have a big strategic decision about all our problems in-year, we would have had no solution at all. We would either have overspent our Budget, which would have resulted in significant consequences for the Northern Ireland Executive and for public services, or we would have had to implement in-year cuts in the region of 8% to Departments that would have decimated public services in Northern Ireland. The horror stories that we heard from Ministers, from the Chief Constable and from others would have become a reality, and public services would have been in an unrecognisable position before the end of this financial year. If we had not done what we did, we would not have got ourselves out of the very pressing problems that we had in-year.

The Member made a point about borrowing for investment, and I agree. We borrow on the capital side for investment in the future.

However, what we have bought — the Member used this phrase — is breathing space. We have given ourselves breathing space by getting ourselves out of the immediate, pressing problem of this year's situation. We have given ourselves breathing space to produce a credible plan and a balanced Budget for next year that will get us back on the straight and narrow.

5.15 pm

Mr Allister: I am almost reluctant to intervene in this blood-letting and feuding within the happy Executive. What assurance has the Minister that, by taking on this extra millstone of £100 million of debt, he will get agreement on the Budget from those who have put him in this position? Should I understand his statement on October monitoring as meaning that Sinn Féin has now accepted £87 million of Tory cuts? Is Sinn Féin now required to accept £114 million of Tory cuts for the next Budget and more besides according to the cyclical reduction that would come anyhow? Just what is the level of Tory cuts, as Sinn Féin likes to call them, that it is required to agree to in order to obtain a Budget?

Mr Hamilton: The first point was about what confidence I have that we will get agreement on next year's Budget. The proposal was put to the parties at the Executive last week. It was made very clear in the proposal, not least because it is clear in the Chancellor's letter, which every Member now has, that we need to agree a balanced Budget and a credible plan for dealing with our problems by the end of this month. It is perhaps styled as a condition. I do not see it as a condition; I see it as entirely consistent with my position over the last number of weeks and months. It is exactly where we should be. We should not wait until after the end of this month to have a draft Budget out to consultation and be working towards agreement on the final Budget by the end of this year or the start of next year.

I have to say that, when it was presented at the Executive, it was accepted in the correct way. Subsequent political comment by Sinn Féin Members, including Sinn Féin Ministers, has been that they are up for the intensive period of work that is required over the next number of weeks to get a draft Budget out the door by the end of this month. So, I remain optimistic. As I said to Mr Wilson, there are significant challenges within that, but I am up for those. I will make every effort I can to deal with them, and I hope that other parties will do likewise.

Some wish to describe these as “Tory cuts”. Others might want to describe them as Tory-Liberal cuts. Others in the House have their fingerprints on some of them. Whatever way one wishes to describe them, they are reductions that, as I have described before, are self-inflicted wounds because of welfare reform. The Chancellor’s letter makes it incredibly clear that the £87 million of forgone savings that would have been made on our welfare bill have now gone. They are gone. The £114 million will go. Some may want to style those as Tory cuts. However, it is very clear in the agreement that the Executive signed up to that all parties have accepted those conditions in order to access the £100 million facility.

I would rather that they were not there. In some senses, I do not accept them. I wish that we did not have to pay them. They have been accepted by all parties nonetheless. Of course, the parties that stood in front of this Building with placards and banners saying that they opposed Tory cuts have, by their own definition, been implementing Tory cuts since 2011. I hear Sinn Féin spokespeople on TV or radio talking about how our Budget has been going down because less money has been given to us from Westminster: they have been implementing those so-called Tory cuts since 2011 and continue to do so now.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): There are still three Members to ask questions. I would like to fit them all in, so I encourage Members and the Minister to be concise.

Mr Agnew: The Minister referred to the last Budget and said that, if we thought that that was painful, we ain’t seen nothing yet. In the same statement, he says that he is still hopeful that discussions on corporation tax will bear fruit. Given that the estimated costs of reducing corporation tax to the level proposed are up to £400 million a year, is this proposal still credible? Is it desirable? Is it sane? How are we supposed to find that extra £400 million, given that we are struggling to balance the books in the current situation?

Mr Hamilton: Of course, the first point in response to the Member is that, even if we get corporation tax powers, as I hope and expect we will by the end of this year — certainly a decision by the end of this year and powers devolved by the end of the Parliament — we will not be implementing the reduction and therefore taking the hit to the block grant immediately. It will be for us to decide when the reduction takes place. In that sense, that aspect of it is within our control. I will still be pursuing aggressively the devolution of corporation tax powers, in so far as we can at the conclusion of negotiations. There will be a cost. Nobody has ever run away or shied away from the fact and the reality that there will be a cost — a sizeable cost — to our block grant. At a future point, a level of maturity on the part of some members of the Executive that, until this point, has not always been on display will be required to deal with that, but I still think it is the best option that we have in transforming our economy. I am the first to praise my colleague the Enterprise Minister for the sterling work that she and Invest Northern Ireland have been doing in attracting jobs to Northern Ireland, but, if we look at how they have attracted and promoted 7,000 jobs in this financial year already, we have to ask what we could do if we had reduced corporation tax? What would be the beneficial impact on not only the economy in Northern Ireland but the whole of society in Northern Ireland? Whilst

I know that some in the House are less enthusiastic about it, I do not think any of them have a plan or alternative that would have the transformative effect on our economy that a reduction in corporation tax would have.

I accept entirely the Member’s points that there are costs involved and that, if past behaviour is anything to go by, it will be exceptionally difficult to reach agreement on where those commensurate cuts and reductions would have to be made. I think the fact that every party in the Executive is committed to doing it shows that there is at least a willingness to take the power, and there should then be a resultant maturity in making the reductions that, inevitably, will be required.

Ms Maeve McLaughlin: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for his statement. We need to reflect on the contradictory nature of some parties voting against vital investment, particularly when we look at the area of health. That said, the Minister alluded to the strategic decisions and direction that were needed on health. How will the £60 million allocation be prioritised in terms of Programme for Government commitments and, indeed, monitored, given the Minister’s comments in June around the concern of the management of the current health budget?

Mr Hamilton: The previous Minister and the current Minister have set out the degree of pressures. Nobody will be better placed to understand those than the Chair of the Health Committee. The Health Minister faces pressures in his Department totalling around £160 million. Whilst the allocation of a total of £80 million does not go to deal with all of that, it is fair to say that the worst of those pressures will not materialise. That is certainly what the Health Minister said at the Executive last week when he talked about getting the extra £60 million. Earlier, in response to questions, I mentioned that it would mean that he would be able to continue to employ locum doctors and nurses and therefore not have to close down wards and, perhaps, not have to close down certain health facilities across Northern Ireland. Obviously, the Minister will choose to deploy the £80 million that he now has in other areas to ensure that healthcare in Northern Ireland is not compromised.

I still think that there is a huge challenge in the Department this year. If the 6% inflation figure is right and that is the sort of pressure that the Health Department will face next year and every year thereafter — we all know the reasons behind all that — we are facing into a very difficult scenario in health. That is why the reform plans initiated by my colleague Edwin Poots, when he was Minister, need to be implemented. We also need to have a strategic conversation as an Executive, an Assembly and a society in Northern Ireland about what our priorities in health are, what must be absolutely protected and what can be done, perhaps, in slightly different ways. I am up for that conversation; I think colleagues are up for that conversation; and I hope that others in the Executive will join that conversation, even if it is not between now and the end of October, as we agree a draft Budget. It is a conversation that desperately needs to be had very quickly to inform future budgets as we move forward.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Unfortunately, despite my best efforts, one person has to be excluded because the time is up.

Executive Committee Business

Off-street Parking (Functions of District Councils) Bill: First Stage

Mr Kennedy (The Minister for Regional Development):

I beg to introduce the Off-street Parking (Functions of District Councils) Bill [NIA 40/11-16], which is a Bill to transfer to district councils certain functions in relation to off-street parking places; and for connected purposes.

Bill passed First Stage and ordered to be printed.

Legal Aid and Coroners' Courts Bill: Final Stage

Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice): I beg to move

That the Legal Aid and Coroners' Courts Bill [NIA 33/11-15] do now pass.

I start by reminding Members that the Bill includes provision relating to Coroners' Courts and the role of the Lord Chief Justice, which, through the entire passage in the Assembly, attracted no debate previously.

On the important topic of legal aid, the Bill opens a new chapter in the management of legal aid by facilitating the creation of a Legal Services Agency. I believe that legal aid is a cornerstone of the justice system. We need a strong and independent mechanism to take decisions that adhere to the principles behind legal aid but take account of the financial realities. In line with a recommendation from the 2011 access to justice review, I believe that the new arrangements described by the Bill meet those standards.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Beggs] in the Chair)

As it is making way for the agency, I want to pay tribute to all those who played their part in the Northern Ireland Legal Services Commission. That includes board members, senior management, staff and members of the appeals panels. Since the commission was created in 2003, they have done their best to administer the increasing demand for legal aid and to do so in a way that is impartial, fair and reasonable. This has never been easy, and there has been no shortage of criticism of the commission. There will be a challenging period ahead as the commission continues to deliver its targets whilst preparing to make the transition to an agency of the Department of Justice. I want to put on the record now my gratitude to each and every member of staff for their hard work in difficult and often thankless circumstances. Of course, the closure of the commission also marks a new beginning for staff. They will transfer to the new agency, becoming part of the wider Northern Ireland Civil Service. I am confident that they will benefit from the opportunities and the advantages that come from being part of the wider Civil Service. The Civil Service too will benefit from their experience and their knowledge.

Greater flexibility for staff is one benefit of the new agency, but there is a bigger prize. The legal aid budget has been subject to unacceptable overruns for some time. Forecasting has been a real problem. In the current climate, this approach is unsustainable. Bringing legal aid closer to the Department will deliver improvements to budgetary management in line with Civil Service best practice, which I believe will lead to improved control over costs. I want it to be clear that I am only talking about controlling costs, not interfering either in individual cases or in the scope of legal aid. At the core of the Bill are provisions that provide safeguards on the award of civil legal aid. I have made it clear that the Bill does not in any way restrict eligibility for legal aid. Independence in respect of individual decisions is essential. There will be a director of legal aid casework to take decisions on the award of civil legal aid. The Bill contains safeguards to ensure the independence of the director. The safeguards include prohibiting the Department from issuing direction or guidance in respect of individual decisions; requiring any direction or guidance to be published; imposing a duty on the Department to ensure that the director acts independently when deciding an individual case; and the appointment of panels to hear appeals.

The role of director will be a challenging one. As well as decisions on civil legal aid, the director will take over responsibility from me for decision-making on the provision of exceptional legal aid funding in individual cases, for example the representation of next of kin at certain inquests, to comply with article 2 of the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR). The post holder will have support from me and the Department but not interference in individual cases or classes of cases. I hope that they will also have the support of the Assembly as they ensure that decisions in that critical area are fair and transparent.

5.30 pm

The agency starts a new chapter, but I would like to take this opportunity to look a little further ahead. The agency will put legal aid on a firmer footing in the Department and will allow us to look again at what we want to achieve through legal aid. In the coming months, I will bring forward further reforms to reduce costs. In light of the financial environment, that will inevitably include taking difficult decisions about the scope of legal aid. I have also commissioned the access to justice review part 2, which will help to set the agenda for the future.

There is clearly a need for more rigorous financial control, governance and accountability arrangements in respect of legal aid and a need to bring costs under control, including improving the efficiency of the delivery body. I believe that the creation of the agency will help to improve the governance of public spending and will facilitate the delivery of legal aid reform. Integration with the Northern Ireland Civil Service will allow for access to a wider range of skills and opportunities for staff movement and will provide greater opportunity to share services and make efficiencies through corporate support services. None of the changes will impact on access to justice or in any way restrict eligibility for legal aid, but they will lead to a more efficient and effective service that is in the interests of everyone.

I conclude by thanking those who have contributed to the work on the Bill, most notably the members of the Committee and its staff, and I commend the Bill to the House.

Mr Givan (The Chairperson of the Committee for Justice): On behalf of the Justice Committee, I welcome the Final Stage of the Legal Aid and Coroners' Courts Bill. It has been a much simpler one than other justice Bills that have come through the Assembly, and it has passed through the various stages with relatively few amendments.

As I stated previously, the Bill is viewed by the Committee as an essential part of the wider programme to reform the legal aid system in Northern Ireland. It will provide the opportunity to address a range of ongoing issues in relation to legal aid spend that require urgent attention, and the Committee will expect to see improvements in the governance arrangements and increased transparency, accountability and efficiency. That is one of the areas that the legal professions have repeatedly been able to point to as a major problem in tackling the legal aid budget, and I think that it is a step in the right direction to try to get the necessary changes in place. That will go some way to removing the criticism that has been levelled at the Department — at times unfairly — in respect of how the legal aid budget system is administered. It will help to remove the excuse that has been put forward. Given that the accounts of the Legal Services Commission have been qualified every year since it was founded, the change has been necessary and will hopefully address those concerns.

The Committee welcomed the support of the Assembly for the two amendments tabled by the Minister, which were at the instigation of the Committee, as they strengthened the control relating to the delegated powers in the Bill. The amendments ensure that the subordinate legislation to provide the framework for the constitution and procedure of appeals panels that will decide appeals on individual applications for civil legal services will be subject to the draft affirmative resolution procedure on all occasions, as will the rules in respect of the assignment of solicitor and counsel where a criminal aid certificate has been granted. Given the significance of the powers, it was right to ensure that both pieces of subordinate legislation were subject to the appropriate Assembly control at all times.

Issues relating to the requirement in the Bill for the Minister to designate a civil servant in the Department of Justice as the director of legal aid casework and how the recruitment and appointment of the director would take place and whether there are adequate and sufficient safeguards to protect and ensure the independence of decision-making once the executive agency has been established and the director appointed to take decisions, particularly the provision for the Minister to issue directions, were raised and discussed during Committee Stage. While the Committee decided not to table any amendments, some members expressed reservations about both issues. The amendments proposed by Mr Elliott at Consideration Stage and at Further Consideration Stage were helpful in teasing those issues out, and the Committee was clear that the independence of individual decisions on the grant of civil legal aid by the director must be protected. The debates on the amendments were useful and provided further clarification in that area.

I congratulate Mr Elliott on being successful with one of his amendments. I know that he did not, on that occasion, get my support but, nevertheless, he subsequently demonstrated that he did not need it. Obviously, the force of the argument prevailed in the Chamber, and he will be able to speak on how he, in his opinion, has strengthened the Bill. I commend Mr Elliott on navigating an amendment through the House, which is an achievement in and of itself.

Finally, in my role as Chairman of the Justice Committee, I thank its members for their diligence in carrying out the scrutiny of the Bill in a short timescale. We agreed to do that as quickly as we could, but, in doing it speedily, we did not sacrifice any of the scrutiny that the Bill merited. Hopefully, other Committees can look at the Justice Committee and see that you can put legislation through quickly without compromising the scrutiny process. Having said that, we now have the Justice Bill before us, and we will be taking considerably longer than we did when dealing with this Bill. I thank departmental officials for their assistance during Committee Stage and our Committee staff for their support and assistance. I put on record my appreciation to those organisations that contributed to the legislative process by submitting written and oral evidence at Committee Stage.

I will now speak briefly as a private Member. This is a stronger Bill because of the scrutiny process that was applied to it. The Committee demonstrated that, when you go through a process and identify particular issues, and amendments are then brought forward — on this occasion by the Minister — through working together we can get a piece of legislation that, I hope, is fit for purpose, if I can use that phrase.

Other issues that we touched on included the legal aid budget and future legal aid issues. The Minister has highlighted scope, which, up until this point, the Department shied away from. However, having had a number of conversations with the legal profession, there is merit in looking at what aspects should be taken out of scope within legal aid, because we are spreading an ever-increasingly thin budget across a whole series of issues, and we are doing it in a way in which other jurisdictions do not do it. That is not to say that they have got it right, but I think that there is merit in the Department looking at that. I am sure that the Committee will want to consider those issues as well.

There were changes that the Committee supported by a majority vote around the current level for criminal legal aid fees, and I trust that the Minister will bring forward the statutory rules for that. Members will then be able to take a final vote on the issue.

There is also the issue of civil legal aid, and, to date, the Department has failed to bring forward any reform proposals. It brought a raft of recommendations to the Committee back in June 2013 that would have saved in the region of £13 million, but, a year later, it had to come back and say that it had got its methodology wrong and that it was back at the drawing board. A year's time has been wasted, and the Committee is still waiting for recommendations to deal with civil legal aid some 18 months after the issue was first highlighted. That is in a Department in which budget constraints are pretty acute, and the Minister has highlighted those repeatedly over the past number of weeks. Nevertheless, the Department has failed to reform the civil legal aid aspect of the legal aid budget.

We need to get into that area and look closely at it, because there are aspects of it, particularly in family law to do with representation and issues such as non-molestation orders, that will need some scrutiny to make sure that we do the right thing. However, in the absence of the Department bringing forward substantive proposals, we are not able to do our job. I appeal to the Minister to get on with that piece of work and allow members of the Committee to do their job, and together we can try to get a legal aid system in place that is better than it currently is. I commend the Bill to the House.

First, we are satisfied with the terms of the Bill to set up an executive agency within the Department of Justice for the delivery of legal aid. Sinn Féin had concerns about the power of the Minister to direct the director of the new agency, but we particularly welcome the increased transparency, accountability, efficiency and independence. We are also satisfied that the Minister is bound by legislation. Any reclassification of cases will be decided on the Floor of the Assembly. We are also satisfied that the Minister has no power to direct any individual cases, as he said at the outset.

We are also supportive of the second aim of the Bill; to appoint the Lord Chief Justice as head of the Coroners' Courts and presiding coroner. It should ensure more efficiency in the Coroners' Courts service, particularly in the field of inquests.

Mr A Maginness: I support the Bill. Along with my colleagues in the SDLP, I think that this is a good and a much-needed Bill in reforming the Legal Services Commission; bringing it closer to the Department; giving it more resources; and making it a much more effective organisation. It has long been criticised, and I think that, in one report, the Criminal Justice Inspection described it as being not fit for purpose. In any event, the reform is overdue and we welcome it. I think that everyone recognises the need for such reform. Those in the legal profession and the stakeholders are all supportive of it.

We, along with colleagues in other parties, expressed concerns about the independence of the director of legal aid casework. My colleagues and I are satisfied that measures have been put in place to guarantee that independence, particularly in relation to the adjudication of individual applications. The Minister has given reassurance to the Assembly on that issue. I think that it is important to maintain that independence and to maintain that independent scrutiny and determination of legal aid applications without fear of ministerial intervention.

Mr Elliott brought forth some interesting amendments, as the Chair of the Committee mentioned. I had great sympathy with the amendments that he brought and, indeed, supported at least one amendment that was successful. It was an important contribution to the overall situation that we find ourselves in here with the Civil Service. We bring people in from outside, where possible, to revitalise it. I think that that is an important measure and should be welcomed by all. I hope that even the Minister, on reflection, may see that as a worthwhile proposition. Mr Elliott showed the House that useful amendments could be made to legislation, and that was an important contribution to the whole process of passing the Bill.

The Committee worked well with the Department on the Bill. There was a degree of cooperation, and I think that the Department took on board quite a number of issues that the Committee raised. I agree with the Minister when he says that we have to improve management, control costs and look at the efficiency of the system. Those are very important aims, and I hope that they will be achieved through the passage of the Bill.

5.45 pm

The appeals panel provides an important guarantee for applications for legal aid. Of course, the arrangements for the panel will be determined by secondary legislation and the House will have an opportunity to scrutinise that. It is a very important element, and the fact that the Minister agreed to a three-person panel, albeit that it is as yet undecided whether it will be composed of lawyers, non-lawyers or a combination, nonetheless —

Mr Ford: Will the Member give way?

Mr A Maginness: Yes, I will give way.

Mr Ford: I am grateful for the Member's positive comments. I just want to inform him that the legislation will require that the chair of the panel is a lawyer. The other two posts will be open to but not necessarily filled by lawyers.

Mr A Maginness: That reflects the concerns that were expressed that those who are involved in the system should be intimately involved in the system of scrutinising applications on appeal. That is important, and I am grateful to the Minister for recognising that in his changes and for pointing out so clearly to the Assembly what he envisages.

The Bill is a good example of Members working together. We may not have got it right earlier today, but we have got it right this afternoon.

Mr Elliott: I am here on behalf of the Ulster Unionist Party to support the Bill. It took a long time to get the Bill started, but, as the Chairman of the Committee said, at least we moved on it quickly and got it through its processes in as speedy a fashion as possible.

The purpose of the Bill is obviously to end the Legal Services Commission. That process has had a lot of criticism. The Chair of the Committee indicated that a lot of the criticism that has been directed towards legal aid and the overspend on legal aid has been directed at the Department, maybe unfairly. Obviously, a tightening of the process is required, and I anticipate that the Bill will help with that. There is no doubt that the legal aid bill and its management were rolling out of control, so I hope that this will go some way to resolve that criticism and the issues that are in the public domain.

I had some difficulties with two aspects of the Bill. One of the amendments I tabled that was not supported was about the power of the Department to compel the director of the agency to comply with its directions. I appreciate that Mr Maginness — I think that it was Mr Maginness or Mr Lynch — indicated that the Department cannot compel the director on individual cases. However, there is still that power to compel the director, and I feel uneasy about that. We will see how the outworkings of that go, and, at least, the couple of amendments that I tabled created an open debate about that and allowed the Minister to clarify a number of issues, which, I believe, will be helpful in the long term. What the Minister said in the House has relevance to any case law that may come ahead of us. I hope that it does not get to that point, but at least it is there.

My other amendment, which got approval in the end, concerned the process by which the appointment of the director will take place. I am pleased about that, and I heard the Chair of the Committee, Mr Givan, make a rare comment of praise for me. Mr Givan praising anybody in the House should maybe go down in history. Anyway, thank you very much, Mr Givan. That is appreciated. Even though I did not have his support, I genuinely feel that the amendment was right. I wanted to make the competition and process for that position much more open. The Minister intervened to Mr Maginness earlier and indicated that the chairman of the panel will be a lawyer. Sometimes, you do not want lawyers all over the place or to have footprints all over everything. However, in many areas in Departments, it is important that people have experience and knowledge of the role that they are playing and that they are not just there on the basis that they are good administrators. It is helpful if they have a knowledge of the role. You need an outside pair of eyes looking in, and you certainly need experience.

I thank the Members who supported my amendments, particularly the successful amendment. I know that that was not what the Minister wanted to achieve, but I hope that he will happily work with it in the sense and spirit in which it was meant.

I support the Bill. I thank the Bill Office for its assistance with the amendments that I tabled; I thank the Department, which was always upfront in discussing the issues with the Committee; and I thank the Justice Committee officials for their help and support.

Mr McCarthy: Like others, I welcome the Bill reaching its Final Stage this afternoon. The Bill is yet another stage in the Justice Minister's wide-ranging and far-reaching reforms of our justice system. In an Assembly in which we are often criticised for passing too little legislation, our Justice Minister, as expected, has consistently advanced an ambitious legislative programme.

The new structures should allow more effective financial management and forecasting, providing much-needed confidence that everything that should be done to manage the legal aid budget in a time of severe financial pressure is being done.

In the Bill's early stages, the Assembly debated at length and in detail Members' desire to ensure that, when the Legal Services Commission becomes the legal services agency, the independence of decisions over granting legal aid will be protected.

Members should be well aware of the Justice Minister's determination to respect and protect the structures and procedures of the justice system, which are designed to prevent political interference in what should be independent matters. The Justice Minister repeatedly reminds Members of the importance of his respecting the independence of the judiciary and the Public Prosecution Service, the operational independence of the Chief Constable, the role of the Policing Board and so on.

Members can be confident that the Bill, with all its safeguards and the Minister's record, will ensure that decisions on the granting of legal aid will be taken in the way in which they should be taken: independently and without political interference or influence. Rather than increasing the role of the Minister, the Bill transfers some responsibilities that currently rest with the Minister to the new director of legal aid casework.

In conclusion, the Assembly can vote to pass the Final Stage of the Bill and be confident that it is backing moves to secure and strengthen independent decision-making, to protect access to justice and to improve financial management at a time when it is desperately needed. I support the Bill and commend the Minister for his ongoing programme of work.

Mr Ford: I thank Members for their comments. At this time of the evening, I also thank them for their brevity.

We have an extremely good Bill in so far as it relates to legal aid. The Bill's safeguards demonstrate a commitment to ensuring that legal aid is managed robustly and independently by the new director of legal aid casework. There will be support from the Department, from the Minister and from officials, but individual decisions on legal aid will be a matter for the director. The independence of his role is guaranteed completely, and, as was highlighted in the debate, the role of the appeals panel will ensure that.

We had good proposals regarding independence. I note that Mr Elliott hopes that I will agree with what he has proposed about independence. I always wanted the same level of independence as Mr Elliott. My problem is that I am not quite sure that his wording gives reality to what we all want to see.

The important issue is that we will work to ensure proper independence and accountability.

The issue of directions was highlighted. It is absolutely clear that, first, they will not relate to any individual case; secondly, they will not relate to the scope of cases; and, thirdly, any directions will be published, and there will be complete openness in how that is done, subject to Assembly scrutiny of the proceedings as they go through. So I believe that we have answered the points raised by a number of Members. The changes made to subordinate legislation, which came through at Consideration Stage after discussion between the Department and the Committee, were significant.

There was a suggestion that the Department was shying away from reforming the scope. That will be considered in the second part of the access to justice review. I am not sure that "shied away from", as opposed to "sought to avert", given the difficulties that have arisen in other jurisdictions, is quite the right phraseology.

On the effectiveness of the commission, it is clear that its current operation suffers because it does not have the advantage of the economies of scale that it would have if it was part of a bigger or wider organisation. Legal aid administration costs have doubled since the Legal Services Commission was set up. That is not sustainable. The agency will be tasked with bringing those administration costs under control.

On the wider issue of costs, let me say in answer to the Chair that the proposals for further reforms to civil legal aid will be with the Committee within weeks. I believe that the revised proposals represent something that is entirely robust and is sustainable in a way that will ensure that we do not continue to have problems in that area.

I am grateful that the Committee last week agreed with a set of proposals for criminal work, although it is unfortunate that it took rather longer than the Chair or I had hoped.

Almost universally, what seems to happen at this stage of any justice legislation is that I praise my officials, Committee staff and Committee members, and we should accept that. I am not sure whether it is pertinent to repeat Alban Maginness's comment about getting things wrong earlier today, but we have certainly got this right. We got things right over the weeks and months that the Committee was carrying out its role. I repeat my thanks to the Committee, its officials and my officials for the constructive way that suggested amendments were dealt with.

The Bill is a major step forward, but it is only another step in a major programme of reform of legal aid. It will provide a firm foundation for the future, and I commend it to the Assembly.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): Before we proceed to the Question, I remind Members that, as section 84(2)(b) of the Justice (Northern Ireland) Act 2002 applies, cross-community support is required.

Question put and agreed to.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): As there are Ayes from all sides of the House and no dissenting voices, I am content that cross-community support has been demonstrated.

Resolved (with cross-community support):

That the Legal Aid and Coroners' Courts Bill [NIA 33/11-15] do now pass.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): I ask Members to take their ease for a few moments.

(Mr Principal Deputy Speaker [Mr Mitchel McLaughlin] in the Chair)

Committee Business

Older People: Review of Supported Living

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Business Committee has agreed to allow up to one hour and 30 minutes for the debate. The proposer of the motion will have 10 minutes to propose and 10 minutes to make a winding-up speech. All other Members who wish to speak will have five minutes.

6.00 pm

Ms Maeve McLaughlin (The Chairperson of the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety): I beg to move

That this Assembly welcomes the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety's review of supported living for older people in the context of Transforming Your Care.

In September 2013, the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety agreed that the scrutiny of Transforming Your Care (TYC), the implementation of Transforming Your Care and its impact on older people would be one of our strategic priorities for the 2013-14 Assembly session. The 'Transforming Your Care Strategic Implementation Plan' states that, for older people, one of the significant changes and benefits over the next three to five years will be an increase in community-based alternatives to residential care, which will involve different styles of independent living. The plan then went on to state that, due to the improved availability of these types of community-based alternatives, it is expected that the demand for statutory residential homes will further decline. That, in our view, was quite a bold statement, and the Committee decided that it wanted to drill down further, given that what is being envisioned appears to be quite a radical shift in the types of services being offered to older people.

Furthermore, given that the future of statutory residential homes is a live issue, the Committee believed that it would be a good time to carry out a review into exactly what the supported living options for older people are. The Committee's report, therefore, contains 11 recommendations, some of which my colleagues will cover in some more detail. I wish to focus the remainder of my remarks on three particular recommendations, which all concern the requirement to better forecast and plan the need and the demand for supported living places for our older people.

The first is planning and projections for supported living facilities. One of the issues that the Committee saw as a priority was whether there are, indeed, long-term projections for the need for supported living facilities for older people. When we initially discussed this with the Department, we were somewhat surprised when officials advised that they did not have long-term projections and did not recognise a need for such projections. Officials argued that it was not necessary to have an exact view of how many facilities might be needed, but rather individual choice in terms of care options was more important. Officials also stated that, even though we know the older population is increasing and will increase further, this cannot be used as a basis for working up figures for what the demand or need for supported living might be. The Committee found that quite confusing.

The Committee, therefore, queried this line of reasoning, and we were not alone. The Older People's Commissioner told us of her concern that there does not seem to be any publicly available departmental planning or modelling data for supported living. She argued that planning was essential in the appropriate provision of services for older people. The Older People's Commissioner also made the point that any planning that does exist appears to be short-term in nature. The Federation of Housing Associations also made a similar point and stated that there needs to be more long-term planning around supported living, beyond the current three- to five-year cycle of the Supporting People programme.

Towards the end of its review, the Committee again raised the issue of long-term planning with the Department. This time round, however, the Department argued that long-term modelling was not desirable because there was too much risk of creating overcapacity and potential voids. Officials reasoned that the current planning structure used in the context of the Supporting People programme, whereby plans are made to build specific facilities in specific locations over a three- to five-year period, is sufficient. The Department further advised that, under the Supporting People programme, seven more facilities to cater for 155 tenants will be opened within the next three to five years. This seemed a very modest provision to the Committee. We challenged the Department as to whether the 155 places in the pipeline represent what is required for our ageing population, as opposed to what is required based on need. The Committee also made the point that, given that the majority of current facilities are at full occupancy, the creation of only seven new facilities may not offer all older people a choice of moving into one.

The Department advised us that it needs to plan for nearly full occupancy to make facilities financially viable, and added that people may have to wait for a short time at home for a place to become available. However, of particular note, the Department could not provide figures for how many people were in this position — in other words, how many people receive domiciliary care in their own homes who could also be supported in supported living accommodation. The Committee, therefore, was not convinced of the Department's arguments as to why long-term modelling is currently not being undertaken. We believe that, given the known projections around the ageing population, it should be possible to work up projections around the percentage of older people who could potentially choose to be suitable for supported living.

The Committee does not accept that the current approach of planning for individual facilities over a three-to-five-year period is sufficient. In our view, a more long-term approach is required. The Committee therefore recommends that the Department should begin forecasting the need and demand for supported living places over a 10-year period. The indicative forecasts should be kept under review, and they should be reassessed when decisions are being taken to build new facilities. We also recommend that the Department should begin collecting data on the number of older people supported in their own home through domiciliary care who would be suitable for supported living models, in order to provide a fuller understanding of need and demand.

I will conclude by adding a few remarks of my own as a constituency MLA. I returned last week from a visit to the Scottish communities, health and well-being projects in the greater Glasgow area. It is very apparent that the Scottish Government's focus has been on health inequalities and preventative spend. Communities there have had up to 20% of the budget in terms of delivering and reshaping care for their older people. There are clearly lessons for the North of Ireland in protecting, promoting and enhancing choice for our older people and communities.

This was an important piece of work that the Committee undertook in terms of our scrutiny role in Transforming Your Care. It was very apparent that, whilst we talk about an ageing population and we know the statistics for 2020, we had no clear forecast model or planning in place to deal with that eventuality, now or in the future. I ask the Assembly to support the motion and the recommendations in the report. Go raibh maith agat.

Mrs Cameron: As a member of the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety, I support the motion. I welcome the review of supported living for older people in the context of Transforming Your Care.

The population of Northern Ireland is growing at the fastest rate in the UK. In relation to today's motion, it is worth noting that, by 2020, the number of people over 75 years old is expected to increase by 40% from that in 2009. The number of people aged over 85 is expected to increase by 58%. Whilst longer life expectancy and good health are things to be celebrated, it is clear that a strategic plan for helping our older generation to live as independently as possible for as long as possible is a matter of great urgency.

One of the core principles of Transforming Your Care centres on home being the hub of care for older people. However, we still have an over-reliance on acute and unplanned services to respond to crises. Rather than that firefighting approach, we must move towards a proactive, preventative and holistic service to maintain the health and well-being of older people, rather than the current dependence on institutional and hospital care. Research suggests that that preventative approach can deliver better outcomes for older people, with fewer hospital admissions and shorter lengths of stay. Indeed, the appetite for remaining in their own communities is evident amongst the vast majority of older people whom I have spoken to in my constituency of South Antrim.

That said, the confusion that exists around the definition of supported living has created a degree of ambiguity that must be overcome by the Department in order for the proposals to progress. For the purposes of the motion, I refer to the Department's latest definition of supported living:

"we consider 'supported living' to encompass a range of health and care provision, health-related adaptations, housing accommodation and housing support services that are designed to help vulnerable people to retain their independence in their community."

Some of the confusion in the definition of supported living has, no doubt, led to a lack of public awareness of the services available. It is clear that, when people are in full receipt of the information and advice on the services accessible to them, they are in a position to make an informed decision on what is most suitable for them. The awareness of supported living will therefore make them more likely to choose the concept, should their health begin to deteriorate.

Responsibility for disseminating the information falls to the five health and social care trusts, and it is that task that, the Committee feels, is not being carried out as effectively as it should be. So that the information reaches all potential service users, it is vital that the five trusts formulate an action plan setting out their proposals for raising awareness of the concept of supported living for older people as a model of care, as well as proposals for better promoting the facilities in each area. It is evident that some of the trusts have made inroads into promoting the concept while others have been found lacking. I appreciate that, in these days of technological advances, many of us receive our information through social media or websites. However, the target audience of the information cannot be forgotten. Whilst many of the potential service users are familiar with those methods of communication, many more would prefer to receive information and knowledge through more traditional means. It is, therefore, incumbent on each of the trusts to engage with all sections of the community, such as housing associations, GPs and community groups, to ensure that the information is received by the appropriate persons. It is also vital that the information that is placed on the trusts' websites provides clear and concise material on the concept of supported living and how it differs from residential care.

The concept of supported living is key to the success of Transforming Your Care. However, the key to the success of supported living is in ensuring that the information is received and understood by its potential service users before their need arises. I trust that the Health and Social Care Board will accept the Committee's recommendation to ensure that each HSC trust develops and promotes both the concept of supported living and the facilities in its area.

Mr McKinney: I welcome the opportunity to speak on today's important motion, as SDLP health spokesperson and a member of the Health, Social Services and Public Safety Committee. I endorse the comments of other Members in relation to the report. I confine my comments largely to recommendations 4 and 5.

The Committee recognises the importance of implementing the Transforming Your Care plan. Part of that implementation involves the development of supported living facilities, which provide a vital service for vulnerable people and for necessary care and independence, allowing them to be part of the community and to retain relationships important in everyday life.

Perhaps the greatest issue holding back the further development of supported living facilities has been the issue of vacancies or "voids", as they are known, in the current facilities and their financial implications for housing associations. The Committee is aware that, although some facilities have waiting lists, there are voids in others. They are present across all five trusts to differing extents and remain of particular concern. That relates to evidence provided to the Committee by the Northern Ireland Federation of Housing Associations, which has pointed to significant voids in some supported living facilities that have serious financial implications for that housing association. The federation identified that:

"A particular issue is that it often seems to take longer to fill the schemes than a housing association and its respective trust expected."

There must be greater liaison between Departments, trusts and associations and the adoption of thoroughly considered action plans to minimise the potential for those voids. Under the current system, all the financial risk is taken by the housing association, and the voids have the knock-on effect on it of having to incur unbudgeted and unsustainable losses. One prominent example of that is Gngangara in Enniskillen, where losses are estimated to be around £1 million. That, in turn, acts as a disincentive to the housing association, not just in Fermanagh but all across the North.

6.15 pm

To stimulate further development, the Committee believes that consideration must be given to risk sharing and that, if further developments fail to meet the target, the trust and the housing association should take the weight of any financial shortcomings. Although that is, of course, not the objective, risk sharing may in fact act as an added incentive for the trusts to promote their supported living facilities better. In that regard, the Committee is formally recommending that the potential of the trusts to take on an element of risk sharing with the housing associations be further explored.

The Committee also recommends that there should be more joint planning between the trusts and housing associations before decisions are made to commission new facilities. Although there has been some dialogue between the Departments on the potential for risk sharing, DHSSPS appears reluctant about the idea. There needs to be further communication and transparency. There must be clear evidence that sufficient numbers exist to fill new developments, with a relevant timescale and an effective action plan in place.

Recommendation 5 relates to research into Gngangara and Hemsworth Court, which is a similar facility. The Committee notes with great concern that there were serious shortcomings at Gngangara and Hemsworth Court. A bespoke piece of research was being planned to analyse those shortcomings and what action could be taken to rectify them, which would provide valuable insight — so the official said — and help facilitate the overall development of supported living facilities. The Committee is aware of the Departments' plan to conduct such research. However, it was estimated that that would cost £500,000 over a two- to three-year period. The Committee questions whether, in the current financial climate, it is economical for the Department to outsource such research. It is therefore recommending that the Department should not commission researchers or consultants to evaluate and review Gngangara and Hemsworth Court but rather that that work should be carried out by officials from the Departments and/or their arm's-length bodies as part of their existing roles.

Finally, the first of the recommendations again reflects, consistent with earlier comments, a lack of strategic thinking and a failure to collect and evaluate information about projected need, especially against the projections in TYC. If we do not do that, not only are we failing our older people now but we will fail the next generation of older people. I support the motion.

Mr Beggs: On behalf of the Ulster Unionist Party, I rise as a former member of the Health Committee and someone who contributed to the report that has now been completed and presented to the Assembly. It was a very useful piece of work, and I commend the Committee and its staff for their work in the area.

On a personal level, a number of members of my extended family are at the stage at which they need additional help and support. Along with my constituents, I see the pressures that are on families and the limited choices that are often available. This was a very worthwhile area to investigate. As has been said by other Members, Transforming Your Care clearly flagged up the issue of supporting independent living, but it appears to me that not enough has been done to develop that strategy and implement options. Options for individuals and families are vital, because each person will have individual needs, and the more options there are, the better.

As part of our investigation we visited Cedar Court in Downpatrick. I think that every member of the Committee was very impressed by the facility. Having had an opportunity to speak to the residents, I felt that it was clear that they were very content with their facility and the support that they received. I was struck by one individual who indicated that he had regained a degree of independence and was now able to use his free bus pass to travel widely, when previously he was restricted. Having appropriate care is clearly vital.

The difficulty with supported housing is that it is not widely known about. Many people are unaware of it. Indeed, there is a large degree of confusion in the various bodies. First of all, we had the Department, in its evidence in February, indicating that there were 414 supported living accommodations. Then, on 26 March, we had the trusts indicate that there were 18. The trusts and the Department were not even able to agree the terminology between them. Then, we had the Northern Ireland Federation of Housing Associations giving evidence. It was very clear about the difference between sheltered housing and supported living. When I took the opportunity to cross-examine some of its witnesses, they made it clear that supported living was the "next step up". That was one of the comments made. They also said:

"It is usually for people who need an element of support to maintain their tenancy and an element of care."

Around that time — in fact, two days earlier — a letter was received from the Department indicating that it was now going to review the terminology. In the middle of a study by the Committee in which we had unearthed confusion, the Minister and the Department decided that they would review the terminology. Clearly, in the course of our work, we had highlighted that there was a problem. I welcome the fact that that was taken on board, but it is a sad state of affairs that the Committee had to unearth that situation. As the issue proceeded and further evidence was gathered, it was clear that members of the administration that looks after supported living were making it up as they went along.

We then received a document entitled 'Supported Living', which looked at how support was provided for the "frail elderly". I know that none of my relatives would want to go into accommodation for the frail elderly; they would want to go in to receive additional support. When I highlighted that issue to officials, some of them changed their ideas and the term "extra care housing" was then used. Again, they were sort of making it up as they went along. Of course, in Northern Ireland, there is a body called Extra Care that provides domiciliary care. It is clear that, as the Committee has recommended, there needs to be a clear review of this area and wide agreement between the housing associations, health trusts and those who represent older members of the public so that terminology can be agreed, confusion can be removed and appropriate planning can be made for all levels of accommodation.

Mr McCarthy: Like others, I am grateful, as a member of the Health Committee, to say a few words this afternoon in support of this important motion. Indeed, I take the opportunity to welcome the presence of our former Health Committee colleague in the form of Mr Jim Wells, who is now our Minister. We can expect nothing but positive results and responses, I am quite sure.

Mr Wells (The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety): Will the Member give way?

Mr McCarthy: I will surely.

Mr Wells: I thank the Member. I note that he is the only member of the Committee to welcome me to this position. I think that bodes badly for future debates. Thank you very much. I was not expecting that. It is much appreciated.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Member gets an extra minute of course. [Laughter.]

Mr McCarthy: It is a pleasure. We will expect positive results.

Like others, I wish to put on record my sincere thanks to the Committee Clerk and her staff for all their work and the help that they gave members, the research staff here in Parliament Buildings and of course all those who gave evidence as we proceeded with our review. At this point, I have to declare an interest in the subject and say how important it is for the Assembly to show its appreciation to senior citizens for the contribution that they have made to this society. We have a duty to ensure that, when people reach pension age, they receive proper help and assistance, whether that is housing or anything else, and that the Assembly can and will rise to the challenge.

Today's motion is about supported living in the context of the Transforming Your Care blueprint. Our review, as the Chair has already said, concluded with 11 recommendations that we ask the Assembly to endorse and the Department to accept and implement at an early date.

It was clear from the evidence received by the Committee that there is a lack of an agreed definition in this area and, even worse, that different agencies are themselves working to different definitions. We welcome the increased policy focus on the delivery of services in the community, in common with other aspects of Transforming Your Care, but, critically, that must be backed up with resources. In addition, beyond the consideration of resources, there is a need to ensure that provision is in place to combat social isolation, particularly for older people who do not have relatives or close friends living nearby.

Mr Beggs: Will the Member give way?

Mr McCarthy: Briefly.

Mr Beggs: Does the Member agree that it is important that what is widely known as supported living is available in each area, so that independent living can occur and be in easy reach of friends and family, such as at Greenisland House and Lisgarel in Larne?

Mr McCarthy: Absolutely. I fully agree with the Member.

The review's first recommendation is very significant, in that it deals with the establishment of a new definition for supported living. We say that the Health Department should consult representatives of our elderly population, and there are many — the Age Sector Reference Group, the Pensioners Parliament, Age NI and others, including the Older People's Commissioner for Northern Ireland. The Department should also consult and work with, as has been said, the Northern Ireland Federation of Housing Associations and other relevant stakeholders.

Along with other Members, I was delighted to join the Northern Ireland Federation of Housing Associations here at Stormont, last week, to show our support for its present campaign — I will show Members the picture — Let's keep on Supporting People. It is vital that we get behind those efforts to protect and strengthen this vital programme. Every year, Supporting People assists some 26,000 vulnerable people throughout Northern Ireland in a wide range of accommodation-based and floating support services. Among those helped are older people, people with learning disabilities and homeless people. A wide range of support is provided to help people live as independently as possible. That is the important aspect of what we are discussing today: improving quality of life and reducing demand on the health and social care systems.

In conclusion, we strongly recommend that the Department does not relabel supported living facilities as schemes for the frail elderly, as has already been mentioned by other Members, given that the purpose is to promote older people's independence and support them in what they can do, rather than focusing on that which older people cannot do. I hope that the contents of the report, which is far-ranging and was well worth doing, will be recognised by the Department and the Minister. I support the motion.

Mr Dunne: I, too, welcome the motion and the work that was done by the Health Committee in providing the report on the review of supported living for older people. During the controversy over the proposed changes to residential care resulting from the Transforming Your Care programme, which we are all fully aware of, it was clear that there was a real issue around the provision of alternative suitable accommodation for elderly people. From the evidence that we have gathered, it is clear that many people were not aware of the opportunities and alternatives that were available or, in many cases, were not available. So, it is absolutely recognised that there is a clear need for the provision of such alternatives by the Health Department, in a joint effort with DSD. The Committee clearly recognised the need for such provision throughout our community. In many cases, the buildings for supported housing will be provided by housing associations, such as Fold, and the management of same will be run by the trusts.

During our discussions, as has already been mentioned by other Members, there was a clear issue in relation to a difference of understanding of the terms, what supported living really means and how it varies between the Health and Social Care Board and the trusts. In 2012, 'Who Cares? The Future of Adult Care and Support in Northern Ireland' was commissioned by DHSSPS and DSD. The report clearly stated that supported housing provided people with that little extra help and security while enabling them to remain in the domestic environment for as long as possible.

6.30 pm

The Northern Ireland Federation of Housing Associations describes supported living as being an option for a significant proportion of our ageing population. The Health and Social Care Board talks about supported living for suitable people who need care and house-based support to allow them to live in their own accommodation. It is clear that there is a group of people who cannot live or choose not to live on their own any longer and need a level of support. However, the trusts have a different approach.

The Belfast Trust stated to us that it was suitable only for a very small percentage of older people and that it was an expensive model of care, which is very specialised and expensive on the capital and revenue side. It needs to be targeted at people who are most in need and would most benefit from the model. This would not be open to every older person who wants to live in a community-type environment. Therefore, from the Department's and the trusts' point of view, given that supported housing is expensive, it is very targeted at those who would most benefit from it.

There are mixed messages out there about the criteria and the definition of supported living and what it means to many organisations. We need clear leadership on the provision of supported living. We need a joined-up effort between the Department of Health, the health trusts and DSD.

The provision of suitable accommodation for our older people must become a priority. The definitions need to be clear and based on need and demand. I look forward to the new Minister giving us all the answers.

Mr Brady: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. I also support the motion. It would be churlish not to welcome the Health Minister here. I think that this is his first debate.

Mr Wells: Two — [Interruption.]

Mr Brady: Kieran pre-empted me, but I would have said it anyway because it is good to see the bridesmaid becoming the bride, if you will excuse the language.

There has been a long-term policy aim to shift care from institutional settings such as nursing and residential homes to a greater provision of services for older people living in their own home or in supported accommodation. The Supporting People programme was introduced in 2003, with the aim of commissioning housing support services to improve the quality of life and independence of vulnerable people. The new Supporting People strategy from 2012 to 2015 is aiming to build on the success of the original strategy.

The total supported housing budget spend for older people's services in 2012-13 was £8.93 million, and 425 accommodation-based services provided housing to over 10,300 people. Sheltered housing is the main form of provision for older people, but some more specialist supported living provision also exists for frail older people and older people with dementia. In addition, 10 floating support services support 345 people at any one time at a cost of £604,800. Those services cater for a range of clients from isolated and rural people to people with mental health and dementia needs. There is funding for two home improvement agencies, whose role is to advise and assist applicants who have a disability through the home improvements grant, in particular disabled facilities grants, and older people with a disability are the main recipients of that service.

At the moment, the majority of services for older people are provided by housing associations, with a number of services provided by the voluntary and community sector and the health and social care trusts. At this point, I will commend the voluntary and community sector for the work that it does in helping in that area of need. Caring for the ageing population is a complex, cross-cutting issue, and there has been a tendency to react to crisis events rather than having preventative support. There remains a heavy reliance on formal residential and nursing home care and informal care in the role of unpaid carers such as family members, and I will mention them later.

Here in the North, the number of people aged over 65 is expected to increase by 40% between 2010 and 2025. The number of very elderly people, those aged over 85, is expected to almost double. This means more people with long-term illnesses and disabilities. People are living longer but not necessarily more healthily. Obviously, this has implications for how and where people are cared for. The majority of older people want to remain living in their home, and policies such as Transforming Your Care have attempted to reflect that. However, the concept of care at home and in the local community is not new.

Older people are the largest group of users of community health and social care services. They account for one fifth of the budget, currently £700 million. Keeping people at home or in less formal types of care is further complicated because responsibility for many aspects of housing rests separately in the Department for Social Development. As a member of the Social Development Committee, it is easy to see the cross-cutting and overarching issues. TYC lists older people as one of its key commitments and seeks to reduce the number of older people in formal care. TYC states that it wants to help older people to live independently:

“at home or in supported accommodation”.

However, in the follow-up strategic implementation plan, the wording has evolved somewhat to older people living independently:

“at home or in assisted housing”.

These are two different concepts, and clarification is certainly needed. I know that one of the things that the Committee wants is clarification on what supported housing actually means.

I want to mention specifically the role of unpaid carers. Many older people who require some form of care depend on the invaluable role of informal, unpaid carers at home, whether they are family members or friends. It is estimated that unpaid carers save the health service here around £4.4 billion every year. Yet, a lot of these carers are older people who will eventually need to have someone care for them. If we are to implement TYC, which someone described as a vision without action, we need to put in place an infrastructure of proper domiciliary care and proper support for carers.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Member's time is almost up.

Mr Brady: I just want to make the point that we need to bear in mind that carers will be one of the groups affected by the advent of welfare cuts.

Mr G Robinson: First and foremost, I congratulate the Minister on his appointment to the post of Health Minister. I also take this opportunity to thank him personally for his very successful visit to my East Londonderry constituency last Friday. I can truthfully say that the Minister's visit was very much appreciated. Thank you very much.

I am a new member of the Health Committee. The debate focuses on people having the services that they require to maximise the number of people living in the correct surroundings to suit their personal everyday needs. Many of the older generation and their families whom I have spoken to in my constituency welcome that.

Recommendation 11 states that the Health Department and DSD should work closely on developing housing options for older people. This could range from care in their home to requiring a nursing home placement, but it must be primarily dependent on a patient's medical needs.

We all appreciate that living in the correct surroundings is beneficial to the individual, especially so for mental health patients as the services that they need are carefully provided. Someone who needs just a little help and support to stay at home should not be taking up a residential or nursing home place, as that is detrimental to them personally.

Mr Beggs: Will the Member give way?

Mr G Robinson: I am carrying on.

Indeed, it is not cost-effective. As DSD helps to fund placements, it is critical that we ensure that the best possible solution is found for all parties involved, hence the need for close interdepartmental working. We all wish for the best health outcomes for older people, as the motion states. However, we must also ensure that we deliver the services required and in a manner that we can afford. That is what Transforming Your Care is based on. I ask the House to support the motion.

Ms McCorley: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. Éirí inniu mar bhall nua den Choiste Sláinte le tacaíocht a thabhairt don rún. As a new member of the Health Committee, I support the motion.

Tá fócas na díospóireachta inniu dírithe ar mholtaí an Choiste Sláinte a tháinig amach as a athbhreithniú ar chur i bhfeidhm Ag Athrú do Chúraim, go háirithe maidir leis na himpleachtaí ar mhaireachtáil thacaithe do dhaoine níos sine.

Today's debate focuses on the recommendations of the Health Committee report arising from its review into the implementation of Transforming Your Care, particularly what it means for supported living for older people. I wish to look at recommendation 9, which calls on the Department to review the current indicator of performance for older people living in supported living facilities for the indicators of performance direction for 2015.

When the Committee was listening to evidence from the various stakeholders earlier this year, it became clear that there was a lack of clarity on the definition of supported living, which was sometimes conflated with domiciliary care, supported housing and sheltered accommodation. Correspondence from the Department provided a definition for supported living facilities. It stated:

“Supporting People funds a range of housing related support services for vulnerable older people to improve their quality of life and attain independence. These services can be provided in their own homes, or in hostels, sheltered accommodation or other specialised housing support”.

That definition suggests that the indicator —

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I ask Members to check if their phone is ringing. It is creating enormous interference.

Ms McCorley: Gabh mo leithscéal. The definition suggests that the indicator of performance covers older people living in a range of accommodation and not just the 18 facilities built under the Supporting People programme.

The five health trust areas across the North informed the Committee that there are 18 supported living facilities, while the Department gave evidence to suggest that there are 414 facilities. How does the current indicator of performance operate in the face of such a disparity over which facilities are relevant? Is soiléir go gcaithfidh aontú a bheith ann ó thaobh na saoráidí a bhéas san áireamh sa chatagóir maireachtála tacaíthe. Clearly, it is imperative that there is agreement on which facilities are to be included in the supported living category. Without that, it will not be possible to collate accurate numbers of people receiving support. Furthermore, it will be impossible to assess the number of places required in the future.

A new indicator of performance, “Number of older persons living in supported living facilities”, was produced for 2014-15. However, the Committee was surprised to learn that no target has been developed for that indicator. It is difficult, therefore, to imagine how the Department makes up its mind on what constitutes a favourable number of older people living in supported living as opposed to a poor number and how those numbers would indicate a good or bad performance by any individual trust.

The Committee, therefore, recommends that the Department reviews the current indicator of performance for 2015 and that a revised indicator be produced with an associated target, which provides an assessment of the trusts. Furthermore, the Committee recommends that the Department begins collecting data on the number of older people supported in their own home through domiciliary care who would be suitable for supported living in order to provide a fuller understanding of need and demand. Tacaím leis an rún. I support the motion.

Mr Wells: Mr Principal Deputy Speaker, it was a dull, quiet and somewhat unusually boring afternoon in this Building 20 days ago: I was at a meeting on the second floor; I looked at my phone, which I had checked half an hour earlier, and noticed that there were 14 missed calls. I then noticed that all of them were from the office of the First Minister. My immediate thoughts were that I was in very big trouble or that something significant was happening. So, I made my way down to the First Minister’s office, and he asked me to take on this portfolio. After having said yes,

I casually asked him, “When do I start?” He said, “In 15 minutes’ time”.

When you, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker, adjourned the Assembly, I was to go round to your office and sign the declaration of office. So, I had 17 minutes’ warning that I would go from being a non-entity of an obscure Back-Bencher, which had been my lot for the previous 20 years, to becoming Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety. If I am surprised I am here, then, no doubt, most people in the Chamber will be equally surprised. I make that point for two reasons. First, I do not have all the answers. Therefore, in respect of several of the points raised, I may refer the Members back to the experts who will respond in writing through me.

Secondly, my first 20 days in this job, which have been the most intense of my life, have given me an indication of the wonderful work carried out by my predecessor, Edwin Poots. I have nothing but admiration for his time in office and for the workload that he encountered and the decisions that he took. I feel very proud to step into Edwin Poots’s shoes, and certainly I have nothing but praise for what I have witnessed both from the inside and the outside.

I also thank the members of the Committee. I had five years, two months and 14 days on the Committee, not that I was counting, and I enjoyed enormously my roles as Chair and Deputy Chair and the outstanding work of the staff of that Committee, who, in my opinion, were the top team in this Building when it came to servicing a Committee. I am told that I am not allowed to name them, but they know who they are, and they are an outstanding team. I also thank those who have welcomed me to this position, all three of you. I noticed that the Chair and many long-serving members of the Committee did not deem it worth their while to welcome me. Mr McCarthy, Mr Brady and Mr Robinson, I thank you.

Mr McKinney: Will the Member give way?

Mr Wells: Yes, Mr McKinney.

Mr McKinney: Will the Member accept that it was remiss of me not to welcome you to your new post and your first formal speech? I now welcome you.

Mr Wells: Thank you very much, Mr McKinney. I have forgiven you for that. I noticed that, when Mr Poots was made Health Minister, everyone welcomed him to the position, so I think that that bodes badly for me in the future.

I thank the Chair of the Health Committee for tabling the motion on this very important issue, and I very much welcome the Committee’s review of supported living for older people in the context of Transforming Your Care. I have to say that I have to express the most sizeable of interests on this since I sat on the Committee throughout the formulation of this report and the hearings and agreed the report. Therefore, I have an interest to declare, but I hope that I can be a bit more detached now that I have moved from the Committee.

We know that everyone wants to stay in their own homes, with support if necessary, for as long as they possibly can. Older people have been telling us this for years, and, indeed, one of my Department’s key priorities is to ensure, wherever possible, that people are helped to maintain their independence in their own home, whether that is in a supported living environment or in their own personal home. I believe that that is vitally important.

Of course, everyone should have a choice about where they live, and, if they need help to look after their personal care, they must have a say in how those needs are met. Transforming Your Care underpinned this policy, and part of its vision was the key principle that the home should be the hub of care for older people. Many Members made that very important point. The logic of this will inevitably mean a corresponding reduction in the dependence on residential care.

I do not intend to get into the whole debate this evening on the residential care home issue. There will be many further opportunities to deal with that, but there is no doubt that many people would prefer to live in some form of supported living than in residential care. In fact, TYC made specific reference to reducing our stock of statutory residential homes, which prompts us to find better and more effective ways of providing care to our ageing population. I will not rehash all the demographic information, but I noticed that Mrs Cameron and several other Members quoted the very significant statistics on how we are going to become a more ageing population. Indeed, I was calculating that I will fall into the category of being part of that ageing population by the time that those dates arrive. It does have profound implications for our health and social services.

Regardless of who the Health Minister might be during future Assembly tenures, the amount of resources available to them will always be finite, so we must look to reform our services and the way in which we deliver them. It is vital that we take steps now to redesign our services so that people are supported to live longer and to live well in the heart of our communities. Only by doing this will we be able to provide the quality services that our older people are entitled to, both now and in years to come. We have to be very clear that this is something that will affect every one of us and our families at some point in the future.

There is already a wide range of community-based services in place that contribute to supporting people to maintain their independence in their homes. I do accept the point about definition. Under the definition that I have, there are 414 institutions looking after the needs of 10,000 people, but I accept that we need to refine the definition of that type of care.

Domiciliary care, the provision of personal care in a person's own home, is the main service used to help people to maintain their independence. The most recent statistics indicate that over 25,000 people in Northern Ireland are being supported to live at home by domiciliary care services, and the HSC is investing in the region of £160 million per year on domiciliary care services for older people. It is a significant part of the overall departmental budget.

Mr Beggs: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Wells: I certainly will.

Mr Beggs: Will the Minister accept that, for some individuals, it can be a very isolating existence if you have limited mobility and limited numbers of friends and family who are able to visit you? Supported living accommodation can provide communal living with independence, which many people wish to retain, and, therefore, it needs to be looked at and made a widespread option.

Mr Wells: Yes, I accept that older people living on their own with domiciliary care may not always be the preferred choice, although for the vast majority of people it is. Of course, I have experience of places like Cedar Court, which the Member mentioned, and St Paul's in Lisburn, which provide, I believe, the best of both worlds: the privacy of having your own front door and the ability to meet people with similar interests and have companionship. We must be prepared to give people choice, and if the choice is domiciliary care, we are investing a huge amount of money — £160 million — in that.

Mr McCarthy: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way, and I accept the figures that he has just given. Will he agree with me that, despite all those good efforts, a number of people, particularly in rural areas, are being denied community meals? That is simply because the criteria for receiving those meals have reached such a point that a lot of people are missing out. They are out of the loop and are not receiving the community meals.

Mr Wells: As the honourable member knows, particularly in the Southern Trust, we are in a process of re-enablement, which has often removed the need for community meals. Those services involve working for a limited period, typically two to six weeks, with individuals whose independence is at risk. They are supported to learn and re-learn skills necessary for daily living to rebuild their confidence and promote their social inclusion. The goal is a level of independence that will allow either discharge requiring no service or reduced services on an ongoing basis. Re-enablement services are being rolled out across Northern Ireland, with three of the five health and social care trusts already providing full coverage for their area. Self-directed support services offer service users and carers greater flexibility and independence by enabling them to tailor their support package to their individual needs. Also, assistive technology, such as Telemonitoring Northern Ireland, helps to support people, including older people, with chronic conditions at home.

Housing adaptations can help people to remain independent in their own home. Following a consultation last year, officials from my Department are working collaboratively with DSD officials to draft a final review report and associated action plan on housing adaptations built around the theme of home as the hub of care. Of course, supported living services are a key component underpinning the strategic concept of the home as the hub. They will improve the range of choices available to our older people if and when they reach the stage in their lives when they need purpose-built accommodation with person-centred care services as part of the package.

We have already seen examples of how supported living schemes can be a success. Barn Halt Cottages in Carrickfergus, for example, have been providing state-of-the-art accommodation and care services for a number of years. More recently, the Belfast Trust, in conjunction with the Department for Social Development and Helm Housing Association, has transformed the site of the former statutory residential home on the Shankill Road into a purpose-built supported living facility. Hemsworth Court is providing care and support in the heart of the community. Mr McKinney raised the issue of allocations in Hemsworth Court. At present, 33 of the 35 places have been allocated, and so I think that the concerns that he raised about the Enniskillen situation do not apply to that facility.

I am aware, however, that some issues surrounding the concept of supported living will need further work. The question of definition, for example, is an important one, as I mentioned earlier, and I am clear that more work needs to be done to clarify exactly what we refer to when talking about supported living.

That is important, because people need to be clear about the options available to them when making decisions about their care and support. Similarly, I am keen to ensure that information promoting the schemes is widely used — many Members raised the issue of the lack of awareness — to make certain that older people will have an opportunity to make properly informed decisions about what best meets their particular needs.

Some of the facilities have not filled as quickly as we might have expected, and Mr McKinney raised that point. That presents difficulties for our partners. We need to understand the reasons for that so that we can put measures in place to prevent underoccupancy. The Committee's report highlighted those issues along with others, and it makes 11 very helpful recommendations.

I will, of course, provide a more detailed response to the Committee in due course, once I have had an opportunity to consider how best to implement the recommendations.

Ms P Bradley (The Deputy Chairperson of the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety): It gives me pleasure to wind on the debate.

Although I have been on the Health Committee for just under three weeks, I sat on it previously. I believe that I have an understanding of the issue, not only through my membership of the Committee for Social Development but through my former career in hospital social work, where I worked predominantly in elder care and looked at the specific needs to promote independence and empowerment among our older population.

Before I start, I draw Members' attention to recommendations 10 and 11 of the Committee report. In recommendation 10, the Committee recommends that the Department clarify its strategic position on the links between the availability of supported living places for older people and the availability of places within statutory residential homes. In my research for the recommendation, I was absolutely astounded to discover that there is no clear-cut definition of what constitutes supported living, and there appears to be some confusion among the relevant stakeholders about what is meant by the term. Not only is there confusion over what is meant by it but there appears to be a level of confusion among housing associations, the board, the Department and the trusts on the types of people suitable for supported living accommodation.

According to the TYC document, the increase in community-based options such as supported living would see a correlating decline in the demand for the provision of statutory residential homes. In preparing for the debate, I was surprised to find that the trusts could not provide the Committee with a figure for how many people they expected to be placed in supported living facilities over the coming three years who would previously have been placed in residential homes.

The lack of strategic direction regarding the role of supported living in replacing residential placements is concerning, bearing in mind that the policy direction is laid out in 'Transforming Your Care'. I do not accept that the newness of this type of care is a reason for the lack of strategic planning, which is vital to ensure that people and their families have access to appropriate care at the appropriate time.

In her evidence, the Commissioner for Older People suggested that there was no correlating relationship between increasing the role of supported housing and the declining need for residential places. That was also supported by the Health and Social Care Board, which stated that, although it had evidence of a 5% decrease in the demand for residential places, that was not just because of the supported living element but because the provision of care in people's own homes had had an impact. Therefore, I believe that the Department of Health needs to do further work to provide a stronger strategic guideline, building on that contained in TYC, on the relationship between supported living provision and the provision of residential care.

Recommendation 11 looks closely at the terms of developing housing options for older people. As has been said, we have an ageing population, and that is truly a given fact. Thankfully, we now have people living longer. Most of us in the Chamber today can anticipate living well past the threescore years and 10 that we would have expected several decades ago. To ensure that we can build on that, the Committee believes that coordinated thinking by a number of Departments is required.

I now turn to what my fellow members of the Committee had to say. I thank the Chair for her opening remarks and for setting out the Committee's scrutiny for community-based options for older people. She highlighted the long-term projections and the fact that officials did not recognise a need for long-term projections, even though they recognised that we have an ageing population and that that is only ever likely to increase.

I note also that she stated that the Committee recommended that the Department should begin forecasting the need for supported living places over a 10-year period and that these indicative forecasts should be kept under review and reassessed when decisions are being taken, especially when building new facilities.

7.00 pm

My colleague Mrs Cameron indicated that Northern Ireland has one of the fastest growing populations in the United Kingdom and that, therefore, we need to look at our strategic planning in the years ahead. She also said that we should not continue with our "firefighting approach" and that a planned approach was required. She also highlighted the fact that there is a lack of awareness amongst the general public about the types of supported living available as well as other means that will ensure that people can remain in their homes for longer. She also said that it is vital that all five trusts set out an action plan, which should be clear and concise, about supported living.

Mr McKinney made the excellent point that people should be able to retain relationships and everyday life and be able to be part of their communities. I come from a social work background, and that was definitely an ethos that we promoted: all people have the right to live where they want to and be in the communities that they want to live in. He also spoke of the significant voids in the Northern Ireland Federation of Housing Associations' facilities and how housing associations were facing financial losses. He also said that we need to look at risk sharing between trusts and housing associations. Another two words that he used that jumped out at me were "communication" and "transparency", because there does not seem to have been too much of either over supported living. He also pointed out the lack of strategic thinking.

Mr Beggs spoke on a personal level and as a constituency representative. He said that he understood the need for supported living and the lack of options available to meet individual needs. Again, he brought up the issue of the definition of supported living. That vein ran through the contributions of almost everyone who spoke this afternoon. From my social work background, my definition of supported living would have been extremely different from that of other health professionals, so if there is a difference there, is it any wonder that there is a difference between what Departments, trusts and Members believe it to be? There needs to be a clear definition. I think that that would go some way to facilitating the decisions that health professionals have to make. We cannot begin to expect our community to understand what supported living is if health professionals, Departments, trusts and Members are not fully aware.

Mr McCarthy declared an interest in the subject, although I cannot think why. He, too, said that evidence received had shown that there was no clear definition. He also said that we need to ensure that provision is there and that people had the right to live in their own homes in their own communities and to make the decisions that affect them, because it is their decision to make.

My colleague Mr Dunne said that there was a clear issue in the provision of suitable alternative housing and around the lack of knowledge among those who may require it. I ask again how we can expect our community and our ageing population to have the knowledge of what supported living is when many others in Departments, trusts and the health professions do not know. He went on to mention the Belfast Trust and said that its supported living scheme was not open to everyone but only to those with specific needs. Again, I think that we need to look at what people want and are asking for.

Mr Brady spoke of the long-term policy and the shift in the number of those wishing to remain in their own homes. He also spoke about the need for carers to be supported, about Transforming Your Care and about the lack of clarification. Mr Robinson spoke about services' need to maximise the number of people able to live in their own communities, and he outlined the benefits of that, particularly for those with mental health issues. We know that, within our ageing population, we also have a higher level of people with mental health issues.

I am going to run out of time very shortly, so I will maybe skip on. I will cover Ms McCorley's comments first. She spoke about a need for further understanding. She also spoke about data gathering in the trusts, which linked to what the Chair of the Committee said at the beginning.

In closing, before I get told off as well, I want to congratulate the Minister. When he was elevated to the lofty heights of Minister, I was elevated to his position as vice Chair of the Committee, so I do not know whether to congratulate him. He spoke about Barn Halt Cottages. My colleague Pam Cameron and I visited there last year and saw a very successful and worthwhile supported living project that promoted independence in our older population. We have many places out there that are good models of support. We just need to work on that, and we definitely require much more.

Speaker's Office: Allocation of Functions

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Before we proceed with business, I wish to inform the House that the Deputy Speakers and I met this morning. I have agreed the allocation of functions with my colleagues in accordance with Standing Order 4(7) for this week.

Speaker's Ruling: Jim Allister

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I return to the matter raised by Mr Allister last Tuesday, 7 October, when he queried how Deputy Speaker Beggs had dealt with his question during a ministerial statement. I have now considered the Hansard report of last Tuesday's plenary sitting and reviewed the relevant Standing Orders, Speaker's rulings and the 'Assembly Companion'. I have reached a conclusion on my response, which I discussed with the other Deputy Speakers this morning. We agreed that I would deal with it today. The Member has been informed — I note his presence — that I would respond to him at this stage in proceedings today so that he could make himself available to hear it.

Standing Orders expressly state that the Speaker's decision on all questions of procedure is final and that that authority applies equally to Deputy Speakers. As the Member well knows, that means that, regardless of the circumstances of a ruling and whether a Member agrees with it, he or she is obliged to abide by it. Last Tuesday, therefore, the Member was clearly in breach of Standing Orders when he challenged the Deputy Speaker after the ministerial statement and when he later questioned the consistency with which the Deputy Speaker had chaired that item of business.

Furthermore, the Member also suggested that the Deputy Speaker had acted at the behest of a Clerk. Mr Spratt raised a point of order about that, and he was indeed correct that that was a breach of the conventions of the House. Speaker's rulings make it very clear that staff are there to assist Members in the performance of their duties. The Deputy Speakers and I are grateful for the advice and assistance we receive from the Clerks, but the House, and the Member in particular, should be in no doubt that we are entirely responsible for the conduct of business.

Decisions rest with the Chair, and I reiterate that it is not in order to challenge those decisions.

The Member concerned has had several warnings on previous occasions, so while I would welcome an apology to the House, I am not living in the expectation of that being forthcoming. In accordance with Speaker's rulings, I therefore inform the Member that his speaking opportunities will be restricted from now until 10 November 2014.

I know that the Member will try to spin this, but let me be clear: this is all about his behaviour towards the Chair and towards Deputy Speaker Beggs last week. It was amongst the worst that we have seen in the Assembly.

The Deputy Speakers and I are determined that the authority of the Chair will be upheld and that such blatant breaches of Standing Orders, Speaker's rulings and Assembly conventions cannot be allowed to pass without consequence. Let us move on.

Mr Allister: On a point of order.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I have informed the House —

Mr Allister: On a point of order.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I have informed the House that you will not be allowed to speak unless you wish to apologise. I ask you to resume your seat.

Mr Allister: I wish to make a relevant comment —

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I am not inviting you to make any comment.

Mr Allister: — which will address the issue.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I am asking you whether you wish to take the opportunity to make an apology. If not, resume your seat immediately.

Mr Allister: I wish to address the issue, which may well encompass what you have in mind.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Let us move on. That does not satisfy me. Let us move on.

Mr Allister: I think that we will see more of a kangaroo court tonight on 'Spotlight'. Are you permitting me to make a comment?

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I am not.

Ministerial Statement

October Monitoring Round/Paediatric Congenital Cardiac Services: Outcome

Mr Wells (The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety): I am very glad to have this opportunity to make a statement to the Assembly on two hugely important matters for health and social care services: first, the outcome of the October monitoring round for my Department, and, secondly, the report of the international working group on paediatric congenital cardiac services (PCCS).

Since I have been in office, there have been a number of challenging issues to address. This statement deals with two of them: the financial position for 2014-15 and paediatric congenital cardiac services.

As the Assembly is aware, the Executive reached agreement last Thursday on the October monitoring round for 2014-15. As part of that agreement, my Department received an additional allocation of £60 million. That was on top of the conditional allocation of £20 million, which was from the June monitoring round.

Whilst £80 million is most welcome, there are still consequences for the provision of health and social care services as it is simply not possible to maintain current levels of service provision in the absence of all the required levels of funding. This statement updates the House on the implications of the October monitoring round for my Department.

The Executive, the Health Committee and the Assembly are well aware that my Department has experienced significant financial pressures, notably since autumn 2013, and these have yet to be resolved. The pressures are in a wide range of areas, including children's services, the quality and safety of services, elective care and unscheduled care, and they reflect the increasing demands on health and social care and the technological and treatment advances that can now be provided. These unfunded pressures are despite my Department having delivered efficiency savings of £490 million over the last three years. Indeed, a further £170 million is planned for delivery in the current financial year.

My Department made significant monitoring round bids in June and October 2014. The Executive and the Health Committee were advised that additional funding needed to be found to avoid the worst consequences for patients and clients in Northern Ireland. I very much welcome the £80 million that is being made available. It is a significant investment, but it is disappointing that £87 million is being handed back to the Treasury for welfare reform penalties rather than being invested in local health and social care. This approach means that I will not be able to take forward many of the plans that would have improved health and social care services and the outcomes for the Northern Ireland population.

Indeed, if we had obtained that £87 million, we would be extremely happy. Even our share of that £87 million would have been very welcome.

I assure you that my priority is that the services that we provide must be safe and effective for all the patients that they serve. Unfortunately, that may mean that some services will need to be reviewed, and that, in some cases, opening times may need to be restricted. Indeed, some services may need to cease altogether, based, of course, on the views of clinicians on safe staffing levels. However, with the additional funding that is being made available, I expect trusts to avoid the worst of these consequences and to minimise any reductions in the use of agency and bank nurses, social workers and locum doctors.

Whilst some further investment in elective care will be possible, this will be much less than the full extent of the pressure, and that means that the current restrictions on the use of the independent sector will have to continue. I assure you, however, that those patients with existing appointments in the independent sector will be treated. All other patients will be treated within the local trusts in priority order, but, inevitably, this increased pressure on trusts will lead to longer waiting times.

The extent of the pressure on my budget means that I will have no option but to impose further cuts in other areas, including departmental arm's-length bodies, my Department's administrative costs and pharmacy spending. There has been further discussion in recent days about restraint on wider public sector pay. I believe that this is a necessary measure, given the extent of financial constraints, but it should be applied consistently across all areas of the public sector, and not restricted to one element of the workforce. I strongly advocate that any pay restraint imposed on health and social care workers should be consistent with those applied in other public sector organisations.

On the more positive side, the additional £80 million will fund a wide range of existing expenditure commitments and allow further new investments to proceed. I will allocate the funding to those areas that minimise the worst of the consequences on front line patient care, thus addressing the serious concerns previously raised by the Chief Medical Officer. I particularly want to ensure that unscheduled care and patient flow is supported to reduce the number of breaches of the emergency department waiting time standards, including through the challenging winter period. This includes ensuring that existing domiciliary care packages are maintained and that some new care packages can also be provided.

I also intend to provide support to enable National Institute for Health and Care Excellence (NICE) drugs and treatments to continue to be provided, which will mean that patients can benefit from specialist treatments without considerable extension of waiting times. I know that the Chair of the Health Committee will welcome the next part of my statement: investment will be made in the Altnagelvin radiotherapy centre during 2014-15 so that it can be opened as intended in 2016. The funds will also mean that the cath labs in Altnagelvin can continue to operate a vital 24/7 service as planned, and that some further support can be provided to the voluntary and community sector and the Family Fund.

For mental health and learning disability, 116 clients will benefit from being resettled into the community, and hence be able to access the facilities that we have planned for them. I am also able to provide further support to drive forward important elements of reform under the Transforming Your Care agenda, allowing integrated care partnerships to make further progress and ensuring that there is a greater equity in reformed services across Northern Ireland.

In the coming weeks, specific allocations to front line services will be made to the Health and Social Care Board (HSCB), the Public Health Agency (PHA) and the trusts to reflect my ministerial priorities and the pressures being experienced in local areas. I will then expect the trusts to break even and be accountable to me, the Assembly and the public for the performance standards that I set.

I will turn now to another very important issue, that of paediatric congenital cardiac services. As Members will recall, on 9 December 2013, my predecessor, Mr Poots, made a statement to the Assembly announcing that, in conjunction with his counterpart in the Republic of Ireland, he had appointed a team of international clinicians to provide an assessment of the optimal model for a cardiac surgery and interventional cardiology service for congenital heart disease to meet the respective needs of the Republic of Ireland and Northern Ireland. The international working group (IWG) was chaired by Dr John Mayer, Professor of Surgery at Harvard Medical School and senior associate in cardiac surgery at Boston Children's Hospital.

The members of the group were Dr Adrian Moran, the associate clinical professor at Tufts medical school and chief of paediatric cardiology at Maine Medical Center, USA; and Dr John Sinclair, consultant paediatric cardiac anaesthetist at the Royal Hospital for Sick Children in Glasgow. Nursing expertise and advice was provided to the international working group by Dr Patricia Hickey, the vice president of cardiovascular and critical care services and associate chief nursing officer at Boston Children's Hospital.

10.45 am

In my written statement to the Assembly on 24 September, I announced that the international working group had presented its report to the two Departments, that both were considering the report and that I would subsequently announce our response to the international working group's full recommendations together with the Minister for Health in the Republic Of Ireland, Leo Varadkar TD. Today, I am following up on that commitment. Members may ask why there was a delay between receiving the report and it being published. It is being published as I speak. The reason for that is that, because it was a joint report commissioned by the two Ministers, we had to seek the agreement of our colleagues in the Irish Republic before we could release it.

In reaching this decision, I have given careful consideration to the report in the wider context of the various reviews and assessments that have been carried out in recent years relating to the paediatric congenital cardiac surgery service in Northern Ireland. I have given specific consideration to the report and recommendations of the Health and Social Care Board's PCCS working group of April 2013; the views of the parents' groups, which I very much welcome, such as Heartbeat Northern Ireland, which supported those recommendations; the views of the Children's Heartbeat Trust as appended to the report and recommendations of the Health and Social Care Board's PCCS working group; and the proposed model for the future delivery of paediatric cardiac services that was submitted to my Department by Belfast Trust cardiologists in March 2013.

I have met many of the groups involved in the debate since my appointment. It was in that context that my predecessor and Minister Varadkar's predecessor commissioned the international working group to assess, in both jurisdictions and on the basis of a single service, the current and projected need for the service; the way in which the service is currently delivered; and the possibilities for configuring the service that could best meet the needs of the overall patient population.

All the recommendations in the report are important. Indeed, the international working group has highlighted their interdependent nature. I know that the question of whether surgery would remain in Belfast was of major concern to the patients' families and the Assembly in particular. Like my predecessor, I wanted to end the uncertainty on that specific issue. It was for that reason that I announced on 24 September that the report had recommended that all paediatric cardiac surgery and paediatric interventional cardiology should cease to be delivered in Belfast. That is one of 14 recommendations that, together, make up the working group's proposed model for delivering that vitally important service.

The service is important not just for now but for current and future generations of people born with heart conditions, many of whom live a full and normal life into adulthood thanks to the advances made in that medical specialty in recent decades. It is the fourth successive report to recommend that paediatric cardiac surgery should cease in Belfast. The first was the Sir Ian Kennedy review, which was published in August 2012. The second was the Health and Social Care Board's PCCS working group review in April 2013, which I mentioned earlier. The third was the Chief Medical Officer's report to my predecessor on the evidential base and clinical practice aspects of congenital cardiac services, which was published in August 2013. The weight of evidence based on clinical assessment is clear. In the interests of patient safety and to ensure the future provision of a safe, effective and sustainable service for those vulnerable patients and their families, it is my responsibility as Health Minister to act on that evidence.

As I said, the international working group's report makes a total of 14 recommendations that are interdependent. The view of the international working group is that the recommendations cannot be easily separated without threatening the viability of the proposed solution. The proposal that paediatric cardiac surgery and interventional cardiology should be provided by a single children's heart centre in Dublin is one of a series of interdependent recommendations that make up the IWG's proposed model.

From the outset, that work has had the optimisation of the service as its main focus. The recommendation should therefore not be viewed in isolation.

I believe that the overall package addresses the range of serious concerns that patients' families, patients' groups and clinicians have made known following previous reviews. They have presented questions and challenges and are to be commended for doing so. In turn, the international working group has taken those views on board, and the Chief Medical Officer has confirmed his view that the proposed approach offers the best opportunity to provide that important service in an appropriate, safe and deliverable framework.

Like some of the patients' families and their representatives, I, too, had an opportunity to meet Dr Mayer and the international working group when they visited Northern Ireland in April 2014. Of course, that was in my previous capacity as Deputy Chair of the Health Committee. In doing that, I was impressed by their clear desire to hear about the experiences of the families and listen to their concerns and their commitment to addressing those within their recommendations. Indeed, the report speaks of the willingness of the international working group, observed during their visits in both jurisdictions at all levels, to have a solution at all levels based on political, clinical, policy/management and parental views.

I am satisfied that the international working group has fulfilled its terms of reference, and that view is shared by my counterpart in the Republic of Ireland, Minister Leo Varadkar.

The proposed solution provides for a surgical service that would see children treated in accordance with the highest standards of safety. In addition, it points to opportunities for: enhancing the support we make available to their families; involving their representatives, as well as clinicians, in governance arrangements; improving communication and the flow of information between clinical teams in Dublin and Belfast; and further improving the transport service that we provide to get patients to where they need to be as quickly and safely as possible.

Time will not permit that I go through the detail of each and every recommendation with you, but I urge Members to study the report that has just been released. I know that Members will want to take time to read the report for themselves, and it is now available on the departmental website, but I want to draw your attention to some aspects and themes arising from the recommendations.

Recommendation 7 of the international working group's report proposes the key change to the current service in Northern Ireland — that those arrangements should be brought to a conclusion and that all paediatric cardiac surgery and interventional cardiology should take place in Dublin, in Our Lady's Hospital in Crumlin.

One of the major concerns expressed in the wake of the previous report was that cessation of surgery would impact on the ability to maintain specialist medical skills in Belfast, which, in turn, would restrict the service available. However, I am reassured to note that the maintenance of those life-saving skills is central to recommendation 4, which advocates the flow of nursing and physician personnel between the two jurisdictions. It is a two-way street, as it draws on the respective strengths of both jurisdictions to form one service — effectively one team serving one patient population. It details how Belfast-based paediatric cardiologists and paediatric cardiac anaesthetists should participate regularly in procedures with colleagues in Dublin, which will ensure that their skills are maintained.

The report also seeks to improve the experience and the involvement of families and their representatives in the proposed model. I have greatly valued the opportunity to meet the parents and family representatives. There are some very caring couples who are doing so much to look after very ill children. They are to be admired and supported. In that regard, recommendation 2 advocates the establishment of a family advisory group with representatives from both jurisdictions to provide direct input to a single governance vehicle, which I will say more about shortly. The family advisory group's aim will be to give a voice to families and also to serve as a means of providing feedback about how the system is functioning.

Family concerns are also addressed in two further recommendations. Recommendation 8 seeks enhanced patient and family services in Dublin for all patients and families who do not reside in the Dublin metropolitan area. That would include assistance with travel, lodging, meals and other practical matters. Indeed, many parents have made these points to me about the practical difficulties of dealing not only with a very ill child but with accommodation, food, travel arrangements etc. Recommendation 9 proposes the integration of the activities of clinical nurse specialists and advanced practice nurses in Belfast and Dublin to provide patient and family support, to manage the transfers of patients between Belfast and Dublin and to co-manage clinics.

This is an aspect of the model recommended by the IWG that I particularly approve of in that it provides families with full participation through their representatives on both the governance committee and the proposed family liaison service. If this is implemented, it will empower families in a way that has not happened before; providing them with an opportunity to ensure that their concerns, for instance, about the provision of accommodation and reimbursement of expenses are fully addressed.

There are four recommendations on the specifics of arrangements to ensure integration of services through IT links and case conferences. Those are recommendations 3, 6, 12 and 13.

The IWG has recognised the importance of effective emergency transport arrangements to make an all-island service function effectively, and indeed it met transport providers during its visit in April. Recommendation 10 calls for quarterly meetings between the paediatric and neonatal patient transport services in the two jurisdictions. This aims to facilitate and further strengthen safe transfers between outlying areas and the centres in Dublin and Belfast, as well as transfers between the centres. Recommendation 11 recognises the need for the Republic of Ireland to continue to upgrade its paediatric transport services and suggests building on the expert inpatient extracorporeal life support (ECLS) services existing in Dublin to form a mobile ECLS service.

Finally, recommendation 1, which effectively ties the whole model together, relates to the establishment of a single governance committee, composed of patient representatives, senior clinicians including surgeons, cardiologists and nurses, and the Chief Medical Officers and commissioners from both jurisdictions, to address all operational and policy issues. It would oversee the operations of the personnel, facilities and institutions involved in the care of patients of all ages with congenital heart disease. Its scope, as envisaged by the IWG, would be to effectively influence the deployment of capital and personnel resources for the management of patients with congenital heart disease in both jurisdictions. Terms of reference would be agreed by the respective health authorities in Northern Ireland and the Republic of Ireland.

There are issues for us to work through regarding the practicalities of this recommendation as it has been described in the report. However, we believe that there may be an alternative joint governance vehicle to the IWG model, which would be better suited to our separate clinical and statutory structures but would maintain the principle of placing clinicians and families at the forefront of influencing decisions with real input from patient representatives. My Department and the Department of Health in the Republic of Ireland have reached broad consensus that this vehicle would operate effectively as a clinical network and still deliver the aim of the recommendation.

The report therefore gives us an achievable model. It gives us an indication of how to get there, but it does not prescribe the detail about exactly how the transfer should occur, when surgery in Belfast should cease, how Dublin's capacity can be increased or what happens with patients in the meantime. This is for me to agree with Minister Varadkar, and our Departments are working together closely to establish how we can build on the willingness that the IWG encountered during its visit and to plan how to make the model a reality.

Minister Varadkar and I have both agreed to accept all the IWG's recommendations and are committed to their full implementation, subject to the outcome of any necessary consultation. We are issuing a joint policy statement to that effect today. I will say something further about the consultation in a moment.

In implementing this new model, there will be a requirement to plan and take it forward in stages, as some elements will take longer to achieve than others. I know that the immediate concern of patients, their families and their clinicians is around what happens now and in the short term. I can assure you that my Department has been working closely with the Health and Social Care Board, the Belfast Trust and colleagues in the Republic of Ireland to understand what a pathway to implementation may look like, what obstacles would need to be addressed and what investment may be needed along the way. In the meantime, and central to that, of course, is ensuring that, throughout the interim period, we have arrangements in place to ensure that patients receive the best possible care.

11.00 am

First and foremost, we will need to ensure that a suitable, safe alternative is in place immediately after elective surgery and interventional cardiology ceases in Belfast. Currently, a very small number of paediatric cardiac operations and interventional procedures take place in Belfast. Those that do are planned, involve less complex procedures, exclude very young children and are carried out by surgeons who are based in Dublin and travel to Belfast once or twice a month. In highlighting that, I want to put on record my sincere gratitude for their continued willingness to do so over a prolonged and uncertain period. That has been hugely appreciated, not least by the families of the patients they treated.

All other elective surgery is carried out in heart centres in England, namely in London and Birmingham, whilst provision also exists for patients requiring emergency treatment to be treated in Dublin or in specialist centres in England. Again, I would like to express my sincere thanks to the clinical teams in Birmingham and the Evelina children's heart hospital for the service that they provide to Northern Ireland children and their families.

With regard to children requiring emergency surgery, I know that Members have expressed concern about the future arrangements for diagnosis of children born in the north or north-west of Northern Ireland, where transfer times to Dublin take considerably longer. Ultimately, it will be for the clinicians to decide whether a child should be transferred directly to Our Lady's Children's Hospital in Crumlin or whether that child should be transferred directly from Belfast to England. A key aspect of the single-service model is that, when it is fully implemented, it will have the capacity to deal with all emergency cases. However, it will be some 18 months before the model is fully in place and operating to capacity.

The current arrangements for emergency transfers have recently been the subject of review. There have been two cases recently, one in August and one in September, where it has not been possible for Our Lady's Children's Hospital in Crumlin to accommodate cases for emergency surgery. The HSCB is engaged with the Health Service Executive in the Republic of Ireland about this, to ensure that any additional steps that are necessary to ensure the robustness of the current arrangements are put in place. That only serves to emphasise the critical nature of ensuring safe, effective and robust services in the long term, which I am confident the proposed model will achieve.

In the short term, it will be important to ensure a well-managed extension of the current service level agreements (SLAs) between the two providers in Northern Ireland, the Republic of Ireland and, of course, England, where appropriate. It is most important that the existing SLAs continue in operation, augmented as necessary, to enhance the current arrangements and are quickly replaced by the single-service model proposed by the international working group. Further implementation will be on the basis of the outcome of any necessary consultation and by early agreement on the resource timelines and service integration requirements. That will be driven and carried out within appropriate structured project management arrangements with all the necessary steering, oversight and consultation structures required, in line with the international working group's recommendations. In that respect, Leo Varadkar and me have instructed our officials to take forward preparation work with immediate effect, with a view to having a clear action plan agreed and in place by the end of December 2014.

The current arrangements under the SLAs will remain in place until December 2014. Thus, the immediate impact of the removal of surgery from Belfast will be that, from January 2015, more children from Northern Ireland are likely to receive elective surgery at specialist centres in England, as required, until the appropriate capacity is in place in Crumlin. Interventional cardiology will cease in Belfast from April 2015, and Northern Ireland children will then receive that service in Crumlin, delivered by Belfast cardiologists working as part of the integrated team in Dublin.

On 25 April 2013, my predecessor acknowledged receipt of the report of the HSCB's PCCS working group, and said that he wished to consider its recommendations before reaching a decision. Subsequent to that, he and his counterpart in the Republic of Ireland commissioned the IWG to carry out its assessment, which I have published today. I, therefore, wish to advise the Assembly that, in light of the IWG's recommended model, I propose to recommend the PCCS working group's proposals on the following basis: that consideration will be given to the implementation of the recommended service specification in the context of the IWG's model; and that the working group's preferred way forward for the future configuration of the service for Northern Ireland should be taken account of in the implementation of the IWG's model. It is notable that both groups reached the same conclusion, which is that surgery should cease in Belfast and be carried out in Dublin.

The HSCB will bring forward detailed investment proposals to further develop a cardiology centre of excellence at Belfast Trust and to strengthen the Northern Ireland network. In that regard, I will ask the HSCB to work closely with the Belfast Trust's management and cardiologists in developing the investment proposals. I wish to place on record my thanks to the board, the Public Health Agency and the working group for the extensive work that they completed in providing advice to my predecessor.

Members will recall that my predecessor announced the Belfast Trust's proposals to consider the possible transfer of children's cardiac surgery from the Royal Victoria Hospital to the Royal Belfast Hospital for Sick Children, subject to the completion of a risk assessment, and has concluded that such a transfer would be desirable. As paediatric surgical services are due to end on 31 December 2014, I have asked my officials to write to the HSCB for an updated position on the proposed transfer as this would now appear to be unnecessary.

I intend to announce details of the public consultation on the recommended model in the near future. I am making the report available on the departmental website today, and I have outlined in the statement the link to it on the Department's website. I urge all concerned to consult it, as it is now live.

In the meantime, I have instructed my Department to work with commissioners and providers to immediately plan for the implementation of the service model recommended by the IWG. I will await the outcome of the consultation before making my final decision on whether to implement the model. My decision to proceed with the planning is in keeping with the principle that precautions should be applied, given the vulnerability of the sustainability of the service in the Belfast Trust.

In conclusion, the proposed model is absolutely focused on patient safety and the effective delivery of care. My predecessor and I have been motivated throughout this work by the desire to provide the best possible standard of care for children in Northern Ireland who suffer from congenital heart disease and their families. The simple reality is that we cannot reach these standards alone. That is the clear message from the work of IWG, and I cannot and will not ignore their expertise and experience in reaching that view. Patient safety is central to this decision. I commend the work of the IWG to the Assembly.

Ms Maeve McLaughlin (The Chairperson of the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety): Go raibh maith agat. I thank the Minister for his statement. As this is his first ministerial statement, I congratulate him on his elevation. It was remiss of me not to do it yesterday.

There is a lot of detail in the statement, but two important issues are covered, specifically in relation to the breakdown of the budget and the very welcome news around the radiotherapy unit and the cath lab. I am delighted that that is planned. Has DFP put any conditions or restrictions on how the £80 million will be spent, or will priority be at the Minister's discretion? Can I confirm how much of it will be allocated towards public health, given the policy direction on early intervention and prevention?

Moving on to children's heart services, what I am hearing today is a shift from the hub-and-spoke model to an all-Ireland single heart centre based in Dublin. Can I confirm that the hub-and-spoke model is now not in place and that it is a single centre? You said in your statement that the overall package addresses the range of serious concerns with patients' families. How will that take place? Can we have more detail on that?

Your statement specifically suggests that it does not prescribe the detail of how exactly the transfer would occur, when surgery in Belfast would cease, how Dublin's capacity can be increased and what happens with patients in the meantime. What assurances can the Minister give, given that there will be a consultation period?

Mr Wells: I thank the Chair of the Committee for going easy on me with questions on my first oral statement. There are so many issues to be dealt with. This will be quite complex because some Members will ask questions on budgets, others will ask about cardiology, and some will mix the two.

First, on the budgetary issue, there are no restrictions on the Department in how we allocate the £80 million additional funding. There are, of course, conditions on the £20 million that was allocated in the June monitoring round. As the honourable Member knows, there are quite strong caveats in the mechanism that led to the release of the £80 million, but that is being dealt with by the Executive and DFP.

As I said to her before, £80 million is not enough for us to meet the widely recognised needs that have emerged in health and social care in Northern Ireland. So, between the board, the DHSSPS finance staff, the Public Health Agency etc, we will sit down to prioritise where we need to spend this money. It is no secret that all five trusts are under considerable pressure at the moment and have exceeded their budgets. We will have to look at that situation and bring it into some form of balance.

The only real specific that I can outline — the Chair and other Members for Londonderry have written to me about the issue on many occasions — is that the Altnagelvin facility will go ahead as planned. I know that that will be welcomed by her community and all those in Northern Ireland, Donegal etc who will benefit from that. I am relieved that we have at least been able to deal with that issue.

The hub-and-spoke model was considered before the international working group's report that issued today. I cannot, under any circumstances, ignore the fact that we now have four separate reports, all written by highly acclaimed and knowledgeable experts, that point in the one direction. It would be negligent of me, and I would be ignoring the interests of the patients, if I ignored what those reports say. We will go to a central model, but the Clark clinic will remain open, and services will still be delivered there. However, serious interventions will be dealt with by Dublin or, if they are extremely complex, by Birmingham or London. So we are moving towards a centralised model.

You asked for timelines. We reckon that it will take 18 months to get this all in motion. I can tell you that there is great goodwill from the HSE in Dublin, and we are also committed to it. I regard it as a priority that I will meet Leo Varadkar within the next few weeks so that we can discuss this very carefully.

I emphasise that the £80 million includes the £20 million that came from the June monitoring round, which has some conditions attached to it. It is conditional on assurances of steps to be taken to break even and live within our budget. I can tell you that it is an extraordinarily challenging target.

Ms P Bradley: I also thank the Minister for his very comprehensive statement. Like the Minister and, I imagine, most Health Committee members, I have met the parents and parent representative groups concerned with paediatric congenital heart services. The statement refers to the family advisory group and the inclusion of parents and parent representatives in decision-making. What specifically does the Minister see as the role of the parents and parent representative groups in the implementation of the new model?

Mr Wells: I apologise to the Chair, as she raised a similar point about the involvement of the parents. My door is always open to the parents. Indeed, shortly after my appointment, I attended a fundraising event in Banbridge, where I met many of the parents. We have met various groups. I spent most of yesterday dealing with the concerns of parents. I also greatly value the input of Mr Swann, who has a very clearly defined personal experience of the issue.

Through the proposed model, we are determined that family representatives will have a voice on the governance vehicle and the family advisory group. We are serious about that because I realise that, for many parents, this is a very difficult decision and a bitter pill to swallow. I accept that. We are determined to make the practical realities of attending Crumlin as simplified, efficient and caring as possible for parents who already have the huge burden of looking after a terribly ill child. Therefore, the groups established under the IWG report are designed to give those parents the optimal input. Leo Varadkar and I will listen very carefully to parents' recommendations through those groups. Already, the parents have raised with me some very practical difficulties. They have, for instance, to wait for three months before being reimbursed for the expense of going to Dublin or England. There must be procedures that can be established to ensure that that does not happen. A small issue, but certainly an issue if you are a young person, is the lack of Wi-Fi availability after a certain time of night for children undergoing cardiology services in the Royal. That is a big issue to a young person or a teenager, and we will have to look at that.

We will do everything we can to facilitate the parents and families in this situation because we know how difficult it will be to ask them to travel to Dublin when they have been used to using the Clark clinic.

11.15 am

Mr McKinney: I thank the Minister for his statement. I congratulate the international working group for the work that it has done. We welcome this, particularly the joint nature of the discussions. Minister, you made the statement, but I think it only appropriate that we from the SDLP congratulate your predecessor, Mr Poots, on his sterling work in furthering this project.

It throws up some questions, as you outlined. In your previous answer, you touched on the parents. Would it be appropriate for recommendation 1 to come ahead of the consultation to allow the immediate establishment of that working group so that parents, clinicians and all the rest of them can involve themselves in early discussion?

You talked about the economics earlier. Can the Minister reflect on whether the pharmaceutical price regulation scheme (PPRS) would make a substantial difference to the actual pharmacy spend? In other words, does he accept the notion that embracing the scheme would mean a zero rise in the pharmacy bill?

Mr Wells: First, I will deal with Mr McKinney's first point. As he knows, we have announced a review of the individual funding request (IFR) system. We believe that the report is due back on my desk by the end of November. It will deal with the exceptional holiday criteria for when clinicians ask for specific drugs. Before we go any further, it is important that we look at that. It is only six weeks away and may deal with some of the problems that he and many other Members have with the present situation regarding the 40 cancer drugs. I cannot pre-empt what the review will say, but, given the very short time span, I think that we should look at it before we revisit the model that he outlined.

The Member mentioned moving ahead during the consultation period. I think that he will understand that we are bound by certain protocols. If you announce a policy decision, you have to allow time for people to make their views on it known. However, that does not preclude us going ahead and preparing the way. My understanding is that officials are already meeting to discuss the suggestion that he made. Provided that that can be done in a way that keeps it watertight, from a legal point of view, I do not see any problems with it. Equally, there may well be people who will read the report today and find something that they wish to point out to us or something that they have observations on. Therefore, to be absolutely watertight, we have to ensure that we have 12 weeks of consultation, or whatever period is deemed necessary.

Mrs Dobson: I thank the Minister for his statement and congratulate him on his elevation to Minister. I look forward to working with him. I also look forward, Minister, to hearing more from you at this evening's Adjournment debate. Given the timing of the statement, I should, perhaps, be trying to secure more Adjournment debates.

You mentioned the north-west, which is the furthest away, and we need to ensure the early diagnosis of those vulnerable children. Will you outline what infrastructure will be put in place?

You mentioned the parents, who we all work very closely with. How do you plan to address their very real fears and the concerns of the local families who you have met? Words and promises simply are not enough.

Mr Wells: First, the wishes and views of the parents in Northern Ireland will have exactly the same weight as the wishes of the parents from the Irish Republic. This is meant to be a cooperative model, which will mean that any concerns that they have will be directed to the clinicians, to those in Dublin in Our Lady's and to the relevant Departments. So, I see this as an exciting model that will mean that their views will be at the core of this new arrangement.

Also, I know that she perhaps is quite annoyed about the fact that this statement was made on the morning of her Adjournment debate on the same issue as far as Upper Bann patients are concerned. There was no attempt to head her off at the pass. What simply happened was that the timing was such that an agreement was made with the authorities in the Irish Republic that we would jointly publish this report today. We will address tonight the specific issues that she will undoubtedly raise of behalf of her constituents, but it was just the way that it happened, and there is no cunning plan, as it were, to deal with that. I am quite happy to address her concerns tonight, but, of course, she will have to accept that there will be a huge degree of overlap because the arrangements that we outlined this morning obviously apply in their entirety to patients coming from Upper Bann, as they do for all of Northern Ireland.

Mr McCarthy: Like others, I welcome the Minister's first statement to the Assembly. First, I have to express my sadness that we are losing such a service providing cardiac surgery from Belfast City Hospital. That having been said, at least we are having a service on the island of Ireland, which is preferable to having to travel across the water. From experience, parents tell me that they would rather be in this island.

My main question is on the financial mess that our health service is in at this time and has been in for some time. I remind the new Minister that the Finance Minister accused the former Health Minister of mismanagement of the budget. That is a very serious accusation, and it seems to be that that is where the mess that we are in is at now. The threat to the quality and safety of our services cannot be underestimated. Can the Minister tell the Assembly whether that mismanagement by the former Minister on the budget has been identified? If it has, can he tell the Assembly what is being done and where to make sure that it will not continue? And can he —

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Can you just come to your point?

Mr McCarthy: Can the Minister come back to the Assembly and tell us that the mismanagement has been identified and rectified?

Mr Wells: As the honourable Member will be aware because he sat on the Health Committee at the time, the previous Minister Mr McGimpsey predicted that there were would be 4,000 compulsory redundancies resulting from the CSR when the DUP and Mr Poots took over. That has not happened. There have been no compulsory redundancies whatsoever, and, indeed, Mr Poots took on an extra 500 nurses. We are about to take on 61 health visitors, and we have increased the number of consultants and doctors.

So, the overspend that he is referring to was a mere £13 million, which is 0.3% of the overall budget. The reason for that is that the previous Minister decided to continue with elective surgery so that people who were in misery and having very difficult issues with hips, knees etc got the treatment that they deserved. That was quite easily dealt with, but what he has to accept is that, last autumn, after having managed to achieve £490 million worth of savings in the budget through better and more efficient uses of the resources, there was a huge surge in demand that occurred in autumn 2013 and which is still with us. That is the problem. It is not a misallocation of resources but is simply that demand has risen dramatically. As he knows, demand is rising by 6% and resources are rising by 2%. Inevitably, something was going to give, and it gave, as it were, in October and November 2013. So it is not a case of mismanagement, it is simply the case that we had many more people demanding our services, and we had a restricted budget to meet that.

Mr McCarthy: The Finance Minister thinks —

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr Spratt: I, too, congratulate the Minister on his appointment and thank him for his statement this morning. As he and others in the House are aware, I am journeying with cancer at the moment. On behalf of those who journey with me and, indeed, the excellent clinicians who deal with cancer services throughout Northern Ireland, I ask the Minister what cancer services he will be able to introduce this year.

Mr Wells: First, we wish the Member for South Belfast all the best and admire his courage in being so open about having cancer. That has been extremely helpful.

As you know, there are new services planned for oncology in Northern Ireland. The acute oncology services that we will introduce in February 2015 will require 30 programmed activities (PAs) of consultant time to establish quality services for patients with complications from cancer or cancer treatment, patients with advanced cancer or those admitted to hospital with a newly diagnosed cancer. That will assist the implementation of NICE guidance and guidance on metastatic malignant diseases of an unknown primary origin. Excuse the complicated language. From 2015, 31 PAs of consultant time are required to ensure effective service delivery, resilience and sustainability.

I think that we have a lot to be proud of in cancer services in Northern Ireland. For the first time this year, we can say that more people with a cancer diagnosis will be alive in five years' time than will have passed on. We have crossed that Rubicon and passed that very important line in the sand, where we are moving towards cancer being a long-term condition rather than a life-threatening illness. There are still many thousands of people in Northern Ireland who are facing a very dark valley as a result of a cancer diagnosis, but things are moving in the right direction. Many outcomes in Northern Ireland are ahead of those in the UK and many parts of Europe. We have a lot to be proud of, and there will be further investment. Therefore, things are moving in the right direction despite very difficult financial times.

Mr Byrne: I also wish the Minister good luck in his new job, and I know that he will have the interests of patients at heart, given his commitment to health over the years.

On a resourcing matter, I want to ask the Minister about the gap in the out-of-hours GP services based in Strabane for that district. Can they be examined and rectified?

On children's specialist services, can the Minister make sure that the service level agreements (SLA) are clearly understood by all hospitals, especially the South West Hospital, so that parents who have an urgently sick child can be reassured about how they should proceed to get the specialist care needed?

Mr Wells: I suppose that it was only a matter of time before someone went down to grass-roots level and asked me questions regarding provision in their area. The preparation for today's statement was based on a much higher level of policymaking based on the overall budget. I will examine the two issues that the Member raises about Strabane and the South West Acute Hospital and write to him, because I really could not have anticipated that such a fine detail question would be asked after a much more broad-brush statement.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Members should not need reminding that the questions are about the statement that was issued. It was a very detailed statement that dealt with two specific areas. There will be opportunities in the future to deal with wider issues, particularly in that sphere.

Mr Swann: I assure you that mine will be based on the statement. I declare an interest as having a son who is affected by the subject of the statement. In fact, this time last year, we were in Birmingham because Evan had just come through his cardiac surgery.

Minister, in your statement, you say that you will await the outcome of the 12-week consultation, but it also states that the SLAs will cease in 10 weeks' time, which will move more elective surgery to England until places are available in Crumlin. From our meeting yesterday, I assume that it will be 18 months before those places are available.

The interventional cardiology will cease in six months' time, and all the surgery will move to Dublin. Your statement indicated that Dublin was unable to cope with two emergency cases, one in August and one in September, which was only a few weeks ago. Minister, when you put those three timing issues into one place at one time, can you reassure me that individual care pathways can be established for each child before December and before these changes start to implement the surgeries that will affect the children and families in Northern Ireland?

Mr Wells: I thank the Member and his all-party group for the evidence and information that they have given us on this issue. I wish his son all the best as he goes through this difficult time in his life.

There are many areas between the statement today and the complete change in 18 months' time that will have to be examined very carefully and phased. However, we are dealing with a situation where we can no longer continue to provide a first-class service, given the patient numbers that we have in Northern Ireland. We are not anywhere near the 400 children that we need to provide a first-class service. That is a fact of life and the way that medicine is going. I will be liaising very closely with parent groups and the Member as we go through this difficult process to try to ensure that the movement from one situation to the other is done in a way that will have the least impact on vulnerable children. The pathways is one of the issues that will have to be looked at. At the end of the day, I hope that he accepts that we are doing this with the primary motivation of providing the best possible service for our children.

We are pretty certain that the SLA for elective surgery in Belfast will end in December 2014 — two months' time. All other SLAs will continue until the new international working group model is in place. Those include defined pathways for each child. I accept that the gap will be difficult to manage. I have said that there are many, many issues on my desk, and I regard this as being one of the top five.

Therefore, I am going to take a deep personal interest in this to make certain that our children are not impacted by it. I have met too many loving, devoted parents throughout Northern Ireland who are caring for terribly ill children not to make certain that I will make this a personal priority. Frankly, I know that if I do not, the Member will be snapping at my heels daily — the quiet, reserved individual that he is — to make absolutely certain that I get this one right in conjunction with my colleagues in the Republic. That is why I am going down to see Leo Varadkar. That is why I have made it a priority to go down to Crumlin to make an assessment for myself, and that is why I will be keeping a very detailed overview of the entire process over the next 18 months.

Mr Beggs: I thank the Minister for his statement, and I congratulate him on his appointment. Elective care waiting lists have grown significantly over the last year. In your statement, you indicated that the investment in elective care will not meet the current pressures that exist in the trusts. In fact, you said that it would lead to elongated waiting times. Can you provide us with some hope as to when our health service will improve, when elective surgery will be brought down to the levels that occur in other parts of the United Kingdom and when the pressures on our A&Es will be resolved?

Mr Wells: I was expecting the honourable Member to ask that question. This is a very difficult issue. He has to understand that 63% of the health care budget in Northern Ireland is tied up in salaries, wages and pensions and that another £500 million of the budget is tied up in various contracts. We cannot legally touch those during any financial year without being taken to court and losing. Therefore, the actual aspect of the budget that I have, and that Edwin Poots had, that can be controlled effectively is a very small overall proportion.

One of the areas where we can, as it were, turn off the tap of expenditure is elective care, particularly when it is contracted out to the private sector. It is not a position that any of us wants to be in, and yes, waiting lists will undoubtedly increase. We have already 20,000 people in the system at the moment who are waiting, and that is 1,000 people for every constituency, so I have no doubt that every Member in the House will start receiving letters. However, we simply have to devote the resources to where they are most needed.

Elective care tends to be life-enhancing rather than life-saving. I realise that many people are in considerable pain because they have not had their hip, knee or whatever done, but that is the situation that we are in. My predecessor had to issue information to the private sector telling it that there would be no further referrals apart from those that are in the system. So that, unfortunately, is the price we pay for the huge increase in demand that there has been. We are trying, through the use of trust resources, to put as many people through as we can, but the waiting list is challenging, to put it mildly, and will cause us considerable anguish over the next few months.

Mr Dunne: I, too, welcome the Minister here today. Can he give us some assurance about the excellent work of the children's hospital at the Royal, especially the Clark Clinic? Will the excellent work that they do there before and after operations — they carry out operations at the moment — continue? Can he give us an assurance that that will continue at the current high standard? Also, it is important that we recognise the excellent work done by the Children's Heartbeat Trust in the lobbying and campaigning that it has done on this issue. A number of us, when we were newly elected, found this to be one of the first issues raised with us.

Mr Wells: I concur with the Member on the excellent work done by the charitable sector in this field. It has been very articulate and forceful in representing the needs of parents and their children.

I emphasise that the statement that I have made this morning does not mean the end of paediatric cardiology services in the Belfast Trust. The IWG recommends that the single, all-island model will provide for a fully integrated team from Belfast and Dublin, with Belfast continuing to provide surgery for young adults and the adult population. I will go further by saying that I want to strengthen Belfast as a centre of excellence for cardiology. I have asked the board to bring forward investment proposals to secure this and strengthen the regional cardiac network at the same time. That will secure the specialist skills available in Belfast going forward within the single model.

I agree with the Member in congratulating the previous work done in that hospital, but this is not the end. The very high level cardiac interventions will be done in Dublin from when the model is finished and rolled out. It is a different model, but we still place enormous store by the facilities at the Royal.

Mr G Robinson: I thank the Minister for his statement. What will the spend on Transforming Your Care be directed towards?

Mr Wells: Included in the October monitoring round was a bid of £2.6 million and a proposed investment of £2.4 million. The proposed investment of £2.4 million reflects the ability to spend within the remaining months of 2014-15. These resources will be directed at developing a wide range of early intervention and prevention initiatives, including the treatment of atrial fibrillation, which would enable some 444 strokes to be avoided. There will be a range of investment in what are known as FREDs, including fall prevention, patient education on diabetes, strokes and early supported discharge (ESD), GP education and diabetes investigations. There is also the intention to develop GPs' ability to diagnose and commence treatment without a secondary referral. There will also be a continuation of diabetes self-management pilots, which are aimed at reducing the need for patients to attend outpatient appointments and which reduce insulin prescribing costs and avoid emergency department admissions.

On the capital side, we are continuing with the building of new facilities at Banbridge and Newry, so investment is ongoing. Transforming Your Care continues throughout this, albeit in challenging times. As Members will know, we have made various monitoring round bids for this, and we have not been as successful as we would like to have been.

Mrs Cameron: I apologise for not being in the Chamber at the beginning of the Minister's statement. I welcome the Minister to his new and challenging role, and I congratulate Edwin Poots on the excellent job that he has done in recent years. What public health initiatives will be able to be taken forward in light of the statement?

Mr Wells: I am totally committed to the principle that we need to educate our public better in managing their own health. As a result of the agreement last Thursday, a number of services will be continued or expanded. There will be new developments in obesity services, such as the food in schools programme, to increase the levels of consumption of fruit and vegetables in primary-school children, increase access to physical activity programmes and see the development of further community-based initiatives to develop the skills of individuals and families to grow and cook healthy food.

On the flu vaccine, the number of people in the at-risk groups for flu has also been increased beyond the initial planning assumptions. The intranasal flu vaccine has helped Northern Ireland to achieve a higher than average uptake of flu vaccine for children, and those programmes will be able to continue.

Developments in core screening services will include the appointment of additional staff to meet increased demand in diabetic retinopathy; extension of the age for bowel cancer screening from 71 to 74 years; testing for HPV and cervical cancer screening; appointment of staff to provide quality-assured newborn blood spot screening; and the completion of the introduction of enhanced screening for women at a high risk of breast cancer. There will also be specialist nurses for homelessness and for the black and ethnic minority communities.

So there will be positive initiatives within the PHA. However, we still have a long way to go to achieve the right balance of the funding of that organisation, which is so essential.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: That concludes questions on the statement.

Mr Swann: On a point of order, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker. I want to seek guidance from the Speaker's Office about the detail of the statement. It covered two serious items: the outcome of the monitoring round and paediatric congenital cardiac services. Perhaps in future such a detailed statement that covers two very serious items could be dealt with in two individual statements.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: That is generally a matter for the Minister. We have a new Minister, and he is obviously running to catch up with his brief and to keep the House informed. We all noted the detail of the statement, but I thought that the Minister was very good in taking questions on the two elements of the statement. For your information, it is a matter for the Minister.

Executive Committee Business

Lands Tribunal (Salaries) Order (Northern Ireland) 2014

Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice): I beg to move

*That the draft Lands Tribunal (Salaries) Order
(Northern Ireland) 2014 be approved.*

I trust that this item of business will be somewhat shorter than that which the preceding Minister was subjected to. Under the provisions of the Lands Tribunal and Compensation Act (Northern Ireland) 1964, my Department is responsible for the administration of the Lands Tribunal and determining the remuneration of its judiciary by order, a draft of which must be approved by the Assembly. The tribunal currently consists of a president and one other member, both of whom are appointed by the Northern Ireland Judicial Appointments Commission.

The draft order that is before the House provides for an increase of 1% in the annual salaries that are payable to members of the Lands Tribunal for Northern Ireland, effective from 1 April 2014. That accords with the statement that was made by the Prime Minister on 13 March, following consideration of recommendations made in the thirty-sixth report of the Senior Salaries Review Body, that the Government have decided to increase judicial salaries by 1%. The Department of Finance and Personnel has approved the increase.

At this stage, I wish to thank the Justice Committee for its customary careful and detailed consideration of the draft order. It is with the Committee's support that I bring the draft order before the House. I commend it to the House.

Mr Givan (The Chairperson of the Committee for Justice): I will speak very briefly on the motion on behalf of the Committee. The Committee considered the proposal for the statutory rule in June this year and the statutory rule itself at its meeting on 2 July. As outlined by the Minister, the rule provides for increases in the annual salary of the president and member of the Lands Tribunal for Northern Ireland. The increase is in line with the 2014 report of the Senior Salaries Review Body and the subsequent decision announced by the UK Government in a written statement in March that judicial salaries should increase by 1% from April this year.

On that basis, the Committee agreed that it was content with the statutory rule and therefore supports the motion.

11.45 am

Last year, a similar statutory rule came before the House to make provision for the 2013 change in salary for the same body. At the time, and I repeat, I expressed the view, which was accepted by the Minister, that the use of the affirmative resolution procedure was "odd" and not a good use of Assembly time, given that the salary increase affects one person and relates to a relatively small amount, and yet other statutory rules deal with changes to legal aid funding covering millions of pounds and they are subject to the negative resolution procedure. So, I am aware that the Department is exploring legislative options to amend the Lands Tribunal and Compensation Act (Northern Ireland) 1964 to remove the requirement to increase salaries of members of the Lands Tribunal by draft affirmative resolution procedure, and I urge the Minister to progress that as soon as possible so that a similar rule does not have to be brought to the Assembly next year for debate. I support the rule.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: No other Members have notified that they wish to speak.

Mr Ford: Principal Deputy Speaker, I thank the Committee Chair, as ever. It is always good to record progress made between the Minister of a Department and a Committee. I entirely endorse the points that he made about the rather artificial nature of the debate that we are required to have, and I confirm that my aspiration accords entirely with his: that we will shortly be spared the difficult task of progressing this order annually. With that, I commend to the House what, I hope, will be one of the last such orders.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: There is a danger of agreement breaking out, and the excitement could overtake us all.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

*That the draft Lands Tribunals (Salaries) Order
(Northern Ireland) 2014 be approved.*

Education Bill: Accelerated Passage

Mr O'Dowd (The Minister of Education): I beg to move

That the Education Bill proceed under the accelerated passage procedure.

Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. I begin by stating that my request for accelerated passage is a decision that I have not taken lightly, nor is it an attempt to avoid proper scrutiny of the Bill by the Assembly. It is needed as a matter of urgency to meet a very tight timescale to ensure certainty in our education administration system by April 2015.

Indeed, the Bill and its accelerated passage would not have been needed had the Education and Skills Authority (ESA) been the future of our education administration system. However, despite my best efforts and those of others, it was not possible to get agreement. Had it been possible to secure agreement on the Education Bill, the ESA would have been in place for April 2015. In the meantime, while we have been waiting to get agreement on the ESA, local government reform has been steadily progressing and it now provides an inescapable deadline.

It has always been assumed that the establishment of the ESA would have prevented local government reform from having this unintended impact on education administration. As Members are aware, the territorial responsibility of our existing education and library boards (ELBs) is defined in law by reference to council areas. Currently, the reference is to the existing model of 26 councils, and so the ELBs are defined by five groupings of those 26 territories. From 1 April 2015, under the Local Government (Boundaries) Act 2008, our 26-council model will be replaced by the new 11-council one. Our ELBs should change to be compatible with that. Since May 2014, I have been seeking Executive agreement urgently to prepare legislation that will replace the five ELBs and their staff commission with one education authority. However, it was not until the Executive meeting of 9 September that my Executive colleagues reached that agreement. That has left a challenging time frame to ensure that the necessary legislation is in place that will allow me and my Department to ensure that our education system is compatible with local government reform by 1 April 2015.

In this interim period, my Department has worked to complete the draft of this legislation, the Education Bill 2014. The legislation that I propose is minimal, in the interests of securing consensus, and would deliver only structural and technical change. The Bill would simply change the current requirement of the Education and Libraries (NI) Order 1986 for there to be five ELBs into a requirement for there to be one education authority.

The functions and responsibilities of the Education Authority would be the same as those that are undertaken by the ELBs and would include their employer responsibilities. Employer responsibilities within our system would otherwise remain unchanged. The further provisions of the primary legislation will be the absolute minimum necessary.

In concluding, I will set out, as succinctly as I can, the reasons for my request for accelerated passage for the Bill. The reason why accelerated passage is needed is that the Executive, the Assembly and I should do all that is possible to avoid the risk of not having the Education Authority in place by 1 April 2015. Accelerated passage enables the measures necessary to establish the governance of the authority to begin at a point at which the 1 April deadline remains feasible.

Accelerated passage makes it possible to complete the legislation sufficiently in advance of 1 April 2015 for there to be time enough for my Department to apply the Bill's schemes of transfer to the transfer from the ELBs to the new authority of approximately 40,000 staff, including teaching staff. Accelerated passage makes it possible for my Department to deliver for 1 April 2015 not only the legislation but the administrative minimum that is required to establish the new authority.

The main consequence of accelerated passage not being granted is that it will be impossible for the Education Authority to be in place for 1 April 2015. In that event, the highly negative default will be the unintended continuation of our five ELBs amidst new local government structures. While that scenario continues, the legal basis for our education and library boards' responsibilities and their governance arrangements will be significantly less secure than was ever intended.

The consequence of accelerated passage not being granted is a scenario in which there are many significant risks. Those risks significantly outweigh the potential for accelerated passage to have any negative consequences, given the transparency of a minimalist six-clause Bill that will ensure the necessary structural and technical changes.

Finally, accelerated passage —

Mr Elliott: I thank the Minister for giving way. I am trying to assess the issues with accelerated passage. Does the Minister feel that this is a temporary process or temporary legislation that will be overtaken by a Bill that is wider ranging at a later stage? If so, is that one of the reasons for accelerated passage, or does he see this legislation being here for a long time to come?

Mr O'Dowd: I do not envisage bringing any further legislation forward during this mandate for the Education Authority or the structure of our educational administration.

The Bill allows for the minimum change required to ensure that our Education Authority is compatible with the new local government structures. It also provides a sturdy platform for change if a future Education Minister believes that is required, if the Executive agree with the Education Minister and if the Assembly agrees on legislation.

Nothing can happen beyond the Bill without the consent of the Assembly at a future date. Given that the necessary time frame does not exist in this mandate, it is not my intention to bring forward any further legislation for our education administration. The Bill gives certainty to our education structures. In the future, if someone wishes to make a change, so be it.

Finally, accelerated passage is a measure that caters for the unique demands of the present situation and the very tight time —

Mrs Overend: Will the Minister give way?

Mr O'Dowd: I am more than happy to give way.

Mrs Overend: The Minister is very kind. I refer him to clause 4(3), which states:

“The Department may by order make such supplementary, incidental, consequential or transitional provision as it considers necessary or appropriate in consequence of, or for giving full effect to, any provision made by this Act.”

Clause 4(6) states that such an order would be subject to negative resolution, which means that it would not come before the Committee for agreement. So I am asking the Minister —

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Member will have an opportunity to put those points as we discuss the purpose of the motion. I wonder why you are interrupting the Minister at this point.

Mrs Overend: Sorry, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker. If we are looking for accelerated passage, that is one of the reasons why we —

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: We are about to move into a discussion, and you will have every opportunity to make that point.

Mrs Overend: OK. I am sorry.

Mr O’Dowd: Go raibh maith agat. I will come back and answer that point in more detail as the debate goes on, but the key is this: I can commence only those orders that are in connection with the Bill. I cannot go beyond the Bill or bring in by order any changes that should be covered by primary legislation. So when introducing the clause that you mentioned, I can commence only those changes that are commensurate to or in connection with the Bill. I cannot introduce primary legislation through the process that you outlined. It would not be allowed into the Assembly by the Speaker’s office, and it would not get past the Executive or, in fact, the Assembly. There is no underhand mechanism. It is a clause that is in much legislation, but it relates only to the powers in each individual piece of legislation. On that point, I bring my opening comments to an end.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: In light of the interventions, I urge Members to stick to the purpose of the discussion, which is accelerated passage. As soon as we discuss that, and if we agree to proceed, there will be a further debate, when we will be able to examine all the details of the Bill. Members should keep their focus on the purpose of this phase of the Bill, which is accelerated passage.

Miss M McIlveen (The Chairperson of the Committee for Education): Let me begin by declaring an interest as a member of the board of governors of Castle Gardens Primary School, Newtownards and Killinchy Primary School. With your permission, I will initially make a few remarks as Chairperson of the Committee for Education before speaking as an individual Member.

On 30 September 2014, in line with Standing Order 42(3), the Minister briefed the Education Committee on accelerated passage for the Education Bill. He said that accelerated passage was sought owing to the timescales associated with aspects of the reform of public administration. The Committee questioned the Minister on the justification for that.

The ongoing changes to local government, agreed by the House as part of RPA, are wide-ranging. From 1 April 2015, we will see changes to district councils, not only to their powers but to the number of councils and their boundaries.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Dallat] in the Chair)

As the Minister just said, the existing education and library boards are defined by the old district council boundaries. Indeed, the allocation of places on the boards is also determined in part by the number of district councils in a board’s area and the related relative populations of schoolchildren in the maintained and controlled sectors.

The Minister advised the Committee that, without the Bill, the RPA changes could undermine the legal certainty associated with the obligations and responsibilities of the education and library boards. It was further argued that accelerated passage was needed to mitigate that risk, as was pointed out today.

I think that everyone on the Committee understands that the roll-out of RPA will necessitate changes to the education and library boards. I also think, or at least hope, that the last thing that anyone on the Committee wants to do is to introduce further uncertainty into the administration of education.

Setting aside the wider RPA issues, I think it worth mentioning that the existing ELBs and other organisations have been limping along for quite some time. Vacancy controls, in place since 2006, and several hundred voluntary severances have had a substantial impact on their efficiency and operability. Indeed, perhaps a third of non-teaching ELB staff and a larger proportion of senior staff are in temporary positions.

As a member of a number of boards of governors and Chair of the Education Committee, I know that this has been a difficult time for the education and library boards. I know also that many people in those organisations will welcome the early establishment of the proposed Education Authority and the associated stabilisation of staffing arrangements. I understand that, but it should be noted that the Bill will create a very large public sector organisation. The Committee has received only limited information on its anticipated structure, staffing levels and transitional arrangements. Welcome though the information provided so far has been, it is neither sufficient nor satisfactory.

12.00 noon

The change proposed in the Bill is limited but, nonetheless, significant. Given the importance of the dissolution of the ELBs and their replacement by the Education Authority, it is unfortunate that it appears that the Committee will not get the opportunity to scrutinise the legislation to the extent that it would have liked. Notwithstanding this, the majority of members of the Committee will, with some reservations, support the motion for accelerated passage. I should indicate that, whether or not the Assembly agrees to accelerated passage, the Committee will expect to receive more information and regular updates on the Minister’s plans for the establishment of the Education Authority. I ask that, in his response today, the Minister assents to this.

There are a number of issues and important principles in the Education Bill. There are also important questions in respect of representative bodies, for example, for the controlled sector. As is usual, I will air the Committee’s views on those subjects during the Second Stage debate that is scheduled for later today.

Speaking as a DUP MLA, the road to reform has been long and fraught. After two aborted Bills, it is disappointing that this Bill should come before us with such limited time to consider it. The work of the Education Committee in forensically examining the clauses and outworkings of the previous two Bills was exemplary, and showed the effectiveness of the Committee system in the scrutiny of legislation. That said, the two previous Bills were unwieldy pieces of legislation that truly merited clause-by-clause examination, particularly given the radical overhaul that they would have given effect to for the whole education system in Northern Ireland.

The Bill for which accelerated passage is being sought is much less radical but nonetheless important. If legislation is not passed, the education system will not be standing at a crossroads but on a cliff edge. Ideally, I would like to have had the opportunity to scrutinise the legislation in Committee. That process has shown itself to be extremely thorough and effective to date. Similarly, I would have liked the Minister to have brought these proposals sooner, as it was clear for some time that the previous Bill was not going to obtain the support necessary. In fact, the proposals in the Bill bear a striking resemblance to the position that the DUP suggested in 2008.

Unfortunately, the realities of the situation do not permit that. We face the reality that the passage of legislation must be accelerated to ensure that there is service delivery come 1 April next year. It is with reluctance, therefore, that I will accede to accelerated passage. That the Bill is to have no formal Committee Stage does not mean that the Committee will be ignoring its outworkings. I sincerely hope that the Minister and his officials will provide the information necessary to facilitate the work that the Committee will carry out. The time constraint will necessitate promptness from the Department, and I ask the Minister to give his undertaking to cooperate fully with the Committee in its endeavours.

It is regrettable that we have an eleventh-hour solution to a matter that has taken almost six years to resolve. It could have been handled much more effectively had the Department not, with ESA, bitten off more than it could chew. There remain some outstanding issues, which I will go into in more detail during the Second Stage; these issues would have benefited from thorough examination in a Committee Stage. While more detailed consideration of any Bill is always the better course, given the perilous predicament that education will be placed in should the Bill not proceed, we understand the reasons for accelerated passage at this stage.

Mr Hazzard: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I, too, welcome the Minister bringing forward the relevant legislation to bring our education administration system into line in time for the implementation of RPA on 1 April 2015. Effective and efficient reform of our system has long been sought, so it is fair to say that each and every part of our education system looks forward to this long overdue process of change.

Given the quite considerable time constraints that the Minister and Department face in implementing the proposed changes, Sinn Féin is content that the Bill proceeds with accelerated passage. At the end of September, the Minister briefed the Committee on various aspects of the Bill and took the opportunity to outline the need for accelerated passage. I think that it is fair to suggest that the Committee took on board the rationale presented by the Minister, and I hope that such consensus will be reached again here today. Too often in recent years, political consensus on educational reform has been difficult to achieve. To the detriment of our system and the welfare of our teachers and pupils, the protection of narrow political interests has scuppered much-needed educational reform. To the eyes of many, certain political parties have too often trapped themselves in the straitjacket of zero-sum politics when discussing administrative reform in our education system. They prioritise the narrow needs of a particular interest over the strategic interests of our system as a whole. Indeed, in 2011, the Assembly agreed to the establishment of ESA. However, despite the Minister agreeing to a number of significant compromises, we were still unable to secure political agreement to take the Education Bill forward. There can be no doubt that the delay in reaching agreement on this critical issue is having a detrimental impact on education structures. It must not be allowed to continue.

Given the huge financial constraints being imposed on the Assembly, and specifically on education budgets, the fact that the reform has the potential to save £180 million over the next 10 years should not be cast aside so easily. Not only will the reform deliver much of the savings and efficiencies of the original ESA plans, but it will ensure the effective use of public funds and that the money already invested in preparing for ESA has not been wasted.

The Minister has outlined today the severe implications if accelerated passage were not to be granted and that the 1 April 2015 deadline would, in all probability, be breached. Not only would the system once again bemoan the lack of cohesion and vision from its political representatives in Stormont, but the failure to align our administration structures to that of the review of public administration would place our boards on a precarious legal footing. It is a nightmare scenario that must be avoided. The boards have endeavoured for some years now to shoulder much of the effects of a lack of agreement on ESA. We must not walk away from the table again without agreeing a way forward.

The Minister summed it up well at Committee and again here today when he described the consequence of accelerated passage not being granted as a “scenario of many significant risks”. Those risks significantly outweigh the potential for accelerated passage to have any negative consequences given the transparent straightforwardness of a Bill that contains six clauses. I also welcome the commitment from the Minister that this instance does not establish or intend any precedent in bringing forward future legislation. It is a measure for the unique demand of the present situation and the time frame imposed by RPA. In light of such, we are content to support the Minister’s request for accelerated passage.

Mr Rogers: I declare an interest as the chair of the board of governors of Grange Primary School. The preamble on the Department’s website is still for ESA, but it holds very true for the Education Bill. It states:

“The purpose of education reform is to improve outcomes for all young people in education and to ensure equality of access to quality education provision. It also aims to streamline education administration to ensure that much needed resources can be directed to supporting front line services.”

It is a shame that £17 million has been wasted over the years. Think of it simply as this: you could have employed another 140 teachers over the last five years. What a difference that would have made to raising standards.

We would have liked to have the opportunities to scrutinise the Bill in Committee, and we would have expected the impasse with ESA to be recognised earlier and for the Bill to be brought to the House a bit earlier as well. Let us face it: too much money is wasted in five parallel education authorities. I look forward to one authority. We in the SDLP will support the idea of accelerated passage. As the Minister said, this is a platform for potential future reform, but the platform must be fit for purpose and we must all leave from the same platform. Further procrastination in the education sector is not an option. We will support the accelerated passage, but the authority must be representative of all in the education community. I trust that the new authority will help to reduce the bureaucracy in the management of our education system by reducing duplication and streamlining management structures.

Mr Kinahan: I welcome the Bill. All along, the Ulster Unionist Party has wanted to see a suitable ESA Bill that delivers a better education system in a leaner and more economic manner, so we welcome that sort of streamlining. The spin that was being put out about the Executive all agreeing to this is just not right. The public were misled on that matter, and they should receive an apology. Our Minister opposed the accelerated passage of the Bill, and it is our intention today to oppose accelerated passage. It is sad that we seem to have an interim sticking plaster of a Bill. It makes me think that, once again, we have the two main parties doing a deal.

I know that, in the summer, there were all sorts of discussions, compromises and groups going through, but none of that has ever gone to the Committee or to the other parties. It is as if they are frightened of consultation and of actually talking to people. There has been no effort to work with all parties for a consensus, and I think there is no intention to do so. I wonder whether the DUP has been bought again by the promise of a controlled sector body. We do all want to see a controlled sector body, but we want to see a Bill that works for everyone, and that is why it needed proper consultation. I think that is a very good reason for us to oppose accelerated passage today.

I was not involved with the first ESA Bill, but I was very involved with the second ESA Bill. The second ESA Bill was very different from the first. It did not go through a proper consultation process. In fact, I wrote to every single principal and chair of governors in every school, and 88% said that they had not been properly consulted, yet here we are. It is a disgrace. Here we are, rushing again and accelerating a Bill through that is phenomenally important.

I would like to hear from the Minister whom he has spoken to in the schools, the boards and everywhere else, because we would like to know on what basis the Bill has been put together. Sadly, I could not make the Committee meeting when the Minister was there to answer questions, but I have the transcript. In it, he claims that the previous ESA Bill was agreed. It may have only been agreed by the two main parties, but the reason why it fell was because it was not consulted on or taken through the processes with all the other parties beforehand. If it had not been for the Ulster Unionist Party raising the concerns, we would have had that ESA Bill in place. Here we go again.

We were told in the briefing on the Bill that there are no other options and that, for legal reasons, we must accept that the Bill is the only solution, because councils need to have representation on the library boards and, because they have changed, that legal basis no longer exists. Is that really the right reason, or is it just an excuse to get a quick Bill through that still gives the strength to the Department to do what it wants? Did the Department consider reorganising the elections, or, rather, those from councils on the education committees, in a different way so that we did not have to have this one Bill? Did they look at a different system of SL1s and other forms of Committee work and legislation to actually get it in place and get it working so that we do not have this interim or sticking-plaster Bill?

I believe that the Minister does want to improve our education system and works at it. I just disagree about the fact that he never talks to the other parties as to how it is to be done. I sometimes suspect, especially after what happened with the inspection report, that he is being run by Connolly House and we are not actually being treated to the democracy that we all deserve.

With that all in mind, we have to ask ourselves whether we are being forced to accept this relatively simple Education Bill with accelerated passage because it suits them and not the rest of us. Some I spoke to in the education system said that we should really have three boards, which would be more preferable than one board. It would give us some form of comparability and some form of local accountability, yet, because we have had no consultation, no chance for consultation and no Committee Stage, we will not be able to explore that. If you had three boards, you could have one for Belfast and two others to fit the more rural communities. You could work on it through a proper Bill in time to get it into a more efficient system. Comparison, like competition, is an extremely efficient way of ensuring that a government system works properly.

It looks like we are going to get one single board, and that will become another silo — another monolith that is not answerable to anyone except the Department. We were told that the education and library boards were going to be rebooted. That was back at the beginning of the year. We know that the curriculum advisory and support service (CASS) has been reduced and is struggling. We know that teachers in every school are not receiving the support that they should be and that, consequently, the children in those schools are also not receiving the education. That, of course, works into the future. It now seems that, even when accelerated passage is put in place, that same help is going to be delayed further, until April 2015.

Will the Minister clarify whether money will go to the boards in the meantime and in the future so that that is not the case?

There is very little detail in the Bill, which concerns me even further. How will the educational services actually be provided on the ground? When speaking to the Committee, the Minister said that he wanted a body that is accessible to the schools and communities that it serves. If that is the case, will he outline today how that new body will work on the ground so that it is accessible to schools and communities? We do not know the structure and we will not be able to discuss it in the Committee in the detail that we should.

The previous ESA Bill wasted £18 million-plus. We do not know how much this new Bill will cost. Indeed, has it had a good economic viability check? It is claimed that the same Bill has had equality impact screening but if you look at how little is in the Bill and how little we know about it, you see that it really does affect everyone in the community. I feel that it needs proper equality impact screening as it goes along.

My colleague raised the fact of negative resolution on one of the clauses in the Bill. The Minister responded that he could not bring forward primary legislation. That is the very reason that we need the Committee Stage and longer to look at this. We need to know exactly what it can and cannot affect. Certainly, we need to change the fact that it has negative resolution.

I put it to everyone here that we should not accept accelerated passage because there has been no consultation. The Committee needs to know much more about the detail of the Bill and has a duty to the public to scrutinise it. No other options are being shown or considered — we are certainly not even looking at the option of more than one board. There is little detail on the structures and organisations that will work on the ground and we have not looked at the actual effects on the community itself. The Ulster Unionist Party opposes accelerated passage.

Mr Lunn: I apologise to the Minister for not being here for most of his statement. I was unavoidably detained.

Those of us who have been with this process since 2007 effectively, which includes the Minister himself and, to a certain extent, the current Committee Chair, would almost accept anything at this stage. We have been through an ESA Bill that was split in two, followed by a further ESA Bill. What we are looking at now are the tattered remnants of what was actually a very good Bill, the second ESA Bill, but it is the best that the Minister can hope to achieve through the House at the present time. Somebody mentioned the eleventh-hour nature of it. Frankly, we do everything at the eleventh hour, do we not? That is the way in which this House works — by deadlines.

We have no problem with accelerated passage. That is what this short debate was meant to be about, although I hear an awful lot of detailed stuff coming in already. What is left of what was a good Bill is so simple. I hear Mr Kinahan saying that we do not know enough detail of the Bill. Well, read it. It is only really a couple of pages. The rest of it is all of the tidying-up stuff, repeals and amendments of previous legislation.

Mr Kinahan: Will the Member give way?

Mr Lunn: Yes, certainly. Go on.

Mr Kinahan: I wonder whether the Member would clarify how, if there is so little detail in it — and I have read it from top to bottom — he can feel happy with accelerated passage when we do not actually know what is coming with it?

Mr Lunn: I do not know, frankly, what the Member means about what is coming with it. We can have that discussion at the next Stage. There is plenty of time, certainly this afternoon, for a lot more detail.

In the meantime, as somebody has already said, the education boards are, in the Chairperson's words, limping along. That is being kind to them — they are almost broken. We badly need a new arrangement. There are certainly questions to be asked about it. Will it save £180 million in the next 10 years as was actually promised for ESA? That was an ESA figure: it does not necessarily apply to this. As regards whether there is one board or three, I have an awful feeling that if the Minister had proposed three boards, the Ulster Unionists would now propose one. We just cannot keep on doing business like this.

Mr Kinahan: Cynical.

Mr Lunn: I know that I am being cynical, Mr Kinahan, but that is the way that it sounds. There always seems to be opposition to everything. I can find no sensible reason to oppose accelerated passage for the Bill. As I said, those of us who have been with it for seven years have to welcome it. It is a stopgap arrangement. A lot more will come down the track eventually, but I will have more to say about that in the next debate.

Mr Agnew: At the outset, I declare an interest as a director of the Northern Ireland Council for Integrated Education, but I am speaking as a Green Party Member.

The failure to agree the ESA Bill was very much a failure of the Executive. Now the Assembly is being asked to consent to that failure by granting accelerated passage for this Bill, and I cannot support that. It is important that we get the Bill right rather than getting it quickly. It is important that Members have time to consider potential amendments, what has been lost from the ESA Bill and what further could perhaps be salvaged.

I understand that there is concern about the footing of the education and library boards. Whilst I am as keen as anyone else in the House for a long-term solution, whatever it might look like, to give certainty to the education sector, a rushed Bill will only ever be a stopgap and will not provide that certainty. I am not sure whether the Bill, or granting it accelerated passage, would serve the purpose that it purports to serve.

It very much appears that the slimmed-down Bill is what can be and has been agreed between the DUP and Sinn Féin. However, it is not what has been agreed in negotiation with the Assembly. It is right that such an important Bill should go through the full processes. The Chair of the Committee referred to it as an eleventh-hour solution. It is too important an issue to be taken forward in this manner, so for that reason, I oppose accelerated passage.

Mr McCallister: I am somewhat surprised that so many Members seem willing to go along with whatever the Executive arm of government demands of us. Are we nothing more than a seldom-used rubber stamp for the Executive? Has the Assembly no aspirations to be something more and be the primary legislative body for Northern Ireland? That is what is at stake here. We should grant accelerated passage only in the most extreme circumstances.

On the one hand, we hear from Mr Lunn, who says that we are so ground down by this that we would accept almost anything at this stage. Effectively, we can write the Executive a blank cheque — a blank cheque to an already bankrupt Executive. That is why the House should oppose accelerated passage. We are told by Mr Lunn that it is a relatively short and simple Bill. If it is short and simple, why on earth would we do it by accelerated passage? The two do not sit together.

I have been critical of other parties that brought forward accelerated passage. I have been critical of the UUP bringing the Road Races (Amendment) Bill by accelerated passage. I have been critical of the DUP bringing Bills by accelerated passage when it was clearly unnecessary to do so. I refer Members to the Planning Bill, which Mr Kinahan will have experience of. The Planning Bill was introduced to the House on 6 December 2010. I think that Edwin Poots was the then Minister of the Environment. He did not ask for accelerated passage. That Bill had 248 clauses, seven schedules and 205 pages, and it went to Final Stage before the Assembly was dissolved on 23 March, just over three months later. The Committee worked at that Bill. The Committee held extra meetings to get the Bill through. The Committee worked and engaged with the Department to pass the Bill. I believe that we had a better Bill at the end of it.

So, why are the Minister, the Committee and so many Members ganging up and saying that it is right to do this? Why not let the Bill go through the normal processes? This is a failure because we could not agree on the ESA. I refer Members to OFMDFM's statement in July 2012. It stated that discussions had been successfully concluded and that the Bill would be brought to the next meeting of the Executive in order to commence its passage in the Assembly. It is over two years since those discussions were, supposedly, successfully concluded.

I sat on the Education Committee for over a year with the current Minister and other Members here. Ms Ruane brought the first ESA Bill to Committee, then we had a second one and now we have a carve-up deal cobbled together at the last minute to get us over the line. It has been quite obvious for months, and even years, that you were not going to get your way on the ESA Bill. The Assembly, led by many colleagues in here, was broadly saying no. Then you cobbled together this Bill and are proceeding to bypass the legitimacy of the Assembly in having a scrutinising role. I think that it is absolutely disgraceful. We should not use accelerated passage unless we are absolutely convinced that there are no options and that we need emergency legislation.

The Minister has more than adequate time, and I am quite sure that the Chair of the Committee would be willing to have extra meetings, with the time limit set for the start of April to coincide with the new councils, to work hard on that scrutiny. The Minister would have a better Bill at the end of it. So, why the Assembly has to pick up the mistakes and failures of our Executive is beyond me. Why so many Members have willingly coalesced on that, I have no idea. At times, the Assembly should stand up in robust opposition to the Executive and say, "We are not going to be treated like that. We are not going to be used as a rubber stamp when you mess up and cannot get your act together. If you cannot get your legislation into this Building in time, you pick up the problems." The Assembly should be very strong.

I have to say that I am surprised that so many parties in the Assembly, particularly some of the smaller ones that sometimes count themselves as having a more oppositional role, are going along with this. They should reflect and think about how and why we are granting this procedure. The Bill has some controversy in it. It is time that the Assembly stopped writing blank cheques for the bankrupt Executive and started to stand up to them and robustly defend representative democracy.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): The Business Committee has arranged to meet immediately after the lunchtime suspension. I propose, therefore, by leave of the Assembly, to suspend the sitting until 2.00 pm. The first item of business when we return will be Question Time.

Oral Answers to Questions

Finance and Personnel

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Questions 10 and 12 have been withdrawn. We will start with listed questions.

Budget Pressures

1. Mr Swann asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel to outline the extent of the inescapable budgetary pressures facing the Executive. (AQO 6792/11-15)

Finance: Executive Discussions

14. Mr McCarthy asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel for his assessment of the conclusions reached as part of the recent Executive discussions over financial issues. (AQO 6805/11-15)

Mr Hamilton (The Minister of Finance and Personnel): With your permission Mr Deputy Speaker, I would like to answer questions 1 and 14 together, as they relate to the same issue of budgetary pressures and possible consequences of continued deadlock in the Executive.

As Members will be aware, the Executive agreed the October monitoring resource allocations on 9 October. I updated the Assembly on the outcome of this in my statement yesterday. The June monitoring round agreed resource departmental expenditure limit (DEL) reductions of £77.9 million, equating to 2.1%. An additional 2.3% reduction was required to meet the £87 million cost of not implementing welfare reform. This has now been agreed.

Through negotiations with Her Majesty's Treasury, I have secured access to the reserve in 2014-15 of up to £100 million. This has allowed the Executive to make allocations of £125 million to mitigate the worst impact of these reductions. However, this is far from an ideal solution. It is most unfortunate that the intransigence of some in the Executive has enforced the need to call upon the £100 million facility. This will make the 2015-16 Budget considerably more difficult because, in addition to having to cover £114 million of welfare reform savings lost to Treasury, we will now be faced with repaying an additional £100 million.

Mr Swann: I thank the Minister for his answer. Minister, can you clarify what the £7.6 million allocated to the Public Prosecution Service (PPS) will be used for, with particular reference to equal pay?

Mr Hamilton: That question would probably have been better put to me yesterday. I will do my best, and, if I leave anything out, I will ensure that the Member is written to and informed fully. A pressure had developed. There were two elements that fed into the pressure of over £7million in the PPS. One was to do with casework pressures, but the larger amount was to do with the resolution of a pay settlement in a case that had been settled in the courts earlier this year or late last year. So, it became a legal and contractual requirement and therefore inescapable, as indeed were many of the other pressures that were addressed in the £125 million allocation. They were not necessarily things that we wanted to do or that fitted in with the Executive's strategy of delivering Programme for Government targets. They were things that, legally, we had to do, in this case as the result of a court judgement.

Mr McCarthy: Would the Minister agree that, in the long term, tackling the issue of a divided society will be as important as reaching a sustainable position on welfare reform?

Mr Hamilton: I do not want to be dismissive of the idea, notion or aspiration of ending a divided society and having a more united, and therefore more prosperous, society in Northern Ireland. I think that that is an aim that all of us share. We all have to continue to ensure that we are making every effort that we can to meet that goal. I suppose that it depends on how the Member would define "long term". He is older than me, so long term might be longer for him than it is for me.

The immediate problem that we have is around our Budget. That is exacerbated and not helped at all by what we are having to repay. I know that the Member agrees with me in this regard. The penalties that we are having to pay — £87 million this year and £114 million next year — are creating a real present and pressing problem. That is what we tried to deal with in the October monitoring round. Whilst I think that it is noble and correct to aim to end the divisions in our society, it is not as immediate and pressing as the issue of welfare reform in the context of this year's Budget. However, that does not mean that Members, including myself, or anybody else should be dismissive of trying to break down barriers that are costing government in Northern Ireland money on an ongoing basis.

Mr McKay: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. The inescapables to which the Minister referred today and yesterday are no doubt partly a result of the fact that the cuts got deeper and deeper the closer you got to the end of this budgetary period.

In his correspondence and communication with the Treasury, how has he pushed the Treasury to change its policy direction? It is clear that the Tories are intent on further cutting our Budget and ensuring that the financial crisis that we face continues, as it looks set to do.

Mr Hamilton: The Member is right to identify that our Budget is facing a number of pressures. I have not denied that, do not deny it and will not deny it. I have spoken at length in the House about the pressure that not progressing with welfare reform is having. No one in the House, regardless of their position on the policy of welfare reform, can deny that the pressure is increasing. Last year, it was £13 million; this year, it is £87 million; and, next year, it will be £114 million. That pressure will grow and grow. According to work that DSD has carried out, it is anticipated that in excess of £300 million will come out of our Budget in 2018-19, if we have not progressed with welfare reform legislation by that stage.

There are other pressures. The Member will be aware of pressures in respect of public sector pensions. Departments are having pressures as well, although he is right to point out that many of the inescapable pressures that we have addressed became inescapable because of the stage in the financial year at which we were taking decisions to trim other budgets to help to pay for them.

Yes, they were deemed to be inescapable, but the degree to which they became inescapable was exacerbated by our lack of taking a sensible decision, back in June — a decision to take the full 4·4% out at that time, which I recommended but which the Executive did not endorse. The Member is right: there are other pressures. They include the fact that our resource budget has remained fairly flat. It has risen, but, in real terms, it is due to go down by 1·6% next year. That presents a challenge on top of all those other challenges that we face.

I am sure that my party's Members of Parliament will ensure that Northern Ireland's voice is heard in Parliament and that, where there are unnecessary, unfair reductions to our Budget, the Government in Westminster will hear, loudly and clearly, that they are not acceptable. I wish that others would perhaps join us in making that call in the appropriate place.

Mr I McCrea: Can the Minister outline the potential implications if the Executive fail to agree a Budget for 2015-16?

Mr Hamilton: The Member is trying to lure me into a scenario that I do not want to contemplate, which is not having a Budget in place for next year. There are two ramifications, one of which is in the short term. The letter from the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the First Minister was shared with Members yesterday, and it was very clear. There is a condition within it that we have to agree a credible plan and a balanced Budget by the end of this month if we wish to access the £100 million facility made available through the national reserve. I think that I have made clear over the last number of days — certainly, yesterday — how necessary that £100 million is to ensuring that we live within our means this year. So, in the first instance, we need to agree a Budget to ensure that we can access that money, and all those hellish, nightmarish scenarios around cuts to public services can be avoided.

In the longer term, I suppose, there is a concern that the deadlock will continue, primarily because of a lack of agreement on welfare reform and the ramifications that that will have for next year's Budget, in penalties and other costs, and we are unable to agree a total Budget. I remain optimistic that we can get a draft Budget out the door, and I will be making every effort in the coming days and weeks to ensure that we meet the deadline of having it agreed by the end of October. Of course, section 59 of the 1998 Act empowers the permanent secretary of my Department to allocate up to 95% of the previous year's Budget to the next year's Budget, but I think that everybody in the House will agree that we do not want to get into a situation in which civil servants are making that sort of decision. We should have the ability and courage to move forward with what will be a very difficult Budget and to take necessary decisions in the coming days and weeks to ensure that we have a balanced budget and a credible plan to move forward on that basis.

Mr D Bradley: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Will the Minister clarify whether he intends to address the residual equal pay issues within the Northern Ireland Civil Service and will that include civil servants who, previously, were with the Northern Ireland Office?

Mr Hamilton: When I hear "equal pay", I know and the Member will be aware that there are at least two issues. One is for those who are leavers and retirees, and the Member will be aware that, over the last number of months, the Department has settled that case with the union and is actively trying to ensure that those who are entitled gain access to that settlement. That was, of course, changed by the number of years one was out of service, and I think it was the Abdulla case in Birmingham City Council that changed the legal position in respect of that. I cannot remember the precise figure, but my understanding is that the vast majority of cases have been settled and that there is a residue of a number of cases that have not been settled. We will continue to work over the next while to try to make contact with those who are entitled to ensure that they get what they are entitled to.

The other issue that has been raised with me several times in this House is in respect of former employees of the NIO and the police. I think that the House knows my position on this. I want to deal with that issue. I always repeat, at the risk of sounding like a stuck record on this matter, that there is no legal entitlement for those people to have access to the previous equal pay settlement. Notwithstanding that, I think that there is a moral case. I have put a solution to the Executive that I think deals with the matter to address that moral case that I believe is there. Unfortunately, that has not found favour on all sides of the Executive. To be fair, most Ministers, including the Member's party colleague and, indeed, other Ministers, including party colleagues of mine, have contacted me and said that they are content with the solution that I have put forward. Unfortunately, the problem and the blockage on this matter rest with Sinn Féin, which wants a solution that, I believe, does not take cognisance of the fact that there is no legal entitlement. If we were to follow through with that solution, it would be unaffordable to the Executive. Surprise, surprise —

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): The Minister's two minutes are up.

Mr Hamilton: — Sinn Féin expects us to go off to London and ask for them to give us the money to pay for it.

Revenue-raising Proposals

2. Mr Boylan asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel to outline his Department's proposals for raising revenue under the current local fiscal arrangements (AQO 6793/11-15)

Mr Hamilton: In Budget 2011-15, the Executive agreed that the levels of domestic and non-domestic regional rates would be increased in line with inflation. For next year's budget, my Department is working on the assumption that this policy will continue and that the level of the regional rate for the 2015-16 year will increase by the rate of inflation.

Mr Boylan: Minister, in order to increase our local resources and maintain our front line provisions, can you outline any proposals for targeting local levies that will assist our budgets at this time?

Mr Hamilton: I might be the only person in the House, but I think that I know what the Member is getting at. There seems to be some confusion in different quarters. I suspect that he is talking about the Executive taking on more tax-varying powers that might assist us in some way or another. Again, I think that I have been fairly consistent in coming to the House and saying that I do not have a reflexive, knee-jerk response to it where I think that all tax-varying powers should be ruled out. It is quite the opposite. I think that I have set down very clearly the tests that I think need to be passed on further tax devolution to the Assembly. One is that it needs to be affordable; secondly, it needs to have a very clear social and/or economic benefit to Northern Ireland. On that basis, we have supported and have gained the devolution of air passenger duty for long haul flights in the past because it was affordable and it secured our only direct flight into North America. We continue to pursue, and I remain optimistic that we will get, the power to devolve corporation tax to Northern Ireland. Whilst that is more expensive than air passenger duty for long haul flights, it is, I think, affordable, and it does produce the very clear long-term benefits of increased jobs, and jobs that pay well in excess of the average wage in Northern Ireland.

My Department has undertaken a piece of work on other powers that could be devolved to Northern Ireland, consistent with the commitment made in the economic pact that was agreed with the Prime Minister in June 2013. I hope to have that piece of work and the conclusions contained therein with Executive colleagues in the next number of weeks. Our initial reading of that is that, in having very clearly defined social and economic benefits for Northern Ireland, there are no other or not many taxes available to us or ones that we might take that would have the same transformative effect that corporation tax would have or which would pass that affordability test.

2.15 pm

Mrs Cameron: Does the Minister have any plans to reduce or remove anything from the rate scheme for next year?

Mr Hamilton: The Member and, I am sure, the House will be aware that the small business rate relief scheme, which was introduced a number of years ago and which has been extended twice since, has a shelf life whereby it ends at the end of this financial year. I have initiated and am close to the conclusion of a review that is being carried out by the Northern Ireland Centre for Economic Policy (NICEP) into the merits of the scheme and how it has functioned, and, of course, that will then inform any decision that I might want to make, in the context of next year's Budget, as to whether we extend that scheme any further. That is the only one that there is no doubt or a question mark over. I think that I made it pretty clear that I think that there is merit in some type of scheme moving forward, because, when the scheme was introduced, we were in the middle of the recession, and whilst we can confidently say that we are in recovery now, certain sectors, particularly retail, continue to suffer in particular parts of Northern Ireland. So, there is probably a need, I believe, for some sort of scheme to continue. The complexion and the quantum of that will be something that the work of NICEP will help to inform. Above and beyond that, none of the other rate reliefs will be taken off the table or done away with in the next financial year.

Mr McGlone: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Mo bhúiochas leis an Aire as na freagraí cuimsitheacha. I thank the Minister for his comprehensive answers. Could he provide us with some detail as to what assets he or his Department have identified that could be used to realise revenue?

Mr Hamilton: I do not have a list of all the assets. I am sure that, if I had that list and started to read it out to the Member, I would exceed my two minutes. I would probably take the entirety of the remainder of Question Time, including Health questions.

There is an active asset management strategy in place that has been agreed by the Executive, and it is taken forward primarily by properties division in my Department and in conjunction with OFMDFM. That is identifying, on an ongoing basis, those assets that are no longer required by the public sector and looking at the best option for realising and accruing better benefits for the public sector, and that could involve selling those assets and getting a capital receipt. Sometimes it involves getting planning permission for an asset or a site so that you increase the value of it. It also involves decanting, and my Department has been very active in moving out of some leased estate that we have and going back into some of our own estate or moving into new offices that are better suited to modern work practices. That is saving a considerable amount of money, year on year, but that needs to be continually assessed and looked at on an ongoing basis because opportunities will present themselves.

The Executive have actively pursued realising benefits from assets sales over this Budget period, and the Member will recall that, at the start of this Budget period, it was our capital budget that was under real pressure and we needed to sell assets to get money to invest in infrastructure. That has happened and will continue to happen where and when it is appropriate.

Welfare Reform: Economic Impact

3. Mr Milne asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel who will draw up the terms of reference for the independent research on the economic impact of welfare reform. (AQO 6794/11-15)

5. Mr Girvan asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel whether the impact of welfare reform on Northern Ireland study, commissioned by the Northern Ireland Council for Voluntary Action (NICVA), is an accurate reflection of the current financial and economic pressures facing Northern Ireland. (AQO 6796/11-15)

Mr Hamilton: Mr Deputy Speaker, with your permission, I would like to answer questions 3 and 5 together.

The issue with the report on the impact of welfare reform on Northern Ireland, commissioned by NICVA, is not so much with the report itself but rather with how the information has been interpreted by some parties. Indeed, NICVA recently stated that some £500 million of the much quoted £750 million that will be taken out of Northern Ireland as a result of welfare reform relates to changes that have already taken place or which are outside the control of the Northern Ireland Executive. In addition, the NICVA report focuses only on one side of the equation and takes no account of the potential impact of welfare reform on local labour markets or of the adverse impact of reductions in departmental budgets as a result of non-implementation. In order to provide some much needed clarity on the impact of welfare reform, I have commissioned an independent review, the terms of reference for which have been drawn up by my officials and shared with the Department for Social Development.

Mr Milne: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Mo bhuíochas leis an Aire go dtí seo. I thank the Minister for his answer. Has there been any cross-party agreement on the terms of reference for the research?

Mr Hamilton: As I pointed out in my initial response, the terms of reference have been drafted by my Department and shared with the Department for Social Development. Whilst I have not got explicit or particular cross-party support for the terms of reference, they touch on a range of subjects that I am sure everyone agrees need to be looked at. They include the policy implications for the Northern Ireland Executive of not maintaining welfare parity; an assessment of the modelling assumptions that currently exist for welfare reform; an assessment of the regional economic impact that the proposed national welfare agenda may have, which includes opportunity costs of forgone public expenditure due to penalties; and the additional consequences that might flow from continuing to deviate from national welfare reform policy, including the implications for IT systems and the delivery of social security payments. Those are not all the things that it will look at, but I am sure that there would not be much dissent from any quarter of the House on whether we should look at those things and get an independent view.

I was before the Finance and Personnel Committee some weeks ago and was pressed by three members of the Member's party to do work like that. I shared with them the fact that it was already my intention to do work like that, because, whilst the Executive had spoken about doing some work, they had not been able to agree to take it forward, so I thought that, to help to inform the situation, I should do it. I took the Committee's comments as an endorsement of that work. We need an independent review that helps to inform the situation better, because there are a lot of figures floating about out there, not least the many figures being thrown out erroneously by members of his party. The figures that I know that are really starting to bite relate to the fact that, every week that passes, £1.6 million of public expenditure that could help people in Northern Ireland is not helping them, because we are paying welfare reform penalties this year. With every month that passes, £7.2 million is lost to the Executive.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): The Minister's two minutes are up.

Mr Hamilton: We cannot tolerate that, and it needs to be addressed as quickly as possible.

Mr Girvan: The Minister mentioned the figure of £750 million that was banded about in the NICVA report. Why is that figure much lower now?

Mr Hamilton: I think that NICVA is being unfairly tarnished by that. Work was carried out on NICVA's behalf by people at Sheffield Hallam University. That figure is out there and has been cited by many, so it has become somewhat authoritative. From listening to contributions on the radio, particularly that of Seamus McAleavey from NICVA, it has been very clear, certainly in the last fortnight, that some have taken the full figure of £750 million and thrown it out there as being the gospel truth on what is being lost, when, by NICVA's own admission, £500 million of that has already gone from Northern Ireland's budget. There are multiple reasons for that, and they are very clear. Some have been passed because of changes that took place at Westminster that we have no control over, and some have taken place because of decisions in this House.

I see that a former Minister for Social Development is in the House. Some of the reductions in our overall welfare expenditure are the result of legislation that he passed, or perhaps it was his predecessor who started that legislation. I was the Chair of the Committee during that entire period, but it went through when Mr Attwood was Minister. Issues such as the 1% uplifting of benefits, which was lower than had previously been the case, were voted through the Assembly. In many cases and in those cases in particular, the House voted for them. Some of the parties that oppose the passage of the current welfare reform legislation voted through or certainly did nothing to stop those impacts on welfare in Northern Ireland. Therefore, in some respects, with regard to the figure of £500 million out of £750 million — I am not saying that I accept all the figures — there is accountability on the other side of the House for those reductions.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): The Minister's two minutes are up.

Mrs D Kelly: Minister, I note your acknowledgement that the figure of £750 million is over the four-year period and is not actually wrong, but will the terms of reference for this work include the proposals going through Westminster for changes in childcare and the cap on the cost of welfare coming to devolved Administrations? In other words, will it reference not just current but future cuts?

Mr Hamilton: If we knew what the future cuts will be and had that sort of precise information about the future, perhaps we would do the lottery at the weekend. I assume that the Member is referring to comments made by the Chancellor in the past few weeks. They have to be seen in the context of being pre-election commitments or statements. It will be interesting to see whether they survive after the next election, no matter who is in power. Those things are interesting and show that the future direction of policy on welfare at a macro-UK level will continue to be restraint. That is why we have to get our act together on welfare here in Northern Ireland.

We have already seen swathes of welfare reform legislation come through, many of which are having a difficult impact on people in Northern Ireland. Some came through in the last Assembly mandate, when the Member's party was in charge of the Department for Social Development. What I want to see from this work is that the current problem that we face, which is causing budgetary difficulties and political difficulties as a consequence of the budgetary problems, is independently reviewed and assessed. There are a lot of figures out there, and people are saying this and that. We need an authoritative independent review that hollows out the particular set of circumstances that we now face. That is the spirit in which the work has been commissioned. It will be carried out independently, and I hope that the figures and conclusions that come from it will be accepted on all sides of the House, because that is the spirit in which they are being offered. It is a genuine attempt to carve a way through the morass of figures because people are clearly somewhat confused about what the truth is.

Mrs Cochrane: It is disappointing that the former Social Development Minister was not so proactive and did not instigate that type of research, meaning that the current Finance Minister has had to step in and do his job for him. How will the Minister avoid the new research becoming an excuse for Sinn Féin and the SDLP further to defer a decision?

Mr Hamilton: The Member is somewhat unfair in her criticism of the previous Social Development Minister, who did attempt to get work like this done. In fact, well before the summer, at a much higher level, the First Minister initially suggested that the Executive carry out work like this to do exactly what I said to Mrs Kelly, which is to get a genuine hollowing out of all the problems that we face with the current welfare legislation, the economic and social impacts and the cost to the Northern Ireland Executive of not progressing it. Unfortunately, there was a lack of agreement from Sinn Féin to move forward on that. I thought that there was still considerable merit in doing that work, and that is why I have taken it on. It will be copied to Executive colleagues to help to inform their overall deliberations.

As to the Member's question about this being a cause of further delay, I can assuage her concerns and calm her nerves. This will be a short, sharp piece of work carried out on our behalf. We have gone through a procurement process, and the people are in place and doing the work. I expect that it will take no more than four weeks and that I will have the report in front of me by the middle of November at the latest. It will not run and run so that parties that may wish to procrastinate further can say that they will wait for the outcome; they will have it in their hands within a number of weeks.

Rates: Convergence

4. Mr Kinahan asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel whether the funds intended for the convergence of district rates will be extended beyond a two-year period. (AQO 6795/11-15)

Mr Hamilton: I am considering the consultation outcomes before finalising the arrangements for next year's scheme. Our analysis to date suggests that the funding allocated by the Executive will deliver a scheme that will help everybody affected for a longer period than two years.

I intend to announce the full details of the scheme in the next few weeks, once my Department has completed the overall costings to ensure that the scheme stays within the budget set by the Executive of £30 million for rates revenue forgone. That work had to wait until the outcome of the non-domestic revaluation was known and will be completed shortly.

2.30 pm

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Unfortunately, we will not have time for a supplementary question, because that ends the period for listed questions. We will now move on to topical questions. Topical question 1 has been withdrawn.

Empty Premises Relief: North Down

T2. Mr Dunne asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel how many businesses, particularly in North Down, have benefited from the empty premises rate relief scheme, given that he will no doubt be aware of the burden of business rates on business owners in Northern Ireland. (AQT 1602/11-15)

Mr Hamilton: The Member is right. No matter what town I go to in Northern Ireland, traders and business owners always raise issues about rates.

To answer the Member's specific question, I am very pleased to be able to report that a total of 331 properties across Northern Ireland have benefited since empty premises relief was introduced in April 2012. That means that £1.367 million of rates relief has been allocated to those properties over that period.

We do not have figures by constituency, but 14 properties have benefited in the North Down Borough Council area. That area covers most of the North Down constituency — there is just a little bit of Ards where I live that is not in there, but we will all be one big happy family in a number of months anyway. Therefore, 14 businesses have opened since the inception of the scheme and as a result of my predecessor's initiative.

Mr Dunne: I thank the Minister for his detailed answer. Will he assure us that he will continue with the scheme?

Mr Hamilton: Some 331 businesses across Northern Ireland have opened as a result of the scheme. It has not just been small businesses. There was maybe a view at the start that the scheme would very much focus on retail, but it has not just been retail businesses, such as corner shops or other small retail units, that have benefited. Cafes, restaurants and a range of different businesses have benefited. One of the biggest beneficiaries was the Marine Hotel in Ballycastle —

Mr Frew: Hear, hear.

Mr Hamilton: — which reopened last year using that scheme. I hear a welcome for that from the Back Benches. As Mr Frew will testify, that has breathed a bit of life back into that part of Ballycastle and has helped to rejuvenate the tourism product in that beautiful part of Northern Ireland.

I was able to visit a couple of the recipients of empty premises relief in my own constituency last week. Whilst the policy was about filling vacant spaces in high streets and town centres across Northern Ireland, the two businesses that I visited have, between them, taken on a total of five employees. So, those are new businesses that are filling units that were otherwise vacant, but they are also employing people in businesses and new businesses across Northern Ireland.

It is a policy that is working. If we have a situation in which retail is still suffering and there are still vacant units in our town centres and high streets across Northern Ireland, I will want to seriously look at extending that scheme beyond its life, as it is due to run out at the end of this financial year.

Financial Transactions Capital: Projects

T3. Mr Humphrey asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel what type of projects are being funded using financial transactions capital this financial year. (AQT 1603/11-15)

Mr Hamilton: The Executive have allocated over £38 million of their allocation for financial transactions capital this year. We have a total of between the high 60 millions of pounds and £70 million, given the roll-forward of cash from last year that we were able to take into this year. So, we had around £70 million of financial transactions capital to spend in this year, and we have allocated £38 million of that.

The projects that are receiving that capital are the agrifood loan scheme, the Northern Ireland Science Park, GP and dental practices for some modernisation work that they are carrying out, a range of housing schemes within the Department for Social Development and, of course, the University of Ulster's relocation project to the Member's constituency of North Belfast. So, a range of projects across different Departments are soaking up that £38 million so far.

Mr Humphrey: I thank the Minister for his answer, and, obviously, I welcome the investment in north Belfast. Is the Minister concerned that some of the FTC available will not be spent?

Mr Hamilton: I am concerned to an extent that, if we have roughly £70 million of FTC this year — we are allowed to carry forward either 5% or 10%, which works out at roughly £5 million — we should be able to underspend this year, not lose it in subsequent years, and roll it into the next financial year. Whatever way you cut it, there is still a sizeable amount of financial transactions capital that is unallocated, and we are nearly halfway through the financial year. Officials in my Department are actively working with officials in other Departments to get them to come up with schemes that could use that money in-year. That work is proving to have mixed results. Some Departments are very active in coming forward with schemes; others have yet to come forward with any.

I continue, frequently, to encourage Ministers to open their mind to the possibilities that FTC creates for bringing forward capital projects that might otherwise not be funded from within their budget. I understand that it is different, it is new and it requires Departments to work proactively with the private sector, which is not necessarily what they are used to doing in the delivery of a project. However, this is the way that an increasing chunk of our capital budget is coming. I think that it will be an increasingly active feature of capital budgets moving forward. As that is the case and as we are looking at FTC comprising around 10% of our overall capital budget next year, Departments will have to think up new ways in which that money can be spent. As I say, we are working on a few projects that could take up the remaining allocations from this year, and I hope that we might be able to report some progress in the remaining aspects of the October monitoring round, including capital allocations, which I will bring to the House in the next number of weeks.

Rates Convergence

T4. Mr Rogers asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel whether the £30 million that has been set aside for rates convergence is ring-fenced or part of the ongoing budgetary discussions. (AQT 1604/11-15)

Mr Hamilton: The £30 million has been set aside for rates convergence. I did not get a chance in response to Mr Kinahan, who was cut off in his prime earlier, to knock down some of the myths and erroneous information that were put out by certain quarters of the media last week about the scheme. It was presented, particularly by the BBC, as something that had come out of the blue, as though we did not know that there were going to be issues in the converging of one council with another or, in some cases, the convergence of three councils or, in one instance, of four councils. It was identified a long time ago by the Executive. Mr Rogers's colleague to his right-hand side, from his time as Minister of the Environment, will recall that it was several years ago — I think that it was 2012 — that the Executive first agreed that they would set aside £30 million for convergence, recognising that there would be an impact from convergence on some members of the public and ratepayers. It is money that has been set aside, and it is, in that sense, ring-fenced and will not be affected by any of the issues around the Budget that we continue to negotiate.

Mr Rogers: I thank the Minister for his answer, and, as he said, this was agreed a number of years ago. In the budgetary discussions that are about to take place, is any consideration being given to the possibility that more money might be needed to smooth the transition?

Mr Hamilton: It has not, although there is a provision in the Local Government Act for a review of the scheme, I think, midway through. In my view, that is more about the functionality of the scheme and whether it is working properly and smoothly and having the effect that we want it to have in easing the convergence of one level of rates with another. Obviously, we will have to consider the totality of issues. Funding will come up in that review, but we will have to consider it in the context that it will be midway through a scheme. The scheme is likely to last three or four years; if we go two years forward, it will be in the middle of a phase in our budgeting where it will be incredibly tight and the availability of more cash for a scheme like that — indeed, for any type of scheme — will be fairly limited.

Treasury Bailout

T5. Mrs McKeivitt asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel what the process will be for the £100 million bailout referred to in the letter from the Treasury to OFMDFM, given that there is a condition in it that a Budget for 2015-16 must be agreed by the end of October. (AQT 1605/11-15)

Mr Hamilton: I will correct the Member on one point: the letter from the Chancellor was to the First Minister. She is right to point out that there is something that is described as a "condition" in the letter. I do not think the condition that we should agree a draft Budget by the end of this month is a condition; it is something that is consistent. It is a condition in terms of our access to the reserve, but it should not be an onerous condition for the Executive. It is something that we should have done several weeks ago. It is something that I have been pressing for as far back as December last year, when I wrote to Executive colleagues about what I thought would be the ideal Budget process in the lead-up to the next financial year. Unfortunately, that ideal process got overtaken by a lack of movement on issues like welfare reform, which clearly inform next year's Budget. I have been pressing, particularly since the return from the summer break, the need for us to agree not only on a way to deal with the in-year position, which we have done, but on a draft for the 2015-16 Budget so that we can get it out for public consultation and have discussions on agreeing a final Budget towards the end of this year or early next year. That sort of timetable can still apply.

A lot of work has been carried out by my Department to set up the early stages of a draft Budget. There will be headline issues that we will need to discuss, and obviously the repayment of the loan is a factor that will have to be considered in light of discussions on next year's Budget. We would have been working towards the end of this month anyway to get a draft Budget agreed. That allows us to go out to public consultation and will help and inform our deliberations on the final Budget. We hope to have a final Budget in place by the early part of next year. That gives Departments roughly three months to plan for what will be a very difficult Budget next year.

Mrs McKevitt: What effect will that have on the Programme for Government? If it does not work out, what is his plan B?

Mr Hamilton: I do not plan to fail. As long as the effort that my party colleagues in the Executive and I put in is met by goodwill and similar effort on all sides, we can agree a draft Budget by the end of this month. How next year's Budget impacts on the Programme for Government is not particularly a direct responsibility for me apart from the targets in the Programme for Government that are directly related to the Department of Finance and Personnel. However, as I said on the programme board for the Programme for Government, a mid-term review of the Programme for Government has been carried out. That will see some new targets introduced, and it will see existing targets extended in light of the fact that we have extended our term by one year. The Budget clearly has an impact on that, because how testing you are of the targets that are already in the Budget will be impacted on by the resources that a Department has. If you want to stretch a Department on a particular target, you have to be careful and mindful of the fact that it will need money to achieve those targets. If Departments are going to take hits to their budgets, as many will next year, perhaps those targets, as they are elongated, should not be stretched in a way that makes them more difficult to achieve.

County Hall, Ballymena

T6. Mr Swann asked the Minister of Finance and Personnel whether he has any information on the future of County Hall in Ballymena, given that the building has seen the removal of DVLA staff, could potentially see the removal of North Eastern Education and Library Board staff and will lose planning division staff because of RPA. (AQT 1606/11-15)

Mr Hamilton: I do not.

Mr Swann: Would the Minister mind finding out, as it is part of the DFP estate?

Mr Hamilton: I am sorry that I do not have instant recall on every building in the extensive portfolio of properties that my Department is responsible for. However, given that the Member has raised it and that it is an issue for him, for the constituency and for those who work in it, I will correspond with him on the proposed future for County Hall in Ballymena.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): That concludes topical questions.

Health, Social Services and Public Safety

Health: Budget Pressures

1. Mr Beggs asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety to outline the extent of inescapable budgetary pressures facing his Department and its arm's-length bodies. (AQO 6807/11-15)

Mr Wells (The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety): My Department has faced considerable financial challenges in 2014-15, with £160 million of additional resources estimated to be required to balance the books. Some of these have been addressed through the £80 million of additional funding that we received at the Executive on Thursday, but some £70 million remains to be managed.

The situation does not get any better in 2015-16, with additional pressures in the health and social care system of over £300 million on top of those pressures carried forward from 2014-15. Those will be dealt with through non-recurrent measures. The largest inescapable pressure in this is additional pension costs, estimated to be in the region of £90 million. There are also substantial pressures in 2015-16 in relation to demographic changes, National Institute for Health and Care Excellence (NICE) drugs, elective care, mental health and learning disability resettlements.

Mr Beggs: Recently at the Health Committee, officials revealed to me that the trusts were on schedule for a deficit of some £130 million but were recently awarded £60 million by in-year monitoring. Would the Minister accept that when pressures first emerged this time last year and were not addressed by the annual Budget process, difficulties with inefficiencies and growing waiting lists were mounting up? We now also understand that there has been an increase in the number of elective operations cancelled because of staff shortages. Would he accept that there are major problems resulting in the failure to manage the finances of the health service?

Mr Wells: The Member is correct. The current reported deficits for 2014-15 amount to £133.3 million. Clearly, some of the £60 million and £20 million will have to be used to address those issues. Also, the trusts have been told in no uncertain terms that they must balance the books for this year. That will be extremely challenging.

In my previous capacity, I regularly met the chairs or chief executives of the trusts. In the first three years, they were somewhat relaxed about their budgetary situation and said that whilst it was challenging, they were going to meet their targets. This year, they are telling me that it is extremely difficult.

The reason for that is not inefficiencies as such; it is this radical change in demand that we first saw coming into the system in autumn 2013. That has remained the situation: we are getting more and more demand, and yet our bottom line in increasing budget is only 2%. That is the pressure that is beginning to tell. Efficient, well-managed trusts are telling me that they are finding it very hard to manage.

They believe that it is not inefficiencies; it is simply the sheer number of people presenting for treatment.

Mr Sheehan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as ucht a fhreagra. I thank the Minister for his answers so far. Given the pressures that the Minister outlined, can he give a rationale for the increasing costs in the administration of the Health and Social Care boards?

Mr Wells: The Health Committee, when I was Chair, looked at the issue of administrative costs in the health and social care system in Northern Ireland. The figure that they came up with was 4.1% on a £4.65 billion budget. That compares very well with health authorities in the rest of the United Kingdom and, indeed, internationally.

Any organisation that is administering such a large amount of money and can keep its admin costs down to that level is relatively efficient. However, even if we were to take a percentage point out of that, which would mean a radical downscaling in admin staff, that would not come anywhere near what we need to achieve to balance the books for this year.

There are radical changes ongoing in the health service; for instance, the Transforming Your Care initiative, which requires highly qualified administrators to carry out that change. So whilst we are dedicated in this incoming year to looking at admin charges, I do not think that that is a silver bullet.

It is clear that the problem is increased demand: 6% as far as the clinical aspect is concerned. I met the Ambulance Service on Friday in Limavady and their stats show a 5% increase in demand for their services, so there is no great science involved here. The difficulty is that as society ages and we become more infirm, demand rises. The result is a huge pressure on budgets. I do not believe that it is inefficiency; I believe that it is simply the effect of demand.

Mr McKinney: Minister, is it not true that it is not just demand? Given your predecessor's acknowledged waste in the health service, the fact that the health service spent £50 million in the last two years on bank staff, a significant proportion of which did not go to front line services, tens of thousands of cancelled appointments every year, and boards' staff numbers swelled by 25% —

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Question.

Mr McKinney: — and more in the last two years, what action are you taking to audit across the Department, the board and the trusts to ensure that existing budgets are providing best value for money and best outcomes for patients?

Mr Wells: The honourable Member for South Belfast is correct: we must always look for value for money in expending such a huge budget. As my predecessor said just before he left office, "Is every penny being spent absolutely correctly? No, there will always be opportunities for savings". However, remember that he, in his first three years of the CSR, took £490 million in savings out of the system and transferred it to front line care and more important matters in the budget. This year, we have pledged ourselves to £170 million of efficiencies, and that has caused each trust and the board to examine every aspect of expenditure.

There are certainly more efficiencies to be made, but I do not believe that that will solve our difficulty. I am absolutely convinced that it is the sheer numbers coming through the clinics, the GP surgeries and the hospitals that are causing our problem, and the stats show that. It does not take a genius to work out that, if demand continues to rise at GPs — they have confirmed that — at clinics and at hospitals, and there is more out-of-hours demand, we will inevitably require more money to do it. You can achieve only so much in the way of efficiencies before you end up needing more money. "More money" sounds dramatic, but is only something like 2.2% of the entire budget that we are looking for as extra resource and is not a huge amount in the overall scheme of things. It seems a large quantum because you are dealing with Health, which is the biggest-spending Department in the Northern Ireland Executive.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Before calling the next Member, I appeal to Members to please be brief in their questions, because long questions generate long answers, meaning that fewer Members have an opportunity for their questions to be answered.

Cancer Services: Crisis

2. Mr Brady asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety for his assessment of the reported crisis in local cancer services. (AQO 6808/11-15)

Mr Wells: Over the past decade, we have witnessed significant progress in cancer provision in Northern Ireland, which has led to real improvements in outcomes for patients across a wide range of cancers. A recent Europe-wide study shows that Northern Ireland cancer survival rates for lung, breast and prostate are the best in the UK. These improvements have been brought about through investment in cancer services and by a major refocusing on how the service is delivered. We have established cancer targets, instigated extensive reforms and invested in the staff and infrastructure necessary to bring our cancer services up to the standard expected of a modern high-quality health service. We have also been able to provide better access to a wide range of evidence-based treatments, including drugs and radiotherapy.

The improvements have been impressive, but we must not be complacent. They have all been achieved against a background of increasing demand. Since 2009-2010, the number of patients receiving treatment for cancer after an urgent referral has increased by 42.3%, which again emphasises the point that I made earlier. With an ageing population, that figure is likely to increase. It is predicted that, by the age of 75, one in three in Northern Ireland will have cancer.

Mr Brady: I thank the Minister for his answer. On a recent 'Spotlight', consultants raised concerns around cancer research. How does the Minister respond to those concerns? Go raibh maith agat.

Mr Wells: I watched that programme twice on the iPlayer just to make certain that I had picked it up correctly. I also met Mr Allister Murphy, who was one of the main, very articulate spokesmen on behalf of cancer sufferers. I met him in my office here at Stormont. Some very strong points were made, but, as he knows, before that programme was made, we had instigated the individual funding request (IFR) review process. We are looking at the whole individual funding request mechanism to see whether the exceptionality test is fit for purpose in the present situation. That is due to report to me at the end of November, so that is how urgently we take the issue. At the moment, that is the best vehicle to deal with the issue rather than instigating other measures.

I do not know what that report will say, but it may deal with many of the issues that the Member has raised. Remember that we, as a society, have increased our spending on drugs by £30 million, and a large percentage of that has been on cancer drugs. The outcomes indicate that we are doing very well, and, most importantly, for the first time in Northern Ireland's history, more people are now living with cancer for five years after diagnosis than have passed away.

It is moving from being a very life-threatening condition to a long-term one. Of course, there are still many who have had the trauma of receiving very bad news indeed, but the movements are in the right direction. I congratulate the staff at the Belfast City Hospital cancer centre and all the clinicians who have done so much to take us to the forefront on these issues. We can do better, but this is a good news story. When I was young, which was a very long time ago, as you know, Mr Brady, 82% of those who had leukaemia in childhood passed away. Now, 82% are alive after five years. We have made real, major changes. Investment in cancer services over the last 10 years has been considerable, including, of course, the opening of the new cancer centre, in which we invested £70 million.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): The Minister's two minutes are up.

Mr G Robinson: Will the new cancer unit at Altnagelvin hospital relieve some of the cancer service pressures in Northern Ireland?

Mr Wells: Even the Chair of the Health Committee had a small smile on her face when I announced this morning that the radiotherapy unit at Altnagelvin in Londonderry will open on time in 2016. I know that that is of great benefit to Mr Robinson's constituents in Limavady and other areas. Not only is that good news for the north-west, it is good news for Northern Ireland. By 2015, the City Hospital cancer unit will be at full capacity, so Northern Ireland plc will not have sufficient spaces.

It is also good news for the people of the Irish Republic. Cancer sufferers in places such as Donegal, Sligo and Leitrim will no longer be forced to go the whole way to Dublin; they can go to Altnagelvin for their treatment. This is a good example of the Irish Republic and Northern Ireland working together on an issue of common concern. It shows that it is not a one-way process. The Irish Republic is sending patients to us, and we are sending patients to places such as Our Lady's in Crumlin. I welcome this. It is full steam ahead. To be honest, I could not go back to Londonderry having not made that announcement — I think that I would have been hounded out of the city. When I go back this week, I think that it will be a very welcome process. I really look forward to the cutting of the ribbon for this wonderful facility and hope that I am still in office for that.

Mr D Bradley: Go raibh míle maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as an méid a dúirt sé go nuige seo. Cuirim fáilte roimhe chuig an chéad Tráth na gCeisteanna seo aige. I thank the Minister for his answers and welcome him to his first Question Time. In light of what has been said, what is his assessment in economic and health terms of formally establishing a cancer centre of excellence here in Northern Ireland?

Mr Wells: As I said earlier, the outstanding work at our centre in Belfast City Hospital has led to huge changes in survival rates. I am glad that he did not ask me to answer in Irish; the only Irish I have is Bord na Móna. Therefore, I will answer entirely in English.

We have achieved so much already using the resources that we have: we have managed to attract from throughout the world some of the top consultants and experts in the field; Queen's University is a world leader in research and development in the field; and we have some top PhD students doing tremendous work. Where we are is not perfect, but it is a long way from where we were before we opened the centre. We are making progress, but we have to be cognisant of the fact that people get terribly bad news, so it is not all plain sailing. Unfortunately, some people have to face the ultimate reality.

I pay tribute to the four Members who contracted cancer and had the courage to go public and tell of their journey: Jimmy Spratt, Paula Bradley, Oliver McMullan from East Antrim and Seán Rogers. They have come forward, explained their journey and shown that there is hope. I hope that we can give them all a 30-year contract, review their situation at the end of that and that they will be with us for many years.

Mr Elliott: I thank the Minister for that. I also congratulate him and welcome him to the post of Health Minister. Do any statistics show a higher incidence of cancer in some parts of Northern Ireland than in others?

3.00 pm

Mr Wells: I know that MLA McCarthy and several others who represent east Down have indicated their concern about the presence of Sellafeld and clusters of cancer that, they believe, have arisen from that installation. I have to say that the statistics do not really bear that out. The MP for South Down, Ms Ritchie, and her predecessor, the late Eddie McGrady, have also asked parliamentary questions about that. The statistics seem to show that the incidence is no different from that in other parts of the United Kingdom or the rest of Northern Ireland, and that it relates to other factors, such as lifestyle choices, with smoking, and so on, being the main determinant of cancer. We watch those statistics with extreme interest, but, as things stand at the moment, we cannot be definitive in that respect.

Of course, there is the underlying geology of places such as south Down, where radon gas is a problem, but that is well known. We do not yet know about man-made influences, but the truth is that the quick hit — the low-hanging fruit — in Northern Ireland to stop cancer in many cases is to stop smoking. We lose about 800 people a year to lung cancer in Northern Ireland. Some 85% to 90% of those are people who were smokers, and many of the rest were exposed to passive smoking. That is how we save lives, and that could be done at minimal expense.

I had a friend in Downpatrick who recently died from lung cancer. I saw what that lady went through in the last six months of her life. She admitted that her heavy smoking had caused that terrible illness. We need to concentrate on that rather than on studies that, frankly, do not show a positive or negative correlation either way.

Ulster Hospital: Pressures

3. Mr Cree asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety for his assessment of the pressures at the Ulster Hospital. (AQO 6809/11-15)

Mr Wells: Since 2011, the Ulster Hospital has seen an increase in emergency department attendances and emergency admissions, again confirming my earlier point. The South Eastern Trust has advised that admission rates in the current year to date represent a 2.7% increase on the same period in 2013-14. There has been an improvement in the trust's performance against the 12-hour emergency department target for 2013-14, with 1,092 patients waiting longer than 12 hours, which is almost half the equivalent number for 2012-13. Performance against the four-hour target fell slightly to 70.5%, compared with 73.1% in 2012-13.

It is unacceptable to me that anyone should have to wait unduly at A&E. Whilst 12-hour waits have not yet been eliminated, there is evidence that progress is being made. The number of 12-hour waits has reduced significantly, with only 46 people waiting longer than 12 hours in the first four months of the current year, 2014-15. The percentage seen within four hours has also improved, with an average of 76% in the first four months of 2014-15. I am looking to the Health and Social Care Board, working with the trust, to ensure that progress in delivery against those agreed standards continues. I congratulate and thank the staff of the Ulster Hospital for tackling the issue and making solid progress.

Mr Cree: I thank the Minister for that information. It is very helpful. Minister, can you tell us approximately how many serious adverse incidents (SAIs), as they are referred to, there have been in the Ulster Hospital over the last number of years? Can you give us a commitment that, when you get questions for written answer on the matter, we will get a prompt reply, rather than the Department stalling and thinking up reasons to prevent it answering those questions quickly?

Mr Wells: I am aware of concerns expressed by the Member and others representing Strangford and North Down that SAIs are collected at trust level and not by individual hospitals. There is a question for written answer before me at the moment, and I have turned that around immediately. It has ruined several Saturday nights for me having to answer those questions from the Member and many others. I understand where the problem arises, but the difficulty is that, if there are fewer than five serious adverse incidents, you run the risk of revealing the identity and personal circumstances of the individuals concerned.

I must say that I thought the Member raises a valid point. I am going to go back to the officials, because doing it for the South Eastern Trust would indicate that it could be in Downe Hospital, Lagan Valley Hospital or the Ulster Hospital, and that is not the level of information that he expects. That seems to be why he is not getting the specific information that he requires. I am going to have a look at that, because I think that he has made a valid point.

Mr Dunne: I thank our new Minister for his very intensive answers today. Can he give us an update on the ongoing capital scheme at the Ulster Hospital, which will, I understand, include a new A&E unit?

Mr Wells: I know that the honourable Member for North Down lobbied my predecessor very heavily on that particular issue. He is very much a defender of the Ulster Hospital. I have no doubt that will continue.

Work on the first phase of the latest redevelopment programme is ongoing and will provide a new £115 million generic ward block at the Ulster Hospital. That new ward block is due to be completed in late 2016 and open to patients in early 2017. We will make certain he gets an invite to that opening. It will provide 288 beds, comprising 12 inpatient generic wards, surgical and medical, each with 24 en-suite bedrooms. There will also be day surgery, endoscopy, and four day surgery and three day endoscopy theatres, pharmacy and support services.

The second phase of the redevelopment programme will see the construction of a new £108 million acute services block. Enabling works started in August 2014, with construction due to start on site in autumn 2015 and scheduled to be open to patients in early 2018. The new acute services block will provide 150 beds, including acute observation assessment beds, an acute assessment unit, acute wards, an emergency department, imaging, new emergency parking, and kitchen, dining and support services.

I hope, Mr Dunne, that indicates a huge commitment by the Department to the people of North Down and Strangford. Despite very difficult financial circumstances, the capital budget has ensured that the people of North Down and Strangford are very well catered for at the Ulster Hospital.

Mr Rogers: As a South Down colleague, I welcome the Minister to his first Question Time.

Minister, in terms of the pressures on services at the Ulster Hospital, do you believe that enhanced GP services and opening more beds at Downe Hospital would help to alleviate some of those pressures?

Mr Wells: The honourable Member for South Down has sat with me, when I have been wearing my other hat, in many meetings on that issue. He is aware that the problem at Downe Hospital is not one of resources; the problem is attracting middle-grade doctors to staff the hospital at particular times. All attempts by the South Eastern Trust's personnel department to get experienced doctors to apply and work at Downe Hospital have been largely unsuccessful.

Personally, I am convinced that the information that I am getting on this from the chief executive of the South Eastern Trust is correct. I have been shown just how few people are applying. I know that I got myself into very serious trouble by saying this to a packed public meeting in St Patrick's Grammar School about a year ago, but I am still convinced that, in the absence of middle-grade doctors, we cannot continue to treat patients. Technically, it is illegal. We cannot do it. Therefore, until we solve that problem, we will have to divert patients to the Ulster Hospital, with all the difficulties that causes. It is not a lack of will by the board or the Department to ensure that those staff are attracted.

Integrated Care Partnerships

4. Mr Craig asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety for an update on the progress being made on integrated care partnerships. (AQO 6810/11-15)

Mr Wells: Integrated care partnerships (ICPs) work as multi-sector collaborative networks of health and social care providers that come together to respond innovatively to the assessed care needs of local communities. The initial focus of the 17 integrated care partnerships, which were established in September 2013, is on the frail elderly and aspects of long-term conditions, namely, diabetes, stroke care and respiratory conditions.

ICPs have been engaged in reviewing care pathways in their respective local areas and have identified opportunities to enhance service provision for citizens of Northern Ireland. Examples include provision of specialist information to GP practices on care for patients with long-term conditions; increasing provision of structured education programmes for patients with type-2 diabetes; development of an integrated role for third sector organisations in supporting older people in the community; and collaboration with the Northern Ireland Ambulance Service on its approach to handling emergency calls concerning diabetic cases.

I welcome the contribution of all the health and social care providers who are participating in this work to improve the integration of care for patients and service users.

Mr Craig: I thank the Minister for that comprehensive answer and wish him all the best in his new job. I hope that he works every bit as hard as his predecessor. If he does, he will have very little time on his hands.

I note that you mentioned the Northern Ireland Ambulance Service. Are you convinced or content that enough work has been done to give the necessary medical information on a patient? Have they enough access to that information when they are called out? A certain level of care is needed for specific conditions that, sometimes, the Ambulance Service is not fully aware of.

Mr Wells: It is a very interesting point that the honourable Member for Lagan Valley has raised and one that, in my five years, two months and six days on the Health Committee, I have not heard mentioned before. I suggest that the best way forward on this is that, if he has specific concerns, he contacts my diary secretary and we meet to discuss the issue.

It is absolutely vital that Ambulance Service staff have the full information available. As I mentioned earlier, those staff are under incredible pressure, with an increase of 5% per annum. However, it is important that, when collecting a patient, they have the full information required to deal with that patient. Remember, those men and women deal with some of the most horrific and difficult circumstances that any of us could ever face. We need to make certain that, in an emergency, they have the full information. I would welcome the opportunity to discuss that with the Member.

Mr McGlone: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire chomh maith. I am not going to ask him to respond about Bord na Móna. [Laughter.] What impact has the failure to implement Transforming Your Care had on the integrated care partnerships?

Mr Wells: I think that the honourable Member for Mid Ulster has got it totally wrong. I am committed to Transforming Your Care (TYC), as indeed were the majority of the Assembly, including himself, when it was discussed on numerous occasions.

John Compton's analysis is accurate. It is proving difficult in the present financial situation to deliver all that we want to as quickly as possible. However, Compton said that, if we do not change the way that we do things, by 2020, we will not be able to afford an adequate health service. Far too many people are too far up the ladder of health-care provision in Northern Ireland. We need to give them support so that people are treated at the right level, commensurate with their needs. The partnerships are continuing. It is going to take three to five years to complete, and that remains our ambition. However, the financial pressures that we face today were not evident when TYC was published. We have to be mindful of the potential impact that that could have on the scope and scale of change that may be possible.

We are going through the very difficult transition period between the publication of 'Transforming Your Care' and its final fruition. The difficulty is that, while that is going on, demand continues to rise, and budgets continue to be flatlined or go down in real terms. That is a challenge. I talked this morning about paediatric congenital heart disease being in my top five. This is also in my top five of issues that we are going to have to deal with.

The good news is that I ate, slept and drank Transforming Your Care, because it came in during my time as Chair of the Committee. I have had many meetings with John Compton, Fionnuala McAndrew and other senior staff about it and expect that there will be many more to come. We will continue to give it absolute priority.

GPs: Seven-day Access

5. Mrs Cochrane asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety, given the recent proposal in England, is he working towards seven-day patient access to GPs. (AQO 6811/11-15)

Mr Wells: I thank the honourable Member for the question. It is very appropriate and timely.

Currently, all patients across Northern Ireland have access to GPs during working hours, which are defined as 8.00 am to 6.30 pm, five days a week. That is supplemented by access seven days a week to the GP out-of-hours service. I am keen to explore how greater flexibility can be provided for patients to access GP surgeries. I already have written to Dr Tom Black and arranged a meeting with him on 23 October to explore this and other issues. Mr Tom Black, of course, is chair of the BMA's Northern Ireland General Practitioners Committee. However, any final decision would have to take account of the significant workforce and financial implications it would give rise to and the consequential additional pressures it would place on the health service budget.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Time for listed questions is up. We now move on to topical questions. Mr Paul Givan is not in his place. I call Mrs Brenda Hale.

3.15 pm

Ebola: Northern Ireland Preparations

T2. Mrs Hale asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety what preparations are being made to deal with the possibility of Ebola cases in Northern Ireland. (AQT 1612/11-15)

Mrs Hale: I congratulate the Minister on his well-deserved elevation.

Mr Wells: Again, that is a very timely and topical question, and I thank the honourable lady for that.

In order to deal with the potential importation of a case of Ebola disease in Northern Ireland, my officials have been working closely with our counterparts across the rest of the UK and the Republic of Ireland. The Public Health Agency is responsible for protecting the public from communicable diseases in Northern Ireland. The PHA has been coordinating with regional planning, in conjunction with the Department and the five trusts. The planning has included the development of patient care pathways by all trusts; preparation for the management and isolation of suspected cases; the accumulation of appropriate personal protection equipment; and the carrying out of staff training.

In addition, the Chief Medical Officer has sent five letters to the chief executives of the health and social care organisations providing information for all front line clinical staff who may be treating or admitting patients, all infection prevention and control staff, and GPs and practice staff. The letter includes flow charts for use by staff in emergency departments and by staff in primary care for dealing with patients who present with Ebola-like symptoms. The Chief Medical Officer has also written to all schools, universities and further education establishments.

It is important to note that the UK has robust systems in place for infectious disease control, including at airports and ports. Advice by the UK Border Agency has been circulated to all United Kingdom ports. In Northern Ireland, the Public Health Agency, through its health protection service, has communicated with colleagues covering all sea ports and airports in Northern Ireland, informing them of the current situation and directing them to sources of other information. In order to reduce the risk of international spread of the disease and in line with World Health Organization guidance, the affected countries have introduced exit screening at airports to ensure that individuals who are unwell do not board flights.

Mrs Hale: I thank the Minister for his very informative answer. Can he estimate how many UK health professionals are overseas caring for Ebola patients?

Mr Wells: Yesterday, I had a call from the junior Minister for health in London, and he brought me up to date with the UK-wide situation. I am sure that the Member is aware that an exercise was carried out on Friday in readiness for the potential for Ebola to arrive in the United Kingdom. We believe that there is a small number of UK health workers who are caring for Ebola patients in west Africa. Indeed, the Minister quoted a figure to me yesterday of about 600. That would indicate that between 15 and 20 of those people could be from Northern Ireland. Indeed, given the history of Northern Ireland people in helping those in need in the Third World, it might be more, but that gives you an indication of the numbers that could be involved.

In recognition that some staff may wish to volunteer to work in the affected areas, the UK Chief Medical Officer recently issued advice to health-care workers advising them to register with the UK international emergency medical register. That will enable an appropriate mix of staff to be selected and trained, with arrangements to follow up and monitor them on their return. As I have mentioned, we reckon that there are about 600 front line staff in countries like Sierra Leone, which, being part of the Commonwealth, has strong UK links.

The monitoring of this terrible disease is an absolute priority. It has killed over 4,000 people in west Africa. Whilst the ways of contamination are very specific, we have seen health-care workers, who have returned from Liberia, Sierra Leone, Nigeria and other affected areas, becoming infected. Therefore, we have to do absolutely everything to ensure that the condition does not spread; but, remember, the vast majority of people coming from west Africa come through airports in London or Dublin. That is where controls have to be effectively exercised to ensure that, when they move on to Northern Ireland, they have already been screened for the dreadful condition.

Paediatric Congenital Cardiac Services: Public Consultation

T3. Mr G Kelly asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety, following his earlier statement, to outline the purpose of a public consultation if the way forward for children's heart services has already been decided. (AQT 1613/11-15)

Mr Wells: The honourable Member for North Belfast has vast experience of the Court Service, and he will understand that, when any consultation is carried out —

Mr G Kelly: I have never been held in such esteem.

Mr Wells: I think that he is a world authority on court services, and he is not a barrister. With any consultation, in order to do things legally, you have to have a period when people can reflect.

I have published on the Department's website this morning the full, unabridged report; it is all there. I have read it, my officials have read it and we believe that what it recommends is the best way forward for very critically ill children. However, there may be some important observation during the consultation; we do not know. Legally, we are duty-bound, but we can, of course, make preparations during the consultation period. Then, if the consultation comes back giving it a full bill of health, we can move on.

I remain open-minded. I have to say, Mr Kelly, that my priority is how we deal with some of the terribly ill children whom I have seen over the last three or four weeks. It has broken my heart to sit in rooms and see how ill those children are. I have no party political baggage in this; I will do what is best for those children. If the best place for those children to be treated is Dublin, so be it. There can be no boundaries or difficulties with that. We owe it to the children. They should go to Birmingham or London if needs be. Equally, there will be people in the Irish Republic with other conditions for whom the best care in is here. That is sensible cooperation between two self-governing jurisdictions.

Mr G Kelly: Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as a fhreagraí go dtí seo. I thank the Minister for his answer. Of course, I agree with him that we need the best care for the children involved. However, he will understand that people are worried, because of the transition and the passing over of services, about what services will remain in Belfast from January 2015. Can he explain that?

Mr Wells: A bit like with Transforming Your Care, we will move into a difficult transitional period between the removal of services from Belfast and a greater uptake in Dublin and then, in 18 months' time, the final service provision in Dublin under a memorandum of understanding. That has to be watched extremely carefully. However, remember that, since January 2014, many children from Northern Ireland have already been down to Dublin for congenital heart surgery. As far as we can see, that has generally worked well. Many patients from Dublin have been sent to either Birmingham or London for surgery, so it is an almost international arrangement that we have.

I regard it as absolutely essential to watch carefully to ensure that none of the care of these very vulnerable children is remotely affected for these 18 months. I want to make it clear that Belfast will still be a centre of excellence for cardiology. We are not closing that down. The concern that that might happen was raised during the consultation period. However, I am left with four independent reports that all tell me that the option of Our Lady's in Dublin is the only way forward. I would be negligent to ignore that.

GP Workforce

T4. Mr McNarry asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety, apropos his earlier answer to Mrs Cochrane, to explain his plans to manage the ageing GP workforce, with 25% likely to retire in the next few years. (AQT 1614/11-15)

Mr Wells: The honourable Member for Strangford asks a very apposite, topical question. I had dinner on Friday night with the leader of a GP surgery in the East Londonderry constituency, and he made exactly the same point. The sad thing is that the GP route is not seen as an attractive one for young local doctors. Many of them want to be consultants. Many of them want to have career progression at the A&E or hospital level. Nothing surprises me now, but I have seen consultants who look like my grandson. They are so young that it is absolutely unbelievable. People are becoming consultants at 30, 33 or 35. That is very attractive, but, meanwhile, GP surgeries tell me that they are having great difficulty attracting the same young doctors to work for them.

What I can tell you is that the Department is carrying out a review of the medical workforce to look at issues like that. Undoubtedly, the shortage of candidates presenting themselves for GP cover will be an absolute priority and something that we will have to deal with at university level. On top of that, of course, many of the potential GPs are not here but on Bondi Beach. We lose 50 trained doctors a year to Australia, where the salary and the conditions are much more attractive. That has a profound impact on the pool of experienced medical graduates as well. The Member is pushing at an open door, and it will have to be dealt with as soon as possible.

Mr McNarry: I hope that we can walk through the door together, Minister. Having heard what you have said — I appreciate what you have said — I need to ask you this: what steps will you take to prevent the closures that are likely to happen due to the fact that we do not have GPs?

Mr Wells: Whilst I accept that GPs are under incredible pressure and the statistics that they have provided me with show an escalating number of patients, remember that Northern Ireland's population is now 1·826 million. That alone puts pressure on doctors. There is no indication of any closures, but, without doubt, there is an indication of very hard-pressed staff. At hospital level, of course, we have had to curtail hours in places such as Downe and Lagan Valley because we could not get the middle-grade doctors. The Member is right to flag this up. We will have problems here, and that is why the review is so timely. We are looking at an intensive study of our workforce to identify where we will get GPs in the future. As I go round surgeries throughout Northern Ireland, unfortunately I see that many GPs look my age. That is worrying. In surgeries, I would like to see spring chickens rather than old roosters, as it were, who are about to retire and, indeed, have made the point that, if they were given an appropriate package, they would go in the morning. That attitude worries me. When you go to hospitals, you see far more young doctors who are keen to advance their career.

Hospitals: Cancelled Operations

T5. Mr McCarthy asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety whether he is totally embarrassed by the figures quoted in last night's 'Belfast Telegraph', which stated that hospitals have been forced to cancel 9,778 operations at the last minute. (AQT 1615/11-15)

Mr Wells: I read that front-page article in the 'Belfast Telegraph' last night. It is a worry. I would like to dig down to see where exactly those figures came from. Presumably, they came from a freedom of information (FOI) request by the appropriate journalist. There are, often, reasons for this. There can be staff illness, a lack of backup or problems with some of our consultants who are flying in from other places to do the work. I do not know what the cause is. However, we will investigate that story and find out what is happening and come back to him on it. I know that my life will not be worth living if I do not answer his question; he is a bit of a terrier on this type of issue. He is right to raise it, but the first indication that I had of that story was when I opened the newspaper at about 1·00 am.

Mr McCarthy: You certainly were not concentrating on your reading at 1·00 am. If you had been, you would have seen that a shortage of beds resulted in no operation for 1,734 patients, broken equipment in hospitals resulted in no operation for 593 patients and — here we go — staff shortages resulted in no operation for 1,570 patients. Surely, that is contributing to enormous stress on our patients I acknowledge what the Minister has said, but —

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Sorry. I remind the Member that this is Question Time in the Northern Ireland Assembly, not Saturday morning in Hyde Park Corner.

Mr McCarthy: I implore the Minister to find out and go over the reasons for operations not being performed, because they are in the hospital setting.

Mr Wells: The Member will accept that, despite the enormous difficulties of the recession, the previous Minister invested in 500 more full-time nurses and a 15% increase in consultants and that we are about to appoint 61 new health visitors. The doom and gloom that his party and the Members to my right painted have not come true.

I go back to my early point. We have had a very large increase in demand and a finite supply of experienced staff and facilities. Often, that can lead to a situation where a bed is not available. In an emergency you tend to have to use a bed rather than use it for an elective procedure. The other problem, of course, is that we no longer use the route of the private sector to relieve waiting lists. That is a huge concern for me. So many people were expecting to go to places such as the North West clinic and Kingsbridge for surgical procedure, but that is no longer available because of financial constraints. We are in great difficulty, financially, in health. We still need an extra £70 million. I understand that very little is coming through the pipeline in monitoring rounds, so we have difficult decisions to take, and there will be complaints about those decisions and what affects people. Worrying about that is probably what keeps me awake at 1.00 am. If I had an extra £71 million, I would be sleeping very soundly.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): With enough to do, I can get Mr Ross in for a question.

Speak Up, Save a Life: Organ Donation

T6. Mr Ross asked the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety for an update on the Speak Up, Save a Life campaign. (AQT 1616/11-15)

3.30 pm

Mr Wells: The PHA, as you know, has been organising and running the Speak Up and Save a Life campaign for organ donation, and that has encouraged people to talk to their family and friends about their organ donation wishes. The moment that I was appointed Chair of the Health Committee, I immediately registered my organs for donation. They should be good, because there is not a hint of alcohol in any of them, so they are good quality organs. I also did it because a certain radio show that begins at 9.00 am on a Monday and ends at 10.30 am and which will remain nameless would have asked me that question.

This campaign has included the development and production of two TV adverts; two radio advertisements; outdoor posters, which I am sure that we have all seen; online advertisements; Northern Ireland-branded organ donation leaflets and posters; and, of course, an information website. The initial phase of the media campaign ran from 12 February until 31 March 2014. The second phase of the campaign began on 1 June and will run to the end of this month.

The impact so far has been significant. I know that the honourable Member is taking an interest in this. Since the campaign was launched, there have been 23,148 visits to the website. Before the campaign started, there had been 20,826 new registrants on the organ donor register. That is 598,000 in total. A report that we received on 30 September shows that there have been 2,363 new registrants on the register through the Northern Ireland website. So, this is good news.

What we really hope will happen is that people like me will voluntarily put their name on the register and that we will have sufficient organs to ensure that everyone is covered and that there is no need for any further legislation. This is the commitment of the previous Minister to try to deliver that, and well done to the 2,363 people who have newly registered. They could save somebody's life some day, and they have to be applauded for that.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Order. Time is up. Before we return to the debate on accelerated passage, I invite the House to take ease while we change at the Table.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Beggs] in the Chair)

Executive Committee Business

Education Bill: Accelerated Passage

Debate resumed on motion:

That the Education Bill proceed under the accelerated passage procedure. — [Mr O'Dowd (The Minister of Education).]

Mr O'Dowd (The Minister of Education): Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Ba mhaith liom mo bhuíochas a ghabháil leis na Comhaltaí as a bheith páirteach sa díospóireacht seo inniu. Aithním, leis an iarratas seo le haghaidh pasáiste luathaithe, go bhfuil gá lena mhíniú ina iomláine agus go bhfuil deis againn é a phlé mar is ceart, sa dóigh is go bhfuil Comhaltaí sásta leis an riachtanas agus lena chinntiú nach iarracht é grinnscrúdú cuí an Tionóil a sheachaint.

I thank Members for their participation in this debate. I recognise that my request for accelerated passage needs to be fully explained and properly debated so that Members are satisfied of its necessity and reassured that this is not an attempt to avoid proper scrutiny by the Assembly.

I trust that Members now understand the importance of accelerated passage to this Education Bill and accept, in the circumstances, the need to ensure that from, 1 April 2015, we have an education administration system that has a secure legal basis in which to operate and deliver high quality education services to our children. So it is right that we take the time we need to debate, challenge and discuss.

I welcome the interest that has been shown on all sides of the House, and I thank those Members who contributed. Many specific points were raised, and I shall address as many of them as possible. I shall, of course, write to Members on any issues that I am unable to cover now.

First, I assure the Chair of the Education Committee that it is my intention to keep the Committee fully informed of the progress on the Education Authority. I have instructed my officials to provide the Committee with regular updates. At the earliest opportunity, I intend sharing with the Committee the full business case, including the proposed structure of the Education Authority. I assure the Chair of the Committee that at no stage have I ever thought that the Committee will ignore this Bill, and, in fact, I have no doubt that the Committee will carry out its role to full completeness. As I said, I have instructed my Departmental officials to fully cooperate with the Committee. I also reassure her of a speedy turnaround on Committee questions and requests to me and my Department.

A number of other Members made contributions in relation to the reasons, or lack of reasons, for the accelerated passage of the Bill. I fully understand Members' concerns. It is not a decision that I have taken lightly, and I do not believe that the Assembly should take lightly any decision to approve accelerated passage for any Bill. However, in this case, time has caught up with us for whatever reason. Members can spend their time pointing fingers at each other across the Chamber, at the Executive and at whichever political party it suits you to point your finger at, but there has been a collective failure by all parties in the House to agree to ESA and to bring forward a Bill, or amendments to a Bill, that are acceptable to all Members of the House. Some parties have made it their intention to actively lobby against any ESA Bill in the House.

Mr Kinahan asked me who I have consulted with in relation to the new Bill. Not necessarily in relation to the new Bill, but I have spent the last two years involved in various engagements with political parties, stakeholders, interested parties, individuals and collectives on how we move the education administration forward in this society. There are many different views out there, but what was central to the vast majority of those discussions was that people wanted certainty and wanted to be assured that we would have an administration in place that would steer a steady course and ensure that staff morale is raised and that staff know exactly what their destiny will be and what their roles will be. I believe that this Bill allows for that.

I want to correct a number of assertions made by Mr Kinahan, because I think that it is important, in these matters, for the public record to be correct. First, while the Executive meetings remain confidential, I do not think that I am breaching confidence when I say that, on 25 September, there were no recorded objections to accelerated passage from any member of the Executive. Mr Kinahan also suggests — I accept that he may have been paraphrasing — that I suggested at the Education Committee that there was agreement on ESA. If there was agreement on ESA, I would not be standing here. The ESA Bill would have passed, we would have moved on and we would all be much happier for it. What I did say at the Education Committee, in a response to a question from Mr Lunn, was:

“No. Rightly or wrongly, I believe that we had broad agreement on the proposal in the previous ESA Bill as to how we would construct a new board. It came about from the heads of agreement that were published, I believe, in November 2011.”

Maybe I have not checked the minutes properly, but that is the only occasion when I refer to the use of the word “agreement” in relation to ESA. I did not say that ESA was agreed. I said that the proposals in and around how we construct the board were broadly agreed. It is important that the public record has the proper minutes in relation to that matter.

Members raised other concerns about why we have reached this stage and why the Bill has not been approved before now. Mr Kinahan asked why we have one authority instead of three authorities etc. All those matters were widely discussed and debated in my time in the Education Committee and beyond and again by various political parties, interested parties and sectoral support groups, but at no time has anybody come forward with a firm proposal on a three-board model. At no time has anyone come forward with a firm proposal on an alternative model to ESA.

I have brought forward a single authority because I believe that it is the path of least resistance. I believe that it is a path that will allow us to bring certainty to our education system and our education administration, and I believe that no one loses. Most importantly, no one loses in terms of educational delivery. No one loses within the boards, no one loses on services to schools, our pupils do not lose out on support services and the political parties are not seen to lose face over the positions that they hold around administration in education, and they are quite right to hold very different opinions on all those matters.

The proposal that we have before us today is a compromise on everyone’s behalf. We are often lambasted in the House for not compromising. The Executive are often lambasted for not compromising. The proposal before us is a compromise. It allows us to move forward with certainty on education. I would much prefer if we were debating it for longer; the Committee Stage is important for any Bill. However, time has caught up with us.

I believe that I have set out sound reasons for seeking accelerated passage. I believe that the length of time that we have debated education over several years has allowed the education bodies to be examined from all angles. This is a structural change to education. The services being delivered by the authority will be the same as the boards’. I have outlined where there are minor changes in terms of the board — the appointment of the chair and the teachers committee. Those are laid out in six simple clauses in relation to the structure of education. The services delivered by the boards will not change in any way under the new Bill.

I recommend that the Assembly accepts accelerated passage in acknowledgement of the fact that I have not brought this proposal forward in any way to dismiss the role of the Assembly and the Committee. That remains vital. However, I believe that the urgency involved in bringing the Bill to reality outweighs the concerns expressed thus far.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): Before I proceed to the Question, I remind Members that the motion requires cross-community support.

Education Bill: Second Stage

Mr O'Dowd (The Minister of Education): I beg to move

That the Second Stage of the Education Bill [NIA 38/11-16] be agreed.

Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Is mian liom labhairt.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): Order. I ask Members leaving the Chamber to move quietly.

Mr O'Dowd: Forálann an Bille Oideachais do bhunú comhlachta aonair a chur in ionad na cúig Bhord Oideachais agus Labharlainne agus a gcuid Coimisiún Foirne. The Education Bill provides for the establishment of a single body to replace the five education and library boards (ELBs) and their staff commission. Local government reform is the context.

Our five education and library boards are defined in the Education and Libraries Order 1986 by links to the 26 local government districts. Those 26 districts will be replaced on 1 April 2015 by a new model of 11 councils. If we do not agree and implement a new future for education administration from 1 April 2015 — or as soon as possible thereafter — the legal basis for our education and library boards' responsibilities and their governance arrangements will be significantly less secure than ever intended.

I believe that a Bill to replace our five education and library boards with a single authority is the best solution. I believe it to be the most efficient and effective way of providing administrative arrangements for education that are compatible with the new local government structures effective from 1 April 2015. A single education authority will overarch the issue of compatibility with local councils, and it will have much of the strength of the business case made for the Education and Skills Authority (ESA), which promised £185 million of savings over the next 10 years.

By contrast, a future that does not involve the complete amalgamation of the five ELBs will require increased investment, given the current depleted and unsustainable nature of the existing boards. It will also require potentially complex and contentious agreements around territory and boundaries. It will represent the costly re-entrenchment of the pre-RPA system, purely for the reasons of technical compliance with local government.

The Bill is, therefore, minimal, in the interests of securing consensus, and delivers only structural and technical change. It is a short Bill, providing for a single Education Authority (EA) that retains the responsibilities of the education and library boards as provided for in existing legislation, including employer responsibilities. Otherwise, employer responsibilities in the education system will be unchanged.

4.00 pm

The Youth Council, the Council for Catholic Maintained Schools (CCMS) and the Council for the Curriculum, Examinations and Assessment (CCEA) will be unaffected. The case for a staff commission to serve multiple ELBs does not apply, so that body will be dissolved, with its functions being absorbed by the single authority.

Alongside the Bill and its establishment of the Education Authority, I have also agreed with the Executive that, as part of the reorganisation of education administration, my Department will fund a new organisation to provide support for controlled schools. The functions of that body, as agreed by the Executive on 9 September 2014, will include: providing a representational and advocacy role for controlled schools, including advice and support in responding to consultation exercises in respect of education policies, initiatives and schemes and in regard to relationships with the Department, the Education Authority and other Departments; working with schools within the sector to develop and maintain its collective ethos, including, where appropriate, a role in identifying, encouraging and nominating governors and ensuring that ethos is part of employment considerations; working with the Education Authority to raise educational standards; participating in the planning of the schools estate; assessing ongoing provision within the sector; participating in area-based planning coordinated by DE and the Education Authority, including membership of the Department's area planning steering group; engaging, where appropriate, in strategic planning processes, including community planning; and building cooperation and engaging with other sectors on matters of mutual interest, including the promotion of tolerance and understanding.

I turn to the content of the Bill. There are six clauses and four schedules, as follows.

Clause 1 provides for the establishment of the Education Authority and applies schedule 1, which puts in place arrangements for membership and governance of the authority, most of which are standard. The title Education Authority has been used instead of Education Board to avoid the potential for confusion throughout the education Orders due to the many references they contain to the board of governors of a school.

Clause 2 provides that the functions of the Education Authority will be the transferred functions of the education and library boards.

Clause 3 dissolves the ELBs and their staff commission and, with schedule 2, transfers their assets, liabilities and staff to the Education Authority.

Clauses 4, 5 and 6 and schedules 3 and 4 cover the usual matters of amendments, repeals, interpretation and commencement.

In only two respects does the Bill provide some element of significant change. There are two areas where simple continuation was practically not an option. The first area concerns the provisions that govern the chair and membership of the new authority. The Bill proposes that a chair be appointed by the Department of Education rather than elected by members. It also proposes that there be 19 members, comprising a balance of political members linked to party strengths in the Assembly, community members and members drawn from transferors and trustees. Those arrangements differ from those that have provided for ELB chairs and members since 1986, which would not be suitably wieldy or precise when applied to a regional-level authority. Nor would they apply modern standards of governance.

Of course, the Bill retains the weighting effect of the provisions that have applied to the balance of transferors and trustee members within the ELBs since 1986: it provides for four transferors and three trustee members. Otherwise, it provides for a compact total membership of 20, inclusive of one chair, eight political members that are established by reference to party strengths in the Assembly and four community members. Those arrangements resemble the provisions agreed for ESA, which was an agreed and fit-for-purpose model for the governance of regional-level education administration.

The second area where some change has been necessary is in the teaching appointment committees. Those have operated in the five ELBs and have been directly involved in teacher appointments in controlled schools in their respective areas. The new membership provisions and the issues of scale that are presented by a regional organisation mean that those arrangements cannot continue. The Bill provides that new arrangements will be developed by the new authority in a teaching appointments scheme, which will require the approval of my Department.

That is the extent of the Bill. Despite the two necessary changes that I have summarised, the Bill is best and most accurately understood as being the minimal legislation required to create a single board in place of the five we have.

Should we return to the issue, a single authority will be consistent with, and provide a platform for, fully implementing the RPA in education.

In the meantime, the Executive have agreed to withdraw the commitment to establish the ESA from the 2011-15 Programme for Government. I shall not, therefore, move the Education Bill 2012 to the next stage.

I acknowledge that some Members may wonder why we cannot have other provisions in the Bill or why the new Education Authority cannot have wider powers, for example to promote improved standards in schools or to support professional development etc. The intention had always been that the Education Bill 2012 would have delivered such provisions and that it would have completed its passage in time for the ESA to be established long before the reform of local government in April 2015.

I proposed considerable concessions in pursuit of agreement to progress the 2012 Bill, but, regrettably, my efforts were not successful. We now face the imperative provided by the timetable for local government reform. There is no "do nothing" option in this case; we cannot continue with our current structure of education administration. The present Bill, therefore, delivers only the structural and technical change required to comply with local government reform.

There will be future opportunities to pass legislation that will further benefit and improve the education service, but to include further provisions in this Bill would risk not securing the consensus that we need to secure the immediate future of our education administration.

Molaim an Bille don Tionól. I commend the Bill to the Assembly.

Miss M McIlveen (The Chairperson of the Committee for Education): Thank you, Mr Deputy Speaker. With your permission, I will initially make a few remarks as Chairperson of the Committee for Education and then as a DUP MLA.

Two years ago, almost to the day, my predecessor, Mr Mervyn Storey, stood here and made his Second Stage speech for an Education Bill. He said at that time that it was a bit like déjà vu all over again. He was, of course, referring to the second Education Bill in the space of around three years, and here we are again.

Last time, the Chairperson of the Education Committee picked out the many differences between the ESA 1 and ESA 2 Bills. This time, the Bill that is before us could hardly be more different from those that went before. For a start, it is considerably shorter. It simply dissolves the five education and library boards and the staff commission and replaces them with a single education authority. All duties, obligations, responsibilities, staff and assets are – if we understand correctly – to transfer from the old education and library boards to the new Education Authority.

Unlike the previous Education Bills, this Bill will not alter the employment arrangements for teaching staff, except to simply transfer those working for one of the old five ELBs to the new Education Authority. The old questions about employers, employing authorities, tribunals and agency simply do not apply to this Bill. It appears to change nothing for voluntary grammars and nothing for schools generally in respect of the vexed questions about employment and management schemes.

The Bill dissolves the ELBs and the staff commission and leaves the Council for Catholic Maintained Schools in place, together with its duties in respect of planning for the Catholic maintained education estate. As Members are aware, the Minister is to establish a controlled schools sectoral support body, which is to have a role in area planning. Members of the Committee welcome the new body and generally see this as a fairer way to plan for our schools.

That said, I expect that some Members are disappointed that the Bill does not set out and guarantee the role for this new body in statute. I think that some other Members may also be unhappy that the Bill did not simplify educational planning by dissolving the CCMS. Others may also highlight today the absence of a statutory sectoral support body for voluntary grammar schools.

Schedule 1 sets out the composition of the board of the Education Authority; this appears largely to match those arrangements in the existing ELBs. This differs a little from that proposed in the previous Bill. Members of the Committee highlighted concerns in respect of the absence of explicit or guaranteed representation for integrated, Irish-medium and voluntary grammar schools on the board of the authority. The Committee considered evidence from stakeholders suggesting representation for those groups, groups representing young people and for organisations representing business and so on.

I think that the Committee appreciates the benefit of having a small board and understands the difficulty in representing all interests.

I am sure that some Members, particularly at Consideration Stage, will want to say more about representation. In the interim, however, the majority of the Committee probably takes the view that, in the first instance, the Department should, imaginatively and in line with public appointment principles, ensure that the four community representatives are selected to ensure an appropriate and fair level of representation.

The Committee has sought further detail on how the substantial projected savings for the authority are to be realised, particularly as CCMS is to continue to exist. In his response today, perhaps the Minister will set out, at least at a high level, how savings are to be made and bureaucracy reduced through the establishment of the Education Authority. This is of particular interest, because, unlike his ESA proposals, the Committee has not seen the detailed business case for the Education Authority.

To summarise: the argument underpinning the Bill appears to be simplicity. By simply generally replicating existing ELB arrangements in the new Education Authority, it appears that the Minister hopes that this will prove to be uncontroversial and, therefore, acceptable. The Minister indicated to the Committee and has repeated today that he believes that this simple foundational Bill could be used to drive an incremental reform of educational administration. The Committee has not taken a formal view on this longer-term way forward. That said, I think that Members generally favour an incremental and agreed strategy, in contrast to what some characterised as the Department's previous all-encompassing approach to educational administration, which was doomed to failure.

In taking things forward with the Education Authority, I hope that the Minister will give thought to those uncontroversial spin-offs identified from the previous legislation — for example, the options to improve autonomy for some controlled schools to allow them to appoint their own principals and perhaps hire a bursar to improve financial performance. In the longer term, perhaps the Bill may also allow for the simplification of what is a fairly complex and much-amended body of education legislation, the idea being to allow for a higher and commensurate level of delegation to schools.

As my predecessor in the Committee also said two years ago, any education Bill is usually yet another cause for consternation for many in the education sector: principals, teachers, boards of governors and others. Whatever way this Bill progresses, on behalf of the majority of Committee members, I hope that the House's sober deliberations will provide certainty to those whom I have just mentioned and reassurance that we all have the best interests of school pupils and their parents at heart. I believe that the majority of Committee members feel that the Bill is simple and introduces very limited but important changes. The majority of Committee members, therefore, are probably just about content to support the Bill's progress to Consideration Stage.

Speaking as a DUP MLA, I want to say that this is a significantly less complicated Bill than were the two previous Bills, but it is no less significant. While the legislation does not see the establishment of an education and skills authority with broad, sweeping powers, it does see the dissolution of the five current boards and the creation of what is, essentially, a single education board. A number of issues require clarification as the Bill progresses. There is the issue of the controlled sector representative body. The announcement that there will be such a body is, of course, to be welcomed, and its establishment would merely right a wrong in education. The controlled sector has been shamefully ignored in this regard for far too long. It is to be hoped that the creation of this body will bring equality to the controlled sector, 25 years after other sectors were granted their support bodies.

I welcome the Minister's comments today about how this sector will be supported, but it must not be a toothless organisation. It must have legislative underpinning and be specifically mentioned in the Bill. It is important that this is done, because the Minister has to appreciate that there is a lot of nervousness in the sector. It is a natural consequence of years of uncertainty hanging over education, particularly in the last seven years. The Minister previously gave a commitment that the funding of this body would be enshrined in the Bill. Again, at the Executive and in Committee, a commitment was given that there would be robust underpinning. Up to this point, the Minister has talked a good game, but we need to see that assurance on paper.

4.15 pm

We, as a party, are not looking for the creation of a statutory body. I do not believe that anyone wants yet another statutory body to be created for education in Northern Ireland. However, unless the body is placed on a robust footing, the consequence will be great distrust and unease in the controlled sector. It is essential that this sector is afforded equal treatment, which has been a recurrent theme for my party over the last seven years.

The announcement of the body was welcomed across the sector, but that welcome has waned and is turning to distrust as the perception increases that the sector is once again being treated in a somewhat inferior fashion. The integrated sector, which educates only 7% of pupils, has robust underpinning for its sectoral body under the 1989 Order. All that the controlled sector is asking for, and all that we ask for on its behalf, is equality. I would like the Minister to bring forward proposals in order to allow the controlled sector and Members to assess whether they are fit for purpose.

The Minister needs to appreciate that a failure to place this body on a footing on a par with other sectoral bodies will cause it internal difficulties. That is particularly true of recruitment, especially to senior posts. The uncertain nature of the body is not conducive to recruiting the best people for those posts.

The second key issue — the Minister is aware that I raised this with him at the Education Committee — is the appointment of the chief executive of the Education Authority. For the wider community to have confidence in the new authority, it is paramount that a clear message of independence is made. It is important that the appointment of the chief executive is an open and transparent process, and not a coronation.

The Bill provides that the first chief executive is to be appointed by the Department. The Minister has explained that the rationale for that had to do with the timescales surrounding the appointment of the board. The timescale, as we have been aware through the accelerated passage debate, is understandably tight, but the preferred option, from my perspective, is the appointment of an interim chief executive, with the final appointment being made by the board of the authority when it has been established. The recruitment processes for the appointment of the interim chief executive and the permanent appointment need to enjoy the full protection of a robust public appointments process. They must be open recruitment processes.

The Minister told the Committee that he was minded to appoint a chief executive for a set period, and then the board would make an appointment. I would like that to be reflected in the Bill. I would not like the first chief executive to end up in post for 10 or 15 years without any input from the board. I want to see the board's involvement in the process at the earliest possible opportunity.

After a number of false dawns, the disasters of the first two Bills, and the uncertainty and mistrust caused by the Department's handling of that legislation, it is important that this legislation is unambiguously fair. We also need to be assured that the Bill will deliver savings. It should not be one board run as five; there need to be meaningful savings.

I mentioned in the earlier debate that the existing ELBs have been limping along for some considerable time. The hundreds of voluntary severances, in conjunction with the vacancy controls that have been in place, have impacted dramatically on their efficiency and operability. It is important to stabilise the staffing arrangements. We are not seeing the structure or delivery mechanisms of the new organisation. It is important that what is being created is an efficient, streamlined and effective organisation that is capable of delivering savings and, most importantly, services. I would not like to think that the Minister is rushing through the legislation with no view of how the final organisation will look or be effective.

Obviously, savings are important, but this all needs to be for the greater good of education. It needs to be recognised in the House that the creation of a single authority is what the key stakeholders want and realise is required for education. The change is needed to create the mechanism that should allow the maximum amount of the budget to go directly to the education of our children. I want to ensure that that is the case. For many years, too many layers of bureaucracy ate up the budget, and that must be avoided in the new body.

I certainly hope that all parties involved in today's debate have taken the opportunity to liaise with those who matter in education. I, my predecessor, my party colleagues on the Education Committee and my wider party colleagues have all taken that opportunity. We have made an informed decision to support the principles of the Bill, and we will continue to make those informed decisions as the Bill progresses. It is not ESA or ESA lite. It is what the sector wants.

As I said in the earlier debate, that is what the DUP recognised back in 2008 when we put forward strikingly similar proposals. The former Chair of the Education Committee Mervyn Storey deserves a great deal of praise — it is not because he is sitting directly behind me — for advocating so strongly on behalf of the controlled sector during his tenure to ensure that it was treated fairly, which certainly would not have been the case under the proposed ESA. Some parties in the Chamber may lament the demise of the ESA Bills, but my party does not.

There will undoubtedly be a great deal of discussion around the Chamber about who should be represented on the board of the new authority. While I am more than content with the representation being given to the controlled sector as of right, as the make-up of the board will broadly reflect existing boards, it is difficult to dismiss out of hand the arguments in favour of the voluntary grammars having representation on the board. That is a sector that teaches 32.9% of our post-primary children and owns a huge acreage of the schools estate. For such a sector not to have a voice on the board, which will be dealing with area-planning issues, appears bizarre. I would like to hear the Minister's thoughts on that.

In all of this, when we talk at a high level about reorganisation and budget restraint, it can be too easy to forget about the staff in the existing ELBs. I pay tribute to the work that they have done in the delivery of education, particularly during the many years of uncertainty and upheaval that they have had to endure. To undertake their work in such trying circumstances is a tribute to their fortitude and diligence. Periods of change are always difficult, but in circumstances in which that change has been mishandled at a departmental level, to the extent that the boards have been chronically understaffed for so long, I think that the staff require a particular note of gratitude. Although I say "departmental level", I may want to look towards the political end of that spectrum, too.

Front line services have also been under significant pressure. Praise needs to be given to the staff and head teachers of schools across Northern Ireland at this time of transition. It has been incredibly difficult for those schools with the uncertainty that exists above them. I hope that the passage of the Bill will afford them the certainty that they crave.

Mr Storey: I thank the Member for giving way and for her — albeit ill-deserved — comments earlier. An issue arises out of this about the way in which we do policy in the Chamber and the Executive. Clearly, the vacancy control mechanism that was introduced by the previous direct rule Ministers had an intent to force through legislation that, clearly, seven years later, did not have the consensus of those whom we endeavour to serve. Rather than Departments setting out their stall and then trying to achieve that by vacancy control, which led to the deletion and delineation of services in the education and library boards, there should have been a more pragmatic view taken as to how policy, practice and deliver were achieved.

Miss M McIlveen: I thank Mr Storey for his comments. I think that he will agree with me when I say that the Bill is not yet the finished article. Work will need to be done on it, but we have come a long way from the previous ESA Bills. I will support the Bill at Second Reading, but I hope to see the issues that I have raised being addressed.

I will just make a final comment about the comments that were made in the earlier debate by Mr Kinahan. I sat on the Education Committee from 2007 until last year. I have had the experience of numerous UUP education spokesmen on that Committee. I also experienced the two previous Education Bills as they came through the Committee. Nothing that I heard from any of those spokesmen ever filled me with any confidence that they actually knew what they were talking about.

Nothing I heard from that party's current spokesperson today has changed that view. The revisionist approach being taken by the UUP today is worthy of a republican historian. I may have been a politics and history teacher — Mr Agnew in the corner will be able to account for that as a former pupil — [Interruption.]

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): Order.

Miss M McIlveen: — but I do have a grasp of basic mathematics. Mr Kinahan referred earlier to a DUP/Sinn Féin carve up. Simple addition tells us that, if the DUP had been in favour of ESA, that is what we would have today. If the DUP and Sinn Féin had been on the same page on the first or even the second ESA Bill, why would we be standing here today debating a third? Unlike the current UUP spokesperson, I was on the Committee scrutinising the previous two Bills. At no stage was there anything constructive by way of proposals from that party.

Mr Hazzard: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Like the last Member to speak, I, too, welcome the opportunity to discuss the Education Bill in a bit more detail this afternoon following the discussion earlier regarding accelerated passage.

As I outlined this morning, the ongoing delay in establishing ESA has placed huge strain on those who work for the boards and commission. I have no doubt that today's developments will come as welcome news to those who have endeavoured for years to plug the gaps. It is only proper though that, in the debate concerning the need to build a modern, fit-for-purpose system, we recognise and acknowledge the dedication of those who have shown great commitment to improving the educational experience of learners for the best part of the last half century. This dedication has not only delivered many key services but has developed many new approaches and facilitated much improvement during a long and often arduous journey for our education system.

The Education Bill is undoubtedly a milestone on this journey. I know that some Members spoke this morning about parties surprisingly acquiescing to the demands of the Executive, but, for me, this is not the case. We have all been listening to the messages coming from the front line, our schools and the boards. The message is very clear: we need agreement and we need it now. In light of this, I welcome the clarification from the Minister on arguments that were put forward by some Members, especially around the fact that he will now give the Committee sight of business cases as soon as possible, and also the clarification that, despite protest in the Chamber this morning, the UUP did not, in fact, object to accelerated passage at the Executive. As the Member who spoke last outlined, some serious questions need to be put to the UUP.

Once again, we know what the UUP is opposed to, but we remain totally clueless as to what it is actually in favour of. We used to hear that it was in favour of a single education system, yet it opposes a streamlined single authority that would oversee such a system. Indeed, in a recent debate on pupil absenteeism, the UUP spokesperson, Danny Kinahan, called for urgent action. He said he had had enough of policies and strategies, yet when a much-needed development in education reform comes along, the UUP seeks again to stall and score points against a political rival.

I challenge the UUP to outline today what it believes in and, if it is so opposed to the process of change, to bring alternative ideas to the table, because all its efforts to outflank the DUP will ultimately fail. More depressingly, it will continue to fail the young people who rely on a fit-for-purpose education system.

The case for change in education is obvious. Our system is characterised by uneven performance with outstanding academic excellence coupled with still too many children leaving school without five good GCSEs. Tasked with modernising the administration of education here in the North, the Bill will see the replacement of an outdated administration system with one that better meets the needs of the 21st century.

At the core of that reform and indeed the Bill is the foundation of the Education Authority, which will be tasked with overseeing the establishment of a modern, fit-for-purpose administration system. The Bill provides for the establishment of a single Education Authority at the expense of the existing five library boards and their Staff Commission. Undoubtedly, at this point in the evolution of administrative reform, the Bill provides the most efficient and effective way of providing such administrative arrangements that are compatible with the new local government structures that will take effect from 1 April 2015. As outlined by the Minister, the Bill is clearly the minimum legislation that is required to create a single board in place of the five that are currently in operation; an exercise in expediency, perhaps, but a vital change if we are to provide effective and efficient education administration in the years ahead.

As the Minister outlined today, the Bill will provide for two significant changes to administration oversight. The first relates to provisions on membership and the chair of the authority. Despite the fact that the Bill retains the weighting effect of provisions that had previously applied to the balance of transferor and trustee members since 1986, arrangements now resemble the provisions that were agreed for the ESA and reflect an agreed up-to-date model for the governance of regional-level administration.

4.30 pm

Secondly, the Bill will signal change in respect of teaching employment committees. The new membership provisions and the issues of scale that are now presented by our regional organisation mean that those arrangements can no longer continue. The Bill outlines that the authority will now develop an appointments scheme that will require departmental approval. However, that transformation, thankfully, does not represent a wild stab in the dark for our system. The authority will build on the vast work and experience of the various boards and education bodies as it drives forward to raise standards in the North.

Embedded firmly in the context of previous Bills brought forward, the 2014 Education Bill reveals a few areas of fresh thinking and demonstrates a mature flexibility in looking at solutions to issues that were previously of concern to stakeholders. In the light of that, I welcome the Minister's commitment today, and previously in Committee, around the controlled sector. I know that that brings comfort to all sides of the House. Members will no doubt talk today about the membership arrangements of the board. Again, that is an area in which we all need to be prepared to listen to the arguments put forward over the next days and weeks as we move into Consideration Stage. Sinn Féin is certainly more than willing to do so.

We must continue to push forward with determination and commitment to educational excellence. Vested interests and reactionary objections must not hide the real and present need for reform. Dogma must not stand in the way of necessary change. In driving forward with the desire for educational excellence, standing still is simply not an option. The delivery of education in the North has developed over the decades into a system designed around the needs of our schools and institutions, often at the expense of the needs of our young people. Certainly we deliver education through schools, and the needs of those schools are important, but we cannot continue to shape our education service around the needs of buildings. In the light of that, I hope that the new Education

Authority can be a strategic body that drives change in the decades ahead.

I welcome the opportunity today to discuss in general terms the principles of the Bill. In the days ahead, Sinn Féin will continue to engage with interested parties as we prepare for the consideration of the Bill in finer detail.

Mr Rogers: First, I acknowledge all the people who deliver education to our young people; our teachers, our boards and everyone who makes this a better place for all our children. However, after seven years of an education system shrouded in uncertainty, the SDLP welcomes the development of the Education Authority. Young people, their parents and everyone employed in the North's education system have been subject to too many delays. After what NIPSA recently identified as almost a decade of procrastination, we are now faced with a rush to ensure that an education board is in place in time for the establishment of the new super councils.

Since the Bill for the now defunct ESA arose, the five existing education and library boards have been left in the dark. With the education and library boards set to dissolve next year, uncertainty and lack of direction has seriously affected their capacity to operate and deliver the services that they are tasked with to the highest standard possible. The ESA Bill has been abandoned after seven long years of hard work, and, as was mentioned earlier, £17 million of public money has been squandered. I find it hard to believe that, in the Minister's summing up, he talked about the ESA being a collective failure. It was very difficult for parties other than the DUP and Sinn Féin to know what exactly was going on between the Bill and heads of agreement.

Area-based planning proved contentious in the Education and Skills Authority Bill. With false starts and ambiguities surrounding the previous Bill, it would not have been right to pursue it. However, one major aspect of the EA's strategic management in upcoming years will have to be area-based planning. It is essential that the Minister gives due consideration to area-based planning and critically reassesses the 2006 Bain proposals.

The Minister said:

"The reason why accelerated passage is needed for this Bill is that the Executive, the Assembly and I should do all that is possible to avoid the risk of not having the Education Authority in place by 1 April 2015."

To me, that answers Mr McCallister's question from earlier, when he said that accelerated passage should be used only in extreme circumstances.

You have to acknowledge what is happening in the education world. Our boards are depleted. They can no longer deliver high-quality teacher development and so on. They just simply have not got the resources.

Mr McCallister: Will the Member give way?

Mr Rogers: Yes, I will.

Mr McCallister: The point that I was making on accelerated passage was that we are five and a half months away from the start of April. There is time for this to go through a normal process, working closely with the Committee on its standard six-week scrutiny of the Bill. There is plenty of time to do that.

Mr Rogers: I am coming from a different place. I have been working closely with schools, and I see what is happening out there. The boards need road maps, the schools need road maps and the parents need road maps, so that we can move on and deal strategically with education in Northern Ireland.

It is because of the delays and the money wasted that it is crucial that the new board is constituted to reflect accurately our unique educational landscape. As it stands, the 60 representatives who comprise the education and library boards are to be reduced to 20. A chief executive will oversee the board, with four transferors, three trustees, eight political representatives according to d'Hondt, and four community representatives. That leaves the Northern Ireland Council for Integrated Education, Comhairle na Gaelscolaíochta and the voluntary grammars without specific representation on the new board. Instead, they will be forced to clamber for one of the four remaining places.

Mr Storey: I thank the Member for giving way. Will the Member accept the argument that, historically, those organisations have never had a place on the education and library boards? People need to understand that this is a board on the basis of the 1986 Order. The organisations that he refers to have always had advocate bodies to which they could have recourse, whereas the controlled sector was totally dependent on its place in an education and library board and was left in the wilderness and did not have that independent voice to represent its views. That is the why the wrong had to be righted.

Mr Rogers: I agree with the former Chair, now a Minister. He still has a keen interest in education. The Minister used the word "platform" on a number of occasions. This could be a platform for a future ESA. If there is going to be that platform, it is important that we have people with the right strategic view around that table. In the Minister's briefing on 30 September, he said that we could end up with a board with everyone sitting on it. That is possibly true, but a board without the guaranteed representation of the three sectors that I have mentioned, which have over 50% of our post-primary population, needs to be attended to.

On Irish-medium education, there is no legislation that currently obliges the education and library boards to adhere to the Good Friday Agreement, which outlines a duty to encourage and facilitate the development of Irish-medium education. Comhairle na Gaelscolaíochta has highlighted the deeply detrimental impact that this has had on the sector in terms of transport, area planning, support for governors etc. It was intended that ESA would have a statutory duty to encourage and facilitate the development of Irish-medium schools by engaging with the sector and giving it true regard, as outlined by article 89 and the Good Friday Agreement. There is no reason why that should not be the case with the Education Authority. The best way to fulfil that is by ensuring that the sector has input at authority level. The duties imposed on the Department under article 89 of the 1998 Order in respect of Irish-medium schools parallels that in respect of integrated schools under article 84 of the 1989 Order. The Department must facilitate Irish-medium and integrated education.

Over 40% of our children attend schools in the voluntary grammar sector. They have no input into these arrangements, and the Minister acknowledged that they did not have a lot of input into area planning. If we take another recent survey on the review of GCSEs and A levels, I do not have the statistics, but we will see that about 60% or 70% of our children who are doing A levels attend grammar schools. Should those schools not have input into the system at a strategic level as well?

Mr Agnew: Will the Member give way?

Mr Rogers: Yes, I will.

Mr Agnew: I do not necessarily disagree with him, but does the Member not accept that there is a difference in the responsibilities that the new board will have in respect of voluntary grammars? They have opted out of coming under its full remit, so there is an argument to be made about why they would have a say on responsibilities on other schools when they are not included, if the Member understands my point.

Mr Rogers: I do not know whether they have opted out or not, but I will go back to my original point: this is a strategic authority that will be the platform for the development of education in the future. All chief players should be at the table. Irish-medium, integrated and voluntary grammars need to be there as well. The Minister says that integrated and Irish-medium have a place at the area planning delivery body. However, this is delivery; it is not about the strategic future of area-based planning.

For this reason, the SDLP will table amendments to address these issues. We hope that they will ease the competition for the four community representatives and help to ensure that they accurately reflect the views of the wider community. Establishing a board that is truly representative of our education system is absolutely crucial. We simply cannot afford to waste anything like the money, time and resources that were fruitlessly spent on the ESA Bill. The Education Bill must ensure that the new authority is equipped to protect and enhance Northern Ireland's education system. This will not be possible without the relevant representation and input at strategic level on the board. The Education Authority must be constituted and supported to ensure a sustainable and efficient education system for all our young people, regardless of which sector they attend.

Mrs Overend: When considering the new Education Bill, it is worthwhile pausing for a moment to reflect on what happened to the previous attempts to reorganise education administration in Northern Ireland, namely the Education Bill introduced by Minister Ruane in 2008 and the subsequent Bill introduced by Minister O'Dowd in 2012.

The first Education Bill was introduced to the Assembly on 25 November 2008 and had 55 clauses and eight schedules. The Bill was to make provision for the dissolution of existing organisations and the transfer of duties, functions, assets, liabilities and staff from those organisations to ESA. Those organisations were the education and library boards, CCEA, the Staff Commission for Education and Library Boards and the Youth Council for Northern Ireland. The Bill also made provisions for the dissolution of CCMS and the transfer of certain duties, functions, assets, liabilities and staff to ESA. It passed its Committee Stage on 30 September 2009, some 11 months later.

The second time around, the Education Bill was introduced to the Assembly on 2 October 2012. That Bill had 69 clauses and eight schedules. The Bill was to set up ESA and replace eight existing organisations, namely the education and library boards, the Staff Commission for Education and Library Boards, the Council for Catholic Maintained Schools and the Youth Council for Northern Ireland. It passed its Committee Stage on 8 April 2013, some six months later.

I am a new member of the Education Committee, and my first obvious question for the current Minister is this: what happened to the previous two Bills? They seem to have disappeared into the ether after Committee Stage. The Ulster Unionist Party took a negative view of both Bills, but we did not oppose just for the sake of it. We wanted to shape and improve the Bills to meet the objective of a streamlined, fit-for-purpose administrative support body for all schools. That opportunity was shot down.

There have been rumours of behind-the-scenes talks to placate various interest groups. However, while the Assembly waited patiently for the Minister to bring the legislation back to the Floor, the ESA Bill has been quietly buried. One is tempted to conclude that the impetus to short-circuit the normal legislative process by skipping the Committee Stage with a standard consultation with educationalists and others is an attempt to stop a proper post-mortem of the Education and Skills Authority. ESA was a Programme for Government commitment. At the last time of checking, the cost of the Education and Skills Authority implementation team from 2005 to the end of March 2014 was over £18 million. Given the current budgetary shambles, that must be a complete embarrassment for the current Education Minister.

The argument has been put forward that the end of the current district council boundaries and the mandate of some council nominees on education and library boards has necessitated the establishment of a single Education Authority to become operational on 1 April next year. It is argued that this deadline cannot be made with the normal Assembly scrutiny and that accelerated passage is therefore needed. However, I strongly feel that we need answers from the Minister with regard to alternative options. Two are mentioned in the explanatory notes to the Bill, but there may be others that we have not had the opportunity to discuss. While I and my party believe that there was an alternative to rushing through imperfect legislation, it seems that others are content with such action by the Education Minister. Maybe there was another back-room deal, Mr Deputy Speaker.

4.45 pm

The Education Minister appeared before the Committee two weeks ago and gave a pre-introductory briefing to the Bill. At this stage, I feel that a lot of questions remain unanswered.

Mr Storey: Will the Member give way?

Mrs Overend: Yes, certainly.

Mr Storey: Sometimes I question the Members in the corner. Does she really believe what she is saying? I expended many years, on behalf of my party, on this issue. The DUP has been clear all along on protecting the controlled sector and giving it its rightful place. Do you honestly believe that my party would accept a back-door deal on something on which it and I had expended well over seven years? Really, does she believe the propaganda that was written for her by the central office of the Ulster Unionist Party?

Mrs Overend: I take offence at that. I have written my own speech, thank you very much, Mr Storey. To be honest, I asked the question; you answer it.

Mr Storey: I gave you the answer: no.

Mrs Overend: I will proceed, if the Member is content. The Bill proposes the abolition of the five education and library boards and the formation of one Education Authority, with a board consisting of eight political members, four representatives from the controlled sector, three from the CCMS and four from the community at large in Northern Ireland. There was an opportunity here to ensure that all sectors in the current education make-up in Northern Ireland were represented on the body. We are disappointed that such sectors as the integrated and voluntary grammar school sectors have no input into the authority. The Minister may say that those sectors could have a place, but, in reality, they have no right to a place and may never sit on the authority.

Numerous types of people could be granted one of the four Northern Ireland community places. They could come from the voluntary grammars, others, the integrated sector or trade union backgrounds. Equally, they could be someone who previously worked in the controlled or Catholic maintained sector. What I am saying is this: there could be sectors of our education system that have no input whatsoever to the running of the authority.

Mr O'Dowd: Will the Member give way?

Mrs Overend: Go ahead.

Mr O'Dowd: A number of Members have referred to the voluntary grammar sector. The voluntary grammar sector has not approached me for a place on the board. Has it approached you for a place on the board?

Mrs Overend: I will let my colleague answer that, because I certainly believe that the sector has been talking to him. The conversation —

Mr Storey: Will the Member give way?

Mrs Overend: Not at the minute, thank you. I challenge the Minister. Conversations are two-way things. Have you spoken to the sector? Maybe the Minister will inform us —

Mr Storey: Will the Member give way on that point?

Mrs Overend: Go ahead.

Mr Storey: Maybe this is something that the Member could try to find out in discussions with the voluntary grammar sector, and maybe she can tell us when she last met the voluntary grammar sector. Would the voluntary grammars prefer to have what is known as the voluntary principle? Members who were previously on the Education Committee will know how precious that issue is to the voluntary grammar schools in the non-denominational and Catholic grammar sectors. Or would they prefer a place on a board on which they have never had a place since the inception of the education and library boards in 1972?

Mrs Overend: I thank the Member for his intervention. The reason why I want this to go to Committee and through proper consultation is so that all these discussions can be had. The Member and his party have voted against letting the Bill go to that stage.

I will proceed. Will the Minister inform us whether he gave consideration to the Drumragh judgement when drafting the Bill and how he has incorporated that view? We know from recent 'Belfast Telegraph' surveys that the majority of people in Northern Ireland want some form of shared education, yet I see no means of furthering that aim in the Bill. Furthermore, we in the Ulster Unionist Party have serious reservations about the appointment of the chair of the authority. We would prefer that he or she be appointed by the members of the board. That has been mentioned by Members who have spoken, and I welcome that fact.

As Mr Lunn said earlier, the Bill is short and simple; he also said that it was not worth fighting for. My colleague Mr Elliott raised a very valid point in the earlier debate today. I would welcome clarification from the Minister on that. Is the Bill a stepping stone to further legislation to reform the education system in Northern Ireland?

I tried to say something earlier and am raising it maybe more appropriately now. Clause 4(3) states:

"The Department may by order make such supplementary, incidental, consequential or transitional provision as it considers necessary or appropriate in consequence of, or for giving full effect to, any provision made by this Act."

Mr Hazzard: Will the Member give way?

Mrs Overend: Not just at the moment, thank you.

The clause continues:

"Any other order under subsection (3) is subject to negative resolution."

I hope that the Minister will comment on any such further provisions relating to the Bill.

As I said, I am very concerned about the lack of consultation. Anyone whom I have spoken to in recent days at primary or post-primary level is unaware that the legislation is being moved through the Assembly at the moment, and it is unfortunate that there is no opportunity to debate options and the merits of each. I was also amazed to read that the Department believes that there is no need for an equality impact assessment. Surely such an authority should undergo such scrutiny.

In conclusion, questions remain unanswered. The Minister mentioned in Committee that a body would be set up to represent the concerns of the controlled sector, yet there is no mention of that in the Bill. Will consideration be given to the establishment of other sectoral bodies? No real figures are stated on the savings to be made with the establishment of the authority and to the cost of its establishment. I hope that the Minister can provide detail on that.

From the outset, the Ulster Unionist Party has accepted the need to streamline the administration of our education system, with the inevitable savings being passed on to the front line. It is, therefore, unfortunate that the Bill is not being awarded appropriate time for debate and scrutiny. It is crucial that the Bill is reflective of the opinions expressed by stakeholders. Mr Deputy Speaker, it seems that the Education Minister feels that the beauty of the Bill is in its shortness and simplicity, but you and I know that beauty is in the eye of the beholder. It has already been said that the Bill is short, but it is no less significant. The Ulster Unionist Party will table amendments and looks forward to the Minister's response.

Mr Lunn: Before I start, I want to comment on the accusation that I said that this was not worth fighting for. I did not say any such thing, and I am sure that Hansard will have reported that. I see Sandra smiling, so perhaps she realises that. What I said was that, at this stage and after seven years, some of us were getting a bit war-weary and would accept almost anything. That does not mean to say that we will not scrutinise the Bill fully and give it the attention that it deserves. That is not quite the same thing as saying that it is not worth fighting for.

It is quite refreshing to be talking in the Assembly about an education Bill, because this is the first time in seven and a half years that we have been able to do that. None of the other Bills made it to the House. Members referred to the 2008 Bill, which was in two parts. It was such an ambitious project that it had to be split, and the Assembly and the Committee were unwilling to accept the first Bill without having had sight of the second. Frankly, we thought that all the bad bits would be loaded into the second Bill.

By the time that we got a draft of the second Bill, the Assembly — in fairness, mostly the unionist side of the fence — decided that it was not worth trying to proceed with it. From memory, the draft second Bill was produced on the eve of recess, and it just drifted away. Unionists decided that it was not acceptable. It was very ambitious and was probably too ambitious at the time. As I think the Chair said, an awful lot of Committee time was spent on it. From memory, we spent about nine months in Committee scrutinising the Bill, and it was committed scrutiny. I believe that the original intention of all parties was to try to produce a final Bill that would be acceptable to the Assembly, but that just did not happen.

The 2012 Bill was a slimmed-down version, and it was mostly acceptable to me and my party.

We did not have too many issues with it, but, this time, a combination of unionism and a very vociferous grammar school campaign by the Governing Bodies Association eventually put a stop to it. It was not helped, frankly, by the heads of agreement, which the Minister referred to. There was a clear contradiction in the heads of agreement and between the heads of agreement and the Bill. The Department constantly denied that there was such a contradiction, but there was. It has been referred to recently and is a fact. That Bill was eventually withdrawn by the Minister, but not before we had to listen to nonsense such as that the ESA Bill would, allegedly, force all schools to teach Irish. That was put to me by somebody who should have known better and could not read the Queen's English. A very learned gentleman — I will not name him or say where he came from — said that ESA would put up the school wage bill by 30%. Utter nonsense, and those are only two examples, but the Bill is history now. It was not going to happen and was withdrawn by the Minister.

The next decision was earlier this year, and it was to reboot, as you put it, Minister, the education boards. Through all of this, the education boards, school employees and the whole structure soldiered on manfully. However, in terms of staff morale, vacancy control, people having to act up and others taking early redundancy, it has been a very trying time for the boards, staff and schools. I pay tribute, as others did, to the way that the people working in these situations have managed to keep the ship afloat and get us to where we are now.

Through all of this, the one common thread — the Minister referred to it — has been that the basic idea was to streamline the operation of the education system. I had never heard, until today, any objection to the principle of combining the boards into one unit. Today is the first time that I have heard that, and it is a pity, but we will now, hopefully, move towards one authority.

The Bill is before us, and the time pressures, as the Minister outlined to the Committee and today, have convinced most of us to grant it accelerated passage. That is where we are now. The only real differences are in the consultation and Committee scrutiny, but we have the opportunity here, without a time limit, to scrutinise this short Bill adequately. So, I do not think that there is any democratic deficit or whatever you call it these days. The Bill can be raked over by anybody who really wants to do that.

We, like others, have said that we have reservations about certain aspects of the Bill, and I will give you a flavour of those. The representation of political members, of which there are to be eight, conveniently excludes one of the parties in government here. I can draw a comparison with the Policing Board, which has 10 members, and the Executive, where a smaller party qualifies for a position. The educational set-up in this country is such that, quite frequently, nationalists and unionists are clearly opposed. To me, that is quite unnecessary at times, but it just the nature of things. It does not do any harm to have what I might call a moderate voice at the table as well, so we will table an amendment along those lines.

We agree with others that the integrated and Irish-medium sectors could do with proper representation. I heard Mr Storey making the point that they have never had that, but that is not a reason for not changing things. Between them, the Irish-medium and integrated sectors represent a fairly significant percentage of the school population. That should be a growing percentage, but that is for another day. It is a good opportunity and a good time to introduce proper representation on this board, so we will table amendments to tinker with the numbers. I think that we will suggest that the board end up with 22 members instead of 20.

I heard the figure of 60 mentioned in reference to the number who serve on boards at the moment. Presumably, that excludes the South Eastern Board. In my time, we have had dealings with that board, and it is the only one I know the figure for. The South Eastern Board alone had 20 members, and I imagine that the figure for the other boards was similar. Therefore, if we could scale the figure down from 80 to 20 or 22, we would not be doing too badly. I remind the Minister and others — one or two in the Chamber will remember — that, in Caitríona Ruane's time, the original proposal for the board of the first ESA was seven members. She was pretty unyielding on that point, but, through various means and discussions, we have finally got to the point at which we have been offered 19 members plus a chairman.

5.00 pm

There is a question about the voluntary grammars. We are inclined to think that, as of right, the grammar school sector needs representation and a place on the board of the authority. The question that has been put to me is whether that position should refer to voluntary grammars or just to grammars. There are plenty of controlled grammars out there, and they make the point of asking who is representing them. They have common interests with the controlled sector generally, but they also have a common interest with the voluntary grammars. If we table an amendment on that basis, it will say "grammars" rather than "voluntary grammars".

We also intend to table an amendment on behalf of, let us say, the integrated and Irish-medium sectors. The 1989 Order, as we all know, places an onus on the Department to "encourage and facilitate". I remind Members that, two or three years ago — I do not have the date to hand — the House voted to call on the Minister of Education:

"to actively promote a system of integrated and shared education". — [Official Report, Bound Volume 58, p92, col 2].

That has never been enshrined in legislation, but maybe it is time. I know also that the 1989 Order refers to the boards as well as the Department, so you might say that what I am going to suggest is unnecessary, but we will probably table an amendment along the lines that the new authority should have an obligation to encourage, facilitate and promote the Irish-language and integrated sectors.

We have come a long way with this legislation. Unfortunately, it has been backward rather than forward. If you look at what was in the original ESA Bill in 2008, then look at what was taken out to produce what I thought was an acceptable Bill in 2012, which was not to be, and then look at what we are left with now, you will see that this Bill is right back to the bare bones. There is bound to be legislation that will come forward in future years to resurrect some of the very good stuff that was in both ESA Bills. Hopefully, we can at least get this Bill through. It is urgent. It is important legislation, even though it is short and simple. It is urgent, and we need to get it done.

I will conclude my remarks on that point. We will return to this at Consideration Stage.

Mr Craig: I support the Bill to create a single authority. It has been a long, long time getting to this point. In fact, it is over six years. In fact, it is so long ago that, when we first started on this journey, I recall that the honourable Member Basil McCrea was not only a member of the Ulster Unionist Party but its education spokesman. That, obviously, was a lifetime ago.

Commenting on the Bill, and on the fact that this Bill is clearly not the ESA Bill, one has to wonder why some others raised that issue. As was pointed by the Minister and the Chair, if there had been universal agreement on the ESA Bill between not only the two main parties but others, this Bill would not be before us. Common sense dictates that.

Mr McCallister: Will the Member give way?

Mr Craig: How others came to the firm conclusion that it was us and others who agreed the way forward on the ESA Bill baffles me. I will give way.

Mr McCallister: If the Member was in his place when I spoke during the debate on accelerated passage, he will know that I drew attention to the fact that an OFMDFM press release from 18 July 2012 announced agreement on about 10 areas, including the Maze and the ESA. It should not be that surprising to anyone in the House that we were under the impression that you guys had all agreed when you announced it in your own press release.

Mr Craig: I thank the honourable Member for his intervention. It was so long ago that even he was a member of the Ulster Unionist Party at that stage. Press releases — what does that actually mean? Let us be honest about it: where is the Maze and where is the ESA Bill?

Mr McCallister: You would like to do a deal —

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): Order.

Mr Craig: Where are a lot of the other issues out there? The simple truth is this: there never was full agreement on ESA. I recall the first ESA Bill coming to the House. I sat as a member of my party's team on it, and we tabled 40-plus amendments because of the level of disagreement. It went nowhere, and we have spent the past six years trying to cobble together something that the entire House could agree on.

I listened with bemusement to what some Ulster Unionist Members had to say on the issue. One Member asked what had happened to it, and the other Member said earlier that his party had killed it off. What is true? Did one kill it off? Was that correct, or is the other one correct to say that they do not know anything about it? Is it really, as I suspect, that they were both wrong in what they said?

Mr Lunn: Will the Member give way?

Mr Craig: The Member always gives way.

Mr Lunn: I just want to clarify things for the Member: that Bill was killed by both parties — the Ulster Unionists and the DUP. The Ulster Unionist Members were not on the Committee at that time, so their memory has gone dim, but it was as much your fault as theirs.

Mr Craig: There you are, Mr Deputy Speaker. I will take the blame on that one and happily accept it.

There is one thing that concerns me in all of this: in that intervening six-year period, approximately £17 million has been spent on the whole ESA process. I hope that the Minister will be able to elaborate on that. That involved civil servants and others in the background working on it. What I would like to know from the Minister is whether that work is transferable to the new authority or whether taxpayers' money has been completely and utterly wasted on that process. That concerns me, given where we are on the budget issue around a lot of this.

Something that I will welcome in the Bill is the fact that, for the first time in a long time — I speak as someone who is under the authority of the South Eastern Board — we will have elected representatives on the authority. I welcome that because that is a massive step forward for someone who comes from the South Eastern Board area. We have been living with commissioners for well over six years, and that has been deeply regrettable. It has led to a democratic deficit in that board area.

I formally admit that I am a member of the board of governors of Laurelhill Community College and Killowen Primary School. I welcome the fact that the authority will be set up and will bring some form of proper support to the controlled sector. For the past six to seven years, I have sat on the board of governors of those schools during that whole process and watched the level of support that boards give to schools go down and down and down every year. It becomes much more difficult for a board of governors to get assistance from those boards. I hope that that will be reversed, and not only do I hope that it will be reversed, I welcome the fact that we have promises here of a new controlled body sector. My only question is why that is not written into the Bill. I listened to the Chair speak on the issue, and I hope that amendments will be tabled on that, because that is one thing that I want to see developed for the controlled sector. I watched with interest as others who already have educational bodies that have a say on the boards, as well as their own sectoral body speaking to the Department for them, spoke. That has always had a negative impact on the controlled sector, and it is good to see that that will be redressed in the Bill.

The chief executive's position interests me, because I see in the Bill that the first chief executive will be appointed by the Minister. I question the logic behind that. What is the board being set up to do? It has employment rights: it should be appointing the chief executive. I appeal to the Minister to think about that. Should it not be an interim appointment for a set period — say, six months — while the board is set up? They can then choose for themselves who becomes the chief executive. That person will become the key individual in the authority in delivering the services on the ground.

While I am talking about the chief executive, who is to be appointed under the Bill, I question what will happen to the five existing chief executives. Will they disappear, or, as I deeply suspect, will they become another layer of the bureaucratic system in Northern Ireland? I would like to hear the Minister's views on that, because it has cost implications for all of us in the House.

I would also like the Minister to clarify what will happen to the support services in the existing five board areas when they come under this new single authority. Is the CASS support that is missing for schools at the minute going to be built up, strengthened and enhanced, or is that a matter that he will leave to the new authority? After six years of fighting, arguing, debating and disagreeing with others over the issue, I welcome the fact that here we stand today, discussing legislation that will finally move the situation forward.

Mr McCausland: I support the Education Bill. I welcome it. After 40 years of the education and library boards, it is time for change, but, up to now, there has been no agreement on what that change might be. Everyone agrees that the system should be streamlined and simplified, but there has been no agreement on how that might be done.

The imperative for change is partly that the current boards, because of the uncertainty, have, in a sense, been withering on the vine and have therefore become increasingly untenable and unsustainable. It is because of that uncertainty that people have taken the opportunity to leave and posts are not being filled. Because they have become unsustainable, it is imperative that we proceed as quickly as possible. Doing nothing is not an option, and the long saga of ESA is now over.

The Bill is a short one, and therefore it is acceptable in the circumstances that it moves forward by accelerated passage, and I will turn to that in a moment. It is not the 2012 Bill, it is not the 2008 Bill, and, as we were reminded by Mr Lunn, we will claim the credit for killing off what was bad legislation.

A number of Members pressed the point, including my colleague Michelle McIlveen and my other colleague, of the controlled sector support body.

It is important that that sector, which is at the very heart of our educational system, has the service and support of such a body. It needs to be properly grounded — that matter has been raised, and we look forward to what the Minister will say in that regard — and it needs to be adequate to meet the needs of that sector. Having served for many years on an education and library board, I know that there was always a perception that the controlled sector was somehow being treated in a second-class or inferior way and that there was not proper equality. The creation of a body to support that sector is a good step forward, but we need to get clarity on how that will be done.

5.15 pm

I noticed that Mr Lunn spoke about the responsibility for advancing and promoting certain sectors. I would have thought that, therefore, there was a responsibility to advance and promote the controlled sector within our education system. Is it not worthy of advancement? Is it not worthy of support? Are those schools not worthy of promotion? I believe in equality. Others may talk about it, but I believe in it. I think that that sector deserves the equality of having a support body that is strong and has a commitment to advancing, promoting and supporting that sector.

Mr Lunn: Will the Member give way?

Mr McCausland: Yes, I will.

Mr Lunn: I hear what Mr McCausland says about the controlled sector. I am delighted that the controlled sector will have a representative body that will be tasked to advance and promote the controlled sector as best it can. The integrated and Irish-medium sectors have had it built into legislation since 1989 that they should receive special treatment. That is based on parental demand and choice. All that we are doing is bringing that formally into the Bill and including the word “promote”, which has never been there before. We are not trying to advance integrated education at the expense of the controlled sector. They all need promotion.

Mr McCausland: I welcome the acceptance that the controlled sector should be supported and advanced. Whatever commitments there are for advancing other sectors should also be available to the controlled sector. If we believe in equality, it should be for everyone.

The other point that I want to make is about savings. It would be helpful if we had some sense of how much duplication will be addressed over the next period. Clearly, with five boards, there is duplication. Whilst it is true that places have not always been filled and there has been some depletion in staffing and, therefore, some savings have probably already been made, it would be helpful to have some clear indication of the assessment of the extent of the savings that will be made by the removal of duplication. There has been some sharing of services amongst the boards, and there was talk of extending that. However, the proposal before us for a new education authority will hopefully create greater savings.

That will mean more money for schools. I take the opportunity to say that, in a whole range of areas, we should be looking at where we can make savings to put the money down to the schools. Quite often, you get a whole plethora of ad hoc initiatives that can soak up money in administration when it should go straight to the schools. Schools should be at the forefront.

It is good that the arrangements will be taken forward incrementally. Our education system is complex, and education is a complex subject. I do not know of any other country that has as many different types of schools as we have in Northern Ireland, and there is a complex architecture. It is also a very sensitive issue. We know that only too well, and we are all aware of the lobbying and the strength and fervency of that from various sectors. It is a sensitive and complex issue, and the approach that is being taken now to merge the five boards into one through this legislation is the right way forward.

Over the last few years, the staff in the boards have worked in very difficult circumstances, and it is right that we express our appreciation for their work in spite of the uncertainty and those difficult situations. Issues still need to be addressed — this is not the final Bill, and we know that amendments will be tabled and issues will be addressed.

Mr McCallister and Mrs Overend both referred to the fact that there are five and a half months until the start of the new year. If we consider the timeline for completing the legislative process, even with accelerated passage, and look at the preparatory work that will need to be done before 1 April 2015, it may be just as well that we have a five and a half months, if that is all to be completed.

The Minister sent a letter to the Chair of the Committee, Miss McIlveen, in which he referred to a programme management board which would be established to identify and oversee key work strands. It would be interesting to hear a little bit more about the timeline for that: when will those various pieces of work be completed? Clearly there are issues around finance, dissolution and the establishment of the controlled sector support body. How are all those things going to be done in that period of five and a half months?

I am happy to support the Bill. I think that it is a good outcome in the circumstances. It is much better than and preferable to what has been previously suggested, and it is for the benefit of the system, the teachers, the children and education in Northern Ireland.

Mr Kinahan: I welcome the Bill. As I said in the debate this morning, we welcome the streamlining of the Bill. Everyone will be glad to know that we are not opposing the Bill at this stage.

I hope that the Committee takes on board the points that I made this morning. We need to get some consultation in, or have some way of finding out what the stakeholders think, over the next few weeks. We need to know the detail on the structures and the organisations, and we need to make sure that there is a proper equality impact assessment of the Bill at the right moment.

I was shocked how ready everyone was this morning to accept accelerated passage without challenging it. It is our duty in this Chamber to challenge and debate matters. I am slightly shocked by some of the comments that were made this morning by Members in attacking each other. I am very pleased with the responses that we got at the end of that debate from the Minister, and I appreciate his promise to work with the Committee on the Bill. It was also good to hear who he had engaged with in the last two years. That is the whole point of the Assembly: to ask questions and find out.

Our Minister, and I have it from the horse's mouth, opposed accelerated passage. It may not be in the minutes, but either you were not listening or — sorry, we are not allowed to use “you”. People were not listening, but I have had it from two or three sources, so I say that just to make it absolutely clear.

I suggested the three-board model because various people suggested the three-board model to me, and I think we should have been discussing it. Again, that is what we are here for. We should accept compromises, and I was glad to hear that the Minister will accept them. Some suggestions for amendments are coming through, and it is absolutely right that we raise them today and next week, and find a joint way forward.

I am appalled by the rather disgraceful personal comments from the Chair of the Committee. I will not stoop so low. The proof is in the pudding, if you read the writing throughout the last few years. I will leave it at that.

The three issues that I want to deal with today are the selection of the chair, the make-up the board and the need for a review clause.

As far as the selection of the chair goes, I understand that the Bill says that the chair will be appointed by the Department, but will that competition be open to everyone? Will it follow proper Government guidelines and be an open and transparent process? Other Members have raised that matter today. What qualifications does the Minister want that chair, or the chief executive, to have? In his brief to the Committee, the Minister indicated that the chair will initially be appointed as an interim measure and, as the Chair of the Committee said, we want to make sure that that interim is not five or 10 years. Will the Minister clarify how long he sees that provision being in place?

Let us move on. We talk about the 12; if the Minister is not going to appoint the chair, then the number of places on the committee is 12, not 11. Will the Minister clarify whether he would make that the case if we agree?

Mr Hazzard: I thank the Member for giving way. The Member's colleague stated that she would support the right of the integrated sector and the voluntary grammars to have membership. Does the Ulster Unionist Party also accept the right of the Irish-medium sector to be on the board?

Mr Kinahan: Thank you very much. You will hear me address that further on in my speech, but the answer is yes.

Given that we have one board, if the Bill goes all the way, there will be no comparisons between boards; that makes it even more important that the Department does not appoint the chair. You already have the other controls, so let the board appoint its own chair.

Moving on to the make-up of the board, we accept the political appointments but feel that we should not prevent practising educationalists from being appointed to it. In the previous Bill that was the case, so maybe the Minister will look at varying the guidelines so that we can get people who are working in the system onto the board.

If we consider this piece of legislation not to be an interim measure and accept that there will be an impasse and lack of action into the future, we need to think through what will happen to it in the long term. We seem to agree on the future being shared education, even though we all seem to have completely different ideas on it and very different intentions of how to put it in place. The Ulster Unionist Party wants to see it happen, and the present sharing out of the 11 posts gives CCMS and the controlled sector most of the say: it does not include the integrated, voluntary or Irish sectors. In the Committee briefing the Minister indicated that a controlled sector body would be set up. Will the Minister promise that that will be the case? Will it definitely be funded and set up? If so, by when?

(Mr Principal Deputy Speaker [Mr Mitchel McLaughlin] in the Chair)

Given that we will have a sectoral body for the controlled sector and that we still have the CCMS, will the board be deemed to be unfair if it does not have members from the Governing Bodies Association and the other sectors? It would seem so. We want to work for the future and make sure that we have a board that represents everybody. We need to have voluntary sector representation. I did speak to the voluntary sector, for those who were querying whether I did or not, last night; I also spoke to them as soon as we knew that the Bill was coming up to find out their views. It is the job of all of us to talk to various people, and I expect everyone else to do the same. They would like positions on the board, and maybe, as others have said, the Minister should talk to them rather than wait for them to come to him.

According to the student numbers that I was given for 2013-14, you have 118,000 in controlled, 117,000 in maintained, 21,000 in integrated and 47,000 in voluntary. That indicates that we need to give all the sectors their share.

We in the Ulster Unionist Party intend to bring forward amendments, although it would be wise to talk to the other parties, as we all have different ways of taking this forward.

Lastly, I want to raise the need for a review clause. If the Bill remains in place for a long time, we need to put a review clause in place with regard to the membership of the committee. It might be, depending on what happens at the end of the week or in meetings in future, that we need to change the number of political appointees. However, that is not what I am concentrating on now: we need to put something in place that looks at the proportions of pupils in types of schools so that if, in 10 years, the integrated sector's proportion has doubled, we should consider doubling its representation on the committee. We need to find a formula and find a way forward. That would be the right thing to do.

I was very pleased to hear the Chair of the Committee praising the whole of the education sector and all its hard work. It is absolutely right that we all praise the sector: we put them through a hard time. We all have our strong beliefs.

We support what is happening today, and we wait to see what the amendments bring next week.

Mr Newton: This is a relatively short Bill: short but nonetheless important. The Bill indicates that this is a good day for Northern Ireland, its education system and the pupils who ultimately benefit from it. It has taken us a long time to get here, and it has been a difficult passage.

Even though I was not on the Education Committee for all the time during which ESA was being discussed, I could not help but be involved in ESA and the concerns that were expressed. The Bill was controversial and was debated on a number of occasions. It was much criticised and pored over, line by line and word by word. There was much anxiety about the Bill, certainly on this side of the Chamber, but it was not seen as being a practical solution to where we wanted to be in education.

5.30 pm

We have moved on considerably. The word “dissolution” is used in the Bill, and maybe that is for technical or legal reasons. “Amalgamation” sounds much friendlier to me. The Bill refers to the “dissolution” of the education and library boards and the creation, via the Education Bill, of an Education Authority.

There are those of us who definitely welcome the board for controlled schools, which we see as a positive step in the right direction. Over the years, the controlled sector has been treated rather shabbily, and, unlike some sectors, has not been seen as having a privileged position. The Bill needs to bring equality into the education system, and that board needs authority and responsibility to be brought to it.

On a number of occasions, I raised my concerns with the Minister about the two boards that impact me directly. Mr Craig referred to the board that operates in his area, where the Belfast Education and Library Board operated for many years without any political input whatsoever. The Minister eventually got around to addressing that issue, but it created a gap that remained for a long time, when constituents could not raise issues, and politicians and councillors could not bring issues into the heart of the debate in the Belfast Education and Library Board.

Mr Craig referred to the fact that the South Eastern Education and Library Board was run by, I think, three very nice people. I have no doubt that they were professional in their own way. They were appointed by the Minister, however, and were there to do the Minister’s bidding, if I may use that expression. They were certainly not responsible to any members of the public, the parents or the teaching staff, and access to them was very limited. I am sure that they did their best and that their intentions were worthy, but there was no accountability from the commissioners.

We are moving towards the Bill, but there have been indications that we are not there yet, and other things have still to be settled. It does appear, however, that the groundwork has now been done, and the Bill will be good for education. It will provide stability in the educational system and opportunities for parents in that it will give them access to the policymakers and decision-makers. The Bill will help pupils, who, hopefully, will benefit from the creation of the Education Authority and the access that will become available. Northern Ireland will have a modern, responsive structure to take education forward.

There are direct outputs from the Bill. I suppose that it is right to say — again, it is more pertinent in the east of the city and the East Belfast constituency — that area planning will be a significant feature. Moving to the single body potentially allows for better area planning. No one can argue against area planning. It is the right thing to do, but, so often, it has let down the schools and pupils whom it is supposedly there to serve.

If we move forward, and we will, area planning has to have a number of factors. It has to have openness and transparency, and it must include meaningful consultation. You know, Minister, that, often, when board representatives come to speak to a school perceived to be under threat of closure, they do not come to seek a way forward or an innovative solution, they come to say that the school is closing and that there will be a period of consultation on its closure. More innovative thinking is needed, and there will be that opportunity as we move the Bill forward.

It has been well rehearsed, and I want to pay tribute to you, Minister, for a decision that you took concerning east Belfast.

Mr O’Dowd: I will have to listen to this one.

Mr Newton: I know.

The parents and teachers involved in Dundonald High School were engaged in a consultation process that adopted the approach that I outlined. It took the Minister to make a decision to keep the school open. I believe that the closure of Dundonald High School, and the context in which it was being brought about, needed to be looked at more innovatively. At least, the potential to keep it open needed a more innovative approach. Not only was an approach to keep it open needed but guidelines had to be set for how it could be kept open, whereas, when the board came to consult, it really was about closure.

I could go on about Orangefield High School, but we do not need to rehearse that because we have already been there. The fact is that you were challenged, Minister, with a judicial review on the potential merger of Newtownbreda High School and Knockbreda High School, the approach to which was an example of the area planning system letting down the potential of the schools.

There are other examples that we can learn from. A decision by the previous Minister to merge Beechfield and Mersey Street primary schools brought about the creation of a new build, Victoria Park Primary School. The plan was to build a 12-classroom school, when all the figures said that a 14-classroom school was needed. Only after consultation with parents, teachers and the board of governors, along with political input, was it decided not to open a brand new school with 12 classrooms and two Portakabins in the playground but to build a 14-classroom primary school. Again, area planning was letting us down, and it was letting down the pupils and teachers .

During your time at Committee, Minister, I raised the need to manage the change. Someone said that we should pay tribute to the Belfast Education and Library Board, the South Eastern Education and Library Board and the other boards and their staff, who, under difficult circumstances, have done a good job. I think that someone earlier referred to them “holding it together”. We need to pay tribute to those staff members. As they move into the difficult situation of change, that change needs to be professionally managed. It needs to be done in such a way that there is a good communication system with all those who will be impacted on by the change. It needs to be seen that they are involved in the outcomes of the creation of the new body. We also need to protect them, Minister.

Situations cannot be arrived at in which it is extremely disadvantageous for someone to move from an education and library board to another body. The staff have delivered for us in the past, and they deserve our thanks for that.

Mrs Overend referred to there being a lot of disquiet. I hope that her disquiet will be overcome. During her opportunity to question you, Minister, at the Committee, Mrs Overend opened her remarks by saying:

“A lot of the questions have been covered”.

She appeared to be content with the questions that had been covered. She did not raise any issues. Her only cause for —

Mrs Overend: Will the Member give way?

Mr Newton: I will.

Mrs Overend: That is unbelievable. I was stating a fact. There were a number of members called before me, and so a number of questions had been covered. I did not say that all of them had been covered. That is rather petty.

Mr Newton: If you say that a lot of the questions have been covered, and you then do not raise anything about those questions, you assume that the Member was content with the answers given. I think that that is a reasonable assumption to make.

She then raised only a question about the structure — I will quote from Hansard — which was:

“How many places are there?”

Her second question was:

“Will the unions apply to that other sector?”

Mrs Overend then said:

“There are only four places, so it is quite limited. Is there room to manoeuvre around the numbers?”

She continued:

“But it has to be representative, and that is key.”

I do not get in those questions all the concerns that were raised by Mrs Overend today, but it remains to be seen.

We are in a different place because of the diligent work that was carried out by the Committee over the past number of years on the ESA Bill. That diligent work will have to be carried on as we finalise the Bill. I pay tribute to former Committee members, and I hope that we can continue the diligence of that work in the coming days.

Mr Sheehan: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. It has already been stated that this is a short, simple and straightforward Bill. I intend my contribution to the debate to be in the same vein.

It is a bit like the individual who wants to buy himself a Mercedes but, when he looks at his bank statement, realises that he can afford only a Ford.

Although it is disappointing initially, when he thinks about the clapped-out old jalopy he is driving, which is coming up for MOT in five and a half months, maybe a Ford is not such a bad idea after all. That is the situation we are in. We could not get over the line with ESA, but we have been through everything on it. We have been through all the details. Trevor Lunn said today that we had had six or seven years going through every single dot and crossing every t. We have covered it inside out. We could not get agreement, unfortunately. In my view, it would have been a much better, more adventurous option and one that would have served our children in schools much better than the current model. However, the current model is not bad; it is better than what we have.

Remember, what has triggered this is the reform of local government. The five education and library boards were defined by local government boundaries. Legislation is required to ensure that the education administration is compatible with local government reform. If it is not compatible, it could be open to legal challenge.

I understand that Members want to ensure that there is proper scrutiny. I agree with that. There should be proper scrutiny of any legislation that goes through, and a Sinn Féin Minister should be subject to as much scrutiny as any other Minister, whether they are from the DUP, the Ulster Unionists, Alliance, the SDLP or anybody. It is right that there is proper scrutiny, but we have scrutinised every aspect of education administration over the past six or seven years. It is time to move on.

Some people want to set themselves up as an opposition. Fair enough, I have no difficulty with that, but I have difficulty with people introducing, at the very last minute, issues that are not thought out and have never been raised before and that we hear about for the first time here in the Chamber. The issue of three boards rather than five — that is the first I have heard of that issue, which was raised here today.

The Assembly gets a lot of bad publicity in the media about politicians bickering. I do not always agree with that, and I think that the media focus on disagreements between various parties. I suppose that is the job that the media have, but there is a difference between bickering and standing on points of principle around certain issues. All of us will do that at certain times, but what will get us more bad publicity than anything is politicians in the Chamber bringing forward silly arguments by saying that this has not been thought through or properly scrutinised, when we all know that it has been. Scrutiny is good and opposition is good, but only when it is done properly, and it is not being done properly. I understand that John McCallister has a private Member's Bill on providing an opposition here coming up in the future. Maybe he feels that, on that basis, he has to oppose everything. Maybe the Ulster Unionists think that they have to oppose everything. That is not good politics, and it is certainly not good publicity for the Assembly.

I agree with Robin Newton that this is a good day for the Assembly. The groundwork has been done on the Bill, and it will be to the benefit of our young people and children in schools right across the North. That is what we should be thinking of: what is best for our education system and the children in our schools and how we can best administer that education system so that it benefits the children in the schools.

A single board will overarch the issue of compatibility with local government boundaries. It is argued that the new body should bring much of the £185 million savings over 10 years that it was calculated would accrue from the ESA Bill. I am always sceptical about figures, particularly when they are projected over such a long period. I have no reason to doubt them; I am just always sceptical. Notwithstanding that, it is clear that, if we do not make the change now and end up with a one-board model rather than the current five, new investment will have to be put into those boards. Those boards are the old jalopy that is chugging along. They have been limping along now for the past number of years. If we do not get this Bill through, they will need significant new investment. Let us be clear: the service delivered by a single board will not differ from the service that is being delivered by the boards as they stand.

I accept that there are issues that probably need to be resolved around the make-up of the board and who should sit on it. I certainly think that the integrated and Irish-medium sectors, given the legislative underpinning that requires the Minister to encourage and facilitate those sectors, should have a role in the board. I am not opposed to the voluntary grammar sector having a role either. We should try to be as inclusive as possible so that sectors do not feel that they are being excluded and can all feel that they have a voice in the new set-up.

Mr B McCrea: Will the Member give way?

Mr Sheehan: Yes, I will give way.

Mr B McCrea: I just wonder on that point because I think that the Minister has said that, if we could expand the number of places to 30, we could probably fill those as well. Lots of people think that they should have representation on the board. The board may become unwieldy. Is the Member absolutely certain that we need sectoral representation on the board at all? Do we need people with vested interests trying to fight their corner, or should we look at a different way of doing things, which was the intention of the original ESA Bill? I just wonder whether we really have to make the board so big that everybody is on it.

Mr Sheehan: I certainly accept the argument that, if you make a board too big, it can become unwieldy. The model of the Policing Board was mentioned in the debate. It has 19 members and is not particularly unwieldy. It works quite well sometimes. Other times, it does not work so well. I would say that, if there were 13 members on the board, it would be the same. If there were 20 or 30 members on the board, you would have a similar outcome. Sometimes it works, and sometimes it does not, irrespective of how many are on it.

On the issue of whether there should be sectoral bodies involved in it, these are the people who have an interest in the education of our children, and these are the people who have a stake in the education of our children. It is only fair that people who are so closely involved in the education of our children should have a stake in this and that we should be inclusive rather than exclusive.

I am sure that Members will table amendments to the Bill as they see fit. As it stands now, I give it my support.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: If someone can get their telephone under control, we will move on.

Mr Agnew: I declare an interest as a director of NICIE. I suppose that, in the context of the Education Bill, it is a good opportunity for me to pay respect and indeed congratulations to my former teacher Michelle McIlveen, Chair of the Committee for Education. The House will already know that I had another illustrious teacher, Mr Sammy Wilson. He still gives me lectures, but I do not have to listen now, at least. [Laughter.] I am sure that both my former teachers in the DUP are very proud of what I have become.

The Education Minister has described the Bill as the path of least resistance. He said that no one loses and that it is the minimum legislation. We were told by a number of the Members who spoke that this is a good day for Northern Ireland's education system. If that is the case, we have set the bar pretty low. The Minister also referred to and to some extent criticised those who point the finger. I will point the finger. I point the finger at the Executive. This is a democracy, and you are the Government. If this is the best that you can bring forward, you have failed. There should be collective responsibility. We heard Members from parties that are on the Executive — maybe that is who the Minister was referring to — criticise the Bill and say that they had very little to do with it. I am sure that Mr McCallister will echo my comment that, if you have a Minister in the Executive and you say that you have no say in the Government on something as important as the Education Bill, I have to query what role you play. So I do point the finger at the Executive and the Executive parties. They have failed to bring forward an imaginative and progressive Education Bill, something other than what the Minister himself describes as minimal legislation.

An opportunity has been missed, in the Bill and in area-based planning. One of the few things in education that the DUP and Sinn Féin seem to agree on is the need to work towards a single education system. It will not happen overnight; I think that everyone would accept that. However, we are not even taking steps in that direction, either through the Bill or through area-based planning. We have a segregated system that is crumbling under its own inefficiency, and all that we have done is seek to prop it up. This legislation continues, as has been acknowledged by most, what is already in place. Area-based planning and so-called shared education has sought to find imaginative ways to keep an unviable system economically viable.

Members mentioned the membership of the new authority. I add to that that there is a need to have a voice from the integrated sector. There is a legal duty to facilitate and encourage integrated education. I agree with Mr Lunn that perhaps it should be a duty to promote. To me, that is a strategic duty, and the Minister has stressed that the Education Authority is a strategic body. The integrated sector should have at least a say in it, because, to some extent, that duty runs contrary to the interests of some of the other proposed board members.

A point that has not been made is that the new body will be a significant employer in our public sector. I have seen a figure of 35,000 staff under the new body, and the Minister can confirm whether that is correct. We have an opportunity in the Bill to set an example of how the public sector takes forward employment. It should be written in the Bill that the new authority will be a living wage employer. We hear a lot in the Assembly and in wider UK debate about making work pay. It is important that work pays for those on the lowest rung of our public bodies. In the legislation, we have an opportunity to set an example in that regard. Given that there is an issue around whether the Minister appoints the chief executive or the board does, the issue of the chief executive's pay will be raised. That should be set. There should be a maximum ratio between the lowest paid on the board and the highest paid, who, presumably, will be the chief executive. We can perhaps salvage something that will be transformative through the Bill in what is otherwise uninspiring legislation.

6.00 pm

Chris Hazzard referred to educational excellence. That is an ambition that we all have. We may have different views on how we get there, but I do not think that the Bill moves us much in that direction. I do not think that it is harmful in that regard, but I do not think that this is the Bill or the vehicle. If we can see some efficiency savings going into front line education, that will be welcomed, but we have taken six or seven years to get here at an expense of £17 million. We were told that ESA would produce estimated savings of £180 million over 10 years. Whether or not those figures were accurate, it was, at least, something that we could look towards. I have yet to hear what, if any, savings will be made from this. Will we recoup the £17 million? Will we see efficiencies? Will we see more money directed into front line education services?

This is minimal legislation that, we have all been told, must be agreed, but it is clear that what the Executive have brought forward does not move much forward. As I have said before, we are told that our education sector will welcome the Bill, when, in reality, all it will welcome is the end of a long, tired old saga.

Mr B McCrea: A long, long, long time ago, I was a member of the Ulster Unionist Party. As Mr Craig pointed out, I was education spokesman. I listened to Miss McIlveen say, I think, that she had had the benefit of many UUP spokesmen and many bits of advice and was singularly unimpressed by any of them or anybody who had delivered them. I am happy to stand here and put my academic background in the measure against colleagues opposite. I am happy to take on the debate. I will not be intimidated. If any of you wish to take me on, I am happy to have the debate. That is the purpose of the Chamber and this part in the proceedings.

If Members opposite would like to have a copy of Hansard, I will send it to them, as the record shows where the opposition to the ESA Bills that were brought forward originally came from. Let us be honest: you cannot get a Bill on the Floor if it does not have agreement from the Executive. Those Bills were opposed because they were wrong.

When I look at this document, there are three phrases that stand out. The first is “the minimum required”; the second is “expediency”, which Mr Hazzard used; and the third is “a strategic body”, which is what the Minister hoped that this would be. Yet I can read the official record of 30 September, when the Minister outlined his proposals for accelerated passage, and he said:

“In only two respects does the Bill provide some element of significant change.”

Mr Agnew, who spoke before me, said that this is a fairly limited proposal and it is not a good day for education or for the Assembly. I concur. This is the minimum. In fact, the Minister said:

“That is the extent of the Bill. Despite the new nomenclature and the two necessary changes that I have summarised, the Bill is best and most accurately understood as the minimum legislation required to create a single board”.

You can argue about whether we have to do it by accelerated passage or not. I voted against that earlier today because I do not think that it is a good idea in principle, but I do understand the reasoning.

The most important thing that I would like the Minister to address is to be found on page 10 of the Official Report of the Committee meeting of 30 September. I do not think that it has been covered in this debate. The Minister said:

“As the body establishes itself and works through the urgent matters of staffing etc and consolidates its position, I think it only right and proper that one of the next steps would be to look at the future and consider how it sees education being delivered in the future.”

This is the next step over which we have no control. Earlier, Mr Rogers was adamant about bringing forward amendments because he thinks that the Bill does not go far enough; he wants to make it an ESA Bill. I am concerned that the provisions put forward in the Bill are simple because we could agree on nothing else.

There is no agreement. There is no shared vision. There is no trust. There is no ability to work together. All there is is fear. I fear for, amongst others, the voluntary grammar sector, the controlled grammar sector, the integrated sector and the Irish-medium sector. The problem is that these people are left out of a consultation on what is a fundamental part of our civic society. We have not really addressed that issue; we have not actually got a resolution. I understand that you have to move forward on certain issues because of timescales, but we have not really fixed the problem. All that we have done is the minimum that is required.

There are a number of issues, and I recognise that I have little influence on these debates in terms of votes. All that I can do is raise with you concerns that I, as a stakeholder, would raise. It is not just the bodies that have a stake. I have a stake. It is my future. It is my children's future. It is our community's future. I am concerned that we are not addressing these issues properly.

Some people mentioned the Belfast Education and Library Board and how it went on without political representation for quite some time. Mr Newton brought that up. We will come to the South Eastern Board, because I know that Mr Lunn has a point on that. Maybe that was not a bad thing. Was it a bad thing that people were able to make decisions based on fact, policy and strategic vision? We got a great litany of what happens when politics gets involved in these decisions. It is really difficult to close a school in your area.

Mr Lunn mentioned the South Eastern Education and Library Board. I seem to recall — Mr Lunn might correct me as he is perhaps more expert on this matter than me — that it was the DUP that voted that body out of existence because it would not agree a budget. That is a pretty interesting position for Members on that side of the House because they are now —

Mr Weir: Will the Member give way?

Mr B McCrea: I will make the point and let you come in in a minute, Mr Weir.

This was where people made a point and said, “We are not going to agree a budget.” Apparently that is an OK tactic if it is a South Eastern Education and Library Board but not if you are an Executive or Assembly. That is what caused that place to go and why we have had no political representation.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I am struggling to understand the relevance of this point to what is before us. If it is part of the context and you are coming to the point, I encourage you to do that. You have taken an intervention, and I will not stop that. However, can we stay focused on why we are discussing this matter today?

Mr Weir: I cannot guarantee relevance, but I will try to be at least succinctly irrelevant in responding to the point that has been raised. The plug that was pulled on the South Eastern Board was pulled by a direct rule Minister at a time of direct rule. I cannot remember whether or not the Member was involved in politics at that stage. However, as with all the boards, the board had a 60% majority of unelected members. It is inaccurate to level that at any particular party. At that stage, efforts were made to try to protect those with special needs in particular. The Member should reflect on what he has said on the history of the South Eastern Board. It is not accurate, and I speak as someone who was a member of the South Eastern Board at one stage.

Mr B McCrea: It is interesting that that is one of the supposedly succinct interventions from the Member, but somewhere in the middle of that was the statement that this education and library board was run for quite some time with no political intervention.

I will go back to your point, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker. As I understand it, part of the Bill concerns the removal of education and library boards to turn them into a single education and library board, and another aspect is the membership of that body. That is why I think that my reference to the Belfast Education and Library Board and the South Eastern Education and Library Board is relevant to the discussion.

I do not wish to detain Members unnecessarily, other than to say that this is the minimum required. This is a political fudge; this is not a great day for Northern Ireland or the Assembly; and this is all we can achieve, which is not very much. Is there any need to have 20 people on the board? I asked Mr Sheehan why it needed to be so big. Do we want it to be even bigger? Do we want it to have 30 members? When we try to get more and more people on a body, the danger is that it does not get agreement. The fundamental problem with this debate is that there is no agreement, no trust and no way forward.

We will look at that when the Bill is being scrutinised. It is a very limited Bill, but I still worry that it is the Trojan Horse that will see the destruction of many of our successful schools, and I will not stand for it.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: As this is the first debate in which the Assembly will hear from Ms Sugden, I remind the House that it is the convention that a maiden speech is made without interruption.

Ms Sugden: Thank you, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker. I am sure that many Members will be glad to see me, an independent representative, rise in my place, as it suggests that this long day is nearly over. Coleraine, however, is a long drive, I have a Committee meeting in the morning, we could make the most of the evening, I have a lot to say, and I am pretty sure that, on this opportunity of my maiden speech, what I say does not have to be relevant. [Laughter.] I had hoped to make my maiden speech before now, but I will admit that these past few months have been a challenge and a steep learning curve for me in a role that was very unexpected. I assure the House that, as an MLA, I am very capable of holding the Northern Ireland Executive to account and doing the job that we are here to do for the best interests of my constituents.

If anything, these past few months have been invigorating for me. I have been given a unique opportunity to serve the people of East Londonderry and to be their advocate and champion. I pay tribute to my constituents, because, indirectly, I have been given a mandate to serve them, and I will honour that as best I can. I am grateful for their support during my short time in office.

The passing of my predecessor, my boss and, most of all, my dear friend David McClarty was heartbreaking. In life and death, David was and remains an important influence in my life. He was my mentor, he was my guide, and he is the politician whom I would be honoured to become. I am privileged to sit here after him. The reaction to his passing was comforting, because Coleraine — in fact, Northern Ireland — loved him as much as I did. As an independent politician, David did not move political mountains, but he achieved much more, because he connected with the people whom he represented and helped them. As politicians — as elected representatives — that is one thing that we should all strive to do. All politics is local, and political parties in the House would do well to remember that for the benefit of Northern Ireland.

I move now to the Bill. I will not stand here and reiterate what other Members have said in support of the Bill, because I struggle to add anything else. As was said, it is short, simple and uninspiring — a Ford, if you like — and a matter of process to tidy up an RPA legal framework. In other words, it is a limited Bill. It further demonstrates the inability of our Executive to legislate effectively without throwing their toys out of the pram or making deals behind closed doors.

Yesterday, I abstained from voting for our new Speaker. I was frustrated, and I was not going to vote for a deal that I did not make. Mr Principal Deputy Speaker, I have no issue with you sitting in the Chair. You seem to be quite well versed in the role, but I do have an issue when two parties make deals behind closed doors, forgetting the mandate of other elected representatives in the House. Had that deal been made with the consensus of everyone, you might be sitting here as Speaker — well, that is unlikely.

6.15 pm

I will take this opportunity, because I can, to remind all political parties moving into the new talks to be mindful of the position that the people of Northern Ireland put you in. Be mindful of how far we have come, because that is important, and take responsibility for the power that you hold. I am 28 years old. I live for Northern Ireland. I live for politics in Northern Ireland. I would love to bring my generation with me. I want my generation to feel the same way about this country and Administration as I do. You know, it is OK to drive a Ford, but I would rather drive a Porsche, and I think that that is what we should aim for.

I will support the Bill, so that box is ticked. However, I note, as others noted, the lack of representation from groups other than the controlled sector. That was particularly apparent when I requested a meeting with our Minister of Education and he refused, saying that it was not necessary, and directed me to my education and library board. Minister, I went to someone at my education and library board, and he directed me back to you. These people do not have anyone to lobby for them, and, in my position as an elected representative for East Londonderry, I have tried to do that.

All of our children deserve to have the best education, but they can have that only if they have someone to voice their concerns. I believe that they should be included in such a board. Maybe we should move forward with that.

As I reiterated, the Bill will go through as a matter of process, and that is fine, but it represents a shortfall in our government. We have the potential to do so much more, and I look forward to a time when we are able to do that.

Mr McCallister: Let me be the first to congratulate Ms Sugden on her maiden speech. I declare an interest. My wife is a teacher in the employment of the South Eastern Education and Library Board, and she is also from east Londonderry originally. In case you try to stop me speaking, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker, I voted for you yesterday. [Laughter.] I also voted for Mr Dallat and for Mr Beggs, just to cover all the bases.

The Minister claimed that the Bill is likely to bring savings of between £180 million and £185 million. When he responds to the debate, I would like some detail on the foundation of that claim. That is a lot of money to claim as savings, and it is over quite an extended period. The Minister had to admit to the Committee that the business case for the Bill and this model of reform had not been submitted to DFP. I am sure that he will want to comment on when he expects that business case to be ready. Are we likely to pass the legislation before the business case has even been presented to DFP?

The Minister claimed that this model will continue without any further reduction in posts. He will be aware that, in preparation for ESA, the education and library boards shed more than 400 jobs. Considering that the Bill does not introduce any radical reform — rather, it is a reshuffling of the pack — I ask the Minister where these savings, without further significant reforms, are likely to come from. That brings me to the point that, at times, when listening to the debate, I felt that we almost seemed to have two Bills: one that the DUP thinks that it is talking about; and one that Sinn Féin thinks that it is talking about. I am not quite sure that we are all talking about the same Bill.

The Minister claims that he wants to give certainty to staff. As others have said — I will reiterate it — staff have been treated abysmally by the entire Executive for years now. We want the Bill to be more than just a stopgap, yet they are going to find significant savings over the next 10 years. It is hard to see where those will come from. If the Minister could give more clarity on the savings and the business case in his summing-up, I would be very grateful.

I ask DUP and UUP colleagues where the Bill leaves their stated policy. Perhaps, as Mr Craig would say, press releases do not mean anything. The stated policy of the First Minister, Peter Robinson, and, I am fairly certain, Mike Nesbitt on numerous occasions has been to move to a single education system. The Bill appears to me to consolidate the divide that they claim to hate so much. In fact, Mr McCausland, in his contribution, was almost congratulating himself on getting a place for the sector that he is most passionate about, but where does that sit with the move to a single education system?

I believe that the Minister is right in his approach to a shared education system. I think that it is a more realistic outcome of where we will get to, but it is important to have financial support for the controlled sector body in there. I do not quite understand how you can have a single education system that the DUP and the UUP talk about, only then suddenly to want all these sectoral interests, unless you have completely abandoned that approach. Or was it more about having a dig at the Catholic Church?

I have something to say to the Alliance Party about integrated education. There is a lack of representation for the integrated sector in the Bill, and, let us face it, the Alliance Party probably considers itself the custodian of the integrated sector. I am amazed that it is allowing the Bill to pass by accelerated passage without giving the integrated sector, or the Irish-medium sector for that matter, an opportunity to come before the Committee, speak and present its concerns on the Bill. I am disappointed with that approach, and I will reiterate my concerns about accelerated passage.

We are hearing arguments that this is a short and simple Bill. If it is short and simple, why do we not do the proper process? We spent £17 million or £18 million on a shadow form of ESA that never became relevant. Surely we could do the preparatory work that Mr McCausland talked about while letting the Bill go through the Assembly processes. It is right and proper that the Bill should have gone through Committee.

I will pick up on some of the points that colleagues made. There was talk of minimal legislation but delivering maximum ESA savings. Is that a viable position to hold? Is that likely to happen? Michelle McIlveen, as Chair of the Committee, talked about the maximum amount of the budget going to children and front line services. The Executive should be striving for that.

Mr Hazzard made a point about educational excellence. I do not think that you will find any disagreement from anyone that we want to see excellence in every school in the land. We all strive for that and want it for our own family and children. We should want to extend that to all our constituents and all our citizens.

Mr Rogers talked about road maps and certainty, but the problem with the Bill is that I am not quite sure that it provides the level of certainty, because it seems that we will need significant reform to go with this if we are to build up that level of savings. If we get this legislation wrong, it will not benefit anyone. If the Bill does not receive the proper scrutiny — the valued scrutiny that Miss McIlveen and the Committee could provide — I do not think that that would be good for anyone, let alone our representative democracy.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Dallat] in the Chair)

I take issue with Mr Craig's point that, somehow, this was never supported by the DUP. He cast up that, because it was so long ago, I was still a member of the UUP. We have been doing the review of public administration for so long that Nelson McCausland and Peter Weir were members of the UUP at the start. It is so long in the grind of getting through this.

Mr Weir: Will the Member give way?

Mr McCallister: He is clearly going to make another very relevant point.

Mr Weir: I obviously did not reach the dizzy heights of deputy leadership of the said party, but, whereas the accusation would be true of me at the time of the introduction of RPA, I urge him to withdraw the scurrilous accusation against Nelson McCausland who, at that stage, was not a member of the Ulster Unionist Party. [Laughter.]

Mr McCallister: It is good to hear that Nelson got out slightly earlier than Peter.

Mr Storey: And yourself.

Mr McCallister: Yes; and myself. [Laughter.] Mr Craig's comments highlight — as I keep warning, with all the charity that I can muster, my former colleagues in the UUP — that this is why you should not do unionist unity: you cannot believe a word that they tell you. A press release in July 2012 stated:

"Following a series of meetings and discussions the First Minister and the deputy First Minister are pleased to announce agreements across a range of policy areas and initiatives that will be taken forward over the course of the next number of weeks."

Jointly, they went on to say that they were delighted to make announcements on a wide range of initiatives, including the Maze/Long Kesh Development Corporation; the Victims Commissioner; the Ilex chair; the investment strategy for Northern Ireland; the cohesion, sharing and integration strategy — that is going well; and the Education and Skills Authority. Now let us read what the press release says on it:

"The discussions on the content of the ESA bill have been successfully concluded and the bill will be brought to the next meeting of the Executive in order to commence its legislative passage in the Assembly."

Although we might have established that Mr McCausland was not a member of the UUP when RPA started, he was a member of the Executive when that press release went out. He was the Minister for Social Development, and Mr Storey, the now Minister, was Chair of the Education Committee. A Bill cannot leave the Executive if OFMDFM does not give its approval, so this idea that the DUP somehow never supported the ESA Bill, never had its hands anywhere near it and would not be seen to support it has to be an absolute myth. You cannot —

Mr Storey: Will the Member give way?

Mr McCallister: Mr Storey will maybe confirm that he knows because he is bound to have been involved in the talks at that point.

Mr Storey: I am glad that the Member has given way. As always with NI21 — as far as I know, that is still the party that the Member belongs to —

Mr McCallister: No.

Mr Storey: Oh no, he does not and all that. He is now an independent. That is right.

Let us set the record straight. If the Member goes back and checks the timeline for the agreement in the Executive, he will see that it was predicated on the basis of the decision that was made by the First Minister and deputy First Minister about the heads of agreement. The heads of agreement were the basis upon which the Bill would proceed. It was abundantly clear, when the Bill proceeded, that the heads of agreement could not be implemented because of difficulties with clause 5 and clause 10. When the Member checks the facts about the heads of agreement and the Bill, he will find that that was the timeline. My party remained committed to delivery, but the difficulty was that what was going to be delivered was not what had been agreed.

Mr McCallister: I am grateful for that, but that is at direct variance with what Mr Craig said, which was that we could not believe a press release coming out of OFMDFM. I know that, perhaps in DUP circles, the First Minister may not be the force that he once was, but, back in 2012, this was what you said: the Bill could not have left OFMDFM without your agreement and your hands effectively all over it, and you agreed it. Mr Craig almost denied that you had anything to do with it; the press release was nothing to do with you.

6.30 pm

I turn to other issues. Overall, we are making a mistake by rushing this legislation through. The Bill is not nearly as dramatic as the original ESA Bill was going to be. I am not going to vote against it tonight, simply because there is an overwhelming majority in favour of it. However, I think that this is something that should have gone through a proper scrutiny process with all of the benefits that that brings. Effectively, what we have done here today and acquiesced so much on is the Executive getting a rubber stamp from the Northern Ireland Assembly without the proper scrutiny. It will mean that there will probably be more amendments. It will mean that we will probably have it passed before a suitable business case is anywhere near DFP.

Mr Sheehan talked about opposition. If he checks my voting record, he will find the type of opposition that I mean, which is that when you think that something is bad or there is poor legislation or poor governance, you vote against it, like accelerated passage. Oddly enough, it would have been very easy for me to vote against things like the Public Service Pensions Bill, but it was the fiscally responsible thing to do. It would be very easy for me to join you guys and vote against —

Mr Sheehan: Will the Member give way?

Mr McCallister: — welfare reform or hold out. It would not be the terribly wise thing to do. Even former Minister McCausland made some advances in negotiating opt-outs on welfare reform. Yet, here we are caught in a crisis of Sinn Féin's own making.

I give way to the Member.

Mr Sheehan: I thank the Member for giving way. I am not calling the Member's integrity into question. My point simply is this: people sometimes oppose for the sake of opposing, whether it is bad, good or indifferent legislation or a bad, good or indifferent motion. People oppose just for the sake of it to say, "I am the opposition" or "We are the opposition". That is common currency in the House, and that is what gets this place a bad name.

Mr McCallister: What gets us a bad name is when you try to do it and you do not have the integrity to come out of the Government. You do not have the collective responsibility; you do not have that part that says, "I do not agree with this; I will resign from the Government". That is it. That includes Sinn Féin's position on welfare reform. As the second largest party in the Government, there is a responsibility. We had to send the Finance Minister to get a £100 million loan to stop this thing going into the red. That is not good governance. I appreciate that —

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Order, please. Far be it from me to remind the Member that he is drifting somewhat in educational terms.

Mr McCallister: Mr Deputy Speaker, I am grateful, as ever, for your guidance.

The Assembly should be scrutinising the Bill and scrutinising other legislation, other motions and the work of the Executive branch of government. That is why it is so important to take our time. Having wasted years, we are suddenly faced with doing this in a matter of weeks. I think that that is a matter of huge regret, and we are perhaps not doing the best job. We should all regret that state of affairs very much.

Mr O'Dowd: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Bhí díospóireacht bhíomhar againn anseo inniu, agus is maith an rud é sin. We have had a lively debate today, and that is a very good thing. It is right that differing views should be heard and that we should debate challenging issues. However, given the inexorable deadline presented by local government reform, it is imperative that we seek consensus and agree quickly to move forward. Consensus will be key to the success of the Bill. It is for that reason that the Bill is drafted in such concise terms.

I welcome the interest that has been shown on all sides of the House, and I thank those Members who contributed. Many specific points were raised, and I shall address as many of them as possible. I shall, of course, write to Members on any issues that I am unable to cover now.

In her opening remarks as Chair of the Committee, Ms McIlveen posed a number of questions about elements of the Bill. The four community representatives will be appointed through the public appointments process, which will be open and transparent and done in conjunction with the due processes.

A number of Members raised the question of how the Education Authority is to save £185 million. Indeed, Mr McCallister raised it at the end of his comments. A key component of realising savings will be through the rationalisation of services and structures, for example, ICT, HR and finance systems. In preparation for ESA, significant work has already been undertaken on the harmonisation of those services. That also covers the point about the spend of £17 million in preparation for ESA. Efficiencies realised will be comparable in scale to those expected from ESA, which were estimated at around £185 million over 10 years. That will be the difference between implementing the Education Authority and rebooting the boards and CCMS etc to 2008 levels. This is money that we will not have to spend, providing that the Education Authority is established.

As expected, fewer staff will be employed in the Education Authority, particularly in management grades, than in the current five boards. Significant reductions in staff have already been made in anticipation of ESA. Many of the savings have, therefore, already been made. It is my expectation that any remaining reductions will be made through voluntary redundancy, retirement and resignations. A full business case is in the process of being finalised, and I will share it with the Education Committee at the earliest possible moment. Members will have access to that full information.

Ms McIlveen also raised the issue of wider reform of education administration, the consideration of greater and more appropriate delegation to schools and the simplification of education legislation. That is an objective that can be achieved, but I think that it can be achieved in a different Bill. The key to this Bill — it has been said time and time again — is to deal with the structures that are currently before us and reduce those down into the one authority. Once we have that legislation and the confidence of the education sector is reinstated, we could move towards looking at that. Education legislation is very complex, and I think that it needs to be refreshed. A very complex piece of legislation will be needed to bring that forward, and I expect that there will have to be detailed discussions to reach agreement on it. Let us get this Bill over the line, let us restore confidence in the education sector, and then we can move to that.

As to the appointment of the chief executive, let me put it on the record that I do not believe that "interim" is five, 10 or 15 years. To me, "interim" is up to two years. There was one suggestion of six months, but that is unrealistic. I do not think that candidates would apply for that, and I do not think that any successful candidate would be in position for long enough to make any difference to a board within six months. An interim appointment of around two years is realistic.

It is not uncommon for the chief executive of a non-departmental public body to be appointed by the sponsoring Department. That is consistent with guidance issued by DFP on the establishment of public bodies. The appointment of the first CEO by the Department is for practical reasons, as the Education Authority will not be established in time to undertake the selection and appointment of the chief executive to be in post in April 2015. Even with accelerated passage, we are still facing challenges over time — I say that also in response to Mr McCallister's points. It is critical for the Education Authority to ensure that the necessary minimum administrative arrangements are in place for 1 April 2015. There are examples of similar practice in the appointment of CEOs for development corporations. One notable example is the appointment of the CEO for the Maze/Long Kesh Development Corporation. Maybe that is not the best example in the world, but that is recognised practice.

Another issue raised by Ms McIlveen was that of a controlled sector support body. I urge caution in the days and weeks ahead in tabling amendments to this Bill. This Bill is very finely balanced, and, if we go after elements of ESA that we favoured or go after lobbies that we favour and try to introduce them to the Bill, we are opening a Pandora's box. Once we open it, we will not get it closed again. We will end up in the same mess as we were in with ESA. This is not ESA. Members opposite are quite entitled to lobby for and seek the type of recognition that a number of them sought for the controlled sector support body and different pieces of legislation, but I urge them to think: this is not the legislation to do that in. If we break the balance in this legislation, the hopes and aspirations of many people will falter, and, certainly, any hopes in the short term for a controlled sector support body will be lost, as will the funding for that body etc.

I have had discussions with the controlled sector lobby, and I have set out my proposals and plans to it in writing. I have put in Executive minutes exactly what I read out in the Chamber today about the roles and responsibilities of that body. It is in the minutes of the Executive, and it is now in Hansard. I will also incorporate the roles and responsibilities of that body in DE's corporate plan. So there are a number of factors that give assurances to that body.

I will also table an amendment to the Bill. I have been clear with the controlled sector from day one. I will not name any sector in the Bill, because I think that that upsets the balance and will open up that Pandora's box. The amendment that I propose to table will read:

"The Department may, subject to such conditions it thinks fit, pay grants to any body which is recognised by the Department as representing the interests of grant-aided schools of a particular description."

That clause will ensure that funding will go to the controlled sector. Indeed, I put it on record in Hansard that, once the Bill moves through Consideration Stage, I will start funding a controlled sector support body to get it up and running. Some considerable pieces of work were carried out, I think, in the last calendar year in relation to that body, and I will rejuvenate it. However, Members, I caution you: we are dealing with very finely balanced legislation; let us not tip it the wrong way. I say that to all Members.

Before I deal with the statutory duties of the authority, let me deal with its membership. Various Members around the Chamber made suggestions about which bodies should be represented on the authority. I believe that the make-up of the authority, as it is currently set out in the Bill, is sufficient and will give it democratic and representative authority across the board. However, if Members table amendments that have the favour of the House in the sense of the various bodies that have been mentioned today — the voluntary grammar sector, the integrated sector and the Irish-medium sector — I will not object. However, again, let us ensure that the balance of the board is not thrown one way or the other and that, whatever numbers we end up with on that board, it is a strategic body.

Mr Lunn referred to the amendments that he will table on political representation on the board. I will study those closely and go back to why we came up with the formula for the political representation on the board. I am open to persuasion on all matters in relation to representation on the board. However, I emphasise that it is a strategic body, and I hope that the members who join it will not do so simply to represent the interests of their sector but will be there to set the strategic direction of education into the future.

I want to return to the role of the board or the authority — I have to get used to using the term "authority" — later, because Mr McCrea also made interesting comments about it that I want to respond to.

Mrs Overend said — I paraphrase — that the UUP reacted negatively to the previous Bills. That is correct. That is absolutely correct, and that is not a compliment. Negativity has bogged this process down for several years. As I said, it is a collective responsibility for the failure to get ESA this far. I have my own views about why the ESA Bill failed and who was the original author of that failure, but I think that it is a waste of time —

Mr Storey: Go on, name him.

Mr O'Dowd: It is not you. [Laughter.] You are on the list of accomplices, so you are. It would be a waste of time and would not serve any purpose at this time.

6.45 pm

We have failed to agree an ESA Bill; we have brought forward the single authority Bill, which is simple in its make-up, and I believe that we can reach agreement on it.

Mrs Overend also mentioned the £17 million put in place to prepare for the ESA. I welcome the continued interest of the Social Development Minister and former Education Committee Chair in that matter. However, the reason why the boards were run down and £17 million was invested in establishing the ESA was not some clever ploy to force the ESA through the back door: the ESA was a Programme for Government commitment, not in one Programme for Government but in two. Any responsible Minister who has a Programme for Government commitment has a duty to prepare for it and, indeed, it was always the view in budget deliberations that the Department of Education had the ability to save about £20 million per annum as it prepared for the ESA. So there was a Programme for Government commitment and also budgetary pressures bearing down on us to prepare for the ESA. About 400 staff have left the education boards in preparation for the ESA, and that will hold us in good stead in preparation for the Education Authority.

I cannot say how much of the £17 million will be directly attributed to work that goes into the Education Authority. That will be for others to investigate at another time. However, a significant amount of money from that work programme will, in my opinion, transfer to the authority to allow it to carry out its work.

I have covered points about additional powers.

Mr Rogers raised a number of points that I want to return to. He talked about the membership of the board and who, in his view, should be on it. As I have said, I am open to persuasion on all those matters. However, I want to say this: the new Education Authority will have to be compliant with the agreements reached under the Good Friday Agreement and with Irish-medium and integrated education legislation. The new authority will work under the schemes of the Department of Education, and therefore, by law, it will have to take into account its legal duties for Irish-medium and integrated education, whether or not those sectors are represented on the board.

Mrs Overend asked me whether I had taken into consideration the Drumragh judgement. I have done so, in the preparation of all my work in recent times and since the judgement. I do not believe that anything that I have done in relation to the Bill does harm to the judgement, although the judgement is not as clearly in favour of one side and against the other as some would like us to believe. However, I take into account the judgement as I carry out my work across many elements of the Department.

As to the question of what happened to the two previous Bills to establish the ESA, I will not go down that road.

Mr Lunn and many other Members paid tribute to the staff who have struggled to hold together the current boards and to our school and teaching staff. I join them in paying that tribute. Many heroic measures have been taken by our education and library boards, in particular, in the work that they have carried out over this last number of years. We have a duty to them, as much as anything, in relation to ensuring that we bring forward legislation that gives certainty to education.

Mr Storey: I thank the Minister for giving way. I wish to record my gratitude, as former Chair of the Education Committee, to the education and library boards and, in particular, to those senior staff and others on the boards who, over the years, made an invaluable contribution to education. We may not have always agreed; we may have had our differences, and we may have had issues, particularly about the controlled sector and the way in which it was placed. However, that does not diminish the immense work that was done. I welcome the comments by the Minister about that, and I ask him whether he can ensure, in some way, that that recognition can be conveyed to the boards so that they know how much we, the Assembly, appreciate what they have done.

Mr O'Dowd: He hasn't gone away, you know.

I certainly will do that, and it is only right and proper to do so. In fairness, during the debate, many Members paid tribute to the sterling work carried out by the boards. I will examine ways to mark that, if we get a new Education Authority, of course, and we are all hopeful that we will.

Mr Craig covered support to schools from the boards because of the rundown in preparation for the ill-fated ESA. He wants to know how services will move across and how they will develop. All services will move across, but it is only right and proper that the authority itself decides how those services develop. That programme of work should be carried out in consultation with schools and others, but the authority and its membership carries responsibility for such matters.

What happens to the chief executives of the five ELBs? At present, there is only one substantive chief executive, although those who have stepped into other roles have carried out an excellent job. Once the five ELBs are dissolved or amalgamated — whatever word you want to use — there will be no requirement for the five chief executive posts. Those chief executives are perfectly entitled to apply for any post in the new authority. I suspect that some of them will, and I wish them well. That process will come after employment decisions and the usual employment protocols that will follow through. There will certainly not be five chief executives underneath the new authority when it comes into being.

Mr McCausland referred to a change management strategy, as did Mr Newton in Committee, and to today's gain. A change management programme will be delivered to oversee the transition from five ELBs and their staff commission to a single Education Authority. That will be a large-scale reform programme that will continue to be embedded over a number of years beyond 2015. It is anticipated that it will take some time to arrive at a steady state following the creation of the new authority.

A programme management board will identify and oversee the key work strands necessary to deliver the Education Authority. Early scoping has indicated that those may include human resources, legislation, equality and communications, governance arrangements, operations and services, finance and dissolution, and the establishment of a controlled sectoral support body. I want the controlled sectoral support body to be up and functioning by 1 April 2015 at the latest, and there will be continued support for that body afterwards. A change programme strategy will be in place, which will evolve as time moves forward, and it is significant work.

Mr Kinahan questioned why the Department of Education should appoint the chair, and he wanted to be reassured that the appointment of the chair, if carried out by the Department, would be open and transparent. With such major strategic government bodies, it is normal practice for the sponsoring Department to appoint the chair. However, that appointment must take place in line with the public appointments process, so it has to be an open and transparent process. It will be advertised and will be quite a significant appointment, because that person will be in charge of an authority that, in one way or another, has responsibility for a budget of around £1.8 billion. We will be looking for a significant figure in the process. The post will be widely advertised, job descriptions etc will be put in place, and the usual public appointments process will kick in.

Mr Kinahan also raised issues relating to the interim chief executive, which I have covered. A maximum of two years is interim. That gives a person the opportunity to go in, establish the board and steady the authority, and the authority then has a period to employ a new chief executive.

Mr Newton covered a wide range of areas. He also congratulated me at one point, which I would like to read twice in the Hansard report. He expressed concerns about the area-planning process and used a number of examples. He gave one example of the process working — Dundonald — although he suggested that that was down to the intervention of the Minister. The Minister always has a role in area planning. He referred to the Newtownbreda/Knockbreda judicial review, although he did not refer to the fact that the board won that and was found to have acted properly.

Victoria Park Primary School was mentioned. Lessons have to be learned about the size of that school and how we came to that figure, but it worked out OK in the end.

Area planning will have to continue. Clearly, the new authority will carry out a role, and that will be complemented by the controlled schools sectoral support body, which will also join that overarching group. Area planning is a difficult process. The closure or amalgamation of schools is never easy. When a board or authority has to come to a decision about moving to that process, there needs to be consultation, and it needs to be carried out very carefully. People need to feel valued. You need to ensure that their views are heard, and then a decision has to be made on the future of a school or group of schools. The authority will play a major role in that.

I may have missed some Members' comments. My officials will go through the Hansard report, and, if other points require clarity or a response, I will provide that.

I want to refer to Mr McCrea's commentary. I assume that he was referring to the Hansard report of the Education Committee and my comments to that Committee. I am paraphrasing, but he referred to me saying that the education body would discuss the future direction of education. I see that Mr McCrea has left. I accept that I am paraphrasing, but he appeared to have concerns about that statement. Why would an education authority not discuss the future direction of education? Of course it should. The people on the authority will be key in the delivery of day-to-day education and the education strategy.

Anyone concerned that the body will discuss the future direction of travel in education can be comforted by this: the body will have no legislative authority to change that direction. The legislative authority for that rests with the Assembly, so it is vital that I as Minister, my Department and the Assembly listen very carefully to the views of any future education authority. We should not be concerned that we are vesting powers in the authority that, in some way, will allow it to take decisions that are, quite properly, decisions for the Assembly. There should be no concerns about that.

I think that I have covered all the points. I emphasise again that this is not ESA. I think that it was the Chair of the Committee who said that it was not ESA lite, so let us not make it ESA lite. Let us not create ESA in the next couple of weeks. We could not get agreement on ESA over seven years, and we will not get agreement on ESA in the next seven weeks, so I urge Members across the House to be conscious that, when tabling amendments, as is their right and entitlement, they do so in the spirit that this is minimalist legislation. We acknowledge that many sectors, quite rightly, lobby us as elected representatives and seek changes to legislation. I strongly urge Members to accept the argument that this is not the legislation in which to do that. That does not in any way deny you your right or entitlement to campaign and, at a future date, to introduce new legislation or make changes to legislation, but I urge Members not to amend the Bill out of existence.

Adjournment

Heart Surgery for Children: Upper Bann

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): The proposer of the topic will have 15 minutes, and all other Members who wish to speak will have approximately seven minutes.

Mrs Dobson: The reason why this is such an important debate is that it is the first time that the current Minister will speak on this issue in the Chamber.

Hold on, Mr Deputy Speaker. That was from the speech that I had planned to give, until this morning's impromptu statement from the Minister. Nevertheless, I would have thought that the previous Minister could have shown respect to the House and to the many families who are worried sick about the issue by at least making a formal statement on it. Alas, it was not to be.

7.00 pm

To quote the new Minister:

"It is one of the most complicated and controversial issues on my desk at the minute ... I have time to take a long, cold look at it."

Taking a long, cold look at things seems to be something that Stormont is all too familiar with. Parents and their children looking in from the outside can be forgiven for wondering when the long, cold looks will end and the action start. Those are the same parents whom the Minister spoke about earlier, saying that it is a bitter pill for them to swallow — bitter indeed. Meanwhile, those same parents have the worry — the very real, sickening worry — for their children's health and life.

As I and everyone else know only too well, health is an issue that leaves no home untouched. However, the issue of children's cardiac services is especially emotive, given the age of many of the young people involved and the sheer challenges that they are expected to overcome, often in the first few weeks of their life, and, for too many young children, in the weeks, months and years that lie ahead. There are parents across Upper Bann — I know that the Minister has already met several of them because he mentioned it in the House this morning — for whom the issue is so very dear. It is for those parents and their children that I have secured this Adjournment debate. They and other parents have made lengthy trips to this Building over the past three years, to be met with little more than hollow promises, followed by reports, reviews and consultations.

The business of government grinds slowly — far too slowly — when it comes to protecting the needs of some of the most vulnerable children in our society and addressing the very real fears of their families. I do not blame the current Minister for the actions of his predecessor, and I welcome his assurance to my colleague Robin Swann this morning that he will take a deep personal interest in the issue. Nevertheless, I reiterate my disappointment and that of my party colleagues, as well as that of many other people, at the manner in which it was revealed that the international review group has found that retaining children's surgical cardiac services in Belfast is unsustainable.

The manner in which that information was revealed — through a clearly planted question on the day that the previous Minister knew that he was being sacked — showed little regard for the concerns of the families or the seriousness of the issue. In addition, the Minister would have known that, by making the announcement in the manner in which he did, it would have only been prolonging the agony for those families. He would have known that it would be weeks before the report would be published in full.

My party still wants to see services retained in Belfast. We believe that, with the right level of dedication, the Minister and his Department would be able to hold on to the required expertise. The number of children affected may be relatively small, but, in my opinion, that is something to be pleased about rather than used to cast doubt. Parents in Upper Bann hold many of the same concerns. If the findings that Edwin Poots previously revealed are acted on, what provision, for instance, will be put in place to ensure that all patients, including those needing urgent emergency treatment, will receive care in a safe and time-critical fashion? Although Upper Bann is closer to Dublin than some parts of Northern Ireland are, it is most likely that, in an emergency, families will still have to travel first to Belfast to get the diagnosis before travelling onwards if surgery or emergency interventions are no longer available there.

Another issue that parents are concerned about locally is whether Northern Ireland's cardiology skills and the associated services will be maintained and developed. The prospect of losing children's heart surgery could have a very detrimental impact on the remaining service. Specifically, Minister, when will the £1 million promised by John Compton last year for paediatric cardiology services be delivered? Northern Ireland is at the forefront in many areas of paediatric cardiology, such as telemedicine, research and training. I know that you will share my belief that it is critical that those are further developed.

As I draw my remarks to a conclusion, I will raise with the Minister one more issue that would be of direct benefit to parents in Upper Bann. In March, the Assembly debated the issue of pulse oximetry screening for newborns. In fact, the Minister participated in the debate. He said:

“this is a simple, cheap and non-invasive test that could have significant results for children born with congenital heart disease.” — [Official Report, Bound Volume 92, p273, col 2].

Minister, will you now please bring forward that test? As we know, the earlier that something is detected, often, the easier it is to address. Children's cardiac services is one of the most challenging issues facing the Minister. He needs to take cognisance of the medical advice being offered to him and find a way of balancing that with the wishes of the clear majority of the people of Northern Ireland.

The Minister will soon be making a very difficult decision. He knows my views and those of my party. I know that, after his meeting yesterday and today's debate, he will at least know the views of the parents of Upper Bann.

Mr Anderson: I welcome the opportunity to speak in this debate. I commend Mrs Dobson for bringing this important, emotive and sensitive issue to the House. It has relevance, of course, to not only Upper Bann but right across the country.

Cardiac services for children are crucial, and their needs and quality of care must at all times be a top priority. The debate is timely by complete coincidence: it takes place on the same day as the new Health Minister presented his statement to the House on proposals for paediatric congenital cardiac services. In that sense, as Mr Wells said earlier, many of the issues that we debate this evening will probably have been considered this morning.

The whole issue of children's heart disease is something that I have taken a close interest in for a considerable time. Along with my colleagues David Simpson MP and Stephen Moutray MLA, I have worked with a number of families right across Upper Bann. Therefore, I am well aware of the strength of feeling and emotion around this very complex issue. I pay tribute to the work of the Children's Heartbeat Trust charity for the very special work it carries out daily. I have only to look at the McKee, Greenaway and Flaherty families from my constituency to see the dedication and commitment to fighting for a solution to service provision for those very special children. Those families have inspired many across Upper Bann, and they have helped to cast much light on this important topic. Charities and support groups such as the Children's Heartbeat Trust can also be a real help and encouragement to families whose children have serious heart problems.

I also pay great tribute to the Clark Clinic in the Royal Belfast Hospital for Sick Children for the excellent work it does. Its dedication and skills have been highlighted by the very emotional personal stories that I have heard from families. The life-saving specialist work it undertakes must be commended.

I spoke to the families as recently as yesterday, and I place on record their sincere thanks to all involved in the care of their beloved children, not least the former Health Minister, Edwin Poots, who made himself available at all times and was a great listening ear.

Mrs Dobson: I thank the Member for giving way. I am loathe to say that it was a coincidence; I think that I will table more Adjournment debates if that is the impact they have, but anyway. Does the Member share my hope that, with the change in Minister, good news will finally be delivered to the families you spoke of? We both know them and hold them very close to our hearts. Hopefully, the Minister will be able to deliver good news to the children and their families.

Mr Anderson: I have no doubt that the past Minister did, and the present Minister will, deliver as much of a first-class service as is practically possible. I know that Edwin Poots sent emails to some of those families with personal comments in them, he took that great an interest in the health of those kids. I spoke to those families, and they appreciated the efforts that Edwin had gone to to try to get it sorted out. I have every confidence that the Health Minister in place now will carry on in the same mode.

The new Minister and his predecessor have rightly said that they do not want a second-class service for parents and children in Northern Ireland. Families that I have met — two of them were at the meeting with the Minister yesterday — have raised a number of concerns. I trust that the Minister will take those issues that were noted yesterday on board when the final arrangements are made.

It is crucial that high standards of care are maintained. I know that that was certainly the aim and objective of the international working group, chaired by Dr John Mayer from Boston Children's Hospital, which explored all options, not only talking to surgeons and medical staff but consulting widely with families. I place on record my sincere thanks to him for also doing that.

Families with vulnerable children must be placed at the centre of any decision-making process in order to achieve the highest standard of care and the best possible outcomes. That includes being able to offer the highest-skilled doctors, nurses and support staff possible. With that in mind, I welcome the inclusion of a robust family advisory group in the international working group's recommendations. The increased involvement of parents is crucial. Families want to see better liaison between them and the medical staff and more hands-on support in what is already an anxious time for anyone with a young child who suffers from congenital heart defects.

The report also highlights the huge benefits of a highly specialised team that would be developed between our health service and the Republic of Ireland's health service in order to maximise the level of provision we can give to our most vulnerable children and young people.

I commend the work of the Children's Heartbeat Trust across Northern Ireland in providing practical and personal support to those going through very anxious and difficult times with their children. I encourage it to keep up that good work. I would also like to thank Dr John Mayer and the international working group along with the previous Minister Edwin Poots and our current Health Minister, Jim Wells. In particular, I want to pay a special tribute to the ever-dedicated families. I cannot even begin to imagine what they go through every day. They have truly been inspirational throughout this long journey.

In closing, I trust that, as we move forward, the final arrangements will provide the highest standard of care for our children who suffer from congenital heart disease. I also hope and pray that proper and adequate support is given to the families of those children. I look forward to the Minister's comments later in the debate.

Mr O'Dowd: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Paediatric cardiac care, quite understandably, is a very emotive issue, and I do not envy Mr Wells in his task of dealing with the matter, nor did I envy his predecessor Mr Poots.

The issue has become central in political and media life because of the determination and dignity portrayed by parents of young children with heart defects. They have campaigned, quite understandably, for the retention of surgery in Belfast. The staff and surgeons in Belfast have given them both medical treatment and personal treatment to the highest levels over many years, and they deserve to be commended for that.

However, the realities of modern medicine have come to bear on the issue. The realities of modern medicine dictate many things. They dictate safety at the very core of delivery. I can understand parents wishing the service to be accessible and to be able to travel to Belfast for care, especially given the care that is received there, but when an international body of highly respected medical professionals tells you that, through no fault of anyone, in fairness — it is not a funding issue; it is not a reduction of services issue; it is not about cuts; it is no one's fault — that service can no longer continue safely, then, quite rightly, the Health Minister and everyone else have to sit up and listen.

Mr Wells (The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety): Will the Member give way?

Mr O'Dowd: Yes.

Mr Wells: Will the Member accept that this was the fourth report recommending the same policy change and that I was faced with a situation in which four totally different bodies, coming from totally different angles, had all reached the same conclusion, which is that we have to concentrate on Crumlin hospital and that therefore to do anything else would be totally negligent?

Mr O'Dowd: Yes. I spent several years as the party's health spokesperson. Now, it was in an era when we were all in opposition. There were direct rule Ministers here. You could call, lobby and demand for everything because there was no expense or responsibility connected to it. We are now in a different role. Through that period as health spokesperson, I did learn that, quite rightly, safety comes first. Medical experts will not go beyond that safety line.

The Minister is right that there have been four reports now telling him that these services should be delivered on an all-island basis. This is not a political issue. It is not about partition. It is nothing to do with anything other than the provision of safe, modern cardiac care to young children. That is what is at the centre of it.

I note that what is being proposed is going out to consultation; if I understood the Minister's statement this morning, there will be further consultation on this matter. There is a further opportunity. Key to this is to ensure that the parents, who have acted with such dignity throughout this time, are kept informed of every detail of the proposal, that clarity is given to them when it is required and that they are given to understand every aspect of the proposal moving forward with regard to which services will continue to be provided in Belfast, the surgery services that will be provided in Dublin, how those centres will be accessible to them as parents and family members and how they will be accommodated in those centres. There needs to be assurance that the centre that is being talked about in Dublin has the resources and facilities to carry out services —

Mrs Dobson: Will the Member give way?

Mr O'Dowd: I will in just one second. There needs to be assurance that the centre has the resources and facilities to carry out the additional work that will come its way.

Mrs Dobson: I thank the Member for giving way. Does he agree with me that very little clarity has been given to parents over the past three years and that there has been only false hope?

Mr O'Dowd: I will not get into a political wrangle about this. I have observed the issue as a Minister and as a constituency MLA. I have been lobbied by parents. I have noted their campaign, both at personal and public level. I have seen the efforts of the previous Health Minister on the matter.

I suspect that there is some dissatisfaction among some parents that the decision has gone this way. But unless there is a medical reason not to follow the report, what we have to do now — I will wind up on this point — is ensure that the parents are given every shred of information they require on how this service will be rolled out and developed and that clarity is given. Where additional information or services are required, we have to fall in behind that and support that as well. Go raibh míle maith agat.

Mrs D Kelly: I join others in commending Mrs Dobson for securing the Adjournment debate. I think that she is right to note the coincidence of the statement and the Adjournment debate — nonetheless, whatever it takes to get the job done.

I think that we are all agreed that we want to work in the best interests of all our constituents. As Mr Anderson said, it is not just about children in Upper Bann; it is about children right across the North and their parents in particular. I join others in commending the parents and families and those who have lobbied so hard for so long. It is necessary that we have certainty and clarity on the issues and recommendations that are contained in the reports.

I know from experience that it is not just the parents of children who are currently ill but parents who have had the experience of having their children treated in Belfast who feel so passionately about the retention of services. I want to commend them for keeping with it and assisting those who have come after them. It is also right that we place on record, as the report does, that the strength and quality of the cardiology services that are provided in Belfast are second to none. The change being made is nothing to do with them in relation to the service. I think that it was Mr O'Dowd who said that it is about the safety and viability of the service.

We in the SDLP welcome today's announcement that child cardiac services will become part of an all-island initiative. We see it as a step in the right direction to providing clarity and certainty for parents and families. For too long, we were left in a state of limbo, not knowing whether or not children would have to continue to travel to England. It is much more satisfactory that they have much easier access, and hopefully less costly access, to services in Dublin.

I think I am right in saying that the consultation period is 12 weeks but the service level agreement with Dublin ends in 10 weeks. Perhaps the Minister will address the gap, of two weeks or whatever number of weeks, that might emerge as a consequence of the consultation and whether or not the current service level agreement will be extended. I see reference to that as one of the issues raised in today's media.

Today's report advances 14 recommendations, addressing key issues that would facilitate the transition of the service, including issues of transport, enhancing clinical services, taking on board families' concerns and implementing measures to deal with urgent emergency care. Some issues remain. Earlier today, the Minister pointed out the interdependency of the 14 recommendations, where full agreement across the board is required. I understand very clearly that we are very much in the early stages and there has yet to be full agreement and commitment on the resource timelines and service integration requirements by both Health Ministers and their respective Departments. I trust that Mr Wells has a good relationship with the Health Minister in the South and that they can very quickly come to a conclusion to inform parents.

At the end of the day, communication will be key. When you are ill, you do not really care where the service is, so long as you can get it — and get it when you need it, it is a good service and it has a good outcome for you or your loved one. I believe that that is the ambition of the provision of children's cardiac services and one that I hope will be at the centre of deliberations on the provision of services.

Mr Deputy Speaker, it is very difficult at the end of such a debate to add anything new, so I will finish by recognising that this has been doing the rounds for quite a long time. Members are quite right to point out that it is the fourth such report that has come to the same conclusion. I hope that the announcement is given a fair wind in relation to the consultation, and that we see an enhanced service provision and clarity given to families, because they have enough worry and anxiety dealing with a child who is sick, without having to worry about all the ancillary problems around transport, accommodation and accessibility.

Mr Swann: I know that the Adjournment debate is about Upper Bann, but, having declared the interest already, I think that most Members are fully aware of our personal condition, and I want to tie it in with tonight's Adjournment debate.

At less than 24 hours old, my son Evan was transferred from the maternity ward to the Paediatric Intensive Care Unit (PICU). If any of you have been in the children's hospital in Belfast, you will know that, just outside the PICU, there is a parent waiting room. I went in there, because my wife had just given birth and was not allowed to travel, and the first people I met were Julie Flaherty and her husband, Wayne. The support that those two individuals gave my wife and me through those first few hours and days, while Evan was in the PICU along with their son Jake, gave us the confidence and understanding that the surgery and support that Evan would receive in the unit would be second to none.

Mr Deputy Speaker, Jake did not survive to see the debate today. He passed away over a year ago now. However, Julie and Wayne, in memory of their son, keep this fight alive in their hearts, because they know the necessity of being able to support not just parents but children in an excellent facility in Belfast. From my involvement in this issue, it has not been about numbers. Unfortunately, the Safe and Sustainable review created the magical figure of 400, which nobody could stand over afterwards. The argument has been put forward that the practice has not been safe and that the surgeons have not been there. I appreciate what John said about the advancements in medicine. Nobody is arguing against their child receiving the proper medical service where it is available. The continual call from parents is to be close to home, to be supported close to home and to have that family circle. Dublin is a better alternative than Birmingham and Evelina. I do not think that anybody in this House will argue against that. Belfast is a better alternative.

A number of parents have raised queries in regard to the service level agreement. Mrs Kelly has already raised it, and I raised it this morning in Question Time. It comes to an end in 10 weeks' time at the end of December.

Mr Wells: Will the Member give way?

Mr Swann: Yes.

Mr Wells: Mrs Kelly raised the same point. The service level agreement will be continued past the end of the consultation period. There will be no change, no hiatus or two-week gap. It will just continue on well past the consultation period because, remember, we will still need time to look at the consultation responses. So, that will not cause any problems.

Mr Swann: I thank the Minister for his clarification. Will the service level agreement, which allows the Dublin surgeon to come to Belfast to perform those surgeries, continue for the 18-month period before we transfer our children's cardiac surgery to Dublin? Part of the frustration here, and it is a small line in his statement this morning, is that, from December 2014, more children will transfer to England for surgery. We are looking for the continuation of the small number of surgeries that have already taken place in Belfast, should it be catheterisations or interventions.

During the 18-month period when we are sending more of our children to England, what will happen to our anaesthetists, our PICU nurses and all the supportive care workers who support those children and families? In the recommendations, I saw that, in 18 months' time, there will be a transfer of support workers. However, if they are not given the ability to keep their skills upgraded in the intervening 18-month period, there could be a complete deskilling of our staff in Belfast.

I do not think that we are under any illusion that surgery will miraculously appear back in Belfast; the parents are realistic about that. However, we want the best provision for our children. Tonight, even Dr Michael McBride talked about the period of uncertainty that there will be while this is all worked out. That is where the frustration comes in.

The point that I raised this morning about the individual care pathway for each child will give reassurance, if it can be established. That is a piece of work that should be done and can be done. Like Mr Anderson, I want to pay tribute to the parents who have fought this fight. Mr O'Dowd and my party colleague Jo-Anne Dobson acknowledged that it has been a noble, decent, clean campaign. It is something that they believed in, and they wanted the right outworkings. There has been no political point-scoring in it. It has been for the good of their children to receive a first-class service. There is no argument about that in any shape or form. That is what everybody wants, but it is the travelling and the support that has to be put in place. The establishment of that individual care pathway will go a long way to resolving a lot of those issues.

In finishing, there is an urban myth that, for the children's hospital to increase its ability to take the Northern Ireland patients in 18 months' time, Minister Varadkar is looking at a new-build children's hospital.

It is acknowledged in the Mayer report that there are problems with planning for that hospital in Dublin. A site has not been secured for the new children's hospital. If a new hospital in Dublin cannot be built to take our children in 18 months' time, what reassurances do we have beyond the recommendations and the hope to be there in 18 months' time? Without the upgrading of the facility, without those PICU beds, which are already at over 90% occupancy with the Republic's own children before we add another 250 surgeries a year, and without clarity on where the new build will be, how can we put our faith in it happening 18 months down the line? That is the question. There is no point scoring or trying to catch a Minister out here. It is parents wanting to know the answers to their detailed questions.

Mr Deputy Speaker, thank you for allowing me, a Member for North Antrim, to take part in this Adjournment debate. Going back to my initial point, I can honestly say that, without the support that parents from Upper Bann, especially Julie and Wayne Flaherty, gave us at the start, we would have found our direction of travel in what we had to go through an awful lot harder.

7.30 pm

Mr Wells: First, I thank Mrs Dobson, a Member for Upper Bann, for securing the debate. This is not a question of right or wrong; it is a question of two rights. It is not a black-and-white argument. When I first came to the issue, I thought that it would be very attractive to retain services in Belfast, but we need to look at some cold, hard statistics. In 2011-12, there were 140 surgical procedures involving children from Northern Ireland. Of those, 97 were carried out in Northern Ireland, 13 were carried out in Dublin and 40 were carried out in England. In 2012-13, 69 were carried out in Northern Ireland, 36 were carried out in the Republic and 37 were carried out in England, a total of —

Mr Swann: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Wells: Certainly.

Mr Swann: Minister, I appreciate your cold, hard statistics. I will point out that Evan William-Robert Swann, my son, is more than a cold, hard statistic. You said that this is not black and white. Please do not make the argument here tonight using statistics. Your predecessor was able to support the case. You have more in your speech here tonight than cold, hard statistics. For the families out there, I ask you to advance more than that argument.

Mr Wells: Yes indeed, there is much more to my speech than cold, hard statistics. The Member is across the statistics and has rightly taken a deep personal interest in the issue. However, it is only when you see where the statistics are taking us that you realise why we are in the position that we are in. Hopefully, none of this is revealing any personal information about any patient.

The reality is that, in the first five months of this year, only 12 procedures were undertaken in Northern Ireland, with four in Dublin and 58 in England. The total so far is 74. The reason why I make that point is that all the expertise tells me that we need at least 400 procedures in order to have a safe, sustainable service for our children. Unfortunately, even in the best year, we had 159 procedures, which is a long, long way short of 400. Those are the realities that we face. Indeed, in some years, the entire island of Ireland has just about enough procedures for a safe and sustainable service.

My difficulty, which I mentioned to Mr O'Dowd, is that I have had four separate reports by four separate bodies telling me that this is not safe. What do I do with my GCSE biology? Do I say that I know better, or do I listen to world authorities from places like Harvard and to the Chief Medical Officer, who tell me that we cannot continue in the way that we are going and we have to change? Which advice do I take? I am afraid that I am left in an extremely difficult position.

Frankly, it is a decision that I did not want to make. I would love to have come here this morning, this afternoon and this evening — the topic has been raised three times — and said that we have the numbers, the resources and the clinicians to run a full, sustainable service in Belfast. Nothing would have made me happier. However, the obvious fact is that everyone who looked at the issue has said that it just cannot be done. The honourable Member welcomed the international working group led by Dr Mayer and accepted that he is one of the world authorities on the issue. He works in Massachusetts, where he deals with this very issue of smaller congenital cardiac units, and he looked at this. The Member will see from the report, which I am certain that he has had a chance to look at briefly, that Dr Mayer is absolutely emphatic that we just cannot continue with the model that we have at the moment. There are all sorts of reasons for that, not only numbers. We cannot attract and retain the specialist surgeons that we will need —

Mrs Dobson: I thank the Minister for giving way. Is the Minister saying that, if more children in Northern Ireland had heart problems, he would be forced to deliver the surgery?

Mr Wells: I hate to mention statistics, because we are dealing with human beings — passionate, dedicated parents — but the demographers tell us that Northern Ireland will never have a sufficient number of children to guarantee that the service would be sustainable and would attract clinicians. The problem that we have is that these specialists can move freely across the world. We have difficulty attracting and retaining surgeons in many fields in Northern Ireland because of our size. It would not matter if I committed to the Clark clinic and surgery in Belfast. If I cannot attract and retain the expertise that the trust and I need to continue this surgery, we cannot provide the best service for our children in Northern Ireland. That leaves us with two choices: to send all our children to England — to Birmingham or London — or to concentrate an all-island service at a location that, I realise, will cause considerable difficulties but is preferable, as Mr Swann said, to having that service in England.

There is only a single service in the Irish Republic at the moment. Babies from places such as Kerry, Sligo and Waterford already travel longer distances than children from Northern Ireland would be expected to travel for the same service. I hate mentioning statistics, but the outcomes tell me that this is a safer model than the one that we have.

I accept that all sorts of allegations were made this morning that the coincidence of events happening today was a chance to stymie Mrs Dobson's debate. Nothing could be further from the truth. We have to work closely with the authorities in the Irish Republic and Minister Leo Varadkar. As it happens, he is new to office, and I am new to office. The dates on which we came into office are not that far apart. It has been difficult, in that situation, to get agreement on when the report would be published. We could not do a solo run. This is a joint approach by the two Governments, my Department and the HSE in the Irish Republic. We could not go on our own. I think that Mr Poots felt duty-bound to give some indication, but he was not in a position to publish the report — he could not. One of my first decisions was to issue a written statement to tell the public about the direction of travel, but we were not in a position until now to publish the report. That was not an attempt to undermine Mrs Dobson's debate, although I appreciate that she may have felt that it was.

We have the report, and it is emphatic and clear. No one has attempted to say that the Mayer report does not point us in this direction. The stats, unfortunately, tell us that there is only one route that we can go. I hope that I outlined this morning that we intend to build in safeguards to make absolutely certain that the transition is made without affecting the care of our very vulnerable and needy children. I have also indicated that there will be structures to make certain that the wishes of parents, North and South, are fully considered as we set up the new service. That has to be done. I, personally, intend to pledge myself to ensuring that that happens.

On the first Saturday after my appointment, I attended, with Mrs Dobson, a very moving event in Banbridge. I must say that I found that a difficult event. I met parents who had given their lives to looking after terribly vulnerable, ill young children. I met the parents of Grace McKee at that event, and I met them yesterday. I have nothing but admiration for these people and what they are doing. Therefore, it is absolutely vital that all of their experience at the coalface is taken into account and that we make certain that the move to Dublin, which looks likely to occur, gives rise to as few problems and practical difficulties as possible.

I must say that I am fully aware of the deep concerns felt by Members, patients and their families. I can place myself in your shoes, and I suspect that, if I were in your position, I would probably say the same. However, I have to take a decision in the Chamber that is best for all the children of Northern Ireland. Although I am a unionist and want to retain services in the United Kingdom and in Northern Ireland, I have to say that I am left with no option. My predecessor Edwin Poots, whom I have the highest regard for, wanted to publish the report as soon as possible, but we reached the situation where joint statements were made this morning.

As I said, I have experience of meeting many of the families, and I am well aware of their views. They also made representations to me in my position as Deputy Chair of the Health Committee. I do not want to repeat the debate that we had this morning. I made the oral statement about the international working group's proposed model and the way forward. However, I wish to restate that I am particularly pleased about the strong voice that it gives to families' representatives on both the governance vehicle and the family advisory group. I have met many of the parents, and not only are they deeply caring and loving — their children are very fortunate to have such wonderful parents — but they are very articulate. I have no doubt that, if we get this wrong, they will be beating on my door to tell us that that has happened. Therefore, they have a strong voice, and we want to utilise that. We believe that the proposals, if implemented, will empower the families in shaping the future service in a way that they could never have envisaged. It is something that is completely new.

I have listened to the speeches made by Members this evening and will respond to some of the points that have been raised. Mrs Dobson was her usual articulate self, and she raised a number of points that I want to deal with. First, recommendation 6 of the working group report is clear that there is a need to expand and upgrade the links between the Republic of Ireland and Belfast in paediatric cardiology and to provide ongoing information and technological support. It specifically states that IT be targeted, and it is the view of the IWG that the infrastructure to support the remote acquisition of radiographic images already exists and there is a significant benefit to be had from utilisation of that infrastructure. That will be a key element in the model that is being taken forward.

Several Members raised the issue of the 18 months, and I hope that I have already indicated that the service-level agreement will continue. There is no intention of having any falling off the cliff edge as far as any of the service delivery is concerned. I am fully aware of the risks surrounding the 18-month period and how those skills will be implemented during it. It is essential that, during the transition, the skills be maintained, and my Department will work closely with the commissioners in Northern Ireland and the Republic of Ireland during that period. For example, we envisage that Belfast cardiologists will carry out interventional procedures in Dublin as early as possible in the new year.

Remember that some of the gentlemen and ladies who are experts in this field will simply carry on the same work in a different location. Remember that all those specialists have the same high level of training and work together. There is no form of closed shop between Northern Ireland and the Irish Republic in the field. Specialist paediatric cardiology skills will be retained and strengthened in Northern Ireland. I want to go further and say that that strengthening will make Belfast a centre of excellence for cardiology. I have asked the Health and Social Care Board to make investment proposals to secure that and strengthen the regional cardiac network at the same time. That will secure the specialist skills available in Belfast as we go forward to a single-service model. I am happy to reiterate my Department's commitment to investing in the service. One Member raised the issue —

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Order. You will be happy to know, Minister, that you have gone three minutes over your time. I will allow you to finish, because it is important.

Mr Wells: Mr Deputy Speaker, you have been very generous.

Therefore, the commitment to the additional million pounds stands, and my door is open to anybody in the Chamber or any group that requires further clarification of the route on which we are travelling.

Assembly Business

Standing Orders 10(2) to 10(4): Suspension

Mr Weir: I beg to move

That Standing Orders 10(2) to 10(4) be suspended for Monday 20 October 2014.

Mr Campbell: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. It is not related to this item of business. It is not a challenge to the ruling at all but purely for clarity. Last Tuesday, the Principal Deputy Speaker announced the outcome of an investigation into the honourable Member for North Antrim Mr Allister and curtailed his oral contributions in the Chamber over the next few weeks. Just for clarity, I want to establish whether it is the intention of the ruling to prevent Mr Allister putting down incisive, forensic and analytical written questions like the ones he did about the cost and condition of mint imperials in the Chamber.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): I understand that Mr Allister has been informed of what the situation is, and, yes, his speaking opportunities will be curtailed.

Before we proceed to the Question, I remind Members that this motion requires cross-community support.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved (with cross-community support):

That Standing Orders 10(2) to 10(4) be suspended for Monday 20 October 2014.

Ministerial Statement

North/South Ministerial Council: Agriculture

Mrs O'Neill (The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development): Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. With your permission, I wish to make a statement in compliance with section 52 of the 1998 Act regarding the 23rd meeting of the North/South Ministerial Council (NSMC) in the agriculture sector, which was held in Armagh on Wednesday 1 October. The Executive were represented by Minister Simon Hamilton and me, and the Dublin Government were represented by Simon Coveney TD, Minister in the Department of Agriculture, Food and the Marine (DAFM), and Alan Kelly TD, Minister in the Department of the Environment, Community and Local Government (DECLG).

I chaired the meeting on this occasion and have agreed the statement with the accompanying Minister, Minister Hamilton.

Ministers had a discussion on potential priorities for the agriculture sector and noted that those will be contained in a report to be considered at a future NSMC institutional meeting as part of the ongoing review into sectoral priorities.

On current sectoral priorities, Ministers noted the progress made in addressing key issues affecting the beef sector and agreed to continue to work together to secure a sustainable beef industry in both jurisdictions.

The Council noted that implementation plans have been adopted by DAFM and DARD for the common agricultural policy reforms agreed in 2013. Ministers agreed that officials from DAFM and DARD will monitor the development of the implementation process for pillar 1 and pillar 2 decisions. Ministers also noted that both Administrations are in the process of seeking approval from the European Commission for their respective rural development programmes 2014-2020, with DAFM having submitted its draft programme in July 2014 and DARD due to submit its programme later this month.

Ministers noted that DARD and DAFM have developed a protocol for the cross-border movement of larch logs infected with Phytophthora ramorum. It was noted that an all-Ireland Chalara/ash dieback conference took place in May 2014 and that DARD and DAFM are in the process of summarising stakeholders' responses to key questions. That should assist in informing future policy development.

Ministers welcomed the continued work on the delivery of the all-island animal health and welfare strategy action plan, including the completed review of common disease surveillance priorities and the commitment to cooperation in areas of mutual benefit; the agreement by DARD and DAFM of a common chapter dealing with control arrangements for African horse sickness; the coming into operation of the Welfare of Animals at the Time Of Killing Regulations 2014; the progress made by DARD towards officially brucellosis-free (OBF) status, with DAFM now considering an appropriate OBF monitoring regime following the expiry of the mandatory five years; the progress made by DAFM officials to develop a code of practice for wild animals in circuses; and the achievement of an agreement in principle to a joint contingency approach on rendering facilities.

Ministers agreed the provision of proactive support by DARD and DECLG for LEADER cooperation activities, including a specific focus on North/South cooperation. The Council welcomed the intention of the steering committee on cross-border rural development to proactively promote the development of rural recreation as a key driver in successful rural regeneration. It noted that the rural development projects funded through EU INTERREG IVa are nearing completion and that a synopsis of the impacts and achievements of the rural development theme will be presented to the Council at a future meeting.

Ministers welcomed an event taking place later that day to mark the success of the Clones Erne East Blackwater project and the redevelopment of the canal stores building.

The NSMC approved the appointment of Mr Raymond Dolan as the new chief executive officer of the Food Safety Promotion Board (FSPB) with effect from 1 October. The Council also approved the appointment of Ms Margaret Hearty as acting CEO of the Trade and Business Development Body — InterTradeIreland — on an interim basis.

The Council agreed to hold the next agriculture sector meeting in spring 2015.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Before calling the next Member to speak, I welcome Mr Maurice Devenney as a new Member for the DUP. I had the opportunity to meet Maurice earlier when he signed in. I hope that you have a long and happy career in the Northern Ireland Assembly.

Mr Irwin (The Chairperson of the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development): I thank the Minister for her statement. She referred to the key issues affecting the beef sector and said that there is an agreement to work together to secure a sustainable beef industry. Will the Minister expand on that, please?

Mrs O'Neill: There are current and real issues affecting the beef sector, and the Member will be acutely aware of the issue of nomadic cattle. We had quite a lengthy discussion on how we can work together on that issue. From the discussion, it was very clear that we need to engage continually with the retailers to accept such cattle. It is a long tradition of trade right across the island. We have agreed to hold a number of meetings with the Retail Consortium to discuss those issues. I have agreed a voluntary label, and we want the industry to accept that. We are awaiting some more confirmation on some more discussions on that. The principal underlying issue affecting the beef sector is profitability. Even when prices were good, profitability was still an issue. There are real issues to tackle, and I look forward to being able to work with Minister Coveney, particularly on our new rural development programmes and on how we can support the beef sector in particular through all the programmes that we have outlined.

Mr McMullan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for her statement. Minister, you referred to the development of a code of practice for wild animals in circuses. Will you outline what progress has been made to date?

Mrs O'Neill: I am keen to take that forward. We have set up a working group to look at the issue. As I have said previously, it is important to note that there are no circuses based here; however, there are circuses in the Twenty-six Counties that travel, and it is important that we work together to agree a clear protocol and have that in place. To date, DARD has agreed a protocol with DAFM that provides for an inspection of animals from those registered circuses before they move back into the Twenty-six Counties. I have raised the issue of wild animals in travelling circuses over the last number of NSMC meetings, and we have had regular updates from officials. Our officials continue to work within the auspices of the North/South animal welfare and transport working group. Officials will report back to Minister Coveney and to me when they have considered all of the information available to them, but we are making progress towards having a protocol and ensuring that we are providing inspection. DARD will provide that inspection where it is needed.

Mr Byrne: I thank the Minister for her statement. Will she further enlighten us on what progress has been made on the beef situation? Is legislation being seriously considered to provide cost-of-production pricing plus some profit margin for farmers? She will be aware that there are some lobbying groups who want legislation, and they want this Assembly to deal directly with Brussels in order to see what can be explored in that regard.

Mrs O'Neill: Absolutely. I support that principle in concept, and I am aware of the lobby. We are trying to scope out what we can do. I am very happy to go to Brussels and ask for a change in legislation where needed. The core issue affecting the beef sector is the fact that it is not profitable. Even when prices were high, profitability was an issue. That is what we need to grasp and tackle. We need to have a serious focus on the issue of efficiency in the beef sector. The core of the new rural development programme will be the new grants schemes and such, and we need to put a lot of emphasis and effort on supporting the beef sector so that it can become more efficient and profitable as a result.

Mrs Dobson: I also thank the Minister for her statement. I noted with interest the reference to circus animals, as was pointed out by Oliver McMullan, but will the Minister expand on what is meant by:

"agreement, in principle, to a joint contingency approach on rendering facilities."?

Furthermore, what agreement has been made?

Mrs O'Neill: It means just what it says; that we have agreed, in principle, for officials to do the work and bring forward proposals for us to be able to have plans in place when we come to deal with rendering facilities. Really, that is what it is: there is political agreement for that to happen. Officials have been tasked to go ahead and do the homework on it and then bring that work to the next NSMC meeting.

Mr McCarthy: I thank the Minister for her statement this morning. Her statement references the all-Ireland ash die-back conference, which took place in May 2014. Will the Minister advise the Assembly whether this disease has been overcome throughout the island and whether an assessment has been made of the financial cost to both parts of the island as a result of that disease?

Mrs O'Neill: It certainly has not been overcome, and we continue to deal with it. We have a strategy across the island to work together and to tackle it. One benefit of that strategy is that it is moveable, depending on the disease status and how things change. We continue to put significant resources into tackling the outbreak of P ramorum. Tree disease is high up the agenda in the work that the Forest Service is taking forward. Forest Service also works very closely on the ground with, and is very dependent on the cooperation of, landowners. We are very grateful for that cooperation. I do not have the figures, but there is a cost there in revenue loss, and I am happy to provide that to the Member in writing.

Mr Buchanan: I also thank the Minister for her statement. In her response to the Chair of the Committee, she mentioned nomadic cattle. When will this matter be resolved, as it is a huge issue for the beef finishers here in Northern Ireland?

Mrs O'Neill: I am very keen for it to be resolved ASAP. For my part, I have done what I can do, which was to approve a voluntary label. It is now in the hands of the industry as to whether it accepts that label. I have made it very clear to all the big players that I want the label. The label is acceptable and is fully compliant with EU legislation. It is now up to them to accept it. Minister Coveney and I are meeting the key retailers to ask them to accept the approved voluntary label.

As I said, there has been a long tradition of trade, and quite a number of cattle have been traded in that way over the years. We do not want to disrupt that trade, so I am very keen to get it resolved ASAP.

Mr Poots: I see that you discussed animal disease at the North/South Ministerial Council meeting. What are the figures for TB in the Republic of Ireland and Northern Ireland? What is the comparison? What steps are they taking in the Republic of Ireland and what can we learn from them to eradicate and reduce TB in Northern Ireland?

Mrs O'Neill: That is a regular item for discussion at NSMC meetings. I do not have the figures for their levels of TB, but I can tell you what our figures are. I am glad to say that our stats are on a downwards trend. We went from about 7.46% last year to just over 6% this year. So, there certainly has been progress, and hopefully that downward trend will continue.

I suppose that we approach things differently. The South culls in certain areas. That is obviously not the route that I have taken, although I know that there are some out there who would like that to be the case. We have set up the TB strategic partnership group, which has been tasked with the development of a comprehensive and practical strategy and an implementation plan to secure the progressive reduction of disease levels and the associated costs. We also have our EU eradication plan, which is worth about £5 million. So, a lot of work is going on.

I do not have the figures for the levels in the South, but I am very happy to provide that information to the Member in writing. However, it is suffice to say that having a different disease status affects trade across the island. I intend to have the same disease status across the island for TB and other diseases. We are getting there with brucellosis and hope to have our stat-free status next year. We have a way to go with TB, but it is a priority to drive it out in as quickly a manner as possible.

Mr Elliott: I thank the Minister for her brief statement. She mentioned the Clones Erne East Blackwater project. What stage is the section of the Ulster canal project at? I think that funding from the Irish Government for that has been agreed or, at least, promised, but that does not seem to have progressed.

Mrs O'Neill: I do not have the detail of that here, but there will certainly be opportunities to look at that type of project under the next rural development programme. I think that there will be funding opportunities. One of the areas that we discussed with the new Minister who is in charge of rural development in the South, Minister Kelly, was a potential strategic project. I am certainly up for playing my role to make sure that we can restore the canal to its former glory.

New Assembly Member: Mr Maurice Devenney

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Before we continue with today's business, I wish to inform the House that I have been informed by the Chief Electoral Officer that Mr Maurice Devenney has been returned as a Member of the Assembly for the Foyle constituency to fill the vacancy resulting from the resignation of Mr William Hay. This morning, Mr Devenney signed the Roll of Membership and entered his designation in my presence and that of the Clerk to the Assembly. Mr Devenney has taken his seat. I again welcome him to the Assembly and wish him every success.

Private Members' Business

Human Trafficking and Exploitation (Further Provisions and Support for Victims) Bill: Consideration Stage

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): I call the Lord Morrow to move the Consideration Stage of the Human Trafficking and Exploitation (Further Provisions and Support for Victims) Bill.

Moved. — [Lord Morrow.]

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Members will have a copy of the Marshalled List of amendments detailing the order for consideration. The amendments have been grouped for debate in the provisional grouping of amendments selected list.

There are five groups of amendments, and we will debate the amendments in each group in turn. The first debate will be on offences and penalties. This group comprises amendment Nos 1 through to 23, and amendment Nos 27, 40, 50, 60 and 61 as well as opposition to clauses 1, 2, 4 and 5 standing part.

The group 2 debate will be on amendment Nos 24 to 26 and 62 and opposition to clauses 7 and 15 standing part. This group deals with strategy and prevention.

The third debate deals with paying for sexual services. This group is made up of amendment Nos 28 to 39 and opposition to clause 6 standing part.

Group 4 deals with assistance, support and protection for victims of human trafficking and assistance for those wishing to exit prostitution. The debate will be on amendment Nos 41 to 49, 51 to 53 and opposition to clauses 8, 9, 10, 12 and 14 standing part.

The group 5 technical and commencement debate will be on amendment Nos 54 to 59, 63 and 64 and opposition to clauses 17 and 18 standing part.

I remind Members who intend to speak that, during the debates on the five groups of amendments, they should address all the amendments in each group on which they wish to comment. Once the debate on each group is completed, any further amendments in the group will be moved formally as we go through the Bill and the Question on each will be put without further debate. The Questions on stand part will be taken at the appropriate points in the Bill.

If that is clear, we shall proceed.

Clause 1 (Definition of human trafficking and slavery offences)

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): We now come to the first group for debate, which concerns amendment Nos 1 to 23, and amendment Nos 27, 40, 50, 60 and 61 as well as opposition to clauses 1, 2, 4 and 5 standing part. These amendments provide for new offences, penalties and minimum sentencing in relation to human trafficking, slavery and exploitation. A new offence of forced marriage is also included.

Members will note that amendment Nos 1 to 4 are mutually exclusive with clause 1 standing part; amendment Nos 3 to 6, 12, 15, 21 to 23, 27 and 50 are consequential to amendment Nos 1 and 2; amendment No 18 is consequential to amendment No 17; amendment No 60 is consequential to amendment No 22; and amendment No 61 is consequential to amendment Nos 1, 2, 4 and 23.

I call Lord Morrow to address his opposition to clause 1 and to address the other oppositions and amendments in the group.

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

The following amendments stood on the Marshalled List:

No 1: After clause 1 insert

“Slavery, servitude and forced or compulsory labour

1A.—(1) A person (“A”) commits an offence if—

(a) A holds another person (“B”) in slavery or servitude and the circumstances are such that A knows or ought to know that B is held in slavery or servitude, or

(b) A requires B to perform forced or compulsory labour and the circumstances are such that A knows or ought to know that B is being required to perform forced or compulsory labour.

(2) In subsection (1) the references to holding B in slavery or servitude or requiring B to perform forced or compulsory labour are to be construed in accordance with Article 4 of the Human Rights Convention.

(3) In determining whether B is being held in slavery or servitude or required to perform forced or compulsory labour regard may be had to all the circumstances.

(4) In particular, regard may be had to any of B’s personal circumstances which may make B more vulnerable than other persons such as, for example—

(a) that B is a child or a vulnerable adult; or

(b) that A is a member of B’s family.

(5) The consent of B to any act which forms part of an offence under this section is irrelevant.

(6) A person guilty of an offence under this section is liable on conviction on indictment to imprisonment for life.”— [Lord Morrow.]

No 2: After clause 1 insert

“Human trafficking

1B.—(1) A person (“A”) commits an offence if A arranges or facilitates the travel of another person (“B”) with a view to B being exploited.

(2) A may in particular arrange or facilitate B’s travel by recruiting B, transporting or transferring B, harbouring or receiving B, or transferring or exchanging control over B.

(3) A arranges or facilitates B’s travel with a view to B being exploited only if—

(a) A intends to exploit B (in any part of the world) during or after the travel, or

(b) A knows or ought to know that another person is likely to exploit B (in any part of the world) during or after the travel.

(4) “Travel” means—

(a) arriving in, or entering, any country,

(b) departing from any country,

(c) travelling within any country.

(5) The consent of B to any act which forms part of an offence under this section is irrelevant.

(6) A person to whom this subsection applies commits an offence under this section regardless of—

(a) where the arranging or facilitating takes place, or

(b) where the travel takes place.

(7) Any other person commits an offence under this section if—

(a) any part of the arranging or facilitating takes place in the United Kingdom, or

(b) the travel consists of arrival in or entry into, departure from, or travel within the United Kingdom.

(8) Subsection (6) applies to—

(a) a UK national;

(b) a person who at the time of the offence was habitually resident in Northern Ireland; and

(c) a body incorporated under the law of a part of the United Kingdom.

(9) A person guilty of an offence under this section is liable on conviction on indictment to imprisonment for life.”— [Lord Morrow.]

No 3: After clause 1 insert

“Meaning of exploitation for purposes of section 1B

1C.—(1) For the purposes of section 1B, a person is exploited only if one or more of the following subsections apply in relation to the person.

Slavery, servitude and forced or compulsory labour

(2) The person is the victim of behaviour—

(a) which involves the commission of an offence under section 1A, or

(b) which would involve the commission of an offence under that section if it took place in Northern Ireland.

Sexual exploitation

(3) Something is done to or in respect of the person—

(a) which involves the commission of an offence under—

(i) Article 3(1)(a) of the Protection of Children (Northern Ireland) Order 1978 (indecent photographs of children), or

(ii) any provision of the Sexual Offences (Northern Ireland) Order 2008 (sexual offences), or

(b) which would involve the commission of such an offence if it were done in Northern Ireland.

Removal of organs etc.

(4) The person is encouraged, required or expected to do anything—

(a) which involves the commission, by him or her or another person, of an offence under section 32 or 33 of the Human Tissue Act 2004 (prohibition of commercial dealings in organs and restrictions on use of live donors) in Northern Ireland, or

(b) which would involve the commission of such an offence, by him or her or another person, if it were done in Northern Ireland.

Securing services etc. by force, threats or deception

(5) The person is subjected to force, threats, abduction, coercion, fraud or deception designed to induce him or her—

- (a) to provide services of any kind,
- (b) to provide another person with benefits of any kind, or
- (c) to enable another person to acquire benefits of any kind;

and for the purposes of this subsection “benefits” includes the proceeds of forced begging or of criminal activities.

Securing services etc. from children and vulnerable persons

(6) Another person uses or attempts to use the person for a purpose within paragraph (a), (b) or (c) of subsection (5), having chosen him or her for that purpose on the grounds that—

- (a) he or she is a child or a vulnerable adult or is a member of the other person’s family or the other person is in a position of trust in relation to him or her; and

No 27: After clause 5 insert

“Investigation and prosecution of offences under section 1A or 1B

5G.—(1) The investigation or prosecution of an offence under section 1A or 1B is not dependent on the victim reporting the offence or accusing a person of committing the offence.

(2) Proceedings for an offence under section 1A or 1B may be commenced or continued even if the victim of the offence has withdrawn any statement made in relation to the offence.”— [Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice).]

No 40: After clause 6 insert

“Offence of forced marriage

Offence of forced marriage

6B.—(1) A person commits an offence if he or she—

(a) uses violence, threats or any other form of coercion for the purpose of causing another person to enter into a marriage, and

(b) believes, or ought reasonably to believe, that the conduct may cause the other person to enter into the marriage without free and full consent.

(2) It is irrelevant whether the conduct mentioned in paragraph (a) of subsection (1) is directed at the victim of the offence under that subsection or another person.

(3) In relation to a victim who is incapable of consenting by reason of mental disorder, the offence under subsection (1) is capable of being committed by any conduct carried out for the purpose of causing the victim to enter into a marriage (whether or not the conduct amounts to violence, threats or any other form of coercion).

(4) In this section—

“marriage” means any religious or civil ceremony of marriage (whether or not legally binding);

“mental disorder” has the meaning given by the Mental Health (Northern Ireland) Order 1986.

(5) A person commits an offence if he or she—

(a) practises any form of deception with the intention of causing another person to leave the United Kingdom, and

(b) intends the other person to be subjected to conduct outside the United Kingdom that is an offence under subsection (1) or would be an offence under that subsection if the victim were in Northern Ireland.

(6) A person commits an offence under subsection (1) or (5) only if, at the time of the conduct or deception—

(a) the person or the victim or both of them are in Northern Ireland,

(b) neither the person nor the victim is in Northern Ireland but at least one of them is habitually resident in Northern Ireland, or

(c) neither the person nor the victim is in the United Kingdom but at least one of them is a UK national.

(7) A person guilty of an offence under this section is liable—

(a) on summary conviction, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 6 months or to a fine not exceeding the statutory maximum, or both;

(b) on conviction on indictment, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 7 years.”— [Mr Hamilton (The Minister of Finance and Personnel).]

No 50: In clause 13, page 8, line 7, leave out “a human trafficking offence” and insert

“an offence under section 1A or 1B”.— [Lord Morrow.]

No 60: After clause 19 insert

‘SCHEDULES

SCHEDULE 1

DETENTION AND FORFEITURE OF CERTAIN VEHICLES, SHIPS AND AIRCRAFT

FORFEITURE ON CONVICTION OF OFFENCE UNDER SECTION 1A OR 1B

1.—(1) This paragraph applies if a person is convicted of an offence under section 1A or 1B.

(2) The court may order the forfeiture of a land vehicle used or intended to be used in connection with the offence if the convicted person—

(a) owned the vehicle at the time the offence was committed,

(b) was at that time a director, secretary or manager of a company which owned the vehicle,

(c) was at that time in possession of the vehicle under a hire-purchase agreement,

(d) was at that time a director, secretary or manager of a company which was in possession of the vehicle under a hire-purchase agreement, or

(e) was driving the vehicle in the course of the commission of the offence.

(3) The court may order the forfeiture of a ship or aircraft used or intended to be used in connection with the offence if the convicted person—

(a) owned the ship or aircraft at the time the offence was committed,

(b) was at that time a director, secretary or manager of a company which owned the ship or aircraft,

(c) was at that time in possession of the ship or aircraft under a hire purchase agreement,

(d) was at that time a director, secretary or manager of a company which was in possession of the ship or aircraft under a hire-purchase agreement,

(e) was at that time a charterer of the ship or aircraft, or

(f) committed the offence while acting as captain of the ship or aircraft.

(4) But where sub-paragraph (3)(a) or (b) does not apply to the convicted person, forfeiture of a ship or aircraft may be ordered only if sub-paragraph (5) applies or—

(a) in the case of a ship (other than a hovercraft), its gross tonnage is less than 500 tons;

(b) in the case of an aircraft, the maximum weight at which it may take off in accordance with its certificate of airworthiness is less than 5,700 kilogrammes.

(5) This sub-paragraph applies where a person who, at the time the offence was committed—

(a) owned the ship or aircraft, or

(b) was a director, secretary or manager of a company which owned it, knew or ought to have known of the intention to use it in the course of the commission of an offence under section 1A or 1B.

(6) Where a person who claims to have an interest in a land vehicle, ship or aircraft applies to a court to make representations about its forfeiture, the court may not order its forfeiture without giving the person an opportunity to make representations.

DETENTION OF CERTAIN VEHICLES, SHIPS AND AIRCRAFT

2.—(1) If a person (“P”) has been arrested for an offence under section 1A or 1B, a constable may detain a relevant land vehicle, ship or aircraft.

(2) A land vehicle, ship or aircraft is relevant if the constable has reasonable grounds to believe that an order for its forfeiture could be made under paragraph 1 if P were convicted of the offence.

(3) The land vehicle, ship or aircraft may be detained—

(a) until a decision is taken as to whether or not to charge P with the offence,

(b) if P has been charged, until P is acquitted, the charge against P is dismissed or the proceedings are discontinued, or

(c) if P has been charged and convicted, until the court decides whether or not to order forfeiture of the vehicle, ship or aircraft.

(4) A person (other than P) may apply to the court for the release of the land vehicle, ship or aircraft on the grounds that the person—

(a) owns the vehicle, ship or aircraft,

(b) was, immediately before the detention of the vehicle, ship or aircraft, in possession of it under a hire-purchase agreement, or

(c) is a charterer of the ship or aircraft.

(5) The court to which an application is made under sub-paragraph (4) may, if satisfactory security or surety is tendered, release the land vehicle, ship or aircraft on condition that it is made available to the court if—

(a) P is convicted, and

(b) an order for its forfeiture is made under paragraph 1.

(6) In this paragraph “the court” means—

(a) if P has not been charged, or P has been charged but proceedings for the offence have not begun to be heard, a magistrates’ court;

(b) if P has been charged and proceedings for the offence have begun to be heard, the court hearing the proceedings.

INTERPRETATION

3.—(1) In this Schedule—

“captain” means master (of a ship) or commander (of an aircraft);

“land vehicle” means any vehicle other than a ship or aircraft;

“ship” includes every description of vessel (including a hovercraft) used in navigation.

(2) In this Schedule a reference to being an owner of a vehicle, ship or aircraft includes a reference to being any of a number of persons who jointly own it.”.— [Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice).]

No 61: After clause 19 insert

“SCHEDULE 2

SLAVERY AND TRAFFICKING REPARATION ORDERS

POWER TO MAKE SLAVERY AND TRAFFICKING REPARATION ORDER

1.—(1) The Crown Court may make a slavery and trafficking reparation order against a person if—

(a) the person has been convicted of an offence under section 1A, 1B or 1D, and

(b) the Crown Court makes a confiscation order against the person in respect of the offence.

(2) The Crown Court may also make a slavery and trafficking reparation order against a person if—

(a) by virtue of section 178 of the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 (defendants who abscond during proceedings) it has made a confiscation order against a person in respect of an offence under section 1A, 1B or 1D, and

(b) the person is later convicted of the offence.

(3) The court may make a slavery and trafficking reparation order against the person in addition to dealing with the person in any other way (subject to paragraph 3(1)).

(4) In a case within sub-paragraph (1) the court may make a slavery and trafficking reparation order against the person even if the person has been sentenced for the offence before the confiscation order is made.

(5) In determining whether to make a slavery and trafficking reparation order against the person the court must have regard to the person’s means.

(6) If the court considers that—

(a) it would be appropriate both to impose a fine and to make a slavery and trafficking reparation order, but

(b) the person has insufficient means to pay both an appropriate fine and appropriate compensation under such an order, the court must give preference to compensation (although it may impose a fine as well).

(7) In any case in which the court has power to make a slavery and trafficking reparation order it must—

(a) consider whether to make such an order (whether or not an application for such an order is made), and

(b) if it does not make an order, give reasons.

(8) In this paragraph—

(a) “confiscation order” means a confiscation order under section 156 of the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002;

(b) a confiscation order is made in respect of an offence if the offence is the offence (or one of the offences) concerned for the purposes of Part 4 of that Act.

EFFECT OF SLAVERY AND TRAFFICKING REPARATION ORDER

2.—(1) A slavery and trafficking reparation order is an order requiring the person against whom it is made to pay compensation to the victim of a relevant offence for any harm resulting from that offence.

(2) “Relevant offence” means—

(a) the offence under section 1A, 1B or 1D of which the person is convicted;

(b) any other offence under section 1A, 1B or 1D which is taken into consideration in determining the person’s sentence.

(3) The amount of the compensation is to be such amount as the court considers appropriate having regard to any evidence and to any representations made by or on behalf of the person or the prosecutor, but subject to sub-paragraph (4).

(4) The amount of the compensation payable under the slavery and trafficking reparation order (or if more than one order is made in the same proceedings, the total amount of the compensation payable under those orders) must not exceed the amount the person is required to pay under the confiscation order.

(5) In determining the amount to be paid by the person under a slavery and trafficking reparation order the court must have regard to the person’s means.

(6) A slavery and trafficking reparation order is enforceable in the same manner as any fine which has been, or might have been, imposed in respect of the offence for which the person has been convicted by the court making the order.

(7) In sub-paragraph (4) “the confiscation order” means the confiscation order within paragraph 1(1)(b) or (2)(a) (as the case may be).

SUPPLEMENTARY

3.—(1) A slavery and trafficking reparation order and a compensation order under Article 14 of the Criminal Justice (Northern Ireland) Order 1994 may not both be made in respect of the same offence.

(2) Where the court makes a slavery and trafficking reparation order as mentioned in paragraph 1(4), for the purposes of the following provisions the person’s sentence is to be regarded as imposed or made on the day on which the order is made—

(a) section 16(1) of the Criminal Appeal (Northern Ireland) Act 1980 (time limit for notice of appeal or application for leave to appeal);

(b) paragraph 1 of Schedule 3 to the Criminal Justice Act 1988 (time limit for notice of application for leave to refer a case under section 36 of that Act).

(3) Articles 15 to 17 of the Criminal Justice (Northern Ireland) Order 1994 (appeals, review etc. of compensation orders) apply to slavery and trafficking reparation orders as if—

(a) references to a compensation order were references to a slavery and trafficking reparation order;

(b) references to injury, loss or damage were references to harm;

(c) in Article 16(a) (as amended by Schedule 4) for sub-paragraph (ii) there were substituted—

“(ii) a compensation order under Article 14 of this Order; or”;

(d) in Article 17 the references to service compensation orders or awards were omitted.

(4) If under section 171 or 172 of the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 the court varies a confiscation order so as to increase the amount required to be paid under that order, it may also vary any slavery and trafficking reparation order made by virtue of the confiscation order so as to increase the amount required to be paid under the slavery and trafficking reparation order.

(5) If under section 173 or 179 of that Act the court varies a confiscation order so as to reduce the amount required to be paid under that order, it may also—

(a) vary any relevant slavery and trafficking reparation order so as to reduce the amount which remains to be paid under that order;

(b) discharge any relevant slavery and trafficking reparation order.

(6) If under section 174 of that Act the court discharges a confiscation order, it may also discharge any relevant slavery and trafficking reparation order.

(7) For the purposes of sub-paragraphs (5) and (6) a slavery and trafficking reparation order is relevant if it is made by virtue of the confiscation order and some or all of the amount required to be paid under it has not been paid.

(8) If on an appeal under section 181 of the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 the Court of Appeal—

(a) quashes a confiscation order, it must also quash any slavery and trafficking reparation order made by virtue of the confiscation order;

(b) varies a confiscation order, it may also vary any slavery and trafficking reparation order made by virtue of the confiscation order;

(c) makes a confiscation order, it may make any slavery and trafficking reparation order the Crown Court could have made if it had made the confiscation order.

(9) If on an appeal under section 183 of that Act the Supreme Court—

(a) quashes a confiscation order, it must also quash any slavery and trafficking reparation order made by virtue of the confiscation order;

(b) varies a confiscation order, it may also vary any slavery and trafficking reparation order made by virtue of the confiscation order.

(10) For the purposes of this paragraph—

(a) a slavery and trafficking reparation order made under paragraph 1(1) is made by virtue of the confiscation order within paragraph 1(1)(b);

(b) a slavery and trafficking reparation order made under paragraph 1(2) is made by virtue of the confiscation order within paragraph 1(2)(a).”— [Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice).]

Lord Morrow: Before I come to speak to the relevant amendments in this group, I want to open with some preliminary remarks about the purpose of my Bill.

The Bill has been long in the making and no one knows that better than the one who is speaking. The first consultation on the Human Trafficking and Exploitation Bill was launched in August 2012, and it has taken over two years for us to get to this stage. I have listened to and engaged with a wide range of stakeholders, and while the fundamental provisions of the Bill remain substantively the same, it is already significantly enhanced and revised, and I hope that it will be further revised by the amendments that I have tabled or co-signed, most of which have been in cooperation with the Minister of Justice.

Before I move to the substance of the amendments in this group, I would like to say thank you to a number of people who have contributed to my Bill so far. First, I would like to say thank you to everyone who submitted evidence to my initial consultation, to the consultation conducted by the Justice Committee and during the evidence sessions conducted by the Justice Committee. The quality of the evidence provided has been of a high standard, and I have put forward a number of amendments as a consequence of submissions that were made during the initial consultation and in the evidence given to the Justice Committee. This Bill undoubtedly will be a better Bill due to these contributions.

Secondly, I would like to pay tribute to the Justice Committee, which scrutinised the Bill. The Committee process was an onerous and lengthy one, and some of the evidence given was not easy to deal with. I am thankful to the Committee for its in-depth scrutiny, and I look forward to hearing contributions from its members during today's deliberations.

Thirdly and finally, I say thank you to the Minister of Justice and his team at the Department of Justice, particularly Julie Wilson, Simon Rogers and Alison Redmond. The Minister and his Department have engaged with me very constructively, which has led to many of the positive amendments that have been tabled. Of course, disagreements remain over particular parts of my Bill, which will be explored in due course, but it would be remiss of me not to thank the Minister and his team.

I also thank the Minister of Health —

Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice): I thank the Member for giving way, and I trust, Mr Deputy Speaker, that you will allow me to make an intervention that is slightly longer than usual.

Lord Morrow recorded his gratitude to my team and to the Department, and I wish to record my gratitude to him for the constructive and positive way and the spirit of partnership with which he engaged with the Department over recent months. The Bill is undoubtedly still Lord Morrow's, but those who thought that Maurice Morrow and David Ford could not agree on anything have been proven wrong today by the unique way in which so many amendments have been signed by both of us. That is sign of the constructive engagement of which he spoke.

I add my thanks to Lord Morrow and to Mark Baillie, who has worked most closely with him, as well recording my thanks to Julie Wilson, whom he named, her team in the DOJ and other officials in DFP and DHSSPS who have assisted in ensuring that, by the end of today's debate, the fight against human trafficking in this jurisdiction will be in a much better place. Given the complexity of the Bill, I suspect that there are issues that we will need to revisit for the next stage, but I give a commitment that that constructive engagement will continue to Further Consideration Stage so that we get the best possible legislation for Northern Ireland. Thank you, Mr Deputy Speaker.

Lord Morrow: I thank the Minister very much for his comments. What he said adequately reflects the mood in which we have conducted ourselves on this side, on the Minister's side and in the Department. What he said clearly reflects the attitude that both of us brought to the table when we discussed the advancement of the Bill, even when it came to thorny issues.

I thank the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety and his team of officials, who have also worked closely with me on a couple of key clauses, and the Attorney General, who has given ongoing advice, especially on issues to do with non-prosecution.

I want to explain the way in which the amendments have been tabled. Members will see that I am opposing a number of clauses standing part, the Minister, on other occasions, is opposing a number of clauses standing part and that, on most of the clauses, we have co-signed that they should not stand part. We have done that because we want to amend the clauses in question, and, procedurally, it is easier to remove them and to insert new clauses. I reassure Members that that approach does not mean that I have changed my mind on the principle or substance of the clauses. Rather, the objective of each clause remains the same, but the wording requires to be amended to ensure smooth operation in practice.

I move on to the substance of the clauses and the amendments, which are part of a very large group and that cover a variety of new offences and sentencing powers.

I am opposing clause 1 standing part due to developments that have resulted from the Modern Slavery Bill in Westminster. Members will remember that a draft Modern Slavery Bill was introduced last December, in which consolidated offences were proposed, bringing together previous legislation on human trafficking for sexual exploitation, forced labour and slavery. If accepted, that would have provided greater clarity for the police and prosecutors in seeking to tackle those crimes.

As a result of that Bill, the Department of Justice consulted on similar offences for Northern Ireland through its consultation document, 'Human Trafficking and Slavery: Strengthening Northern Ireland's Response'. The new offences that we will debate today are the result of that consultation. It is important that we have as consistent an approach as possible across the UK on the definitions of those offences.

When I introduced my Bill, the Modern Slavery Bill had not been introduced at Westminster, and we had not had sight of these proposed new offences. Consequently, in light of the changes that have occurred since I introduced my Bill, it is appropriate for clause 1 of my Bill to be replaced. Amendment No 1 introduces new clause 1A, which would introduce a consolidated offence of slavery, servitude and forced or compulsory labour. That new offence would replace the existing offence that currently applies under section 71 of the Coroners and Justice Act 2009. New clause 1A would make it an offence knowingly to hold another person in servitude or slavery or knowingly to require another person to perform forced or compulsory labour. Clause 1A(2) defines clearly what is meant by slavery, servitude and forced or compulsory labour by explicitly referring to article 4 of the Human Rights Convention.

12.30 pm

Taken together, clause 1A(3) and clause 1A(4) outline that in deciding whether a person is a victim of an offence under this clause, regard may be had to an individual's personal circumstances. It would particularly take into account any personal circumstances that would make an individual more vulnerable than others to exploitation.

Clause 1A(5) embeds in law what clause 2 of my Bill sought to achieve: the victim's consent to any part of the offence committed against them under clause 1A is irrelevant.

Lastly, clause 1A(6) ensures that offences of slavery, servitude and forced or compulsory labour in Northern Ireland can be tried only on indictment. This is a different approach to that taken in the Modern Slavery Bill but fits with the way in which human trafficking offences are currently tried in Northern Ireland. Members will remember that we agreed to move to such trafficking cases being tried only in a Crown Court when we passed the Criminal Justice Act (Northern Ireland) 2013. In England and Wales, cases can be heard in a Magistrates' Court as well as in a Crown Court.

Amendment No 2 introduces new clause 1B. This clause would create a consolidated offence of human trafficking to replace the current separate offences of human trafficking for the purposes of sexual exploitation and human trafficking for other forms of exploitation that are set out in sections 57 to 59 of the Sexual Offences Act 2003 and section 4 of the Asylum and Immigration (Treatment of Claimants, etc.) Act 2004. Under new clause 1B, it would be an offence to arrange or facilitate the travel of another person with a view to them being exploited. The offence would cover all forms of exploitation as defined under new clause 1C.

Clause 1B(2) clarifies that arranging or facilitating travel may include transporting, transferring, harbouring or receiving the victim, or transferring or exchanging control over them. This addition goes beyond existing trafficking offences and makes it clear that the full international definition of the act of trafficking set out in the Palermo Protocol applies. I warmly welcome that development.

Clause 1B(3) makes it clear that an offence has been committed whether the person intends to exploit the victim themselves, or knows or ought to know that another person is likely to exploit them.

Clause 1B(4) defines travel comprehensively to mean entering into, departing from or travelling within any country. Clause 1B(5), like clause 1A(5), replicates the effect of clause 2 of my Bill by ensuring that a victim's consent to any act forming part of the offence is irrelevant.

Clause 1A(6), clause 1A(7) and clause 1A(8), taken together, address the international dimension of human trafficking. In line with clause 1A(6), clause 1B(9) ensures that an offence under this clause can be tried on indictment only.

Amendment No 3 introduces new clause 1C. This clause defines what constitutes exploitation for the purposes of a human trafficking offence under new clause 1B. In doing so, it consolidates the relevant provisions of what currently constitutes exploitation in respect of the existing offences of human trafficking and extends the categories of exploitation to include a number of additional measures that had previously been included in clause 5 of the Bill. These were and are intended to bring extra clarity to what constitutes exploitation of forced labour, and I hope that Members will appreciate that they have not been lost in the process of consolidation. These additional measures include a clarification that "benefits of any kind" include "the proceeds of forced begging" or "criminal activities" and that securing services by force includes the use of coercion, abduction or fraud to induce a person to provide services.

I also draw to Members' attention that we have taken the opportunity of consolidating these definitions to make it clear that there will be a different approach to securing services or benefits from children or vulnerable adults. Proposed new clause 1C(6) sets out that an offence can be committed where there is no use of force or coercion in making the victim provide the services, where the victim is a child or a vulnerable person. The existing legislation attempted to deal with these situations where the victims' particular vulnerability is exploited in this way; however, it used rather vague terms, such as "young" rather than stipulating that the person is a child.

Amendment No 4 introduces new clause 1D. Under article 66 of the Sexual Offences (Northern Ireland) Order 2008, it is an offence to commit an offence:

"with the intention of committing a relevant sexual offence".

Sections 57 to 59 of the Sexual Offences Act 2003 provide that relevant sexual offences include offences of human trafficking for the purpose of sexual exploitation and, under article 66 of the Sexual Offences Order (Northern Ireland) 2008, preparatory offences, which include offences of "aiding, abetting, counselling or procuring" such an offence. However, as has been the case in many areas of trafficking legislation, these preparatory offences have applied only to human trafficking for the purposes of sexual exploitation and not for human trafficking for forced labour or of slavery, servitude and forced or compulsory labour offences.

New clause 1D is one of many changes that will be made to the Bill to bring parity in the way that the criminal justice system treats human trafficking and slavery offences. It will create a new preparatory offence similar to that under article 66 of the 2008 Order, which would apply where an individual commits an offence with the intention of committing any slavery-like or trafficking offence under new clauses 1A or 1B. This will mean that lesser offences — for example, stealing a vehicle — that are committed in preparation for and with the intention of committing a slavery or trafficking offence will be eligible for a longer sentence, due to the connection with slavery or trafficking. These offences acknowledge that slavery and human trafficking often involve a chain of events and a range of people at different levels and stages but that they all contribute to the ultimate result of trafficking or forced labour.

In applying this preparatory offence to slavery-like offences, my Bill will go beyond the provisions of the Modern Slavery Bill, in which the equivalent preparatory offence would apply only in respect of human trafficking offences under clause 2 of that Bill. An offence under new clause 1D would ordinarily attract a maximum sentence of 10 years on indictment or six months and/or a fine on summary conviction. Where, however, the offence is committed by kidnapping or false imprisonment, it would attract a life sentence.

I hope that Members will feel that the four new clauses that I have outlined will give Northern Ireland a robust criminal law framework to take the Province forward in tackling these awful crimes. I urge all Members to vote in support of the proposed new clauses.

The purpose of clause 2 is to set out the situations in which the consent of a victim of trafficking or slavery will be considered irrelevant in the context of a criminal offence. The issue of consent, or lack of it, is now covered by the text of new clauses 1A and 1B. Consequently, clause 2 no longer needs to remain in the Bill and should be removed. I urge Members to oppose clause 2 standing part of the Bill.

Amendment No 5 introduces a new clause 2A. It seeks to amend the Criminal Justice (Northern Ireland) Order 2008 to classify the new slavery and human trafficking offences under new clauses 1A and 1B as serious offences for the purposes of sentencing dangerous offenders under schedule 1 to the 2008 Order. It also amends schedule 2 to the Order to classify human trafficking and slavery offences as violent offences under part 1 of the schedule and to classify human trafficking for sexual exploitation as a specified sexual offence for the purposes of sentencing dangerous offenders under part 2 of the schedule. In so doing, the clause will allow the court, where it considers it necessary for the purposes of public protection, to set down a life sentence, an indeterminate custodial sentence or an extended custodial sentence. Members will know that there is a significant increase in potential penalties from the previous arrangements, where the maximum penalty was 14 years. I hope that Members will support the very strong signal that offenders of those awful crimes committed in Northern Ireland will be treated extremely severely.

I am very pleased to have tabled amendment Nos 6 to 14 together with the Minister. Members will remember that I included a clause on aggravating factors in my Bill because the European directive and the European convention on trafficking include particular elements that indicate that a higher penalty should be given to a perpetrator. I recognise that setting out such factors is an unusual step to take, but it is not without precedent in the United Kingdom: aggravating factors are set out in section 4A of the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971, as introduced by section 1 of the England and Wales Drugs Act 2005.

Amendment Nos 6 to 14 are a series of small, technical amendments that ensure that the text aligns with other pieces of legislation and add clarity to the definitions of “public official”, “vulnerable adult” and a “member of the family of the victim”. In all those cases, the purpose and effect of the clause remains the same. However, the amendments will make the text more effective, and areas of uncertainty will be removed. The Minister and I have agreed on the amendments outlined, and I urge all sides of the House to support them. Members will see that there are a considerable number of amendments that we will discuss shortly that bring in new powers on sentencing, such as in proposed new clauses 5A to 5D. The inclusion of specific aggravating factors is a helpful addition to the substantial efforts being made to tackle perpetrators severely.

The Minister made clear his opposition to the principle of clause 4 at Second Stage, and he is seeking to have it removed from the Bill today. I clearly state that I strongly and emphatically disagree with the Minister on this. In the past, as, I am sure, he will today, the Minister stated that introducing a minimum sentence would unduly fetter the discretion of judges to impose an appropriate sentence.

That, however, simply does not stand up to scrutiny.

12.45 pm

In the first instance, the Assembly frequently imposes limits on the sentences that can be handed down by judges. Judges do not have absolute discretion to impose whatever sentence they would like. For example, it would be manifestly unjust for a judge to impose a life sentence on a person who was caught shoplifting, and the relevant statute does not allow a judge to do so. If we as an Assembly can fetter the discretion of a judge in terms of the maximum penalty he or she can impose for an offence, why can we not do so in terms of minimum sentences?

In the second instance, in answer to that question and of vital importance, Northern Ireland already has minimum sentences. Article 70 of the Firearms (Northern Ireland) Order 2004, which was passed in this House in 2004, imposes minimum sentences for a range of firearms-related offences, and schedule 2 of the Violent Crime Reduction Act 2006, which applies to Northern Ireland, imposes a minimum sentence for the offence of using someone else to hide or carry a dangerous weapon so as to make the weapon available for the first person to use for an unlawful purpose. I doubt that we will hear anyone argue today for the repeal of article 70 of the Firearms Order or schedule 2 of the Violent Crime Reduction Act, but that is vital if one is really opposed to the principle of imposing minimum sentences in statute.

The truth is that, whether one considers minimum or maximum sentences, it is entirely appropriate for legislatures to set out the seriousness of an offence by determining the order of penalty that is required. That does not remove judicial discretion any more than defining an offence in statute does. It is very proper that a legislature should be able to define an offence and its seriousness as that relates to sentencing. Judicial discretion remains very much alive and well between minimum and maximum sentences.

Clause 4 rises to that challenge to make it plain that we in the Assembly, the lawmaking body on justice in Northern Ireland, regard human trafficking and slavery as very serious crimes and want would-be offenders to be fully cognisant of that fact before they consider trafficking or holding someone in slavery in Northern Ireland. That is a completely legitimate view for the Assembly to take and one that clause 4 helps to deliver.

To those who, despite those, in my judgement, overwhelming arguments, may still have questions, I will make two further points. First, with the help of the Attorney General we have been able to draft a sophisticated and balanced clause. I will shortly outline my amendments, which send out a very important message to would-be offenders whilst not removing judicial discretion.

Crucially, clause 4 gives judges the freedom to derogate from the two years in exceptional circumstances, although they must account for doing so. Secondly, they should also be aware that, in dealing with the serious crime that we are discussing today, it is a measure that the public supports. An Ipsos MORI poll conducted in August included the following question:

"A proposal has been put forward at the Northern Ireland Assembly to introduce a required minimum sentence of two years for those people convicted of human trafficking or slavery offences within the country. The proposal allows for judges to set a lower sentence in very exceptional circumstances. Do you believe that it is appropriate for such a minimum sentence to be introduced?"

Some 65% of people responded to that question with the answer "yes" and 54% said that they believed that very strongly.

I believe that it is a timely and very well conceived provision that will be very much to the benefit of Northern Ireland. I warmly commend it and urge the House to vote against the motion that clause 4 should not stand part of the Bill.

I will now address the amendments in detail. Amendment No 15 is a technical amendment that links clause 4 to the new consolidated offences. Amendment No 16 would amend clause 4 so that the minimum sentence framework would not apply to children. It was an oversight in the initial Bill that the sentence would apply to children. I am grateful to the Member for East Antrim, the Minister of Justice, who pointed that out at Second Stage.

Amendment No 17 would ensure that, if a judge decides that there are exceptional circumstances that justify not imposing the two-year minimum custodial sentence, they must state their reasons in open court. Amendment No 18 requires the reasons to be recorded by the chief clerk. This ensures that, where there are exceptional circumstances that mean either a lower sentence or a suspended sentence is appropriate, the court is able to give such a sentence, but the reasons need to be given in open court. This will help to ensure that judges are accountable for the sentences that they impose, ensuring that such decisions are taken in a reasoned way. It will also bring clarity about such exceptional decisions for the general public and help to maintain public trust in the sentencing regime.

My amendment No 19 arises out of the concern that —

Mr Elliott: Will the Member give way?

Lord Morrow: Right, OK, I will.

Mr Elliott: I appreciate the Member giving way. I just have a very short query about the last two amendments, under which the court has to give an explanation as to why it may give a lesser or more lenient sentence. I just wonder whether the Member has any ideas or are there any guidelines in statute at the moment as to why a more lenient sentence might even be given. Is it just left to the discretion of the judiciary?

Lord Morrow: I will come to that point in a moment or two. I listened carefully to what the Member said in relation to that.

My amendment No 19 arises out of the concern that, under the clause as currently drafted, it would be technically possible for a court to hand down a two-year suspended sentence. This outcome would undermine the ability of the clause to deliver the clear message that I believe we should send to traffickers. I am very grateful to the Attorney General for spotting that loophole and for suggesting a means to plug it by defining a custodial sentence as not including a suspended sentence, but allowing for such a sentence in exceptional circumstances.

Amendment No 20 introduces a series of technical consequential amendments to ensure that the sentencing framework in other relevant legislation includes the proposed minimum sentence. The changes I am putting forward here reflect the same changes on sentencing as in the minimum sentence in article 70 of the Firearms (Amendment) (Northern Ireland) Order 2004. Under new subsection 4(2D), the Attorney General may refer a sentence for review if the judge fails to impose the minimum sentence. Under new subsection 4(2E), the courts cannot give the perpetrator an absolute and conditional discharge, a probation order, a community service order or an order combining community service and probation. Under new subsection 4(2F), that new minimum sentence would be reflected in the same way as other minimum sentences in legislation setting custodial sentences.

My clause 5 outlines some policy changes I believe should take place to the current Asylum and Immigration Act 2004. However, I am glad to reassure Members that the proposals that I made in clause 5 have been incorporated into new clauses 1A to 1C. In light of those changes, I am content that clause 5 is no longer needed and should not stand part of the Bill.

I strongly support amendment Nos 21 to 30, 27, 60 and 61 to bring in new sentencing powers that reflect provisions in the Modern Slavery Bill. These are amendments that are proposed by the Minister and to which I have added my name. They are complicated provisions that I will set out in broad terms in the next few minutes and allow the Minister to deal with any points of detail.

Amendment No 21 will make it easier for assets to be recovered from those convicted of human trafficking and slavery offences by designating new clauses 1A and 1B as criminal lifestyle offences for the purpose of the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002. It seems clear to me that any measure that will make it easier to recover assets from those who commit these offences is worthy of support. It is crucial that perpetrators of these crimes can have any assets that they have gained through committing them confiscated.

Amendment Nos 22 and 60 introduce new clause 5B and the related schedule 1. Those amendments would allow courts to order the confiscation of land, vehicles, ships or aircraft if they were used or were intended to be used in connection with human trafficking and slavery offences. Under the Sexual Offences Act 2003, those powers are available in Northern Ireland and will continue to be available through the new consolidated offences in this clause.

Amendment Nos 23 and 61 introduce new clause 5C and schedule 2 to allow the court to order an offender to pay a reparation order. That will provide another avenue through which victims can gain some level of compensation for what they have suffered. The advantage of a reparation order over the criminal injuries compensation scheme is that the money comes directly from the perpetrator's assets, if they have any that can be claimed. I am particularly pleased that the courts must consider setting down a reparation order, and, if they do not do so, the judge must outline why they have not done so. However, the point should be emphasised that the orders do not stop a victim making a claim from the state, as well as through the criminal injuries compensation scheme. They simply offer another way of obtaining money to benefit victims.

Amendment No 27 introduces new clause 5G, which will maintain the content of clause 7(2) and 7(3) of my initial Bill in a separate new clause inserted in the most appropriate part of the Bill now that there are new clauses on other criminal justice matters. I believe that the clause is necessary to make it crystal clear to those investigating or seeking to prosecute the perpetrators of these offences that such action is not dependent on the victim reporting that the offence has occurred or accusing an individual of committing such an offence.

As I have said all along, this is a Bill about exploitation. Amendment No 40 has been tabled by the Minister of Finance and Personnel and would introduce a new offence of forced marriage to Northern Ireland. The offence was not included in the initial version of the Bill that I introduced in 2013. However, I am happy for it to be included. It is manifestly obvious to me that forced marriage is a form of exploitation. The offence is based on a similar offence that passed into law in England and Wales earlier this year. I will allow the Minister to speak about the matter further in his contribution.

Amendment No 50 pertains to clause 13 of my Bill, which seeks to protect victims during the course of criminal investigations. I will speak more about this clause later.

Amendment No 50 links the protections of clause 13 to the offences that we are introducing through amendment Nos 1 and 2. Amendment No 50 also extends the provision of the measures to victims of offences under new clauses 1A and 1B. Originally, the clause provided the protection only to victims of human trafficking, following the England and Wales regulations and the EU anti-trafficking directive. However, I have since concluded that the vulnerability of victims of slavery offences is such that this special treatment should be available for those victims, as well as for those who have been trafficked.

1.00 pm

Mr Givan (The Chairperson of the Committee for Justice): With your indulgence, Mr Deputy Speaker, before addressing the amendments, I wish to make some general remarks about the Bill in my capacity as Chairman of the Committee for Justice.

First, I commend Lord Morrow on introducing this very important Bill to the Assembly. I know the commitment and tenacity that he has shown and the hard work and perseverance that it has taken to get the Bill to this stage of the process, and I congratulate him on that. Speaking in the capacity of party colleague, I can say that we are immensely proud of the way in which Lord Morrow has championed the Bill and spent over two years dedicating himself, heart and soul, to bringing forward this legislation. We have huge admiration for the way in which he has conducted himself, at times in the face of very difficult challenges that were being posed to him. He has very carefully and studiously avoided getting involved in confrontation and dealt methodically with all the issues that have been brought his way.

I have no doubt that, when we look back on what, I trust, will be the Bill's successful passage through the House, we will see this day as being a historic occasion. I trust that Lord Morrow will look back with immense pride that he led on the Bill and brought it to this stage and that the Assembly supported him. Indeed, on behalf of my colleagues, I would go as far as to say — this is no exaggeration — that, in bringing the Bill forward, we regard Lord Morrow as a modern-day William Wilberforce. I have no doubt that he would put his imprimatur on the Bill and endorse its content fully. I cannot speak highly enough of our colleague and party chairman, and I am very proud to have been able to support him in some way in getting to this point. It is important that we put that on the record.

As I have said on numerous occasions and as the Justice Committee has heard at first hand, human trafficking is a heinous crime that devastates people's lives and that needs to be tackled from every possible angle. In 2012, when the Committee considered the Criminal Justice Bill, which created two new human trafficking offences, we made it very clear to the Minister of Justice that we wanted the strongest possible legislation to be introduced in Northern Ireland for human trafficking. In the evidence that the Committee received during the passage of that Bill, it was clear that a number of organisations believed that the Department was adopting a minimalist approach in implementing the EU directive on human trafficking and had missed an opportunity to put additional measures into legislation, particularly in relation to the protection, assistance and support of victims, including children, and the availability of proper investigative tools.

There is no doubt that Lord Morrow, through his Bill, is changing that approach and ensuring that the legislation in this country to deal with human trafficking is much improved. His Bill will also address one of the other criticisms raised at that time, which related to the complexity and piecemeal approach to the legislative framework for offences concerning human trafficking and the need for a single comprehensive piece of legislation that would assist in increasing the understanding of the justice framework for dealing with the crime and awareness of it.

Given the importance of the Bill and the interest expressed, the Committee spent considerable time undertaking detailed and careful scrutiny of the then 19 clauses. After completion of Committee Stage, we have continued to consider a range of proposed amendments, most recently in September, following which the Committee wrote to all Assembly Members outlining the updated position.

The Committee sought a wide range of views as part of its deliberations on the Bill and requested evidence from interested organisations and individuals as well as from the Department of Justice. Over 139 written submissions were received, and the Committee took oral evidence from a wide range of witnesses, including voluntary organisations that provide support to trafficked victims and work with those involved in prostitution; academics; Church and faith-based representatives; individuals who are or were involved in prostitution; the Police Service; the Public Prosecution Service; officials from the Department of Justice; the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety; and the Attorney General for Northern Ireland. Lord Morrow, as Bill sponsor, also attended the Committee on several occasions to discuss the Bill's provisions and possible amendments.

To assist its consideration of clause 6, the Committee undertook a visit to Sweden in December 2013 to meet government and non-government representatives to discuss its legislation, which criminalises the purchase of sex. We also met the Oireachtas Joint Committee on Justice, Defence and Equality in Dublin in January 2014 to discuss the findings of its report on a review of legislation on prostitution, which recommends the introduction of a summary offence penalising the purchase of sexual services of another person by means of prostitution or any request, agreement or attempt to do so.

It is clear that the Committee scrutinised and considered all aspects of the Bill in a full and thorough manner. I thank the members of the Committee for their diligence and contributions during the Committee Stage process. I put on record my thanks to those no longer on the Committee: Mr Jim Wells; Mr William Humphrey, who I see is here with us; Mr Sydney Anderson; and Ms McCorley. It is fair to say that some members came with a differing viewpoint at the start of the process, but I have no doubt that the scrutiny carried out and the challenges made led to the robust legislation that we have today. It was a demonstration of how the Assembly and the Justice Committee do work and can do a course of work in which all the political parties can operate together, albeit with differing viewpoints at times. The outcome of that work is a demonstration of how business can be done in the Assembly. This legislation is testimony to that.

As Lord Morrow said, it was not an easy task, and some of the oral evidence on personal experiences was difficult and distressing to hear. I also thank the witnesses who provided written and oral evidence, particularly those who shared with the Committee their personal experiences of trafficking and prostitution, which was not easy for them. I thank Lord Morrow, who, very helpfully, provided further information and kept the Committee informed of developments relating to the Bill, and the Department of Justice officials who kept us updated with developments relating to the Modern Slavery Bill in Westminster and the related provisions for Northern Ireland.

I believe that today is historic — it is an historic opportunity to seize the moment. Northern Ireland and the Assembly can lead on this issue in the United Kingdom and on the island of Ireland. I hope that Members, as we go through the various debates on the groups of amendments, will reflect and come together to send a clear message. I hope that we will seize the moment to make a difference in our society for the most vulnerable. That is what is at the core of the legislation: the protection and support of the most vulnerable.

I turn now to clauses 1, 2 and 5 and the amendments to introduce new clauses 1A, 1B, 1C, 1D and 2A. In the evidence received by the Committee, there was support for the clarity provided in clause 1 on the definition of human trafficking. The inclusion of forced labour was also welcomed, with views expressed that all forms of modern-day slavery should be covered under a unified piece of legislation. There was similar support for clause 5, which provides for the inclusion of additional definitions in the Asylum and Immigration (Treatment of Claimants, etc.) Act 2004 to mirror the EU directive, particularly in relation to forced begging.

During Committee Stage, the Department told the Committee that, as a result of the draft Modern Slavery Bill, which was published by the Home Secretary on 16 December 2013, it was undertaking a consultation on proposals to strengthen the response to human trafficking and slavery in Northern Ireland. The Committee was content with clauses 1 and 5 but noted that the results of the Department's consultation, which included proposals to simplify and consolidate the legislative framework for human trafficking and slavery offences, would have a bearing on both clauses and that amendments may be needed.

On clause 2, all organisations that submitted evidence agreed that a victim's consent should be irrelevant in cases of human trafficking or slavery offences. However, there were differing views on whether clause 2 was necessary, given the law already in place. While some were of the opinion that the provision was unnecessary and that enacting it may give rise to complications, others indicated that it was important to provide clarity on when a victim's consent should be considered irrelevant. They highlighted the 2013 Anti-Trafficking Monitoring Group report, which indicated that there seemed to persist an incorrect view that a trafficked person needed to be abducted or forced to come to the United Kingdom against their will.

When Lord Morrow attended a Committee meeting to discuss the Bill, he recognised that there had been considerable debate on whether clause 2 was required but said that, in his view, stating the need for the consent of victims to be irrelevant was important. He also advised the Committee that amendments would be required to the clause, depending on the outcome of the Department's consultation. The Committee agreed that it was content to support clause 2, but noted that amendments may be needed.

More recently, departmental officials attended a Committee meeting on 10 September 2014 to outline the further work that had been carried out in conjunction with Lord Morrow following the consultation exercise and the range of amendments that is in front of us today. The aim of the amendments, which will replace clauses 1, 2 and 5, is to repeal existing offences and to create a series of new, consolidated offences and definitions relating to human trafficking, exploitation and slavery, servitude and forced or compulsory labour. They will also create new penalties. Amendment No 21 will enable slavery-like and human trafficking offences to be specified as criminal lifestyle offences, which will improve the courts' ability to confiscate criminal assets. Amendment Nos 22 and 60 will enable the courts to order the forfeiture of land vehicles, ships or aircraft that were used or intended for use in connection with human trafficking or slavery-like offences; and amendment Nos 23 and 61 will make provision for the courts to impose new slavery and trafficking reparation orders under which offenders convicted of the offences under new clauses 1A, 1B or 1D will be required to pay reparation to their victims.

The Committee is content with the approach adopted by Lord Morrow and the Minister, and the new penalties obviously strengthen the ability of the police and the courts to deal with the perpetrators of human trafficking and are therefore very welcome indeed. The Committee also welcomes the fact that the new offences will be triable on indictment only, particularly as we used the Criminal Justice Bill to ensure that that would be the case when the new human trafficking offences were being brought forward at that time, and notes that they clarify that the victim's consent to any part of an offence under these new clauses is irrelevant, thus delivering the intended effect of clause 2.

The Committee also supports new clause 2A, which will bring the new offences under the scope of the public protection sentencing framework enabling a court, where it considers it necessary, to impose a life sentence, an indeterminate custodial sentence or an extended custodial sentence, with the result that individuals subject to such sentences will also be subject to the relevant release, licence and recall arrangements.

Moving on to clause 3, the key issue is whether the aggravating factors that a court must consider when passing sentence for human trafficking or slavery offences should be set in statute and, if so, whether that will limit judicial discretion or whether sentencing guidelines would be preferable. The evidence received by the Committee indicated that, while a few organisations preferred sentencing guidelines, there was strong support for clause 3 from the majority of respondents, who felt that the aggravating factors should be set out in the Bill and considered that that approach was not inconsistent with judicial discretion.

The Department initially expressed concern that setting aggravating factors in statute would limit flexibility in responding to emerging case law and fetter the discretion of judges and was of the view that sentencing guidelines would be a better vehicle to respond flexibly to case law as it emerged. However, in light of the strong support in the evidence to the Committee, officials advised that the Minister would support clause 3 but indicated that a number of technical amendments were required. When considering clause 3, the Committee noted the opinion of the Attorney General for Northern Ireland that there was no obstacle to the legislature setting out a series of aggravating factors, that it was not inconsistent with judicial discretion in sentencing, and that the sentencing judge retained discretion to consider factors other than those set out by statute in reaching his or her decision on sentence. The Committee agreed that it was content with clause 3, subject to the technical amendments proposed by the Department and which have been brought forward today.

I turn now to clause 4 and the associated amendments brought by Lord Morrow. When the Committee considered clause 4, two particular issues arose: whether the inclusion of a minimum sentence in legislation regarding human trafficking and slavery offences fettered judicial discretion; and the fact that the compulsory minimum sentence applied to children. There was unanimity in the view that it was unacceptable for clause 4 to apply equally to children and adults and that it required amendment to clarify that the minimum sentence provision does not apply to children. The Committee agreed with this view, and Lord Morrow indicated that he intended to bring forward amendments to make the necessary changes, which he has done today.

With regard to whether clause 4 fetters judicial discretion, there was a much wider range of views, with organisations such as the Law Centre, the PSNI and Victim Support expressing concern that the application of minimum sentencing would compromise judicial discretion. Other key stakeholders welcomed the clause, stating that incorporating a minimum sentence in the legislation was a necessary deterrent, that it sent a strong message to the perpetrators of human trafficking, and that the wording used still provided for judges to apply discretion. The Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission agreed with this interpretation, advising that, in its view, the figure of two years proposed as the minimum sentence was not arbitrary but reflected a subtle increase in current sentencing practice and that the clause allows for judicial discretion because exceptional circumstances are written into it.

1.15 pm

From the start, the Minister of Justice indicated to the Committee that he had concerns regarding a compulsory minimum sentence, and he intends to oppose the clause today. When the Committee discussed the clause with departmental officials, they stated that compulsory minimum sentences were rarely specified in law, reflecting the principle that judges should normally be free to take account of all available evidence and the unique circumstances in a particular case, allowing them to reach a decision on sentencing that fits the crime. In their view, clause 4 would restrict the scope for judicial discretion.

When pressed on the issue of judicial discretion by Committee members, officials accepted that clause 4 did not, strictly speaking, introduce a compulsory minimum custodial sentence, as there was qualification to permit judicial discretion, but were of the view that it was better not to have a range of statutory provisions that would then have an exemption in them and that, instead, discretion should be left entirely in the hands of the judiciary.

The Committee availed itself of the opportunity to discuss the concerns raised regarding clause 4 with the Attorney General when he attended in March. He indicated that the clause does not make provision for a hard minimum sentence model, and the provision for the retention of discretion for the judge to impose a sentence below the minimum threshold, where there are exceptional circumstances, allows flexibility for judges to depart from the statutory minimum. He suggested that it might be desirable to include an obligation for reasons to be stated by the judge if a case is considered exceptional, which would strike an appropriate balance between the policy imperative of an effective minimum sentence and the requirement to do justice in the individual case. The Committee for Justice is clear in its support for a robust sentencing framework that reflects the gravity of human trafficking and slavery offences and indicates the seriousness with which such offences are viewed in Northern Ireland.

When considering clause 4, a number of Committee members expressed some reservations about the broad concept of including minimum sentences in legislation. They were concerned that the clause could interfere with judicial discretion in individual cases, that the majority of cases would become exceptional or that appeals in respect of the severity of the sentence based on whether the judge had given appropriate weight to the exceptional circumstances put forward would arise. They indicated that they wished to consider the arguments further before supporting the clause's inclusion in the Bill.

Other Committee members, including me, were content that sufficient qualification is provided to ensure that there is not an absolute minimum sentence and that it does not exclude judicial discretion. We viewed the clause as being persuasive on the court to impose a two-year sentence but not binding on it. We also welcomed the proposal for an amendment to require a judge to state the reasons if a decision is reached that the case is exceptional and the minimum sentence should not be imposed, viewing that as an appropriate mechanism to address concerns around exceptional cases becoming the norm.

The Committee agreed to support clause 4, subject to amendments to restrict a minimum sentence for a human trafficking offence to adults only, to ensure that the sentence is an immediate custodial sentence and not a suspended sentence and to require a court to state the reasons that a case is considered exceptional. Amendment Nos 15, 16, 17, 18, 19 and 20 tabled by Lord Morrow address those issues. I hope that the other Committee members who, when we were completing the Committee Stage of the Bill, required further time to reflect on the clause, are able to support its inclusion in the Bill today once it has been amended as outlined.

Clause 7 sets out requirements for investigation and prosecution, including that there must be sufficient training and resources for investigating and prosecuting human trafficking and slavery offences, that a prosecution is not dependent on reporting or accusation by a victim and that a prosecution can take place even if the victim has withdrawn their statement. Most of the organisations that discussed the clause with the Committee recognised the importance of sufficient training and resources for investigating and prosecuting human trafficking and slavery offences, and therefore welcomed this aspect of it, with views expressed that there was not much point in having legislation to tackle human trafficking if the investigators and prosecutors lacked the necessary tools and training to identify victims and prosecute perpetrators.

Further awareness training to recognise the signs and symptoms of trafficking and prostitution, including risks and triggers, was identified as particularly necessary. It was also felt that some amendments to the wording may be required to ensure that responsibility for all the training does not rest solely with the Department of Justice but that all Departments and agencies responsible for investigating or prosecuting human trafficking or slavery offences take appropriate measures.

In contrast, the police indicated that they developed and introduced training packages to educate and assist officers in detecting and investigating human trafficking offences and did not believe that there was a requirement for legislation in this area.

The Public Prosecution Service (PPS) also noted that the legislation placed a responsibility for public prosecutors to be trained and stated that this would require the appropriate Department to provide the PPS with legal training resources.

The Department indicated to the Committee that it recognised the intent behind clause 7 and the importance of providing appropriate training and resources for front line professionals in responding effectively to human trafficking and highlighted that a number of steps had already been taken across the criminal justice system and other front line professions to train and raise awareness of this issue. However, it did have concerns that the wording of the clause placed a statutory duty solely on the Department whereas responsibility for training and equipping investigators and prosecutors rested with a range of law enforcement agencies, some of which fall outside the Department's authority. The Department stated that it would prefer to omit clause 7(1) and amend clause 15 to include a requirement that the strategy under that clause must include matters relating to training, investigation and prosecution, which, in its view, would provide a more strategic response and allow training and resources to be considered under a more comprehensive multi-agency approach.

Lord Morrow subsequently advised the Committee that he had discussed the Department's concerns with officials and was content with the proposal to omit clause 7(1) and address matters relating to training, investigation and prosecution in clause 15. The Committee views the provision of adequate and appropriate training for all front line professionals to enable human trafficking to be tackled effectively as being very important and was therefore content to support the approach agreed by Lord Morrow and the Department of Justice in relation to clause 7(1).

In relation to clause 7, subsections (2) and (3), the PPS advised the Committee that it would apply the test for prosecution in all cases referred by the police regardless of whether the victim reported the offence, made a statement, or withdrew a statement, and highlighted that the PPS policy for prosecuting cases of human trafficking clarified this and the steps to be taken in such circumstances. The Committee agreed to support the provisions in clause 7, subsections (2) and (3), that set out that a prosecution is not dependent on reporting or accusation by a victim and can take place even if the victim has withdrawn their statement, in recognition of the difficulties for victims, some of whom do not even know what country they are in and speak little English, to come forward and give statements and evidence in court and noted that a technical amendment to omit unnecessary words in clause 7(2) was needed.

More recently, Lord Morrow and the Minister of Justice advised the Committee that to assist the structure of the Bill, they intend to remove clause 7 and replace it with new clause 5G, which is set out in amendment 27. As there are no substantive changes being made, the Committee is content with this approach.

Let me speak briefly on amendment 40, which is being brought by the Minister of Finance and Personnel and will introduce a new offence of forced marriage. During the Committee Stage of the Bill, Lord Morrow advised the Committee that he had received a request from the Minister to include this new offence in the Bill. He indicated that the offence was part of the Westminster Anti-social Behaviour, Crime and Policing Act 2014, which had recently received Royal Assent and created a new offence of forcing someone to marry against their will. The result of the introduction of the new offence in England and Wales is that Northern Ireland is out of step with the rest of the United Kingdom, and the gap needed to be addressed.

The Committee was supportive of the inclusion of the new provision in the Bill in principle and requested further information on the detail of the proposed new offence from the Department of Finance and Personnel. The Committee subsequently noted the further information on the new offence, which is before us today. It makes sense, therefore, to use this available legislative opportunity to bring about the necessary changes to provide for this new offence and appropriate penalties, and I am sure that the Assembly will support this new provision.

At this stage, those are all the comments I wish to make as Chairman of the Committee. I appreciate that it has taken a little bit of time; however, given that the Committee has a report of 1,200 pages, I will seek to do my best to get all the necessary points put into this particular debate.

Very briefly, as an individual MLA, I will say that obviously in this group the key clause 4 may well divide the House. I concur entirely with the arguments put forward by Lord Morrow in respect of the justification for taking this approach. The evidence has shown, and the Attorney General has recognised it, that it is appropriate for this Parliament to legislate in such a manner. It is not setting a precedent, as Lord Morrow highlighted; it has happened before. Indeed, what is striking in his opinion poll that was conducted during the summer was that a majority of people in Northern Ireland are looking to politicians to legislate for this minimum-sentence approach.

I know there will be some in this House who take the view that that should be entirely the responsibility of judges. However, that is not how the public see it. The public elect us to legislate on their behalf and, if we as politicians decide that there is an issue of significant magnitude that requires a minimum sentence to be put in, then, as the Attorney General said, it is entirely appropriate for politicians to exercise their mandate on behalf of the people in respect of this issue. Therefore, I will be supporting all the positions that Lord Morrow outlined to the House, and I commend them to the House.

Mr McCartney: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. First, I obviously welcome Consideration Stage. I am mindful that you have cautioned us that we should stick to the group of amendments. I just have some indulgences and some broad comments. I actually think I want to support the comments that the Chair of the Committee made in relation to the proposer of the Bill, Lord Morrow, and about the obvious amount of work that he has put into this. There is absolutely no doubt that he was very efficient in terms of the Committee and in furnishing people with information. I acknowledge that.

I suppose that even he would acknowledge that the Bill has been changed since its first framing and the first draft, both by what other people have brought to him and in relation to the Modern Slavery Bill, which he talked about. As the Chair said, the Committee report is over 1,000 pages. I also feel that it is worth acknowledging that, at Committee Stage, all of us who were part of that scrutiny heard very many powerful and insightful witnesses, and I have absolutely no doubt that they will go away from this particular exercise knowing that, when they come to scrutiny Committees in the Assembly, they are there to be properly consulted and properly listened to. Obviously, that should then inform whatever opinion we take in the future. Again, there is absolutely no doubt that, running alongside the Justice Committee report, the joint Oireachtas report had very strong viewpoints, and the views expressed in it were also certainly very informative for us on the Sinn Féin Benches.

I heard Lord Morrow on Radio Ulster this morning and I know from one of the briefing documents that he supplied to all Assembly Members and other people that he laid out three very clear aims. All of us are very supportive of the idea that, where there are vulnerable people being exploited, right across the many different aspects and circumstances of trafficking, slavery and exploitation, we as legislators must do something about it. I think that the Bill, in some way, expresses that.

I now turn to the clauses, a LeasCheann Comhairle. In his introduction, Lord Morrow laid out and described the number of changes in the clauses. When you see that, you can see how this is nearly, if not a rewrite of the Bill, certainly a putting of it into a different context and a presenting of it in a different way. He accepts that the Modern Slavery Bill, which is now being processed at Westminster, has put him in a position, along with the Minister, to make a number of changes, which I think helps strengthen the Bill, and also makes it, if you like, easier to read. That is to be welcomed. I heard the Minister commenting that there are not too many occasions where people will say that he and Lord Morrow agree, but they have found common cause here today, and I suppose that is to be welcomed as well.

The Chair very ably and aptly went through the clauses and the amendments, practically one by one. I think he gave a very fair reflection of how the Committee approached it and the position that the Committee took on all the proposed changes in this group. In brief outline, we welcome, particularly in clauses 1A, 1C and 1D, this idea of a new offence of slavery to include servitude and forced or compulsory labour. I think the Committee at one stage, if it did not have a concern, certainly pointed out that it believed that forced and compulsory labour is a part of this exploitation that perhaps needed to be addressed. When people talk about forced or compulsory labour, it does not always necessarily mean that it is by physical force. It can be psychological or just circumstance. So, we welcome that provision as well.

1.30 pm

There is a very clear definition in the Bill, and that is to be welcomed, around what constitutes exploitation in relation to human trafficking, and, in terms of clause 1D, we welcome the fact that there are what Lord Morrow outlined as preparatory offences. He talked about the technical amendments in clause 2A, and, again, we would welcome that streamlining or bringing the sentencing processes under the dangerous offenders Act of 2008. That sends a very clear signal as to the Bill's intention to see human trafficking and exploitation as a serious offence that should be taken seriously by the courts.

I suppose that leads me to clause 4. At the Committee, that was maybe the issue, apart from clause 6, which we will talk about later on, that perhaps had the most conversation. We believe in principle that the idea of minimum sentences is not an appropriate one. We believe that it should be at the discretion of the judge in that judicial process. We listened very carefully, and I think that it has been laid out very clearly today that the offences that are being committed are serious, should be seen by the courts as serious and the appropriate sentence should be given for the appropriate offence. That is why we find it difficult to move away from the principle of not having a minimum sentence.

People might make a strong argument that this is a serious offence and an offence that most people are totally abhorred by, but I do not think that the circumstance should prevail where there is a minimum sentence for this that does not apply to other serious crimes. We are mindful of the MORI poll, and I am not saying that the question was loaded, but it was certainly framed in a particular way. Perhaps the question that should be asked is whether people agree with the principle that sentencing should be at the discretion of the court. You might get a better view from that. In this instance, I accept what the poll said, but we feel that, in principle, it should be left to the judge.

In the amendments that Lord Morrow has tabled, he accepts that there are circumstances that, I think, are described in the amendments as "exceptional". I think that the MORI poll said "very exceptional", but the amendment just says "exceptional". Although we believe that that is some attempt to except it, there are circumstances in other legislation that has come through the House where people have pointed out that, if you had a minimum sentence, there may be something unforeseen or a particular circumstance that is not catered for by the way that the legislation is framed. The word "exceptional" could be a minefield for different people in the process, be it the defence or the prosecution, to say, "We do not believe this is exceptional" or, "We do believe this is exceptional". We think that the principle of judicial discretion is the best way to take it forward. So, we will support the Department in relation to clause 4 not standing part of the Bill, but, if that fails, we will be supportive of the idea of the exceptional circumstances. I say that to put it on the record.

I will briefly touch on a number of other amendments. We support amendment No 40, which has been tabled by the Minister of Finance and Personnel. There is absolutely no doubt that the idea of forced marriage, as laid out in the amendment, is a form of exploitation. That needs to be addressed, and I think that this is the appropriate vehicle to do it. As the Chair touched on in the latter part of his contribution, we certainly support training with the proper resources and the servicing of that training, so that you have a very good approach in the investigation and in the prosecutorial processes in relation to this. It is good that it is being put into the Bill so that it becomes a requirement rather than people just feeling that it is something that they should do. If we are to make laws and want them to have a particular effect, there is no point in framing a law when those who are charged with enforcing it do not have the resources, do not see it as a priority or do not put in the proper training. That in itself creates a gap, which means that the law is very good and appropriate on paper but, in a contradictory way, is ineffectual.

We support the inclusion of the amendment whereby a prosecution should not rely on a victim's statement, and nor should that be a reason for a prosecution not proceeding. Many people who are involved in human trafficking and find themselves here as part of that experience are from different countries, different cultures and speak different languages, and the Bill caters for that adequately and appropriately.

In summary, we support most of the amendments in the first group. We have reservations with the concept or principle of a minimum sentence and who should have the ability to do that. Is it the legislator or the sentencing provision through to the judicial process? At present, we favour the judicial process.

Mr A Maginness: I thank Lord Morrow for introducing the Bill and for his hard work in realising it. It is faithful to the European directive on human trafficking, and it is important that we apply this into our domestic law. Lord Morrow has done a wonderful job. The work with the departmental officials has been outstanding. There has been a very good partnership between the Department and Lord Morrow. Some issues still divide Lord Morrow and the Department, but the bulk of the Bill is as perfected as it could be in the circumstances, and the original deficiencies have now been remedied by the amendments that have been tabled by Lord Morrow and the Justice Minister. That represents a good deal of good political work, and I believe that the Justice Committee fully supports that, and the Chairperson was sympathetic to that point of view. The Justice Committee has also done a tremendous amount of work on the Bill, and it is a great credit to the Chair, the Deputy Chair and Committee members.

When I was Chair of the Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment, I used to say that it was the best Committee in the House. I suppose that it still remains the best Committee in the House. I could not venture to say otherwise in front of the current Chair of the Committee. However, I think that the Justice Committee is probably almost the best Committee in the House. We did good work, which overcame party division. It is important to remember that in the House today.

I will not delay too long, because there is an awful lot of work to be done in relation to the Bill. The SDLP is very supportive of the amendments that have been tabled by Lord Morrow in the first group. As far as the definition of human trafficking and slavery offences is concerned, sensible amendments have been tabled, which to some extent reflect the Modern Slavery Bill, and it is important to have consistency on those matters.

I think that consent being irrelevant for the victim of human trafficking or slavery offences is very important. This is a heinous offence. Witnesses and victims can be intimidated, perhaps not directly but by force of circumstances: for example, the threat of deportation. It is important that consent is not necessary. Also, in clause 3, aggravating factors is a very sensible —

Mr B McCrea: Will the Member give way?

Mr A Maginness: Yes, I will indeed.

Mr B McCrea: I am struck by that argument, and I am interested in the Member's opinion on it. A number of cases of human trafficking have been brought to the courts recently, and one concerned a person who voluntarily arranged transportation. In other words, people were consensually working together. There was a guilty verdict at the conclusion of that case, but I am worried about the Member's thoughts on consent when two people willingly do something together. Are we sure that we do not need a little more oversight of what the law has to say about the matter?

Mr A Maginness: My point is that, if you have a situation in which proving the offence is entirely dependent on the consent of the victim, in those circumstances, that would be entirely wrong. I think that that is important. Here are people, perhaps the most vulnerable in the world, being subjected to this horrendous situation. Surely it is too much to expect that there would be consent in those circumstances.

There is no doubt that we make exceptions in the Bill, but the abhorrence of what is happening throughout the world and affecting our situation here in this region is such that we have to take an exceptional view in the legislation. I make no apology for that, and I think that we have to protect the most vulnerable people in the world.

Mr Wilson: Will the Member give way?

Mr A Maginness: Yes, indeed, Mr Wilson.

Mr Wilson: Does the Member also accept that, given the nature of some of the gangs who operate in human trafficking and the fact that they may have a hold not just on the victims but sometimes on the victims' families back home, the issue of consent is much more blurred than the Member suggested in his earlier intervention?

Mr A Maginness: I agree entirely with what the Member has said, and I think that the House should take that into consideration.

Mr B McCrea: Will the Member give way?

Mr A Maginness: Yes, of course, Mr McCrea.

Mr B McCrea: I totally accept the Member's point and the point that Mr Wilson has just raised about the nature of oppression, but there is an issue of principle here that interests me. If you were able to say that there was no coercion, hidden or otherwise, and that it is an act between two individuals in full consent — the case that I spoke about was dealt with by law — whereby one person willingly makes travel arrangements for another person, who willingly consents to some form of activity that we would not approve of, the fact is that they agreed to do something. I wonder about the general principle of where the state or the legislature interferes in consensual relationships between people.

Mr A Maginness: With respect to the Member, I think that he might be confusing the issue a little. I do not think that the circumstances that he outlined, in which there is a purely voluntary arrangement, could be characterised as human trafficking.

Mr Givan: I thank the Member for giving way. Unfortunately, I think that the other Member for Lagan Valley has taken a predetermined position on this debate.

He clearly does not understand the amendments that are being debated and that we will subsequently vote on. This is about consent or otherwise in a statement being used for a prosecution. It is nothing to do with the circumstances that he referred to. It would be helpful of the Member read what we are dealing with and made a contribution that was relevant.

Mr B McCrea: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. I find it difficult to engage in debate with the Member through another Member. You might give some direction as to how one might deal with such a situation.

1.45 pm

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): That is not a point of order. However, if there is any value in your statement, I will certainly take it on board.

Mr A Maginness: Thank you, Mr Deputy Speaker. I will try to complete my remarks before Question Time.

I believe that the list of aggravating factors for the court to consider for the purposes of sentencing is comprehensive. It may well be that, in the circumstances, the court would have taken most of those into consideration anyway, but there is no harm in putting into statute the factors that the court should take into consideration.

I move on to clause 4, which is probably the most contentious clause dealt with by this group of amendments. My colleagues and I in the SDLP take the view that judicial discretion is very important, should be respected and that, in most ordinary circumstances, should be absolute. However, there are certain circumstances in which there are minimum sentences. Lord Morrow referred to those and gave examples such as firearms offences, excess alcohol, automatic disqualifications and those sorts of things. In this instance, we are talking about two years and a provision that should send out a very strong message to those who involve themselves in human trafficking that the courts will take a very severe view of it and that there would be a minimum sentence for the courts to apply.

If that was the absolute position, our party would object to it. However, it is not an absolute position because Lord Morrow has brought an element of judicial discretion into the Bill in so far as there are exceptional circumstances. I believe that that is a fair balance and that it provides the necessary judicial discretion. Such is the nature of this crime that we have to send out a very strong message nationally and internationally. That is important, and that is why it is included in the Bill and why we are supportive of it.

For those who seek reassurance on that point, the matter was discussed very thoroughly in the Committee. I refer to paragraph 75 of the Committee's report on the Human Trafficking and Exploitation (Further Provisions and Support for Victims) Bill. It states that the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission:

"highlighted that the figure of two years proposed as the minimum sentence was not arbitrary but reflected a subtle increase on current sentencing practice. It advised that the existence of the exception under legislation should remain within the Bill to ensure that the sanctions imposed under Clause 4 are considered proportionate for all THB offences"

— that is human trafficking offences. Paragraph 75 continues:

“including those offences defined as trafficking domestically but which fall outside of the international standard.”

Paragraph 76 of the same report states that in its oral evidence, the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission:

“confirmed its view that Clause 4 allows for judicial discretion because exceptional circumstances are written into the Clause.”

I concur with the view expressed by the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission. This is exceptional. We accept that it is exceptional and that it is not the ordinary run-of-the-mill. If it were, we would object to it. There are some limitations, but a degree of judicial discretion is permitted, and we believe that that should satisfy the concerns about clause 4.

I will end fairly quickly, Mr Deputy Speaker. Other aspects — assets recovery, reparation orders on the perpetrator and compensation for the victim coming from moneys from or properties owned by the perpetrator — all those things in the Bill are good and important, and it is important that we support them as well.

We support amendment No 40, on forced marriage, tabled by the Minister of Finance and Personnel. It is reflective of legislation at Westminster, and it is important to include it in our domestic legislation and in this Bill.

I do not think that there are any further points that I can make on the first group of amendments, so I will conclude there.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): I may have to interrupt you, Mr Elliott, at 2.00 pm, when Question Time begins.

Mr Elliott: That is fine, Mr Deputy Speaker. I do not mind at all if you interrupt me. You are quite welcome to do that. However I hope that you will, as you did other Members, give me a wee bit of leeway to discuss the overall Bill at the start.

I congratulate Lord Morrow on getting progress on the Bill thus far. It has been an interesting project so far, and I am sure that it has been time-consuming for him. It has created a huge amount of discussion, let alone debate. In various areas out in the community and in the Justice Committee, and, I am sure, in the Department of Justice as well, there have been many soul-searching discussions around the rights, wrongs and merits of some aspects of the Bill.

On many occasions, I have been asked whether I support the Bill, and I have always maintained that I support its principle and ethos, as I am sure that most people do. However, as other Members have said, the Bill has undergone some major surgery in the past number of months, and it is interesting that we have a list of amendments that is over five times the length of the Bill as introduced. Anyway, it is good that Lord Morrow, the Department of Justice and the Minister have been working well together, and, hopefully, they will bring about a better conclusion.

Mr Wilson: I may have picked up the Member wrongly, given the tone of the remarks that he made about the amendments. Does he not accept that all Bills go through extensive amendments and that, rather than that being a fault of the Bill or its original intention, it reflects well on the seriousness with which the issue has been dealt with by Lord Morrow and those who scrutinised the legislation at Committee Stage?

Mr Elliott: I thank the Member for that. I said that I welcome the working-together of Lord Morrow, the Minister and the Department of Justice in bringing forward what may be better proposals. I totally accept that point.

On the matter of the first group of amendments, I acknowledge that a large number of them have been worked out between Lord Morrow and the Department of Justice, and, by and large, the Ulster Unionist Party supports them. Some of the more controversial aspects, as we have heard, are around clause 4 and the principle of setting minimum sentences. However, I acknowledge that Lord Morrow has carried this out in the right way, in that he has allowed for some judicial discretion. I support the issue of minimum sentencing, but I also support judicial discretion being applied in exceptional circumstances.

If Members have any doubt about supporting clause 4, they should look at a recent case in Craigavon Magistrates' Court, where a gangmaster was sentenced to payment of £500. That was someone who had committed crimes against a number of Romanian workers, who had to pick apples and scavenge in bins, for which they were given poverty wages. He charged them to live in an unheated shed. He was fined just £500. He actually charged them for living in that shed, which was unfit for human habitation.

I am pleased that the Gangmasters Licensing Authority said that it was shocked and appalled by the leniency of that punishment. It has indicated that it will appeal the sentence, and I hope it will. So, if anybody has any doubt about the potential of minimum sentencing, they should reflect on that case.

Under amendment Nos 17 and 18, where the minimum sentence is not imposed, the court is required to explain why and record the exceptional circumstances that apply. I envisage some interesting outworkings of that and look forward to seeing some of the explanations as to why courts do not impose the minimum sentences. I intervened when the Lord Morrow was speaking earlier to ask whether he had seen any guidelines that could potentially be utilised in those two amendments. That will be a judicial issue; it will be up to the judges and the courts to decide. However, I can see some interesting outcomes of it.

By and large, we support the amendments in this group. Hopefully, people will reflect on their opposition to clause 4 in light of the non-custodial sentence that was handed down in the case I mentioned.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Order. As Question Time begins at 2.00 pm. I suggest that the House takes its ease until then. This debate will continue after Question Time, when the next Member to speak will be Stewart Dickson.

Oral Answers to Questions

Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister

St Lucia Barracks, Omagh

1. Mr Hussey asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister what discussions they have had with the Ministry of Defence on the possible transfer of St Lucia Barracks in Omagh. (AQO 6850/11-15)

Mr P Robinson (The First Minister): We are aware that the Ministry of Defence (MoD) is working on resolving an outstanding legal impediment relating to the ownership of the historic barracks that form part of the St Lucia site. OFMDFM officials met Ministry of Defence officials in November 2013. However, the MoD has not responded to subsequent follow-up correspondence.

We fully recognise the significance of the historic buildings for the town of Omagh and the potential that they may have to contribute to the development of the area. However, in the current financial climate, we need to ensure that any future use of the St Lucia site and the listed buildings is affordable and sustainable. With that in mind, OFMDFM officials continue to discuss the potential uses of the site with officials from organisations with an interest, including the Department for Social Development and Omagh District Council.

Mr Hussey: Would the First Minister confirm whether the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister would support local groups that, during the decade of centenaries, would like to use the barracks' square as part of that commemoration?

Mr P Robinson: I would of course. The Department has not considered the matter, but, subject to the legal issues between the MoD and the past owner being resolved, I see no reason why it should not be used for that purpose. There is, I understand, a memorial within the site, and I am sure that access to that would be much appreciated by people locally.

Mr Buchanan: Given that the council is keen to have something happen on the site but funds are limited, what are the options?

Mr P Robinson: The first requirement is for the MoD to resolve the legal issues as to whether the previous owner wants to take the site back into ownership or whether it is free for the MoD to transfer. If they offer it on transfer, clearly Omagh District Council would be one of the key partners that would have an interest in the issue. There may even be an interest in part of the site from the private sector or in partnership with DSD and Omagh District Council. Those are the possibilities, but we have to get over the first impediment. Some Members think that OFMDFM is slow at getting replies out. Well, meet the MoD. We are still waiting for our reply from last November.

Mr Milne: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. What is the current position on the Shackleton Barracks site at Ballykelly?

Mr P Robinson: The deputy First Minister and I rescued it from a use that would not have maximised its funding centrally to the Assembly and Executive or the level of jobs that could be brought into the area. We have put it out for expressions of interest, and we received over 40, principally from the private sector, although there are some partnerships and public sector interests.

I have seen expressions of interest that indicate that 1,000 or 2,000 jobs could be created in the area. Indeed, there would be a significant income for the Executive. However, we decided that it is best that we look at dividing the site into lots because there is an interest in the site from, for instance, the Department of Agriculture and DRD. There are also different private sector interests that do not conflict with each other. In the next few days, the deputy First Minister and I will look at actioning that proposal, which is to put it out for public interest and see what bids come in.

Social Investment Fund: Projects

2. Mr Givan asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister for an update on the delivery of projects through the social investment fund. (AQO 6851/11-15)

Social Investment Fund: Allocations

4. Mr Lunn asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister for an update on the allocation of the social investment fund to date. (AQO 6853/11-15)

Mr P Robinson: Mr Principal Deputy Speaker, with your permission, I will ask junior Minister Jonathan Bell to answer this question.

Mr Bell (Junior Minister, Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister): With your permission, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker, I will answer questions 2 and 4 together.

Funding has been committed to 23 projects, with the latest costs — following cost-validation exercises since letters of offer were issued — totalling £34.4 million. We are working with the projects' lead partners on preconditions associated with their social investment fund (SIF) funding. Once these have been met, we will be able to authorise delivery start dates.

One project has started in the northern zone: the Causeway rural and urban network capital project is for the development of a charity hub. Two others — one in the Londonderry zone and the other in Belfast east zone — are close to getting approval to proceed. The Londonderry community work programme is a revenue project designed to provide long-term placements for the long-term unemployed, specifically those on the margins, such as the under-25s, while the Belfast east Bryson Street capital project will create a purpose-built community doctors' surgery on a brownfield site. The surgery will provide state-of-the-art facilities for the local community in an area of high deprivation. It is anticipated that both projects will get off the ground in the near future.

We are exploring options in relation to the remaining zonal allocations, taking account of the levels of investment across the zones, community planning and the current financial position.

Mr Givan: I welcome that answer from the junior Minister, particularly when you consider that the quantum of moneys being talked about is £34.4 million. The Minister will be aware of the Resurgam Trust in my constituency. It is a grass-roots, community-led organisation that is professionally delivering, alongside other communities, in places such as Old Warren, the Low Road, Hillhall, Ballymacash and the Maze. It is making a really big difference in those communities. He will be aware of the successful application for one of the projects to do with SIF. Can he provide the House with an update of progress in taking forward the projects in my constituency?

Mr Bell: I am happy to do that, and I pay tribute to the trust for the work that it is doing with people who are most in need.

There are five projects in the south eastern zone. They include Laganview, which is aiming to create the healthy living centre in the Old Warren estate in Lisburn. A project aims to develop the family centre in Twinbrook, and SIF is part-funding this, alongside the Department for Social Development. The early years work aims to reduce the risk factors linked to educational underachievement and focuses on the transition stages at preschool, primary and post-primary levels, and that will be implemented right across the south eastern zone. In west Lisburn, there is an aim to redevelop the existing community centre — again, in the Old Warren estate — as a dedicated youth facility. Then there is the Cloona House project, which aims to redevelop the building as a headquarters for the Colin Neighbourhood Partnership, to allow the delivery of an extensive range of community services.

All the above projects, with the exception of Twinbrook, have a signed and returned letter of offer in place, and officials are working with the lead partners to meet the conditions. Twinbrook is being managed by DSD, and funding will be committed through that Department.

Mr Lunn: I thank the junior Minister for his answers to Mr Givan; obviously, we share an interest in that constituency. Can the junior Minister give us any sort of guarantee that this fund will be fully utilised in this financial year and that there will not be any underspend that may go to waste?

Mr Bell: It is an important question. Funding has been allocated to 23 projects to date, with the most up-to-date costs totalling, as I outlined, £34.4 million. Spend to date has been focusing on the work that is necessary to take forward the individual projects. We have looked at all the projects as they stand and at the total budget, and I am confident that a number of projects are about to receive their letter of offer. A further 22 projects will be examined. I am very keen that those projects are fully examined and come to fruition. I am confident, as far as I can be, that that fund will be fully utilised. If any project does not make it, there are other projects in the pipeline that will then be considered. Given what it was set up to do — to tackle deprivation and dereliction — I am fully confident that we can spend all the money.

Mr Spratt: I welcome the fact that a number of letters of offer have gone out in my constituency. Will the junior Minister assure the House that the £80 million will be protected to ensure that all the letters of offer will come to fruition?

Mr Bell: The money has been set aside and is targeted at where it is most needed. As I said, I am confident that that money will be fully utilised to tackle issues that have been raised in different zones.

Mr Attwood: At the end of your answer to the original question, you referred to current financial issues. Given that £34.4 million has been committed, are you hinting that OFMDFM will not be able to commit the balance or part of the balance of the moneys up to £80 million?

Mr Bell: No, is the short answer. The £80 million has been protected and is set to deliver on the projects. There is no hint whatsoever of that. As I said, the money has been allocated with the letters of offer. A number of projects are awaiting their letter of offer, and those are fairly imminent. Some £27 million remains. Twenty-two projects are being analysed in relation to that, which would take us to the full amount. If any of those projects were to drop off, there are other projects in the pipeline.

Mr Elliott: I thank the junior Minister for his answers so far. He mentioned a number of the zones, including the northern zone, the south-eastern zone and the Londonderry zone. Will he update me on the western zone, particularly the allocations that have gone out so far and the projects that are close to commencement?

Mr Bell: I am delighted that the old saying is true: all politics is local. In the western zone, we have Work Ready West, which is a revenue project that has been allocated £2.2 million. There is SATCHEL, which is a Sure Start revenue project that has been allocated £1.3 million. There is also Fermanagh House, which is a capital project that has been allocated £0.9 million.

Corporation Tax

3. Mr Wilson asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister, in light of the outcome of the Scottish independence referendum, what discussions they have had with the UK Government on the devolution of corporation tax to Northern Ireland. (AQO 6852/11-15)

Mr P Robinson: Securing the power to lower corporation tax is a key priority for the Executive to promote the growth of the local economy. As part of our economic pact that we signed last year, the United Kingdom Government indicated the intention to make a decision on the devolution of corporation tax powers no later than the coming autumn statement, which will be on 3 December. Since the Scottish referendum last month, we have made clear our expectations regarding further fiscal devolution for Northern Ireland. That has involved discussions with the Secretary of State, and we have also written to the Prime Minister to press him to come to a decision quickly to ensure the swift devolution of corporation tax powers to Northern Ireland.

Mr Wilson: Given the refusal of Sinn Féin and the SDLP in particular, and, to a lesser extent, the Ulster Unionist Party, to face up to the Assembly's budgetary pressures, does the First Minister have any fear that we may find ourselves in a situation in which corporation tax powers are devolved, but we are unable to deliver on a reduction of the rate because of the financial shambles imposed on the Executive by the refusal of those parties to engage in serious debate on the Budget?

2.15 pm

Mr P Robinson: I say to my friend that my fear is not so much that the powers are devolved and we have difficulty implementing them thereafter; my fear is that Treasury might say that it expects a certain level of fiscal management responsibility and that it will therefore hold back from devolving those powers. I am sure — I say this in order to satisfy the concerns of Treasury — that the real difference between welfare reform and corporation tax is that there is unanimity around the Executive table on corporation tax. I am convinced that, if given the power, we will be able to deal with that in a unanimous manner around the Executive table.

I point out that we will obviously require legislation to go through Westminster, probably in much the same way as a money Bill would go through the House of Commons and the Lords. Even after that, there are considerable processes, particularly the procurement of the necessary IT equipment, which would probably mean that it would be, at the earliest, the end of 2016 or early 2017 before it could be implemented on the ground.

Mr Nesbitt: Notwithstanding the long wait, does the First Minister believe that, should the power be devolved, we are ready in terms of A-grade office accommodation, skill sets in the workforce and what some economists might consider other structural flaws in our set-up?

Mr G Robinson: It would be unfair to suggest that DETI and Invest have been anything other than the jewel in the crown of the Northern Ireland Executive and Assembly, and, indeed, of Northern Ireland itself. They have been out there hammering away at bringing in jobs and have done so successfully. They have beaten every target that we set for them. They have brought in more jobs over this period than at any time in the history of Northern Ireland and more foreign direct investment per head of population than anywhere else in the United Kingdom, including London. So, they have done a first-class job. Do I have some concerns that there are areas of infrastructure that we need to do more about? Yes, I have, particularly office space, which he mentioned. We have been so successful that we have started to soak up all of the available office space. The planners and developers need to up their game to ensure that we can continue with the level of growth that we have been successful in bringing to Northern Ireland thus far.

Mr Lynch: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. What discussions has OFMDFM had with the Scottish Executive, and what tax-varying powers are being considered for the North of Ireland?

Mr G Robinson: The deputy First Minister and I had breakfast this morning with the First Minister of Scotland, Alex Salmond. Both of us had a previous conversation with him as part of our business trip to Gleneagles, when we discussed with him elements of devolution; spoke to a major company that was looking to bring hundreds of jobs into Northern Ireland; and had discussions with the European Tour about the two visits of the Irish Open to Northern Ireland. Tomorrow, we leave here for a meeting on Wednesday with Carwyn Jones, the First Minister of Wales, on the same subject.

There is probably recognition that the same type of devolution will not be suitable for all three jurisdictions. Therefore, we need to be satisfied of what is best for us, just as Scotland and Wales will do for themselves. The hope and expectation is that there will be some commonality of approach in ensuring that we have the very best form of devolution for each of the three jurisdictions as we move forward.

In terms of what tax-raising powers we are looking at, we are looking at them all. What we come down on and which taxes are appropriate to be devolved will, ultimately, be a matter for the Executive.

Mr Eastwood: I note what the First Minister said about corporation tax. What are the Executive doing to address the very clear regional imbalances in economic development and job creation?

Mr P Robinson: I am glad to say that we have, through Invest Northern Ireland, been encouraging investment in every part of Northern Ireland. I think that the Member recognises that it is much easier in the greater Belfast area. I know that some people are very seriously considering job potential in the north-west. I hope that we can have announcements on that in the future.

There is no part of Northern Ireland, including the north-west, that anybody on the Executive — certainly not the deputy First Minister and I — would do anything other than encourage people to move to. I want to see everybody in Northern Ireland gainfully employed. I am glad to see that for 21 consecutive months, the claimant count has been going down in Northern Ireland. I am glad to see that we are back down to 6.1% unemployment and that it is hopefully still moving further down. All of that is a good sign. I want people to be employed as much in the north-west as in any other part of Northern Ireland.

Mr McCallister: From his discussions with the Scottish First Minister, Alex Salmond, the First Minister will know whether Scotland are pursuing corporation tax. Is he aware that no work has been done by either DETI or DFP on the impact that Scotland's getting corporation tax would have on Northern Ireland's receiving it or indeed the level at which it should be set? Is that a matter of concern to him?

Mr P Robinson: No. What would have been a matter of concern is that if DETI and its various advisers had not done a lot of work to see what benefit there would be to Northern Ireland if corporation tax powers were to be devolved. They have, and the economic advisers indicate that our benefit could be around 58,000 jobs. That is a significant benefit to Northern Ireland.

I am not convinced that Scotland can make the same strong case as Northern Ireland to have the devolution of corporation tax. In Northern Ireland, we have a devolved government that is coming out of a long period of conflict and division, which makes us a special case. We have a land frontier with another nation that has a very low level of corporation tax compared with that of the UK. That is a disadvantage and a uniqueness in our case. I think that, for many reasons, Northern Ireland stands apart as having a strong case for the devolution of corporation tax. I have no doubt that the First Minister of Scotland and his successor will push to have the devolution of corporation tax, but I think that we have a far better chance of getting it than they do.

Shared Campuses

5. Mr McAleer asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister for an update on the shared campuses, particularly Lisanelly, as part of Together: Building a United Community. (AQO 6854/11-15)

Mr P Robinson: The Together: Building a United Community strategy, published on 23 May 2013, reflects the Executive's commitment to improving community relations and continuing the journey towards a more united and shared society.

Work is progressing across all seven headline actions that were announced alongside the publication of the strategy. One of the headline actions is the creation of 10 shared education campuses. The programme was launched by the Department of Education in January 2014, and it received 16 applications under the first call for expressions of interest. In July 2014, the first three projects to be supported were announced. They are shared STEM and sixth-form facilities, incorporating St Mary's High School, Limavady and Limavady High School; a shared education campus, incorporating Moy Regional Controlled Primary School and St John's Primary School, Moy; and a shared education campus, incorporating Ballycastle High School and Cross and Passion College, Ballycastle. Those projects are now proceeding to full business case.

A second call for expressions of interest opened on 1 October 2014, with submissions due by 30 January 2015. An announcement of the second tranche of shared education campuses is expected to be made in June 2015. In addition to the Together: Building a United Community commitment of 10 shared campuses, the Lisanelly shared education campus programme is also being progressed. The first phase of construction, which is at Arvalee School and Resource Centre, is expected to begin early next year. Work is continuing to prepare the site, and excellent progress is also being made in developing the overall exemplar of campus design.

Mr McAleer: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. What progress has been made on the provision of 100 summer camps? Will those be available for young people outside Belfast?

Mr P Robinson: I thank the Member for his question. Progress is being made on all the areas that were recognised in the seven actions that are being taken forward. We have committed to creating 100 such school or summer camps in 2015. Work is under way to ensure that we meet that commitment. Intervention activities took place in the summer of 2014, and those will continue at Halloween this year. Following an evaluation of the programmes and other related activities, a full and final programme will be developed and rolled out in all council areas from summer 2015. The programme will build on the many existing examples of good practice that are operating in the community across the country.

Mr Byrne: I thank the First Minister for his answers on Lisanelly. Will he state whether all the capital moneys can be put in place in a sequenced order to make sure that the schools that want to go there can avail themselves of the opportunity as soon as possible?

Mr P Robinson: We almost had the embarrassing situation of having money offered to us without us having the ability to spend it on Lisanelly, simply because of the timing of the programme. We have been successful in getting money — as part of the economic pact, along with our own funds — to move on with the Arvalee site proposal. Work is still being done at design stage for the other schools that are going on to the site. Ultimately, it will be a matter for the Minister to make bids for the capital budget. I will say that our capital budget is not in as difficult a place as our revenue budget is for the future, so hopefully a programme can be worked out. I have no doubt that the Minister of Education will argue his case strongly for funding for that purpose.

Miss M McIlveen: Further to those answers, what options are available for schools where physical collocation is not possible?

Mr P Robinson: The deputy First Minister and I are passionately supportive of the shared education proposals. They are a recognition that we have to deal with the situation as it is at present. While he and I might have wanted an overall and immediate integration of education across Northern Ireland, we have to work within the parameters of our present circumstances. That, quite frankly, means that, while we are rolling out the shared education campuses, many schools simply would not have a partner in their area to avail themselves of the benefits of a shared campus. In those circumstances, we are rolling out proposals that look at having shared classes and shared extracurricular activity, be it sport or other elements. On some occasions, there are possibilities for us to go well beyond that.

The deputy First Minister and I recently announced that we have £25 million for a scheme as a result of a very generous offer from Atlantic Philanthropies. That will allow us to make progress on those kinds of schemes. Where departmental funds might have been difficult on the revenue side over the next three or four years, Atlantic Philanthropies' kind giving will allow us to make progress in precisely those areas — revenue — as opposed to in capital areas.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: We possibly have time for a question but no supplementary questions.

Executive Office: Beijing

6. Mr Douglas asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister for an update on the establishment of an Executive office in Beijing. (AQO 6855/11-15)

Mr P Robinson: We are pleased to confirm that we have made significant progress in our relationship with the People's Republic of China and on opening an Executive office in Beijing. The director of the Northern Ireland Bureau started work in Beijing on 1 September. He has been assigned, on an interim basis, the primary objective of setting up the office, establishing contact with key Departments and stakeholder organisations, and exploring opportunities for mutually beneficial partnerships with regions across China.

2.30 pm

Logistical arrangements are being finalised with the Chinese Government for the location of the office itself. The many administrative and protocol issues that are inevitably associated with such a project are being addressed. A number of encouraging initial meetings with government officials, businesses and agricultural organisations and local government bodies have also taken place.

The Executive's decision to open an office in China has been very well received within the Chinese Government and by the business sector. The deputy First Minister and I hope to further consolidate this growing relationship with the Chinese Government when we visit China in the near future to officially launch the Northern Ireland bureau and its services.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: That ends the period for listed questions. We now move onto 15 minutes of topical questions.

Talks: Update

T1. Mr Irwin asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister for an update on the talks that are taking place. (AQT 1621/11-15)

Mr P Robinson: As Members are aware — at least, they should be — the talks process has begun. The Secretary of State has had initial meetings with the parties. I, personally, hope that she will widen it out beyond the Executive parties. If we are dealing with matters of Assembly and Executive budgets, welfare reform and the structures of the Assembly, parties other than the Executive parties have just as much a right to have their say. They may not get their way, just as some of us will not be able to get all that we want, but they should be heard at the very least.

During my party's meeting with the Secretary of State, we tabled a proposal on welfare reform. I look forward to the opportunity to talk to the other political parties about what we propose in that process. It is essential that we resolve this issue. I do not think that now is a time for us to be scoring party political points on it. A serious engagement now needs to take place. I want to make it very clear from my party's point of view that we genuinely want to get a satisfactory outcome to all the outstanding issues during the talks.

Mr Irwin: I thank the First Minister for his reply. Could the First Minister give an update on the date for reaching a conclusion to the talks?

Mr P Robinson: I know that the Secretary of State has optimistically suggested that we can deal with all of the issues by the end of November; would that it could be so. By the end of November, we will want, at the very least, to have made very considerable progress on the financial issues involved. We have looming Budget deadlines, and therefore we need to reach some conclusions as a result of the discussions. Apart from the discussions that we will have within the Executive and between Executive parties, there is a need for us to resolve with Her Majesty's Government some budgetary matters, not least the fact that our Budget in Northern Ireland has been virtually static since 2009 while pressures have been growing and costs have been increasing.

Jobs: North-west

T3. Mr McCartney asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister for additional information on the First Minister's answer to a question from Colum Eastwood, when he said that he had some hope or expectation of job announcements in the north-west, particularly Derry. (AQT 1623/11-15)

Mr P Robinson: I think that you should be declaring an interest as well, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker. The answer is that, yes, I could but, no, I will not. However, if the Member has a quiet word with the deputy First Minister, I think that he will indicate to him that we have had conversations that indicate that there is a very real interest that would be pretty substantial for the north-west. However, as with all of these issues and as the deputy First Minister knows as a fisherman, you have to wait until the fish is landed and in your hands on the bank before you say too much about it.

Mr Mitchel McLaughlin: And make sure that you have a licence. [Laughter.]

Mr McCartney: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Chéad Aire as an fhreagra sin. I thank the First Minister for his answer. Double confirmation is double confirmation, as they say. Does the First Minister agree that job creation and the expansion of the university are two of the main planks that will assist the regeneration of the north-west in line with the Programme for Government?

Mr P Robinson: I am very sympathetic to the case for Magee, which, I assume, is what he is talking about. I was one of those who felt strongly that, if we could do it financially, there should be an increase in the cap. I also strongly believe that that increase should take place in the STEM subjects. I have argued that, if, in the future, some of what we have to do in difficult financial times is about reducing public expenditure by reducing the number of people who work in the public services and if we are going to have a voluntary exit scheme, we will need to ensure that the private sector is bolstered in order to take up the slack. The only way you can do that is through the work that DEL and DETI are doing: getting people with the necessary qualifications to take the jobs that are coming into Northern Ireland and, at the same time, ensuring that we have the jobs coming in to be filled, as DETI is doing. I am strongly of the view that we need to continue to have the growth of students coming out with the necessary qualifications for the above-medium salary levels that we are now attracting to Northern Ireland. That can only be done with the support of our universities, including Magee.

Welfare Reform Legislation

T4. Mr Dunne asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister whether they are aware of any plans on the part of the new Minister for Social Development to introduce legislation in relation to welfare reform. (AQT 1624/11-15)

Mr P Robinson: I think the House knows that the Minister's predecessor brought legislation to the Assembly. There has not been agreement around the Executive table on how to take welfare reform forward. However, I point out to everyone in the House that it is not the Bill that is the problem; the House could easily pass the Bill without violence to the principles of anybody on either side of the House. It is the regulations that flow from the Bill that would be the issue.

We have an Executive convention of not bringing legislation to the Assembly unless the Executive are agreed on that legislation. Maybe that is one of the issues that parties will want to consider when we are talking about the arrangements at Stormont. I have heard requests from several parties in the Assembly that we bring the Bill to the Assembly. That seems to be a change in the convention, and it would mean that any Minister could bring a Bill to the Chamber, even if it did not have the agreement of the Executive. I think that we need to be careful about any precedent that is set. There may well be a time, if we are encouraged sufficiently, when we will bring the Bill to the Assembly, but the worst of all circumstances is bringing a Bill to the Assembly, having it defeated and ending up in circumstances where there is no route out of our present difficulties.

Mr Dunne: I thank the First Minister for his answer. Has he any proposals on how welfare reform can be progressed?

Mr P Robinson: "Lots", I think, is the answer to that. Taking into account the position adopted by other parties, I think there still is a way forward, provided that people are prepared to come forward with a reasonable outcome. Nobody will get everything that they want in this proposition. My party voted against many aspects of the Bill at Westminster in the Commons and in the Lords. However, we recognise that there is a balance. We have to protect the most vulnerable, but they are affected in two ways. Some will be affected by any reduction that would take place in their welfare payments, but most will be affected if there is a substantial reduction in public services and the health service, the education service and the Police Service get run down as a result of £1,000 million being taken out of our block grant. We need to balance those issues and make sure that we do something that is in the best interests. Although it may be difficult for some in our society, we need to do the best that we can for all of them. The bottom line on the issue is that, if we do not succeed in doing this and, as a result, the future of the Assembly and Executive is threatened, we would not be able to provide any protection at all to the most vulnerable under direct rule. They would not get the enhanced deal that is on offer.

Talks: Compromise and Goodwill

T5. Mr Lunn asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister whether they agree that, if the talks are to bear fruit, there is an absolute need for compromise and goodwill to be shown by all sides of the House, with everyone participating. (AQT 1625/11-15)

Mr P Robinson: I have never known any talks or negotiations that have succeeded without there being compromise on both sides, and I think that there the Member encapsulates it — on both sides. Of course there needs to be goodwill, and of course parties need to roll up their sleeves and get down to the work. That is why I am pleased that my colleagues and I were the first and only party to put a serious submission to the Secretary of State.

Mr Lunn: I thank the First Minister for that answer. Will he agree that it would have been a good start and a good gesture of goodwill to allow the election of a Speaker to proceed last week?

Mr P Robinson: When you have agreements, one agreement is valued as much as another. I made it clear last week that we stand over and will honour both of our agreements. We believe that, as one is being put into the talks process, the other should too. Hopefully, in a few weeks, we can come back and do exactly that on both agreements.

Civil Service: Savings

T6. Mr Gardiner asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister why Northern Ireland has seen only 4% savings in Civil Service costs in the last four years, compared to 10% in England. (AQT 1626/11-15)

Mr P Robinson: That is something that, I think, will be fast remedied by the proposals that we are now looking at. I suppose that the answer to it has something to do with the ambition of the Executive in relation to the number of new projects that have been commenced. However, it is very clear that, with 120,000 public servants in Northern Ireland for a population of 1.8 million people, we certainly can make reductions without having any serious impact on the services that are provided. I agree wholeheartedly with the trade unions that that has to be a planned reduction, perhaps over a period, to ensure that we do not leave any parts of the public service undermanned and that we are able to provide the service that people need. Four per cent towards 5% has been the reduction in Northern Ireland, but it has been about 8% in Scotland and about 10% in Wales. I think that it has even gone beyond that in England, where it has been about 12%. So, whatever the percentages, you could argue that some may have been at too high a level before the cull began. The truth of it is that we are looking very seriously at a voluntary exit scheme that would allow us to reduce the number of public servants and, therefore, reduce the amount of our Budget that goes to that cost. If we are able to take a couple of hundred million pounds off our Budget, there are certainly plenty of things that we could use that expenditure on.

Mr Gardiner: I thank the First Minister for his comments. If the Minister is not successful in getting the £120 million estimated savings, will he turn to compulsory redundancy?

Mr P Robinson: I do not think that anybody is talking about compulsory redundancy. Indeed, the head of the Civil Service does not want to be in the doorway when the proposal is put forward that there should be a voluntary exit scheme because he believes that there will be such a rush that he will get knocked down. I do not think that we are in that space at all. We obviously want to talk with the unions to see that we have a fair package for those who will exit the public service at this stage, but I do not believe that it will be necessary to have any compulsory redundancies.

Race Hate Crime

T7. Mr Craig asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister what action their Department is taking to tackle the recent increase in race hate crime. (AQT 1627/11-15)

Mr P Robinson: The deputy First Minister and I are adamantly opposed to anybody who believes that it is right and proper to intimidate or to attack anyone on the basis of their race. I am glad that local representatives are doing what local representatives should do and are going out and offering support to those who are under attack. We, of course, have our race relations programmes, which we will continue to roll out. The deputy First Minister and I will continue publicly to give our support to those who are under attack and to do whatever we can to discourage the attacks and to encourage the police to bring forward convictions of those involved.

2.45 pm

Mr Craig: I thank the First Minister for his comprehensive answer. Does he agree that, given the complications of some of the attacks that are labelled race hate crimes, the justice system must equally hand out heavy sentences to reflect how heinous those crimes are?

Mr P Robinson: Yes, unquestionably. Anyone who is setting out on this kind of activity needs to know that society repudiates their actions. The clearest sign of repudiation of that kind of activity is the ability of the court to set down very strong custodial sentences to those who are involved. I would be going back to an earlier debate if I started to talk about minimum or mandatory sentences in these matters. I do not want to open that one up, but I think that everyone in the House will agree that there has to be a method to discourage people from getting involved. One way in which we can do that — it is within the power of the Assembly — is to look at the sentencing regime to see whether we can strengthen it.

Justice

PSNI: Overtime

1. Mr Boylan asked the Minister of Justice what action he has taken to address the amount being paid out for PSNI overtime. (AQO 6865/11-15)

Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice): I have had general discussions on the police budget with the Chief Constable and members of the Policing Board. The allocation of the police budget, however, is an operational matter and, therefore, the responsibility of the Chief Constable, who is accountable to the board. It is not for me as Minister.

Mr Boylan: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as an fhreagra. I thank the Minister for his reply. Will he give some consideration, when future planning, to whether the cost of police overtime will increase or decrease over the next number of years? Will he factor that into any consideration?

Mr Ford: It is clear that current changes will make it difficult for the police to manage the budget in line with their overall responsibilities, but I repeat that, operationally, I cannot go into the detail of how the Chief Constable chooses to divide his budget. If there are fewer officers at times, he may feel compelled to increase overtime. On the other hand, with a general reduction in budget, it is very difficult to see how that overtime can be increased significantly. I repeat: it is not for me to tell him how to allocate that budget.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Mr Danny Kinahan is not in his place.

Mr D McIlveen: The Minister will be aware that, in light of the budgetary pressures, his Department has undergone a 4.4% decrease in its budget in the incoming year. However, the PSNI has had to undertake over 7%. Will the Minister confirm, as the Chief Constable has hinted, that he is putting barristers before bobbies?

Mr Ford: That is not a hint that I recognise from anything said by the Chief Constable. The Chief Constable has to live within the budget that is allocated to the PSNI, just as every other spending area of the Department of Justice has to live within its spending limit. The reality is that there were significant pressures in the Department of Justice, not least because we had not driven through the programme of legal aid as fast as would have been hoped, and some matters have been resting before the Justice Committee for some months.

All that has contributed to a build-up on the current pressure, which, faced with the decision of the Finance Minister and the Executive to change the basis on which the DOJ budget was ring-fenced in-year without warning, has given significant difficulties to the Department of Justice. Given that there have been significantly greater cuts over the comprehensive spending review period to the block as a whole because of the linkages to the Home Office and the MOJ, further severer cuts have now been imposed on the Department of Justice. Given the existing legal pressures under which legal aid is obliged to be paid, it was simply not possible to protect all the spending areas that we would have wished to.

Mrs D Kelly: Notwithstanding that police overtime is an operational matter for the Chief Constable, does the Minister agree that much of it is because of the failure to show leadership at public order events, particularly parades and protests? Therefore, if there are any gaps in the legislation that need to be filled, would the Minister look at giving political cover to the Chief Constable for charging for such events?

Mr Ford: I certainly agree with Mrs Kelly's first point, which was that a very significant amount of overtime is related to public order issues, as I have said in the Chamber on more than one occasion and, I fear, may have to say on more occasions.

As to the precise issue of charging for events that happen in open, public spaces, there are significant issues that go beyond the kind of instant response that we might wish for. I have no doubt that some Members would wish particular bodies to be charged for events that they hold in the open air, and perhaps other Members would prefer that other people were charged. That is a measure of the difficulty. We need a resolution to the kind of problems that have led to public order difficulties on the streets over the last couple of years. We need political leadership, which the First Minister just talked about, coming into play in a talks process so that we can cut back on public order disputes and, incidentally, on the expense of policing them.

Ms Boyle: Go raibh maith agat. Can the Minister commit to providing extra resource to the ombudsman's office in light of the additional funding that he received lately?

Mr Ford: It is a slight jump from the funding of the police to the funding of the Office of the Police Ombudsman, which is, I take it, what the Member meant. The reality is that the Office of the Police Ombudsman is being protected very significantly compared with other aspects of Department of Justice spending. It is the only spending area in the justice family to have an increase in expenditure over the last three years, and, this year, it is suffering monitoring round cuts of no more than the average, the 4.4% that has just been spoken of. That seems to me very significant protection for the Police Ombudsman.

Mr Wilson: Given the concern from the SDLP and Sinn Féin about the pressures on the police overtime budget, does the Minister agree that one simple way of reducing those pressures would be for those two parties to stop manufacturing contentious parades that require additional policing and therefore increase the police overtime bill?

Mr Ford: It would be so much nicer if, when the Member was asking me to agree with him, he did not stand wagging his finger at me in a manner that is coming close to being unparliamentary.

I thought that I made general points about contentious parades and public order matters. They were not in any sense aimed at one particular group that organises such parades. The reality is that we have problems with parades and protests in different areas and with people from different backgrounds, although I was not aware that the SDLP organised many, so perhaps somebody can tell me about that in the next question. Clearly, there are significant concerns about the imposition on public order and the concomitant difficulties in community relations that come from a number of parades and related protests. As I said earlier, I hope that that will be ended by a resolution in the talks process.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Here at least, we will move on.

Prison Review: Budget Cuts

3. Mr McKinney asked the Minister of Justice for an update on the work of the prison review oversight group, including the impact that the proposed budget cuts will have on the implementation of the 40 recommendations contained in the prison review team report. (AQO 6867/11-15)

Mr Ford: To date, the prison review oversight group, which I chair, has deemed 16 of the 40 prison review team (PRT) recommendations complete. The group referred a further 17 recommendations to Criminal Justice Inspection Northern Ireland (CJINI) and the Regulation and Quality Improvement Authority (RQIA), as appropriate, for independent assessment. This means that 33 of the 40 recommendations are complete or under assessment. I expect that the seven remaining recommendations will be brought to the oversight group in December 2014 or March 2015.

This reform programme has been about modernising the Northern Ireland Prison Service (NIPS) to ensure resources are best directed at reducing reoffending and making the community safer. As part of that, we have also developed a more efficient and effective service. The foundations have been laid for lasting change. However, the economic challenges that we now face were not envisaged by the prison review team when it made its recommendations.

The review team anticipated that savings made through reform initiatives such as the voluntary early retirement scheme could be reinvested in prisons, but this has not been possible; nor has it been possible to invest as much in the voluntary and community sector as the review team and I had hoped.

Whilst my ambitions have not diminished, the reality is that difficult decisions will need to be made on how NIPS delivers for everyone in Northern Ireland.

Despite the cuts, the reforms being overseen by the prison review oversight group are significant and lasting. While the budget reduction is challenging, I believe that we can continue to deliver a modern, focused prison service with partnership working to reduce offending at its core.

Mr McKinney: I thank the Minister. I hear from him that the budgetary cuts are impacting severely, if I am not putting words in his mouth. What impact will there be on the provision of health care, including mental health care, in the Prison Service?

Mr Ford: Mr McKinney referred to the general issue of cost. Let me give a couple of figures. At the time of devolution in 2010-11, the cost per prisoner place was almost £74,000 per year; it has been reduced to, in the last financial year, under £63,000. That is a 21% reduction anticipated by this year — a significant improvement in efficiency. The specific point that he highlighted was around health care, specifically mental health care, which I acknowledge is a significant issue for prisons. Actually, as it is now the responsibility of the South Eastern Trust, it is an issue for DHSSPS to address, not DOJ. Clearly we work in partnership, but the precise issue of how services are provided is not something that I can answer.

Mr McCartney: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as an fhreagra sin. I think the Minister for his answer. He gave some indication about the roll-out of the implementation plan. Can the Minister provide some update as to its impact on Maghaberry prison?

Mr Ford: I believe that there has been a significant impact across all three prisons, not just Maghaberry. For example, at Maghaberry we have seen, with the opening of Quoile House, significant work being done with those who wish to reduce drug dependency, and work being done on the Family Matters landing. I also visited, in Glen House, a specific, intensive project for 12 prisoners seeking to come off drug habits. All of that is related to ensuring that people are less likely to reoffend when they come out. There has also been ongoing engagement, particularly through Business in the Community, with potential employers to ensure that we provide the opportunities for people to get employment when they leave and, therefore, be less likely to reoffend. All of those are significant issues, working with partners in the voluntary and community sector, and with staff being used in a more effective way to promote the rehabilitation of prisoners. I think that we have seen significant improvements from that work at Maghaberry and in the other two institutions.

Mrs Dobson: Minister, why is there no progress in reducing the misuse of drugs in prison?

Mr Ford: I have just given examples of work being done to reduce drug dependency in prison. There is clearly a significant drug problem in prisons, just as there is in the whole of society. Sadly it is not something that can be avoided in prisons when it is so prevalent elsewhere. However, there is work being done around education and prevention, and there is work being done to assist those who indicate a willingness to come off drugs in different ways. There is no doubt that, for example on some of the preventive work, a much more focused programme of intelligence-led rather than random searching has led to a reduction in the number of searches but an increase in the amount of drugs found. That is an indication of good work being done in the Prison Service.

PSNI: Limavady

4. Mr Campbell asked the Minister of Justice for his assessment of the difficulties faced by the PSNI and the people detained in the Limavady area, since the decision to close the custody suite at Limavady Police Station. (AQO 6868/11-15)

Mr Ford: The decision to close the custody facilities at Limavady police station is an operational matter for the Chief Constable. I understand that the Chief Constable has already outlined his reasons for the closure to the Member and indicated that he is confident that it will not impact on crime levels or outcome rates in the area.

Mr Campbell: I thank the Minister for the response. However, is he aware that my information is that, shortly after the Limavady custody suite was closed, the Coleraine custody suite was also closed temporarily? Has he an indication from the Chief Constable as to when the Coleraine custody suite will reopen, given that the current position is that many people being detained have to travel 50, 60 or more miles for custody?

Mr Ford: I have no specific information on the Coleraine question. However, given that in the Limavady area — policing district G — there are currently operational custody suites in the Waterside, Strand Road and Strabane, I am not quite sure how anybody from that direction would be travelling 50 or 60 miles.

If it is an issue for Coleraine, then the distance from Coleraine to Antrim, where there is a very significant custody suite, is somewhat less than 50 miles.

3.00 pm

Historical Institutional Abuse: Victims

5. Mr Poots asked the Minister of Justice what assurances he can give that victims of historical institutional abuse will have their cases brought before a court where sufficient evidence is provided. (AQO 6869/11-15)

Mr Ford: Where individuals commit serious crimes, the shared focus of our justice system is to bring them to account for their actions. Where there are allegations of historical institutional abuse, it is the responsibility of the police to gather and present evidence and of the Public Prosecution Service to assess the strength of the case prepared by the police and determine whether it should proceed to court. As Minister of Justice, I, quite rightly, have no direct role in that process. Consequently, whilst I can confirm that the PSNI is devoting considerable resources to investigating historical institutional abuse, it is a matter for police officers to present the outcome of their investigations and for the independent prosecution service to determine whether that constitutes sufficient evidence to bring such cases to court.

Mr Poots: I thank the Minister for his answer. I welcome the fact that he included the PPS because, last week, when responding on the Mairia Cahill issue, he referred solely to the Police Ombudsman who, of course, has no responsibilities for the PPS or, indeed, for Northern Ireland Office interference. Can I have an assurance from the Minister that, in investigations into historical abuse, whether it is a police officer in Kincora, a priest in Rubane or a Provo in west Belfast, there will be no untouchables when it comes to paedophile abuse?

Mr Ford: As Minister, I cannot guarantee — I think that that is the term the Member used — that that is the case, but it is certainly my belief that there are no untouchables in the way that the PSNI and the PPS conduct their responsibilities in the present day. There are clearly difficulties in dealing with those points when we go back a number of years. That is what is coming from the historical institutional abuse inquiry, and I have seen no evidence to suggest that any matters that arise will not be properly considered by the agencies responsible for investigation and prosecution carrying out their duties fairly and impartially.

Mr Nesbitt: The Minister will be aware that much historical abuse did not take place in institutions, leaving people like Mairia Cahill feeling abandoned. What are his proposals for ensuring that such victims are not left feeling like second-class citizens compared to the victims of institutional abuse?

Mr Ford: The Member has highlighted one particular issue concerning one particular young lady, and that is obviously a matter that causes considerable concern to many of us given the way that it was reported in the media.

Running into the issue of an inquiry is more difficult in the context where we are merely, at this stage, talking about one case. If there are others, as has been hinted at by Ms Cahill, whom she is aware have been similarly abused, I urge them to come forward, however long it may be since their abuse, and make their concerns known to the police so that they can do their work and prepare a file and pass it to the Public Prosecution Service. That is what we hope anybody would do, and, in current circumstances, I believe that there is no reason why anybody should not be prepared to put their trust in the work to be done by the PSNI and the PPS.

If wider issues emerge from that, it may well be that there are appropriate issues to be considered by a public inquiry, but the important issue at this stage is that any of us who have any influence should encourage anybody who is in that position to come forward, however difficult the issues may be and however long ago it may be, and report their concerns and ensure that the police have them investigated.

Mr Milne: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. Can the Minister reaffirm that all investigations and prosecution processes should be free from political interference?

Mr Ford: I detected an irony warning immediately to my right. I can certainly confirm that all investigations into any criminal allegation should be free from political interference, but, of course, I cannot guarantee that other politicians will not attempt to interfere.

Mr A Maginness: I thank the Minister for his previous answers. The most interesting answer was, of course, that if there are other people affected in a similar way to Mairia Cahill, the Minister could see a public inquiry. Is the Minister saying that he himself would try to set up that public inquiry, and is he committed to that if other victims emerge?

Mr Ford: I do not think that I am in a position to commit to such an inquiry. It seems to me that such a thing would have ramifications rather beyond my Department. However, I can only repeat the first point that I made. The important issue is that individuals come forward and make the police aware of what happened to them. That may then give us an assessment of the issues that may need to be addressed. Frankly, that goes back to the point that I made during the early part of Question Time about the wider issues concerned with reconciling the past and seeing how different institutions behaved at different times in the past as we seek to build a different and shared future.

Youth Engagement Clinics

6. Mr Lunn asked the Minister of Justice for an update on the plans to roll-out youth engagement clinics to all police districts. (AQO 6870/11-15)

Mr Ford: Youth engagement clinics have been operating successfully in Belfast since October 2012, and I am pleased to say that the plans to roll out youth engagement clinics to all police districts are well advanced. Training is currently being delivered to police officers in H district with a view to clinics being available in areas such as Ballycastle, Ballymena, Ballymoney, Coleraine and Larne by the end of November. Training will then be completed in the remaining police districts with a view to clinics being operational right across Northern Ireland in the first quarter of 2015. Based on experience to date, I am confident the clinics will help reduce the number of cases involving young people that proceed unnecessarily to court, and thereby improve processing times for youth court cases.

Mr Lunn: I thank the Minister for his answer. Will he outline how the youth engagement clinics that ran during the pilot programme affected performance in youth cases?

Mr Ford: The key answer to that is that the pilot established significant successes for youth engagement clinics in terms of resolving issues more quickly than would have been dealt with by a court or even if they were disposed of by police by a different kind of diversion outside the youth engagement clinic. The analysis of the data gathered from the pilot in Belfast found that the average processing time was 39 days as opposed to 53 days for non-clinic diversion cases. The performance in youth cases in Belfast improved significantly. In the first quarter of this year, the time taken to prepare and submit a charge file was 11 days rather than 22 days in the same period in the previous year, which is very significant and shows that good work is being done and that the improvements are continuing in Belfast. I it is absolutely clear that by maintaining this pathway to deal with low-level offending, we are able to see improvements in services for them, and also the concentration of resources on those where there are more significant issues. They have certainly been able to ensure that young people access the supports that they need to keep them off a reoffending path at an earlier stage, to the benefit of them and the community.

Mr Maskey: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. Is the Minister satisfied that the PCSPs should be really to the fore of ensuring maximum public engagement between the PSNI and the public?

Mr Ford: I really cannot see what PCSPs have to do with youth engagement clinics. My views on the need to maximise the efforts of PCSPs are well known to the House.

Mr Swann: The Minister indicated that those youth engagement clinics will be rolled out across my constituency. Does he agree with those who seem to intimate that those clinics can be an easy and soft option for young offenders?

Mr Ford: I think that all the evidence is to the contrary. Many young people have said that they are being forced, at an early stage, to confront the consequences of their reoffending and, in many cases, to have a direct meeting with those whom the crimes were against. That is actually a more difficult task than waiting a few months and being given a fine or whatever. That is the whole point of the restorative approach that is taken in the youth justice system: it actually ensures that young people face up to the consequences of their behaviour, and they are then less likely to reoffend than if they were simply treated in a conventional way with a fine or whatever.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I call Ms Bronwyn McGahan.

Ms McGahan: Go raibh maith agat. Question 6. Sorry, question 7.

Agriculture Crime: South Tyrone

7. Ms McGahan asked the Minister of Justice how the rural crime unit is tackling agriculture crime in south Tyrone. (AQO 6871/11-15)

Mr Ford: I was going to answer question 7 anyway, Principal Deputy Speaker. The PSNI rural crime unit is a central resource for identifying trends and patterns of rural crime. The information is used by police commanders to enhance the effectiveness of their operational tactics in preventing and detecting rural and agricultural crime. The unit is supported by a data analyst, who is part-funded by my Department.

At a regional level, the work of the unit resulted in an initiative whereby over £3 million worth of agricultural equipment has now been fitted with security devices. At a strategic level, the work of the unit is supported by the rural crime partnership. The partnership, led by my Department, comprises representatives of the PSNI, NFU Mutual and the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development. The partnership recently met a range of stakeholders, including the Ulster Farmers' Union and the National Sheep Association, to seek their views on livestock theft. Discussions are ongoing to develop actions to help address that issue.

The unit's impact is reinforced at a local level by interventions delivered by PCSPs in conjunction with the PSNI. In south Tyrone, those have included Farm Watch, text alert schemes for farmers, trailer-marking and the provision of multipurpose security locks.

Ms McGahan: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for his response. The remit of the rural crime unit is to help the PSNI utilise its resources in the most effective way. Can the Minister elaborate on how the unit can be used on a cross-border basis, given that Augher, which happens to be a hotspot for rural crime, is on a border with County Monaghan?

Mr Ford: I am always surprised when any MLA highlights their constituency as being a hot spot for crime, but it is the sad reality that, if we look at livestock thefts, we will see that the two counties out of 32 on the island that had the worst statistics last year were Armagh and Tyrone. The Member correctly highlights the problem that we have to address.

There are issues that clearly need to be addressed regarding the traceability of cattle in particular — sheep are more difficult — and there are issues where, on a cross-border basis, the work of the rural crime unit in analysing the data is of assistance to the PSNI as it works in cooperation with an Garda Síochána to deal with issues where there are clearly some cross-border movements of stolen livestock. However, ongoing vigilance is required, and we have yet to see the full statistical results of the rural crime unit's first year of operation, which is only just complete.

Mr Elliott: The Minister will be aware that, less than two weeks ago, the Chief Constable indicated that community policing in rural areas would become virtually non-existent. How worried is the Minister about that, particularly in places such as Fermanagh, south Tyrone and Armagh? Has he had any discussions with the Chief Constable about the situation?

Mr Ford: I frequently discuss those sorts of general issues with the Chief Constable. When he talked about the type of policing that is likely to become non-existent, he was specifically talking about neighbourhood policing as opposed to response policing. We need to be careful that we do not raise hairs unnecessarily.

There is no doubt that, at a time of increasing difficulty, there will be problems for the PSNI in continuing to maintain services, and it is having to prioritise. That is why it is clear that certain difficult areas will be a priority for neighbourhood policing, while other areas will simply go back to the situation as it was not too long ago, where there was less of a neighbourhood policing input and more of a response policing input. However, the challenge is for the Chief Constable to determine exactly how he allocates resources. I can only report in general on what he said.

Hydebank: Secure College

8. Mr McCarthy asked the Minister of Justice what progress has been made in transforming Hydebank Wood Young Offenders Centre into a secure college. (AQO 6872/11-15)

Mr Ford: I am pleased to say that my Department has made significant progress in the challenging process of transforming the young offenders' centre into a secure college. The NIPS has worked to put in place the structures, processes and cultural change necessary to deliver a college that will not only meet the needs of those in custody but give them the skills that they need to build a positive life when they are resettled back into the community. Helping young offenders to change their life will in turn help make Northern Ireland safer.

Design principles have been developed that capture the vision, ethos and direction for the college, which we will implement in full from transition in April 2015. A number of significant developments that will provide the infrastructure for the college have been made. Those include a draft timetable across all residential areas. Progress has also been made on a curriculum for the college that will meet the specific needs of the prisoners and address educational underachievement by many of those in custody. The college will also build transferable vocational skills in areas such as horticulture, catering, construction trades and industrial cleaning that will help make the young men more employable when they are released back into the community. I recently chaired a meeting of the oversight group at Hydebank Wood and discussed the college development with the senior team in the Prison Service.

3.15 pm

Mr McCarthy: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for his very detailed response. Will he tell the Assembly whether the good work that is being done in Hydebank Wood could be replicated throughout all the Northern Irish prisons?

Mr Ford: Of course, the specific issue of a secure college for Hydebank Wood is not quite the same thing as would apply in the two adult male prisons. However, there is no doubt that a lot of good work is being done around rehabilitation in that context.

When I last visited Magilligan in the summertime, over half of the prisoners in Foyleview, the open aspect of Magilligan prison, had been out the day before engaged in constructive and positive work for local churches, charities and community groups. That was a sign of the kind of positive engagement around rehabilitation that happens there. The recent opening of Burren House on the Crumlin Road, as the working out unit for Maghaberry, is giving more prisoners the opportunity in the latter part of their time in custody to engage constructively and positively with the community.

There are, of course, educational opportunities in Magilligan and Maghaberry, but they are at a slightly different level from those that are aimed specifically at the younger offenders in Hydebank Wood. However, it is all part of a joined-up approach to try to ensure that, as far as possible, when people leave prison they have some sort of family support, some worthwhile activity, whether it is employment, education or further training, and suitable accommodation to live in. That is what makes society safer.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: That ends the period for listed questions. We now move to topical questions.

Talks: Dealing with the Past

T1. Mr Lunn asked the Minister of Justice whether he agrees that, now that a new round of talks is under way, the dreadful revelations about the past that have emerged in recent days, some of which have been referred to today, make the case even more forcibly for a new and effective means with which to deal with the past. (AQT 1631/11-15)

Mr Ford: I have said it before now, and I fear that I may be repeating it, but the budget of the Department of Justice is a budget for dealing with the present and not the past. There are many issues of the past that seem to me to be only being dealt with by the Department of Justice, with the current exception of the historical institutional abuse inquiry.

It is absolutely clear that we need agreement on appropriate structures to meet the needs of the past. The revelations that came through last week from Mairia Cahill are a reminder that there is a variety of issues from the past that need to be addressed. Those will require a joined-up approach by parties working together, the Executive working together and, hopefully, the two Governments working in conjunction with us.

Mr Lunn: I thank the Minister for his answer. Whatever is agreed and promised to victims has to be deliverable. Will the Justice Department have a role to play in providing advice to the process to ensure that any new process is effective, efficient and article 2 compliant?

Mr Ford: I suppose that one of the difficulties that we saw during the talks that were led by Dr Richard Haass last autumn was that there was not the sort of information that has just been highlighted — whether that information comes from the Department of Justice or other Departments — about how things work within Northern Ireland. During the subsequent party leaders' talks in the early part of this year, my Department supplied a couple of papers to the party leaders' meeting. Those looked at issues relating to the past, how matters are currently being handled and how they might be better handled. If, as we go through the detail of the current round of talks, such papers are requested, my Department will certainly provide them. We currently bear the brunt of much of the difficulty of the past, and I am keen to ensure that we play our part in resolving the past.

Paul Quinn: Murder

T2. Mr D Bradley asked the Minister of Justice whether he is aware that today is the seventh anniversary of the dreadful murder of Paul Quinn who, in the words of the Independent Monitoring Commission, was murdered by current and former members of the IRA, and, given that, what message he has for those in south Armagh who have information about that terrible crime and those who attempted to criminalise Paul Quinn. (AQT 1632/11-15)

Mr Ford: Mr Bradley raises a very serious point. I confess that, although I saw some publicity last week, in the middle of everything else I was doing today, I had forgotten that this was the seventh anniversary. However, I had some meetings around that time, and I am well aware of the tragedy that that was for the Quinn family and others.

My message is the same one that I have just put out in other respects. Anybody who has any information about any criminal activity has a duty to report it to the PSNI so that the PSNI can investigate properly and, if there appears to be enough evidence for them to do so, pass a file to the Public Prosecution Service so that it can determine whether there should be a prosecution. That is the responsibility of each and every one of us as citizens. It is also the responsibility of political leaders to put that point to the community and encourage those who have information to report crime.

Mr D Bradley: Go raibh maith agat arís, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as an fhreagra. I thank the Minister for his answer. In light of what he said, will he join with me in meeting Stephen and Breege Quinn, Paul Quinn's parents? Will he also meet his counterpart in the South to bring himself up to date with the latest developments in the case?

Mr Ford: I thank Mr Bradley for those points. On his latter point, as Members know, I meet my colleague the Minister for Justice and Equality fairly regularly and frequently, and I am certainly very happy, when I next meet Frances Fitzgerald, to raise the issue with her.

On the specific issue of meeting Mr and Mrs Quinn, I frequently meet people who feel that they have been let down by the justice system in the past. I tend not to flag up those meetings in the media. I believe that, in those circumstances, things are better done with some discretion. Frequently, there is very little that the Minister can do but, if the Minister listening provides some measure of comfort to bereaved families, I am happy to use my time to provide that measure of comfort and assistance. If Mr Bradley wishes to talk about that privately with me later, I will happily discuss it with him.

Organised Crime: Larne

T3. Mr McMullan asked the Minister of Justice whether he is satisfied that the courts are doing enough in sentencing those involved in major organised crime in the Larne area. (AQT 1633/11-15)

Mr Ford: I need to be ever so slightly careful. There are a number of threads in that question. I need to be extraordinarily careful, as Minister, that I do not appear to be second-guessing the work of judges. I may talk about issues in general, and Members may talk in here about sentencing policy in general, as, indeed, we did earlier with human trafficking. However, we all need to be very careful that we do not stray beyond our specific role, and I need to be particularly careful, as Minister, that I do not stray beyond my role into issues of sentencing in individual cases.

The Member also highlights the Larne area. Frankly, my concerns are to ensure that I provide the appropriate support to all the justice agencies in dealing with serious and organised crime in every part of Northern Ireland, using the available resources and working in cooperation with our colleagues in an Garda Síochána and in England, Wales and Scotland. Hopefully, at some point in the near future, we will also bring in the services of the National Crime Agency to deal with the serious crime that it can fight. That issue applies in every part of Northern Ireland. So whilst the Member may wish to highlight Larne in particular, as Minister, I will put my concerns about the whole of Northern Ireland to the forefront in ensuring that justice agencies are assisted as best they can be in dealing with those issues.

Mr McMullan: Go raibh maith agat. I thank the Minister for that intriguing answer. Does he agree that the publicity that Larne has had recently and in the past shows that it is in the grip of loyalist paramilitaries and that that still goes on today? Earlier this year, 200 took over the town one night and caused mayhem, and we are still waiting to see whether any of them will be brought before the courts. It is my responsibility to provide answers when I am asked about it by the community. Will the Minister ensure that those who have been arrested and charged will be brought before the courts soon?

Mr Ford: I wish to see people who are guilty of crimes being arrested and brought before the courts soon, but I have no responsibility whatsoever for ensuring that that happens.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I will not call the Member who is listed to ask topical question 4.

Illegal Abattoir: County Monaghan

T5. Ms Ruane asked the Minister of Justice whether he has had any contact with his counterpart in the South of Ireland following the serious matter of the find of an illegal abattoir in County Monaghan at the weekend. (AQT 1635/11-15)

Mr Ford: I have not had any specific contact with my colleague about the illegal abattoir in County Monaghan. If there are specific issues that Ms Ruane thinks that I should be raising with Frances Fitzgerald, I have no doubt that she will now take the opportunity to tell me what they are.

Ms Ruane: I strongly urge the Minister to engage with all relevant Departments, North and South, because this is a very serious matter, and I trust that the Minister sees that. It is important to be in contact with the Health Departments because of traceability and potential health concerns.

Mr Ford: I appreciate the serious points that have been made. I am not sure whether Ms Ruane was in the House when I answered an earlier question from her colleague Ms McGahan on the issue of livestock thefts and cross-border movements of livestock, which was highlighted from the south Tyrone side rather than the Monaghan side. I am well aware of those difficulties.

It is an issue on which there has been engagement between my Department and DARD, and I have no doubt that that will continue. There is also a concern about illegal abattoirs and the health standards operated in them. That principally involves DARD and DHSSPS on our side, and their southern departmental equivalents may also be involved.

There are real issues that tie into wider matters of organised crime that we have talked about. The PSNI has been leading the Changing the Mindset project on counterfeit goods and dubious services in Northern Ireland. We need to let people know that, if they are buying something, whether it is a dodgy DVD, inappropriate perfumes, batteries or meat, and it seems to be too good a bargain to be true, it almost certainly is. In the case of foodstuffs, there is the potential for significant health issues. Those involved in any part of the food supply chain need to carry out their duties properly to ensure the full safety and full security of the food chain throughout. Customers must ensure that they are careful about where they buy their produce and do not get taken in by backstreet or car-boot deals that are too good to be true.

Early Intervention: Cross-departmental Work

T6. Mr Agnew asked the Minister of Justice for an update on the cross-departmental work that has taken place on early intervention. (AQT 1636/11-15)

Mr Ford: There have been a number of issues relating to early intervention over the last couple of years. My Department has tended to be a minor partner in that. In the good preventative work with families to ensure that young children do not get into a variety of difficulties in the future, the Health and Education Departments have a larger role and will see returns more quickly than the Justice Department. Nonetheless, we are partners in some projects because the justice system has a role to play and could benefit from such interventions.

Mr Agnew: I thank the Minister for that information. What are the benefits of cross-departmental work in early intervention?

Mr Ford: In a general sense, sometimes we do not see the significant benefits of cross-departmental work because our Departments are set up in silos. Mr Agnew has highlighted the fact that we need Departments to work together better. That applies across a variety of areas, and there is no doubt that, as we look at the resource problems that we face and the variety of difficulties that comes from those, we need to ensure joined-up working in as many different places as possible. In early intervention cross-departmental working, there is no doubt from research here and in other parts of these islands that, in many cases, a small number of families in a neighbourhood may make significant demands on education, health, social services, justice, housing and employment. There is no doubt in my mind that intensive intervention to support those families would give them significant benefits. In particular, it would give the children in those families significant benefits to ensure that they got better opportunities as they grew up, their health was better, they took their educational opportunities and, in an ideal world, did not come into contact with the justice system in an unfortunate way in their teenage years. Those are the benefits of the work that we have been seeking to pioneer over the past year.

3.30 pm

Car Crime

T7. Mr Sheehan asked the Minister of Justice for an update on his Department's continuing efforts to reduce car crime and so-called joy riding. (AQT 1637/11-15)

Mr Ford: Again, it is not so much my Department's efforts around car crime as those of the justice system as a whole. At the first level, we see the work of the PSNI in dealing with car crime. They have to decide, given their list of issues, how they prioritise areas of crime and what resources they can put into them. There is also work being done around the preventative area, for example by the Youth Justice Agency, because there are issues that are more than just dealing with crime when it happens but about preventative work. It is almost the same thing that I was highlighting to Mr Agnew about early interventions. There is early intervention work to be done not just among the families of very young children but among younger teenagers to prevent them from getting into crime and to stop them when they are in danger of getting into crime and antisocial behaviour.

Private Members' Business

Human Trafficking and Exploitation (Further Provisions and Support for Victims) Bill: Consideration Stage

Debate resumed on Question, That clause 1 stand part of the Bill.

Nos 1-23, 27, 40, 50, 60-61.

Mr Dickson: I welcome this opportunity to speak on the group 1 amendments. Before getting into the detail of what I wish to say, I thank Lord Morrow for bringing the Bill to the House, and Justice Minister David Ford for the excellent work that he and his departmental officials undertook in working with Lord Morrow to bring to the House a Bill that can be debated and, hopefully, a great deal of which can be enacted.

There is no doubt that we have questions of difference on some matters on how we would address the evil of human trafficking. However, I genuinely believe that Lord Morrow and I share a common determination, along with the Minister of Justice, to see it ended. It is in that spirit that many of the amendments tabled jointly in the names of Lord Morrow and the Minister will find favour in the House today.

The Bill has not only helped to further highlight the issue but has sparked a thorough and rigorous debate about our approach. We are very much part of a debate that is happening across western Europe and, indeed, the wider world.

Turning to some of the amendments, I welcome the creation and consolidation of new offences under clauses 1A to 1D, which, in line with what is considered internationally to be best practice, will bring those offences together under one Act and thus simplify the legislative framework.

It is appropriate that offences under clause 1A are triable only in a Crown Court to demonstrate the seriousness and abhorrence with which they are viewed. I also welcome the fact that a victim's consent will be viewed as irrelevant. For example, we know that some individuals may consent to being moved across borders, not knowing what awaits them. We are saying loud and clear that, if you traffic someone, there will be no excuse and you will face justice.

I move to clause 4. I have no doubt that Lord Morrow advocates mandatory minimum sentences with the best of intentions. However, good intentions do not always make good policy. We need to be mindful about what produces the best result. I continue to have deep reservations about imposing mandatory minimum sentences.

We need to ask ourselves whether justice is best served by our assigning fixed penalties to specific crimes or is it best to allow the judiciary to consider the aggravating and mitigating factors and to decide on the most appropriate sentence within a sentencing framework.

Mr A Maginness: I thank the Member for giving way. In relation to clause 4 and the point that you have made, the Justice Committee heard from the Attorney General, Mr Larkin. It was his opinion that clause 4 was "not a hard minimum-sentence model" and his view was that, in certain circumstances, any judge would:

"be free to depart from that predictive statutory minimum".

In those circumstances, surely there is enough flexibility to meet the concerns that the Member has just stated.

Mr Dickson: I considered what the Attorney General said to us but I believe firmly in the underlying belief and right for our judges, within a framework, to determine the appropriate sentences. Indeed, I read recently of how the judiciary may inform itself as to how a case should be dealt with. In the lack of any other formal guidance, when it comes to determining how matters should be dealt with, the judiciary may even take view of debates in the House and particularly the comments of the Minister of Justice. That is the most appropriate way in which these things should be handled. I firmly believe that sentencing is a matter for the courts, within that framework, and that judges are in the best position to consider the unique circumstances of each case.

It is important to note that, where a court might have treated a matter too leniently, the state can appeal and a higher penalty can be given. Indeed, a recent case in Northern Ireland demonstrated that. Those cases can be tried in the High Court and be added to the list of offences for which courts can award an indeterminate sentence. So there can be no argument that we are not treating these offences seriously enough. Furthermore, I have considered this in detail and, although some Members have advocated mandatory minimums for other crimes, I have not seen anything to suggest that they have verifiable deterrent effects. I nevertheless understand that, across the Chamber, there is much sympathy for this measure. If it stands part of the Bill, at least we will have an amendment that will ensure that it does not apply to under-18s, which was another of my major concerns about the initial clause.

In short, my view is that mandatory minimum sentences do not represent sound criminal justice policy. We should not tie courts' hands but let judges take decisions freely, based on the evidence presented to them. There is an important principle of judicial discretion that must be upheld.

Mr Buchanan: First, like other Members, I commend Lord Morrow for bringing the Bill to the House. Hopefully, we will see its passage through the House without too many objections. Today, I direct my comments against the attempt to remove clause 4 from the Bill and in favour of the amendments put forward by Lord Morrow.

Clause 4 would require a court to set down a minimum sentence of at least two years for an individual convicted of a human trafficking or slavery offence. The clause allows for a judge to derogate from this two-year minimum in cases where the court believes that there are exceptional circumstances relating to the offence or to the offender that justify not imposing the minimum sentence. A number of amendments have been proposed to the original clause since the Bill's First Reading. These amendments include ensuring that a minimum sentence cannot be levied against a child and ensuring that, should a judge derogate from imposing the minimum sentence due to exceptional circumstances, he or she is required to outline why they have done so. These amendments seem sensible, and I am happy to support them.

Lord Morrow would be the first to admit that his Bill was not the finished article when he introduced it to the House. It is to his credit that he has been willing to work with others to improve the Bill. This clause is in the minority of clauses that have been the subject of disagreement between Lord Morrow and the Minister of Justice.

The debate up to now can be summarised very simply: Lord Morrow believes that it is wholly appropriate for this elected House to lay down appropriate minimum sentences for particular offences. On the other hand, the Minister of Justice believes, on a point of principle, that it is wrong for the Assembly to fetter the discretion of judges in sentencing. I believe that the introduction of a mandatory minimum sentence for these offences, with the caveat of judges being able to derogate in exceptional circumstances, is the correct and proper way forward.

I will make three points in favour of retaining the clause. First, introducing a mandatory minimum sentence for these offences sends out a strong signal to our society that we take the offences very seriously and that every Member believes that human trafficking and slavery offences are heinous crimes that must be severely punished. Trafficking and slavery offences offend against the dignity of men, women and children who live in the Province or come to it. It is incumbent on us, as Members, to do everything in our power to stamp out this activity. Implementing a mandatory minimum sentence would act as a deterrent to those who seek to perpetrate these crimes and would show victims that we believe that the crime inflicted on them should be severely punished. To my mind, it is difficult to imagine a scenario where an individual found guilty of trafficking or slavery offences should be sentenced to less than two years in prison.

Secondly, mandatory minimum sentences already apply in Northern Irish law for particular offences. There is no constitutional block on introducing such sentences. As was pointed out at Second Stage, article 70 of the Firearms (Northern Ireland) Order 2004 sets out a minimum sentence of five years for those aged over 21 who are found guilty of a set of offences in the Order. I have yet to hear the Minister of Justice calling for the repeal of that article, considering his objections to minimum sentences. In England and Wales, minimum sentences exist with regard to drug trafficking, burglary and firearms offences. Other liberal democracies utilise minimum sentences for many offences. For example, in Canada, according to one think tank, there are currently 49 minimum sentences in operation for particular serious offences.

It is worth pointing out that the Attorney General and the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission have no objection to introducing a minimum sentence in our Province. The Attorney General, in his evidence to the Justice Committee on 6 March 2014, stated that a minimum sentence is:

“a perfectly proper device if the legislature is satisfied as to its policy.”

The Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission, in its evidence to the Committee, stated that it did not take objection to clause 4 as long as it did not apply to children. Consequently, there is no question of the clause being constitutionally inappropriate or contrary to individual human rights.

Thirdly, mandatory minimum sentences are, in principle, an effective way to ensure that justice is done in our country.

It is important to be clear that, contrary to the extravagant claims of some MLAs at Second Stage, the clause does not eliminate a judge's ability to lay down a proportionate sentence. In fact, it provides a stable range within which a judge can decide what a proportionate sentence would be. In this case, a judge can also derogate from laying down a two-year sentence if exceptional circumstances are involved in a case. It is also worth pointing out that the Northern Ireland Assembly has frequently fettered the discretion of judges in the sentences that they can enforce. That is usually seen in how the Assembly limits the punishment that can be laid down by the courts. The truth is that no judge has absolute discretion in the punishments that they can set down.

3.45 pm

I am pretty confident this afternoon — I could be wrong — that the Minister of Justice and other Members making the argument that it is wrong to fetter the discretion of judges would not be in favour of reintroducing the death penalty in the Province, yet that is the ultimate logic of the view that the Assembly should not fetter the discretion of judges. If the Assembly can dictate that certain punishments are beyond the limits of the courts — we do it all the time by limiting the maximum penalty for offences — surely it can outline certain punishments as appropriate for particular offences.

Clause 4 is a sensible one that serves a very useful purpose. It illustrates that human trafficking and slavery offences are deeply serious crimes that will not be tolerated by this society. It is also a measure that is proportionate and constitutionally acceptable. I urge Members from all sides of the House to reject the Minister's attempt to have the clause removed from the Bill and to accept the amendments put forward by Lord Morrow.

Mr Agnew: At the outset, on behalf of the Green Party in Northern Ireland, I welcome the legislation and the attention that it has brought to the issue of human trafficking. My perception is that in Northern Ireland our Police Service is already taking a lead role in tackling human trafficking in terms of its standards set within these islands. The Bill has brought a renewed focus and can help us continue to innovate and move forward in how we tackle human trafficking issues. I am given to understand that the Minister may well have brought forward some of the legislation and, indeed, in working with Lord Morrow, has helped to bring forward this Bill. There is no doubt that the Bill has sped up the process, and anything that we can do to expedite the updating of our laws on human trafficking should be welcomed — of course with the caveat that we have to get the legislation right. Lord Morrow's colleague Paul Givan referred to Lord Morrow being the modern-day William Wilberforce. Whilst I think that may be stretching it a bit far — perhaps if human trafficking was socially acceptable and legal it would be an apt comparison — there is no doubt that many of us in the House will welcome the legislation, as will many of the public.

I will quickly touch on some of the non-controversial amendments in this group that I would like to welcome. I welcome amendment No 21, which would see human trafficking treated as a lifestyle offence. It will further empower the police in their investigation and, indeed, the courts in sentencing. It is a welcome and useful addition to the original Bill. Amendment No 27 ensures that human trafficking offences can be prosecuted even where a victim is reluctant to come forward. Given the nature of the crime we are talking about and the circumstances that many victims find themselves in — being coerced and intimidated and perhaps, in many cases, lacking the confidence to come forward — whilst of course having the victim come forward and act as a witness is always preferable and will strengthen the prosecution's case, it is important that no prosecution is derailed by the ability of those who commit human trafficking offences to intimidate their victims and perhaps circumvent the legal system through that method.

On behalf of the Green Party in Northern Ireland, I welcome the addition of the offence of forced marriage. It is important that this aspect of exploitation is included in the Bill. I think that the Bill is more complete in what it seeks to achieve by the introduction of this offence through this amendment, should it be passed here today.

I move on to clause 4, which is what has caused the controversy with this group of amendments. I oppose clause 4. I have failed to be convinced of the logic of it. I accept that it is not an absolute constraint on judges with regard to a minimum sentence, but there is no doubt that it is a change from the norm about which I am yet to be presented with the evidence. I know that one example was given of a minimum sentence in Northern Ireland law, but the fact that we are being drawn to one exception highlights how rare a situation it is. It was one that I was open-minded about, but I am yet to be convinced about the need for minimum sentencing. I am concerned that, rather than the driving force being evidence that the clause will reduce instances of human trafficking, which is what the Bill's priority should be, it is about being seen to be tough on human trafficking.

We can use any adjective we want. I abhor human trafficking; of course I do. It is a heinous crime; of course it is. That is a given. You would be hard pushed to find a Member in the House who would disagree with that. I think that the courts and judges would take a similar approach: that this is one of the most serious crimes that could be committed by a human being or group of human beings against another human being. I could think of little that is worse than to inflict slavery, imprisonment, abuse and coercion on a person. We should take it as a given that the courts will treat human trafficking with seriousness.

What I do not have in front of me to support the clause is evidence that it will help the courts, decrease instances of human trafficking or act as the deterrent that has been mentioned. What I do not have in front of me is the research that goes through every possible circumstance in which we would sentence in a case of human trafficking. There will be not only exceptional cases but instances in which there will be insufficient evidence to give the harshest of penalties. I have seen judgements in which the sentences given were for only what could be prosecuted for. It is a road that I would be concerned about going down.

What I do not want — it has, to some extent, been alluded to — is trial by public opinion. Judges will be presented with evidence on both sides. They will know the remit of their role. On the outside, we can often have an emotional response to what we hear about court judgements. Often, when we do not have the evidence in front of us, we may rush to judge a court judgement without being fully engaged with the facts. I do not think that it should be trial by public opinion or, in some cases, trial by the media. I fear that the drive behind minimum sentences is to be seen to be tough on crime. If we accept that human trafficking is a horrendous crime and that our judges and courts will treat it accordingly, we can accept that there is no need for minimum sentences in the Bill.

That said, the will of the House may well be that clause 4 passes, in which case I welcome amendment No 16, which would exclude children from the minimum sentences and about which, as has been highlighted, there may have been some children's rights concerns. In fact, there were undoubtedly some children's rights concerns with the clause in that regard. I welcome the recognition of that and amendment No 16, which would exclude children from the clause.

Mr Hazzard: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. I, too, welcome the opportunity, as a new Committee member, to talk about the substantial and important legislation in front of us. Despite being on the Committee only a short number of weeks, I know that the workload, the amount of evidence taken and the direction of the Committee is commendable. Most people have touched on that today. I commend Maurice Morrow for a very assiduous approach to what is a very important issue to tackle. I welcome the evolution of the Bill, a Bill that now sits comfortably with European directives and, indeed, modern slavery legislation at Westminster. I welcome the fact that changes have been made.

Sinn Féin very much welcomes the new offence of slavery, which will include forced and compulsory labour, as we welcome the inclusion of the Finance and Personnel Minister's amendment on forced marriage, an issue that has received increasing publicity in recent years and that we need to get to grips with. I welcome the acceptance of the need for proper resources and training to be utilised in tackling exploitation, slavery and human trafficking. It is vital that the Bill builds on the need for effective exit strategies, compassionate care and a commitment to avoid the secondary victimisation of a victim. In the light of that, I welcome the amendment regarding the right of the victim not to give consent and that such consent is irrelevant in seeking prosecution by the state. That is a very important issue.

I want to touch on clause 4. Of course I agree that we must have robust and rigorous sentencing frameworks. Indeed, for an offence such as human trafficking and slavery, the penalty should reflect the gravity of the offence. However, we must not fall into the precarious situation where legislators feel it is proper to interfere with judicial discretion in such matters. Undeniably, minimum sentences are often the result of good intentions, but, all too often, good intentions do not make good judicial policies. Good policies and, indeed, good results should be paramount. It is with that in mind that I oppose any notion of minimum sentencing.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Beggs] in the Chair)

Surely, justice would be best served by enabling judges to be free to tailor sentences to the aggravating and mitigating facts of each case. Furthermore, minimum sentencing does not reduce crime; it is simply not the deterrent that was suggested earlier. As research indicates time and time again, it is simply false to suggest otherwise. The certainty of arrest, prosecution, conviction and punishment has a greater deterrent effect than the actual severity of said punishment. Just as good law should rightly be tempered with equity, robust sentencing rules should leave well alone so that judges can determine the individual facts of the case.

Overall, however, I welcome the opportunity to consider the Bill today. As I said, it is a better Bill at this stage, and I look forward to hearing the rest of the discussions this afternoon.

Mr McGlone: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. I welcome the private Member's Bill and the opportunity to debate the important issue today.

The trafficking and exploitation of human beings is a degrading practice, and we have a duty to do all that we can to bring those responsible to justice. It is clear that human beings are being trafficked into and through the North by organised criminal gangs for exploitation here and elsewhere. That exploitation takes the form of sexual exploitation, the exploitation of labour and domestic servitude. It is also clear that the organised criminal gangs responsible have largely been able to evade justice. Although around 100 victims of human trafficking have been reported as having been rescued in the North in the past five years, there have been few successful convictions of actual traffickers. The criminal gangs responsible operate internationally, and any attempt to disrupt them and bring them to justice needs a joined-up approach involving a number of Departments and agencies, here and throughout these islands. That work continues through the immigration and human trafficking subgroup of the Organised Crime Task Force, which includes representatives of an Garda Síochána. It is important that we acknowledge that we legislate for one area of a common travel area and that our efforts must be coordinated on an all-island approach or, if you look at it that way, an all-islands approach.

The cross-border forum on human trafficking, which focuses on identifying victims and reducing demand, is an example of that cooperation.

4.00 pm

I commend Lord Morrow on his efforts in bringing forward the Human Trafficking and Exploitation Bill. I also commend the Assembly's Justice Committee, of which I am a member, for its work during the Bill's scrutiny. The Justice Minister has worked constructively with Lord Morrow and the Justice Committee to bring forward amendments to the Bill and, since its introduction to the Assembly, has published the second annual action plan on human trafficking and exploitation for Northern Ireland. The action plan identifies priority areas for the Department of Justice to drive forward during 2014-15: strengthening law enforcement, protecting and supporting victims, and preventing human trafficking and exploitation.

Official figures indicate that the scale of human trafficking in the North is relatively low when compared with the UK, with referrals making up only 2% of the overall figure. In 2013, the national referral mechanism (NRM) received 41 referrals of potential victims of trafficking here. Seventeen potential victims were referred in 2012, and 32 potential victims were referred in 2011. However, we must ensure that we are doing everything in our power to prevent these crimes in the first place and to respond robustly when they do occur.

The Bill, with agreed amendments, has much in it of great value. If implemented, it will do much to advance the interest of victims. The measures to support victims of trafficking are certainly most welcome. There needs to be a strong framework of assistance and support for victims to encourage them to engage with the criminal justice system and help to bring those responsible for trafficking to court. In particular, the additional measures in clauses 13 and 14 for victims who have to appear in court to give evidence are a very important step forward.

Lord Morrow and the Justice Minister have proposed a number of new provisions, among which is one to support services for those who wish to exit prostitution. Such a support mechanism or exit strategy is an important addition to the Bill and is to be commended.

Mr Nesbitt: I will make a short contribution, if I may. First, I apologise to the House that I have not been here for the whole debate to date. I also thank Lord Morrow for bringing forward this important legislation, which takes us beyond recognising that we have a problem to doing something concrete about it. That is to be commended, as is his attitude to the amendments and his discussions with officials, the Minister and so forth to get us to this point.

For me, the test has to be the impact of the Bill, which shines a light on the problem. What is the impact of shining that light? Do we get the traffickers to respond as rabbits in the headlights, which I guess is where we want them, or does it force them to scurry into a deeper, darker black hole where they are less accessible? That is the test for me in looking at the Bill and the amendments in this group.

The only amendment in this group that I want to reference at this point is clause 4 on minimum sentencing. In the House, we are all aware that there are three separate branches to government: the legislature, the Executive and the judiciary. I think that we all agree that we want to give each other the space to operate without interference, but, as was pointed out, we are, to some extent, in a Venn diagram with concentric circles.

There are precedents for one branch of government to overlap another. The question is whether it is a good idea on minimum sentencing. It is certainly constitutionally possible. As Mr Buchanan, among others, pointed out, there are constitutional precedents for setting minimum sentencing in this country. Is it desirable, however, for this legislature to say to the judiciary, "You must impose a minimum sentence"? In principle, we would probably rather not do that. However, is the case made on this specific issue?

I look at it very simply. If one human being is prepared to take another human being and traffic them and say, "I am prepared to subject you to a lifetime's slavery. I am prepared to ruin your life forever and a day by subjecting you to sexual abuse, mental torture and physical abuse, and I don't care," I say to Lord Morrow that, in the context of the judiciary having its own discretion, I want you to say to that trafficker, "We will catch you; we will convict you; and then we will send you away for at least two years." If that is what will happen, I ask Lord Morrow where the door to the Aye Lobby is, because I am 100% behind him on this clause.

Mr B McCrea: I am afraid that I am not one who will join in the plaudits for Lord Morrow on this Bill. I understand his intentions, and I am sure that he is an honourable man trying to address things, but, having listened to the contributions from all around the House, I have to say that I do not think that this is a good day's work. I do not think that the Committee for Justice has done its job properly or that people have inquired properly into this. I am disappointed that the Chair of the Justice Committee is not here, because he engaged in a debate with me earlier, and I would have liked to carry on with that. In this group of amendments, we see that the Department of Justice opposes clauses 1, 2, 4 and 5. Later, it will oppose clauses 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 12, 14, 15, 17 and 18. In total, DoJ has opposed 14 of the 19 clauses. That is not a particularly good record.

The Bill was not fit for purpose. Had it not been for the advent of the Modern Slavery Bill going through Westminster, we would not be talking about anything of any relevance. In my opinion, the Department of Justice, faced with a fairly unedifying spectacle, has done what it does best: tried to make the best of a bad job. It has subsumed Lord Morrow's Bill and made it into Northern Ireland's equivalent of the Modern Slavery Bill. It will, of course, allow Lord Morrow to be photographed, take the plaudits, be greeted as Northern Ireland's Wilberforce and all of those things, but, in reality, we are doing nothing more than what the Minister outlined in the interdepartmental reports that he put forward, which is to make sure that we are compliant with UK and European legislation.

I was disappointed. Maybe some of the Members who engaged with me earlier — not the Chairman, because he is not here — will tell me whether the Committee for Justice, when considering the Bill, looked at His Honour Judge Burgess's report on the Matyas Pis case. He outlined the sentencing guidelines that he was going to use, or which he has suggested — [Interruption.] Excuse me.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): I remind Members that mobile phones should be switched off in the Chamber so that they do not interfere with the debate.

Mr B McCrea: I apologise for that. Tom Elliott asked a question twice, I think, and it is interesting that his party leader also picked up on the issue. I am not sure whether I have got this right, but I think so: under amendment Nos 17 and 18, where the minimum sentence is not imposed, the court is required to explain why and record the exceptional circumstances that apply. He envisaged some interesting outworkings and asked Lord Morrow whether he could give any examples.

Here is what Burgess had to say, and this is the information that I do not think anybody in the House has looked at. Under the Sentencing Council's guidelines, the starting point for involvement at any level in any stage of the trafficking operation "where the victim was coerced" is six years — not two years, six years. The sentencing range is four to nine years. So the two-year issue is a complete red herring.

I talked to Mr Maginness about involvement at any level in any stage of a trafficking operation where there was no coercion of the victim. I think that he ended up saying, if there is no coercion, where is the crime? Actually, there is a crime, according to the Matyas Pis judgement. The starting point for trafficking where there is no coercion is two years, and then it goes on to say that the sentencing range is one to four years. For Mr Elliott's benefit, Burgess sets out the aggravating factors for the offence of trafficking:

- "(1) Large-scale commercial operation.*
- (2) High degree of planning or sophistication.*

(3) Large number of people trafficked.

(4) Substantial financial (in the region of £5000 and upwards or other gain.

(5) Fraud.

(6) Financial extortion of the victim.

(7) Deception.

(8) Use of force, threats of force or other forms of coercion.

(9) Threats against victim or members of victim's family.

(10) Abduction or detention.

(12) Inhumane treatment.

(13) Confiscation of victim's passport."

Those are the aggravating factors. I wonder whether the Committee for Justice or Lord Morrow actually looked at this pronouncement by Burgess because he also goes on to say that the sentencing guidelines set out the following as mitigation:

"(1) Coercion of the offender by a third party.

(2) No evidence of personal gain.

(3) Limited involvement."

In other words, the courts have looked at this, and the criminal provision is there. We do not have to be dealing with this issue. Just to be clear on that particular case, the prosecution accepted that there was no allegation that A and B were brought to or held in Northern Ireland against their will or that force or threat of force was made against them. The prosecution also accepted that the defendant was not part of any criminal gang. Despite all that, he got three years. Not two years but three years, even though, with no coercion, it could have been two. The courts have already addressed this issue. There is already the information, and there is already the legal framework to be present.

Mr Wilson: Will the Member give way?

Mr B McCrea: I will indeed.

Mr Wilson: The Member may well quote the examples that he has done, but Mr Elliott also quoted an example of where the court, having found someone guilty of holding people against their will, putting them in substandard accommodation and taking money from their wages, fined them £500. So, whilst the Member can quote what the sentences may be, there are, quite clearly, cases where even the minimum sentence of two years has not been applied. In fact, non-custodial sentences have been applied in instances where some of the factors that he has listed applied.

Mr B McCrea: I thank the Member for his intervention. He and I have previously talked on this matter. His quotation on this matter was in an accusation to me:

"It seems to be that he is defending the judiciary. He has talked about the length of sentences, the fact that the minimum sentence here is two years and the independence of the judiciary, which I do not actually subscribe to totally because I think that, sometimes, judges are a bit out of touch with the rest of society.” — [Official Report, Vol 87, No 5, p44, col 1].

There is an issue here about the independence of the judiciary. All factors must be taken into account, and where there are sentencing guidelines they are adhered to. In the particular issue that Mr Elliott was talking about, I do not think that the gangmasters do have sentencing guidelines, but, if they are required, we will have them. I have to say to the House that I would far, far, far rather have the judiciary deciding on what was the appropriate sentence and the appropriate way forward than the Members gathered round here because all this is for the optics.

Mr Buchanan: Will the Member give way?

Mr B McCrea: I will in just one moment.

This is for the optics; this is not actually going to change anything. This is people putting out platitudes, saying that we are concerned and should do something and saying that something must be done, but do you know what? All the provisions are already there. This is purely for the optics, and, frankly, it is a waste of time. I will give way.

Mr Buchanan: The Member seems to have a problem with minimum sentences. Does he, therefore, think that minimum sentences regarding firearms offences should be repealed?

4.15 pm

Mr B McCrea: If that is meant to be some sort of fastball to deal with my argument, I do not see it. The fundamental thing that every single person has said in the Chamber, unless the Member is going to disagree with me, is that it is good to have a separation between the legislator and the judiciary. The justice system works because the people who are empowered to do these things are properly informed, can take on board all the issues in front of them and will come up with the appropriate sentence. That seems to me to be a fundamental leg upon which democracy stands.

I am surprised that people will say, “Do you know what? This is an exceptional circumstance, therefore, we can do away with it. We do not need to deal with this particular one.” Pretty soon, everything will be an exceptional circumstance, and what happens then? Then you end up being forced to pass sentences that you do not think are appropriate, and circumstances come up, and you say, “This is not right.” We are tinkering with a very fundamental part of our democracy, and no matter what the good intentions of the people who brought forward this Bill, and I know that Lord Morrow was well-intentioned in bringing forward the Bill, this will not help.

So, I come to a situation now about how we are going to move —

Mr Wilson: Will the Member give way?

Mr B McCrea: Yes.

Mr Wilson: I am sure down in the courts of justice, the judges will find it very touching that they have such a defender in Mr McCrea. Do not forget that this is an issue that there has been widespread concern about in society.

Can he think of any circumstances in which a judge can conceivably believe that a custodial sentence of less than two years is acceptable in cases where people are being trafficked into this country, held against their will and forced to work for slave labour wages?

Mr B McCrea: The Deputy Speaker will forgive me just a little bit if I address this issue because it is slightly outside the remit. The question is not, “What are we trying to achieve?”. I do not know of anybody who supports human trafficking. I do not think that is what we are talking about. The question that we are trying to deal with here is, “What is the most efficacious way of dealing with it?”. I will make the argument later that I think that elements of the Bill, no matter how well-intentioned, are counterproductive.

There may well be some side benefits for having the debate. That is fair enough. As far as I am aware, people were having the debate anyway, but, in response to Mr Wilson, I will say that I think that we are treading on very thin ice when we start to try and dictate to the judiciary on every single item and say, “This is what you will do.” You can take one exceptional issue and say, “That is an exception”, but once you have made one exception, there is another exception and it builds up. A tenet of democracy is that we should legislate, and the judiciary should be involved in the judicial process.

Mr Frew: I thank the Member for giving way. I hear his argument. He is the defender with regard to the gap between the judiciary and us, as legislators. Is he then saying to the House today that we should repeal all the minimum sentences in Northern Ireland around firearms legislation and that the UK should do the same?

Mr B McCrea: The principle that I work on is that I do not understand why a minimum sentence is required if you are going to rely on the judiciary exercising its discretion. In reality, what we have had put forward is that we have said that we are going to have a minimum sentence and then we have said, “Unless we have exceptional circumstances.” When you read the judgement by Burgess, everything that he says is, “There are exceptional circumstances, which I take into consideration.” That is the proper rule of law. This is not somebody saying to the judge, “You will have a minimum sentence per se.” We need to get a situation in which we should observe it properly in principle, and the judiciary should be independent and should be allowed to move forward.

Mr Buchanan: Will the Member give way?

Mr B McCrea: I am sorry. I have already given you a chance, and you will be pleased to know that I am just about to finish anyway.

All I am saying to you is that, on this particular issue and the way forward, I do not take any great pleasure in standing up and saying that I do not think that this is the right way forward. I actually think that we have missed opportunities. Look at the situation that we had at Second Stage, when the Bill was opposed by the PSNI, the PPS and others, and people were coming along saying, “This is not the right way forward”. It is not.

Some people mentioned a poll and said that if you ask a question in a certain way, as was the position that Mr McCartney, I think, took, you will get a certain answer. However, the fundamental thing that we are meant to do here is legislate properly. I put it to you quite strongly that all of the flimflam and all of the saying, "Oh, well this should be different" does not hold water. We should not be interfering; we should not be putting down minimum sentences. This Bill stands only because the Department of Justice has managed to subsume it, take it over, be the cuckoo in the nest and make it the Modern Slavery Bill. That is what it comes back as; that is what we are faced with now; and on that basis we have to welcome those elements. But the rest of it is just for the optics and will not change anything.

Mr Ford: If I am "the cuckoo in the nest", then the thrush or blackbird, or whatever Lord Morrow is, is entirely complicit in much — although not all — that has been done.

Let me repeat the point that I made during my intervention in his opening remarks: this is very much an agreed proposal between us, and I, personally, see no harm in the Department of Justice assisting a private Member to achieve a shared aim by working together. It is actually what I think the people of Northern Ireland want to see in this place, because they see far too much of the other sort. Sadly, I suspect that much of the media comment about this debate will be around the very small areas on which we disagree rather than on the fundamental issue on which we do agree.

I welcome the opportunity at this stage to speak to the group 1 amendment Nos 1 to 14, 21 to 23, 27, 50, 60 and 61, which have all been tabled by jointly by Lord Morrow and me — as I said in my intervention, that is a unique situation — as well as amendment Nos 15 to 20 that Lord Morrow tabled and amendment No 40, tabled in the name of the Minister of Finance and Personnel, for which I carry Executive responsibility on the Floor today.

Amendment Nos 1 to 4 introduce four new clauses to create a package of new offences to tackle the exploitation of people through human trafficking and slavery, servitude and forced or compulsory labour. By bringing these offences together under a single piece of legislation, I believe that we will align Northern Ireland law with best practice as identified by GRETA, the Council of Europe's Group of Experts on Action against Trafficking in Human Beings. Taken together, these amendments will streamline and simplify the legislative framework to facilitate the work of investigators, prosecutors and the courts to bring perpetrators to justice. They will also help to ensure that where individuals are prepared to exploit or enslave fellow human beings, there will be a consistent response under the law of Northern Ireland regardless of the nature of that exploitation. The new slavery-type offences and the new human trafficking offence will attract a maximum sentence of life imprisonment, commensurate with the seriousness of these offences and the impact they have on the victims.

Amendment No 1 introduces new clause 1A, which will create the new offence of slavery, servitude and forced or compulsory labour to replace the existing offence under section 71 of the Coroners and Justice Act 2009. The offence will be triable only in the Crown Court, reflecting the seriousness with which it is viewed. The provision also makes clear that in determining whether an offence under the new clause has taken place, regard must be had to all the circumstances and, in particular, to whether there are personal circumstances that may render the victim more vulnerable than other people. It also makes clear that the victim's consent to any act forming part of the offence is irrelevant. In doing so, I believe that this amendment will offer greater protection from slavery and exploitation to the more-vulnerable citizens amongst us.

Amendment No 2 introduces new clause 1B to create the new offence of human trafficking that is intended to replace both the existing offences of human trafficking for sexual exploitation under sections 57 to 59 of the Sexual Offences Act 2003 and of human trafficking for non-sexual exploitation under section 4 of the Asylum and Immigration (Treatment of Claimants, etc.) Act 2004. The offence will apply at all stages of the trafficking chain, whether that is recruitment, transportation, harbouring, receiving or exchanging control over the victim.

The provision also addresses the international dimension of trafficking, which has been considered by previous legislation in this House. As with existing trafficking offences, the offence will apply where a person is trafficked into, out of or within the United Kingdom and will also cover trafficking activity that takes place anywhere else in the world where the perpetrator is a UK national, a habitual resident of Northern Ireland or a body incorporated under the law of the UK.

Amendment No 3 introduces new clause 1C, which defines exploitation for the purposes of the new trafficking offence under clause 1B and will cover a range of exploitation types including slavery and forced labour, sexual exploitation, organ removal, securing services by force, threats, deception, fraud etc or preying upon the vulnerabilities of children or vulnerable adults to secure services. In doing so, it also makes it clear that, for the purposes of these provisions, exploitation may include forced begging or criminal activity.

In addition to these offences, amendment No 4 introduces new clause 1D, which would create a new preparatory offence; that is, it will make it an offence to commit an offence with the intention of committing one of the offences under clauses 1A or 1B. Article 66 of the Sexual Offences (Northern Ireland) Order 2008 already makes it an offence to commit an offence with the intention of committing a relevant sexual offence, and there is already provision for preparatory offences in respect of trafficking for sexual exploitation. However, there is currently no equivalent preparatory offence in respect of trafficking for non-sexual exploitation or slavery-type offences. New clause 1D will close the current gap in the law and will offer greater protection against these types of offences, regardless of the nature of the exploitation involved.

Amendment No 5 introduces new clause 2A, which is intended to enhance the powers of courts in Northern Ireland to protect the public and individuals from the organised criminals who perpetrate these crimes. New clause 2A will amend schedule 1 to the Criminal Justice (Northern Ireland) Order 2008 to specify the slavery-type and human trafficking offences under new clauses 1A and 1B as serious offences for the purposes of sentencing dangerous offenders. It will also amend schedule 2 to the 2008 Order to specify these offences as violent offences under Part 1 of the schedule and to list human trafficking for sexual exploitation as a specified sexual offence for the purposes of sentencing dangerous offenders. In doing so, new clause 2A will bring the offences under the ambit of the public protection arrangements — the public protection sentencing framework provided for under articles 13 and 14 of the 2008 Order — with the effect that, where the court considers it necessary for public protection, it could impose a life sentence, an indeterminate custodial sentence or an extended custodial sentence. Any individual who receives such a sentence will also be subject to the associated regime for release, licence, supervision and, importantly, recall arrangements.

The introduction of new clauses 1A to 1D will render clauses 1, 2 and 5 of the Bill as introduced no longer necessary, and that is why Lord Morrow and I have agreed they should no longer stand part of the Bill.

Clause 3 introduces factors that the courts must treat as aggravating factors when considering the seriousness of a trafficking or slavery-type offence for the purposes of sentencing. Amendment Nos 6 to 14 are relevant to that. As has been acknowledged in the Chamber today, I have questioned the desirability of and need for clause 3, since the courts already have the ability to issue sentencing guidelines that are flexible enough to respond to emerging case law and, indeed, guidelines are already in place in respect of human trafficking for sexual exploitation. I acknowledge, however, the strong support that exists for the provision, and I have worked with Lord Morrow and his team to develop and agree amendment Nos 6 to 14, which will amend clause 3. The amendments are technical in nature, for the most part providing the appropriate definitions to give effect to the provision. Others will omit certain definitions, such as "position of trust" or "vulnerable adult", from the clause. Those definitions are now included instead in the new general interpretation provisions at new clause 17A. They do not in any way change the intended effect of clause 3.

I suppose you might say, in response to the kind of criticisms that have come from Mr Basil McCrea, that Lord Morrow has convinced me to keep the provision for aggravating factors in the Bill, and I have persuaded him perhaps to amend some of the provisions to tighten up some of the language. We are now agreed that this group of amendments is the best way to handle this issue.

Clause 4 will introduce the mandatory minimum sentence of two years for any human trafficking or slavery-type offence under new clauses 1A and 1B, except where the court believes that there are exceptional circumstances to justify not doing so. The usual position of course is that, whilst the legislature determines the maximum sentence, it does not determine the minimum sentence. Indeed, in a previous debate in the House when we were considering the issue of crimes against elderly people, Mr Jim Allister highlighted a case that he had been involved in where a father assaulted a paedophile pensioner who had abused his child. It was an example of why there can be difficulties with mandatory minimums. Of course, we have the judgement of Judge Burgess in the case of Crown v Matyas Pis, where he looked at the issue of an appropriate level of sentencing. I do not need to repeat the points made by Basil McCrea in that respect, though, if I were to do so, I would do it in a slightly different tone of voice from that which he adopted.

4.30 pm

I wish it to be clear that I still, however, do not support clause 4. My firm belief is that judges are the best people to take account of the specific circumstances of each case as it is presented to them in court and that sentencing should be entirely a matter for the courts on a case-by-case basis. We have had examples highlighting certain bits of legislation. I will, however, point out that the Firearms Order 2004 was Westminster legislation and not, as seemed to be suggested earlier, legislation of this House. Whilst I acknowledge and am reassured that there can be exceptions allowed under clause 4, I do not believe, nonetheless, that the clause is appropriate or is helpful to us at this stage. Nor does the principle of a mandatory minimum sentence sit easily beside other sentencing provisions under new clause 2A, which would, for example, allow courts to award indeterminate sentences for the offences.

Mr Wilson: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Ford: I will.

Mr Wilson: I can understand the Minister's point that he does not believe that the clause is appropriate if he takes the view that you should hand over to judges completely the discretion on this matter, but perhaps he will explain his second remark. Given the seriousness of this type of crime and given the fact that anyone who involves themselves in human trafficking does so in the full knowledge of the suffering that they are imposing, why does he not believe that a statutory minimum sentence is helpful?

Mr Ford: I recognise the points that the Member has made, but, to correct the first point, we do not give judges full discretion; we impose, as a legislature, the maximum. I believe that it is unhelpful to say, "This is a minimum, but it is not really a minimum and exceptional circumstances may apply". There are elements where that is confusing, and that is why I remain opposed. I recognise that many Members from different sides of the House have indicated that they are sympathetic to the provision, and amendments that have been tabled by Lord Morrow address some of my key concerns. However, should clause 4 stand part of the Bill at the end of today's proceedings, some further amendments may be needed to ensure that it is aligned with the existing sentencing framework that we have in Northern Ireland. If that is the case, I will certainly offer to continue to work with Lord Morrow to address those points.

In the event that clause 4 were to be supported by the Assembly, I believe that amendment Nos 15 to 18 and amendment No 20 will help to improve the clause and will mitigate those concerns. Amendment No 15 is purely technical and will ensure that clause 4 applies in respect of offences under new clauses 1A and 1B.

Amendment No 16 is a key amendment, as has been acknowledged by Lord Morrow, to ensure that clause 4 applies only to adults and not to children. That was one of the most significant concerns that I raised at Second Stage and in subsequent discussions, and I have argued that the clause as drafted would run counter to the principle of the best interests of the child, which is set out in article 3 of the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child. I am grateful to Lord Morrow for engaging on that one and for tabling the amendment.

Amendment No 17 would require the judge to state in open court where he is of the opinion that exceptional circumstances exist that justify the imposition of a lesser sentence or a suspended sentence and the reasons for that. Amendment No 18, which is contingent on amendment No 17, would place an additional requirement on the chief clerk of the court to record the court's opinion and reasoning if such exceptional circumstances are considered to exist. Amendment No 19, however, removes the option for the court to award a suspended sentence and, I believe, would act as a further barrier to judicial discretion. I do not support that amendment.

Whilst I fully support the motivation behind it, I remain of the view that clause 4 as a whole runs contrary to the established principle of judicial discretion, the discretion that the legislature normally only sets the maximum rather than the minimum sentence, and I continue to stand against that.

Amendment Nos 21 to 23 and amendment Nos 60 and 61 are intended to facilitate the confiscation of criminal assets, and, in doing so, they seek to undermine the principal driver for the perpetrators of the offences.

They also include new powers to order the payment of reparation to victims.

Amendment No 21 introduces new clause 5A, which amends schedule 5 to the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 (POCA) to designate the new human trafficking and slavery-type offences under new clauses 1A and 1B as criminal lifestyle offences. That, perhaps, needs a degree of explanation. POCA sets out a strict chronology for making confiscation orders, and the question of whether a person has a criminal lifestyle is central to this legal process. If an individual is convicted of a lifestyle offence specified under POCA, the courts can find that they have obtained the benefit of general criminal conduct, which then allows the courts to undertake an inquiry, beyond the normal statutory six-year limitation period, into all prior criminal activities. Profit is clearly the key motivation for those involved in trafficking and exploitation, and by improving the court's ability to confiscate criminal assets, new clause 5A will help to undermine the economic motivation that fuels the exploitation of human beings. By specifying those offences as criminal lifestyle offences for the purposes of the confiscation of assets, there will also be a consistent approach between human trafficking and slavery-type offences and other organised crimes, such as drug trafficking, arms trafficking and money laundering.

Amendment Nos 22 and 60 taken together will introduce new clause 5B and new schedule 1 to the Bill, which will also enhance the powers of the court to target and pursue the assets of traffickers and exploiters. Those new provisions will provide courts with powers on conviction of an offender for a trafficking or slavery-type offence to order the forfeiture of ships, vehicles or aircraft that have been used or were intended for use in connection with that offence. Equivalent powers are already available in connection with the existing human trafficking offences, and it is important that they should be available also in connection with the new human trafficking offence. New clause 5B and schedule 1 will also extend those powers in respect of slavery-type offences under new clause 1A. In that respect, as Lord Morrow highlighted, Northern Ireland law will go beyond the provisions set out in the Westminster Modern Slavery Bill, which will apply only to human trafficking offences. I am delighted that that is an example of where we are able to go further in the Assembly than is currently the case in the UK Parliament. Perhaps that may be something that some MPs or Members of the House of Lords in this House may wish to take up when they go to Westminster.

Lord Morrow and I are clear that victims should be at the heart of the Bill. Amendment Nos 23 and 61 will introduce new clause 5C and new schedule 2, which, together, will enhance the rights of victims by providing the courts with powers to order convicted perpetrators to pay reparation to their victims for any harm that they have suffered as a result of the offence. The model for those slavery and trafficking reparation orders under new clause 5C and schedule 2 is broadly equivalent to that which already exists in respect of compensation orders under the Criminal Justice (Northern Ireland) Order 1994. However, in addition, these new measures would require the court to consider making one of those reparation orders where it had the power to do so, and where it can but chooses not to make one, to set out its reasons. That additional requirement on the courts is intended to enhance awareness of this further means of redress for victims of these offences. Paragraphs 2 and 3 of new schedule 2 set out the effect of a reparation order, including enforcement arrangements in the case of a breach of the order, and also make supplementary provision, including in respect of variations and appeals.

Reference was made in the context of existing clause 7 to training matters, particularly by the Chair of the Committee. Whilst those particular provisions are now to be removed from the Bill, let me remind the House that, so far, more than 4,000 PSNI officers have had —

Mr Humphrey: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way. I appreciate that. Having recognised the right of the Assembly to set maximum sentences, why does the Minister shy away from setting minimum sentences and curtailing the power of judges?

Mr Ford: I thought that I had answered that point, although I am grateful to Mr Humphrey for giving me a chance to repeat it. I believe that it is the normal procedure that the legislature in nearly all criminal cases sets the maximum but not any minimum. The principle of judicial independence and judicial discretion then applies to consider how the case is handled on the facts of the individual case as presented to the judge. I believe that that is the appropriate way to continue, and that is the norm in most cases.

On the point that I was making about training, more than 4,000 PSNI officers have received training in the last couple of years. Operational guidance was issued by the PSNI in October 2013. There is policy and guidance for prosecutors. I have been at some awareness-raising events for staff from health and social care trusts as well as police officers, and a lot of work is being done by partners across health and social care and justice to ensure that guidance is available to staff — whether they be GPs or working in A&E — most likely to come across trafficking victims. I believe that provision for training is being adequately dealt with, and I am grateful for Lord Morrow's acknowledgement that clause 7(1) is no longer required.

Amendment No 27 standing in my name aims to introduce new clause 5G, which is intended to replace the remaining parts of clause 7 and make explicit the legal principle that investigations into and prosecutions on human trafficking and slavery-type offences are not dependent on victims reporting the offence or accusing a person of committing one of those offences. It also clarifies that criminal proceedings for one of those offences may commence or continue, even in cases in which the victim has made a statement about the offence and subsequently withdrawn it. If amendment No 27 is accepted, it would mean that clause 7 in its entirety need not stand part of the Bill, as agreed by Lord Morrow and me.

Amendment No 40, which was tabled in the name of the Minister of Finance and Personnel, aims to introduce new clause 6B to provide for the criminalisation of forced marriage. It is designed to capture two different sorts of behaviour. It is clear that this issue sits easily in a human trafficking Bill, and I am pleased to take up the opportunity on behalf of the Minister of Finance to ensure that it is carried through at this stage. Clause 6B(1) would capture violent, threatening or coercive behaviour intended to cause another person to enter into a marriage. Clause 6B(5) would capture any form of deception used to trick a person into leaving the country with a view to forcing that person to marry. The person may, for example, have been told that they are going abroad to attend a family event and may leave voluntarily on that false premise.

The new clause would cover people who do not or cannot consent because they lack capacity and the relevant penalties are duly set out in clause 6B(7). This is based on the corresponding offences in England, Wales and Scotland, for which the Anti-social Behaviour, Crime and Policing Act 2014 provides. It is often said that parents who force their children to marry believe that they are acting in their child's best interests, building stronger families or preserving cultural or religious traditions. They may not see anything wrong in their actions and, often, they are otherwise loving and kind parents who have never given cause for concern in the treatment or care of their child. Such beliefs are, however, wholly misguided, and it is now rightly accepted that there can never be any justification for forcing a person to marry against his or her will. Indeed, freely given consent is a prerequisite of Christian, Jewish, Hindu, Muslim and Sikh marriages.

The initial act of overriding a person's free will is objectionable in and of itself, but there are wider consequences that may flow from that act and that may continue to have a detrimental impact. The victim may find himself or herself in another country with a completely different culture, unable to leave home unaccompanied, isolated by language barriers and alone and deprived of the love and support of wider family members that we all value so much. He or she may have been removed from school or prevented from going on to further education, denied the opportunity to reach his or her full potential and to live a happy and productive life. It is not just the victim who is damaged; children who are born into these marriages may witness violence or abuse or may even be the subject of violence and abuse themselves.

We already have civil protection orders, which can be called in aid when a person is at risk of being forced into marriage or has already been forced into marriage. Those civil orders are underpinned by statutory guidance for key personnel. However, we must use every tool at our disposal and ensure that every possible protection is put in place. The criminalisation of forced marriage will offer additional protections, but, more importantly, it will send a clear message about what is and is not acceptable in the 21st century. If we are to eradicate forced marriage, we must adopt a zero-tolerance approach, and the new criminal offences in respect of forced marriage will allow us to do just that. I therefore commend amendment No 40 to the House.

Finally, you will be pleased to hear, amendment No 50, tabled jointly by Lord Morrow and me, is technical in nature —

Mr Frew: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Ford: Yes.

Mr Frew: I apologise about asking the Minister to go back, but will he give the House a better understanding of the fundamental point about setting a minimum sentence? Is it OK to set a maximum sentence and curtail the judiciary in that aspect but then not set a minimum sentence? What is the difference between maximum and minimum? How does one curtail judges if the other does not?

Mr Ford: I thought that we had got past that point, but I am grateful for yet another opportunity to talk to it. The simple reality is that legislation in any part of the United Kingdom will always assume that there is a maximum penalty for any given criminal offence, but not always a minimum. In fact, very rarely will there be a minimum. It is not, as said by a number of Members from the DUP Benches, that the legislature cannot do that, and the Attorney General has advised that that may be the case. Rather, it is saying that it is not normal. Once you put in a requirement for a mandatory minimum sentence and then write "exceptional circumstances", it starts to cloud the issue in an unhelpful way, particularly when we have Judge Burgess's defining judgement in the first trafficking case to be tried in Northern Ireland, which made it clear what the range of options will be on the basis of a judgement from the court. So I do not believe that it is necessary or appropriate to go there.

4.45 pm

Finally, and you will be pleased to hear me say that, Mr Deputy Speaker, amendment No 50, which was tabled jointly by Lord Morrow and me, is technical in nature and is needed to ensure that the measures provided for under clause 13 in respect of the protection of victims of police investigations will also apply to victims of the new offences specified under new clauses 1A and 1B.

That summarises the position of the Department of Justice. It is noteworthy that of the amendments tabled in this group — almost half of the Bill is covered by it — 27 have been agreed by Lord Morrow and me. Lord Morrow tabled one amendment that I do not agree with, there are four cases in which we agree that a particular clause should not stand part and one case in which I seek to remove a clause that Lord Morrow does not agree with. That is a measure of the positive and constructive engagement that was undertaken. It may not appeal to every Member — I think of a Member at my right shoulder — but it appeals to the great majority of us. I commend those amendments to the House.

Lord Morrow: It has been a fairly long and very interesting debate. I had thought that, at this stage of the day, we would have been nearly past group three. It bodes well for the evening — perhaps we should prepare ourselves for a long evening and night. It might be the night of the long knives. I do not know, but we will see how it goes from here on in.

I commend and thank all those who have spoken in the debate. It has been largely good tempered. One or two Members got excited and started to jump around and wave their papers all over the place. We always have such exceptions with us, for the present anyway — we will see what the future holds for those people.

I acknowledge everything that has been said. It seems a long time ago, although it was just before lunchtime, that my colleague the Chair of the Justice Committee elevated me marginally too highly, I think, when he likened me to the great abolitionist William Wilberforce. I am no latter-day William Wilberforce. I want to make that very clear, and I hope that you are listening, Mr McCrea. I do not accept that for a single second.

Quite recently, I was reminded of something about Wilberforce by an individual who had looked up how long he had fought slavery and found that it took him 40 years. I have been going at this Bill for less than three years, so maybe I have another 37 years to go. I do not know, but I know that Basil McCrea is saying, "There is not 37 years in that fellow over there." Just be careful before you make any pronouncements, Mr McCrea.

I thank Mr Givan for his very lavish praise, and I appreciate what he said. There has been general consensus, right around the House, that the Bill is basically good. There is one exception, and we will deal with that in a moment or two. Most have acknowledged that, while they may not agree with every aspect and part of the Bill covered by the group 1 amendments, it is a necessary Bill and something that should be done.

Only one person to date has said that it is not fit for purpose, but there is always one, is there not?

I was going to comment on what each individual said, but, since many individuals have said the same or similar things, that may not be necessary. However, I want to make it clear that I appreciate everything that has been said, even by those who, at times, have not been totally supportive of what I am trying to do through this Bill and, in particular, in relation to some of the clauses, whether they be single clauses or amendments.

It is obvious that one issue has been contentious, and it rotates around clause 4. I say, quite frankly, to those who oppose clause 4 that their opposition is not sustainable. When they were asked about maximum and minimum sentences, we had some answers that, in my books, were not very convincing. This Bill is trying to set out in clear and stark terms that the Assembly believes that human trafficking is a great social evil and a heinous crime. Even Mr McCrea, who has no regard for my Bill at all, at least admitted that human trafficking was something that we should be opposed to, and then he went off the rails completely and was not prepared to acknowledge anything else.

Mr B McCrea: Will the Member give way?

Lord Morrow: Not at the moment. I think that I have had enough, just for the minute. There is only so much that one can take in a day.

I believe that this modest proposal is a very appropriate and effective way of making it absolutely clear that we want to make Northern Ireland a cold house, or a cold place, for human trafficking and traffickers. It is designed to further concentrate the minds of would-be traffickers, increasing the incentive for them to think again and thereby reduce the chances for and levels of trafficking in Northern Ireland. I would also like to come back to the intervention that I received during my speech, just to clarify that, when clause 4 reaches the statute book, supplementary guidance for the courts will be produced as a matter of course. I very much hope that Members will support all the amendments in the group, with the exception of that tabled by the Minister, which argues that clause 4 should not stand part of the Bill.

Mrs Foster: I thank the Member for giving way. I have not been in the Chamber for the whole debate, but I have been following it as best I can on the television upstairs. What we want to do is send a very strong message on human trafficking. One of the ways that we do that is by setting a minimum sentence. It has been done before. It has been pointed out, and I accept, that it is not a regular occurrence. However, in relation to drink-driving, society felt that it wanted to send a very strong message, and therefore a minimum sentence was set in relation to that issue. I think that this is another issue on which society expects us to send a very strong message to the judiciary and, indeed, to society as a whole.

I have listened to what people have had to say about fettering the discretion of judges, but judges act within the laws that are set down by the Assembly and Parliament, so we are actually sending a very strong message to the judiciary in relation to that type of action. Therefore, I think, it is wholly and rightly within our limits to do such a thing. Therefore, I support you, Lord Morrow, in setting a minimum sentence for human trafficking, and I hope that the whole House supports what you have laid down.

Lord Morrow: I thank my colleague very much for those valuable and timely points. I too urge the House to take cognisance of what she has said. They are compatible with what I am trying to achieve through this private Members' Bill.

I do not wish to detain the House because, as I said, we have a fairly long evening ahead of us, but Mr Basil McCrea in particular was very disparaging. He said:

"The Bill was not fit for purpose".

He also said that the Department had helped me save face by giving me some concessions. I have had long discussions with the departmental officials on this Bill, and I do not believe that any of them, if they were able to stand in the middle of this Floor or stand where I am standing, would agree with that. Mr McCrea says my Bill is no different from the Modern Slavery Bill. He clearly has not read my Bill and compared it with the Modern Slavery Bill. If he had, he would have seen that my Bill goes much further. It always did in many areas, including — and I want him to listen — on the provision of child trafficking guardians and statutory provision for victims of trafficking.

Mr McCrea would do well to read both Bills: he should get the Modern Slavery Bill and my Bill, set them beside each other and see how much further my Bill goes. My Bill is tailored for Northern Ireland. It is not a perfect Bill. My colleague Tom Buchanan made it quite clear that, when I came to the House first, when I went to the Committee and wherever I went with my Bill, I made it clear that it was not the finished article. My Bill was never put forward as the perfect article. I have said that from day one. As a result of what the Committee has done, of what others have said to me and of what the Department has done and said, I have tabled amendments. Many of those amendments have been agreed with the Minister. Every Member can see quite clearly that they have been signed off by both of us.

Mr McCrea, I think you are out of school, I think you are not fit for purpose in the debate today and whether —

Mr B McCrea: Will the Member give way?

Lord Morrow: No, not now.

Mr B McCrea: So, you will not engage in debate.

Lord Morrow: No. You had your opportunity, and you will get another one a little later, I suspect. You obviously have not read this Bill to any great extent. You set your face against this piece of legislation from day one, and today you came in and denigrated it and said that it should not be going any further.

You said that we are fettering judges. My colleague Arlene Foster has made it quite clear that we do that on occasion. However, this is done in such a way that judges can derogate. Therefore, it is not right to say that we have said, "There will be a two-year minimum sentence. That's it. Full stop." We have not said that: we have allowed for a derogation.

I want to test the opinion of the House on this one. It is absolutely vital to retain clause 4 in the Bill.

Mr Frew: I thank the Member for giving way. I have listened to what he has said, and I know how much work he has put into the Bill and how much work the Justice Committee has put into scrutinising it. Does it not provide reassurance to the House that the Member who is bringing the Bill forward has listened to the Members of the House?

Lord Morrow: I thank my colleague Mr Frew for his comments.

To those who still have reservations about clause 4 remaining part of the Bill, I ask them to think very carefully. This is an attempt to highlight in a very explicit and determined way that we in Northern Ireland take human trafficking very, very seriously and that those who are engaged in it will be dealt with by the full rigours of the law and that they can, and possibly will, be subject to a two-year minimum sentence.

Mr Humphrey: I am grateful to the Member for giving way. In the final part of his contribution, Mr McCrea talked about the police and the Public Prosecution Service. Does the Member agree that the now Assistant Chief Constable, Mr Drew Harris, clarified the position of the Police Service of Northern Ireland on this Bill to the Committee when he appeared in front of it a number of months ago?

5.00 pm

Lord Morrow: I thank my colleague Mr Humphrey for making that salient and important point. Mr McCrea said that the PSNI were opposed to this legislation. Let me be very clear: that is not the position of the PSNI. I believe that it is an abuse of a Member's position to come in here and misrepresent the PSNI or, indeed, anyone else. That is not their position. If Mr McCrea wants to get up, he should get up now and withdraw that remark, knowing perfectly well that that is not the position of the police. They have not said that.

As a matter of fact, as my colleague said, ACC Harris has made it quite clear that that is not their position. I ask the Member to take cognisance of that.

I will leave the matter here and I would like to test the opinion of the House on these amendments.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): Members, before I put the Question, I remind everyone that we have debated opposition to clause 1 but the Question will be put in the positive manner as usual.

Question put and negatived.

Clause 1 disagreed to.

New Clause

Amendment No 1 made: After clause 1 insert

"Slavery, servitude and forced or compulsory labour"

1A.—(1) A person ("A") commits an offence if—

(a) A holds another person ("B") in slavery or servitude and the circumstances are such that A knows or ought to know that B is held in slavery or servitude, or

(b) A requires B to perform forced or compulsory labour and the circumstances are such that A knows or ought to know that B is being required to perform forced or compulsory labour.

(2) In subsection (1) the references to holding B in slavery or servitude or requiring B to perform forced or compulsory labour are to be construed in accordance with Article 4 of the Human Rights Convention.

(3) In determining whether B is being held in slavery or servitude or required to perform forced or compulsory labour regard may be had to all the circumstances.

(4) In particular, regard may be had to any of B's personal circumstances which may make B more vulnerable than other persons such as, for example—

(a) that B is a child or a vulnerable adult; or

(b) that A is a member of B's family.

(5) The consent of B to any act which forms part of an offence under this section is irrelevant.

(6) A person guilty of an offence under this section is liable on conviction on indictment to imprisonment for life.— [Lord Morrow.]

New clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

New Clause

Amendment No 2 made: After clause 1 insert

"Human trafficking"

1B.—(1) A person ("A") commits an offence if A arranges or facilitates the travel of another person ("B") with a view to B being exploited.

(2) A may in particular arrange or facilitate B's travel by recruiting B, transporting or transferring B, harbouring or receiving B, or transferring or exchanging control over B.

(3) A arranges or facilitates B's travel with a view to B being exploited only if—

(a) A intends to exploit B (in any part of the world) during or after the travel, or

(b) A knows or ought to know that another person is likely to exploit B (in any part of the world) during or after the travel.

- (4) "Travel" means—
- (a) arriving in, or entering, any country,
  - (b) departing from any country,
  - (c) travelling within any country.
- (5) The consent of B to any act which forms part of an offence under this section is irrelevant.
- (6) A person to whom this subsection applies commits an offence under this section regardless of—
- (a) where the arranging or facilitating takes place, or
  - (b) where the travel takes place.
- (7) Any other person commits an offence under this section if—
- (a) any part of the arranging or facilitating takes place in the United Kingdom, or
  - (b) the travel consists of arrival in or entry into, departure from, or travel within the United Kingdom.
- (8) Subsection (6) applies to—
- (a) a UK national;
  - (b) a person who at the time of the offence was habitually resident in Northern Ireland; and
  - (c) a body incorporated under the law of a part of the United Kingdom.
- (9) A person guilty of an offence under this section is liable on conviction on indictment to imprisonment for life.— [Lord Morrow.]

New clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

New Clause

Amendment No 3 made: After clause 1 insert

"Meaning of exploitation for purposes of section 1B

1C.—(1) For the purposes of section 1B, a person is exploited only if one or more of the following subsections apply in relation to the person.

Slavery, servitude and forced or compulsory labour

- (2) The person is the victim of behaviour—
- (a) which involves the commission of an offence under section 1A, or
  - (b) which would involve the commission of an offence under that section if it took place in Northern Ireland.

Sexual exploitation

- (3) Something is done to or in respect of the person—
- (a) which involves the commission of an offence under—
    - (i) Article 3(1)(a) of the Protection of Children (Northern Ireland) Order 1978 (indecent photographs of children), or
    - (ii) any provision of the Sexual Offences (Northern Ireland) Order 2008 (sexual offences), or
  - (b) which would involve the commission of such an offence if it were done in Northern Ireland.

Removal of organs etc.

- (4) The person is encouraged, required or expected to do anything—

(a) which involves the commission, by him or her or another person, of an offence under section 32 or 33 of the Human Tissue Act 2004 (prohibition of commercial dealings in organs and restrictions on use of live donors) in Northern Ireland, or

(b) which would involve the commission of such an offence, by him or her or another person, if it were done in Northern Ireland.

Securing services etc. by force, threats or deception

(5) The person is subjected to force, threats, abduction, coercion, fraud or deception designed to induce him or her—

- (a) to provide services of any kind,
- (b) to provide another person with benefits of any kind, or
- (c) to enable another person to acquire benefits of any kind;

and for the purposes of this subsection "benefits" includes the proceeds of forced begging or of criminal activities.

Securing services etc. from children and vulnerable persons

(6) Another person uses or attempts to use the person for a purpose within paragraph (a), (b) or (c) of subsection (5), having chosen him or her for that purpose on the grounds that—

(a) he or she is a child or a vulnerable adult or is a member of the other person's family or the other person is in a position of trust in relation to him or her; and

(b) a person who was not within paragraph (a) would be likely to refuse to be used for that purpose.— [Lord Morrow.]

New clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

New Clause

Amendment No 4 made: After clause 1 insert

"Committing offence with intent to commit offence under section 1A or 1B

1D.—(1) A person commits an offence under this section if the person commits any offence with the intention of committing an offence under section 1A or 1B (including an offence committed by aiding, abetting, counselling or procuring an offence under that section).

(2) A person guilty of an offence under this section is (unless subsection (3) applies) liable—

- (a) on conviction on indictment, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 10 years;
- (b) on summary conviction, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 6 months or a fine not exceeding the statutory maximum or both.

(3) Where the offence under this section is committed by kidnapping or false imprisonment, a person guilty of that offence is liable, on conviction on indictment, to imprisonment for life.— [Lord Morrow.]

New clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 2 disagreed to.

New clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

New Clause

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): We now come to the second group of amendments for debate, which concerns amendment Nos 24 to 26 and 62, as well as opposition to clauses 7 and 15 standing part. The amendments deal with a duty on the Department to publish a strategy, new slavery and trafficking prevention orders and a duty on specified public bodies to notify the National Crime Agency when it is believed someone may be a victim of relevant offences. Members will note that amendment No 25 is mutually exclusive with clause 15 standing part. Amendment No 62 is mutually exclusive with clause 24 standing part.

Mr Ford: I beg to move amendment No 24: After clause 5 insert

“Prevention, enforcement, etc.

Slavery and trafficking prevention orders

5D.Schedule 3 (which makes provision for, and in connection with, slavery and trafficking prevention orders) has effect.”.*

The following amendments stood on the Marshalled List:

No 25: After clause 5 insert

“Strategy on offences under sections 1A and 1B

5E.—(1) The Department shall, at least once in every year, publish a strategy on offences under section 1A and 1B (“relevant offences”).

(2) In drawing up the strategy the Department must—

(a) consult with other relevant organisations; and

(b) have regard to views expressed by such organisations.

(3) The purpose of the strategy is to—

(a) raise awareness of relevant offences in Northern Ireland;

(b) contribute to a reduction in the number of such offences.

(4) The strategy shall in particular—

(a) set out arrangements for co-operation between relevant organisations in dealing with relevant offences or the victims of such offences;

(b) include provision as to the training and equipment of those involved in investigating or prosecuting relevant offences or dealing with the victims of such offences;

(c) include provisions aimed at raising awareness of the rights and entitlements of victims of such offences.

(5) In this section “relevant organisation” means any body, agency or other organisation with functions or activities relating to relevant offences or the victims of such offences.”.— [Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice).]

No 26: After clause 5 insert

“Duty to notify National Crime Agency about suspected victims of offences under section 1A or 1B

5F.—(1) A specified public authority must notify the National Crime Agency if it has reason to believe that a person may be a victim of an offence under section 1A or 1B.

(2) The Department—

(a) must issue guidance to specified public authorities about the sorts of things which indicate that a person may be a victim of an offence under section 1A or 1B;

(b) may from time to time revise the guidance; and

(c) must arrange for any guidance issued or revised to be published in a way the Department considers appropriate.

(3) The Department may by regulations make provision about the information to be included in a notification under subsection (1).

(4) The regulations must provide that a notification relating to a person aged 18 or over may not include information that—

(a) identifies the person, or

(b) enables the person to be identified (either by itself or in combination with other information), unless the person consents to the inclusion of the information.

(5) The regulations may not require information to be included if its inclusion would result in a disclosure which contravenes the Data Protection Act 1998.

(6) In this section "specified public authority" means a public authority specified in regulations made by the Department."— [Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice).]

No 62: After clause 19 insert

"SCHEDULE 3

SLAVERY AND TRAFFICKING PREVENTION ORDERS

PART 1

MAKING AND EFFECT OF SLAVERY AND TRAFFICKING PREVENTION ORDERS

SLAVERY AND TRAFFICKING PREVENTION ORDERS ON DEALING WITH DEFENDANT

1.—(1) A court may make a slavery and trafficking prevention order against a person aged 18 or over ("the defendant") where it deals with the defendant in respect of—

- (a) a conviction for a slavery or human trafficking offence,*
- (b) a finding that the defendant is not guilty of a slavery or human trafficking offence by reason of insanity, or*
- (c) a finding that the defendant is unfit to plead and has done the act charged against the defendant in respect of a slavery or human trafficking offence.*

(2) The court may make the order only if it is satisfied that—

- (a) there is a risk that the defendant may commit a slavery or human trafficking offence; and*
- (b) it is necessary to make the order for the purpose of protecting persons generally, or particular persons, from the physical or psychological harm which would be likely to occur if the defendant committed such an offence.*

(3) For the purposes of sub-paragraph (1), convictions and findings include those taking place before this Schedule comes into operation.

(4) In this Schedule a "slavery or human trafficking offence" means any of the following offences—

- (a) an offence under section 145 of the Nationality, Immigration and Asylum Act 2002 (trafficking for prostitution);*
- (b) an offence under section 57, 58, 58A, 59 or 59A of the Sexual Offences Act 2003 (trafficking for sexual exploitation);*
- (c) an offence under section 62 of that Act (committing offence with intent to commit relevant sexual offence), where the relevant sexual offence the person in question intended to commit was an offence under section 57, 58, 58A, 59 or 59A of that Act;*
- (d) an offence under section 22 of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 2003 (trafficking for prostitution);*

(e) an offence under section 4 of the Asylum and Immigration (Treatment of Claimants, etc.) Act 2004 (trafficking for exploitation);

(f) an offence under section 71 of the Coroners and Justice Act 2009 (slavery, servitude and forced or compulsory labour);

(g) an offence under section 47 of the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Act 2010 (slavery, servitude and forced or compulsory labour);

(h) an offence under section 1A, 1B or 1D of this Act;

(i) an offence of attempting or conspiring to commit an offence listed above;

(j) an offence committed by aiding, abetting, counselling, procuring or inciting the commission of an offence so listed;

(k) an offence under Part 2 of the Serious Crime Act 2007 (encouraging or assisting) where the offence (or one of the offences) which the person in question intends or believes would be committed is an offence so listed.

(5) The Department may by order amend sub-paragraph (4).

SLAVERY AND TRAFFICKING PREVENTION ORDERS ON APPLICATION

2.—(1) A court of summary jurisdiction may make a slavery and trafficking prevention order against a person aged 18 or over ("the defendant") on an application by the Chief Constable.

(2) The court may make the order only if it is satisfied that—

- (a) the defendant is a relevant offender (see paragraph 3), and*
- (b) since the defendant first became a relevant offender, the defendant has acted in a way which means that the condition in sub-paragraph (3) is met.*

(3) The condition is that—

- (a) there is a risk that the defendant may commit a slavery or human trafficking offence; and*
- (b) it is necessary to make the order for the purpose of protecting persons generally, or particular persons, from the physical or psychological harm which would be likely to occur if the defendant committed such an offence.*

(4) The Chief Constable may make an application under this paragraph only in respect of a person—

- (a) who lives in Northern Ireland, or*
- (b) who the Chief Constable believes is in, or is intending to come to, Northern Ireland.*

(5) An application under this paragraph is to be made by complaint.

(6) The acts of the defendant which may be relied on for the purposes of sub-paragraph (2)(b) include acts taking place before this Schedule comes into operation.

(7) The Department may by order provide that an application under this paragraph may be made by a person or body specified in the order (as well as by the Chief Constable); and such an order may make such consequential amendments to this Schedule as the Department thinks necessary or expedient.

MEANING OF "RELEVANT OFFENDER"

3.—(1) A person is a "relevant offender" for the purposes of paragraph 2 if sub-paragraph (2) or (3) applies to the person.

(2) This sub-paragraph applies to a person if—

(a) the person has been convicted of a slavery or human trafficking offence,

(b) a court has made a finding that the person is not guilty of a slavery or human trafficking offence by reason of insanity,

(c) a court has made a finding that the person is unfit to be tried and has done the act charged against the person in respect of a slavery or human trafficking offence, or

(d) the person has been cautioned in respect of a slavery or human trafficking offence.

(3) This sub-paragraph applies to a person if, under the law of a country outside the United Kingdom—

(a) the person has been convicted of an equivalent offence (whether or not the person has been punished for it),

(b) a court has made, in relation to an equivalent offence, a finding equivalent to a finding that the person is not guilty by reason of insanity,

(c) a court has made, in relation to an equivalent offence, a finding equivalent to a finding that the person is unfit to be tried and has done the act charged against the person, or

(d) the person has been cautioned in respect of an equivalent offence.

(4) An "equivalent offence" means an act which—

(a) constituted an offence under the law of the country concerned, and

(b) would have constituted a slavery or human trafficking offence under the law of Northern Ireland if it had been done in Northern Ireland, or by a UK national, or as regards the United Kingdom.

(5) For the purposes of sub-paragraph (4) an act punishable under the law of a country outside the United Kingdom constitutes an offence under that law, however it is described in that law.

(6) On an application under paragraph 2 where sub-paragraph (3) is alleged to apply to the defendant, the condition in sub-paragraph (4)(b) is to be taken as met unless—

(a) not later than provided by magistrates' court rules, the defendant serves on the Chief Constable a notice which states that in the defendant's opinion the condition is not met, shows the grounds for that opinion, and requires the Chief Constable to prove that the condition is met, or

(b) the court permits the defendant to require the Chief Constable to prove that the condition is met without service of such a notice.

(7) References in this paragraph to convictions, findings and cautions include those taking place before this paragraph comes into operation.

EFFECT OF SLAVERY AND TRAFFICKING PREVENTION ORDERS

4.—(1) A slavery and trafficking prevention order is an order prohibiting the defendant from doing anything described in the order or requiring the defendant to do anything described in the order (or both).

(2) The only prohibitions or requirements that may be included in the order are those which the court is satisfied are necessary for the purpose of protecting persons generally, or particular persons, from the physical or psychological harm which would be likely to occur if the defendant committed a slavery or human trafficking offence.

(3) Subject to paragraph 5(1), a prohibition or requirement contained in a slavery and trafficking prevention order has effect—

(a) for a fixed period, specified in the order, of at least 5 years, or

(b) until further order.

(4) A slavery and trafficking prevention order—

(a) may specify that some of its prohibitions or requirements have effect until further order and some for a fixed period;

(b) may specify different periods for different prohibitions or requirements.

(5) If a court makes a slavery and trafficking prevention order in relation to a person who is already subject to such an order (whether made by that court or another), the earlier order ceases to have effect.

PROHIBITIONS ON FOREIGN TRAVEL

5.—(1) A prohibition on foreign travel contained in a slavery and trafficking prevention order must be for a fixed period of not more than 5 years.

(2) A "prohibition on foreign travel" means—

(a) a prohibition on travelling to any country outside the United Kingdom named or described in the order,

(b) a prohibition on travelling to any country outside the United Kingdom other than a country named or described in the order, or

(c) a prohibition on travelling to any country outside the United Kingdom.

(3) Sub-paragraph (1) does not prevent a prohibition on foreign travel from being extended for a further period (of no more than 5 years each time) under paragraph 6.

(4) A slavery and trafficking prevention order that contains a prohibition within sub-paragraph (2)(c) must require the defendant to surrender all of the defendant's passports at a police station specified in the order—

(a) on or before the date when the prohibition takes effect, or

(b) within a period specified in the order.

(5) Any passports surrendered must be returned as soon as reasonably practicable after the person ceases to be subject to a slavery and trafficking prevention order containing a prohibition within sub-paragraph (2)(c).

(6) Sub-paragraph (5) does not apply in relation to—

(a) a passport issued by or on behalf of the authorities of a country outside the United Kingdom if the passport has been returned to those authorities;

(b) a passport issued by or on behalf of an international organisation if the passport has been returned to that organisation.

VARIATION, RENEWAL AND DISCHARGE

6.—(1) A person within sub-paragraph (2) may apply to the appropriate court for an order varying, renewing or discharging a slavery and trafficking prevention order.

(2) The persons are—

(a) the defendant;

(b) the Chief Constable.

(3) On the application the court, after hearing—

(a) the person making the application, and

(b) the other person mentioned in sub-paragraph (2) (if that person wishes to be heard), may make any order varying, renewing or discharging the slavery and trafficking prevention order that the court considers appropriate.

(4) An order may be renewed, or varied so as to impose additional prohibitions or requirements on the defendant, only if the court is satisfied that—

(a) there is a risk that the defendant may commit a slavery or human trafficking offence; and

(b) it is necessary to renew or vary the order for the purpose of protecting persons generally, or particular persons, from the physical or psychological harm which would be likely to occur if the defendant committed such an offence.

(5) Any renewed or varied order may contain only those prohibitions or requirements which the court is satisfied are necessary for that purpose.

(6) The court must not discharge an order before the end of 5 years beginning with the day on which the order was made, without the consent of the defendant and the Chief Constable.

(7) Sub-paragraph (6) does not apply to an order containing a prohibition on foreign travel and no other prohibitions.

(8) In this paragraph “the appropriate court” means—

(a) where the Crown Court or the Court of Appeal made the slavery and trafficking prevention order, the Crown Court;

(b) in any other case, a court of summary jurisdiction.

(9) An application under sub-paragraph (1) may be made—

(a) where the appropriate court is the Crown Court, in accordance with Crown Court rules;

(b) in any other case, by complaint.

INTERIM SLAVERY AND TRAFFICKING PREVENTION ORDERS

7.—(1) This paragraph applies where an application under paragraph 2 (“the main application”) has not been determined.

(2) An application for an “interim slavery and trafficking prevention order—

(a) may be made by the complaint by which the main application is made, or

(b) if the main application has been made, may be made by the person who has made that application, by complaint to the court to which that application has been made.

(3) The court may, if it considers it just to do so, make an interim slavery and trafficking prevention order.

(4) An interim slavery and trafficking prevention order is an order prohibiting the defendant from doing anything described in the order or requiring the defendant to do anything described in the order (or both).

(5) The order—

(a) has effect only for a fixed period, specified in the order;

(b) ceases to have effect, if it has not already done so, on the determination of the main application.

(6) The applicant or the defendant may by complaint apply to the court that made the interim slavery and trafficking prevention order for the order to be varied, renewed or discharged.

APPEALS

8.—(1) A defendant may appeal against the making of a slavery and trafficking prevention order—

(a) where the order was made under paragraph 1(1)

(a), as if the order were a sentence passed on the defendant for the offence;

(b) where the order was made under paragraph 1(1)

(b) or (c), as if the defendant had been convicted of the offence and the order were a sentence passed on the defendant for that offence;

(c) where the order was made on an application under paragraph 2, to the county court.

(2) A defendant may appeal to the county court against the making of an interim slavery and trafficking prevention order.

(3) A defendant may appeal against the making of an order under paragraph 6, or the refusal to make such an order—

(a) where the application for such an order was made to the Crown Court, to the Court of Appeal;

(b) in any other case, to the county court.

(4) On an appeal under sub-paragraph (1)(c), (2) or

(3)(b), the county court may make such orders as may be necessary to give effect to its determination of the appeal, and may also make such incidental or consequential orders as appear to it to be just.

(5) Any order made by the county court on an appeal under sub-paragraph (1)(c) or (2) is for the purposes of paragraph 6(8) or 7(6) (respectively) to be treated as if it were an order of the court from which the appeal was brought.

(6) Sub-paragraph (5) does not apply to an order directing that an application be reheard by a court of summary jurisdiction.

PART 2

NOTIFICATION REQUIREMENTS

OFFENDER SUBJECT TO NOTIFICATION REQUIREMENTS

9.—(1) References in the following provisions of this Schedule to an offender subject to notification requirements are references to an offender who is for the time being subject to a slavery and trafficking prevention order or an interim slavery and trafficking prevention order which is in effect under this Schedule.

(2) Sub-paragraph (1) has effect subject to paragraph 12(7) (which excludes from paragraph 12 an offender subject to an interim slavery and trafficking prevention order).

INITIAL NOTIFICATION

10.—(1) An offender subject to notification requirements must notify the required information to the police within the period of 3 days beginning with the date on which the slavery and trafficking prevention order or the interim slavery and trafficking prevention order comes into force in relation to the offender (“the relevant date”).

(2) The “required information” is the following information about the offender—

- (a) date of birth;
- (b) national insurance number;
- (c) name on the relevant date or, if the offender used two or more names on that date, each of those names;
- (d) home address on the relevant date;
- (e) name on the date on which the notification is given or, if the offender used two or more names on that date, each of those names;
- (f) home address on the date on which the notification is given;
- (g) the address of any other premises in the United Kingdom at which on that date the offender regularly resides or stays;
- (h) any information prescribed by regulations made by the Department.

(3) When determining the period of 3 days mentioned in sub-paragraph (1), there is to be disregarded any time when the offender is—

- (a) remanded in or committed to custody by an order of a court;
- (b) -serving a custodial sentence;
- (c) detained in a hospital; or
- (d) outside the United Kingdom.

(4) In this Part “home address” means in relation to the offender—

- (a) the address of the offender’s sole or main residence in the United Kingdom, or
- (b) if the offender has no such residence, the address or location of a place in the United Kingdom where the offender can regularly be found or, if there is more than one such place, such one of them as the offender selects.

NOTIFICATION OF CHANGES

11.—(1) An offender subject to notification requirements must, within the period of 3 days beginning with the date on which any notifiable event occurs, notify to the police—

- (a) the required new information, and
  - (b) the information mentioned in paragraph 10(2).
- (2) A “notifiable event” means—
- (a) the use by the offender of a name which has not been notified to the police under paragraph 10 or this paragraph;
  - (b) any change of the offender’s home address;
  - (c) the expiry of any qualifying period during which the offender has resided or stayed at any premises in the United Kingdom the address of which has not been notified to the police under paragraph 10 or this paragraph;
  - (d) any prescribed change of circumstances; or
  - (e) the release of the offender from custody pursuant to an order of a court or from a custodial sentence or detention in a hospital.

(3) The “required new information” is—

- (a) the name referred to in sub-paragraph (2)(a),
  - (b) the new home address (see sub-paragraph (2)(b)),
  - (c) the address of the premises referred to in sub-paragraph (2)(c),
  - (d) the prescribed details, or
  - (e) the fact that the offender has been released as mentioned in sub-paragraph (2)(e),
- as the case may be.*

(4) A notification under sub-paragraph (1) may be given before the notifiable event occurs, but in that case the offender must also specify the date when the event is expected to occur.

(5) If a notification is given in accordance with sub-paragraph (4) and the event to which it relates occurs more than 2 days before the date specified, the notification does not affect the duty imposed by sub-paragraph (1).

(6) If a notification is given in accordance with sub-paragraph (4) and the event to which it relates has not occurred by the end of the period of 3 days beginning with the date specified—

- (a) the notification does not affect the duty imposed by sub-paragraph (1), and
- (b) the offender must, within the period of 6 days beginning with the date specified, notify to the police the fact that the event did not occur within the period of 3 days beginning with the date specified.

(7) Paragraph 10(3) applies to the determination of—

- (a) any period of 3 days for the purposes of sub-paragraph (1), or
- (b) any period of 6 days for the purposes of sub-paragraph (6), as it applies to the determination of the period of 3 days mentioned in paragraph 10(1).

(8) In this paragraph—

(a) “prescribed change of circumstances” means any change—

(i) occurring in relation to any matter in respect of which information is required to be notified by virtue of paragraph 10(2)(h), and

(ii) of a description prescribed by regulations made by the Department;

(b) “the prescribed details”, in relation to a prescribed change of circumstances, means such details of the change as may be so prescribed.

(9) In this paragraph “qualifying period” means—

(a) a period of 7 days, or

(b) two or more periods, in any period of 12 months, which taken together amount to 7 days.

PERIODIC NOTIFICATION

12.—(1) An offender subject to notification requirements must, within the applicable period after each notification date, notify to the police the information mentioned in paragraph 10(2), unless the offender has already given a notification under paragraph 11(1) within that period.

(2) A “notification date” means, in relation to the offender, the date of any notification given by the offender under paragraph 10(1) or 11(1) or sub-paragraph (1).

(3) Where the applicable period would (apart from this paragraph) end while sub-paragraph (4) applies, that period is to be treated as continuing until the end of the period of 3 days beginning with the date on which sub-paragraph (4) first ceases to apply.

(4) This sub-paragraph applies if the offender is—

(a) remanded in or committed to custody by an order of a court,

(b) serving a custodial sentence,

(c) detained in a hospital, or

(d) outside the United Kingdom.

(5) In this paragraph “the applicable period” means—

(a) in any case where sub-paragraph (6) applies, such period as may be prescribed by regulations made by the Department, and

(b) in any other case, the period of one year.

(6) This sub-paragraph applies if the last home address notified by the offender under paragraph 10(1) or 11(1) or sub-paragraph (1) was the address or location of such a place as is mentioned in paragraph 10(4)(b).

(7) Nothing in this paragraph applies to an offender who is subject to an interim slavery and trafficking prevention order.

ABSENCE FROM NOTIFIED RESIDENCE

13.—(1) This paragraph applies to an offender subject to notification requirements at any time if the last home address notified by the offender under paragraph 10(1), 11(1) or 12(1) was an address in Northern Ireland such as is mentioned in paragraph 10(4)(a) (sole or main residence).

(2) If the offender intends to be absent from that home address for a period of more than 3 days (“the relevant period”), the offender must, not less than 12 hours before leaving that home address, notify to the police the information set out in sub-paragraph (3).

(3) The information is—

(a) the date on which the offender will leave that home address;

(b) such details as the offender holds about—

(i) the offender’s travel arrangements during the relevant period;

(ii) the offender’s accommodation arrangements during that period;

(iii) the offender’s date of return to that address.

(4) In this paragraph—

“travel arrangements” include, in particular, the means of transport to be used and the dates of travel, “accommodation arrangements” include, in particular, the address of any accommodation at which the relevant offender will spend the night during the relevant period and the nature of that accommodation.

(5) Where—

(a) an offender has given a notification under sub-paragraph (2), and

(b) at any time before that mentioned in that sub-paragraph, the information notified becomes inaccurate or incomplete, the offender must give a further notification under sub-paragraph (2).

(6) Where an offender—

(a) has notified a date of return to the offender’s home address, but

(b) returns to that home address on a date other than that notified, the offender must notify the date of the offender’s actual return to the police within 3 days of the actual return.

(7) Nothing in this paragraph requires an offender to notify any information which falls to be notified in accordance with a requirement imposed by regulations under paragraph 14.

(8) In calculating the relevant period for the purposes of this paragraph there is to be disregarded—

(a) any period or periods which the offender intends to spend at, or travelling directly to or from, an address of the kind mentioned in paragraph 10(2)(g) notified to the police under paragraph 10(1), 11(1) or 12(1);

(b) any period or periods which the offender intends to spend at, or travelling directly to or from, any premises, if his stay at those premises would give rise to a requirement to notify the address of those premises under paragraph 11(2)(c).

TRAVEL OUTSIDE THE UNITED KINGDOM

14.—(1) The Department may by regulations make provision with respect to offenders subject to notification requirements, or any description of such offenders—

- (a) requiring such persons, before they leave the United Kingdom, to give in accordance with the regulations a notification under sub-paragraph (2);
  - (b) requiring such persons, if they subsequently return to the United Kingdom, to give in accordance with the regulations a notification under sub-paragraph (3).
- (2) A notification under this paragraph must disclose—
- (a) the date on which the offender proposes to leave the United Kingdom;
  - (b) the country (or, if there is more than one, the first country) to which the offender proposes to travel and the proposed point of arrival (determined in accordance with the regulations) in that country;
  - (c) any other information prescribed by the regulations which the offender holds about the offender's departure from or return to the United Kingdom, or about the offender's movements while outside the United Kingdom.
- (3) A notification under this sub-paragraph must disclose any information prescribed by the regulations about the offender's return to the United Kingdom.

METHOD OF NOTIFICATION AND RELATED MATTERS

15.—(1) An offender gives a notification to the police under paragraph 10(1), 11(1), 12(1) or 13(2) or (6) by—

- (a) attending at any police station in Northern Ireland prescribed by regulations under section 87(1)(a) of the Sexual Offences Act 2003, and
  - (b) giving an oral notification to any police officer, or to any person authorised for the purpose by the officer in charge of the station.
- (2) Any notification given in accordance with this paragraph must be acknowledged; and the acknowledgement must be—
- (a) in writing, and
  - (b) in such form as the Department may direct.
- (3) Where a notification is given under paragraph 10(1), 11(1), 12(1) or 13(2) or (6), the offender must, if requested to do so by the police officer or other person mentioned in paragraph (1)(b), allow that officer or person to—

- (a) take the offender's fingerprints,
- (b) photograph any part of the offender, or
- (c) do both of those things, in order to verify the offender's identity.

(4) Fingerprints taken from a person under this paragraph (and any copies of those fingerprints) must be destroyed no later than the date on which the offender ceases to be subject to notification requirements.

(5) Photographs taken of any part of the offender under this paragraph (and any copies of such photographs) must be destroyed no later than the date on which the offender ceases to be subject to notification requirements.

(6) In this paragraph "photograph" includes any process by means of which an image may be produced.

PART 3

SUPPLEMENTARY

OFFENCES

16.—(1) A person who, without reasonable excuse, fails to comply with any prohibition or requirement contained in—

- (a) a slavery and trafficking prevention order, or
  - (b) an interim slavery and trafficking prevention order,
- commits an offence.

(2) A person who, without reasonable excuse, fails to comply with—

- (a) paragraph 10(1), 11(1) or (6)(b), 12(1), 13(2) or (6) or 15(3), or

(b) any requirement imposed by regulations made under paragraph 14(1), commits an offence.

(3) A person who notifies to the police, in purported compliance with—

- (a) paragraph 10(1), 11(1), 12(1) or 13(2) or (6), or

(b) any requirement imposed by regulations made under paragraph 14(1), any information which the person knows to be false, commits an offence.

(4) As regards an offence under sub-paragraph (2), so far as it relates to non-compliance with—

- (a) paragraph 10(1), 11(1), 12(1) or 13(2) or (6), or

(b) any requirement imposed by regulations made under paragraph 14(1), a person commits such an offence on the first day on which the person first fails, without reasonable excuse, to comply with the provision mentioned in paragraph (a) or (as the case may be) the requirement mentioned in paragraph (b), and continues to commit it throughout any period during which the failure continues.

(5) But a person must not be prosecuted under sub-paragraph (2) more than once in respect of the same failure.

(6) A person guilty of an offence under this paragraph is liable—

(a) on conviction on indictment, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 5 years;

(b) on summary conviction, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 6 months or a fine not exceeding the statutory maximum or both.

(7) Where a person is convicted of an offence under this paragraph, it is not open to the court by or before which the person is convicted to make an order for conditional discharge in respect of the offence.

CROSS-BORDER ENFORCEMENT WITHIN UK

17.—(1) The Department may by order amend paragraph 16(1) so as to add to or remove from the list of orders in that paragraph any relevant UK order.

(2) "Relevant UK order" means an order under the law of Scotland or England and Wales which appears to the Department to be equivalent or similar to—

- (a) a slavery and trafficking prevention order,
- (b) an interim slavery and trafficking prevention order.

SUPPLY OF INFORMATION TO RELEVANT NORTHERN IRELAND DEPARTMENTS, SECRETARY OF STATE, THE COMMISSIONERS, ETC.

18.—(1) This paragraph applies to information notified to the police under paragraph 10(1), 11(1) or 12(1).

(2) The Chief Constable may, for the purposes of the prevention, detection, investigation or prosecution of offences under this Schedule, supply information to which this paragraph applies to—

- (a) a relevant Northern Ireland department,
- (b) the Secretary of State,
- (c) the Commissioners,
- (d) a person providing services to a relevant Northern Ireland department, the Secretary of State or the Commissioners in connection with a relevant function, for use for the purpose of verifying the information.

(3) In relation to information supplied to any person under sub-paragraph (2), the reference to verifying the information is a reference to—

- (a) checking its accuracy by comparing it with information held—
  - (i) in the case of a relevant Northern Ireland department, the Secretary of State or the Commissioners by that department, the Secretary of State or the Commissioners in connection with the exercise of a relevant function, or
  - (ii) in the case of a person within sub-paragraph (2) (d), by that person in connection with the provision of services as mentioned there, and
- (b) compiling a report of that comparison.

(4) Subject to sub-paragraph (5), the supply of information under this paragraph is to be taken not to breach any restriction on the disclosure of information (however arising).

(5) This paragraph does not authorise the doing of anything that contravenes the Data Protection Act 1998.

(6) This paragraph does not affect any power to supply information that exists apart from this paragraph.

(7) In this paragraph—

"the Commissioners" means Her Majesty's Commissioners for Revenue and Customs;

"relevant Northern Ireland department" means the Department for Employment and Learning, the Department of the Environment, the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety or the Department for Social Development;

"relevant function" means—

- (a) in relation to the Department for Employment and Learning, a function relating to employment or training,

(b) in relation to the Department of the Environment, a function under Part 2 of the Road Traffic (Northern Ireland) Order 1981;

(c) in relation to the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety, a function relating to health or social care;

(d) in relation to the Department for Social Development, a function relating to social security or child support;

(e) in relation to the Secretary of State, a function relating to passports or the Gangmasters Licensing Authority;

(f) in relation to the Commissioners, any of their functions.

SUPPLY OF INFORMATION BY RELEVANT NORTHERN IRELAND DEPARTMENTS, SECRETARY OF STATE, THE COMMISSIONERS, ETC.

19.—(1) A report compiled under paragraph 18 may be supplied to the Chief Constable by—

- (a) the relevant Northern Ireland department,
- (b) the Secretary of State,
- (c) the Commissioners, or
- (d) a person within paragraph 18(2)(d).

(2) Such a report may contain any information held—

- (a) by the relevant Northern Ireland department, the Secretary of State or the Commissioners in connection with the exercise of a relevant function, or
- (b) by a person within paragraph 18(2)(d) in connection with the provision of services as mentioned there.

(3) Where such a report contains information within sub-paragraph (2), the Chief Constable—

- (a) may retain the information, whether or not used for the purposes of the prevention, detection, investigation or prosecution of offences under this Part, and
- (b) may use the information for any purpose related to the prevention, detection, investigation or prosecution of offences (whether or not under this Part), but for no other purpose.

(4) Sub-paragraphs (4) to (7) of paragraph 18 apply in relation to this paragraph as they apply in relation to paragraph 18.

INFORMATION ABOUT RELEASE OR TRANSFER OF OFFENDER

20.—(1) This paragraph applies to an offender subject to notification requirements who is—

- (a) serving a custodial sentence; or
- (b) detained in a hospital.

(2) The Department may by regulations make provision requiring the person who is responsible for such an offender to give notice to specified persons—

- (a) of the fact that that person has become responsible for the offender; and
- (b) of any occasion when—
  - (i) the offender is released, or

(ii) a different person is to become responsible for the offender.

(3) In sub-paragraph (2) "specified persons" means persons specified, or of a description specified, in the regulations.

(4) The regulations may make provision for determining who is to be taken for the purposes of this paragraph as being responsible for an offender.

POWER OF ENTRY AND SEARCH OF OFFENDER'S HOME ADDRESS

21.—(1) If, on an application made by a police officer of the rank of superintendent or above, a lay magistrate is satisfied that the requirements in sub-paragraph (2) are met in relation to any premises, the lay magistrate may issue a warrant authorising a constable—

(a) to enter the premises for the purpose of assessing the risks posed by the offender subject to notification requirements to whom the warrant relates; and

(b) to search the premises for that purpose.

(2) The requirements are—

(a) that the address of each set of premises specified in the application is an address falling within sub-paragraph (3);

(b) that the offender is not one to whom sub-paragraph (4) applies;

(c) that it is necessary for a constable to enter and search the premises for the purpose mentioned in sub-paragraph (1)(a); and

(d) that on at least two occasions a constable has sought entry to the premises in order to search them for that purpose and has been unable to obtain entry for that purpose.

(3) An address falls within this sub-paragraph if—

(a) it is the address which was last notified in accordance with this Schedule by the offender to the police as the offender's home address; or

(b) there are reasonable grounds to believe that the offender resides there or may regularly be found there.

(4) This sub-paragraph applies to an offender if the offender is—

(a) remanded in or committed to custody by order of a court;

(b) serving a custodial sentence;

(c) detained in a hospital; or

(d) outside the United Kingdom.

(5) A warrant issued under this paragraph must specify the one or more sets of premises to which it relates.

(6) The warrant may authorise the constable executing it to use reasonable force if necessary to enter and search the premises.

(7) The warrant may authorise entry to and search of premises on more than one occasion if, on the application, the lay magistrate is satisfied that it is necessary to authorise multiple entries in order to achieve the purpose mentioned in sub-paragraph (1) (a).

(8) Where a warrant issued under this paragraph authorises multiple entries, the number of entries authorised may be unlimited or limited to a maximum.

(9) In this paragraph a reference to the offender subject to notification requirements to whom the warrant relates is a reference to the offender—

(a) who has in accordance with this Schedule notified the police that the premises specified in the warrant are the offender's home address; or

(b) in respect of whom there are reasonable grounds to believe that the offender resides there or may regularly be found there.

GUIDANCE

22.—(1) The Department must issue guidance to the Chief Constable in relation to the exercise of the powers of the Chief Constable under this Schedule.

(2) The Department may, from time to time, revise the guidance issued under sub-paragraph (1).

(3) The Department must arrange for any guidance issued or revised under this paragraph to be published in a way the Department considers appropriate.

INTERPRETATION OF THIS SCHEDULE

23.—(1) In this Schedule—

"cautioned" means cautioned after the person concerned has admitted the offence;

"custodial sentence" means—

(a) a sentence of imprisonment,

(b) a sentence of detention in a young offenders centre;

(c) a sentence of detention under Article 13(4)(b) or 14(5) of the Criminal Justice (Northern Ireland) Order 2008;

(d) a sentence of detention under Article 45 of the Criminal Justice (Children) (Northern Ireland) Order 1998;

(e) an order under Article 39A of that Order sending the offender to a juvenile justice centre;

(f) any other sentence under which a person is detained in custody;

"detained in a hospital" means detained in a hospital under Part 3 of the Mental Health (Northern Ireland) Order 1986;

"home address" has the meaning given by paragraph 10(4);

"interim slavery and trafficking prevention order" means an order under paragraph 7;

"slavery and trafficking prevention order" means an order under paragraph 1 or 2;

"slavery or human trafficking offence" has the meaning given by paragraph 1(4).

(2) In this Schedule "passport" means—

(a) United Kingdom passport within the meaning of the Immigration Act 1971;

(b) a passport issued by or on behalf of the authorities of a country outside the United Kingdom, or by or on behalf of an international organisation;

- (c) a document that can be used (in some or all circumstances) instead of a passport.
- (3) In this Schedule a reference to a conviction includes a conviction for an offence in respect of which an order for conditional discharge is made, despite—
- (a) Article 6(1) of the Criminal Justice (Northern Ireland) Order 1996 (conviction with conditional discharge deemed not to be a conviction), or
- (b) section 14(1) of the Powers of Criminal Courts (Sentencing) Act 2000 (equivalent provision for England and Wales).
- (4) Sub-paragraph (3) applies only to convictions after this Schedule comes into operation.
- (5) In this Schedule a reference to a conviction includes a finding of a court in summary proceedings that the accused did the act charged, where the court makes an order under—
- (a) Article 44(4) of the Mental Health (Northern Ireland) Order 1986;
- (b) section 37(3) of the Mental Health Act 1983, or
- (c) section 58(3) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995, (hospital and guardianship orders).
- (6) In relation to an offence under the law of Scotland, a reference in this Schedule to a person being found not guilty by reason of insanity is to be treated as a reference to a person being acquitted by reason of the special defence in section 51A of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995.
- (7) References in this Schedule to an offender subject to notification requirements are to be read in accordance with paragraph 9.
- (8) In this Schedule, a reference to a finding that a person is unfit to be tried and has done the act charged against the person in respect of an offence includes a finding that a person is under a disability or insane and has done the act charged against the person in respect of an offence.
- (9) A person's age is to be treated for the purposes of this Schedule as being that which it appears to the court to be after considering any available evidence."— [Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice).]

Mr Ford: No doubt, the House will decide that it is teatime at this point. This group of amendments includes a range of provisions, which, together, will, I believe, reinforce the work of Government, law enforcement and civic society in tackling human trafficking and slavery, and in driving it from our shores. Some of these provisions broadly mirror equivalent measures in the Westminster Modern Slavery Bill. Others build on measures already included in this Bill. All of them have the support of the Bill's sponsor, Lord Morrow, the Justice Committee and the Executive.

They are intended to bolster our prevention and enforcement capabilities, to ensure that there is an informed and strategic coordinated response to these offences and to protect the public, or specific individuals, from the harm that such organised criminals wreak, by restricting the behaviours of convicted traffickers and exploiters, where that is necessary.

Amendment Nos 24 and 62 introduce new clause 5D and schedule 3, which create new powers for courts in Northern Ireland to impose slavery and trafficking prevention orders (STPO) where a person has been convicted of a human trafficking or slavery-type offence. These new civil orders are intended to protect the public or specific individuals from harm associated with human trafficking and slavery, servitude and forced or compulsory labour. These orders are preventative in nature. That is, they are intended to stop a person or persons becoming subject to a trafficking or slavery offence by restricting the harmful behaviours of convicted perpetrators.

Since STPOs would be imposed essentially as a diversionary measure to prevent an offence from occurring, it is important that they are proportionate. That is why an STPO under new clause 5D and schedule 3 could be imposed only in cases where the court is satisfied that there is a risk that the offender may commit a human trafficking or slavery-type offence and that the STPO, and the prohibitions and requirements in it, are necessary to protect individuals or the public from the physical or psychological harm that would be likely to occur if the offence were committed.

The nature of the prohibitions or requirements contained in one of these orders would be entirely a matter for the court on a case-by-case basis, depending on the nature of the risk presented. By way of some possible examples, however, they could impose restrictions on an individual to prohibit them from operating as a gangmaster, from working with children or from travelling outside Northern Ireland. Given the potential level of harm associated with these offences, I am satisfied that the STPOs are proportionate and appropriate.

The detailed provisions, including the effect of a slavery and trafficking prevention order, are set out in schedule 3 along with provisions for variation, renewal and discharge of orders and for appeals. Orders could be imposed by courts either on sentencing or following an application by the PSNI where an individual has been convicted of a relevant slavery or human trafficking offence; where they have been found not guilty by reason of insanity; where they have done the act but have been found unfit for trial; or where they have been cautioned in relation to a human trafficking or slavery-type offence. Breach of one of those civil orders would be a criminal offence attracting a sentence of up to five years on indictment or six months and/or a fine on summary conviction.

Work is under way in the other UK jurisdictions to introduce similar orders, although the regime in Northern Ireland will differ slightly from those in the other jurisdictions. For example, I do not believe that it is appropriate to extend STPOs to children and so the orders under new clause 5D and schedule 3 will apply only to adults. In addition, having considered concerns that were raised in response to my public consultation, I do not intend to introduce slavery and trafficking risk orders, which would apply to individuals even where they had not previously been convicted of or cautioned in respect of a human trafficking or slavery-type response.

Nevertheless, I wish to ensure that STPOs are enforceable across each UK jurisdiction. That is, where an order is made in Scotland or in England and Wales but is breached in Northern Ireland, it can be enforced by courts in this jurisdiction, and vice versa. In practical terms, to do this, the relevant authorities need to know that an STPO is in place, and that is why I have included provision in respect of the notification requirements that would be attached to an STPO. These cover the information to be provided by the offender to the police in respect of their personal details, addresses, national insurance number and any travel plans, either within or outside the United Kingdom.

Our ultimate goal is that, through this Bill and other actions that my Department and its partners are engaged in, we may make Northern Ireland free from trafficking and slavery. To achieve this, we need to have a clear strategic vision and direction in place and we need to ensure that there is a consistent, joined-up approach across government, the law enforcement agencies and civic society. So, amendment No 25 introduces new clause 5E, which will build upon the existing annual human trafficking and exploitation action plans that my Department has produced over recent years. It will place a statutory duty on my Department to publish an annual strategy aimed at raising awareness of and, ultimately, reducing human trafficking and slavery, servitude and forced or compulsory labour in Northern Ireland.

In recognition of the importance of a joined-up response, new clause 5E places a requirement on my Department to consult other relevant organisations and to have regard to their views in drawing up the strategy. This approach reflects the productive partnership that my Department has had with statutory and non-statutory organisations through the organised crime task force and NGO engagement group respectively.

Placing this strategy on a statutory footing is a strong signal of my continuing commitment to working in partnership with other key stakeholders towards the eradication of human trafficking, slavery, servitude and forced or compulsory labour. New Clause 5E is intended to replace clause 15 of the Bill, and, as such, Lord Morrow and I agree that clause 15 should no longer stand part.

We have already debated the introduction of new clause 5G under amendment No 27, which relates to the investigation and prosecution of slavery and trafficking offences.

5.45 pm

New clause 5G is intended, as I said earlier, to replace subsections 2 and 3 of clause 7. I have also previously expressed concerns about the effect of subsection 1 of clause 7, which would place a requirement on my Department in respect of training which it could not fulfil, because the responsibilities rest across a wide range of bodies, including other Departments and statutory agencies. I highlighted earlier the work that was being done in respect of training. Lord Morrow and I have instead agreed that these matters should be covered by the statutory strategy required under new clause 5E. As such, we are agreed that clause 7 should no longer stand part.

Amendment No 26 introduces new clause 5F. It is intended to improve our understanding of, and, as a consequence, our response to, human trafficking and slavery offences as they occur in Northern Ireland. Much of our current understanding of the nature and scale of human trafficking is derived from the referral of potential victims of trafficking to the national referral mechanism (NRM). While it provides a helpful insight, we know that the information is limited, especially since, in the case of potential victims who are adults and who do not consent to a referral being made, that information will not be captured.

The UK Human Trafficking Centre also conducts an annual retrospective strategic baseline exercise to give an indication of others who may not be captured in the official NRM statistics. However, whilst it is helpful, that, too, is known to be limited. To address that, new clause 5F places a statutory duty on specified public authorities to notify the United Kingdom Human Trafficking Centre, which is now part of the National Crime Agency, of any person they believe may be a victim of trafficking or slavery-type offences.

The resultant data will be an important tool in helping to inform effective policy development as well as police operational responses. As such, information gathered in this way could, crucially, aid the recovery of other victims from situations where they are being trafficked and exploited, or lead to the conviction of perpetrators.

New clause 5F includes provision to ensure that information may be captured and reported in an anonymised form so that it is not lost, even in cases where an adult potential victim does not wish their personal details to be provided.

In debating these amendments, which will reinforce our capacity in respect of prevention and enforcement, I should also touch on clause 16, which would currently require my Department to establish an independent rapporteur for Northern Ireland to report on the operation of the Bill.

Members will be aware of the proposal in the Modern Slavery Bill at Westminster for a United Kingdom-wide anti-slavery commissioner. It is my firm view that a commissioner operating across the entire United Kingdom would provide a much better model of oversight than the local rapporteur envisaged by clause 16. The issue is primarily one of accountability. A UK-wide anti-slavery commissioner would have oversight of all law enforcement agencies and statutory organisations operating in the sphere of human trafficking and slavery in Northern Ireland, devolved and non-devolved. A local rapporteur would not. I believe that that is a critical factor, particularly given the wide range of bodies, both devolved and non-devolved, in combating these crimes here.

A UK-wide commissioner would also be best placed to identify and recommend best practice across each of the UK's constituent jurisdictions, as well as to offer a wider strategic view of human trafficking and slavery and associated trends across the United Kingdom as a whole.

Whilst I acknowledge that cost should not be our driving consideration, neither, in the current climate, can we afford to ignore financial implications. It is the case that a commissioner operating across the whole of the United Kingdom would offer greater economies of scale and value for money, and would ultimately be more affordable than a local rapporteur with limited oversight within this jurisdiction.

For those reasons, I intend to seek the Assembly's legislative consent to extend the anti-slavery commissioner under the Westminster Modern Slavery Bill to Northern Ireland. Lord Morrow has indicated that, in principle, he agrees with that approach, but that he wishes to see the detail of the draft Westminster legislation before he will support the removal of clause 16 from the Bill.

I have agreed a package of measures with the Home Secretary to ensure that Northern Ireland interests will be adequately met under the Westminster legislation, and I am satisfied that those will be effective and appropriate. However, Lord Morrow, quite understandably, wishes to be assured on the detail of the provisions. For that reason, I do not, at this stage, propose to push this House to a vote on clause 16. Subject to securing the Assembly's consent to a devolved role for the United Kingdom-wide commissioner, however, it is my firm belief that it should ultimately be removed from the Bill at Further Consideration Stage. I commend this group of amendments to the House.

Mr Givan (The Chairperson of the Committee for Justice): First of all, I will cover clause 15 and then amendment No 25.

There is widespread support for a statutory requirement for the Department of Justice to publish a strategy every year on raising awareness and tackling human trafficking and slavery offences in cooperation with governmental and non-governmental organisations. While the publication of the Department's human trafficking action plan in May 2013 was welcomed and could provide a possible template, the clear view was that there should be a statutory requirement to ensure continued commitment from the Department, particularly given that information sharing, data collection and collaborative working across agencies and departments continue to present challenges. A number of organisations also felt that the strategy should be flexible enough to respond to changing trends in trafficking and suggested that it should also include reporting on the measures prohibiting paying for sexual services of a person.

The Department advised the Committee that it was content with the statutory requirement in clause 15 for it to publish an annual strategy and that it intended to bring forward amendments regarding training, investigation and prosecution to replace clause 7(1), as discussed earlier, and to ensure the strategy must include matters relating to raising awareness of the rights and entitlements of victims of human trafficking across the criminal justice system, and that would address concerns relating to the prosecution of victims of human trafficking who have been compelled to commit an offence as a consequence of being trafficked.

The Committee supports the intention to place a statutory requirement on the Department of Justice to publish a strategy to raise awareness of and contribute to the reduction of human trafficking and slavery offences and agrees with the issues that the strategy should cover, including the proposed amendments from the Department.

Amendment No 25 introduces a new clause 5E, which effectively replicates the provision of clause 15 and the amendments that I have previously outlined. Given that there are no substantive changes and the replacement of clause 15 by new clause 5E is intended to accommodate technical changes and re-group the provision more logically within the Bill, the Committee is content to support this approach.

Amendment Nos 24 and 62, taken together, make provision for the courts to impose new slavery and trafficking prevention orders either upon sentencing or following an application by the PSNI. The Committee received information on these new civil orders, a breach of which will be a criminal offence, from the Department in September, and, having noted that they will enable the courts to respond swiftly by regulating the actions of those convicted of being involved in slavery and human trafficking offences where it is necessary to do so, thus protecting the public from harm, it is content to support these amendments.

The Committee also supports amendment No 26, which places a statutory duty on the PSNI and the Health and Social Care Trusts to notify the United Kingdom Human Trafficking Centre of any cases where there is reason to believe that an individual may be a victim of a human trafficking or slavery offence even in cases where the individual has declined to give their consent to a referral to the National Referral Mechanism. The capture of this additional information, even though it may be anonymised, will improve understanding of the extent and nature of human trafficking and slavery-like offences and, according to the Department of Justice, inform timely operational responses and the development of effective strategic and policy responses.

Mr Deputy Speaker, with your indulgence, I would like to briefly refer to clause 16, which provides for a Northern Ireland rapporteur to report to the Northern Ireland Assembly on the performance of this Act and other matters relating to human trafficking and slavery. The concept of an independent oversight mechanism to provide effective monitoring and accountability arrangements has been broadly welcomed, apart from by the PSNI and the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety, who both felt that the current system of scrutiny and the accountability mechanisms were sufficient.

The key issue is whether a Northern Ireland rapporteur or a UK-wide anti-slavery commissioner is more appropriate. When the Committee sought evidence on this proposal, some organisations supported a UK-wide commissioner, given the international nature of human trafficking and the fact they would be able to look comprehensively at the actions of all the organisations and agencies involved in tackling trafficking in Northern Ireland, which a Northern Ireland rapporteur would not be able to do, given that responsibility for some organisations, such as the Home Office, the UK Human Trafficking Centre and the Gangmasters Licensing Authority, is not devolved.

In the absence of detailed proposals regarding a UK-wide commissioner, others felt clause 16 should be retained, at least in the meantime, and it was important that whatever form the rapporteur took, they should scrutinise the work of the PSNI and the relevant Northern Ireland Departments and report to the Minister and the Assembly.

Lord Morrow advised the Committee that he accepts that there is an argument for a national rapporteur to operate on a UK-wide basis but indicated that he had concerns about the fact that, as initially drafted in the Modern Slavery Bill, the commissioner would only consider law enforcement and not areas such as victim support, which the Northern Ireland rapporteur would have the power to do if clause 16 were enacted. He also highlighted the importance of having a rapporteur who would effectively consider the needs of Northern Ireland and its particular challenges, including the land border with the Republic of Ireland.

When the Committee visited Sweden, it met the Swedish national rapporteur and discussed her role, remit and the benefits of having such an appointment. Members support the principle of having an independent body to monitor and report on the response to human trafficking in Northern Ireland. The Committee therefore agreed to support clause 16 but noted that the remit of the anti-slavery commissioner, which is a post that would be created by the Modern Slavery Bill, could be extended to Northern Ireland and decided that it would consider the matter further once clarity on the position regarding such a commissioner and the remit and responsibilities was available.

More recently, the Department advised the Committee in September that the Minister has been engaging with the Home Secretary and with Scotland to ensure that Northern Ireland interests are covered with a view to including a provision in the Modern Slavery Bill to extend the commissioner's role to Northern Ireland, subject to the Assembly's consent through a legislative consent motion. I know that the Minister elaborated on that.

The Department outlined that the Minister has got agreement on a range of issues, including a requirement for the Home Secretary to consult devolved Ministers on the appointment of the commissioner, a duty on the Home Secretary to consult devolved Ministers before agreeing the strategic plan or annual report, a power for the Northern Ireland Minister to be able to request ad hoc reports on Northern Ireland matters, that reports by the commissioners will be jointly submitted to the Home Secretary and devolved Ministers, and that there will be a statutory duty on the Northern Ireland Minister to lay the reports before the Northern Ireland Assembly. The Department is due to brief the Committee on the proposed legislative consent motion at the meeting scheduled for 5 November.

Mr McCartney: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I will be brief, because the Chair outlined all the main issues in relation to this group. On the latter point, officials will be coming to the Committee on 5 November to provide information on the process for the LCM, and I would say to the Minister that whatever detail is forthcoming should be shared with the proposer of the Bill, obviously, but certainly the Committee and, indeed, the wider Assembly.

Lord Morrow: I am glad to be able to support the Minister on the series of amendments that propose new clauses 5D to 5F and schedule 3. Amendment Nos 24 and 62 would introduce slavery and trafficking prevention orders through new clause 5D and schedule 3. They will help to ensure that those convicted of human trafficking and slavery can be prevented from embarking upon particular activities linked to committing human trafficking and slavery offences. I believe that such orders will provide the police with another tool in their armoury with which they can seek to tackle this crime. In and of themselves, they will not solve the problem but are a useful part of a package of measures that could make a real difference. Introducing such orders is a positive step forward in tackling this crime in Northern Ireland.

Amendment No 25, which relates to new clause 5E, would replace and amend clause 15, moving it up so that it sits in Part 1 rather than in Part 4. I am particularly grateful to the Minister for agreeing to have in statute a requirement to publish a strategy every year, which will ensure that the Department of Justice remains focused on tackling those crimes in Northern Ireland. The annual strategy will cover human trafficking and slavery offences. The Department will have to consult with other relevant organisations in drawing up the strategy. The strategy will need to consider how best to foster cooperation between organisations, the provision of training and equipment for those involved in investigating or prosecuting trafficking or slavery offences, and raising awareness.

While it would be wonderful if human trafficking and slavery could be eradicated in the near future, it seems unlikely in our increasingly globalised world. Consequently, ongoing efforts will be required by the Department to tackle this crime. Having an annual strategy that includes requirements for cooperation between organisations working in this field, provision for training and equipment for those involved in investigating and prosecuting those offences and provisions aimed at raising awareness of the rights of victims will help to improve the response of statutory and non-governmental organisations to human trafficking and slavery offences.

If the annual strategy were not in statute, a future Minister could simply end the publication of the annual action plan, and the Assembly could do nothing about it. Consequently, I feel that it is necessary for that provision to be kept in statute.

6.00 pm

As the Minister outlined, amendment No 26, which is new clause 5F, would place a statutory duty on particular public authorities to notify the National Crime Agency, of which the UK Human Trafficking Centre is a part, of any cases in which there is a reason to believe that an individual may be a victim of human trafficking or slavery offences. I believe that that is a positive amendment that will help statutory bodies to respond to human trafficking and slavery offences. As many Members will be aware, data on the extent and nature of human trafficking and slavery in Northern Ireland is often incomplete and limited. In reality, due to the hidden nature of the crimes, we consider that that will probably always be the case. However, the duty to notify the National Crime Agency will help to provide a better picture of the situation in Northern Ireland and will clearly assist law enforcement agencies and other statutory authorities to respond more effectively to the crimes being committed.

I also support the decision to ensure that that data does not go into the existing national referral mechanism statistics but is held in a different data set. That is very difficult terrain to navigate because, ideally, all victims of human trafficking would be willing to put themselves through the national referral mechanism process. However, in practice, a substantial group of victims does not want to do so. That may be because, on being rescued, they want to return immediately to their home country. It can also be caused, sadly, by a distrust of the police and other law enforcement agencies. Not requiring that the duty be a part of the current national referral mechanism process will allow additional anonymised data to be recaptured and will give us a clearer idea of the scope of the problem in Northern Ireland.

Clause 7 outlines requirements and resources for training, investigation or prosecution. I have already spoken about new clause 5E, and we have already agreed new clause 5G, which together cover the content of clause 7. With the Minister, I am therefore proposing to remove clause 7 from the Bill. New clause 5E covers training needs, and new clause 5G will mirror clauses 7(1) and 7(2).

Clause 15 requires the Department of Justice to publish an annual strategy on human trafficking and slavery. Following constructive discussions with the Department of Justice, it was agreed that the clause required substantial amendment. Consequently, a redrafted clause was drawn up and has been introduced as new clause 5E, which I spoke about just now. I am therefore proposing that clause 15 be removed from the Bill.

I also want to speak about clause 16, on which no amendments have been tabled. One of the key requirements of the European directive and the European Convention is that there should be an anti-trafficking national rapporteur or equivalent mechanism to review the efficiency of anti-trafficking legislation and policy, so I provided for a rapporteur in clause 16. Since publishing that proposal in my draft Bill in August 2012, the UK Government have announced their decision to create the new office of an anti-slavery commissioner, which would have some overlap with the functions of a national rapporteur.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Dallat] in the Chair)

For me, the issues are now quite finely balanced. On the one hand, the remit of the anti-slavery commissioner is limited to criminal justice, and whilst the scope has been extended to improve identification of victims, it has nothing to do with victim care, which is, I believe, a very significant shortcoming. Moreover, the anti-slavery commissioner is not independent of government.

On the other hand, money is tight. Departmental officials indicated at the Justice Committee that it would cost around £50,000 annually to introduce a regional rapporteur for Northern Ireland, while it would cost only between £20,000 and £30,000 annually for Northern Ireland to be covered by the anti-slavery commissioner at UK level. In difficult financial times, we, as Members of the Assembly, have to bear that in mind.

I have received assurances from the Department of Justice suggesting that the commissioner would be of real benefit to Northern Ireland. As of today, the legislative consent motion that would enable Northern Ireland to benefit from the anti-slavery commissioner has not been tabled. I certainly am not willing to propose that clause 16 be removed until I have seen the text of that motion. I have been assured by the Public Bill Office that it will be possible for us to agree to keep clause 16 in the Bill today and make a final decision at Further Consideration Stage. Consequently, I propose that, for the moment at least, clause 16 should stand part.

Mr Ford: I am sure that it will be a pleasure to the House that we have concluded this group in such a short time. I have outlined at length the effect of the proposed measures. I believe that they are important: they will help to protect Northern Ireland from the evil done by those who seek to traffic and exploit others; they will provide the necessary new powers for our courts to protect people and deter perpetrators; and they will enhance our understanding of the nature and scale of these evil practices in Northern Ireland so that we can better target our efforts and be more strategic in how we use our resources to eradicate them.

After listening to the Members who spoke, I felt that it was clear that there was general support around the House. The one key issue that remains is that of the rapporteur and clause 16. I entirely accept Lord Morrow's point that he, at this stage, wishes to keep clause 16 in. From the conversations that my team and I have had with the Home Office, I am optimistic that we will be able to see the benefits of a UK-wide rapporteur in Northern Ireland, which, as Lord Morrow acknowledged, will have financial benefits as well as the benefit of ensuring that the role would look at non-devolved as well as devolved matters in this region. At this stage, Lord Morrow has made it clear that he wants to see the colour of my money as well as the colour of the Home Office's money. That is a perfectly reasonable position at this point, but I trust that, within the next week or two, we will be able to resolve that and deal with it properly at Further Consideration Stage. So, I am content that clause 16 stand part at this stage, and it appears that the House is content with the various amendments that I have proposed.

Question, That amendment No 24 be made, put and agreed to.

New Clause

Amendment No 25 made: After clause 5 insert

"Strategy on offences under sections 1A and 1B

5E.—(1) The Department shall, at least once in every year, publish a strategy on offences under section 1A and 1B ("relevant offences").

(2) In drawing up the strategy the Department must—

(a) consult with other relevant organisations; and

(b) have regard to views expressed by such organisations.

(3) The purpose of the strategy is to—

(a) raise awareness of relevant offences in Northern Ireland;

(b) contribute to a reduction in the number of such offences.

(4) The strategy shall in particular—

(a) set out arrangements for co-operation between relevant organisations in dealing with relevant offences or the victims of such offences;

(b) include provision as to the training and equipment of those involved in investigating or prosecuting relevant offences or dealing with the victims of such offences;

(c) include provisions aimed at raising awareness of the rights and entitlements of victims of such offences.

(5) In this section "relevant organisation" means any body, agency or other organisation with functions or activities relating to relevant offences or the victims of such offences.".— [Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice).]

New Clause

Amendment No 26 made: After clause 5 insert

“Duty to notify National Crime Agency about suspected victims of offences under section 1A or 1B

5F.—(1) A specified public authority must notify the National Crime Agency if it has reason to believe that a person may be a victim of an offence under section 1A or 1B.

(2) The Department—

(a) must issue guidance to specified public authorities about the sorts of things which indicate that a person may be a victim of an offence under section 1A or 1B;

(b) may from time to time revise the guidance; and

(c) must arrange for any guidance issued or revised to be published in a way the Department considers appropriate.

(3) The Department may by regulations make provision about the information to be included in a notification under subsection (1).

(4) The regulations must provide that a notification relating to a person aged 18 or over may not include information that—

(a) identifies the person, or

(b) enables the person to be identified (either by itself or in combination with other information), unless the person consents to the inclusion of the information.

(5) The regulations may not require information to be included if its inclusion would result in a disclosure which contravenes the Data Protection Act 1998.

(6) In this section “specified public authority” means a public authority specified in regulations made by the Department.”— [Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice).]

New clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

New Clause

Amendment No 27 made: After clause 5 insert

“Investigation and prosecution of offences under section 1A or 1B

5G.—(1) The investigation or prosecution of an offence under section 1A or 1B is not dependent on the victim reporting the offence or accusing a person of committing the offence.

(2) Proceedings for an offence under section 1A or 1B may be commenced or continued even if the victim of the offence has withdrawn any statement made in relation to the offence.”— [Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice).]

New clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 6 (Paying for sexual services of a person)

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): We now come to the debate on the third group, which concerns opposition to clause 6 stand part and amendment Nos 28 to 39. This group deals with the offence of paying for sexual services and the Minister’s opposition to the clause; the repeal of an existing offence in connection with prostitution; adding detail to the reporting duty in clause 6; and the Minister’s alternative to clause 6A, which would amend the existing legislation to extend the timeline for prosecution of an offence relating to prostitutes subject to force.

Members will note that amendment No 32 is consequential to amendment No 31. I call the Minister of Justice, Mr David Ford, to speak to clause 6 stand part and to address the amendments in the group.

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

The following amendments stood on the Marshalled List:

No 28: In page 3, line 26, at end insert

“(2) In Article 58 (Interpretation of this Part) at the end of paragraph (3) insert “other than in Article 64A”.— [Lord Morrow.]

No 29: In page 3, line 26, at end insert

“(2) Article 59 (Loitering or soliciting for purposes of prostitution) is repealed.”— [Mr McCartney.]

No 30: In page 3, line 31, leave out “over the age of 18”.— [Lord Morrow.]

No 31: In page 3, line 35, after “to” insert

“imprisonment for a term not exceeding 6 months or”.— [Lord Morrow.]

No 32: In page 3, line 36, after “scale” insert “, or both”.— [Lord Morrow.]

No 33: In page 3, line 37, before “to imprisonment” insert “on conviction on indictment”.— [Lord Morrow.]

No 34: In page 3, line 39, after “advantage” insert

“to B or any person other than B”.— [Lord Morrow.]

No 35: In page 3, line 41, leave out “(including sexual services)”.— [Lord Morrow.]

No 36: In page 3, line 41, at end insert

“(3A) No offence is committed under this article unless the sexual services that are provided or are to be provided by B to A involve—

(a) B being physically in A’s presence,

(b) B touching A or A touching B, and

(c) the touching is sexual.”— [Lord Morrow.]

No 37: In page 4, line 4, leave out “must raise awareness of this offence.” and insert

“shall conduct an advertising campaign to ensure public awareness of the change effected by this section.”— [Lord Morrow.]

No 38: In page 4, line 7, at end insert

“(7) In particular the report must set out—

(a) information on the nature and extent of prostitution connected to human trafficking including numbers of arrests and convictions during the period covered by the report in connection with an offence under this Article or section 1A, 1B or 1D of the Human Trafficking and Exploitation (Further Provisions and Support for Victims) Act (Northern Ireland) 2014;

(b) the extent to which, in the opinion of the Department, this Article has operated to reduce human trafficking; and

(c) the impact of this Article on the safety and well-being of prostitutes.”— [Mr McCartney.]

New Clause

No 39: After clause 6 insert

“Time limit for prosecution of offences under Article 64A of the Sexual Offences (Northern Ireland) Order 2008

6A.—(1) In Article 64A of the Sexual Offences (Northern Ireland) Order 2008 (paying for sexual services of a prostitute subjected to force, etc.) at the end add—

“(5) Notwithstanding anything in Article 19(1) of the Magistrates Courts (Northern Ireland) Order 1981, proceedings for an offence under this Article may be brought within the period of 6 months from the date on which evidence sufficient in the opinion of the prosecutor to warrant the proceedings came to the knowledge of the prosecutor; but no proceedings shall be brought by virtue of this paragraph more than 3 years after the commission of the offence.

(6) For the purposes of paragraph (5)—

(a) a certificate signed by or on behalf of the prosecutor and stating the date on which such evidence as is mentioned in that paragraph came to the knowledge of the prosecutor shall be conclusive evidence of that fact; and

(b) a certificate stating that matter and purporting to be so signed shall be deemed to be so signed unless the contrary is proved.”.

(2) Subsection (1) does not apply in relation to proceedings for an offence if—

(a) the offence was committed before the day on which that subsection comes into operation; and

(b) but for that subsection, Article 19(1) of the Magistrates’ Courts (Northern Ireland) Order would have prevented proceedings being brought for that offence on that day.”.— [Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice).]

Mr Ford: I welcome the opportunity to open the debate on whether clause 6 should stand part of the Bill. My view is that it should not, either in its original form or with amendment Nos 28 to 38.

The House will recall that, on previous occasions when this subject has been discussed, I have referred to the need to make and develop policy based on relevant knowledge, evidence and facts. My view has always been that clause 6 was, unfortunately, lacking in those component parts. We have, for example, heard quite a lot in previous discussion and debate about the law in Sweden, and I have taken the time to go there and hear for myself the views of interested parties. I have no wish to detract from what Sweden has done in their own best interests and for their own societal reasons, but I absolutely question the validity of making serious changes to the criminal law in this jurisdiction based on what happens to work for a very different country with a very different ideological outlook.

Mr Wilson: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Ford: Yes, I will.

Mr Wilson: If the Minister is going to use the justification that Sweden somehow has a different society from Northern Ireland, maybe he will explain why the restriction works in Sweden but would not work in Northern Ireland. What are the differences between the two societies?

Mr Ford: Deputy Speaker, rule number one is clearly never give way in the first 30 seconds of a speech before you have had the chance to explain anything. If Mr Wilson chooses to listen, he will hear some of the reasons as I go through them.

In order to plug what appeared to me to be an obvious knowledge gap, I commissioned research earlier this year into the framework of prostitution in Northern Ireland. The report of that research by Queen’s University was published last week, and I wrote to all Members on Thursday to share with them a summary of the key findings relevant to this debate. Although the primary purpose of the research is to inform future policy development and legislative change, should that be necessary, we are now, at least, in a better position to understand why clause 6 is not the best way forward at this time, even if we do not have ready answers yet to make decisions on future policy.

I have two main concerns about the effect of clause 6. Those concerns are not based on an ideological view of prostitution but are grounded at a real and practical level. First, the clause began its life in a Bill designed to reduce the incidence of human trafficking both for sexual and other forms of exploitation. The argument in favour of such a provision says that criminalisation will reduce demand for sexual services, and, where demand is depressed, the traffickers will not come because there will be no market for them and they will go elsewhere. If only it were that simple. From the evidence provided by the research report, I have serious concerns over that basis for adopting clause 6.

The survey results make it clear that criminalising the purchase of sex will not deter those who buy sex to a significant extent: only 16% of those surveyed said that it would make them desist. Nor will it stop people selling sex. Indeed, if amendment No 29, standing in the name of Raymond McCartney, is carried, we could see it becoming easier to do. That amendment would repeal the current offence of soliciting in a public place for the purpose of selling sexual services. It seems that the Assembly needs to be careful that we do not ignore the fundamentals of policy development, which are so important — proper review, consideration and consultation — by engaging in what I fear to be a box-ticking exercise in the minds of some.

The argument in favour of criminalisation to reduce demand does not take account of the realities of prostitution, which we are now in a better place to understand. It fails to recognise that the people involved in prostitution are individuals, all with different backgrounds, different perspectives and different circumstances. This is not a homogeneous group. The research provides ample evidence of that fact with different ethnicities and nationalities, different genders, ages, educational provision, family status and reasons for involvement in prostitution. I am certainly not suggesting, nor has the research found, that everyone involved in prostitution has made an independent and free choice to do so. I totally accept the need for the law to protect the vulnerable and to punish the perpetrator. That is why so much of the Bill is good, right and proper. That is why I have worked with Lord Morrow to make the Bill as effective as possible in addressing trafficking and in supporting the victims, but that underpinning and shared desire is not furthered by clause 6.

In addition to not meeting the fundamental objective of depressing the market and thus reducing the attraction of Northern Ireland to traffickers, the provision will push the sale and purchase of sexual services further into the background, thus allowing more scope for criminality to become involved. Over 60% of the sex workers surveyed thought that criminalisation would put them at greater risk. That is the second failing, when we enter the territory of making law that not only is likely to be ineffective in achieving the fundamental objective of the provision but will create a more hostile environment in which women, at varying levels of vulnerability, will continue to sell sexual services.

We have two real problems here: law that may well be ineffective in reducing trafficking and law that may also increase the risk for women who continue to sell sexual services. The evidence from elsewhere is that some women will continue to sell, and some men will continue to buy.

6.15 pm

Mr Wilson: I thank the Minister for giving way. Of course, as part of his defence, he is using some of the research that he has commissioned through his Department and Queen's University. Does he accept that all the academics who were involved in the research took a very liberal point of view and were supportive of the sex industry rather than being opposed to it? Therefore, the information and colour of the research he got back was somewhat influenced by the views of those whom he appointed. If he had really wanted balanced research, why did he not at least ensure that there was some balance amongst the research team that was appointed?

Mr Ford: That is a fairly serious attack on the academic credibility of those who carried out the work. That group was awarded the contract on the basis of the case they put forward that they could do the research in an appropriate way. They have academic credentials and come from three institutions — it was not merely Queen's; there was also involvement from Galway and Berlin universities. On that basis, it is a fairly dangerous attack, with no evidence, on the credibility of those who carried out the research.

There is also a third element of clause 6, which has to figure largely for anyone who seriously wishes to engage in the proper consideration of the justification of the provision. Certainly, as Minister of Justice, I must be alert to the credibility of any proposed addition to the statute law. I have to accept that that role is likely to be curtailed in circumstances such as these, but I would be failing in my duty if I were not to point out to the House that the provision falls short on yet another count — having a credible chance of consistent enforcement — and therefore risks undermining the integrity of the criminal law.

The Chair of the Justice Committee said that I had some serious explaining to do regarding the concerns I expressed in my letter to Members over the views the police had on the question of enforcement. I think that the views I expressed were quite clear. I referred to the difficulties that were clearly articulated by the police at the Justice Committee and to the researchers, the difficulties that they would have in using clause 6 to emulate the way it is enforced in Sweden and, particularly in the current climate, to target finite resources to police consensual sexual transactions, instead of pursuing organised crime, trafficking and the associated sexual exploitation. There is no change to the police's position, and they have articulated that over a period of time.

There are real concerns about the implementation of clause 6 that are illustrated in the research report. First — this is one of the key points to learn from the comparison with Sweden — offences of consensual sex purchase in this jurisdiction will not reach the legal threshold of seriousness necessary for covert evidence gathering. We know that in Sweden evidence is obtained through telephone taps, largely of mobile phones, to get the necessary evidence to catch the perpetrators. Mind you, we also know that prostitution continues at a higher level in Sweden than is currently the case in Northern Ireland, despite its being illegal. We simply cannot rely on telephone taps to carry out covert operations against what is a consensual activity. It does not meet the required threshold, and a police superintendent would not be in a position to sign the necessary warrant for it. Secondly, it is absolutely clear, in any circumstances and particularly in the difficult financial circumstances we are in now, that police resources will quite rightly be focused on circumstances of sexual exploitation, whether it is trafficking, human slavery or whatever else. That has to be the priority, not the small instances of consensual sexual activity that are currently lawful and where there is full consent on the part of those participating. The third point is that, in the absence of things like intelligence from covert telephone tapping, witness evidence is very unlikely. Those are simple statements of fact as to how policing would operate in this jurisdiction, compared with elsewhere, as to the possibility of enforcing it.

The timing of the debate and the publication of the research report just last week have not allowed for full and proper consideration of how we might address the law and policy on prostitution for the future, but we should at least be perfectly clear on how the law works at present to protect victims of sexual exploitation. It is already an offence to buy sex from a prostitute who is being coerced. There is no defence to that charge; it is an absolute offence. The argument used in a radio interview by a recent former member of the Justice Committee that people will say that they did not know simply does not make any difference. The onus is on the purchaser to take the necessary steps to ensure that the person whom he is buying from is selling independently and without coercion. The logical conclusion of that is that no one at all should buy.

There has been criticism — I have no doubt we will hear it again today — that no prosecutions have been brought for this offence. To improve the prospect of obtaining successful prosecutions, I have tabled an amendment to article 64A of the Sexual Offences (Northern Ireland) Order 2008 to make it more effective. Amendment No 39 will extend from six months to three years the statutory time bar on the prosecution of offences of paying for sex with a prostitute subjected to force. I have done that on the advice of the police and the prosecution service, to better enable them to successfully prosecute purchasers where a case against the traffickers or exploiters first has to be completed. It is clearly the case that, if it can take a year or sometimes up to two years to prosecute exploiters, having a six-month limit on the prosecution of clients is inadequate. It is also clear that having three years to prosecute clients would make a significant difference and would mean that they did not get the opportunity to get off on timing.

The provisions already available to target sexual exploitation are often ignored or dismissed. When a person knowingly engages in sex with a prostitute who is being subjected to any form of force — if it is knowing — the law is absolutely straightforward: the absence of consent to the act means that the purchaser will be guilty of rape or serious sexual assault. No lesser charge would be appropriate; no lesser charge is appropriate.

My support for the vast majority of this Bill is not in question. I hope and believe that Lord Morrow will accept that as a true statement. Human trafficking remains a global curse that we all want to see stopped, but clause 6, in my opinion, does not further those shared objectives. I know that there are honourable and principled beliefs in the House that drive the desire of Lord Morrow and others to see this provision enacted; I cannot and do not fault people for that. However, as Minister of Justice, I also hold firm views on how the criminal law is used and, in that context, I cannot support a provision that I do not believe addresses the primary objective: to reduce the demand for trafficking into sexual exploitation. The provision will not act to protect women who sell sexual services, and it will not lend itself to reasonable standards of enforcement. I therefore oppose clause 6 and urge —

Mr Givan: I appreciate the Minister giving way. He touched on the police's position in respect of this. At the meeting of the Justice Committee, Assistant Chief Constable — now Deputy Chief Constable — Drew Harris said this, and I want to be clear and put it on the record, so I quote him:

"We believe that clause 6 sends out a strong message ... it offers us another plank on which to mount prosecutions against those who have used prostitutes."

He went on to say in that Committee meeting that the police supported clause 6 with some qualifications:

"We are not opposed to clause 6 ... We give it qualified support".

That is important, and I will elaborate on it when I speak. However, I want to counteract some of the Minister's remarks: the police support the clause because it sends out a strong message and allows them another tool to target those who use prostitutes.

Mr Ford: The issue is that reservations have been expressed about the practicality of clause 6 and the existence of laws that are already there to deal with prostitutes who are subject to any kind of coercion or force. That is the position that, it seems to me, has also been clearly articulated in recent times by the police.

The reality is that we have to ensure that we get legislation that works and has a chance of securing convictions and that we address the issue of prostitution in an appropriate way, which can be done if we look in a wider sense at the body of research we have and at other information available to the House.

I fear, however, that clause 6, even with the proposed amendments, merely creates difficulties with law enforcement without the prospect of getting the convictions we want. The key issue for me is the fight against trafficking, and by capturing consensual sexual relationships at the same time, whatever we may think of them, we run into the danger of not succeeding in the key objective of the Bill, which is to protect the vulnerable, fight the traffickers and ensure that we put in support mechanisms to deal with those who wish to exit prostitution and get the benefits from doing so. I therefore oppose clause 6.

Mr Givan (The Chairperson of the Committee for Justice): First, I apologise for missing the first part of the Minister's contribution in this very important debate on clause 6. I am pleased to stand here and speak in support of clause 6, as the Chairman of the Committee for Justice and on a personal basis.

Clause 6 has attracted the most attention, the most comment and the most controversy. Much of the written evidence received by the Committee focused on the clause, and we took the opportunity during the oral evidence sessions to explore and debate in considerable detail the evidence for and against it with a wide and varied range of stakeholders. Those stakeholders included the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety, Department of Justice officials, the Police Service of Northern Ireland, the Public Prosecution Service, voluntary organisations that provide support to trafficked victims and work with those involved in prostitution, academics, church and faith-based representatives, human rights organisations, and individuals who are or were involved in prostitution. We also held informal meetings with a victim of trafficking for sexual exploitation and a sex purchaser. The evidence that we heard, particularly from former prostitutes and the victim of human trafficking, was some of the most powerful and distressing that I, and I am sure I speak for all the Committee members, have ever experienced.

To assist consideration of the issues, the Committee undertook a visit to Sweden, which was the first country to pass legislation to prohibit the purchase of sexual services, and met with a range of governmental and non-governmental officials, including the national rapporteur. We also met with the Oireachtas Joint Committee on Justice, Defence and Equality to discuss the findings and conclusions of its report on a review of legislation on prostitution, which was published in June 2013 and recommended the adoption of the Swedish approach of criminalising the purchase of sexual services.

While a majority of the written submissions received by the Committee supported clause 6, either in its entirety or in principle, a number raised a variety of arguments against it. A number of those who supported the introduction of the clause also highlighted the need to ensure that a support package is put in place to provide assistance to those who wish to exit prostitution and wanted to see that included in the Bill. As a result of that evidence, Lord Morrow has brought forward an amendment to provide for such support. I very much welcome that, and I am sure that the Assembly will support it when we debate it later.

A number of key issues, which I want to touch on briefly, came through in the evidence. The first is the reasons for people entering prostitution. Some academics and those who represented sex workers indicated that there were those who entered prostitution as a career choice. However, former prostitutes and organisations involved in providing support and assistance to prostitutes and former prostitutes who gave evidence to the Committee, including Women's Aid and Ruhama, indicated that frequently the reasons related to poverty, homelessness and abusive and dysfunctional family backgrounds rather than a career choice. The Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission, in its oral evidence to the Committee, stated that protecting vulnerable people had to be the priority and that it therefore welcomed clause 6, viewing it as reasonable and proportionate to legislate in that area.

Concerns were also voiced that clause 6 could have a negative impact by driving prostitution underground and preventing people reporting incidents or seeking assistance from the authorities.

However, the overwhelming majority of respondents were firmly of the view that prostitution was already underground because of its very nature, the prevalence of criminal elements within that area and reporting of incidents to the statutory authorities rarely taking place. In evidence provided to the Committee, when asked if she had reported an instance of rape to the police, Mia, a former prostitute, said:

"No. Calling the police is not something that you even think of ... It is hard enough for women outside prostitution to take rape cases. Many people do not even believe that a prostituted woman can be raped. It does not even enter our heads to call the police."

6.30 pm

The message that legislation that criminalises the purchase of sex would send was also highlighted, with many stakeholders firmly of the view that it would challenge and change attitudes within society towards prostitution and curtail demand. They drew attention to research that has shown that changing the law in Sweden has had a transformative effect on public attitudes over the past 10 years regarding paying for sex and the attitudes of men to buying sex, particularly amongst the younger population. In 1996, before the law came in, just under 70% of the population were against criminalisation. In 2008, 70% supported the law, with 78% of people aged 18 to 28 in support of it.

I say that bearing in mind figures from an opinion poll of 1,000 people in Northern Ireland, where we are already ahead of the public attitude in Sweden, where they have criminalisation. The people in Northern Ireland have recognised what the right thing to do is even before this law is brought in. The figures that struck me most in that survey was that 16- to 34-year-olds were of the strongest view that it was right to bring in the provision contained in clause 6.

Those opposed to clause 6 were, however, concerned that the impact could be to ostracise prostitutes further, and referred to evidence that, in their view, demonstrated that sellers were further stigmatised in Sweden following the introduction of the Swedish Sex Purchase Act.

Another issue raised was whether further research on the nature, scale and extent of sex work and the links between human trafficking and prostitution was required before adopting legislation on criminalising the purchase of sexual services in Northern Ireland. However, those organisations that work on the ground with trafficked victims and those in prostitution indicated that there was ample evidence on those areas and the situation would be little different in Northern Ireland.

As I mentioned, a key issue raised was the importance of ensuring that support services were put in place for those who were in, had exited or wished to exit prostitution before clause 6 is enacted. I will return to that issue in the next debate.

I will turn to the issue of whether clause 6 should be included in this Bill. Those who do not support it have indicated that the selling of sexual services and human trafficking are separate, complex social phenomena that require separate policy and legislative responses. The view of those in favour of clause 6 is that there is overwhelming evidence and research available to demonstrate that prostitution and trafficking are inextricably linked. For example, two recent reports by economists published by the International Labour Organization showed a direct correlation between scale and percentage. In other words, the more the sex industry grows, the bigger the scale of trafficking. It is, therefore, not just appropriate but essential to include clause 6 in the Bill.

Let me speak about the Swedish model in more detail. The majority of those who gave evidence to the Committee were of the view that the Swedish model of criminalising the purchase of sexual services was an effective, tried and tested model and was the best way to tackle the demand for prostitution and trafficking of human beings for the purposes of sexual exploitation.

The Committee visited Sweden to gain first-hand knowledge of the legislation that is in place and the impact that it has had. We met a range of governmental and non-governmental officials, including the national rapporteur, and engaged in detailed discussions on how the legislation works in practice, the effect on the scale and nature of human trafficking and prostitution in Sweden and the benefits and outworkings of it. All members found the visit very interesting and informative.

Many of the issues that have been raised in the debate on clause 6 were discussed. Governmental officials were adamant that the legislation in place in Sweden works and has not driven prostitution further underground. They stated that the sellers and buyers have to find each other; therefore, the authorities can also find them. Of particular interest, was the discussion with a detective inspector in the vice team, who candidly admitted that the Swedish police were initially opposed to the legislation, as they did not think that it would work. However, they now fully support it and believe that it has assisted in tackling prostitution and trafficking.

Following the visit to Sweden, the Committee met the Oireachtas Joint Committee on Justice, Defence and Equality to discuss the findings and conclusions of its report on a review of legislation on prostitution, which recommended the adoption of the Swedish approach of criminalising the purchase of sexual services. The meeting provided the opportunity for a useful and interesting discussion on how that Committee unanimously concluded that criminalising the purchase of sexual services would curtail demand and therefore lessen the incentives for human trafficking.

Committee members also took the opportunity to raise some of the key issues that I outlined earlier, including the message sent out by legislation to criminalise the purchase of sexual services, whether such legislation should be separate or part of the Human Trafficking Bill and whether further research is required. The Joint Committee pointed to significant international research and evidence of the link between human trafficking and prostitution, including the report of the international human-trafficking unit, the European Union anti-trafficking coordinator and the report from the United States Department of State on its monitoring of international trafficking. The Joint Committee suggested that separating trafficking and prostitution could undermine what the legislation is aiming to achieve.

The Joint Committee felt strongly that the criminalisation of the buying of sexual services would have the effect of sending a message that prostitution was not acceptable in today's society. It has received evidence that trafficking was happening because of the demand for sexual services and the money to be made. In its view, while the legislation would not totally prevent prostitution, it would curtail demand and challenge attitudes within society towards paying for sex and indicate a desire to protect the most vulnerable in society who were unable to do so for themselves.

Mr Poots: Will the Member give way?

Mr Givan: Yes.

Mr Poots: Does the Member agree with me and, indeed, with the European Union anti-trafficking coordinator, who said that trafficking, organised crime and prostitution are linked? Why would the European Union coordinator be wrong on this issue and the Minister right?

Mr Givan: I think that the European coordinator is right. We can see the tide coming across Europe on this issue. You had the Nordic countries of Sweden and Norway, and now we have it being taken forward by the French Parliament, led by the socialist movement on this occasion. You had the vote in the European Parliament, leading on this issue as well. Northern Ireland has the opportunity to lead within the United Kingdom and on the island of Ireland. It is right that we do so, given the overwhelming evidence that exists at an international and at a local level. Now is the time to do it.

To conclude on the Joint Committee of the Oireachtas that dealt with this: it also highlighted the importance of ensuring that support services are in place for those who wish to exit prostitution.

Speaking briefly in an individual capacity, I believe that the engagement with the Joint Committee at the Oireachtas was one of the most beneficial visits that the Committee undertook. I single out one member of that Committee because, in my view, he spoke very well. He does not come from my political belief-set and does not share my constitutional beliefs, but it is Pádraig Mac Lochlainn, who is a Sinn Féin TD. Pádraig Mac Lochlainn was the most articulate and effective at that meeting in being able to answer questions from Committee members to try to help get a better understanding of the approach that has been taken in the Republic of Ireland on this issue. I want to put that on the record, because I think that it is right to pay tribute to the work that he has been doing on this issue in the Republic of Ireland. He has been leading on it, and I found the arguments that he made during that visit to be very persuasive. In the spirit of trying to put out the hand of generosity on this issue, it is right that I pay tribute to a Sinn Féin member who, in my view, has been a champion of this cause.

I will now clarify the position of the PSNI on clause 6. I commend the PSNI for listening to and taking account of the evidence received by the Committee, which has resulted in a significant change of position. The written submission received from the Police Service highlighted a number of concerns and indicated a view that the deterrent value of the legislation would be minimal and would present investigative difficulties. However, when Assistant Chief Constable Drew Harris attended in February, he stated that the PSNI welcomed clause 6 as it sent out a strong message that Northern Ireland is a difficult place for organised crime groups to operate in. If the law were passed, the PSNI envisaged that prosecutions may flow from major ongoing investigations into organised crime gangs. ACC Harris highlighted the fact that Northern Ireland is a target for such groups. He said that demand existed for prostitutes and that crime gangs regard it as high yielding in cash and low risk, so it is attractive to get involved. Most of the groups operating prostitution in Northern Ireland come from outside the jurisdiction, and clause 6 would send a strong message of intent and demonstrate our revulsion at that type of crime.

The PSNI welcomed the awareness that had been raised regarding human trafficking in Northern Ireland as a result of the debate on the Bill and indicated that, if clause 6 were passed, it would use the legislation to the best effect it could. When pressed by the Committee to clarify the PSNI position, which had obviously moved from that outlined in its written submission, ACC Harris stated that, having listened to the debate and discussed it as a command team, the PSNI was now in a position of having qualified support for clause 6. He said that he believed that the impacts could be positive, but that, at that stage, it was difficult to quantify.

Having taken such a substantial range of evidence, the Committee discussed and debated the merits of clause 6. A number of members, including me, indicated that they supported the clause and the amendments that Lord Morrow intended to make to narrow the scope of the offence, provide further sentencing options and require an advertising campaign to ensure public awareness of the changes in the law. We noted that a wide-ranging group of organisations, including the Irish Congress of Trade Unions, various Christian Church groups and organisations such as Women's Aid that work with and support victims of human trafficking and those in prostitution, indicated in written and oral evidence that they fully supported the criminalisation of the purchase of sexual services in Northern Ireland. The evidence from those who had exited prostitution and victims of sex trafficking made a compelling case for the introduction of clause 6. As one former prostitute put it:

"it is not possible to defend prostitution without defending all the harm and damage it causes. Therefore, it is not possible to be pro-women in prostitution but not pro-prostitution, as some argue for upholding the sex trade."

In our view, the information obtained during our visit to Sweden regarding the impact that its legislation had on reducing demand for sexual services and tackling human trafficking and the meeting with the Oireachtas Joint Committee added weight to the argument to support clause 6. We also noted developments that had recently taken place that indicated a move towards the adoption of similar legislation in other countries such as France, the publication of the European Parliament's Committee on Women's Rights and Gender Equality report on sexual exploitation and prostitution and its impact on gender equality, the European Parliament's plenary vote, which supported the position that demand reduction should be part of the strategy to reduce trafficking, and the Westminster all-party parliamentary group on prostitution and the global sex trade, whose report recommended that there should be a general offence for the purchase of sexual services. All that strengthens the argument for clause 6.

The members in support of clause 6 strongly believe that there is a clear link between human trafficking and the demand for sexual services. Criminalising the purchase of such services will curtail demand and therefore lessen the incentive for human trafficking for sexual exploitation, thus reducing it and making Northern Ireland a hostile place for such activity. Without clause 6, the objectives of the Bill are weakened.

6.45 pm

The view was also expressed that changing the law changes and creates values over time. The drink-driving legislation was cited as an example. Changing the law will challenge attitudes in Northern Ireland to paying for sex and indicate a desire to protect the most vulnerable and tackle trafficking for sexual exploitation.

Let me stop and speak briefly as an individual MLA. For me, there are serious question marks over the quality of the Queen's University research. I know that colleagues will go into that in more detail, but, if you accept the bonafides of that research, it should alarm, disturb and disgust all Members to learn that 17,500 men pay for sex every week in Northern Ireland. That, in itself, should send a very clear message to Members that we need to challenge that attitude. Those people believe that it is right to treat women and young girls as a commodity that they can buy for their sexual gratification. That, in itself, if you accept the Queen's University research, should give people a mandate to walk through the Lobbies in support of this law to challenge that attitude.

When completing Committee Stage back in April, other members of the Committee indicated that they were not in a position, at that time, to support clause 6. They stated that they required more evidence on the size and nature of prostitution in Northern Ireland, and they were concerned about the possible unintended consequences for those involved in prostitution of criminalising the purchase of sexual services. The Committee agreed to support clause 6, subject to the proposed amendments, with no member of the Committee voting against the clause. I hope that Committee members who were unable to express support for clause 6 back in April are in a position to do so today.

As I finish speaking as Chairman of the Committee, I want to bring to the attention of Members two quotes from informal meetings that the Committee held. One trafficked individual, Anna, has spoken in the media. She did not want to appear in the public sessions but met members privately. The other quote is from an individual whose evidence I found totally abhorrent and disgusting but who was incredibly candid and gave a real insight into the mind of someone who engages in paying for sexual services.

Let me quote the individual who thought that it was right to pay for sex. He believed that prostitution was driven by accessibility and acceptability. He was asked whether criminalising the buyer would stop him from buying sex.

That individual said that he had engaged in encounters with over 200 individuals, not just in Northern Ireland but in foreign countries. He told the Committee that, even though he suspected that the people with whom he engaged were underage, that they were children, it did not stop him from having sex with — in my view, raping — those young girls. That is the type of mindset that exists. That is what we are talking about when we talk about the individuals involved.

That individual lives in Northern Ireland, is married and has three children. We asked him what his response would be if the law was introduced: would it stop him buying sex? He answered yes, saying that his wife knew nothing about his sex-buying and that the naming and shaming would be a massive deterrent. That was his response. Take it at face value, given the conduct in which he was engaged and the type of individual involved. He was a married man with three children. What was the single most important deterrent to him? The public shame — getting caught. The onus of enforcement would be on the buyer, not the seller, who is the victim in these instances. It is the effect of naming and shaming that would deter him from engaging in that activity.

The second quote is from Anna, who was trafficked to Northern Ireland for sexual exploitation. She stated that her one wish was for legislators to bring in laws criminalising men who pay for sex. She said, and I quote:

"Gangs involved in trafficking would not give up their profits easily and the only way to end trafficking is to end demand."

I support clause 6.

Ms Ruane: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Cuirim fáilte roimh an díospóireacht seo. Tá an Bille seo an-tábhachtach ar fad. I welcome the debate and the fact that the private Member's Bill has been brought forward by Lord Morrow. From the outset, it is obvious to anyone in this House that I am coming from a very different side of the political spectrum from Lord Morrow. He is a unionist. I am a republican. I do not want to label anybody, but I presume that he considers himself to be to the right. I consider myself to be to the left. I have never heard him call himself a feminist, whereas I am a strong feminist. You will have heard me say that on many occasions.

It is nice to hear my colleagues in the South of Ireland, such as Pádraig MacLochlainn TD, whom I was speaking to earlier today and over the weekend, getting such high praise. The best way to support the work that he has done is by supporting my party's amendment, which does not criminalise women. I look forward to hearing from the Member on that. It is also nice to see that the DUP is not afraid to break parity. We have heard a lot about parity over the years, and it is good to see that it is not afraid to break it.

I have watched the debate. I met many people and had discussions with women and men right across this island and indeed throughout the world. I have watched as progressive groups such as Amnesty International and Women's Aid are on opposite sides of the argument. I have enormous respect for both those organisations. I have listened as many women spoke about the rights of sex workers and workers while other women talked about prostitution with regard to human rights abuses and the exploitation of women. I have listened to academics. I will not engage in putting down research by any academics because the reality is that there are hundreds of them in the world, doing their research and coming from different perspectives. That is the reality. We can sit here and rubbish one report and use another. What I say is that, yes, the Minister has his report, but, equally, there is the report of 75 very esteemed academics in Ireland who are very critical of the approach that the Minister is taking. Today, I will not get into —

Mr B McCrea: Will the Member give way?

Ms Ruane: I will, Basil, yes.

Mr B McCrea: Thank you. I would like to ask you to think again about research. Does that mean that we do not bother with any research because you will always get some that supports your argument and somebody else will get their own research? Surely there must be something that we can rely upon to inform public debate.

Ms Ruane: I am not anti-research; I am all for it. The more research we have, the better. However, what I will not do here today is rubbish one report and say that another is wonderful because it supports my argument. The point that I am making is that academics are divided on this; let us not pretend that they are not. Some want to see legalisation of the so-called sex industry and regulations to protect people from it; others want to see the criminalisation of the purchaser of sex and for women who are prostitutes not to be criminalised.

As regards legal views, we could have different lawyers here who all have different opinions, depending on what question they are asked. I have always been very clear: I like the Nordic model. I believe that we should criminalise the purchaser of sex and decriminalise women. On a recent visit to Iceland in the summer with some of my colleagues who are here in the Chamber, we met the Minister of Social Affairs and Housing. I am not very good at Icelandic, but her name is Eygló Harðardóttir. Gender equality comes under her Department.

She was very supportive. As you know, Iceland is one of the countries that did bring in this law, and she was strongly in support of it. I absolutely accept some of the points that the Minister made. Some of those countries are much more equal than we are, have a much stronger focus on gender equality and are much fairer societies, but that should not be an excuse for us not to bring in good law.

We heard that different police forces have different interpretations. I am sure that the Dutch police would give us a very different view than the Swedish police now. Members will know that I am on the Policing Board. I listened to the PSNI, which started by saying that it would not be able to police it, and then — this is where the confusion comes in — changed its position when challenged. It is not up to the PSNI to decide what can or cannot be policed. It is up to the Assembly; it is up to us to make the law. For too long, and too often in the past, the PSNI took positions that were not actually its to take; parades is just one example of that. I am glad to see that the PSNI has now stated the correct position, which is that it will respect what the House agrees.

In Sinn Féin, we have had a robust debate. We have had detailed scrutiny. We have reserved our position. We wanted to genuinely hear all points of view. We are not nodding dogs. Debate, and grappling with complex issues, is part and parcel of our everyday political life. I am not on the Justice Committee, but I pay tribute to my colleagues Seán, Raymond and Rosie. I particularly thank Rosie for her attention to detail on this. We had an all-Ireland team, as you would expect from us, and Pádraig Mac Lochlainn and his team also worked with us.

I want to state in the House today that I respect people's right to hold different views and accept that many of them are sincerely held. I make no judgement on them. Personally, I have had a very clear view on this for a long time. I support clause 6. Our aim is to ensure that women in prostitution are not exploited. This means that we must create the circumstances where the women are not criminalised. That is why Sinn Féin tabled amendment No 29 and why we are looking for your support. The Chair of the Justice Committee will be delighted to know that Pádraig Mac Lochlainn supports the amendment. I ask for support for the amendment from across the House.

I support the Nordic model, but the debate has become very — what would you say — polarised. Nobody is saying, and I am certainly not saying — and to be fair to Lord Morrow, I have not heard him say — that we are going to get rid of prostitution in the morning, next year or the year after. However, I have heard people say that this is an important step in the right direction.

I am 52 years of age. I am a mother and a grandmother — a mamó, as Gaeilge. I have lived and worked in three continents. I have worked with some of the poorest people. I remember being in one country, which I will not name, where I had to go to a mother to tell her that her five-year-old child was getting $2-50 to have oral sex with a soldier. The reason that was happening was that nearly every prostitute in the town had AIDS. It broke my heart to go to that house. You could not call it a house; it was the size of nothing, with five children living in it. The mother did not know where her next penny was coming from. She said to me, "I've five children. I hid his clothes. I don't know how to stop him. I'm worn out."

Mr B McCrea: Will the Member give way?

Ms Ruane: I will.

Mr B McCrea: I am touched by the story that you have recounted. I think that everybody would be saddened by it. However, the Member will no doubt be aware of the International Labour Organization, which runs a large campaign about the reduction of AIDS.

7.00 pm

It has a report out that says that you will not be able to tackle the Aids epidemic throughout the world unless you are able to decriminalise sex. The argument that it makes is that there is no access to condoms, health provision or any of those things. If the Member is concerned about tackling disease in the human condition, and I am quite sure that she is, surely she agrees that we must find a way of making it acceptable to get support to the people who need it most.

Ms Ruane: I absolutely agree. I will come on to the International Labour Organization, and of course I will come on to proper sex education, which we have not had for too long in our society. Our children and young people need proper sex education.

Ms P Bradley: I thank the Member for giving way, and I thank her for telling us that. Will the Member agree with me that, in our country, we do not have a lot of those problems with HIV and Aids, but we do have men and women in our country who, daily, are abusing children as young as that and using them for sexual gratification. We do not know whether they are the children next door to us or children who are being trafficked into this country. So it is happening here in Northern Ireland as well.

Ms Ruane: I thank the Member for her intervention, and I absolutely agree with her.

As I was saying, I have worked on three different continents. I have worked with some of the richest people in the world, and I have worked with some of the poorest. As Members here will know, I was Minister of Education in the Assembly for four years. During that time, I met thousands of young people. I had daily conversations with them about careers and futures. In all those 52 years and in all those various jobs, no one ever said to me, "When I grow up, I want to be a prostitute."

The reality is that there are deep inequalities in Ireland, North and South. There are deep inequalities in the global north/south. I agree with my colleague Basil McCrea that a multifaceted approach is needed to deal with many of these issues. I am glad to hear the Chair of the Justice Committee talking about gender equality. We do not hear it enough from the opposite Benches, but I welcome the fact that we are hearing it more and more. Women are under-represented in politics, business, statutory bodies, sporting and cultural bodies, and international organisations.

The strongest message that we got in Iceland was that it is a more progressive society because women are active citizens in that society. I see my colleague Paula Bradley nodding her head in agreement, because she, too, was on that trip. It is in all of our interests — men and women — that we create a fairer, more equal society. I ask those men who do not yet call themselves feminists to do so rather than to react. You have daughters, and I have yet to meet a father who says that they do not want their daughters getting a fair crack of the whip and fair play.

Mr Givan: I thank the Member for giving way. I am all in favour of gender equality. I have no issue with that whatsoever. Let me say it as a father. I do not often talk about my children, but I have three daughters: Annie, Holly and Maisie. One is seven, one is five, and the other is coming two in a couple of weeks. What disturbs me is that there are people in our society who believe that they could be a commodity for them to buy. I could never, ever support such a proposition. Shame on those in the House who want to defend the enslaving and exploitation of my children and other people in the future for taking that approach.

Ms Ruane: I thank the Member for his intervention, but I have not heard anyone —

Ms Lo: Will the Member give way?

Ms Ruane: I will, yes.

Ms Lo: While, obviously, I agree that no children would want to be in prostitution as a career, it is important to note that many of them have been driven into prostitution because of social inequalities, poverty, drug addiction, homelessness — various social problems. We need to eradicate those social inequalities — those difficult problems that they experience. Then, they would not be driven into prostitution.

Ms Ruane: I absolutely agree with my colleague, and I am coming to some of those points. I have not heard anyone in the House trying to defend exploitation, prostitution or people who abuse women. I have not heard that, and I think we need to be fair. Rather than saying, "Shame on people who do not agree with us", I think we need to recognise that we are having a very honest debate. Nobody has all the answers. I have one view; other people have other views. I am going to believe that all of us want to try to bring about changes so that none of our children has to face the issues that my colleague or Anna Lo has talked about.

I make no judgement of prostitutes. I understand the reasons why they choose that role. The point I was making is that it is not a role they started in life saying they wanted. They are driven to be something that they did not choose to be because of life experience or poverty. That is why we have brought forward an amendment, which I did not hear the Chair of the Justice Committee talking about. He talked about Lord Morrow's amendment, but he did not talk about ours, which is that the Minister of Health develop a strategy, in consultation with other Departments, and where we will actively support women who want to exit prostitution. It is all very well —

Mr Agnew: I thank the Member for giving way. She describes herself as a feminist. I would describe myself as someone who is aspiring to feminism. I think that that is probably as close as I can put it. She makes reference to those who wish to exit prostitution. The Queen's University research, whatever people think of it, showed that something like 32% of those in prostitution in Northern Ireland who were surveyed have third-level education degrees. As a feminist and as a woman, does she support those who choose prostitution to make that choice for themselves?

Ms Ruane: I would prefer to see prostitution eradicated. I do not believe that any woman chooses prostitution, and I do not believe that prostitution is not harmful to women. I think that there are complex reasons why women go into prostitution. You know that I am a feminist, but I do not believe that prostitution is a life choice for a woman. Again, I stress, in case anyone did not hear me: I do not believe we should criminalise women. That is why I am asking for your support on our amendment.

Mr Givan: I appreciate the Member giving way. She has made the point that I did not mention their amendment. Let me make it clear: we will be supporting the amendment that has been tabled in relation to that aspect.

Ms Ruane: Is that amendment No 28?

Mr Givan: It is to do with the criminalisation aspect that you talked about.

Ms Ruane: I appreciate that clarification; I thank the Member for it. I want to broaden this a little bit. Iceland and Norway can introduce and implement their laws, and make the changes that are necessary, because they have an equal society. We have a way to go before we reach the equality that they have in their society. We have to aspire towards it, and we have to work towards it. We have to do things, like get rid of page 3. I find it offensive to see pictures of naked women splayed all over popular newspapers. We have to get rid of partially clothed women in advertisements to sell cars; we have to stop feeding into a culture that turns a blind eye to misogyny, sexism, violence against women and children and glorification of the lad culture. We have loads of that here. I throw that out as a challenge.

I cringe every time I hear people in the House or on the radio — leaders of parties — talk about “manning up”. Get rid of that language. It is outdated, and it should be gone. It should not be used; it is so insulting.

We need a new message going out, to boys and girls, of respect, equality, assertiveness and empowerment. Added to this, women are seen as less than, and men are seen as more important. It chips away at the self-esteem of women. As I said before, we do not have a particularly good culture in talking about sexuality and about protecting ourselves. Is it any wonder that we have such a high level of teenage pregnancy and significant levels of domestic and sexual violence? I am not saying this to make a political point, but it is those same negative and dangerous messages that are being sent to our LGBT community that they are less than. All these negative images need to stop.

Now, on to prostitution. I find that what happens to women who are engaged in prostitution deeply hurtful. Their bodies are being touched, grabbed and penetrated again and again, usually on a daily basis, having different men dictate what they want to do. Prostitution is about the sexual satisfaction of the sex buyer, not the prostituted person. One person with money buys access to the body of another person, who, generally, is in a very desperate situation. Prostitution has a devastating impact on the physical and mental health of those affected. It affects self-esteem and self-confidence, and it can result in infertility. Many women involved in Ireland's sex industry feel that they had no real choice and that poverty and life circumstances dictated “choices” that they made. Those in prostitution face beatings, rape, sexual assault and degrading treatment, and they live in a state of constant tension.

Contrarily to that, the sex buyer has a choice, and it should be noted that only one in 15 men — although it is too many — has purchased sex in Ireland. So, 14 out of 15 have not. Let us not forget that. In the North, we are told that it is 3%. This is not a myth about lonely, isolated men; 60% are married or in a relationship.

Reducing the size of the sex trade will help to combat organised prostitution. Organised criminality is linked to and completely pervades the sex trade in Ireland. The sale of people for sex is one of the three most lucrative international criminal enterprises along with drugs and arms. Prostitution is a high-gain, low-risk enterprise for those involved. That is, those who are not prostituted themselves.

Many third parties gain. Who gains? Career criminal pimps, landlords and prostitution advertisers. Demand from those who buy sex fuels the trade in women and children who are trafficked. It sustains an illegal prostitution industry worth hundreds of millions a year in Ireland. The simple, lucrative step of incriminating the purchase of sex would immediately cut demand to that huge, lucrative trade. Diminished demand for paid sex would support the PSNI to target persistent criminality, and we need a step change from the PSNI in relation to this.

Legislation can be used to change attitudes and, ultimately, behaviours. I know that we can have a debate about whether it has been successful in Sweden and how successful it has been, but what we do have now is a decade of an entire generation that has grown up in a society where it is considered unacceptable for bodies of women and girls to be bought by others for their sexual satisfaction. Seventy per cent to, possibly, 80% of Swedes support this on the basis that exploitation is exploitative and incompatible with equality. In the past 12 months, the Council of Europe, the European Parliament, MPs in France and, just two weeks ago, MPs in Canada have backed the targeting of demand to curb exploitation, abuse and trafficking.

7.15 pm

One of the European Parliament resolutions supported Iceland, Norway and Sweden, and it did so because it:

“Believes that looking upon prostitution as legal ‘sex work’ ... is not a solution to keeping vulnerable women and under-age females safe from violence and exploitation, but has the opposite effect and puts them in danger of a higher level of violence, while at the same time encouraging prostitution markets – and thus the number of women and under-age females suffering abuse – to grow;”.

Trafficking women and girls for the purposes of sexual exploitation is a modern, global form of slavery.

Ms P Bradley: I thank the Member for giving way. The Member and I often do not agree on things, but there are things that we do agree on, and one of those is the rights of women. Will the Member comment on the issue in clause 6 and what the Human Rights Commission has come out and said in its support for clause 6?

Ms Ruane: I read the submission from the Human Rights Commission, and I heard what the Chair of the Justice Committee said. The Human Rights Commission had queries about some aspects, but it was supportive. Amnesty International is not, and I have huge respect for Amnesty International. It has its reasons, but I do not agree with its reasons, on this occasion. I thank the Member for her intervention.

I will move on to looking at Dublin, and I know that reference was made to what has happened there. We can look to our colleagues there. We now have two reports from the Oireachtas Justice Committee. It has unanimously backed sex buyer laws decisions taken after 800 written submissions and six months of hearings. The Justice Minister, Frances Fitzgerald, has also spoken of using laws to target demand and ruin the business model for pimps and traffickers. There is now an expectation that the South will publish legislation before Christmas and that laws will follow.

Sex buyer laws are not new. As we have heard, they have been implemented successfully in a number of countries, including Sweden. The level of men buying sex has reduced from 13.6% in 1996 to 7.9% in 2008, according to research commissioned by the Swedish Government. Three years ago, the Stockholm police estimated that between 200 and 400 women and girls have been annually trafficked into Sweden for prostitution, while, in Finland, where there is no law targeting demand, the number is 15,000 to 17,000.

The Swedish experience stands in marked contrast to the situation in the Netherlands, where laws that attempted to regularise prostitution have brought about more than a decade of failure. Organised crime and illegal brothels continue to flourish right alongside those that are licensed. A recent paper commissioned by the International Labour Organization indicates that Germany, which introduced a more liberal prostitution law in 2002, is estimated to have 150,000 people working as prostitutes. That is 60 times that of Sweden, even though the population is only 10 times bigger.

The Oireachtas Justice Committee agreed, when it included prostitution as sexual violence, and said that no action should be taken to criminalise or stigmatise those who sell sex.

I would like to mention briefly the Turn Off the Red Light campaign, and I know that other Members have mentioned it. The campaign seeks to end prostitution and human trafficking. It sees the trafficking of women and girls for the purposes of sexual exploitation as a modern form of slavery. Dozens of community groups, charities, trade unions, religious and secular alike, support the campaign, and our party has signed up to it. Amongst those organisations are the National Child Protection Training Centre, the National Women's Council of Ireland, One in Four Ireland, Rape Crisis Network, Immigrant Council of Ireland, Ruhama, Irish Refugee Council, SIPTU, the trade union movement, the Union of Students of Ireland and Women's Aid.

I want to single out Women's Aid. I have tremendous respect for it. What makes Women's Aid and groups like it different is that they are working day and daily with women and children who suffer violence, regardless of who they are. They are not involved at the academic level, and I respect academic research and reports, but I also accept that I have a right to disagree with them. They deal with it day in and day out.

They support and empower the women and children. They provide a safe place for the women and children when they are crying out for support. They are not getting enough support, and the women in the House from all parties will know that they need more support and more funding. I want to put it on record that, when I was Minister of Education, I put in place a programme to support Women's Aid so that it could train teachers in identifying children at risk at the earliest stage.

Sinn Féin has also tabled an amendment — amendment No 44 — calling on Minister Jim Wells to put in place support for women who want to exit prostitution and to work with other Departments to develop a strategy. We need a multi-agency approach; nobody can do this on their own. We will need to see real action on the part of Minister Wells rather than rhetoric, and resources need to be put alongside the Bill, if it is successful. I look forward to working with everyone in the House to ensure that that happens.

Mia de Faoite was mentioned, and I will quote her as I thought that she was particularly articulate. I will not quote some of the more distressing bits, because I do not think that I would be able to get through it. She said:

"Life on the street is complex. We led difficult and complex lives, and I would never be able to explain them in this short time. However, there are two issues that I would like to address today. The first is rape. Rape becomes part of the job, so much so that we do not really use the term 'rape'; we do not have permission to. We might allude to it, but then it is ignored and the subject is changed. Many people become desensitised to the pain of others because, if you acknowledge someone else's pain, you may just have to acknowledge your own."

She also said:

"Prostitution and sex trafficking are intrinsically linked: you have one because of the other. For the last 18 months of my time on the Burlington Road, I stood alongside a trafficked woman. She became my closest friend, and I have never seen a human being so broken down. The conditions in which she lived were inhumane, and, although we had arrived at the same place through different means, we were connected because we were bought, used, exploited, humiliated and raped by the same offenders. One night I would be bought, and, a few nights later, the same man would buy her. On a couple of occasions, we were bought together. That connection can never be broken by anyone at any time in any country."

Reading Ms de Faoite's evidence to the Committee was harrowing, and I pay tribute to her for speaking up on this important issue.

I have also listened to many people in the House talk about regulation and driving things underground. I have no doubt that, if we were living in a different century, we would be having the same debate here except that the term would be "slavery". Some people would have been saying, "You have to regulate and protect. Slaves are not from one country, one colour, one age or one language". I know that hindsight is a great thing, but would anyone in the House advocate that we should legislate and put slaves in a red light district so that we can protect and regulate them? I do not think so.

The debate that we are having today is taking place all over the world. We have an opportunity to show leadership and send out the message that this part of Ireland is not open for business for pimps and traffickers, that we will not criminalise prostitutes and that we will put in place mechanisms of support for women to exit prostitution. Supporting our amendments is the best way of sending a very clear message that the aim of the Bill is not to criminalise women involved in prostitution. In the aftermath of this debate and the Bill, I ask that we show understanding for different viewpoints and that we continue to engage, regardless of the outcome. I hope that the Bill goes through the House. We will play our role to ensure that it does.

Mr A Maginness: I do not intend to speak for too long. Many of the issues have been outlined by the Chair of the Committee in a succinct fashion in relation to the Committee's deliberations and the attitude that it adopted both in general terms and, in particular, on clause 6. Of course, the Minister, quite properly, presented his point of view in opposition to clause 6, a position that my SDLP colleagues and I disagree with. In fact, I have become a little impatient with this debate because we could have reached a unified position on the clause much earlier.

I am grateful to Ms Ruane for clarifying the position of her party, and I take that on board. However, the central issue is exploitation: the exploitation of a woman by a man.

That is it. It is as simple as that, and you do not have to go any further. It is exploitation by violence or economic superiority. There may be other reasons, too, but it is the exploitation by a man of a woman because he wants sex, he has the money and he is prepared to pay for it. In essence, that is what this is all about. If we ignore that, we are running away from the central issue of exploitation. It is a gross violation of any woman that this should happen. Some spurious arguments have been put forward, not, I believe, in the House but outside the House, on women choosing this as a working career. That is absolutely and utterly wrong, and it is important to nail that lie.

Mr Agnew: I thank the Member for giving way. I find it hard to understand why anyone, male or female — we have to acknowledge that there are male prostitutes — would choose that form of making money, but can he cite the evidence that contradicts the Minister's evidence that significant numbers do so? What evidence does he have that every circumstance involves coercion, poverty or lack of volition?

Mr A Maginness: I had the privilege to be a member of the Justice Committee. I heard the very clear evidence coming through, and I do not resile for one second from the position that I have expressed. I defy the Member to produce evidence to support the myth that there is such a thing as a happy hooker. It is a myth, and those who have exited prostitution will tell you that it is entirely erroneous — entirely wrong. We should not peddle myths in the House. We should be educating the public and the media, telling them that there is no such thing as an option and that women are forced into prostitution. That is the position, and we should act on that. We should do away with the notion that there is such a thing as a happy hooker who simply enjoys this so-called work, allows herself to be exploited and allows herself to become some sort of object of pleasure for a man with whom she has no loving relationship. Will the Member give way?

Mr A Maginness: Certainly, I will give way.

7.30 pm

Mr B McCrea: I have no doubt of the sincerity of the Member's position. However, does he think that the criminalisation of the purchase of sex by men will improve the situation considerably, or are there other things that we should take into consideration, such as education?

Mr A Maginness: I will come to that, but the short answer is that I do believe that the criminalisation of the purchaser will have a profound effect on prostitution. It has had a profound effect in other jurisdictions, particularly in the Nordic countries. The Nordic model — the Swedish model, as we call it — is something that we should attempt to emulate, and I do not think that there are any serious arguments against it. I said that the evidence was presented to the Committee. I will not repeat it all, but, if you had listened to Mia de Faoite or to Anna, who gave evidence to the Committee in private session, you would have been absolutely overwhelmed by their testimony, which was very impressive indeed.

Mr Agnew: I thank the Member for giving way. While I have no doubt that that evidence was compelling — we have heard some of it summarised today — the Member is well educated and knows that the testimony of one person does not represent the generality. We have to go from the general to the specific. That is why we need research, and the Minister has provided us with that. While many have questioned the validity of that research, I have yet to see counter-evidence to it.

Mr A Maginness: Huge amounts of research have been done on this, both nationally and internationally. The overwhelming conclusion that people have come to when asking whether women voluntarily enter into prostitution is that, no, they do not. They are exploited human beings. Ms Ruane made a very telling point about the parallel with slavery. This is a form of slavery. There is absolutely no doubt that it is a form of slavery. Nobody volunteers to do this, and to say otherwise is totally wrong and misleading.

Mr Givan: Will the Member give way?

Mr A Maginness: Yes, indeed.

Mr Givan: The Member says that it is totally misleading to give the contrary view that Mr Agnew and Mr McCrea seem to hold. Does the Member agree that that very benign view of prostitution is not borne out by the reality of the evidence that we heard? Can the Member cite for me any evidence that shows that prostitution is good for the woman? That is a salient point. Those who want to uphold the mythical right to choose in respect of the most vulnerable women, who are being exploited, present this as a right to choose, yet those women are in the depths of despair. That is not a choice. Where is the evidence that prostitution in any form is good for you?

Mr A Maginness: I agree. The Member expresses it very well. We did not come across such evidence, and I defy anybody in the House to produce it. The more evidence we heard, the more convinced we were that there was no such thing as a career choice. If you do not believe me, talk to Women's Aid. Some of the most powerful evidence came from Women's Aid. They are working with women in prostitution who are trying to exit prostitution. Do not take my word for it; talk to them. I have absolute confidence in their expertise in this field.

I am on the point about research. The Department has produced research from Queen's University. I will not go into the details of it, but the conclusion of Women's Aid on that research was that it was:

"deeply flawed and lacks a basic understanding of the links between prostitution, human trafficking and the spectrum of sexual exploitation that is taking place here in Northern Ireland."

For that reason, Women's Aid withdrew its name and moral authority from the research that had been produced. That is good enough for me. They are the people who know what this is all about. That was no fancy academic essay or fancy idea, but a reaction by them, given their experience, to a flawed research report. I put my trust in their judgement in relation to that report.

I had better deal with the Minister's position. He also said that he doubts the practicality of the provision. There may well be difficulties with the provision and with enforcement, but we have to test it. It is an advance on what we have and we have to test it. For the first time ever —

Mr Wilson: Will the Member give way?

Mr A Maginness: Yes, indeed.

Mr Wilson: Would the Member agree that almost any law enforcement produces practical difficulties on occasions? Rural crime and the stealing from farms across the countryside in Northern Ireland creates huge difficulties for the police because of the shortage of cars and manpower to patrol areas. Just because we find it difficult to patrol those areas or catch those people, it does not mean that we should not have a law and allow robbers to steal from farms. Would he agree that if we use the argument the Minister has used, there are a whole lot of things that the police are asked to do at the moment that we would simply tell them to give up on as they cannot possibly do them with ease?

Mr A Maginness: Of course, I agree with what the Member has said.

For the first time ever, the man will have to pay in terms of criminality. That is the difference and that is an important message to send across this society. Across this island, across these islands and across the UK, this will be the first time that that will have happened. We are setting a precedent. I think that we are setting a good precedent and that we can build on it. This law may not be perfect, but it is a good first step, and that is the important thing about it.

An argument was put forward — I think it was by the Minister; I do not know if I am right — that prostitution would simply go underground. The view that was expressed to the Committee was that prostitution is already underground. If you do not trust that then let me quote from an interview with Anna, who gave evidence to our Committee, in today's 'News Letter'. She stated that the Bill:

“will not drive vulnerable women underground”.

She continued:

“They are already underground. Nobody was coming to help me.”

That is a good answer to that argument about driving prostitution underground.

In relation to one other aspect — the change in the onus — paragraph 128 of the Committee's report shows that the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission advised the Committee that:

“in July 2013, the UN CEDAW Committee recommended to the UK Government that they revise their legislation by shifting the burden of proof from the prosecution to the purchaser of sexual services.”

That was another development internationally, and, indeed, international law is moving in that direction anyway. The Swedes, the Nordic countries, the lower House in the French Parliament, the Canadian Parliament and the European Parliament, through the Honeyball report, and there have been developments in other fora throughout the world. I think it is important that we bear those in mind. They have been mentioned already by Ms Ruane and by the Chair of the Committee.

Let me also say, in dealing with the Minister's argument, that the PSNI started off in a position of opposition to this but, fair credit to them, they moved their position, not as a result of political pressure but of clear arguments coming to them. They changed their minds, and people should give them credit for changing their minds from opposition to qualified support. Yes, they see difficulties in implementation and so forth, but it is right and proper for them to identify those difficulties. When this law was introduced in Sweden, the Swedish police said that they did not want it and were opposed to it, but now the Swedish police are advocates for this particular law. It is very important that we bear that in mind.

Finally, in relation to the change in law, let me say that law has an effect on society; law changes values in society. Somebody referred earlier to drink-driving. Most people now — the generality of people — are horrified by anybody drinking and driving. Ten or 20 years ago, people chanced their arm, and people did not see that as something antisocial. So the values have changed; and there is a normative effect in society when law changes. That sends out a very strong message, not simply to human traffickers but also to society at large, and young people in particular, that there has been an important value established by this law. I think that that —

Ms Ruane: Will the Member give way?

Mr A Maginness: Yes, Ms Ruane.

Ms Ruane: I absolutely appreciate the point you make about law. Another good example of that is the anti-smoking law. You would not go into a restaurant now and expect to see people smoking, whereas it was the norm before. There was not much intervention, although police forces, North and South, thought that it might be difficult. So I thank the Member for making that point.

Mr A Maginness: I thank Ms Ruane for that very effective intervention. Of course, when all those matters were being debated in relation to smoking, the police said that it was impossible for them to police or enforce that. However, if you go to the toughest areas of Belfast, you see people obeying the law in a right and proper fashion. There is a respect for the law, and people enjoy the change in atmosphere within establishments.

We are not in a position to support amendment No 29. We think it is late in the day. We do not think that the case has yet been proven in relation to it, and there could be abuse if the provision were passed. It could cause a public nuisance. However, I would say in relation to amendment No 29 that the current position in relation to soliciting is this: the PSNI, in its report to the Committee, said that over the past five years there had been no prosecutions. So it is not a matter of the police actively enforcing that particular provision, and I think that the current provision, whereby there is tolerance of such, should be preferred. We do not rule out a review of that position in the future, but at this moment we cannot support the amendment.

Amendment No 38 concerns the report on clause 6. I do not think it incompatible with clause 6(6), if I am correctly citing the Bill as it presently stands. Amendment No 38 has been brought by Sinn Féin. We support that particular amendment because it adds to clause 6. We are happy enough to support it. I will conclude there.

7.45 pm

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): The Minister has been in his place since Question Time and has indicated that he does not wish to be discourteous to the House by leaving the debate. I propose to suspend the sitting for a short break until 8.00 pm.

The sitting was suspended at 7.45 pm and resumed at 8.00 pm.

(Mr Principal Deputy Speaker [Mr Mitchel McLaughlin] in the Chair)

Mr Elliott: Clause 6 has caused much debate, probably much more than any other part of the Bill. Unfortunately, there were some quite aggressive debates in Committee and attempts, due to individual stances, at character assassination. I will not engage in any of that this evening.

I listened to the Minister speaking on the matter. I paraphrase what he said, but he suggested that the clause would not do what it is probably intended to do. That is one of the main bases of the Minister's arguments. I have sympathy with that position, and I believe that he is accurate in some ways. However, the problem is that there is nothing else here, and I think that Mr Maginness said that. There is nothing else in place to deal effectively with prostitution and the sale and purchase of sexual services.

A number of organisations and individuals, including the Presbyterian Church and the Methodist Church, highlighted potential problems. Indeed, the Police Service of Northern Ireland is still indicating that it has some issues with clause 6. However, in the absence of any legislation currently in statute or with the potential to be in statute at any time in the near future, this is all we have to improve the situation regarding the sale and purchase of sexual services.

I note that the Department of Justice last Friday published the research that was carried out by Queen's University. I will not try to discredit that research by any means; I do not think that that is my position. It came out only last Friday, and we have not had a reasonable opportunity to assess it. However, I am concerned that it came out just two days before this debate. If it had not been for Lord Morrow's Bill and clause 6, would we have had that research at all? Would the pressure have been there to progress other legislation that may come forward — I hope that it does — to deal with prostitution and the sale and purchase of sexual services? What we have is out of date and needs to be updated and upgraded. We do not have legislation at the moment, so clause 6 is all there is. We want a reduction in the sale of sexual services and prostitution, and what we have at the moment is the only means to provide support for that. If it speeds up further legislation, it will have been worth it. If it moves the Department to do further research and bring forward legislation in the future, clause 6 will have served that purpose as well.

Sinn Féin has tabled amendment No 29. Ms Ruane did not fully address many of the issues on which I have queries, but maybe they will be addressed by other Members. I do not know whether that amendment will be helpful in reducing prostitution. If it were helpful, I would find a way to support it, but I am not sure. It may encourage prostitution. If the offence of loitering and soliciting were removed, would that not encourage more prostitution? I am open to persuasion. The amendment has just come forward, but, at present, I have not heard enough to persuade me of its merits. I will listen to further debate.

The second amendment that I want to deal with is amendment No 37 from Lord Morrow, which would replace the part that puts responsibility on the Department to raise awareness of the offence. That responsibility is made somewhat more specific, in that Lord Morrow's amendment states that there must be an advertising campaign to raise awareness. I am just trying to get a basis for that. I am not saying that I oppose it; I just want to hear more information. I am sure that Lord Morrow will address the issue. I want more information on why the responsibility is not more broadly based, as was, I think, the original intent of the Bill, and why it is narrowed down to just an advertising campaign. Maybe, at Further Consideration Stage, we can look at how there could be more involvement and work with those in the sex trade in an attempt to persuade them and better educate them. That would be a much more broadly based situation than just an advertising campaign. Lord Morrow has just tabled the amendment, and I am happy to listen to what he has to say in the debate.

What I am trying to say and what I hope that I am saying is that I envisage difficulties with clause 6, but, as somebody asked earlier, what legislation comes without difficulties? I hope that it will pressurise the Department into making further legislation. It is all that we have at the moment, so we should take what we are getting and hope that it will lead to further legislation.

Mr Dickson: Clause 6 is, undoubtedly, the most controversial part of the Bill. It has generated most attention and, indeed, the longest and most rigorous part of the debate today. It is important that we debate clause 6, but it should not detract from what, I hope that Lord Morrow will agree, is the key part of his Bill, which is the human trafficking element — people brought into this country for domestic servitude or forced labour and other forms of human trafficking. I trust that the debate on clause 6 will not detract from what, I hope, he would describe as the key point of his Bill, which is human trafficking and the purposes for which it happens.

One clause is insufficient to deal with a subject such as the criminalisation of the purchase of sexual services. It is for that and other reasons, which I will explain, that I do not believe that clause 6 should stand part. Indeed, it may divert important attention and resources from the key import of the Bill, namely human trafficking. However, let me, for the avoidance of doubt, say that I believe that this should be the subject of a separate Bill — I pick up the point that Mr Elliott made — that can deal in detail with the complexities of the subject.

My opposition is based on evidence from looking at what happened in Sweden, where a similar model has been in place for 15 years. The reality is that criminalising the purchase of sex has not resulted in any demonstrable reduction in prostitution or trafficking in Sweden. Some reports suggest that the level of street prostitution has gone down, although that is disputed by those who have rigorously scrutinised the numbers. There is also no certainty that it has decreased permanently. Furthermore, the vast majority of prostitution is now off-street and online, but, some 15 years on in the Swedish experience, that is not surprising. As the research by Queen's University has now shown, it is also the case here that those arguing that the law has been successful seem to have equated the reduction in street prostitution with an overall reduction, which has not been proved. Indeed, in 2008, the Swedish National Board of Health and Welfare said:

"It is also difficult to discern any clear trend of development: has the extent of prostitution increased or decreased? We cannot give any unambiguous answer to that question."

The likely outcome of clause 6 is that it may drive the industry further underground and further marginalise sex workers, moving them to the so-called darknet, paramilitaries and drug dealers but no less accessible. They will be perceived de facto to be working in a criminal environment, which will undoubtedly increase stigma and substantially reduce the tolerance of them by society. The clause may act under the guise of protecting sex workers, but, for some, it will fuel an ideological position against prostitution and those who work as prostitutes.

We see that, in Sweden, rather than offering support and protection, for example, foreign sex workers are criminalised and deported. It will be more difficult for sex workers to avail themselves of important essential services to protect themselves or to leave prostitution. There is evidence in Sweden of sex workers moving off the streets and into underground work, following the criminalisation of purchase, as well as urgent and panicked arrangements leaving prostitutes with little time to assess clients for risk, making it more dangerous for the women involved. Similarly, there is more reluctance on the part of those who buy sex online to give any identifying information that may lead to their prosecution, again preventing the proper vetting of clients and leaving sex workers more vulnerable to abuse. There is evidence from two Swedish researchers who said that a sex worker with whom they had worked through fieldwork had now lost count of the number of times that she had been raped by men who had not provided appropriate personal information and were now untraceable. It is important to note that the same sex worker said that she had not been raped before the purchase of sex was criminalised in Sweden in 1999.

Crucially for the Bill's primary objective, there is evidence that the criminalisation of purchase in Sweden has discouraged clients from reporting incidents of trafficking and abuse. Those involved in fieldwork in Sweden have been able to directly establish this by talking to the purchasers of sex. This principle is why I believe that clause 6 has the potential to be ineffective in reducing trafficking and to create a more dangerous situation for those who are trafficked for sexual exploitation.

Other Members across the House know that to be true. From Committee discussions and plenary debates, we were, at least, strongly led to believe that members of Sinn Féin had reservations about clause 6. It is remarkable and extremely disappointing how suddenly that questioning has simply collapsed, with minds made up before the initial research from Queen's University was published. When Rosie McCorley of Sinn Féin told the Assembly on 23 September 2013 that her party needed detailed information from research on the impact on women involved in prostitution before it could make a decision on clause 6, she said that she looked forward to seeing the Department's research. Yet, the amendments from Mr McCartney, Mr Lynch and Mr Hazzard were clearly formulated and submitted before the Minister circulated the initial findings of the Queen's University research at the end of last week.

That research tells us, as we have heard from others in the House, that only 2% of sex workers think that the purchase of sex should be made illegal; 61% of Northern Ireland-based sex workers surveyed thought that it would make them less safe; 85% believe that it will not reduce sex trafficking; and only 8% of clients said that it would make them stop purchasing sex. The overwhelming weight of evidence is against clause 6 in its current form. It is opposed by the vast majority of sex workers, whom the Bill seeks to protect. Yet, the Assembly is on the verge of passing it into law. That, I believe, is an indictment of this institution. Strength of feeling is trumping the evidence on how we best protect some of the most vulnerable people in society. This is clearly a case of heart over head, ideology over practicality and, for Sinn Féin, control from party leadership in the Republic of Ireland.

It shows how little progress has been made in involving sex workers and properly considering their views on policies relating to them. It is, quite frankly, astounding that the only piece of independent research telling us what the sex industry looks like in Northern Ireland has been, by and large, rubbished and ignored by those who wish to support clause 6. I suspect that that is because it is telling them what they do not want to know or hear.

8.15 pm

I remind Members of the written evidence given to the Committee by members of the national working group on prostitution and exploitation and by Tamara Barnett, senior researcher for policing and crime in the Greater London Authority. She told us:

"Those working with sex workers state that criminalisation of either the client or sex worker can result in dangerous and sometimes fatal consequences for sex workers. This is particularly the case for on-street sex workers, since criminalisation often leads to displacement, forcing sex workers to work in less well lit, more dangerous and less well known areas."

Members should think very carefully, and consider the warnings, about the potential for fatal results from criminalisation. If, in the next three years, it can be shown that even one sex worker has been beaten, raped or murdered as a result of the legislative change made by the Assembly, those consequences will forever haunt this institution.

It is clear that our approach to prostitution should not be dealt with in one clause of a Bill on human trafficking. It is a much wider, more complicated issue that urgently needs to be considered separately. I commend groups such as Amnesty International, which, in the face of public opinion, has highlighted the deep flaws in clause 6. It is extremely important that those points have been made. We have in front of us a clause that should, in my view, not stand part of the Bill. I urge Members to follow the evidence and oppose it, and, in doing so, issue a call for separate legislation to deal with this complex matter.

Ms P Bradley: Like others in the House, I commend Lord Morrow for bringing the Bill forward. I know that he has applied great commitment and, I say on a personal level, has sat with me, on many occasions, to explain his rationale and alleviate any concerns I may have had, especially around the rights and empowerment of women. I know that he has done that with many people; when asked to sit down and explain, he has been more than generous with his time and has offered explanations to anyone who has asked for them.

In my comments on clause 6, I will first focus specifically on the letter that we received from the Minister of Justice on Thursday informing us of the research that was published on Friday. Then, I will focus on the research itself.

The letter from the Minister suggests that one of the main problems with clause 6 is the opposition of the police; the Minister claims they say that the offence is unenforceable. However, that is flatly contradicted by the evidence given to the Justice Committee by the police. In February this year, the now Assistant Chief Constable, Drew Harris, was asked whether the PSNI was against the legislation. He said, not once but three times, that the PSNI was not opposed. Moreover, when asked about the legislation in September last year and whether the police would enforce it, the then Chief Constable, Matt Baggott, far from suggesting that the offence was unenforceable — and there was an ideal opportunity to say then that it was unenforceable — said, “Absolutely. That is our job.”

I now turn to the research itself. I am glad that it has been brought up. Much mention was made of it earlier in the debate, and I am glad to be able to speak on it because I feel that it was flawed. When the Minister commissioned the research in September 2013, just before the Second Stage of the Bill and 13 months after Lord Morrow first consulted on his Bill, he would have been aware that it would be at least a year before the research would come out. The argument then would have been that Members should reject clause 6 until we had the research or, as has now proven the case due to the date of Consideration Stage, that clause 6 would have to be rejected until the findings of the report could be considered.

Amanda Patterson, a Department of Justice official, was clear in the evidence that she provided to the Justice Committee back in March. She was asked by a Member for Foyle from the party opposite why the Department could not seek to work with Lord Morrow to ensure that the research was published before Consideration Stage. Her response was that clause 6 should be rejected even if Lord Morrow delayed, because:

“There would be too much coming out of the research to make a decision in a short time, because we would have to consider its findings. There may be recommendations that involve other people and having to consult other people. I do not think that it would work.”

If another Department wants a great example of the textbook way to try to topple a proposal, the way that the Department of Justice has proceeded in considering clause 6 provides one.

If anyone has any doubts about what I have said about the Department’s motivation, these must be blown away when we look at the researchers that they appointed. I know that Mr Wilson has also spoken about this. It is well known that academia is hugely divided on the question of whether criminalising demand is a good idea, not so much on the basis of the interpretation of the data but rather on the basis of the answers of scholars, like anyone else, in response to the underlying question of whether there are any circumstances in which you regard selling sex as an acceptable form of employment. People have very strong views on this, and academics who answer yes to that question are, not surprisingly, completely opposed to criminalising paying for sex.

In this context, if one is to use public monies to conduct a review, it is imperative to assemble a balanced research team. Far from doing that, the Department assembled a group including published opponents of criminalising paying for sex — led by some who had already gone on the record in their opposition to clause 6 — that, not surprisingly, did not contain a single scholar who has been published in favour. The academics then proceeded to select an advisory group that was something of a who’s who of critics of the approach of criminalising the purchase of sexual services. It even included one academic who is chair of the Sex Workers Alliance Ireland. Consequently, it should come as no great shock to anyone that the research was so critical of the criminalisation approach.

Rather than acting like a Government Department providing a proper review —

Mr Agnew: Will the Member give way?

Ms P Bradley: No, I will not. I am sure that you will have time to speak later.

The Department has acted like a think tank with a very clear agenda. However, I do have sympathy for these academics in some regards. First, the document that was produced, although deeply flawed, is actually a lot more nuanced than the Department of Justice’s summary of findings. The Department of Justice did not include in its summary of the research any of the caveats that the researchers included in the text of the document, some of which I will come to in a few moments. The Department was also selective in the quotations from the report that they chose to highlight. This is not a surprise considering the political goal that they had for the research, which was to kick clause 6 to the kerb.

Secondly, I think that the researchers were probably quite rushed in preparing the document and conducting the fieldwork involved. The Department of Justice timetable involved here was a tight one, due to political considerations that it had in commissioning the research. This may have led to some of the methodology flaws in the research document.

I would now like to draw attention to some of the flaws that have been flagged up to me and that I have noticed in the research document. First, the use of an online survey as a basis for many of the conclusions drawn is of significant concern. I am informed by academics who have contacted me about this piece of research that online surveys are typically very selective and not very reliable in dealing with personal and emotional issues, of which this is certainly one. As the authors admit, this strategy was used not because it was the most appropriate strategy but because it was the most convenient one. This may well have been the case, because the researchers simply did not have the time to engage with more individuals face to face. The authors admit that face-to-face interviews would produce more reliable and authentic results, but they undertook an online survey, again, because it was most convenient.

In paragraph 2.6.12 of the report, the authors make a revealing statement with regard to the nature of the online survey that they utilised. They state that:

“It is also possible that sex workers with a relatively high degree of choice and independence about their working conditions are over-represented, and women, men and transgender persons, who are, to varying degrees, controlled by someone else, are underrepresented."

To my mind, that is an admission that those who are in prostitution who have been trafficked and who are controlled will have been unable to take part in the online survey, for obvious reasons. It is highly unlikely that they will have private internet access, and it is hard to believe that they would be allowed to take part in such research by their pimps or controllers. Despite that highly significant flaw, the researchers continue to assert that the online survey is reliable, and they go on to make a number of bold claims about the status of prostitution in Northern Ireland on the back of it, which the Department of Justice has repeated.

It is acknowledged that the researchers conducted 19 face-to-face surveys, but that is a very small sample from which to draw any meaningful conclusions. By way of comparison, a recent study conducted by Professor Roger Matthews and a number of academic researchers for a study into exiting from prostitution conducted face-to-face interviews with 114 women. They are more cautious about their findings than the academics involved in producing this research were.

Furthermore, the research openly acknowledges that fewer than half of the respondents, 46%, said that they sold sex in Northern Ireland. That means that the majority of respondents sold sex outside Northern Ireland. That is a major consideration, because, when the Minister proposed research, the point was made that it was not necessary since there was already an abundance of research. To that, the Minister responded that he wanted specific research on Northern Ireland. What he has done, though, is provide research that tells us far more about the rest of the British Isles than it does about Northern Ireland.

Sixty thousand pounds of the budget was spent on this research, and it turns out that the majority of the data does not even relate to Northern Ireland. The fact that the majority of the respondents do not sell sex in Northern Ireland has enormous implications for the findings, since it is virtually impossible to know whether responses are by those selling sex in Northern Ireland. Therefore, many of the claims made in the report cannot be relied on since over half of the sample live elsewhere.

Finally, as the author noted, after putting a case for the use of an opportunistic sampling frame, as is stated on page 31 of the report, one of the disadvantages of sampling frames is that some people will be more inclined to respond to the survey than others, and it is difficult to know which sub-population is over-represented. Estimates of the population size of sex workers and the clients on the basis of such data alone are, therefore, unreliable.

That knowledge of the serious limitations of the data does not prevent the authors going on to make a number of unjustified and unreliable claims. The implications of the selected and distorted nature of a sample and the lumping together of different types of sex workers, most of whom do not operate in Northern Ireland, mean that the principal aims of this research were not met. To my mind, considering the manifest flaws in this research, it seems apparent that the House should pay little heed.

Clause 6 outlines an approach that has proven effective in other jurisdictions and which will send a strong signal that paying for sex is not conduct that we will tolerate in Northern Ireland, with all that it means for trafficking and wider exploitation.

I finish with this, Mr Deputy Speaker. Before I became an MLA, I had a career as a police officer, and I worked in social services. I dealt with many horrific stories of vulnerable people. One sticks out clearly in my mind. We talk about child exploitation and trafficking, but let us not be so naive: this is happening in Northern Ireland on a daily basis.

I know of one child, whom I found out about and got to speak with. She was a young girl of 11. At 11 years old, she was selling oral sex to men — grown men — for as little as a few cigarettes. This is happening on our streets. We need to stop that. We need to prosecute those men for what they are doing to our children.

8.30 pm

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: There is an awful lot of background noise, which does not help us to follow the debate.

Mr McCartney: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. Do not tolerate it while I am on my feet.

Caitriona Ruane laid out in a longer way than I will our support for clause 6, and she gave a comprehensive explanation of why we are supporting clause 6. I welcome the fact that there is an intention from the Democratic Unionist Party to support our amendment on soliciting and loitering. That is where I want to turn my attention first. Alban Maginness and Tom Elliott said that the lateness with which we tabled the amendment did not allow them to have a proper go at this. I appreciate that, and, perhaps, we should have done it a bit earlier, but timescales and deadlines always pose challenges.

Throughout our deliberations, particularly at Committee Stage, we had the view that, if we were doing this as an attempt to say on behalf of the Assembly and, indeed, the people whom we represent that we had a very clear issue with prostitution, we should be taking steps to decriminalise the actual prostitution. We would be sending a clear message to prostitutes that we do not consider them as part of the criminalisation that will take place as a part of this legislation. Alban Maginness, in a way, brought this down into a very short sentence when he said that at the core of this was the issue of exploitation. Indeed, Tom Elliott, if I picked him up correctly, agreed with that sentiment. Alban went on to say that it was a form of slavery. That is the context and the approach that we took on amendment No 29. If people were involved in slavery, you would not want to have in place a law that would criminalise someone for being a slave. That is the approach that we have taken to repealing the issues around soliciting and loitering. It is to send a very clear message to the people who are being exploited that in no way will we permit or allow a process of criminalisation when we are trying to tackle this complex issue. That is what was behind the framing of that amendment. I am not sure what way the vote will go tonight, but I appreciate that you may take more time and that maybe this is something that we might have to revisit at Further Consideration Stage. We will not count the votes in advance.

Alban Maginness has made the point tonight and consistently throughout our deliberations and scrutiny about the normative effect that changing the law can have. We would send a clear signal to the people who, we accept, are vulnerable and who, we accept, are being exploited that changing or repealing the law in this way would allow them to feel that they are not part of the process and are not to blame and therefore should not be charged or criminalised as a result of some of their vulnerabilities and some of their exploitation. That is the context in which we tabled that amendment.

Amendment No 38 relates to reporting. We feel that it is a good way, and I think that everybody accepts that it is the first go that this Assembly or, indeed, any legislature on these islands has had at bringing about this type of legislation. It is not a bad precedent to set that, after a period, we will reflect on its effect. We all accept that there is no point in having legislation in place and then finding out that it has no real effect. The reporting mechanism ensures that, in two or three years, as we have framed it, people will be able to look back and say, "Here is the effect that we had". If there are gaps and issues around arrests or convictions or if people who leave prostitution are not given the services and resources that are framed in this legislation and that it intends to give, that needs to be addressed. That is a good appraisal of it in three years' time.

One thing that struck me is that there is no doubt that the PSNI — Caitríona Ruane and others have touched on this — had a particular position and then changed it. In fairness to them, in the middle of it, they said that the Nordic model was based around surveillance and, in particular, phone tapping. In this legislation, phone tapping would not be permitted under our RIPA laws. Therefore, that is the type of thing that we have to monitor in three years' time. That is why we feel that the amendment around the progress report is necessary.

There has been much mention tonight of Pádraig Mac Lochlainn. Indeed, the Chair spoke about him in very glowing terms. Jim Wells is not here, but, if you go back through the Hansard reports of many of our Committee meetings, you will see that the name Pádraig Mac Lochlainn featured in nearly every evidence session. In fact, I think that he could be the first Sinn Féin member to address a DUP conference. He will be waiting for that invite in the future.

Stewart Dickson was there — he is not in his place now — when we went to Dublin and met the Joint Oireachtas Committee. The Oireachtas report had concluded. It was an 800-page report, and there were hundreds of witnesses. The question was asked about the two processes that were in place. One had taken place in Dublin, and the other was unfolding up here. He said very stridently that all of us should come at this with an open mind. He found himself on a journey, and the journey took him from having a particular position to another position. That is the way that we approached the issue.

Stewart Dickson mentioned the research, and Tom Elliott also touched on it. Obviously, the Department and the researchers were under a fair degree of pressure, but the Bill was tabled last year. It went to Committee Stage around November, so it was reasonable enough for us to expect that the research would have been at a more advanced stage than it was. If Stewart Dickson was of the view that we could be convinced by the research to take a different position from the one that we have now taken on clause 6, the emphasis or onus was on the Department to come up with that research a bit quicker. I suppose that the easy way out of this is to say that Dublin made up its mind and we followed for whatever reason, but we have a very clear approach to the matter. We listened to the evidence, and there is absolutely no doubt that many of the people who came in front of the Committee and gave evidence — I think that Alban Maginness mentioned Women's Aid and the Irish Congress of Trade Unions — made very powerful arguments on this.

Again, there might be a debate about whether there are some people who do this and believe that they are not being exploited. That might be the case, but the strength of the evidence and the approach taken by most people was that the overwhelming majority of people who find themselves in the clutches of prostitution do not do it willingly. They believe that they were forced into it, perhaps by circumstances beyond their control. There may not be physical enforcement, but they found themselves enforced. In that light and with that in mind, we support clause 6.

Mrs Cameron: I support the Bill tabled by my colleague Lord Morrow and welcome the opportunity to take part in the debate this evening. I will also take the opportunity to thank Lord Morrow for the valuable work that he has done to bring this important Bill before the House today.

Since the days of Thomas McCabe and Mary Ann McCracken, Northern Ireland has had a rich abolitionist heritage in respect of slavery. Yet, over 200 years since the Abolition of the Slave Trade Act and 181 years since slavery was made illegal in the United Kingdom, thousands of vulnerable and disadvantaged people are still trapped as slaves in our so-called modern, progressive society. Those people are the evidence of a modern-day form of slavery that is hidden in plain sight and walks amongst us daily.

Human trafficking has many manifestations, including forced labour, domestic enslavement and criminal exploitation, with the sexual exploitation of women and children the most common type. All of those serve only to suppress and humiliate people and reduce them to little more than tradable commodities. As a legislature, we must ensure the passage of the Bill in order to protect the vulnerable and voiceless in our society and provide them with viable alternatives and support to return them to life rather than simply an existence.

Human trafficking is often a detached and displaced crime with the coordinators, in many cases, based in different countries as part of shadowy, faceless organisations. As we see a growing number of ethnic minorities being trafficked, it is clear that those organisations prey on the most vulnerable, particularly women who are already at risk, be it due to ethnic cleansing or caste systems or simply by virtue of their gender. The victims are selected, groomed and traded like possessions, perhaps most poignantly on the promise of a better life that, we all know, is rarely, if ever, the case. As they are often people who, to all intents and purposes, do not exist in their own country, we must do all that we can to help them when they arrive in our country through no choice of their own. As the UK and Republic of Ireland Governments have moved to enact similar legislation, it is vital that Northern Ireland puts in place similar measures to ensure that we do not become a conduit for human trafficking across Europe or allow our country to be used by organisations as a business address for their dealings in other jurisdictions.

In 1999, Sweden was the first country to pass legislation to prohibit the purchase of sexual services. Whilst the argument against clause 6 focuses on the assumption that criminalising the purchaser of sexual services will drive prostitution underground, a 2010 study demonstrated that street prostitution had halved. It also proved that there was no evidence of an increase in off-street prostitution. In addition, significant evidence was provided that that law had deterred human trafficking. Further to that, in April 2014, the Council of Europe recognised that sex buyer laws were the most effective tool for preventing and combating trafficking in human beings. The recommendations included counselling centres, providing prostitutes with legal and health assistance and exit programmes for those who wish to give up prostitution. It is clear that the so-called Nordic model offers many valuable lessons by way of ensuring that there is proper support for those who have been trafficked into prostitution and demonstrates that it is possible to ensure that they are properly protected from exploitation and humiliation. We must focus our efforts on providing support services for those exiting prostitution to make their transaction as easy as possible, whether that be by providing counselling, drug rehabilitation, educational programmes or health advice.

I tend not to use figures from opinion polls in speeches, as, in most cases, they are open to interpretation over some aspect of how they were gathered. I do not intend to change my view on that for the purposes of today's debate. I am, however, a passionate supporter of Women's Aid, and I am on the record numerous times speaking up for the organisation and about the valuable work it does. When that organisation came out so strongly against the research findings that it has withdrawn its support for the departmental panel looking into this aspect of the Bill, I was naturally inclined to pay great heed to its views.

We are increasingly surrounded by headlines of historical sexual abuse that has been covered up by many prominent organisations and institutions, and I find it incredible that those calling for the further investigation of past abuses cannot fully support the attempts to defeat the ongoing abuse that is being inflicted on the most vulnerable people in our midst. Sadly, not all the individuals trapped in abuse and slavery because of trafficking can find the voice or the courage of those brave enough to come forward to highlight and challenge the appalling horror that has been inflicted on them for the sexual gratification of individuals.

There are those in the House who may argue that individuals who sell or pay for sex are entitled to do so if that is what they individually choose to do, but I am much more concerned for those who have no choice and no voice. That is why I support the Bill.

8.45 pm

Mr McGlone: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. Mo bhúiochas as éisteacht a thabhairt domh. I appreciate the opportunity to talk about the Bill.

Some concerns have been expressed about the unintended consequences of clause 6 on those involved in prostitution. If I picked the Minister up correctly, he said that it could create difficulties in law enforcement and might not act to protect women who provide sexual services. I think that this is very important because, until I heard evidence at the Justice Committee, I could have been influenced one way or the other. On one side of the debate was the argument that, if you go ahead with this, you drive prostitution underground; on the other side was the argument that quite the opposite was true.

Women's Aid came before the Committee and other Members referred to Women's Aid. They are the people who have to help women to pick up the pieces of their lives when they have been abused, brutalised and, in this instance, sexually assaulted, manipulated, trafficked or whatever it may be. It is very important that I read into the record what Women's Aid said:

"Women's Aid supports the provisions within clause 6 of the Bill, which criminalises those who purchase sexual services. Given that the majority of human trafficking in Northern Ireland is for the purposes of sexual exploitation, we believe it is crucial to tackle the demand that fuels this heinous crime and send a strong message that anyone buying sexual services here or worldwide is supporting sexual slavery and the degradation of human rights. We are joined in our belief that criminalising the buying of sex is the way forward in tackling human trafficking by the End Violence Against Women coalition (EVAW); European Women's Lobby (EWL); Equality Now; Turn Off the Red Light Campaign in the Republic of Ireland, whose members include the Immigrant Council of Ireland, Ruhama, Barnardos, Rape Crisis Network Ireland, ICTU, the Labour Party, SIPTU, Soroptimist International Ireland, and a host of other NGOs, trade unions and charities.

Clause 6 of the Bill would implement a similar response to prostitution and human trafficking as the model used in Sweden, which was introduced there in 1999 ... According to a report by Swedish police in 2010, the law criminalising buyers of sexual services has successfully deterred many criminal networks from considering Sweden as an option for trafficking or pimp-led organised prostitution. The report also states that there has been a significant decrease in on-street prostitution, that the numbers of sexual services sold via Internet/off-street means are still much smaller than neighbouring countries Denmark and Norway, and that the proportion of prostituted persons from other countries had not exploded in the way it had elsewhere.

On the other hand, in countries where prostitution has been legalised, there has been no improvement in the situation of those in prostitution or decrease in human trafficking.

In the Netherlands, a 2007 report for the Ministry of Justice concluded, 'There has been no significant improvement of the situation of persons in prostitution'. This has been corroborated by other studies and criminal cases, in which exploitation, trafficking and coercion have been found to exist within legal, licensed brothels. 'The prostitutes' emotional well-being is now lower than in 2001 on all measured aspects. The use of sedatives has increased.'

Options for leaving the industry were in high demand, while only 6% of municipalities offer assistance.

Several other countries have followed Sweden's lead in criminalising the purchase of sex."

As we speak here tonight, I have heard no valid reason why we should not support clause 6. Other Members have deliberated on it, and the Minister has reservations. Frankly, I do not understand those reservations because I, too, heard the evidence from the police — from Drew Harris — who said that they could support clause 6. Frankly, I do not understand the position that the Minister has put himself in or found himself in.

Finally, and very briefly —

Mr B McCrea: Will the Member give way?

Mr McGlone: Yes, OK.

Mr B McCrea: You mentioned Drew Harris. The Official Report shows that he said:

“The criminalisation of the purchasing of sexual services may add a further impediment, and it can reasonably be anticipated that it may add a further impediment to individuals who are prosecuted coming forward to police to make complaints”.

That is why the Minister has a problem, because Drew Harris said that criminalisation has implications that are not fully understood but which can be anticipated to be detrimental.

Mr McGlone: I thank the Member for that, but had he read on a wee bit further, he would have found that Mr Harris clarified his position and that of the PSNI in regard to this matter. He highlighted that later on when the Chair of the Committee challenged it and got further clarification from the police on their position.

Mr B McCrea: What is your response to my question?

Mr McGlone: Sorry, if I could speak.

Mr Givan: Will the Member give way?

Mr McGlone: Yes.

Mr Givan: The Member for Mid Ulster is exactly right. It has been stated time and time again that the PSNI moved away from its original written submission, but the evidence session was unequivocal. They support clause 6 with some qualifications, but they think that it is and will be an effective tool for serious organised crime. That is where they anticipate using it to best effect.

To put it on the record, I spoke with the Chief Constable about this issue over the weekend. I contacted his office and he has assured me, in writing, from the Deputy Chief Constable on his behalf, that the PSNI supports clause 6. I am happy to put that correspondence in the Library to verify that for Members' benefit.

Mr McGlone: That would be very welcome. I thank the Chair for that further clarity. Hopefully, that would put Mr McCrea's reservations on clause 6 to bed.

Finally, and briefly, my colleague Alban Maginness referred to the lateness of amendment No 29's introduction. Frankly, I do not understand it. It proposes to repeal article 59:

“Loitering or soliciting for purposes of prostitution”.

I possibly could be convinced, although, at this stage, I do not understand why or how you would remove that tool from the range of services and enabling legislation that police have to address some problems that have arisen previously on the streets in this city, in Belfast. I am not entirely sure of the rationale behind amendment No 29, although I am sure that some Sinn Féin Members will clarify their thinking and rationale.

That is my contribution in support of clause 6; I look forward to the rest of the debate.

Mrs Hale: I wish to speak against the Minister of Justice's amendment seeking to remove clause 6.

One of the major drivers for human trafficking in this country is for the purposes of sexual exploitation. The national referral mechanism (NRM) figures, which I acknowledge are flawed but which provide the only official figures that we have, show that a majority of those trafficked into Northern Ireland were trafficked for the purposes of sexual exploitation. We must ask why these individuals are being trafficked into Northern Ireland to work in prostitution. The answer is simple: people in Northern Ireland — mostly men — want to buy them, and they can buy them.

The grim reality is that none of those who pay to use the bodies of trafficked people has faced any consequences whatsoever for what they have done. Not a single person has been charged or convicted of the offence of paying for sex with a person who has been coerced, as outlined in article 64A of the Sexual Offences (Northern Ireland) Order 2008. It is most certainly not the case that no one has paid for sex with a trafficked person in Northern Ireland since 2009. I do not think that anyone in the Chamber would be so naive as to believe that. The truth of the matter is that the offence introduced in 2009 has been an abject failure. Clearly, the current offence is not an offence worth having.

The reason why it has failed is twofold. First, our criminal justice system has been unable to successfully prosecute on the offence within the six-month time bar. To be fair, Minister Ford has suggested an amendment to remove that time bar. However, it should be added that he has done so only in response to this Bill.

Mr Ford: Will the Member give way?

Mrs Hale: I am happy to.

Mr Ford: Will the Member accept that I had intended to legislate on that issue, but that this Bill provided the means by which to do so?

Mrs Hale: I thank the Minister for his intervention. I was going to say that, but he has now saved me the bother.

Secondly, the offence has failed due to its caveat nature and complexities in prosecution. While it is true that the offence is a strict liability offence, meaning that whether the buyer knows or does not know whether the seller has been trafficked or exploited is irrelevant, it is still necessary to prove that the seller has been coerced into providing the service. It is not always clear-cut that an individual has been coerced, and it can be difficult to substantiate. That is underlined by the fact that it is not the experience of Northern Ireland alone.

Other places have been tempted by the idea of addressing demand for paid sex simply by targeting transactions with those who have been subject to force, and their efforts in that regard have been sadly ineffective. A good example to consider is Finland. In 2013, the Finnish Ministry of Justice conducted a review of the law in Finland, which, like Northern Ireland, only criminalised the purchase of sexual services from individuals who have been trafficked. The review found that the law was not doing enough to protect victims of human trafficking and argued that the criminalisation of the purchase of sexual services would have a much stronger impact and would be easier to monitor.

It is my contention that, even with the change advocated by the Department of Justice today, the current caveated offence will not be nearly as effective in tackling human trafficking as clause 6 of Lord Morrow's Bill. If the House were to agree with the Minister that his amendment is a better way forward, I predict that it will not be long before we would back here considering the issue after the amendment failed to tackle the real problem.

The Minister of Justice is seeking to resist clause 6 on the basis of the research that he published on Friday. To my mind, that research was commissioned as a wrecking tactic to try to destroy clause 6. As we know, Lord Morrow launched his consultation on the Bill in August 2012. Minister Ford proceeded to announce that he was going to launch research into prostitution only in September 2013, over a year later. The selected researchers only began work in April 2014, with a final document only being released on Friday of last week. Much has been said about the findings of the document, and I will leave it at that. It was manifestly obvious from the beginning that the purpose of the research was to derail clause 6. It was like a tactic straight out of 'Yes Minister'. The hope was that Lord Morrow would either remove his clause or postpone bringing his Bill forward.

As Mr Wilson and Ms Bradley said, the research team did not contain a single published supporter of criminalising paying for sex. It did, however, include published opponents, including the lead researcher, who had already entered the debate specifically on clause 6 prior to being selected and had said that clause 6 should be removed from the Bill without replacement. However, many academics do not share that view. For example, 75 academics signed an open letter in support of the Honeyball amendment that went before the European Parliament in 2013. They included many eminent figures.

If the Department had wanted a wider perspective, it could have insisted on a balanced panel with some academics who believe that prostitution is a legitimate form of work and some who do not, but it did not do that. In my opinion, that is a terrible shame, considering the fact that the Department of Justice spent £60,000 of taxpayers' money on that research. The Minister has consistently stated that his Department is short of cash, which I have no doubt is true given these strained financial times. However, he felt that he could spend £60,000 on a flawed study, which is more than the cost of a regional rapporteur for Northern Ireland.

I will now respond to the criticism —

Ms Lo: Will the Member give way?

Mrs Hale: I am happy to give way,

Ms Lo: Does the Member agree that law and policy should be based on evidence, and that it was quite right that the Minister spent money to commission the research?

Mr Poots: Will the Member further give way?

Mrs Hale: Yes.

Mr Poots: Is it not the case that the evidence provided was extremely poor? The consequence of that is that, very sadly, reputational damage has been done to an organisation in the form of Queen's University Belfast, which many of us respect. That reputational damage has been done as a result of how the report was produced. As has been quite rightly pointed out, it is £60,000 wasted.

Mrs Hale: Thank you.

Ms Lo: Will the Member give way?

Mrs Hale: One final time, Ms Lo.

Ms Lo: In response to Mr Poots's comments —

Mr Dickson: [Inaudible.]

Mr McCarthy: I did not speak. It was him.

Ms Lo: Sorry, I got distracted. I have suddenly forgotten what I was going to say.

Mrs Hale: Maybe the Member would like to respond during her speech.

Ms Lo: Forget it. I will come back.

Mrs Hale: I will now respond to the criticism that is regularly levelled at clause 6 by those who say that it confuses prostitution with trafficking. That simply does not stand up to scrutiny as we have heard.

First, as I have said, the NRM shows that over half of those trafficked in Northern Ireland since 2009 were trafficked to meet the demand for paid sex. Secondly, the Bill has never been just about trafficking; it has always been called the Human Trafficking and Exploitation Bill. It addresses challenges where no element of trafficking is present, including the sale of sex. To my mind, it is clear that, regardless of whether an element of trafficking is present, the experience of most people in prostitution is one of exploitation. That was eloquently demonstrated, for example, through the inquiry into prostitution published this year by Westminster's all-party parliamentary group on prostitution and the global sex trade:

"the group took a large volume of consistent and highly compelling evidence that women involved in prostitution were regularly survivors of child sexual abuse; had entered below the age of 18; had problematic patterns of drug and alcohol misuse; or had been targeted having been in care."

Having worked for a long time with young people and children in care, I know that this is a very serious issue and that they are targeted by pimps and traffickers in their area. Extreme poverty was also regularly cited and, in some cases, all those factors were sadly, and horrifically, present. The report was also highly critical of the English offence equivalent to article 64A, saying that it:

"fails to account for the complex nature of coercion. Coercion is often a subtle and manipulative process. The language of 'choice' assumes a range of options. More often the decision to enter prostitution is led by poverty, drug or alcohol dependency, or patterns of abusive behaviour."

9.00 pm

For most people entry into prostitution is not the result of a positive choice on the part of the individual but is caused rather by a lack of choice. That point was made eloquently again and again by submissions to the Justice Committee, as we have heard. Annie Campbell of Women's Aid said:

"Prostitution is not a choice; it is a trap that women and girls are lured into or fall into."

And Clare Moore of the Irish Congress of Trade Unions summarised the evidence well when she said:

"Many of the women involved in the sex industry had no real choice. Poverty and life circumstances combined with deception and exploitation are evident in many of their stories. We believe that for, most of those involved, prostitution is rooted in poverty, marginalisation and desperation and linked histories of abuse and violence."

Do we want a law that serves the interests of pimps and traffickers or one that serves the best interests of vulnerable children, men and women and challenges the primary driver for trafficking into Northern Ireland? As the current offence has illustrated so very eloquently, we cannot have a law that serves both interests. We in the House have to make a choice. We need a law that serves the best interests of the vulnerable men, women and children and challenges the primary driver for trafficking into our Province. That is the option presented to us by clause 6.

In closing, I should say that I am glad that Lord Morrow has put forward an amendment to ensure that much-needed support is provided to help people to exit prostitution. That has been of central importance in countries that have criminalised demand, and the need for its provision was actually highlighted by Mr Wells, prior to his becoming Health Minister, at the Second Reading of Lord Morrow's Bill in September last year. The point was also made by a significant number of organisations to the Justice Committee during the Committee Stage — for example, Women's Aid, Ruhama, the ICTU and SPACE International — and Lord Morrow has listened and responded.

I do not claim that criminalising the purchase of sexual services will end prostitution in Northern Ireland. No legislation could achieve that. Laws against theft and murder have not managed to eradicate those crimes, yet they have sent a normative signal that such practices are unacceptable in our society and, crucially, help to reduce their occurrence. I believe that clause 6 can perform a similar function. I urge Members, no matter where you are coming from, to please support — for their sake — clause 6 today and reject the attempt by the Minister of Justice to remove it from the Bill. Finally, I must say that Lord Morrow's vision and tenacity in bringing the Bill forward is a shining example of advocacy to us all.

Ms Lo: My party colleague Stewart Dickson has made a compelling case against clause 6. I am just going to add some of my thoughts.

Human trafficking is, no doubt, one of the severest abuses of human rights, and we must do all we can to stand firmly against any form of modern-day slavery, whether it be sexual exploitation, domestic servitude, forced labour or any other activity. As someone who has spoken out for years about this heinous crime and set up the all-party group in Stormont on human trafficking, I welcome Lord Morrow's commitment to eliminating it. In the 12 months that have elapsed since Second Stage, the Bill has greatly improved. I know that Minister Ford has worked closely with Lord Morrow on the Bill, and I commend them both for their efforts.

It will come as no surprise to the House that, whilst I support the vast majority of the Bill's provisions, I must reiterate my very grave concerns about clause 6. Clause 6, as we all know, would criminalise payment for the sexual services of a man or woman. That has provoked an intense and, at times, emotionally charged debate in the Chamber and in the media. I respect the very different views and opinions on the matter, and I hope to convey my reservations with sensitivity. I firmly state that I support the objective of discouraging the trafficking of persons into Northern Ireland for sexual exploitation. However, I am not convinced that there is sufficient evidence on which to pass legislation such as this, and I will detail why shortly.

We find ourselves in an interesting position where those from a more evangelical persuasion, who possibly seek to ban prostitution for religious and moral reasons, find themselves in agreement with those with a more radical feminist perspective. Some feminists argue that prostitution is a form of male violence against women. They argue that it is physically and psychologically damaging to sell sex and that there are no women who sell sex voluntarily. Furthermore, it has been claimed that, if one wants to achieve a gender-equal society, prostitution must cease to exist, not only for the reasons I have mentioned but because all women in society are harmed as long as men think of women as commodities. I will not disagree with some of those sentiments, but I urge all who support clause 6 for such reasons to ask themselves the following questions. If clause 6 is introduced, what will the implications be? How will they impact on the women involved? What will it mean for women involved in prostitution if they have to leave that form of labour? Are we sure that we are putting protections in place to support women in every way? Those are all questions that Sinn Féin raised at Second Stage. It is disappointing that they have apparently changed their mind despite their previous reservations.

The inclusion of a clause on prostitution in a human trafficking Bill, although the two issues are often cited as being interrelated, is misguided. They are not one and the same issue.

Mr Wilson: Will the Member give way?

Ms Lo: Yes.

Mr Wilson: Given that all of the evidence shows that many of those who are trafficked are trafficked to be sold for sex, how does the Member reach the conclusion that that is an inappropriate issue to address in an anti-slavery Bill? Since she seems to think that this is some crusade by evangelical fundamentalists, perhaps she will tell us which of the following groups are evangelical fundamentalists: Women's Aid, ICTU, Equality Now and the European Women's Lobby. Which of those have joined the evangelical wing of the Protestant Churches in Northern Ireland?

Ms Lo: Would you not agree that the Bill was very much drafted and supported by CARE? That is my answer to you.

Policy and legislative responses should distinguish clearly between human trafficking for sexual exploitation and prostitution. They are not the same. If each is to be targeted effectively, they need to be addressed separately. The notion that sex trafficking is a simple supply-and-demand equation, and if you stop the demand, you stop the supply, is flawed.

A single clause in this Bill is not going to deal comprehensively with the complex social issue of prostitution. A single clause simply cannot formulate exit strategies and other service provisions. A Member from the DUP mentioned counselling, employment and training. Those are the things that need to be in the Bill. A single clause itself is just useless. We need all those provisions and different strategies together to deal with the issue in a wholly realistic manner.

Mr Wilson: Will the Member give way?

Ms Lo: No. I gave way to you once already.

Attempting to tackle a topic as complex as prostitution through one clause in a private Member's Bill is not the best approach.

Clause 6 is, by and large, based on the Swedish model. It is frequently stated — and has been mentioned many times today — that the number of women in visible prostitution in Sweden has decreased since the Sex Purchase Act was introduced in 1999. The Swedish police described the Act as an efficient tool for keeping trafficking away from Sweden. The law has brought support from the general public in Sweden and that has been interpreted as it having had its intended normative effect on opinions of prostitution.

If you look at the available evidence, however, you will see that none of those points is fully convincing. The claim that the number of people involved in prostitution has declined is based largely on the work of organisations that report back on specific groups they work with. Social workers, for example, count and get an impression based on their contact with women in street prostitution in larger cities. That does not take into consideration other forms of prostitution, which, hidden from view, are still going on.

The 2010 Skarhed report, which is regularly cited, acknowledges that there are other forms of prostitution, but it still concludes that the law is a success based on the number of women in contact with social workers and police. Men involved in prostitution, women who operate indoors and those selling sex outside the larger cities are, therefore, excluded from the scope of the report.

This excessive focus on street prostitution ignores the fact that, since 1999 or so, mobile phones and the Internet have meant a decline in face-to-face contact with women selling sex in the traditional sense. That is backed up by the recently published DOJ research, which found that the majority of sex workers in Northern Ireland advertised online and worked from houses. The police can certainly testify to that.

The Swedish Sex Purchase Act is often said to be an effective tool against human trafficking. The evidence for that claim is weak. The official data that does exist is vague. Some authors have also pointed out that the Act may have raised prices for sex, making trafficking for sexual purposes potentially more lucrative than ever.

Mr A Maginness: I thank the Member for giving way. I am interested in the point that she raises that really, in a sense, the Swedish model is not working and is making the situation worse. That is not compatible with the widely acknowledged success of the Swedish model, which many people internationally recognise and are, in fact, copying.

9.15 pm

Ms Lo: I thank the Member for raising those points. It has also been well accepted, in report after report, and I will cite some of them from the document that I have, which is from the Board of Health and Welfare in Sweden. It states:

"We have determined in previous reports ... that prostitution is a multifaceted phenomenon that is affected by several interacting factors. No causal connections can be proven between legislation and changes in prostitution. It is also difficult to identify the impacts of legislation because social processes are affected by several complex and situational factors."

It continues by stating that in recent interviews by the Board of Health and Welfare:

"most men state that the ban has not changed anything for them, but describe it as a 'punch in the air'."

So, it has been criticised, and I urge Members to open their mind and not listen just to what they heard from the government side in Sweden. Many people have come out to cast doubt on the statistics from the Swedish model.

There is the other problem that, if we simply ban something from happening here, it merely moves the problem elsewhere. Exporting a problem is not a solution. We all need to work together, and there are initiatives that enable European member states to work together, because we know that it is a global trade that crosses borders. Country borders are no deterrent to human trafficking. I have long argued that one of the most effective ways to prevent people being trafficked into prostitution is to focus on the source countries. I understand that, in China, there are open advertisements in newspapers in certain provinces, luring young women into applying for bogus posts as nannies and waitresses in the UK and America. What are the Government in China doing to stop people from falling into these traps? Those Governments need to address such issues, and we need to put pressure on them to do more, rather than export women to the west to be exploited. It is a serious crime, and we all need to work together.

It is also important to repeat the PSNI's concerns that passing legislation banning prostitution may have the unintended consequence of diverting resources from tackling trafficking to monitoring prostitution; not to mention just how difficult it could be to enforce the legislation. We should remember that it is already against the law to pay for the sexual services of a prostitute who is subjected to force — irrespective of whether the person had any knowledge of force being used — or to solicit the services of a prostitute in a public place.

My overriding point is that it is bad practice to legislate and to take long-term policy decisions without an evidence base, particularly a local, Northern Ireland-specific evidence base. We do not know the true extent of human trafficking in Northern Ireland or the proportion of prostitutes here who have been trafficked. To legislate in this manner, without a fuller sense of those figures is, in my view, irresponsible. That said, I welcome the recently published DOJ-commissioned research, which is the most comprehensive survey to date of how the sex industry works in Northern Ireland. It surveyed 171 sex workers and 446 clients, and it looked at all aspects of prostitution, including trafficking for sexual exploitation. I know that DUP Members rubbish it, but perhaps that is because they do not like the results. I have, through my constituency work, met women who voluntarily work as sex workers and women who have been trafficked into prostitution. It is a very complex issue. People are driven into it through all sorts of circumstances, be it debt, drug or alcohol addiction, or because they did not get enough help from government, social services or public services. They have no other choice but to go into prostitution. The issue is how we should help those women to prevent them feeling that prostitution is their only option. We need to help them to not fall into the trap of thinking that prostitution is the only way out.

From the DOJ research, we learned that only about 20 people still work as street-based prostitutes in Northern Ireland. The majority of the industry advertises online and works from houses. Between 300 and 350 people are available for sex work every day. There is a significant number of male sex workers in Northern Ireland. Fewer than 1% of those surveyed stated that someone had forced them into prostitution. The majority of sex workers surveyed said that they did not agree that it should be illegal to pay for sex. Interestingly, the research tells us that more than one third of men questioned for the study mistakenly assumed that they were breaking the law by purchasing sex. If people continue to pay for sex thinking that it is illegal, what is to say that they will cease when it is actually illegal?

For the first time in Northern Ireland, prostitutes have been asked about their lives and circumstances and whether the legislation that Lord Morrow proposes would free them from the many vulnerabilities they face. Prostitution is a very complex issue. We still do not know how many people involved in the trade are coerced by human traffickers. It is very hard to determine the extent of what we are dealing with. Further evidence is required. Until then, I cannot, with good conscience, support clause 6. I say that as someone who has advocated and raised awareness of the issue for more than 10 years, when a Chinese woman murdered in north Belfast was widely known to have been a victim of human trafficking. I urge the House to think carefully about clause 6.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Before I call Steven Agnew, I point out that there is a considerable amount of noise and the buzz of conversation, particularly when women colleagues are trying to make a contribution. It is difficult for them to speak, and it is difficult for the rest of us to follow the debate. I know that it is late in the evening, but we have to pay attention, and we have to allow other people to be able to pay attention.

Mr Agnew: I am not sure whether it is the late hour or the length of the debate, but I do not relish speaking on it. It is a difficult and emotional topic. Everyone who has argued their case has done so with genuine intent and feeling. I go back to what I said earlier: we all abhor human trafficking. Where we may disagree is how best we tackle it. I have seen the body language of some Members — I have probably been guilty of it myself — who, on hearing somebody with whom they disagree, have turned away, sighed or whatever it might be. We should give one another a bit more respect than that. We are coming from a genuine place on what is a very difficult issue. There are many victims, and how best we serve them is at the centre of the debate.

For me, there are two categories of argument in the debate: a moral one about whether prostitution is right or wrong and whether it is inherently exploitative and one based on what the outcomes would be should we criminalise the purchase of sex. On the moral argument, I am conflicted. I will be honest about this: I had prepared a very one-sided speech — I prepare speeches — but I listened to the debate and thought, “No, that is dishonest. This is not one-sided, and no one moral argument holds absolutely”.

I listened to Catriona Ruane describe herself as a feminist. She talked about the commodification of women. Of course, I am absolutely opposed to that with every fibre in my body. Whether it is prostitution, page 3 or lads' mags, I oppose the objectification and commodification of women. I listened to Paul Givan speak about his daughters. I have a daughter. Would I wish her to grow up and become a sex worker? Absolutely not. That is not what I want for my daughter. It is not a choice that I would make for her, and I hope that it is not a choice that she will make or have to make.

Equally, I have read the research provided by Queen's University. I understand that people have questioned its legitimacy and intent, and I think that there is a flaw if somebody states a clear position on something before researching it. I accept that, but I do not think that we can completely ignore it for that reason. It says that 98% of those surveyed oppose the criminalisation of the purchasing of sex. Maybe it is not 98%, and maybe the survey is not perfect. Maybe it is only 80%, but can we ignore that? We have an indicator. It is not perfect or absolute. Not every sex worker in Northern Ireland was surveyed, but it is what we have as evidence. I heard Alban Maginness and, I think, Catriona Ruane say that no woman chooses to be a prostitute and sell sex. I do not have the evidence for that, so I cannot go on that argument. I have the research that I have, and I can go only on the evidence there.

Mr Givan: Will the Member give way?

Mr Agnew: Certainly.

Mr Givan: I appreciate the point that the Member is making, and it is one that we posed to the Human Rights Commission. Some will say that clause 6 is an infringement of people's rights and the right to a private life, but, when we put that to the commission, Dr Russell said:

“the question is whether it is reasonable and proportionate for the state, in order to protect the rights of the most vulnerable members of society, to restrict the rights of others. In the commission's view, those who are vulnerable should be the priority in this instance.”

That is why the Human Rights Commission said that it was right to support clause 6.

Mr Agnew: I thank the Member for his intervention. I did not say that it was a rights issue, but, again, that is a part of the evidence that we cannot ignore. That is why I say that I am conflicted on the moral arguments.

I get concerned about arguments that absolutely assume that no woman, even if she says that she has chosen to sell sex as a form of work, can have chosen to do so. I get concerned because I fear that, underneath some of the comments, there is still a presumption that sex is something that is done to a woman, that sex by its very nature is violence against women. Individual Members will have to search their conscience on that, but I think that it underpins some of the arguments that no woman would ever choose it.

Mr Givan: I appreciate the Member giving way again. We asked the Irish Congress of Trade Unions that too. Is prostitution — sex work, as you call it — regarded as a valid form of work? In response, Peter Bunting said:

“The clear answer to that, which I think you got from the previous witness as well, is that it is really about exploitation. It is very simple. We could not conceive it to be a valid description of work.”

Mr Agnew: Again, I thank the Member for his intervention. I hope that in future debates, when I give evidence from the Irish Congress of Trade Unions, the Members opposite will say, “That is a great organisation, that is. We should listen to what it has to say”, particularly tomorrow, when we discuss the living wage. I will quote the ICTU tomorrow.

This is where I come at this: as I said, I would not choose prostitution for my daughter; I would not choose it for anyone. I find it hard to comprehend that anyone would make that choice with the availability of other choices, but I read evidence that says that 32% of those surveyed have degree-level education. I suspect that they have opportunities, although I do not know the individual circumstances. I accept that it might not be 32% — it might be 20% — but it is still a significant number that we cannot ignore of people who are saying that, “We are educated, and we are sex workers”. We have a perception —

9.30 pm

Mrs Foster: Will the Member give way?

Mr Agnew: Yes.

Mrs Foster: Does the Member accept that somebody with a degree-level education — this picks up on Ms Lo's point — may have come into prostitution through alcoholism, drugs, debt and a myriad of reasons that may mean that it has actually not been a free choice for them to end up in prostitution and that, in actual fact, they are vulnerable people who have ended up in prostitution and now continue with it?

Mr Agnew: I do. I hope that the Member will, equally, accept that there are those who got into prostitution while in university to help to fund their education.

Mrs Foster: Correct.

Mr Agnew: That is regrettable, and it is choice that I would not make. It is a choice that someone else has made, and I do not feel that I can say that they should not make that choice. That is where I get very uncomfortable about legislation.

Mr Humphrey: Will the Member give way?

Mr Agnew: I will give way in a second. I want to finish this point.

When we start saying that, “I would not, so you should not”, I get very uncomfortable.

Mr Humphrey: The Member should also remember that many of those being trafficked into prostitution come, for example, from the eastern bloc in Europe. They are highly educated, but they do not have the opportunity to get meaningful employment in the professions in which they have been trained and for which they studied in university.

When Women's Aid came before the Committee during my time there, they made the point about women, for example, from China who had no identity and those from certain sects or castes in India who, equally, have no identity. When we were in Sweden, we had the issue of people from Latvia, Lithuania, the former Soviet states and so on who do not have an identity in their own country. Those people are then trafficked and used; they have no option. We were told of a young lady in Stockholm who, at 19 years old, was servicing upwards of 20 people a day in a filthy, dirty flat. She had no salary; she had to ask for a bottle of water or a packet of cigarettes. She had no choice. The issue is that we have to protect the people who have no choice, the most vulnerable people, who simply can do nothing to protect themselves. It is our duty and responsibility to provide the laws to protect them because they simply cannot protect themselves, especially when they are in a nation other than their own.

Mr Agnew: I thank the Member for his comments. To a large extent, I agree. We are not debating whether trafficking should be illegal: it is illegal. In fact, we have a Bill here that I hope will enhance our action to tackle trafficking. It is the muddying of prostitution and trafficking that I take issue with.

On the point about the nationality of those with degrees etc who were surveyed, perhaps the Minister may comment further; I do not have that level of detail. Again, I suppose that the one fundamental thing that I come down to is that I do not have enough information to say that we should criminalise the purchase of sex because, at this point, I do not feel that I have the evidence to say that it will help those who are most vulnerable, those who are exploited, coerced and driven to prostitution through poverty. I do not have that evidence; it is not evidence that I have seen.

I mentioned at the start of my contribution that I felt that there were two arguments. First, there is the moral one, and, as I said, it is one that I am conflicted on. I do not think it is a simple matter. If I could get rid of prostitution, pornography and the objectification and commodification of women, I would do it. However, I do not think that that is a choice we have in front of us today. The other argument, and I feel I have perhaps a bit more research and evidence around this, is the outcome of what I think would happen for the most vulnerable groups that we have identified should clause 6 be passed today, which I suspect it will.

It may not be exact, but we have an indicative figure that 17,000 men a year purchase sex. We can challenge that figure, but it is probably an indication of the level of purchasing of sex. The number of people guilty of trafficking in Northern Ireland, which is the large focus of the Bill — people have pointed out that it is the exploitation Bill, and we can have the debate about whether prostitution is exploitative — is, I suspect, in the tens. We can widen that by looking at the other vulnerable groups as well as those trafficked and include the perpetrators of rape and coercion. That is a number that we should focus on. It is a number that we should go after. It is a realistic target, if not to eradicate, to turn the screws on those perpetrators.

There has been a lot of debate about the position of the police. The evidence given by Detective Superintendent Philip Marshall has not gone away. The police can change their position, but the points he made are as valid today as they were when he made them. I do not believe that it is viable for the police to pursue and gather evidence on 17,000 men a year. We would be putting a huge strain on them, when what we are talking about is human trafficking, a very specific and heinous crime, as has been pointed out, and one of the most serious crimes.

Whatever we think of prostitution, compare trafficking with two adults who are in a consensual transaction over sex. Whether we think it is right or wrong, on the spectrum of offences, compare two consenting adults with somebody who is trafficked, coerced, enslaved, imprisoned, tortured or raped. Those are the women and men whom we need to protect. Those are the crimes being perpetrated that we need to go after. Yes, we can expand it to prostitution. However, that is a separate Bill and we need more evidence. Those in prostitution who are being exploited, pimped or coerced are protected in law. If they are raped or are suffering domestic violence, we have laws against that. What we are focusing on today is human trafficking.

If we want to better protect the most vulnerable in our society, let us look at our prosecutions around rape. Rape is illegal. We do not need the criminalisation of the purchase of sex to make rape illegal. However, we are not convicting the perpetrators. We hear a lot of debate in the media about entrapment, particularly around footballers but also people in high-profile positions of power. When a woman says that she has been sexually abused or has faced sexually inappropriate behaviour, we have to assume that she is telling the truth and start from that basis. At the minute, our justice model when it comes to rape is absolutely failing. If people genuinely want to protect the most vulnerable in our society, that is something that we have to look at.

However, I believe that, in the case of resources and of getting a good outcome from this legislation around preventing human trafficking and prosecuting people guilty of human trafficking, we need to focus and target our resources on the perpetrators of this most serious of crimes, along with rape and coercion. I will come to the issue of those driven to prostitution through poverty, addiction or debt, which has been referenced. That is wrong, and it is something that we want to oppose.

Mr Humphrey: I am grateful to the Member for giving way. I will just make the point that the Republic's equivalent Committee to the Justice Committee, which we met on a visit to Dublin, is looking to shape legislation to protect people who are trafficked into prostitution. If the Republic of Ireland Government pass legislation through the Dáil that protects those people, and we fail to provide the laws to protect people here in Northern Ireland, what will happen is that Northern Ireland will become the soft underbelly for this illicit, illegal and heinous crime on a much larger scale. We are already having people trafficked from mainland Europe across the United Kingdom and to the Republic. You are talking about resources. If we do not introduce legislation, it will expand exponentially and in a way that we will never control and get a grip of. I make the point again that we have a duty and responsibility to protect the most vulnerable people. The Member has talked much about loopholes and things. We need to turn and look at how we are protecting people. From what I am hearing, you are not doing that.

Mr Agnew: I disagree with the Member. I am absolutely focused on how we protect people in getting the outcomes. I repeat that human trafficking is illegal. This Bill will not change that one way or the other. What this will criminalise is the purchase of sex. Those trafficking, whether it is across the border from the South or wherever it comes from, will still be committing a crime.

What I am saying is that we should focus police resources on those crimes. I go back to the evidence from Philip Marshall; we have evidence from Philip Marshall that says that actually those who are purchasing sex are identifying trafficking. We would lose one of our key witnesses. A trafficked individual, most likely a woman if it is in the sex trade, will have contact with three groups of people: her traffickers, other women who are trafficked, and the clients. If we remove the client, who is there to give evidence? The other people who are trafficked are not in a position to give evidence because they are equally as in danger as they are. The trafficker is not going to give evidence, so we actually rely on the client to give evidence.

So I disagree. I am absolutely focused on tackling human trafficking. What I am not focused on is tackling prostitution because I do not share the same moral outrage at prostitution that some Members of the House have, although I absolutely am outraged when people are exploited. Again, I think that we have to separate the two things. However, I will make the point that those who are driven to prostitution —

Mr Ross: Will the Member give way?

Mr Agnew: Sure.

Mr Ross: Given the issue that he raises, which I take as a genuine issue, about whether or not the client, as he calls it, would give evidence, does he have any evidence that clients have been bringing forward that sort of information to the police? If he does have that evidence, can he present it to the Assembly today?

Mr Agnew: The evidence was presented by Philip Marshall of the PSNI, who heads up the work on human trafficking.

Mr Ross: How many?

Mr Agnew: I do not have the numbers but I can access them. It was cited as one of the police's tools of gathering evidence. We need to be mindful that, if we pass clause 6, we take that tool away.

I come now to the issue of prostitution driven by poverty, addiction and debt. Anyone in that situation is undoubtedly a victim. However, again, if we are genuine about wanting to help those people, we need to look at each of those individual issues. How do we address poverty? How do we address addiction? How do we address debt? Prostitution is the symptom of those things, not the cause. We will not get into those debates now. We will have debates forever and anon about having a strong welfare state; a living wage for workers and making work pay; and proper support for addiction and treating it like an illness, rather than treating those with addictions somehow as criminals or a lesser group in society. If we are genuinely concerned about those people, that is how we will treat these issues.

9.45 pm

I will conclude, Principal Deputy Speaker; I have probably spoken at length. We have to accept the reality that prostitution, whatever we think of it, is the world's oldest profession. The Bill will not get rid of prostitution. We cannot wish it away; we cannot legislate it away. It is a reality in our society. We have to make sure that the best protections possible and the best support available are in place for those engaged in prostitution. I welcome clauses that would help women or men find a pathway out of prostitution, for example. I think that that is the right approach. For some people who are in desperate need, it is their only avenue of earning money. We have to make sure that the alternatives to prostitution are better, whether that be through our welfare system, improvements in pay and working conditions in our, unfortunately, low-paid employment or supporting the Irish Congress of Trade Unions, not on a selective basis. This is the way forward. I do not believe that criminalising the purchase of sex is in the best interests of victims of coercion, rape or exploitation, and I do not think it is the best way to tackle human trafficking.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I call Mr Basil McCrea. [Interruption.]

Mr B McCrea: Mr Principal Deputy Speaker, if Mr Givan wants to say something, I am quite happy to let him start. The hour is late. There has been much debate this evening about research and the quality of research. I have listened intently to some fine speeches. Stewart Dickson, Anna Lo, Steven Agnew and some other Members made me think about what is at stake here.

Some other contributions, which I know to be honestly held, seemed to be trying to draw the research to fit the contributor's narrative. If they could find a bit of research that supported their story, that was good research, and research put forward by other people, which did not support the story, was bad research. That does not seem to me to be the right way to go about things. One of the points that Mr Agnew put forward was that, regardless of whether it is 100% correct, there are certainly indicators that some information is better than no information. Of course, Members are right to interrogate it to see whether it is appropriate and relevant to Northern Ireland, and whether we can substantiate it, or whatever, but we should not ignore it.

One of the big arguments that came across was an argument that I heard from Alban Maginness and, I think, Patsy McGlone. They were emphatic in their support for the Swedish model. Yet, Anna Lo was able to come back and say, "There is not emphatic support for the Swedish model". It is not uncontested. Not only do many people say that it does not work but that it is counterproductive.

I did not get to go to Sweden as part of my research, but I talked to some of the media outlets there. This information may be of help to Members. This summer, on 24 July 2014, a Swedish newspaper published the headline, "Police turn blind eye to Swedish 'slave trade'". The article states:

"Police in Gothenburg have confirmed that sex trafficking in the city has developed into a full-blown slave trade - but that they lack the resources to do anything about it."

The article goes on to say:

"Gothenburg police busted a large Romanian pimping network in 2011",

But, not long after that, other people came in and took over.

One week earlier, the Swedish newspaper 'Expressen' stated that human traffickers had gone from "just" selling sex to selling women as lifelong slaves. That is in Gothenburg, the second city of Sweden, where, you are telling me, there has been such a great success. The newspaper said that the cost of a slave for life is €2,000 and that for 700 kronor or $100, one can rent a couple of girls for a day for cooking, cleaning or anything else. One seller reportedly said, "Do what you like with them". This is Sweden. This is Gothenburg. This is where we are supposed to have the panacea and where we are supposed to have it fixed. Human trafficking is an acknowledged problem in large Swedish cities, with well-established red light districts in Stockholm, Gothenburg and Malmö. I do not know whether the Committee managed to get to Rosenlund, which is one of the red light districts in Gothenburg, but, apparently, there is quite a lot of information available there. However, the real problem that they come back with is that there are no clear statistics on how widespread the black market business actually is because much of the trade is now conducted online. However, there was some research done. Some Members opposite have ridiculed the Queen's University research, but they might listen to a report from Lund University in Gothenburg, which, in 2012, found that one in 10 of 5,000 Swedish men surveyed had paid for sex. That one in 10 is not at the same level as the one in 15 that Caitríona Ruane was talking about, but there is still a level of sex that is going on.

Last November, TV4, one of the major Swedish television stations, reported that sex trafficking was on the rise in Sweden, with a quarter of a million sex purchases in Stockholm alone over the course of one year. The report stated that a sum of about kr400 million was exchanged online for sex sales, and there was no way of knowing how many more purchases occurred on the streets. So, the situation is similar in Gothenburg, but police have other priorities. Persistent and warlike gang violence has kept the police force busy, and, in September last year, the police launched Operation Trygg — Operation Safe in English — to combat the shootings. That is part of the issue. The Gothenburg police conclude by saying:

"We have a pile ten centimetres high of tips and reports [about human trafficking], but we don't have the time or resources to handle it so we can't even look. We can read them of course, but then we just feel frustrated because we can't do anything."

All that I will say to those of you who are putting forward the argument that the Swedes have the answer is that this evidence and information that I have tends to suggest the contrary. There are, of course, official reports that Ms Lo talked about from the Department of Health. The real argument that we are coming round to here is that we are pinning all our hopes that we will be able to deal with something with a particular course of action that has not been properly researched, does not have the full support of the international community and may, in fact, be counterproductive. That is the real issue facing us when we talk about prostitution.

Mr Humphrey: Will the Member give way?

Mr B McCrea: Just one moment.

The question about prostitution is one of what to do about it. I thought that Mr Agnew made a really brave speech when he came forward and said that he is morally conflicted about which way he should go. Let us assume that we are not in favour of prostitution and that we want to try to remove it. What is the best way to deal with that? That is the big question, and you can also take the situation as this: what do you do about all those people who, for whatever reason, are already involved? There are those who maybe have had financial difficulties, drug difficulties, difficulties with alcohol abuse or some other issue that has brought them into that situation. How do we deal effectively with the people who are already in an inevitable situation?

Mr Humphrey: I thank the Member for giving way. To be fair to the Stockholm police, they did not say to the Members across the House who were on the trip to Stockholm — we did not go to Gothenburg — that they had the panacea. They said that they could put much more resource into dealing with the problem, which was huge on an international scale. Obviously, because of Sweden's close proximity to the Baltic nations, there was a huge problem, with ferries going in and out regularly to all the Baltic nations. They did say that they had started to make progress in dealing with protecting very vulnerable people, most of whom are nationals other than Swedes. It was also pointed out to us, as Members will recall, that, when people go into a phone box in Stockholm, where there are cards and whatever placed, and phone the number, they think that they are phoning a number in Stockholm but are actually phoning a number in Bucharest. That is how internationally organised these people are.

It is a huge operation, with thousands of girls being exposed, abused and treated in such a heinous way. I accept what the Member is saying. No one who I have listened to who has used the argument of the Swedish example has said that it is the panacea. No one has used that language, but it cannot remain that nothing is done. We have to do something. It is the best option that there is. Part of the problem in Sweden is that the nations that about Sweden have not introduced laws to protect people. Only one or two prostitutes have been murdered in Stockholm in the past 10 years, but an equivalent where it is legal — it is perfectly legal in the Netherlands — 80 have been murdered in Amsterdam.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Before you resume, I remind Members of the lateness of the hour. Interventions are meant to be short and to the point. That was verging on a speech. The next time that it happens, I will interrupt.

Mr B McCrea: In response to that, I have a Sinn Féin press release. It states that Sinn Féin endorses the Turn Off the Red Light campaign, which, I understand, was part of the reason why it changed its position. It says in this press release — I realise that Mr Humphrey did not say it:

"In countries, like Sweden, where the purchase of sex is illegal, there has been a massive decline in prostitution"

— wrong —

"and a significant reduction in sex trafficking"

— wrong —

"and organised crime."

— wrong. That is not correct. This information is not right. So when you make —

Ms Ruane: Will the Member give way?

Mr B McCrea: Yes.

Ms Ruane: Actually, the information that you gave out is incorrect. Sinn Féin did not change its position. We stated that we would reserve our position so that we could use the Committee Stage to scrutinise and genuinely listen. In all fairness, that is what we did.

Mr B McCrea: Far be it from me to contradict the Member, but I think that her colleague Mr McCartney said something slightly different. Be that as it may, it still gets to the situation where this information is not correct. You are making decisions on the basis of improper information. We need to give you the proper information and then reach a decision.

Ms Lo came forward with information, and I have some stuff here. I talk to people with respect. I do not say to you that you are wrong. You are absolutely entitled to reach whatever conclusions you think are appropriate, but, as part of the debate, I would like to say to you, "Here is some information that I have that seems to contradict what you have. Maybe we should talk about this and see if there is a way forward." One of the things that Ms Ruane said that I agree with is that the vast majority of this conversation and this debate has been taking place between people who really care and want to find a way forward. They may have different analyses about what should be done. That is absolutely fine. This is a legislative Assembly. It is absolutely right and proper that those who bring forward legislation should expect to see it scrutinised. That is the purpose of this Chamber, and that is what we should do if we are doing our job.

I have some other points, and it is useful that I follow on from Mr Agnew because he raised some very interesting issues. One of the most telling things that he said, which was really brave, was, "Do you know what, in terms of the difference between people that are trafficked and people that are in consensual prostitution" — I think that that phrase or something like it was used — "there is a big difference". This is something that actually we have to — [Interruption.] I think Mr Givan needs a glass of water.

Mr Humphrey: Or something stronger.

Mr B McCrea: Or something stronger.

Look at the numbers that we have. I think that I am right in saying that the information that came back stated that it is 17,000 men in Northern Ireland per year — not per week, as I think Mr Givan said. Look at the numbers in the research from QUB: only 20 people are estimated to be involved in street prostitution, and the total number is 300 to 350. So, given the actual numbers involved in this, is it so important that we have to do it tonight? Can we not do proper research? If you are not happy about the quality of the research, let us do it properly. Let us get it right. Let us go and do something proper. When we come on to the issue of information —

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Dallat] in the Chair)

10.00 pm

Mr Givan: Will the Member give way?

Mr B McCrea: Yes — all right.

Mr Givan: I appreciate the Member giving way. He again referenced the research to justify some of his points. The Queen's University research was carried out and led by the lead researcher, Dr Huschke. When she came to the Committee, she presented evidence using the same methodology of an online survey. Let me read very briefly two of the exchanges. Mr Wells asked Dr Huschke about online surveys and she said:

"The way that online surveys work is that you create an online survey and then you contact people."

Mr Wells said:

"Which they did."

Dr Huschke said:

"Yes. So, you do not have control over who forwards it to whom."

Mr Wells went on to say:

"All I have seen is a prominent pimp urging his prostitutes to complete your form."

Dr Huschke's response was yes.

I put that to Members. The lead researcher for Queen's University admitted to the Committee that her previous research had been actively promoted and circulated by a pimp to his prostitutes. I rest my case.

Mr B McCrea: I am really glad that you have rested your case, because I have some more points that are worth looking at. If we want to talk about peer-reviewed research, I believe that Members will have heard of a publication called 'The Lancet', which is where medical professionals publish their papers. An article was published in 'The Lancet' on 21 July 2014, "Control of HIV Pandemic Will not be Achieved without Radical Improvement in Support for Sex Workers". We were challenged earlier in the debate on whether we can find some reasons why you might not want to do something and whether there are some positives, and I am sure that most Members would join me in wanting to see a reduction in and an eradication of HIV. The article states:

"decriminalization of sex work would have the single greatest effect on the course of HIV epidemics across all settings studied".

That is in 'The Lancet'. It continues:

"and could avert at least a third of HIV infections among sex workers and their clients in the next decade".

By the by, it goes on to say:

"Furthermore, the study finds that partial criminalization, and other criminalization of clients and third parties (often referred to as the 'Swedish approach') reproduces many of the same harms as full criminalization."

I will not bore people with the detail, but that published research in 'The Lancet' states that this is not the right way to go forward on health grounds. There may be other issues that you want to deal with but, on health grounds, that is that.

We talked about the information and the numbers and said that about 20 people are estimated to be involved in street prostitution. We also mentioned the figures of 300 and 350. Members might be interested in this statistic. It is a pity that some DUP Members have left, because they should hear it. A statistic brought out by the Brook and ARK knowledge exchange project states that 60% of males in Northern Ireland and 51% of females have had sex before the age of 16. You could say, "Look at the scale of the issue that we are going to talk about". Is that statistic right or wrong? It needs to be looked at.

I want to deal with points raised about the PSNI. During the debate, I heard people using the word "unequivocal" about the PSNI's support. Mr Givan said that he had a letter from the Chief Constable. I have not had the benefit of that, but I can tell you that I have read through the Official Report of what the Assistant Chief Constable and Detective Chief Superintendent McComb said, and they used words like "nuanced", "qualified", "unsure" and "different". They may not have wanted to get involved in a public spat with the Justice Committee or with legislators, but what I read was not unqualified support. There were at least grounds for further investigation. Some try to say, "We have now turned it all round. We have presented the information to the PSNI, and it is now fully supportive of what we are going to do". I am sorry, but I do not see that in the evidence, but perhaps other Members will bring it further forward.

So you get to the situation of how to go forward. I will make an earnest contribution. I do not think that it is necessary to personalise or have a go at people just because they bring forward a different opinion. In fact, if I was really secure in my arguments, I would welcome and take interventions and not say to people that I have heard enough from them.

I would engage with them because I am not afraid, and I am not intimidated. I will say what I have to say because I think that it is worth saying.

On that point, I will conclude by saying to you that the Swedish model is not proven. It is counterproductive, and the Swedes know it. It was part of a different agenda at a different time. We should not follow straight on just because it appears to suit some other agenda. This is far too important an issue to conflate — that, I think, was the word that you were looking for — prostitution and human trafficking. Human trafficking must be opposed. The debate on prostitution needs further investigation and further research. If you do not like the research that was put forward, do it properly and do it yourself, but have a proper reasoned argument. On that basis, I will oppose clause 6.

Mr Lyttle: I will do my best to be brief at this late hour. As a member of the all-party group on human trafficking, I welcome the opportunity to support the Bill. I welcome the contributions made by my Alliance Party colleagues on the issue — Anna Lo MLA as founding chair of the all-party group on human trafficking and the Alliance Minister of Justice, David Ford, particularly the work that he did to establish the human trafficking engagement group that worked with a number of NGOs and Church groups, including No More Traffik, A21, International Justice Mission (IJM), Active Communities Against Human Trafficking (ACT) and other organisations and people who made an important contribution to raising awareness of this important issue.

I also welcome the work that the Minister has done in collaboration with the proposer of the Bill, Lord Morrow. I recognise the hard work put into the Bill by Lord Morrow and his team, including other NGOs, such as CARE, which contributed positively to many aspects of the Bill.

I recognise many of the Bill's positive contributions. The three key areas of human trafficking that we aim to tackle are prevention, prosecution and protection. Much of the Bill contributes to streamlining offences and improving victim support, in particular, the child trafficking guardian, the discretionary power to extend the reflection and recovery periods for victims of human trafficking and access to health care. However, there are gaps. I believe that the demand and drivers for forced labour have not been paid particular attention by the Bill, nor, indeed, has the awareness raising by many other organisations.

The complex matter of the criminalisation of the purchasing of sex is introduced in clause 6, and that has generated significant and emotive debate. It may be worth noting that some organisations have supported the clause, but other organisations raised concerns, as have many others: for example, the Presbyterian Church, Amnesty International and NEXUS NI have expressed concerns about the adequacy and practicality of some of the proposals. Maybe we can look at what those organisations have said, given the other information that has been referenced this evening. Amnesty International said:

"We are ... concerned that the approach of combining legal measures to address human trafficking with legal measures to address prostitution, both complex issues, will not be an effective nor appropriate approach".

NEXUS NI said:

"Although we accept that people are trafficked to Northern Ireland for sexual exploitation, we recognise that trafficked victims and those who sell sexual services are two separate and complex groups."

The Presbyterian Church said that the case had not been adequately made for a blanket ban on paying for sex. The Church said that it believes that prostitution is, indeed, "an evil in our society", but:

"in the absence of any clear and coherent policy on dealing with the issue of prostitution ... we are not convinced that such a wide-ranging clause should be introduced into a Bill that is primarily dealing with human trafficking."

I was going to intervene when Mr McCrea referred to the Swedish model, but he seemed to be in full flow, so I let him progress. The Swedish National Council for Crime Prevention said that it found little or no evidence that criminalising the buying of sex had had any significant impact on decreasing trafficking for sexual exploitation.

I think that we can agree that those are important organisations with information to bring to bear on this issue with work being done to try to reduce human trafficking and prostitution. I have profound concerns about prostitution in our society and for everyone involved in it. However, it is my understanding that the Minister of Justice has given a clear commitment to bring a full review of the law on prostitution in Northern Ireland before the Assembly and to undertake a deeper consideration of the issue than is afforded by the single clause in this, albeit extremely important, anti-human trafficking Bill. I believe that that proposal should have the support of the House, and I will support it.

Mr McCallister: We are at the stage of the debate where everything has been said, but not quite by everyone. My main criticisms at the Second Reading of Lord Morrow's Bill were about the two issues of human trafficking and prostitution being placed in the one Bill. Those were the concerns that I had then and that I still hold today.

I congratulate Lord Morrow, the Minister and the Committee on their work to improve the Bill. Dare I say that that is why I so vehemently oppose accelerated passage for legislation. The debate has probably shown the Assembly at its finest. Whatever you think about other Members' opinions, whether you agree or disagree, I do not think that anyone could suggest that we are not all passionate and agreed that human trafficking is a huge societal evil; in fact, it is a global evil. Mr Givan compared Lord Morrow to Wilberforce, and I think that the fact that there are more people in slavery today than in Wilberforce's time is a huge indictment on the world. We should be grateful for the work that the Department of Justice, the Committee and Lord Morrow have undertaken.

I have heard many passionate speeches throughout the debate from Ms Bradley, Ms Ruane and Mr Agnew, all talking about the sexualisation of our society, the commercialisation of it and the range of ways in which that can happen. Mr Agnew spoke about sexually inappropriate behaviour and crossing the spectrum to prostitution and the difficulties in dealing with that. We have only to look around to see that it is a very male-dominated Assembly making this legislation.

Mr Agnew said that the figures involved in trafficking were probably in the tens and that trafficking is already illegal; however, we have also heard that 17,000 men a year purchase sex. If we have improved the Bill, if the contributions that the Committee and the Minister have made to Lord Morrow's Bill have improved that and if this Assembly has improved that and taken us farther than the rest of the country, that is to the good when dealing with trafficking. However, I still have some concerns, and I am not convinced that the case has been made for clause 6. I suspect, as would seem from the contributions in the debate, that it will go through relatively easily, but I thought that it was worth placing on record my concerns about it. However, I am pleased that so much progress has been made to the Bill in the past year or 13 months; it shows the benefits of having a proper scrutiny process.

Mr Poots: I seek to be brief. I had the pleasure of working with Lord Morrow on the Bill in my previous role as Minister of Health, and I think that considerable work has been done and progress has been made. I was somewhat driven to speak by a number of Members who spoke and who appeared to sanitise the business of prostitution.

We need to lay bare the lie that prostitution is something that is largely carried out by people willingly, that it is something that is being carried out by people who are doing degrees and starting up businesses and who may be carrying it out in some well-appointed apartment in a reasonably leafy suburb of a city. We need to make it clear just what prostitution really is.

I wish that some of the Members who spoke had listened to some of the evidence given by groups like A21. It is out there seeking to save people from human trafficking and get them out of the situations and circumstances they find themselves in.

More often than not, prostitutes are young women who are many hundreds and maybe thousands of miles from their homes, who have been taken and who have been fooled and deceived into leaving their place of refuge, which is their home, to get a better life, only to find that they are under the control of pimps who expect them to perform sexual acts for men. Those men pay the pimps considerable sums of money and the prostitutes get a very small amount. If prostitutes do not do what the pimps want them to do, they will suffer violence and attacks. That is what we are really talking about. Let us cut away the flimflam and get down to the fact that it is a dirty, seedy business. It is misogynist, and it uses women — largely women, but not exclusively — as a commodity.

If we can do something about it, do something better and take away the apportionment of blame from the victims — which is what we intend to do tonight — and put it to the person who acquired the sex, it will be a significant move forward.

I urge people to read the evidence that was provided to the Committee by Miss Moran. It is compelling and, if people read it with an open mind, I do not see how they could arrive at a decision other than to support what has been proposed by Lord Morrow.

Lord Morrow: The Minister of Justice has consistently opposed this measure and, today, he has set out his reasons for proposing to remove it entirely through opposing the question that clause 6 stand part of the Bill. In its place, the Minister would like to amend the existing article 64A of the Sexual Offences (Northern Ireland) Order 2008 to allow prosecutions to be brought up to three years after the offence has been committed, rather than the current situation in which a prosecution can only be brought within six months of the offence being committed. That would be achieved through the introduction of new clause 6A.

The logic of clause 6 in my Bill is simple. The NRM data clearly demonstrates that, since 2009, not only is the demand for paid sex in Northern Ireland the biggest single driver for trafficking into Northern Ireland but it accounts for over 50% of the victims. In that context, it seems to me that, to ensure that human trafficking is reduced in the future, we should put in place the very best legislative framework to address the demand by making the buying of sex an offence.

Of course, the Minister says that he agrees, and points out that our current law already makes it an offence to pay for sex with someone subject to force which, of course, any trafficked person would be. Moreover, he also says that he recognises that the current law is not working well, and proposes raising the time bar in order to make it work better. I understand his logic, but I suggest that his solution is nothing like as robust and effective as the solution proposed by clause 6. The idea of limiting the offence to paying for sex with someone who is coerced might sound great in principle, but it has not worked in practice. The law was warmly welcomed as a step in the right direction when it was introduced back in 2009, but the stark reality is that it has not resulted in a single conviction.

First, although article 64A has always been a strict liability offence — making it clear that what the buyer believes or knows about the coercion of the seller is irrelevant in terms of a prosecution — the fact remains that proving that the seller has been coerced is difficult in practice. In fact, an all-party group inquiry into the laws on prostitution in England and Wales concluded that, and I quote:

“Section 14 of the Policing and Crime Act 2009 is an insufficient measure for protecting victims because coercion is too difficult to prove.”

Our article 64A offence is identical to that in England and Wales.

Secondly, if we look at other jurisdictions that have opted for these caveated offences — for example, Finland and England and Wales — none of them have tended to work well in practice, and convictions have been very limited. According to the Solicitor General, the CPS has no record of any prosecutions for this offence in England and Wales in the most recent financial year, 2013-14, yet the national referral mechanism identified 533 victims of trafficking in the same jurisdiction for sexual exploitation in 2013.

In comparison, Gunilla Ekberg, former special adviser to the Swedish Government, told the Justice Committee that in Sweden almost 5,000 people had been arrested for purchasing sex over the past 15 years, with a conviction rate of about two thirds. Moreover, in the time since article 64A was introduced, the number of people identified as potential victims of trafficking for sexual exploitation has increased both in Northern Ireland and in England and Wales. It has not done what we hoped it would do, and I suggest that tinkering around the edges is not going to solve the fundamental problem.

I want to set out for Members why I think that clause 6 is the better option. First, before I leave the discussion on the current article 64A, I want to remind Members that clause 6 introduces tougher penalties than that provision. In a 2009 London study of 103 men who buy sex, 77% agreed that a greater criminal penalty would deter them from purchasing sex, as compared with only 47% who would be deterred by a requirement to attend an educational programme. That shows how effective clause 6 could be at reducing demand.

Secondly, I want to look at the international evidence. Of crucial importance, the criminalising of paying for sex has proved to be an effective strategy in other jurisdictions, particularly Sweden and Norway. I do not claim that this model is perfect. Indeed, as José Mendes Bota, who recently took a resolution calling for the criminalising of paying for sex successfully through the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe, put it in evidence to the Canadian Parliament:

“There are no models that are 100% perfect.”

I think that he is absolutely right on that, but to my mind, having visited Sweden to find out more about how the Nordic model operates, I think that it provides the best way forward, engaging directly with human trafficking and wider exploitation.

It is particularly worth reflecting on evaluations which have been conducted on the laws in operation in Sweden and Norway.

In July 2010, the Swedish Government published an evaluation of the operation of the Nordic model in Sweden, which was conducted by the Swedish chancellor of justice and former supreme court judge, Anna Skarhed. The evaluation did not claim that the Nordic model was perfect, but it highlighted the following points. First, street prostitution was found to have been cut in half as a direct result of the criminalisation of sex purchases. Secondly, there was no evidence that the decrease in on-street prostitution had led to an increase in off-street prostitution. Thirdly, fewer men stated that they had purchased sexual services, and over 70% of the Swedish population indicated that they continue to support the law. Fourthly, trafficking in Sweden is on a substantially smaller scale than in other comparable countries, and the Swedish police report that the law on the purchase of sexual services acts as a barrier to human traffickers who consider establishing themselves in Sweden.

Clearly, although prostitution still exists in Sweden, the law in operation in that country has had a positive effect. Nor has the example of Sweden been an isolated one. A 2014 independent evaluation for the Norwegian Government of the operation of the approach in Norway has some noteworthy conclusions. The summary stated that the ban on the purchase of sexual services has reduced demand for sex and thus contributed to the reduction in the extent of prostitution in Norway. The report highlighted that there was a clear declining trend in the market after the law was implemented.

The research also indicated that the law has led to a reduction in the level of human trafficking in Norway. As the summary puts it, a reduced market and an increase in law enforcement posed larger risks for human traffickers. The profit from human trafficking is also reduced due to those factors. The law has thus affected important pull factors and reduced the extent of human trafficking in Norway in comparison to a situation without a law.

I want to be absolutely clear that, while the demand for paid sex is the biggest single driver for trafficking in Northern Ireland, I recognise that it is not the case that the majority of individuals involved in prostitution in Northern Ireland have been trafficked. From the information I have received from the PSNI, a significant minority have been trafficked, but that does not constitute a majority. However, the title of my Bill is not, and crucially has never been, as some seem to believe, the "Human Trafficking Bill". It never was. It is the Human Trafficking and Exploitation (Further Provisions and Support for Victims) Bill. It is my contention that the vast majority of individuals in prostitution today are victims of exploitation.

The academic evidence and the evidence submitted to the consultation for my draft Bill and to the Justice Committee make it plain that, for the majority who work in prostitution, doing so has been the consequence of a lack of choice rather than a positive choice. As Annie Campbell, director of Women's Aid in Northern Ireland, which I have found to be a fantastic organisation, said:

"Prostitution is not a choice; it is a trap that women and girls are lured into or fall into. They need a humane society to send out a zero-tolerance message of no abuse to support them to get out of that trap."

Evidence from the Home Office and multiple academic studies demonstrates that the majority of people who sell sex are incredibly vulnerable and subject to real exploitation. Home Office figures reveal that homelessness, living in care, debt and substance abuse are all common experiences prior to entering prostitution. Many of those in prostitution have suffered abuse or violence in the home. Home Office data has shown that as many as 85% of people in prostitution have experienced physical abuse in the family home, with 45% reporting familial sexual abuse. In a 2012 study of 114 women in prostitution in London, 50% said that they had experienced some form of coercion through trafficking or from a partner, pimp or relative. The same study found that 32% of those interviewed had entered the sex industry before the age of 18. Other studies have found higher numbers than that. For example, a 2004 study found the figure to be 52%. Numerous studies have found that between 50% and 95% of women in street prostitution are addicted to class A drugs.

10.30 pm

Some of the evidence given to the Justice Committee also powerfully illustrates the level of exploitation experienced by people in prostitution. I would like to highlight the evidence given by two individuals, some of which has been mentioned. One worked in prostitution and one paid for sex in the past. I think particularly of the contribution from Faoite — I hope that I pronounced that correctly — who entered prostitution at the age of 33 because she had developed a heroin addiction. She told the Committee in stark terms about the reality of what life was like for many who worked in prostitution. She described how she was not seen as fully human and was treated like an object by those who bought her.

I also think of the evidence of a former sex buyer. He stated that he had never met an empowered sex worker. That individual reckoned that between 5% and 7% of the prostitutes who he came across were minors. He also admitted to paying for sex with individuals who he thought were underage. He further suggested that, from a punter's perspective, the women were all the same and they would buy anyway. At the end of the session, he was asked whether criminalisation of the purchase of sexual services would have made a difference to him, and he emphatically said yes. To him, naming and shaming would be a massive deterrent.

Undoubtedly, some people have made a definite choice to work in prostitution. I recognise that. Such individuals gave evidence to the Justice Committee during its hearings on the Bill. They said that they enjoyed working in prostitution and have stridently opposed the introduction of this clause. However, while it is clear from the evidence that this group does not constitute a majority of those working in prostitution, the problem is that the current law is drafted in such a way that, as a matter of practice, it assumes exploitation to be the exception rather than the rule and, therefore, is not designed to protect the vulnerable.

Today, we face a choice. Do we want our legislation regarding the sale of sex to be defined out of regard for the vulnerable majority or out of regard for the privileged minority? There is no doubt in my mind that the current law, which tries to help the vulnerable majority and the privileged minority, effectively helps just the privileged minority. By contrast, the new law that I am proposing is defined out of primary regard for the vulnerable majority: those who have been trafficked or are there due to exploitative circumstances.

The imperative for clause 6 is greatly compounded by the publication on Friday of an Ipsos MORI poll, which referred specifically to my proposal in this Bill and the proportion of victims of trafficking found in sexual exploitation. In that light — not in a vague way, but in the knowledge that this proposal was to be debated in this Assembly — the survey asked whether people believed that we as a country should criminalise the purchase of sexual services. A staggering 78% of those surveyed across Northern Ireland said that they believed or strongly believed that Northern Ireland should criminalise paying for sex. Only 13% did not believe that we should take that step. Moreover, when we look at the views of just women, we see that the 78% rises to 82%. Of particular interest was the fact that support was high amongst young people, at 82% among 16- to 34-year-olds. This data indicates overwhelming public support for this clause.

I must respond to some of the counterarguments. During the course of debate on my Bill over the past months, those opposed to clause 6 have regularly used one particular argument. They allege that criminalising the purchase of sexual services could drive prostitution underground — this argument is commonly heard — making it more difficult to help those working in prostitution. Although this argument seems superficially plausible, it falls apart under scrutiny. I will make two points about this. First, prostitution in Northern Ireland is largely very much an underground activity already. Secondly, it is patently obvious that prostitution can never entirely go underground. For money to be made in prostitution, customers are required, and to obtain customers those involved or controlling prostitution need to advertise sexual services publicly. This may be in newspapers or on the Internet, and if the average punter can find an ad for sexual services, so can the police. This was made clear to us on our trip to Sweden. Consequently, this tired argument needs to be put out to pasture once and for all. It is not credible and not rooted in any evidence whatsoever.

There is the related concern that changing the law would make prostitution more dangerous for individuals working in the industry. The evidence is that prostitution is already extremely dangerous. In the Irish Medical Organisation's 2012 submission to the Dáil Committee on Justice, Defence and Equality, the representative body for 5,000 medical practitioners in the Republic of Ireland pointed to a women's health project in 2007, which showed that the majority of women involved in prostitution who came to the project recorded symptoms related to sexually transmitted infections. It also pointed to the fact that one study in London has found that mortality rates are estimated to be 12 times higher among women involved in prostitution than the national average. In the 2011 DOJ research, the author stated:

"Many women involved in prostitution in Northern Ireland are subjected to extreme violence."

After the Swedish law came into effect, the National Board of Health and Welfare there stated, in 2003:

"Police who have studied the occurrence of violence have not found any evidence of an increase."

The 2008 prostitution inquiry conducted in Sweden also established that the claims made by opponents about a worsening situation were baseless.

Data from Norway shows a decrease in severe violence against those in prostitution. In 2012, research showed a halving of the number of people in prostitution who had experienced rape since purchasing sex was criminalised in 2009, compared to those surveyed in 2008. Violence from pimps was also halved and violence from clients was down from 89% to 74%. The recent evaluation of the Norwegian law states that researchers did not find:

"any evidence of more violence against prostitutes after the ban on buying sex entered into force".

There are those who talk about conflating prostitution and trafficking. Many critics of this clause, including the Minister of Justice, have stated that clause 6 conflates human trafficking and prostitution in an unhelpful fashion. However, it is important to point out that, as José Mendes Bota, the Council of Europe's General Rapporteur on violence against women has put it:

"Although we understand that prostitution and trafficking are separate phenomena, there is a strong link between prostitution and trafficking."

It is also important to have regard for what the EU anti-trafficking coordinator told us, just the week before last, during her trip to Northern Ireland. She said that prostitution, organised crime and human trafficking are linked.

She said that at a Department of Justice public event, and she stated clearly:

"You can quote anything I say".

Indeed, the Department of Justice's 'Research paper investigating the issues for women in Northern Ireland involved in prostitution and exploring best practice elsewhere', which was published in January 2011, outlined on page 8 that those two phenomena are "closely interlinked". The research document is rarely mentioned now by the Department of Justice, officials or the Minister, but it made it very clear that one of the main drivers for human trafficking in this Province is for the purpose of sexual exploitation.

In a context where the NRM figures clearly demonstrate that not only is the demand for paid sex the single biggest driver for trafficking to Northern Ireland but well over 50% of victims suffer sexual exploitation, we must do something to address that demand if we are to see an end to human trafficking. Moreover, in a Bill that seeks to tackle human trafficking and other forms of exploitation, addressing exploitation and prostitution is not merely appropriate, it is something that should be expected. Policymakers have long lambasted the tendency to place everything in policy silos that ignore the relationships between different phenomena that are all tied up together. To that end, I am very proud that my Human Trafficking and Exploitation Bill presents a very effective piece of joined-up government. That is not a weakness; it is a very great strength.

It is asserted by some that we need more research and debate. Let me be very clear: there has actually been a huge amount of debate on this issue. There have been two public consultations: mine and the Justice Committee's. The issue was the subject of six hours' debate at Second Reading. The Justice Committee took the unusual course of extending its proceedings for a full six months to properly look into the evidence. It took written and oral evidence from a wide range of witnesses. It visited Sweden and the Dáil specifically with clause 6 in mind. Its report runs to, I think, almost 1,200 pages, much of which is on clause 6. There have been numerous radio and television interviews and debates on the matter, and, today, we are debating the matter once again. The matter has been debated exhaustively.

Much has been said today about the research into prostitution that was published on Friday. I do not propose to go over all that ground again. Suffice it to say that I agree with the views of those around the House who believe that that research is flawed. It should not cause us to change direction on the matter. As I have outlined today, we have considerable evidence of a much more reliable standard from other jurisdictions than the document that the Minister gave me on Thursday.

Clause 6 sets out for us the best way forward on prostitution law reform. I am delighted that it is supported by such a broad section of Northern Ireland society, including organisations such as Women's Aid, the Irish Congress of Trade Unions, the hugely impressive Turn Off The Red Light campaign, the Evangelical Alliance, the Catholic Church, SPACE International and the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission. They have come out in favour of the approach that I have outlined.

I am also overwhelmed by the positive response to the Ipsos MORI poll: 78% in support was far greater than I imagined. I am particularly encouraged that that rises to 82% amongst young people. I am also encouraged to see the support that it is gaining internationally. I noted with interest that, in February this year, the European Parliament voted overwhelmingly for the Honeyball report — 349 votes to 139 — which supported criminalising paying for sex, and that, in April this year, the Council of Europe voted overwhelmingly — 82 to 17 — for the Mendes Boata report, which supports criminalising paying for sex. Other countries, such as Canada, are going down the same route. Members, I believe that this is the right approach to take and I believe that we have the evidence to go forward.

10.45 pm

I will end with a quote from ACC Drew Harris. Speaking to the Justice Committee in February, he said:

"A demand now exists for prostitutes, for prostitution in our society and on the island of Ireland as a whole. Crime gangs regard it as high-yielding in hard cash and of low risk."

I hope that the Bill will start changing that situation and I urge Members across the House to vote in favour of clause 6.

Before we come to the question of the vote on whether clause 6 should stand part of the Bill, let me set out the details of the amendments I have tabled and make some comments on the other amendments tabled. There are nine amendments in this group that I have put forward to improve the operation of the clause — amendment No 28 and amendment Nos 30 to 37. It is important to state at the outset that all the amendments I am proposing to the clause have been accepted as legally accurate and workable by the Attorney General.

The amendments I am proposing to clause 6 cover different areas. The first relates to payments. Amendment No 28 inserts a new clause 6(1A). This amendment ensures that the definition of payments set out in article 58 of the Sexual Offences (Northern Ireland) Order 2008 does not apply to the new offence of paying for the sexual services of a person. Subsection 3 of the clause contains a definition of "payment" that is to be used for the offence, but, for clarity, the Attorney General advised me that it should also be made clear that the article 58 definition of "payment" does not apply.

Amendment No 34 makes it clear that, in addition to an offence taking place if the payment is offered to the person offering the sexual service, an offence will also take place if the payment is made to someone controlling the person.

Amendment No 35 amends the definition of "payment" in subsection 3 of the clause. This was done to ensure that the clause actually achieved its intended effect. The Attorney General advised me that this phrase could unintentionally broaden the clause to include activities that there was no intention to criminalise, specifically, situations of mutually exchanged sexual activity where no other form of payment, material or financial, had been exchanged, but which could under the law have been viewed as a reciprocal exchange of sexual services. Consequently, I proposed the amendment.

Amendment No 30 deletes the phrase "over the age of 18" from revised article 64A(1). I have proposed this amendment to remove the anomaly, which was highlighted by the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission, whereby if an individual paid for sex with a child, which is a criminal offence under article 37 of the Sexual Offences (Northern Ireland) Order 2008, it would actually be harder to convict a person charged with that offence than it would be to convict someone charged under the proposed article 64A. This is because, if an individual is charged with paying for sex with a person under the age of 18, they can argue that they reasonably believed that the child was over 18. If that defence were successful, the prosecution would fail and no other prosecution route would be available, whereas, if the person had paid for sex with someone over the age of 18, no such defence would be available. Members will not be surprised to hear that that is not what I intended to do when I introduced clause 6 of my Bill. The Attorney General advised me that the best way to solve that problem was simply to delete the phrase "over the age of 18" from the clause.

Amendment Nos 31 and 32 would insert new wording into revised article 64A(2)(a) of the offence to mandate that, if someone is found guilty of paying for sexual services on summary conviction, most commonly in the Magistrates'

Court, they may be imprisoned for a term not exceeding six months, receive a fine, or both.

Amendment No 33 would insert new wording to 64A(2)(b) to mandate that a prison term of up to one year or a fine can be applied following a conviction under indictment. The amendment clarifies that a custodial sentence may be imposed on conviction under summary and indictment judgements, differentiating the maximum sentence available in the different courts.

Amendment No 36 introduces a new subsection 3A to the offence. This measure is introduced to deal with the claims that clause 6 could criminalise lap dancing or sexual services using methods of communication such as telephones or webcams. The amendment ensures that the two individuals have to be physically in each other's presence and that the actual physical touching by one party of the other is required. Again, this amendment has been checked by the Attorney General, and he informs me that the amendment will rule out clause 6 applying in these situations.

Amendment No 37 would introduce a new subsection 5, which would require an advertising campaign to ensure public awareness of the change effected by clause 6. To my mind, that amendment is crucial to the success of the approach introduced by clause 6. We need to make it clear to our society that paying for sex is unacceptable. Such advertisement, which played an important role when the law was changed in Sweden, is necessary to ensure that people are aware of the law, why it has been passed and how it now works.

I will turn now to address the other amendments to clause 6. Amendment No 29, proposed by Sinn Féin, would repeal the offence of loitering or soliciting for the purposes of prostitution. I am aware that some Members might have concerns that that amendment amounts to a wholesale decriminalisation of prostitution. Let me reassure Members that that is not the effect of this provision; if it were, I would resist it strongly. What the amendment does is remove the single offence of soliciting on the street for the purpose of selling sex. The existing law does little to address off-street prostitution. In this regard, clause 6 is a vast improvement since it addresses prostitution in all contexts on and off street. Moreover, it is worth emphasising that the amendment does not remove the more serious prostitution offences to do with brothel-keeping and controlling prostitution for gain where one person makes a profit through the prostitution of another. In practice, as Assistant Chief Constable Drew Harris told the Committee for Justice, although there is some very limited on-street prostitution in Northern Ireland, in the vast majority of cases, it is off street. The offence has a limited reach and, in practice, is seldom used. According to data that has been received from the PSNI under a freedom of information request, not a single arrest was made for soliciting for the purposes of prostitution between 2009 and 2013.

It is well understood by academics that those in street prostitution are among some of the most vulnerable people involved in prostitution as a whole. Given that the intention of my Bill is to address exploitation, and in light of the limited practical usage of the soliciting offence, I am content to accept the amendment.

I will speak briefly about amendment No 38, which is also proposed by Sinn Féin. This amendment relates to the provision in subsection 6 of the new offence requiring the Department of Justice to review the data on the operation of the offence and to report to the Assembly. Amendment No 38 sets out specific matters for consideration in that report, namely the nature of trafficking into prostitution, the number of arrests and convictions under the clause 6 offence and the new consolidated trafficking and slavery offences in this Bill, and finally the impact of the offence on those in prostitution. The matters listed in the amendment are all subjects that I would have expected to be covered in a report under subsection 6, but I am very happy to accept this amendment.

I should also make some comments about amendment No 39, which introduces a new clause 6A to increase the time limit for investigating the current article 64A offence to three years. In the event that the House decided to reject clause 6, I would support the Minister's amendment. It is manifestly obvious that giving the police three years to investigate this offence rather than six months will make the current offence more effective. However, as I set out in detail at the beginning of my speech, I want to be very clear that I do not believe that this measure goes far enough. I do not believe that this caveated offence will ever be an effective deterrent against purchasing sexual services in Northern Ireland. Even with the increased time for investigation, it will prove very difficult for the police and prosecution services to convict many individuals for this offence. My prediction is that, if the Assembly supports amendment No 39 over clause 6, we will be back looking at the issue in the future once it becomes apparent that this approach simply does not go far enough.

Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice): A lot has been said on this particular group of amendments. I will try to be finished by midnight.

Perhaps I should start with some of the amendments to clause 6, which did not get an awful lot of attention during the general debate but which have just been referred to by Lord Morrow in some detail.

Certainly, as he highlighted, amendment No 28 is a fairly technical amendment. If clause 6 were to be passed, I would have no particular issues with it. Amendment No 29, as he correctly highlights, repeals the offence of soliciting on the street in circumstances where we know that there are virtually no women working on the streets these days; prostitution tends to be conducted in a different way, such as in a building or advertised on the Internet. The estimate from the Queen's research was that no more than 20 women are working the streets of Northern Ireland. So, by removing that vestige of criminalisation of women, it seems to be in keeping with the proposals of clause 6. However, it is the case that there are other aspects where women may still be criminalised. Lord Morrow referred to brothel-keeping. As I understand the law, it currently prescribes that, if two women are working together, that constitutes a brothel. It may be that those who propose that particular amendment might wish to revisit some of those aspects, because it seems to me that there is a difference between two women working together in the interests of protection and those who are working in a brothel controlled by pimps.

(Mr Principal Deputy Speaker [Mr Mitchel McLaughlin] in the Chair)

For amendment No 30, Lord Morrow has highlighted the issue of removing the age limit of 18. That is an issue that I see no difficulty with whatsoever. The reality is that there are laws on the statute book that deal with the issue. The current law on paying for the sexual services of a prostitute subjected to force applies with no lower age limit, and there are much more serious offences regarding paying for the sexual services of a child, which can actually carry a maximum penalty of up to life imprisonment. Whilst I see nothing wrong with the amendment, it does not add very much, given the offences that already exist. However, the House may well see fit to pass it anyway.

As Lord Morrow highlighted, amendment Nos 31, 32 and 33 relate to penalties. If I am opposing clause 6, it would seem illogical to oppose an increase in the penalties that fall within that. I suspect that other Members will perhaps take their advice from Lord Morrow and not from me.

Amendment Nos 34 and 35 deal with payments, whether through a third party or, as Lord Morrow put it, for mutually-exchanged sexual services. Again, if those amendments are to be passed, I see no reason why those should be abolished.

Amendment No 36 addresses one key concern raised by some of us who have difficulties with the way that clause 6 was opposed. It certainly removes things such as webcam sex or telephone sex. What I am not sure that it necessarily does, although he highlighted it specifically, is relate to issues such as lap dancing. There may be issues that would need to be revisited at Further Consideration Stage in that respect as well. If what he is seeking to do is remove some of the non-physical aspects of sexual services, it is clear that the amendment as it currently stands is doing that. I am not sure that it goes quite as far as he believes it does, and I am happy to discuss that with Lord Morrow, if the amendment goes through, to see whether further refinement to it might be appropriate at a later stage.

The specific issue I have some difficulty with is in amendment No 37. I really have my doubts as to whether we need to have an advertising campaign to raise public awareness of this issue. If this issue is not the one that has attracted the greatest attention from the work done by the Assembly over many years, I would be very surprised. I think that few people would be unaware of the debate or the consequences of the debate, assuming that we finish in time for the morning news bulletins.

Therefore, I have a little difficulty with the suggestion of an advertising campaign. We are well publicising this issue.

11.00 pm

There is also a minor technical detail. There are at least one or two Ministers and former Ministers in the House at the moment. As I understand, under the Executive policy, there is a specific bar on advertising campaigns in general on an economic basis. I believe that the single exception is road safety campaigns; if the Minister of the Environment were here, he might keep me right on that point. So, it runs contrary to policy. I believe that it is possible to publicise what is being done in the fight against trafficking through the kind of work that my staff did when they ran a stall at St George's Market on Saturday and the work being done by our NGO engagement partners and elements of the Organised Crime Task Force. I do not feel that paying for advertising is necessary to ensure that we raise awareness, although I entirely agree that we need to raise awareness.

Amendment No 38 looks at the issue of what might be included in the annual report that the Department must publish. I have no problem with its general principle. There are some slight issues that might require amendment at Further Consideration Stage if the House is minded to support this. If that is the case, I would certainly be happy to discuss with Lord Morrow and Mr McCartney whether some fine-tuning would make it a better amendment than it currently is. However, I am happy with the principle of it as it stands.

It is clear that the issue of prostitution has exercised Members more than the other aspects of the Bill. The fact that we put through 28 amendments in the first group with virtually no dissent anywhere but have had 19 Members speak in the debate on this particular group shows that it is a significant issue. It is clearly a moral issue for many of us. One Member said that he had moral difficulties. I do not think that many of us have moral difficulties in our concerns about prostitution. The issue is the best way to address it.

There are clearly attractions in voting for the proposal as it stands. I doubt that any of us thinks that prostitution is a good thing. In particular, no one wants to see women being subjected to fear, violence, coercion of any kind, threats or the circumstances that forced them into selling sex against their will. That is an issue that is morally reprehensible and that we would all wish to address. No one wants to imagine what that must be like. No one wants to imagine the society that permits men to use women in such a way. On that, we are all agreed. However, the issue is the best and most effective way of dealing with this that deals with trafficking and exploitation and does not become a catch-all that may have problems elsewhere.

Let me just refer briefly to some of the points that have been made during the debate. I will not attribute them to individuals since many of them were made by a number of people.

Whilst clearly there is evidence from groups such as Women's Aid that the women that they see are abused and exploited, whether for sexual services or other things, there is evidence from the research that Queen's provided for us that shows that, for some, entry into prostitution is an issue of choice. That is not something that is attractive or that we wish to hear, but it is a fact. There is no doubt that there are normative effects of a law. However, I think that there are issues around drink-driving, for example, that were accepted to be inappropriate antisocial behaviour at the point that specific breath test limits were introduced and so on. That is different from this. Frankly, it is also the case that those kind of normative effects work when you are trying to lead a large body of society.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I appeal to Members that we should acknowledge that the Minister has served a heroic stint throughout this debate. He has listened to us. I think that we should listen to him.

Mr Ford: Thank you, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker. The normative effects may apply when there is a body of opinion in society around a change being needed. We know from the statistics from the Queen's research that roughly only 3% of men in Northern Ireland use the services of a prostitute in the course of a year. That is very different from the normative effect where you are seeking to alter the opinions of 25% or 30% of the population.

We also know that there is a variety of different reports on the effects of the Swedish experience. My visit to Stockholm established different views between some of the public agencies, the police and prosecutors, and some of those who were working in support of women involved in prostitution. It was not that clear-cut. What was clear is that the proportion of men who use prostitutes in Sweden is higher than it is in Northern Ireland, despite the law. The number of complaints stood at 1,277 in 2010. That is a significant number of complaints for something that is supposed to have had a significant effect. It may have had an effect, but I also noticed that not one Member — unless they did so during one of my more sleepy moments — made any reference to the point that I made about telephone intercept evidence being a key part of the way in which the Swedish police fight the use of prostitutes. That would simply be impossible within our standards. It would be appropriate to use such telephone intercepts if we were talking about serious organised crimes, though I am happy to say that it would not be the Minister of Justice who would authorise them, if we were talking about trafficking on a scale. It would not be appropriate to use them against ordinary clients or ordinary punters. So, there are real issues with the difficulties that we have that have not been addressed.

It is clear that there is a link into prostitution for women who are trafficked, but it is not clear that prostitution goes back the same way into the issue of trafficking, in general.

I move now to the police position. Nobody has said that the police said that the law would be unenforceable. As Members have said, it is the role of the police to enforce the law as we make it. Police officers, including Deputy Chief Constable Drew Harris, have said that it is hard to quantify how much of a deterrent this law would be. They have said that their focus would be on organised crime groups and serious harm, which is what I, as Minister of Justice, would hope their focus would be on at any time. The evidential opportunities are limited, certainly if evidential opportunities rely on the word of the prostitute. There is also a qualification about impact.

A number of Members, particularly from the DUP Benches, questioned the research that was published last week by my Department, and there were allegations of bias. I certainly regret the time it takes to procure research under our arcane system, which requires multiple tenders and so on. It is unfortunate, but I asked for it to be produced in order to inform the debate. I hoped that Members would have read it for reasons other than to seek something to object to within it.

Comments were made about the research being biased. I consider that those comments impugn the reputation of those who conducted the research. I leave it to Queen's, the University of Berlin and UCG to make their response to that. I believe that it is entirely possible for an academic — and, sometimes, easier than it is for a politician — to have a view yet honestly represent the evidence that is put before them.

As detailed in the report, despite what some Members have said, detailed steps were taken to guard against confirmation bias — the idea that you ensured that the interpretation of data comes out to support pre-existing views. The details of that are set out in chapter 2 of the report, but nobody referred to it. It acknowledges, honestly, the problems that the survey methods were likely to result in, and it makes allowances for them. The number of people who were involved in the online survey, and the detailed interviews that were held with sex workers, clients, experts and service providers, give us a good picture of what the situation is in Northern Ireland, allowing for the fact that many workers and clients are mobile between the different jurisdictions of these islands and, indeed, further afield. Obviously, the websites on which much of the advertising takes place are not confined to one jurisdiction.

Contrary to what some have suggested, the report does not make recommendations. It analyses and reports findings, as it was asked to do. The research was quantitative and qualitative, and, for the first time, it had a focus on Northern Ireland and our particular concerns. I have no doubt that it did not make comfortable reading for many of us, but many Members may have found that it challenged the stereotypical picture of the sex industry.

I do not believe that we can ignore the voices that we heard. We have a responsibility to ensure that what we put into law is not going to make the lives of women, predominantly, and, as others have said, some men who are involved in the sex trade, more difficult or more dangerous. It is clear that many of those who are involved in the sex trade selling sexual services have made an independent, informed choice. That is clearly not the picture for all, but it is clearly the picture for some. We have to ensure that we fully support the measures that target those who are exploiting others and which provide support to those who are involved in the sex trade who are subject to force and coercion. That is what I believe we can do without clause 6 as it stands.

In summary, there are two large pieces of the jigsaw missing from the picture that has been painted today. I believe that those are two major flaws in the policy arguments that we have so far heard about letting this clause stand part of the Bill. One is that we now have evidence from the survey to show that criminalisation will not depress the market. The research report quotes the figure that only 16% of buyers would be prepared to change their behaviour if this law were enacted. We also have seen evidence that over 60% of women selling sexual services fear that criminalisation will make their lives more risky. In addition, we continue to see that there are major problems in enforcing such an offence. Those are problems that have been highlighted in a number of different areas, and I repeat the point that telephone intercepts may work in Sweden and may work against those involved in organised crime, but we could not use them against the individual punters. Resources will have to be devoted to the area in which we all want to see action taken, against those who engage in organised crime and organised trafficking.

My Department will be studying the research commissioned by Queen's and other relevant evidence on the wider issue of prostitution in Northern Ireland. I will consider what legislative change is necessary or appropriate for Northern Ireland in the future, but, at this stage, I remain unconvinced that clause 6 will be the appropriate way to move forward. However, if it is the case that the House is minded to support that, I will certainly look to make the adjustments that I have highlighted in some of my comments, working, as we have done over a period of months with Lord Morrow and with the proposers of some of the other amendments, at Further Consideration Stage.

Finally, in conclusion on this point, I emphasise that my amendment No 39 and the insertion of new clause 6A is not an alternative to clause 6. I believe that it is something that is entirely appropriate to stand, even if clause 6 goes ahead. It may or may not be effective, but there is nothing to suggest that it is not as well worth doing as many as the other amendments to clause 6. So, I trust that we can unite around amendment No 39, whatever minor differences we may have at the point earlier. We are all agreed on the principle. The unfortunate thing is that we have not yet seen the evidence on how we can agree on the method.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Members, although we have debated opposition to clause 6, we must first dispose of the amendments to the clause before putting the question on clause 6 stand part. Amendment No 28 made: In page 3, line 26, at end insert

“(2) In Article 58 (Interpretation of this Part) at the end of paragraph (3) insert “other than in Article 64A”.— [Lord Morrow.]

Amendment No 29 made: In clause 6, page 3, line 26, at end insert

“(2) Article 59 (Loitering or soliciting for purposes of prostitution) is repealed.”— [Mr McCartney.]

Amendment No 30 made: In clause 6, page 3, line 31, leave out “over the age of 18”.— [Lord Morrow.]

Amendment No 31 made: In clause 6, page 3, line 35, after “to” insert

“imprisonment for a term not exceeding 6 months or”.— [Lord Morrow.]

Amendment No 32 made: In clause 6, page 3, line 36, after “scale” insert “, or both”.— [Lord Morrow.]

Amendment No 33 made:

In clause 6, page 3, line 37, before “to imprisonment” insert “on conviction on indictment”.— [Lord Morrow.]

Amendment No 34 made:

In clause 6, page 3, line 39, after “advantage” insert

“to B or any person other than B”.— [Lord Morrow.]

Amendment No 35 made:

In clause 6, page 3, line 41, leave out “(including sexual services)”.— [Lord Morrow.]

Amendment No 36 made:

In clause 6, page 3, line 41, at end insert

“(3A) No offence is committed under this article unless the sexual services that are provided or are to be provided by B to A involve—

(a) B being physically in A’s presence,

(b) B touching A or A touching B, and

(c) the touching is sexual.”— [Lord Morrow.]

Amendment No 37 made:

In clause 6, page 4, line 4, leave out “must raise awareness of this offence.” and insert

“shall conduct an advertising campaign to ensure public awareness of the change effected by this section.”— [Lord Morrow.]

Amendment No 38 made: In clause 6, page 4, line 7, at end insert

“(7) In particular the report must set out—

(a) information on the nature and extent of prostitution connected to human trafficking including numbers of arrests and convictions during the period covered by the report in connection with an offence under this Article or section 1A, 1B or 1D of the Human Trafficking and Exploitation (Further Provisions and Support for Victims) Act (Northern Ireland) 2014;

(b) the extent to which, in the opinion of the Department, this Article has operated to reduce human trafficking; and

(c) the impact of this Article on the safety and well-being of prostitutes.”— [Mr McCartney.]

Question put, That the clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill.

New Clause

Amendment No 40 made:

After clause 6 insert

“Offence of forced marriage

Offence of forced marriage

6B.—(1) A person commits an offence if he or she—

(a) uses violence, threats or any other form of coercion for the purpose of causing another person to enter into a marriage, and

(b) believes, or ought reasonably to believe, that the conduct may cause the other person to enter into the marriage without free and full consent.

(2) It is irrelevant whether the conduct mentioned in paragraph (a) of subsection (1) is directed at the victim of the offence under that subsection or another person.

(3) In relation to a victim who is incapable of consenting by reason of mental disorder, the offence under subsection (1) is capable of being committed by any conduct carried out for the purpose of causing the victim to enter into a marriage (whether or not the conduct amounts to violence, threats or any other form of coercion).

(4) In this section—

'marriage' means any religious or civil ceremony of marriage (whether or not legally binding);

'mental disorder' has the meaning given by the Mental Health (Northern Ireland) Order 1986.

(5) A person commits an offence if he or she—

(a) practises any form of deception with the intention of causing another person to leave the United Kingdom, and

(b) intends the other person to be subjected to conduct outside the United Kingdom that is an offence under subsection (1) or would be an offence under that subsection if the victim were in Northern Ireland.

(6) A person commits an offence under subsection (1) or (5) only if, at the time of the conduct or deception—

(a) the person or the victim or both of them are in Northern Ireland,

(b) neither the person nor the victim is in Northern Ireland but at least one of them is habitually resident in Northern Ireland, or

(c) neither the person nor the victim is in the United Kingdom but at least one of them is a UK national.

(7) A person guilty of an offence under this section is liable—

(a) on summary conviction, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 6 months or to a fine not exceeding the statutory maximum, or both;

(b) on conviction on indictment, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 7 years."— [Mr Hamilton (The Minister of Finance and Personnel).]

New clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Opposition to clause 7 has already been debated.

Question, That the clause stand part of the Bill, put and negatived.

Clause No 7 disagreed to.

Clause 8 (Victim of trafficking in human beings)

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: We now come to the fourth debate, which concerns amendment Nos 41 to 49 and 51 to 53 as well as opposition to clauses 8, 9, 10, 12 and 14 standing part. These amendments deal with new duties on the Department to provide support, assistance and protection to potential victims of trafficking, and support for those wishing to exit prostitution. This group also deals with proposals for a child trafficking guardian or independent legal guardian. Members will note that amendment No 41 is mutually exclusive with clause 9 standing part. Amendment No 42 is mutually exclusive with clause 10. Amendment Nos 46 and 47 are mutually exclusive with clause 12 and with each other. Amendment No 48 is mutually exclusive with clause 8, and amendment No 53 is mutually exclusive with clause 14 standing part.

If that is perfectly clear, I call Lord Morrow to speak to clause 8 stand part and to address the other amendments and oppositions in the group.

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

The following amendments stood on the Marshalled List:

No 41: After clause 9 insert

"Interpretation of this Part

9A.—(1) For the purposes of this Part there is a conclusive determination that a person is, or is not, a victim of trafficking in human beings when, on completion of the identification process required by Article 10 of the Trafficking Convention, a competent authority concludes that the person is, or is not, such a victim.

(2) In this Part—

"competent authority" means a person who is a competent authority of the United Kingdom for the purposes of the Trafficking Convention;

"the Trafficking Convention" means the Council of Europe Convention on Action against Trafficking in Human Beings (done at Warsaw on 16 May 2005);

"trafficking in human beings" has the same meaning as in the Trafficking Convention."— [Lord Morrow.]

No 42: After clause 10 insert

"Assistance and support pending determination by competent authority

10A.—(1) The Department must ensure that a person to whom this section applies is provided with assistance and support in accordance with this section.

(2) This section applies to a person if—

(a) that person is aged 18 or over or, in a case where the age of the person is uncertain, the Department reasonably believes that person is aged 18 or over; and

(b) a reference relating to that person has been, or is about to be, made to the competent authority for a determination for the purposes of Article 10 of the Trafficking Convention as to whether there are reasonable grounds to believe that the person is a victim of trafficking in human beings.

(3) Assistance and support is to be provided under this section until there is made in relation to that person—

(a) a determination that there are not reasonable grounds to believe that the person is a victim of trafficking in human beings; or

(b) a conclusive determination that the person is or is not a victim of trafficking in human beings;

but if a conclusive determination that a person is a victim of trafficking in human beings is made within the relevant period, assistance and support is to be provided until the end of that period.

(4) The relevant period is the period of 45 days from the date on which the determination mentioned in subsection (2)(b) is made by the competent authority.

(5) Assistance and support provided to a person under this section—

(a) must not be conditional on the person's acting as a witness in any criminal proceedings;

(b) must only be provided with the agreement of that person;

(c) must be provided in a manner which takes due account of the needs of that person as regards safety and protection from harm;

(d) must be provided to meet the assessed needs of that person, having regard in particular to any special needs or vulnerabilities of that person caused by gender, pregnancy, physical or mental illness, disability or being the victim of serious violence or serious abuse.

(6) Assistance and support under this section must be offered from a person who is of the same gender as the person receiving it.

(7) The assistance and support which may be provided under this section includes, but is not be restricted to, the provision of—

(a) appropriate and safe accommodation;

(b) material assistance (including financial assistance);

(c) assistance in obtaining healthcare services (including counselling);

(d) appropriate information on any matter of relevance or potential relevance to the particular circumstances of the person;

(e) translation and interpretation services;

(f) assistance in obtaining legal advice or representation;

(g) assistance with repatriation.

(8) Where assistance and support has been provided to any person under this section, it may continue to be provided even if that person leaves Northern Ireland.

(9) Where—

(a) assistance and support has been provided to a person under this section; and

(b) that person ceases, by virtue of a conclusive determination that the person is a victim of trafficking in human beings or the ending of the relevant period, to be a person to whom assistance and support is to be provided under this section, the Department may nevertheless ensure that assistance and support continues to be provided to that person under this section for such further period as the Department thinks necessary.

(10) Nothing in this section affects the entitlement of any person to assistance and support under any other statutory provision."— [Lord Morrow.]

No 43: After clause 10 insert

"Assistance and Support for Exiting Prostitution

10B.—(1) The Department of Health, Social Services, and Public Safety must ensure that there is a programme of assistance and support made available to a person who wishes to leave prostitution.

(2) Assistance and support provided under this section—

(a) is not conditional on the person's willingness to act as a witness;

(b) shall be provided with the agreement of the person; and

(c) shall take due account of the victim's safety and protection needs, including being offered assistance from a person of the same gender.

(3) Nothing in this section affects the entitlement of any person to assistance and support under any other statutory provision.

(4) For the purposes of this section "prostitution" has the same meaning as in Article 58 of the Sexual Offences (Northern Ireland) Order 2008."— [Lord Morrow.]

No 44: After clause 10 insert

"Strategy on assistance and support for exiting prostitution

10B.The Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety shall, at least once in every year, publish a strategy, in conjunction with other government departments, to ensure that a programme of assistance and support is made available to a person who wishes to leave prostitution."— [Mr McCartney.]

No 45: In clause 11, page 6, line 19, leave out from ", by order" to end of line 25 and insert

"issue guidance as to—

(a) the procedures to be followed by a person to whom this section applies to apply for compensation under the Criminal Injuries (Compensation) (Northern Ireland) Order 2002;

(b) the grounds on which compensation may be awarded under that Order; and

(c) the arrangements available to assist and support such a person in applying for such compensation.

(3) This section applies to a person if (and only if) there has been a conclusive determination that the person is a victim of trafficking in human beings."— [Lord Morrow.]

No 46: After clause 12 insert

"Child trafficking guardian

12A.—(1) The Regional Health and Social Care Board must, in accordance with this section, make arrangements to enable a person (a "child trafficking guardian") to be appointed to assist, represent and support a child to whom this section applies.

(2) This section applies to a child if—

(a) a reference relating to that child has been, or is about to be, made to a competent authority for a determination for the purposes of Article 10 of the Trafficking Convention as to whether there are reasonable grounds to believe that the child is a victim of trafficking in human beings; and

(b) there has not been a conclusive determination that the child is not such a victim; and for the purposes of this subsection a determination which has been challenged by way of proceedings for judicial review shall not be treated as conclusive until those proceedings are finally determined.

(3) Arrangements under this section must—

(a) be made with a registered charity (within the meaning of the Charities Act (Northern Ireland) 2008);

(b) provide for the appointment of a person as the child trafficking guardian for a child to whom this section applies to be made by that charity;

(c) ensure that a person is not so appointed by that charity unless that person—

(i) is an employee of the charity; and

(ii) is eligible to be so appointed in accordance with regulations under subsection (4);

(d) provide for the appointment of a child trafficking guardian only where the person with parental responsibility for the child—

(i) is not in regular contact with the child or is outside the United Kingdom;

(ii) is suspected of having committed an offence under section 1B in relation to the child; or

(iii) for other reasons has interests which conflict with those of the child;

(e) include provision for the termination of the appointment of a child trafficking guardian, including in particular provision for such termination—

(i) if the child ceases to be a child to whom this section applies;

(ii) on the child attaining the age of 18 (unless subsection (9) applies);

(iii) on paragraph (d) ceasing to apply in relation to the child;

(iv) where, after consulting the child trafficking guardian, the Regional Health and Social Care Board is of the opinion that it is no longer necessary to continue the appointment because long-term arrangements have been made in relation to the child.

(4) The Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety shall by regulations make provision for—

(a) the training and qualifications required for a person to be eligible for appointment as a child trafficking guardian;

(b) the support to be provided for, and the supervision of, a child trafficking guardian.

(5) A child trafficking guardian appointed in relation to a child must at all times act in the best interests of the child.

(6) The functions of a child trafficking guardian include (where appropriate)—

(a) ascertaining the views of the child in relation to matters affecting the child;

(b) making representations to, and liaising with, bodies or persons responsible for—

(i) providing care, accommodation, health services, education or translation and interpretation services to or in respect of the child; or

(ii) otherwise taking decisions in relation to the child;

(c) assisting the child to obtain legal or other advice, assistance and representation, including (where necessary) the appointment and instructing of legal representatives to act on behalf of the child;

(d) consulting regularly with the child and keeping the child informed of legal and other proceedings affecting the child and any other matters affecting the child;

(e) contributing to a plan to safeguard and promote the future welfare of the child based on an individual assessment of that child's best interests;

(f) providing a link between the child and any body or person who may provide services to the child;

(g) assisting in establishing contact with members of the child's family, where the child so wishes and it is in the child's best interests;

(h) accompanying the child to meetings or on other occasions.

(7) Any person or body providing services or taking administrative decisions in relation to a child for whom a child trafficking guardian has been appointed under this section must recognise, and pay due regard to, the functions of the child trafficking guardian and must (to the extent otherwise permitted by law) provide the child trafficking guardian with access to such information relating to the child as will enable the child trafficking guardian to carry out his or her functions effectively.

(8) The Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety may by regulations confer additional functions on child trafficking guardians.

(9) The arrangements under this section may provide for a child trafficking guardian appointed in relation to a person under the age of 18 to continue (with the consent of that person) to act in relation to that person after that person attains the age of 18 but is under the age of 21.

(10) In this section—

“administrative decision” does not include a decision taken by a court or tribunal;

“parental responsibility” has the meaning given by Article 6 of the Children (Northern Ireland) Order 1995, except that it does not include parental responsibility conferred by a care order (within the meaning of Article 49(1) of that Order).— [Lord Morrow.]

No 46: After clause 12 insert

“Child trafficking guardian

12A.—(1) The Regional Health and Social Care Board must, in accordance with this section, make arrangements to enable a person (a “child trafficking guardian”) to be appointed to assist, represent and support a child to whom this section applies.

(2) This section applies to a child if—

(a) a reference relating to that child has been, or is about to be, made to a competent authority for a determination for the purposes of Article 10 of the Trafficking Convention as to whether there are reasonable grounds to believe that the child is a victim of trafficking in human beings; and

(b) there has not been a conclusive determination that the child is not such a victim;

and for the purposes of this subsection a determination which has been challenged by way of proceedings for judicial review shall not be treated as conclusive until those proceedings are finally determined.

(3) Arrangements under this section must—

(a) be made with a registered charity (within the meaning of the Charities Act (Northern Ireland) 2008);

(b) provide for the appointment of a person as the child trafficking guardian for a child to whom this section applies to be made by that charity;

(c) ensure that a person is not so appointed by that charity unless that person—

(i) is an employee of the charity; and

(ii) is eligible to be so appointed in accordance with regulations under subsection (4);

(d) provide for the appointment of a child trafficking guardian only where the person with parental responsibility for the child—

(i) is not in regular contact with the child or is outside the United Kingdom;

(ii) is suspected of having committed an offence under section 1B in relation to the child; or

(iii) for other reasons has interests which conflict with those of the child;

(e) include provision for the termination of the appointment of a child trafficking guardian, including in particular provision for such termination—

(i) if the child ceases to be a child to whom this section applies;

(ii) on the child attaining the age of 18 (unless subsection (9) applies);

(iii) on paragraph (d) ceasing to apply in relation to the child;

(iv) where, after consulting the child trafficking guardian, the Regional Health and Social Care Board is of the opinion that it is no longer necessary to continue the appointment because long-term arrangements have been made in relation to the child.

(4) The Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety shall by regulations make provision for—

(a) the training and qualifications required for a person to be eligible for appointment as a child trafficking guardian;

(b) the support to be provided for, and the supervision of, a child trafficking guardian.

(5) A child trafficking guardian appointed in relation to a child must at all times act in the best interests of the child.

(6) The functions of a child trafficking guardian include (where appropriate)—

(a) ascertaining the views of the child in relation to matters affecting the child;

(b) making representations to, and liaising with, bodies or persons responsible for—

(i) providing care, accommodation, health services, education or translation and interpretation services to or in respect of the child; or

(ii) otherwise taking decisions in relation to the child;

(c) assisting the child to obtain legal or other advice, assistance and representation, including (where necessary) the appointment and instructing of legal representatives to act on behalf of the child;

(d) consulting regularly with the child and keeping the child informed of legal and other proceedings affecting the child and any other matters affecting the child;

(e) contributing to a plan to safeguard and promote the future welfare of the child based on an individual assessment of that child's best interests;

(f) providing a link between the child and any body or person who may provide services to the child;

(g) assisting in establishing contact with members of the child's family, where the child so wishes and it is in the child's best interests;

(h) accompanying the child to meetings or on other occasions.

(7) Any person or body providing services or taking administrative decisions in relation to a child for whom a child trafficking guardian has been appointed under this section must recognise, and pay due regard to, the functions of the child trafficking guardian and must (to the extent otherwise permitted by law) provide the child trafficking guardian with access to such information relating to the child as will enable the child trafficking guardian to carry out his or her functions effectively.

(8) The Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety may by regulations confer additional functions on child trafficking guardians.

(9) The arrangements under this section may provide for a child trafficking guardian appointed in relation to a person under the age of 18 to continue (with the consent of that person) to act in relation to that person after that person attains the age of 18 but is under the age of 21.

No 47: After clause 12 insert

“Independent Legal Guardian

12A.—(1) The Regional Health and Social Care Board must, in accordance with this section, make arrangements to enable a person (an “Independent Legal Guardian”) to be appointed to assist, represent and support a child to whom this section applies.

(2) This section applies to a child if—

(a) a reference relating to that child has been, or is about to be, made to a competent authority for a determination for the purposes of Article 10 of the Trafficking Convention as to whether there are reasonable grounds to believe that the child is a victim of trafficking in human beings; and

(b) there has not been a conclusive determination that the child is not such a victim; and for the purposes of this subsection a determination which has been challenged by way of proceedings for judicial review shall not be treated as conclusive until those proceedings are finally determined; or

(c) there is reason to believe that the person is a separated child, in which case the person shall be presumed to be a separated child.

(3) Arrangements under this section must—

(a) be made with a registered charity (within the meaning of the Charities Act (Northern Ireland) 2008);

(b) provide for the appointment of a person as the Independent Legal Guardian for a child to whom this section applies to be made by that charity;

(c) ensure that a person is not so appointed by that charity unless that person—

(i) is an employee of the charity; and

(ii) is eligible to be so appointed in accordance with regulations under subsection (4);

(d) provide for the appointment of an Independent Legal Guardian only where the person with parental responsibility for the child—

(i) is not in regular contact with the child or is outside the United Kingdom;

(ii) is suspected of having committed an offence under section 1B in relation to the child; or

(iii) for other reasons has interests which conflict with those of the child;

(e) include provision for the termination of the appointment of an Independent Legal Guardian, including in particular provision for such termination—

(i) if the child ceases to be a child to whom this section applies;

(ii) on the child attaining the age of 18 (unless subsection (9) applies);

(iii) on paragraph (d) ceasing to apply in relation to the child;

(iv) where, after consulting the Independent Legal Guardian, the Regional Health and Social Care Board is of the opinion that it is no longer necessary to continue the appointment because long-term arrangements have been made in relation to the child.

(4) The Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety shall by regulations make provision for—

(a) the training and qualifications required for a person to be eligible for appointment as an Independent Legal Guardian;

(b) the support to be provided for, and the supervision of, an Independent Legal Guardian.

(5) An Independent Legal Guardian appointed in relation to a child must at all times act in the best interests of the child.

(6) The functions of an Independent Legal Guardian include (where appropriate)—

(a) ascertaining the views of the child in relation to matters affecting the child;

(b) making representations to, and liaising with, bodies or persons responsible for—

(i) providing care, accommodation, health services, education or translation and interpretation services to or in respect of the child; or

(ii) otherwise taking decisions in relation to the child;

(c) assisting the child to obtain legal or other advice, assistance and representation, including (where necessary) the appointment and instructing of legal representatives to act on behalf of the child;

(d) consulting regularly with the child and keeping the child informed of legal and other proceedings affecting the child and any other matters affecting the child;

(e) contributing to a plan to safeguard and promote the future welfare of the child based on an individual assessment of that child's best interests;

(f) providing a link between the child and any body or person who may provide services to the child;

(g) assisting in establishing contact with members of the child's family, where the child so wishes and it is in the child's best interests;

(h) accompanying the child to meetings or on other occasions.

(7) Any person or body providing services or taking administrative decisions in relation to a child for whom an Independent Legal Guardian has been appointed under this section must recognise, and pay due regard to, the functions of the guardian and must (to the extent otherwise permitted by law) provide the guardian with access to such information relating to the child as will enable the guardian to carry out his or her functions effectively.

(8) The Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety may by regulations confer additional functions on Independent Legal Guardians.

(9) The arrangements under this section may provide for an Independent Legal Guardian appointed in relation to a person under the age of 18 to continue (with the consent of that person) to act in relation to that person after that person attains the age of 18 but is under the age of 21.

(10) In this section—

"administrative decision" does not include a decision taken by a court or tribunal;

"parental responsibility" has the meaning given by Article 6 of the Children (Northern Ireland) Order 1995, except that it does not include parental responsibility conferred by a care order (within the meaning of Article 49(1) of that Order);

"separated child" means a child who is outside their country of origin and has been separated from both parents, or from their previous legal or customary care giver, but not necessarily from other relatives. This may include children who have been trafficked, enslaved or exploited but are accompanied by other adults including community members, friends or members of their extended family.”— [Mr McCartney.]

No 48: After clause 12 insert

“Defence for slavery or trafficking victims compelled to commit an offence

12B.—(1) Subject to subsection (9), a person is not guilty of an offence if—

(a) the person is over the age of 18 when the act which constitutes the offence was done;

(b) the person does that act because the person is compelled to do that act,

(c) the compulsion is attributable to slavery or to relevant exploitation, and

(d) a reasonable person in the same situation as the person and having the person’s relevant characteristics would have no realistic alternative to doing that act.

(2) “Relevant characteristics” means age, sex and any physical or mental illness or disability.

(3) A person may be compelled to do something by another person or by the person’s circumstances.

(4) Compulsion is attributable to slavery or to relevant exploitation only if—

(a) it is, or is part of, conduct which constitutes an offence under section 1A or conduct which constitutes relevant exploitation, or

(b) it is a direct consequence of a person being, or having been, a victim of an offence under section 1A or a victim of relevant exploitation.

(5) For the purposes of subsection (4) “relevant exploitation” is exploitation (within the meaning of section 1C) that is attributable to the exploited person being, or having been, a victim of an offence under section 1B.

(6) Subject to subsection (9), a person is not guilty of an offence if—

(a) the person is a child at the time the act which constitutes the offence is done; and

(b) that act was done as a direct consequence of the person being, or having been, a victim of an offence under section 1A or of relevant exploitation.

(7) For the purposes of subsection (6) “relevant exploitation” is exploitation which falls within one or more of subsections (2) to (5) of section 1C and is attributable to the exploited person being, or having been, a victim of an offence under section 1B.

(8) In this section references to an act include an omission.

(9) This section does not apply to an offence which, in the case of a person over the age of 21, is punishable on indictment with imprisonment for life or for a term of at least 5 years, other than any of the following offences under the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971—

(a) an offence under section 4(2) committed in respect of a Class B or Class C drug;

(b) an offence under section 5(2) committed in respect of a Class B drug;

(c) an offence under section 6(2).

(10) The Department may by order amend subsection (9).— [Lord Morrow.]

No 49: In clause 13, page 8, line 6, leave out “chief officer of police” and insert “Chief Constable”.— [Lord Morrow.]

No 51: In clause 13, page 8, line 21, leave out “professionals” and insert “persons”.— [Lord Morrow.]

No 52: In clause 13, page 8, line 28, leave out “a reasoned decision” to end of line 29 and insert

“the police officer in charge of the investigation decides to the contrary and records the reasons for that decision in writing.”.— [Lord Morrow.]

No 53: After clause 14 insert

“Special measures: amendments to the Criminal Evidence (Northern Ireland) Order 1999

14A.—(1) The Criminal Evidence (Northern Ireland) Order 1999 is amended as follows.

(2) In Article 3 after paragraph (1) insert—

“(1A) In this Order “a slavery or human trafficking offence” means an offence under—

(a) section 57, 58, 58A or 59 of the Sexual Offences Act 2003 (trafficking for sexual exploitation);

(b) section 4 of the Asylum and Immigration (Treatment of Claimants, etc.) Act 2004 (trafficking for exploitation);

(c) section 71 of the Coroners and Justice Act 2009 (slavery, servitude and forced or compulsory labour); or

(d) section 1A or 1B of the Human Trafficking and Exploitation (Criminal Justice and Support for Victims) Act (Northern Ireland) 2014 (slavery, servitude, forced or compulsory labour and human trafficking).”.

(3) In Article 5(4) (witnesses eligible for assistance on grounds of fear or distress about testifying) after “sexual offence” insert “or a slavery or human trafficking offence”.

(4) In Article 13(4)(a) (evidence given in private) after “sexual offence” insert “or a slavery or human trafficking offence”.

(5) In Article 21 (interpretation etc. of Part 2) after paragraph (4) insert—

“(5) For the purposes of this Part as it applies in relation to a witness who is the complainant in respect of a slavery or human trafficking offence, where the age of the witness is uncertain and there are reasons to believe that the witness is under the age of 18, that witness is presumed to be under the age of 18.”.

(6) In Article 22 (complainants in proceedings for sexual offences) after “sexual offence” insert “or a slavery or human trafficking offence”.

(7) In Article 23 (child complainants and other child witnesses) in paragraph (3) for sub-paragraph (cc) substitute—

“(cc) a slavery or human trafficking offence;”.

(8) In Article 39 (general supplementary provisions) after paragraph (2) insert—

“(3) Paragraph (2) is subject to Article 21(5).”.— [Lord Morrow.]

Lord Morrow: Thank you, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker. This group of amendments covers clauses in Part 2 to meet international obligations on assistance and support for trafficking victims, and Part 3, which sets out protections for victims within the criminal justice system. I start — [Interruption.]

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Order. Sorry, Lord Morrow, please continue.

Lord Morrow: — by seeking the Assembly’s agreement to remove clause 8, which seeks to ensure that trafficking victims who committed an offence as a result of being a victim of trafficking should not be prosecuted. It proved to be a clause that gave rise to a lot of concern.

After listening carefully to the evidence given to the Justice Committee, I propose to remove clause 8 and add new clause 12B, which would introduce a statutory defence in its place. Let me provide some context on how I came to this position.

I was reluctant to concede any ground on clause 8 because of the concerns of notable NGOs, such as the Anti-Trafficking Monitoring Group, the Law Centre and the Centre for Social Justice, about the prosecution of victims that was taking place. Nevertheless, this was the one clause that the Justice Committee was not able to support in its report, even though it supported the principle.

The Committee’s report sets out in detail the comments and concerns about the clause at paragraphs 201-260. I think that I can fairly summarise those concerns, which were that the clause would give blanket immunity to victims of trafficking and setting out a hierarchy of victims. There was a concern that, even if a victim committed a murder, they would not be prosecuted. That was not my intention, but it raised sufficient concerns to warrant further consideration.

I think it safe to say that Members from all sides of the House were sympathetic to the objective of clause 8; it was the detail that ran into difficulties. It is of real importance that victims of human trafficking, who are some of the most vulnerable people in this country, should not be criminalised for offences that they commit as a direct consequence of being trafficked. However, that should have certain limits, and I acknowledge that the clause as initially drafted was flawed in the breadth of offences that it covered.

I informed the Justice Committee, when I gave evidence before it in March, that I would wait to see how the Modern Slavery Bill, which is passing through Westminster, dealt with the subject of non-prosecution. The version of the Bill that was presented to the House of Commons in July this year for its First Reading included, in clause 39, a defence for slavery or trafficking victims compelled to commit an offence. That clause would allow human trafficking victims in England and Wales to raise a defence if they were accused of certain criminal offences that they were forced to commit as a result of being trafficked. That defence could not be used for serious violent offences or sexual offences but could apply to crimes such as cannabis cultivation. Following discussions with the Attorney General and the Department of Justice, it was agreed that a similar clause could be implemented in Northern Ireland. I will cover the detail of new clause 12B later, but I reassure Members that, in removing clause 8 as it stands, I am not proposing to remove the type of protection that I was seeking for victims. I am asking the Assembly to support a different approach at a later point in the Bill. I hope that Members will support that position.

Members will see that there are significant changes to Part 2. Clause 9 was intended to be an administrative clause, setting out definitions for Part 2 on who should be regarded as a victim of trafficking under the national referral mechanism, which is the identification process that the UK uses to meet its obligations under the European Convention on Action against Trafficking in Human Beings. The wording I used was based on a definition in Westminster legislation, the Legal Aid, Sentencing and Punishment of Offenders Act 2012. The revised definition proposed in new clause 9A, through amendment No 41, has the same effect but is set out much more succinctly than my original clause and is favoured by the Department of Justice, so I propose to remove the current clause and add a new clause in its place.

Like clause 9, the purpose of new clause 9A is to provide a definition of a victim of trafficking in order to be clear about who would and who would not be able to access the services I set out in this Part of the Bill. The current regime is that, when a person is referred to the national referral mechanism, they are provided with emergency support, and a decision will be made as to whether there are reasonable grounds to believe that they may be a victim. That is called a reasonable grounds decision. When a reasonable grounds decision is made that the person may be a victim, he or she can access 45 days of services during the so-called recovery and reflection period. There is then a second stage to the process, whereby it is concluded whether the person is a victim: a conclusive grounds decision. New clause 9A, like clause 9, defines when a conclusive determination is made and will be particularly relevant for determining when a person is eligible for compensation. The clause also provides a definition of the term “competent authority”, which is also relevant for new clauses 10A and 12A.

I propose to remove the original clause 10 and replace it with a new clause 10A, through amendment No 42. This requires some explanation. In the original version of my Bill, clause 10 would have impacted a number of Departments. However, in the months following my Bill passing Second Stage, it became apparent that that clause was necessary only with regard to the Department of Justice. The Department of Health, which currently provides support to confirmed victims of human trafficking and child victims, assured me that it was going to bring forward regulations that would allow victims of human trafficking to access primary and secondary health care. I understand that the Health Committee considered the draft Provision of Health Services to Persons not Ordinarily Resident (Amendment) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2014 in September, and we can expect them to come into operation in the coming months. To my mind, this is very much a positive step for some of the most vulnerable victims in our Province. In light of this assurance that children were covered by the Department of Health through the new regulations, I came to the view that it was sensible to remove my original clause and add a new clause, setting out what services the Department of Justice would provide to potential victims of trafficking. My original proposal for a 90-day period of support was made in recognition that it has been widely reported that recovery from the trauma of human trafficking can be a long and painful process. I am very pleased that, through the regulations being proposed by the Department of Health, victims of trafficking with leave to remain will be able to access healthcare support for a much longer period.

I am also pleased that new clause 10A, which I developed with the Department of Justice, contains discretionary powers that allow the Department to continue providing support to a particular victim beyond the usual 45-day period where the Department considers it necessary to do so. Those two elements go a long way towards addressing the longer-term needs of victims.

I hope that Members will support amendment No 42. If the Assembly chooses to pass this clause, we will be the first part of the United Kingdom to outline in statute the assistance and support provisions that all potential victims of trafficking are entitled to once they are identified. Let me run through precisely what the clause seeks to do. Clause 10A(1) outlines the requirement upon the Department for assistance and support to individuals who satisfy the requirements of clause 10A(2). Under clause 10A(2), the support provisions would apply to individuals who are 18 or over, or who are reasonably believed to be so, and who have been referred or are about to be referred into the national referral mechanism. As the Minister will no doubt point out, currently under the EU directive, the DOJ's responsibilities to provide assistance and support are triggered by a decision by an NRM-competent authority that there are reasonable grounds that an individual is a victim of trafficking. In practice, the Department of Justice already goes beyond the requirement under the directive, ensuring that support is available from the first point of contact with the potential victim. I have always agreed with that approach, and I was keen to ensure that my Bill would enshrine it in statute.

Clause 10A(3) outlines that support and assistance should be provided until either there is a determination that an individual has been given a negative reasonable grounds decision under the NRM process or an individual is granted a conclusive grounds decision confirming whether or not there is clear evidence that they are a victim of human trafficking. In cases where an individual is granted a positive conclusive grounds decision, clauses 10A(3) and 10A(4) would require the Department of Justice to continue to provide support until the end of the 45-day reflection and recovery period. That goes beyond the requirement set out by the European directive and will help to ensure that victims of trafficking in our country have the time to recover to some extent from their ordeal. By putting those amendments in law, the provisions will see Northern Ireland go further than the other parts of the UK. We will be leading the way by guaranteeing that support to victims in the long term.

Clauses 10A(5) and 10A(6) set out how the support under that clause will be provided. First, the support and assistance must not be conditional on a person acting as a witness in criminal proceedings. There are a number of different reasons why a victim of human trafficking may not want to testify in criminal proceedings. Perhaps they do not want to relive the traumatic experience that they have gone through, or perhaps they do not trust the police. Whatever the case may be for a given individual, to my mind, it is imperative that the granting of support and assistance is not conditional on a victim participating as a witness in a trial.

Secondly, the support and assistance must be dependent on the agreement of the person. If an individual does not want the support and assistance available, they cannot be forced to receive it.

Thirdly, the support and assistance must be provided in a manner that takes due account of the needs of the person as regards safety and protection from harm. A lot of evidence shows that victims of human trafficking can remain vulnerable following their identification as a victim. Consequently, the support and assistance must not lead to a risk of re-trafficking or other forms of abuse.

Fourthly, the support must be provided to meet the assessed needs of that person. In some cases, a victim will not need access to particular services. For example, if a trafficking victim's first language is English, it is unlikely that they would require translation services. This provision ensures that only appropriate services will be provided.

Fifthly and finally, under subsection 6, the support and assistance must be offered from a person of the same gender as the person receiving it. This clause has been included to consider the situation facing women in particular who may have been sexually exploited in prostitution. In the vast majority of cases, they will have been exploited by a man. I am informed by a number of charities working in the field that having a support service provided by a man can be traumatic for some of the women concerned.

Proposed clause 10A(7) sets out the types of assistance and support that should be provided under the clause, according to assessed need. There are seven areas specified in the clause: appropriate and safe accommodation; material assistance; assistance in obtaining healthcare services; appropriate information on a matter of relevance to a particular victim's own situation; translation and interpretation services; assistance in obtaining legal advice or representation; and, finally, assistance with repatriation.

Clause 10A(8) would grant the Department a discretionary power to enable it to continue to provide support to potential victims in specific cases where an individual is relocated to another jurisdiction on the advice of the PSNI. It is not difficult to envisage a case where that may occur with regard to this particular form of crime.

As I have already mentioned, clause 10A(9) would grant the Department further power, which it could use at its discretion, to continue to provide support to an individual beyond the point where a conclusive determination is made. That would only come into play when such support would be necessary. Having met some victims of human trafficking, I am aware of the complexity of some of their needs. It is imperative that the level of assistance and support is not cut off just as soon as a conclusive determination is made, if new support arrangements are not in place. It should be stressed that the clause is not envisaged as requiring the Department to provide such services in perpetuity. It is only in place to ensure that there is a smooth transition from one form of support to another.

Finally, proposed clause 10A(10) states that the requirements and powers specific to the Department of Justice under the clause do not affect the individual's existing rights to assistance from other Departments or agencies. With those provisions outlined in statute, victims will be able to see in black and white what they are entitled to. Statutory bodies and NGOs will have a benchmark to work with in the support that victims are entitled to. Finally, the Assembly can be assured that the Department of Justice will not withdraw support and assistance for victims because it would be required to provide such support in statute. I should add that I am not suggesting that the current Minister is thinking of doing such a thing; I am thinking more of potential future holders of that office.

I am proposing a completely new assistance clause, new clause 10B, in amendment No 43, which is a testament to the benefits of our legislative process here at the Assembly. During the course of Second Stage and the subsequent contact that I had with interested charities, and in the very thorough Justice Committee scrutiny of the Bill, it became clear to me that providing support for individuals wishing to leave prostitution should go hand in hand with other measures in my Bill — in particular, clause 6. The Justice Committee stated in its report:

“The overwhelming majority of respondents recognised the importance of ensuring that support services were put in place for those who are in, have exited, or wish to exit prostitution.”

The importance of providing those services was raised with the Justice Committee by organisations in favour of and against clause 6. The list of organisations in support of such a measure is long, but includes the Evangelical Alliance, the Law Centre Northern Ireland and the Irish Congress of Trade Unions.

Introducing a legal model that criminalises the purchase of sexual services in conjunction with creating support programmes to assist people to exit prostitution has also been recommended by landmark resolutions from the Council of Europe and the European Parliament this year. A European Parliament resolution on sexual exploitation and prostitution and their impact on gender equality, passed on 26 February 2014, states in paragraph 42 that the European Parliament:

“Recognises that a vast majority of persons in prostitution would like to stop but feel unable to do so; stresses that these persons need appropriate support, particularly psychological and social assistance, to escape the sexual exploitation networks and the dependencies frequently associated with these; suggests, therefore, that the competent authorities put in place programmes to help persons escape prostitution, in close cooperation with the stakeholders”.

On 8 April 2014, the Council of Europe resolution on prostitution, trafficking and modern slavery similarly encourages member states to set up exit programmes for those who wish to give up prostitution; its aim is rehabilitation based on a holistic approach, including the provision of mental health, health care, housing support, education and training and employment services.

Academic evidence has shown that a large percentage of women in prostitution would like to leave it if they could, but they face significant barriers and there are very few specialist programmes to help them. New clause 10B will require the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety to ensure that a programme of assistance is available for individuals who wish to leave prostitution.

A recent study produced by experts in this field, led by Professor Roger Matthews of the University of Kent, makes a clear distinction between the effectiveness of programmes specifically focused on helping people to leave prostitution and those who are focused on supporting them through health care and harm minimisation. The study says that harm minimisation approaches tend to focus on minimising immediate harms and typically adopt a reactive approach by responding to requests for support to leave prostitution. It is the case that many existing forms of support operate, essentially, to sustain women in prostitution rather encourage them to move on.

The study later states:

“the claim that the service provided by reactive harm-reduction services are essentially the same as the proactive services provided by specialist exiting agencies is misconceived. We have developed a model that combines the ability to address women's needs and builds up trust and support on one hand with a proactive exiting strategy, which is designed not to perpetuate the involvement of women in prostitution but to facilitate their exit.”

I make no criticism of existing programmes in Northern Ireland that provide sexual health care service and harm reduction support to people involved in prostitution. However, we must complement those services with programmes that will signpost people towards routes out of prostitution and offer them support to make that transition. In times when funding is being squeezed, we need to ensure that these vital programmes are protected by establishing them in legislation.
