Official Report (Hansard)

Assembly Sitings

Northern Ireland Assembly

Monday 1 February 2016

The Assembly met at 12.00 noon (Mr Speaker in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

Assembly Business

New Assembly Member: Mr Alastair Patterson

Mr Speaker: I wish to advise the House that I have been informed by the Chief Electoral Officer that Mr Alastair Patterson has been returned as a Member of the Assembly for the Fermanagh and South Tyrone constituency to fill the vacancy resulting from Mr Neil Somerville's resignation. Mr Patterson signed the Roll of Membership and entered his designation in my presence and that of the Clerk/Chief Executive on 27 January 2016. The Member has now taken his seat. I welcome him to the House and wish him every success.

Question Time: Standing Order 20(8A)

Mr Speaker: I want to return to the point of order raised by Mr McCarthy after last Tuesday's Question Time. Standing Order 20(8A) is very clear that answers to questions may be no longer than two minutes. For a Minister to continue to exceed that time in the face of repeated reminders is discourteous to the House and unacceptable. Ministers may, from time to time, need more time to provide answers on complex issues, and the Deputy Speakers and I will regularly accept requests for additional time in those circumstances. However, filibustering or waffling is not in order, and, if we find that Ministers persistently slip beyond their time, we will intervene and move on to the next question. I hope that that is clear.

Standing Orders 10(2) to 10(4): Suspension

Ms Ruane: I beg to move

That Standing Orders 10(2) to 10(4) be suspended for 1 February 2016.

Mr Speaker: Before we proceed to the Question, I remind Members that the motion requires cross-community support.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved (with cross-community support):

That Standing Orders 10(2) to 10(4) be suspended for 1 February 2016.

Mr Speaker: As there are Ayes from all sides of the House, and there is no dissent, the motion is carried.

Committee Membership

Mr Speaker: The next item on the Order Paper is a motion regarding Committee membership. As with similar motions, it will be treated as a business motion. Therefore, there will be no debate.

Resolved:

That the Ulster Unionist Party Assembly Committee membership be changed in accordance with the proposals laid in the Assembly Business Office by the party on 27 January 2016. — [Mrs Overend.]

Ministerial Statements

North/South Ministerial Council: Tourism

Mr Bell (The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment): With your permission, Mr Speaker, I wish to make a statement in compliance with section 52 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998 regarding a meeting of the North/South Ministerial Council (NSMC) in tourism sectoral format. The meeting was held in Armagh on 2 December 2015. Minister Carál Ní Chuilín and I represented the Northern Ireland Executive. The Irish Government were represented by Paschal Donohoe, Minister for Transport, Tourism and Sport. I chaired the meeting. The statement has been agreed with Minister Ní Chuilín, and I make it on behalf of us both.

Ministers noted the current position of the EU funding programmes that may be of assistance to the tourism sector and agreed that the relevant tourism stakeholders in both jurisdictions will continue to monitor closely developments at EU level to ensure that tourism may benefit from all suitable collaborative funding opportunities. The chairperson, Mr Brian Ambrose, informed Ministers of the work of the Tourism Ireland board since the previous meeting, including delivering the 2015 business plan and developing the 2016 business plan, as well as progress on implementing the corporate plan for 2014-16. Ministers also learned of the progress in delivering Tourism Ireland's performance goals for 2015 and the development of the 2016 goals.

Ministers received a presentation from the CEO, Mr Niall Gibbons, on Tourism Ireland's performance throughout 2015. It contained highlights of Tourism Ireland's marketing campaign throughout the year, with particular regard to the Wild Atlantic Way and Causeway coastal route; the global greening campaign; Game of Thrones; the Irish Open; the British-Irish visa scheme; and overseas publicity.

Ministers received a performance overview of the 2015 season and were informed of emerging promotional themes for 2016, in particular, Ireland's Ancient East; Northern Ireland's Year of Food and Drink 2016; the Wild Atlantic Way and Causeway coastal route; and Dublin — A Breath of Fresh Air.

The NSMC welcomed the strong growth in visitor numbers from all main markets to Ireland and Northern Ireland. Ministers noted the current position of the 2016 business plan and the intention to bring it to the next available NSMC meeting for approval. The plan has since been approved at the NSMC Special EU Programmes Body (SEUPB) meeting on 11 December 2015.

The joint work to develop a compendium report on tourism statistics was noted. The study is expected to be finalised shortly, and a detailed report will be made available to Ministers at their next meeting. Ministers noted that work is progressing on the preparation of an all-island cruise tourism strategy in consultation and collaboration with key stakeholders and that it should be completed in early 2016.

The NSMC noted the ongoing work by relevant Departments in Ireland and Northern Ireland to host the Rugby World Cup in 2023 and the preparations in hand in both jurisdictions to host the Women's Rugby World Cup in Belfast and Dublin in August 2017.

The NSMC noted Tourism Ireland's annual report and accounts for 2014. It consented to the grant of right of way over the Royal Canal towpath at Kilbrook, County Kildare, to Cathal Fitzsimmons and to the deed of transfer and grant of right of way between Waterways Ireland and Bord Na Móna Energy Ltd for lands at Begnagh, County Longford.

Ministers also consented to the transfer of lands to Waterways Ireland and a 20-year licence to Longford County Council. That is to facilitate the development of the shared pedestrian and cycle route along the Royal canal from the junction of the Longford branch at Cloonsheerin to the Westmeath county boundary at Cloonbrin for a distance of 28.2 kilometres.

The Council agreed to meet again in tourism format in spring 2016. I commend the statement to the Assembly.

Mr McGlone (The Chairperson of the Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment): Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Mo bhuíochas leis an Aire as a ráiteas. I thank the Minister for his statement. He stated:

"the relevant tourism stakeholders in both jurisdictions will continue to closely monitor developments at EU level to ensure that tourism may benefit from all suitable collaborative funding opportunities."

Will the Minister provide detail on what those developments are, which stakeholders will be monitoring them and the nature of the monitoring that is ongoing?

Mr Bell: Essentially, we are working with all our partners. I regularly meet directly with the leadership of Tourism Northern Ireland and Tourism Ireland. In fact, I am just back from a very successful meeting, not in the EU but in the United States, specifically in relation to the EU programme. We know that, in our work with our EU partners, our tourism figures are up. They are up in Northern Ireland and up across Ireland. Indeed, it is almost the case, which we want to encourage, that that rising tide does lift all boats. I am pressing to ensure that we maximise every opportunity that we take with our EU partners. I have asked the groups that are working directly with our partners in Europe to look specifically at all the funds to ensure that we sweat all the assets to make sure that the trajectory of upward tourism numbers is supported by every resource that is available to us from the European Union.

Mr Dunne: I thank the Minister for his statement. Can he give us some assurances that Tourism Ireland is promoting Northern Ireland across the world as a visitor destination and not just promoting Ireland as one unit, with Northern Ireland losing out?

Mr Bell: I am pleased to see the work that Tourism Ireland has taken forward. It has set itself very ambitious targets for growth in 2016 from Great Britain and from all the main overseas markets. They have been set together in the 2016 business plan. I can reassure the Member that the targets have been set in the business plan and that it has been agreed.

Mr Dunne is absolutely right. Northern Ireland has a unique distinctiveness, and it has a very important role to play in attracting overseas visitors. We have stressed to Tourism Ireland — it accepts and understands the point — that one of my key priorities is to see standout specifically for Northern Ireland. To help Northern Ireland achieve its tourism potential, I have highlighted the importance of the market or the event lending itself to the potential visitor being able to see positive specific messaging about Northern Ireland. A great programme has been put together by Tourism Ireland across the United States on the Northern Ireland Year of Food and Drink. I was in a packed hall — I mean packed — in New York, and there was a tremendous amount of energy and goodwill among dozens of tourism providers, who were all taking a specific interest in Northern Ireland and telling me of their specific plans not only for the Year of Food and Drink but for the Gobbins cliff path; the Causeway coastal route; Titanic Belfast; the huge success that we can offer in golf; the expansion of the Waterfront Hall to bring business tourism in; HMS Caroline coming online; and city breaks to Belfast and Londonderry. All that has a specific Northern Ireland standout, and I compliment the work that Tourism Ireland is doing to ensure that that standout gets as wide a market as possible.

Mr Ó Muilleoir: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Ba mhaith liom fosta buíochas a ghabhail leis an Aire agus fáilte a chur roimhe ar ais go hÉireann ghlas. I thank the Minister for his statement. I welcome him back from his successful tour of the United States. It is 4.00 am in California and so, if the Minister yawns, he has an excuse.

I suppose that I have two questions, Minister, about this successful engagement with Tourism Ireland. The first is, before we all go on our way and seek election, those of us who are standing again in May, can we perhaps get the air development route fund up and running? I think that it would make a difference. As you know, tourism is 9% of GDP south of the border and 6% up here. Closing that gap would be enormously helpful to our airports. I think also, of course, of the States and the great wish that Belfast and its sister city of Boston could be united by an air route. Additionally, Minister, welcome back.

Mr Bell: There is an important point to be made about air access. I congratulate both of our airports, which I notice have seen an increase in numbers. I also met City of Derry Airport about proposals that it has. We met in its boardroom and looked at what we can do there. I notice that Belfast City Airport and Belfast International Airport are reporting increased numbers of visitors and travellers, which shows that we are on the right trajectory.

The answer to your question is yes, we hope to get an air route development fund out within the financial year so that people could be aware of that. The purpose is to develop the connectivity, as the Member says, between business destinations and look at those inbound routes that have tourism potential. I am thinking of key destinations such as Germany and Scandinavia, and city destinations such as Munich, Madrid and Milan.

The Northern Ireland fund has to meet the requirements not only of Northern Ireland but also of European Union state-aid rules. It is also under the constraints of whatever the Executive can afford. I will do all that I can to ensure that I can announce the way forward in respect of air route funding before the end of the financial year.

Mr Cochrane-Watson: I welcome the Minister back from the United States. I welcome the statement. I am keen that the 2023 World Cup is brought to Northern Ireland and the Republic of Ireland. Tourism from sport is attractive to us all.

There is a huge imbalance between Dublin Airport and Belfast International, in my constituency, particularly in north Atlantic travel. It could be as much as 12:1, United being the only north Atlantic carrier out of the International. Is there any way that Tourism Ireland could promote the benefits of Belfast International and help you and others in attracting more inward travel? One aspect attractive to the traveller is that entry and customs can be cleared at Dublin Airport. I appreciate that the volume of travellers is probably not there, but it would be a huge benefit to Belfast International if the volume was there and we could do that at Belfast before travel.

Mr Bell: I appreciate both points that the Member makes. In support for the Rugby World Cup bid, there is considerable work going on to ensure that it goes ahead. A director has been put in place, work is ongoing in progressing the bid, and both Administrations and agencies are fully behind it. We are trying to guide the bid preparation with an overview group, and we have set up interdepartmental groups in both jurisdictions. They have agreed the terms of reference for the groups, and Deloitte consultants will meet key government representatives to discuss several issues over the coming weeks.

There is real potential for a number of Rugby World Cup games. I met former Tánaiste Dick Spring in my offices in Netherleigh. I have been down to the Aviva. The First Minister and the deputy First Minister were recently at Kingspan to try to make sure that that bid goes ahead. The potential that we have is for hundreds of thousands coming here onto the island for up to eight World Cup games and a quarter final. Moreover, the fact that we could get key rugby international nations to base themselves here would be tremendous for spend, hotel beds and everything else.

We will be throwing our work fully behind that, and we are well supported by the likes of Brian O'Driscoll and other key ambassadors who have key influence in the rugby community. If I can use a pun, with Brian O'Driscoll and others, we will stand shoulder to shoulder, and let us hope that the selectors select Ireland for 2023 and we answer the call.

On access, funding is already provided via Tourism Ireland. It is working with the Northern Ireland airports to provide the cooperative marketing that is aimed at inbound tourism performance on new and existing routes. We will continue to look, with both airports, at how we can maximise the potential. There is a debate on this. I am pressing the UK Government on air passenger duty, and I do think that, as we have said, it does unfairly impact on Northern Ireland. I want the UK Government to address that and to deal with it and, ideally, to abolish it. I have to say that we do not seem to be getting a lot of traction back from the UK Government on that, but we will continue to press that case.

There then becomes an issue locally as to whether we take the financial hit and do it ourselves. As the Member knows, we commissioned the Northern Ireland Centre for Economic Policy at Ulster University, which informed us that it was a weak financial tool. An additional report was brought to us to challenge that, and we asked the expert economists to look at that additional report. Again, they came back to us and said that the cost to the public finances in Northern Ireland would be so high that it would be a weak economic tool. So we are looking at what we can do, which is the air route development fund.

I congratulate the Member's constituency and Graham Keddie and his team, and I want them to continue to challenge us. I want to be challenged, as long as people understand that I have to take that money out of the public finances somewhere along the line to justify it. I also have to justify it against expert advice that is saying to me that this is a weak financial tool. I will continue to work with all of our airports to maximise the potential that is coming through there, and I do believe that, in Tourism NI and Tourism Ireland, there is the willingness to do so.

Mr Dickson: Thank you, Minister, for your statement. Minister, you may not have heard the statement made yesterday by Mr Howard Hastings, who I think most of us will agree is an expert on tourism in Northern Ireland. How do you propose to assuage his concerns and the concerns of other experts in tourism in Northern Ireland that not enough is being done to market Northern Ireland and that there is a disproportion in the way that funds are allocated to deliver that marketing of Northern Ireland? Very briefly, you made reference to the Rugby World Cup and other events and also to food and drink. Will the Minister agree that the time is right now to alter our licensing laws to make those events more friendly and amenable to that legislation as well?

Mr Bell: I will answer those points in order. I thank Dr Hastings for the work that he does. He regularly gives up time and comes in, almost as an official adviser, to some bodies of mine, and he has put in a huge amount of intelligence and energy and used a wonderful network from an earned reputation for excellence in tourism that the Hastings group has to help us going forward. I am not sure that there is a single Minister who has not been challenged to spend more in any particular area. The House will be aware that my Department has invested significantly in tourism in the last number of years. We have put over £100 million into the tourism infrastructure, and tourism budgets are still healthy. We have allocated £30 million to our two tourism bodies, and we need to be smart with the resources that are available. I know that both of our tourism bodies are looking to maximise the marketing opportunities that Howard has challenged us to look at, specifically through the use of some digital marketing. Tourism Ireland has specific expertise in the digital marketing sector.

With £100 million having gone into infrastructure and £30 million having gone into both tourism bodies, our tourism figures are up. We will certainly want to keep being challenged by the industry on specific areas that it thinks that we should put more money into.

I understand the specific position on the licensing laws. I understand the difficulties, particularly for craft breweries and distilleries where, if people are visiting, you can give them a bottle, but you cannot sell them one. To a certain extent, you have to say, "Look, you can't buy it here, but if you go 300 yards or 2 miles down the road, you can buy the product". There is a difficulty there, and the Executive have agreed to look at it. I think that we want the change to maximise the economic potential of Northern Ireland commensurate with our responsibilities on alcohol.

Mr McKinney: I am sure that, like me, the Minister will welcome the announcement that Northern Ireland will host the Commonwealth Youth Games in 2021. Can he reflect on the benefits to the economy of the Commonwealth Youth Games, as well as the costs, infrastructural implications and marketing? What discussions are being had with Tourism Ireland about how it will be involved?

Mr Bell: First of all, I want to congratulate the Northern Ireland Commonwealth Games Council (NICGC) on its winning bid for the 2021 Commonwealth Youth Games. It has significant potential in Belfast. It is an opportunity for our young athletes from the Commonwealth family to take part in international competition. It also offers spectators the chance to see the sports stars of the future in action. DETI officials, Tourism NI and the Commonwealth Games, with responsibility specifically for Belfast for Tourism NI, are working together to ensure that the necessary business case is in place. I am working on that business case specifically to see how the event can be hosted. There is a lot of work involved with the business case. I hope to see both Tourism NI and Tourism Ireland maximising the potential of the project.

Mr Givan: Thank you, Minister, for your statement. The Minister will be aware of the loss of the Troon ferry service. Is he able to comment on that and on what actions, if any, can possibly be taken by DETI to ensure not only that air access into Northern Ireland is enhanced but that our sea ports are a way for people to access and come to Northern Ireland?

Mr Bell: The Member raises a very important point. The decision by P&O Ferries to cease operating its Troon to Larne service was and is disappointing. However, the ferry companies operating Irish Sea services are private commercial entities and, as such, decisions regarding the viability of specific routes are commercial matters for those companies. I can tell the House and the Member specifically that no jobs will be lost due to withdrawal of the Larne to Troon service, because the staff will be redeployed to other routes.

The Member raises a key point. The sea links with Great Britain are essential for business, for tourism and for the growth of the Northern Ireland economy. I and my predecessor, the First Minister, have met ferry operators on a number of occasions. The Larne to Cairnryan service operates year round, with up to seven daily sailings each week, and additional passenger capacity will be added to the service in the coming months. Tourism Ireland will continue to work with P&O Ferries and Stena Line to promote holidays to Northern Ireland via the Irish Sea routes, including the Cairnryan to Larne service.

North/South Ministerial Council: Trade and Business Development

Mr Speaker: That went so well that the Minister wishes to make another statement.

Mr Bell (The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment): You are not giving me a break this afternoon, Mr Speaker.

I wish to make a statement in compliance with section 52 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998 regarding a meeting of the North/South Ministerial Council (NSMC) in trade and business development sectoral format. The meeting was held in the offices of the North/South Ministerial Council, Armagh, on Wednesday 2 December 2015. The Executive were represented by me, in my capacity as Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment, and by Carál Ní Chuilín, Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure. The Irish Government were represented by Richard Bruton TD, Minister for Jobs, Enterprise and Innovation. This statement has been agreed with Minister Ní Chuilín, and I am making it on behalf of us both.

Ministers received a joint presentation by the Northern Ireland Independent Retail Trade Association (NIIRTA) and Retail Excellence Ireland (REI) on their joint study of the retail sector across both jurisdictions. The Council noted the summary findings of the NIIRTA/REI joint 2014 survey of the retail sector, including that the two retail agencies intend to establish a retail forum comprising representatives from both jurisdictions.

The Council received a presentation from Martin Cronin, the Chairperson, and Thomas Hunter McGowan, the CEO, on InterTradelreland's performance and business activity against 2015 business plan targets. Ministers noted that, during the first 10 months of 2015, InterTradelreland had delivered the following: assistance to 65 first-time innovators; assistance to 44 first-time exporters; 4% efficiency savings; a total jobs impact of 916; and the delivery of a total business value of £67 million or €84 million.

(Mr Principal Deputy Speaker [Mr Newton] in the Chair)

Ministers were advised that there was strong demand for InterTradelreland programmes in 2015. Business and economic research activities carried out by InterTradelreland included continued production of the InterTradelreland quarterly business monitor; a report on 'SMEs, Credit Constraints and Growth', which is a cross-border study relating to access to finance; and, most recently, 'Mapping the Potential for All-Island Sectoral Ecosystems', which examines the opportunities for developing the potential of clusters across both jurisdictions. Ministers noted the current position of the 2016 business plan and that officials continued to engage in discussions on the plan. The Council noted InterTradelreland's annual report and accounts for 2014, which had been certified by the Comptrollers and Auditors General and laid before the Northern Ireland Assembly and the Houses of the Oireachtas.

Ministers received a presentation by officials from the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment and the Department of Jobs, Enterprise and Innovation, previewing the implementation of the research and innovation theme of the new INTERREG Va programme for the period 2015-2020.

Ministers noted a paper prepared by InterTradelreland providing an update on the Horizon 2020 programme and the early results for the period January 2014 to May 2015. Twenty-two collaborative projects, involving 64 applicants, have been successful to date. They have secured €29.67 million in funding, and, of that total, Northern Ireland partners have secured €14.24 million and partners from Ireland have secured €15.43 million. The average award per partner is €463,500.

Ministers welcomed the wide range of activities organised by InterTradelreland to encourage engagement to date. They included a total attendance of 486 participants at 'Focus on' events; the hosting of a range of conferences; the organisation of advisory service workshops; and the provision of financial assistance for scoping out partnerships and proposal opportunities.

Ministers also noted that InterTradelreland had identified and will undertake additional promotional and awareness-raising activities in conjunction with the Horizon 2020 all-island steering group. That will utilise the contact point networks in each jurisdiction to drive delivery of the €175 million target. The work by InterTradelreland with Horizon 2020 applicants to identify further resubmission opportunities was also noted.

The Council agreed that the next trade and business development meeting should be held in the spring of 2016. I commend the statement to the Assembly.

Mr McGlone (The Chairperson of the Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment): Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. Mo bhuíochas leis an Aire as a ráiteas. Thanks very much, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker. I again thank the Minister. In his statement, the Minister referred to the:

"strong demand for InterTradelreland programmes in 2015" and welcomed:

"the wide range of activities organised by InterTradelreland to encourage engagement".

I fully endorse that. Its work has been tremendous, and its support of the SME sector in particular has been phenomenal.

Although I welcome the additional funding allocated to InterTradelreland in January monitoring, it should be noted that the additional funding does not contribute to the baseline for future InterTradelreland budgets, leaving it very vulnerable to further cuts in future budgets. The budget for InterTradelreland continues to decline in the face of what the Minister rightly referred to as growing demand right across the island of Ireland. Despite increased demand for its services, the budget remains at 30% below the 2008 level. Therefore —

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I ask the Chairperson to come to his question.

Mr McGlone: I am coming to it right now. Thank you for your indulgence.

In the face of growing demand for its services and in recognition of the very positive impact that InterTradelreland has on economic growth and development across the island, what assurances can the Minister give that its budget will not continue to be eroded at that level?

Mr Bell: Let me take the first part. I welcome the very positive commitment given to the work undertaken by InterTradelreland. I will pull out some of the highlights of 2015 that I have seen. The Acumen programme stimulates cross-border business for SMEs. In 2015, there were 134 applications, resulting in 103 approvals. The Elevate programme was put together to focus on helping microenterprises to take the first steps in exporting and to explore opportunities in a new cross-border market. During 2015, the programme received 514 enquiries from SMEs and 139 applications, which resulted in 80 of those companies being approved for support. The FUSION programme is the flagship technology transfer programme that provides support to companies with new product or process development needs. There was a staggering result from that programme, with over 80% of FUSION graduates being offered jobs. The point that you initially made about the work that is going ahead was well made and is endorsed by me.

The business plan for 2016 remains subject to approval. For 2016, I decided to maintain InterTradelreland's 2015 baseline. That is a reasonable outcome, given the current budgetary pressures across the Department. I have discussed the matter in some detail with Richard Bruton TD, and, as with Tourism Ireland and other arm's-length bodies, I have advised InterTradelreland that it can make bids as part of the monitoring round process. In connection with that I am pleased to report, as I said to Mr Ó Muilleoir in response to a question for oral answer in recent weeks, that we were able to bid for £206,000 of additional money for 2016 as part of the January monitoring round. I am pleased to report that all parties, including the InterTradelreland board and officials and the two co-sponsor Departments, have agreed to that additional funding. That gives an idea that I have not only maintained the budget from 2015, but, where there are specific programmes that deliver jobs and opportunities in Northern Ireland and help to take our businesses to new levels of sales, exports and graduate employment, I will do my level best to get funding where I can.

Mr Dunne: I thank the Minister for his detailed statements. We are all very aware of the need to support businesses in research and innovation, especially our SMEs. Will he give us an update, in some detail, on the progress of INTERREG Va, the programme for 2015 to 2020?

Mr Bell: I welcome the allocation of €71 million to research and innovation activities in the 2014 to 2020 INTERREG Va programme. That investment will support increased cross-border research and development competence-building in the life and health science and renewable energy sectors. A further key objective is to grow the number of small to medium-sized enterprises across the region that engage in research and innovation activity on a cross-border, collaborative basis.

We want to establish and are establishing robust and comprehensive governance arrangements to underpin an efficient programme implementation.

That is the key focus for my Department, and we continue to liaise with our colleagues in DFP, SEUPB and the Republic of Ireland to this effect.

Calls for applications are being publicly announced and managed by the SEUPB, in its role as the programme managing authority. Following a call for projects under the "business investment in research and innovation" (R&I) priority, which closed on 21 October, successful applications were approved by the programme's steering committee at the end of November to proceed to full development of the business case. A call for projects under the "enhancing research and innovation" priority is scheduled to open on 22 February this year.

Mr Murphy: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for his statement. He may or may not be aware, due to his travels, that the Assembly's Enterprise Committee went to Dublin last Thursday and met with its counterpart in the Oireachtas. We attended the launch of this report on the all-Ireland economy. I commend it very much to the Minister and, indeed, to his senior officials and those in Invest NI. We also had the opportunity, at a joint Committee session, to hear from InterTradelreland. I very much welcome the fact that he secured additional funding for InterTradelreland and that he has extolled the virtues of a lot of the work that it is doing.

The Minister mentioned in his response to our Chairperson that there is an opportunity for an in-year monitoring bid. But does he accept that, when running programmes like this with a long lead-in, it is not ideal for a body such as InterTradelreland to have to rely on moneys that may become available and then spend that very quickly? Will he continue with his commitment to the fight to secure additional funds in the baseline budget for InterTradelreland? Because you can see quite clearly, from this and its own report that it released recently, that, for a modest investment, there is a very significant return in business development right across the island.

Mr Bell: What comes through clearly from the reports is that not only have hundreds of jobs that were potentially at risk been secured but new jobs and the promotion of potential further new jobs have been gained through this programme. My strategy is that anything that brings jobs to Northern Ireland will have my full and unequivocal support, and I accept the point that for this amount of money there is quite a high performance level. This is evidenced in the fact that I can give you examples where some 80% were successful, in the number of programmes that are going through and in the demand for the service.

There was big pressure on me, as Minister, and the Department. There are competing demands in the Department. Tourism will make a demand, as stated earlier. It is difficult to manage with a limited amount of resources, and when you get a plan coming through, the psychologist in me believes in B F Skinner's theory of classical conditioning: you should always try to reward good behaviour so that it is increased. In reality, the behaviour, industry and energy of InterTradelreland in bringing jobs to Northern Ireland, securing jobs for Northern Ireland, bringing additional jobs to Northern Ireland and giving our graduates an enhanced programme, as well as its success rates, is very clearly something that I want to reward. So, I did not make the cut, as some proposals were made, to its 2015 budget. I maintained that against other competing needs, and I said that — both myself and Mr Richard Bruton — where possible, we can bid for additional resources and probably need to put additional energy into monitoring rounds. At our first go at it, we had another £206,000 into the budget. Of course, it would be better to always give people money up front, so that they can plan for the period. Given the fact that I have maintained the budget as it was from the previous year, and sought successfully to get additional money into the budget, demonstrates not only ministerial endorsement of the programme but my encouragement for them to go ahead. I will not waste any opportunity, in terms of monitoring rounds, to try to get additional finance to get more jobs into Northern Ireland.

Mr Cochrane-Watson: I thank the Minister for his statement. Like others, I attended the joint Committee, and I fully endorse and support the work of InterTradelreland and would be very supportive of any efforts to maintain and enhance its budget.

As outlined in the statement today, the establishment of the retail forum comes on the back of extensive surveying and research by NIIRTA and its partners. One of the main issues raised through that was the impact of rates and the instability that excessive rates bills can add to microbusinesses, particularly those in our town centres. Will the Minister work with his Finance and Personnel colleague to look at opportunities, through rates relief perhaps, to support SMEs or small businesses, particularly those in the retail sector in our town centres?

Mr Bell: There are vital points to be made about rates, and the Member has made some of them. I will certainly have further discussions with him and also Minister Storey about how we can continue to support rate relief. What we have tried to do to keep rates low, through specific initiatives, has been one of the success stories of devolved government. If the Member has additional specific proposals that he wishes to make, I am willing to hear them and take them to the Minister of Finance and Personnel.

Overall, when we look at our economic conditions, we can genuinely say that there are signs of improvement. Almost 40,000 additional jobs have been created since 2012 and, today, more than 26,000 fewer people are claiming unemployment benefits than did so in February 2013. In 2015, real earnings increased for the first time since 2009. I will discuss specific proposals that Mr Cochrane-Watson may have, to see how we can get the trajectory of additional jobs, fewer people claiming unemployment benefit, and real earnings increases, particularly in the retail sector which, I agree, has not only valiantly supported Northern Ireland through very difficult economic conditions but continues to support the lifeblood of our town centres.

Mr Dickson: I thank the Minister for his statement. Does he agree that he, his Department and the Assembly need to send out a very clear message that Northern Ireland is better in Europe and that the development of programmes such as InterTradelreland depend on us remaining in Europe? Will he also tell the House what contingency plans he has should the UK Government decide to withdraw from the European Union?

Mr Bell: There are very important matters to consider when we look at the issue of Europe. My Department has sought to provide people with the most informed choice they can make in relation to Europe. We asked for the best advice that we could get; we asked Oxford Economics to give us specific advice — which will be available in the coming period — in relation to a potential exit from the European Union, the potential of the status quo, and the third potential, which we do not know about at the moment, which is whatever reforms could be given by the European Union to the British Prime Minister. We will have to look at those very carefully.

We have also asked to look at other models. There is the Norway model, the Swiss model, and the Turkish relationship in terms of customs union. The best thing we can do is look very carefully at the expert evidence and see what the British Prime Minister brings back from his negotiations with the European Union. I believe that there needs to be change and that the status quo is not an option. We will look very carefully at what the British Prime Minister brings back and we will examine it against the best evidence we have in order to make an informed decision when we know what the referendum question, which is due before the end of 2017, is going to be. When we know the question and the plan, we will examine them against the evidence and give more definitive news then.

Mr Ó Muilleoir: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. Buíochas arís leis an Aire. I thank the Minister for the statement on cross-border economic cooperation. I want to commend him on managing to find the £206,000 for InterTradelreland because, of course, Minister Bruton was able to double that and put £600,000 into InterTradelreland at this time when there is so much momentum behind the work that it is involved in.

I want to follow up on what Conor Murphy said about the visit to the Dáil last week and the report on the all-island economy. We are sometimes critical of unionist Ministers for not doing enough for the all-island economy. This is the first report on an all-island economy since the Oireachtas came into being, so the criticisms and blame can be shared.

It is very relevant to what you said today, Minister, that one of the big proposals is for one economic and enterprise agency on the island. Will you ensure that your officials work proactively, in a professional and systemic fashion, with the IDA on corporation tax harmonisation and reduction, because it has been there, done that, got the T-shirt. It has shown that it can maximise the full benefits of a reduced level of corporation tax. I would be really pleased, Minister, if you could come back at some stage and tell Members that Invest NI is having regular dealings with the IDA and ensuring that it is getting all the information and knowledge that it has, so that that is also brought to bear north of the border when corporation tax is harmonised across the island, as we hope and trust will happen if it is affordable.

Mr Bell: The Member is right: we have an enormous opportunity in that, on 1 April 2018, our corporation tax will be at 12.5%. We will be able to compete for business across the world, as I was competing for several businesses in San Francisco and New York in the past week. I hope to see fruit flow in jobs and investment from those, given that Northern Ireland now has a unique opportunity because our business costs are estimated to be 85% of those for the rest of the United Kingdom and about 95% of those in the Republic of Ireland. You can add to that the talent of our people, a very young population and the excellent work that the Department for Employment and Learning has undertaken in bespoke training and tailor-made initiatives to support business.

Allstate said that it came to Northern Ireland for the costs but stayed for the people. Companies such as Citi came in with 369 jobs and has now created some 2,000 jobs. Here is another interesting fact: 80% of all foreign direct investment to Northern Ireland has subsequently reinvested. At Invest NI, we try to get those businesses to tell their story about why, when they come here, they subsequently reinvest. That foreign direct investment comes from companies such as Baker and McKenzie, Citigroup, Allen and Overy, Allstate — a whole list that created thousands of jobs. So we have the best foreign direct investment proposition; more foreign direct investment per head than any other part of the UK; the lowest costs; and now we can add corporation tax.

I will certainly talk to Invest Northern Ireland about ensuring, with the IDA, that all opportunities are maximised. Invest Northern Ireland has done an absolutely spectacular job. When we sat as an Executive, we set it an initial target of some 20,000 jobs. At the Programme for Government meeting in 2011, that was increased to 25,000, and, to date, it has delivered some 44,000 jobs. Before the Assembly is dissolved, I hope to make additional job announcements on the back of a programme that Invest NI has done. In many cases, it has done that in very difficult conditions against a backdrop of a falling euro, the strength of the dollar and everything else.

If the Member is asking me to ensure that we maximise every opportunity and look at maximising every opportunity to harness the economic power across the two jurisdictions to deliver jobs and success, my answer is: absolutely.

Mr McKinney: I thank the Minister. Will he update the House on the status of INTERREG's EU monitoring committee? Will he assure the House that everything possible is being done to maximise the drawdown of funding across INTERREG's range of funds?

Mr Bell: Yes, I can assure the House that we have the maximum drawdown. All my information to date is that we are on course to meet all the targets that we have set ourselves, but I will continue to keep those targets under effective scrutiny, monitoring and evaluation to ensure further success.

Mr Allister: Briefly reverting to Mr Dickson's question, may I say that I look forward to the Minister coming off the fence on the issue of the EU and joining the ranks of those who want to liberate our great trading nation from its shackles?

His statement is clear that the 2016 business plan for InterTradeIreland has not yet been approved. Will he explain to the House how ongoing expenditure is lawful when the business plan has not been approved?

Mr Bell: The business plan is set to be approved at the next meeting of the North/South Ministerial Council, and I am advised that no expenditure reflects what the Member says. There is no unlawful expenditure.

I say to the Member, too, that it is easy to make a point — he is a learned QC — about coming off the fence. As I stand here today, we do not know what the referendum question is.

Mr Allister: We do.

Mr Bell: We do not know. Through you, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker, we have not been given the terms of the referendum question. Will it simply ask whether we wish to leave the European Union? In that case, I imagine that the Member will say yes. However, if the question is whether we wish to remain in the European Union, I imagine that the answer from the Member will be no. In the absence of knowing the exact nature of the question, it is a very, very foolish person who answers it.

As I have said, there are concerns — some businesses, including international businesses, have reflected them to me — about how, were the UK to come out of the European Union, the potential loss of a market of some 500 million people would impact jobs and investment. Equally, I have been advised that, were we to come out, there is the potential for new trade agreements. The volume of trade between the EU and the UK is so significant that new trade arrangements could be put in place, and there is the possibility that we could look towards other markets in Asia, and specifically at things that we could do there that we cannot do now.

I say to the Member that the best thing that anybody in Northern Ireland can do is to take the most informed decision that they possibly can. That is why we have commissioned work from Oxford Economics to look at what a Brexit could mean and what the status quo could mean. Earlier, I said to the Member, in words as strong as I can use in the House, that I do not believe, as my parliamentary leader and our Member of the European Parliament said, that the status quo is an option.

We have to see what the Prime Minister achieves in the negotiations. It would be foolish and would not serve the people of Northern Ireland well if we made decisions when we do not know what the UK Prime Minister has negotiated. At the end of the day, it will be the decision of the people of Northern Ireland. They will look at the economic advice and at all the different models — the Norwegian, Swiss, Turkish and other models that could be followed — to get the best information on staying in or coming out. Give the people of Northern Ireland the best information, let them examine it against the reforms that the Prime Minister brings back and let them decide how to vote on the basis of facts. That is the most sensible and intelligent way to proceed.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: That concludes questions —

Mr Allister: On a point of order, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker. Should the Minister mislead the House to suggest that we do not know what the question in the referendum is? Section 1 of the European Union (Referendum Act) 2015, which already has Royal Assent, sets out the question:

“Should the United Kingdom remain a member of the European Union or leave the European Union?”

Why does the Minister pretend to the House that we do not know the question, when the law of the land states what it is? A couple of weeks ago, he did not know what the unemployment rate was. He told us that it was at a third of European and Republic of Ireland levels.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr Allister: He was wrong about that, and he is wrong about this.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Order. The Member has his point on the record. I am sure that the Speaker will note it.

Mr Bell: May I reply, Mr Speaker —

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: No. Time is up.

Mr Bell: On a point of order, Mr Speaker. The latest unemployment statistics given to me were 6% in Northern Ireland, 8.9% in the Republic of Ireland and a European Union average of 9.3%. I thought that the difference between six and nine was three.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: That concludes questions on the Minister's statement.

Departments Bill: Further Consideration Stage

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I call the junior Minister, Mrs Emma Pengelly, to move the Further Consideration Stage of the Departments Bill.

Moved. — [Mrs Pengelly (Junior Minister, Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister).]

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Members will have a copy of the Marshalled List of amendments detailing the order for consideration. The amendments have been grouped for debate in the provisional grouping of amendments selected list. There is a single group of amendments — amendment Nos 1 and 2 — dealing with a technical issue relating to the references to the Ombudsman (Northern Ireland) Order 1996 in the Bill. We will debate the amendments in turn. Once the debate on the group is completed, the second amendment in the group will be moved formally as we go through the Bill, and the Question will be put without further debate. If that is clear, we will move on.

Clause 2 (Consequential amendments and repeals)

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: We now come to the amendments for debate. With amendment No 1, it will be convenient to debate amendment No 2, which is consequential. I call the junior Minister, Mrs Emma Pengelly, to move amendment No 1 and to address the other amendment in the group.

Amendment No 1, together with amendment No 2, makes a technical adjustment to the Bill that does not change its substance or affect the policy behind it. The Bill, as drafted and as it now sits, takes account of the current law, including the legislation that covers the operation of the statutory office of the Assembly Ombudsman, the Ombudsman (Northern Ireland) Order 1996. That Order specifies the remit of the ombudsman by referencing the names of individual Northern Ireland Departments. Given the nature of the ombudsman's role, the Order is frequently accessed by the public. Consequently, when the Departments Bill was being drafted, it was considered that it would be helpful to make specific textual amendments to the Ombudsman (Northern Ireland) Order 1996 to reflect the Departments after restructuring in May 2016. That would have been achieved through the amendments reference in clause 2(1) and listed at schedule 2 to the Departments Bill. However, with the Departments Bill in its concluding stages, it is necessary now to take account of how it interacts with another Bill currently before the Assembly, namely the Public Services Ombudsman Bill, sponsored by the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister.

In my introductory speech at Second Stage on 8 December, I referred to the possible need for a technical amendment to this Bill at a later stage, pending the progress of the Public Services Ombudsman Bill. That Bill would establish a new combined Public Services Ombudsman in place of the existing and separate offices of Assembly Ombudsman and Commissioner for Complaints. It is now expected to complete its Assembly stages next week. It will establish the new Public Services Ombudsman position with effect from 1 April 2016, and, on that date, the Ombudsman (Northern Ireland) Order 1996 will be repealed and the office established under that legislation will cease to exist. This means that clause 2(1) of and schedule 2 to the Departments Bill will be superseded. Consequently, they will be redundant and can now be removed from the Bill.

Amendment No 1 would remove from the Bill clause 2(1), which references the amendments to the Ombudsman (Northern Ireland) Order 1996 contained in schedule 2 and consequential on clause 1. Clearly linked to that is amendment No 2. It would remove schedule 2, which details the consequential amendments, all of which relate to citations of Departments in the Ombudsman (Northern Ireland) Order 1996. These are technical amendments that will improve the Bill by removing provisions that will become redundant as a consequence of the Public Services Ombudsman Bill and its anticipated progress in the course of the next week.

Mr Nesbitt (The Chairperson of the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister):

The Committee noted the amendments before the House today when we met on 27 January. As the junior Minister pointed out, our Public Services Ombudsman Bill is nearing the end of its passage; indeed, the Committee is seeking an Exceptional Further Consideration Stage late today. We hope to bring the Final Stage to the House next week. When that Bill comes into operation, the Ombudsman (Northern Ireland) Order 1996 will be repealed. On that basis, it seems nothing other than logical to make these changes to the Departments Bill at this stage. I support the amendments.

Mr Hazzard: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. As has been outlined by the Minister and the Chair of the OFMDFM Committee, these are logical amendments to redundant provisions — clause 2(1) and schedule 2 — which need to be removed as the Public Services Ombudsman Bill progresses. I support both amendments.

Mrs Pengelly: I thank Members for their contributions and support in relation to the technical amendments. As I said at the outset, the amendments make small technical adjustments to the Bill that do not change its substance or affect policy. They are necessary as a result of the progress of the Public Services Ombudsman Bill and its anticipated repeal of the Ombudsman (Northern Ireland) Order 1996. They remove references to the 1996 Order, which will become redundant on the coming into operation of the Public Services Ombudsman Bill. I should say at this point that the Bill does not need to be reflected in the text of the Public Services Ombudsman Bill, as that Bill refers generically to Departments rather than listing them by name in the way that the Ombudsman (Northern Ireland) Order 1996 did. The Departments Bill is important legislation, and I am glad to see it progressing through the Assembly today.

Amendment No 1 agreed to.

Schedule 2 (Amendments)

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Amendment No 2 is consequential to amendment No 1.

Amendment No 2 made:

In page 3, leave out schedule 2.— [Mrs Pengelly (Junior Minister, Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister).]

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: That concludes the Further Consideration Stage of the Departments Bill. The Bill stands referred to the Speaker.

Rates (Amendment) Bill: Further Consideration Stage

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I call the Minister of Finance and Personnel, Mr Mervyn Storey, to move the Further Consideration Stage of the Bill.

Moved. — [Mr Storey (The Minister of Finance and Personnel).]

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Members will have a copy of the Marshalled List of amendments detailing the order for consideration.

The amendments have been grouped for debate in my provisional grouping of amendments selected list. There are two amendments, which will be debated in a single group. Both amendments deal with the entitlement to rates reductions. I remind Members intending to speak that they should address their comments to only the amendments. If that is clear, we shall proceed.

We now come to the single group of amendments for debate. With amendment No 1, it will be convenient to debate amendment No 2. I call Mr Daithí McKay to move amendment No 1 and address the other amendment in the group.

Mr McKay: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. I beg to move amendment No 1: In page 1, line 8, at end insert “(5B) Without prejudice to the generality of paragraph (5A), prescribed cases in regulations under that paragraph shall include, subject to such conditions as may be prescribed, where a hereditament is occupied by a community amateur sports club.

(5C) The first regulations under paragraph (5A) shall be no later than 30 September 2016.”

*(b) in paragraph (6) insert at the appropriate place —
““community amateur sports club” means a registered club within the meaning of section 658(6) of the Corporation Tax Act 2010;.”*

The following amendment stood on the Marshalled List:

No 2: After clause 1 insert

“Specified recreations: pigeon racing

1A. In the Schedule to the Rates (Recreational Hereditaments) Order (Northern Ireland) 2007 (list of specified recreations), where appropriate insert “Pigeon Racing”.— [Mr Cree.]

Amendment No 1 is a straightforward amendment. At last week’s debate at Consideration Stage, I gather that there was consensus on the need to make regulations within a fixed timescale. The thrust of the amendment is to ensure that the first regulations under paragraph (5A) be made no later than 30 September 2016. It is also useful to put community amateur sports clubs (CASCs) in the Bill.

I take this opportunity to thank the Minister for his engagement with me on this issue last week. I, of course, would have preferred it if we could have dealt with the issue of CASCs with bars with licensed premises as part of the extension of the rates relief, but the Assembly ruled otherwise. Nonetheless, I hope that the Department will take the opportunity, ahead of the introduction of the regulations, to find a solution or an option for those clubs. My primary concern is that there is a greater disincentive for clubs with bars to build further facilities for their communities and associations. I say that particularly as a rural representative. Of course, on the other hand, clubs without bars will no longer have that disincentive, so, if they decide to build a new pitch or hall, there will be no added rates burden.

The Finance and Personnel Committee has heard of possible options, including assessing according to the different levels of turnover, changing how club bars are rated etc. The Department now has an opportunity to consider the options more fully. I hope that it will bring forward recommendations that represent a step forward for those clubs. All community amateur sports clubs play a vital role in our community. That point has been laboured at other stages of the Bill, so, hopefully, that will be the case.

In regard to amendment No 2, put forward in the names of Mr Leslie Cree and Mr Robin Swann, Sinn Féin has no issues with the pigeon-racing amendment. There are many and a very wide variety of recreations on the list of sports already. Some might argue that some of them are lesser sports than pigeon racing, and some may have a contrary view. I see no reason why that should not be included as well. No doubt, if it is passed by the Assembly today, it will give Mr Swann something to tweet about — or should that be coo about? I give my support to amendment No 2.

Mr I McCrea: My comments will be very short, as we have discussed and debated this a number of times over the last couple of weeks. The Member, to be fair, as I have said before and will say again, has been to the fore of trying to promote this issue. It was unfortunate that we had to go down the route of bringing it forward in the Minister’s name and not his, but we are where we are. The Member brought forward his amendment last week, which, unfortunately, did not go through. We had a quick chat about it. In respect of my conversation with the Minister, the fact that the Member took up the offer to consult with the Minister and figure out a way forward on this gives a wee bit of assurance that, when these things happen, things can move forward.

In that sense, it is a wee bit unfortunate that, in respect of the amendment from the Ulster Unionist Party, consultation has not really happened with the Minister. We had an issue with Mr McKay’s amendment last week because consultation had not taken place. However, it now has, and we are therefore able to support it. Unfortunately, that consultation with the Minister has not happened with the Ulster Unionist amendment, and there are still some questions around pigeon racing. I have nothing against it; I have some such clubs in my constituency, although, as far I am aware, they do not have premises that would benefit from this rate relief. I am not saying that I do not sympathise with them, but we do not have enough information to be able to support the amendment from the Ulster Unionist Party.

However, as the Minister outlined the last time we debated the Bill, his door is open for a conversation with Mr Swann. Mr Swann has flown off to America, which may be why we have not had the consultation. Who knows what might happen between now and the end? We are content to support the amendment from Mr McKay, but unfortunately we cannot support the amendment from the Ulster Unionist Party.

Mr Cree: I rise to speak primarily to amendment No 2, although we support amendment No 1.

I start by noting that it was my colleague Robin Swann who drove amendment No 2 forward. As has just been said, he did fly off to America. It is interesting that we have not heard a tweet from him since, but it will be a good test to see if he can home his way back. [Laughter.] Unfortunately, he is unable to be here, and I am only too happy to take this forward on his behalf.

The issue was raised at the Bill's Second Stage by Mr Swann, and I want to expand on three points: why the Bill is an opportunity to pursue this, why pigeon racing should be included as a prescribed recreation by Land and Property Services (LPS) and how pigeon racing can meet the requirement to satisfy the definition of a sport.

The first clause of the Bill refers to the 1977 Order, and it is that Order that is the parent legislation for the Rates (Recreational Hereditaments) Order (Northern Ireland) 2007, which sets out the prescribed definition of recreations, as recognised by Land and Property Services. I believe this Bill is the best vehicle for correcting an oversight, whereby pigeon racing is excluded from the LPS list of prescribed activities. As Mr Swann stated at the Second Stage, that would give the Minister an opportunity to be a trailblazer and a champion for pigeon men and women across Northern Ireland. Mr Swann asked me to make sure I put that in.

In previous exchanges with officials and special advisers, it was implied that pigeon clubs as registered charities were the answer. However, that is not the case, and it is an easy cop out because it would place a disproportionate burden on clubs that have the ability to take up the opportunity, against any benefits that they might achieve. The application process via the Northern Ireland Charities Commission is daunting in itself, never mind the financial cost of obtaining and retaining certification, and likely would outweigh any benefits that clubs might accrue through rate relief. The inclusion of pigeon racing in the list of prescribed activities will allow it to avail of the 80% rate relief, despite what happens in other clauses.

At Consideration Stage, the Minister made reference to:

"article 31 of the 1977 Order, which details prescribed recreation."

He quoted it as stating:

"'prescribed recreation' means a recreation, whether conducted indoors or outdoors, which in the opinion of the Department demands an appreciable degree of physical effort and which is of a kind specified".

At that stage, my party highlighted what it believed to be an irregularity, because it is disingenuous that some recreation sports are listed under the 2007 prescribed activities list but are not recognised as sports by Sport Northern Ireland.

The Land and Property Services list of prescribed recreations, which is predicated on the Rates (Recreational Hereditaments) Order (Northern Ireland) 2007, includes camping; model power boating; recreational walking; paddleball; bicycle polo; and power boarding. All those sports or, perhaps more accurately, recreations can avail themselves of the rates relief that can be obtained through the current legislation, never mind what may be possible through any future legislation.

What makes those activities different from the other 125 that are named as "prescribed recreations" is that they are not recognised by any of the UK sports councils as disciplines of other sports or on a stand-alone basis. That has been confirmed by Sport Northern Ireland. I believe the premise to exclude pigeon racing due to a perceived lack of physical activity of the pigeon man or pigeon woman to be misguided. In any event, if the Department or LPS were to be exact in that stipulation, how could they and the UK sporting bodies explain — I will give you another list — ballooning, model aircraft flying, gliding, which is a special case, wildfowling, yoga and rambling as activities that require a greater degree or level of physical activity than that involved in pigeon racing? In fact, to refuse to treat pigeon racing equally in the rates legislation with those non-sporting activities is wholly discriminatory and should not be condoned by the House.

There is a lot of work being undertaken to get official recognition for pigeon racing as a sport. When that is achieved, LPS will have to amend the list anyway, so it may as well do it now when it has the chance. The arguments being put forward will demonstrate that a significant amount of physical activity is undertaken by the pigeon owner in preparation for and during pigeon races. We are not putting forward an argument regarding the physical activity of the pigeon owner to be recognised solely on the basis of a race. When you take the definition of "sport" as laid out in the Council of Europe's European sports charter of 1999, you see that it states:

"'Sport' means all forms of physical activity which, through casual or organised participation, aim at expressing or improving physical fitness and mental well-being, forming social relationships or obtaining results in competition at all levels."

It is that definition that is recognised in law, and that is crucial to the argument. For the purpose of the debate, I will break the definition down. It states:

"physical activity, which, through casual or organised participation"

It cannot be denied that pigeon racing is organised through the Royal Pigeon Racing Association, the Irish Homing Union, Northern Ireland Provincial Amalgamation, Ulster Federation and East Down Combine. The rules and regulations in place, especially for dispute resolution and anti-doping, leave many sports trailing in their wake. The definition also states that "sport" means all forms of physical activities that:

"aim at expressing or improving physical fitness and mental well-being".

How can it be argued that the 25 to 30 hours per week of physical activity that is undertaken by pigeon men and women ranging in age from 10 to 90-plus do not improve physical fitness? It can and will be shown that the amount of physical activity undertaken by the pigeon man or woman as part of one pigeon race is greater than the combined activity of more than 10 athletes at an athletic meeting. How many 80-year-olds actively compete in athletic events?

Where “mental well-being” is concerned, it can be shown that pigeon men and women need to have significant mental capabilities to participate in the sport. Striving to be the best requires mental toughness, the ability to deal with stress and excellent memory capacity.

Turning now to “forming social relationships”, I will say that that is a lot of what pigeon racing is about. Pigeon racing was breaking down political, religious and class barriers long before anything or anyone else. In what other sport can you compete against the pensioner next door and the Queen of England on the same day? Pigeon clubs provide the only social contact for some older pigeon men and women and an opportunity to meet friends on a weekly basis. Given that the majority of pigeon men and women are over 60 years of age, such social contact is, we argue, essential for their physical and mental well-being.

Mr McNarry: Will the Member give way?

Mr Cree: Yes.

Mr McNarry: I am intrigued by the debate, never having raced a pigeon in my life. I am wondering whether communications in my old party are still carried out by pigeon carrier. On a more serious note, can the Member inform the House of the training element that goes into pigeon racing and the physicality that he is talking about, which I think is a good point? Can he maybe give us an insight as to how long it takes to train a pigeon and what that entails? Are other pigeons involved in that or is it purely human contact?

Mr Cree: Thank you very much for the question. It is an interesting one.

Mr McNarry: I just want an answer.

Mr Cree: I have to say that it is not just the actual pigeon racing: you have to feed the birds and clean them out every day. Indeed, there is a lot of toing and froing. I am no expert on pigeon racing, but my father kept pigeons. He, in fact, had us doing a lot of the work. Not only was he doing sufficient recreation, working at them every day, but he had us doing it as well. It is one of those things that perhaps you do not fully understand unless you are involved in it directly. There is all that ongoing treatment; looking after the birds, doing small runs, taking them out, letting them free and hoping that they come back. There is quite a lot of work in it.

Moving back — I am almost finished — I was talking about the mix of people and the social interaction. Nowhere is this more evident than in the annual charity pigeon shows in Dublin, Lisburn and Blackpool, where pigeon men and women in their thousands gather together, as it says here — I was going to say flock together — to meet friends and colleagues to compare experiences and simply enjoy one another’s company once again. The opportunity to put something back into society through the millions of pounds given in charitable donations is something that all pigeon men and women can rightly be proud of. Pigeon clubs are also an excellent source of education for younger members. They learn discipline; respect for their fellow members, especially the older members; and a sense of fairness and honesty. Trials in America using pigeon racing as a means of breaking down gang culture in inner cities have proved very successful; something that we could all learn from here. We would draw similarities —

Mr Lyons: Will the Member give way?

Mr Cree: I will if the Member is short and to the point.

Mr Lyons: I cannot guarantee that. I thank the Member for giving way. He has been very informative. I did not know that pigeon racing has helped to break down gang culture in the United States. Is it not the case that, although what he is saying and trying to achieve is worthy, he is going about it the wrong way? There should be legislation to change the list of prescribed recreations rather than doing that in the way in which he is trying to go about it.

Mr Cree: I thank the Member for his intervention. Clearly, we are where we are. Mr Swann raised the issue at Second Stage. Not a lot of consultation was carried out. That does not make it right that these people should be overlooked. As I said at the start of my presentation, that has to be addressed sooner rather than later.

Getting back to the gangs issue, we would draw similarities in a lot of respects to boxing clubs in Northern Ireland. Again, many Members here will have experience of the good work that they have done in breaking down these sorts of barriers.

Although it is not strictly required in the definition, pigeon races can be and are competed locally, regionally, nationally and internationally. They are competed at club level; regional level, with the nine counties of Ulster being divided into 11 geographical regions; and nationally across the whole of the nine countries of Ulster. In addition, the King George V Challenge Cup is competed for by members across the whole of Ireland. That is why Mr Swann has been working with the excellent Northern Ireland Pigeon Association at a Northern Ireland level and through the Royal Pigeon Racing Association at a UK level to have pigeon racing designated as a sport. The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure has been in support of that.

I will conclude by urging Members to support amendment No 2.

Ms Hanna: I will speak briefly on these, because we have covered them at length. Amendment No 1 is, I suppose, a softening of the previous amendment. We remain supportive of that. Amendment No 2 deals with the new clause. I will try to kill two birds with one stone and address them both. In the context of the other activities that are outlined, we think that it is compatible. In the target demographic that the Member has outlined who participate in the sport, we think that it is appropriate. There is a relevant social benefit. We will let this one fly. We think that the policy does have wings and that those clubs should get their rates cheap, cheap.

1.30 pm

Mr Storey (The Minister of Finance and Personnel):

Thank you to the Members who spoke about the two amendments. I will try to resist using some of the analogies that were used already during the debate.

Mr McNarry: Are you a hawk or a dove on this issue?

Mr Storey: I do not want to enter into the internal workings of UKIP and whether it uses pigeon carriers or whatever it is. That is entirely an issue for the Member’s party.

On amendment No 1, I advise the House that I met Mr McKay to discuss the new amendment and agree a form of words that would develop the amendment that he tabled at Consideration Stage. At that stage, I highlighted that there were elements of his proposed amendment that would have been acceptable to me and that would fall within the stated aim of the Bill, as it was introduced, and my preferred policy position for further consultation. The present amendment complies with those standards, and, although I am not convinced that it adds material value to the Bill, it certainly does not conflict with its aims as agreed at Executive level when it was originally introduced.

As I stated last week, I have no difficulty committing my Department to making the first set of regulations by the end of September. That requirement is again encompassed in the amendment being considered at present, and I am content to endorse it. Likewise, I am happy to include a reference to community amateur sports clubs in the Bill now that such a requirement no longer affects the generality of the new enabling power brought forward in the Bill. The change also avoids the enabling power being pinned down too tightly and should help allay the concerns raised by Mr Cree at Consideration Stage in that it will allow the consultation process to take place without artificially confining the enabling power for the enhancement. It is important to underscore and underline that. I can, therefore, endorse the second part of the amendment.

On the outworking of the revised clause, I will make a number of points in relation to the next steps. Now that the Bill has taken its final shape, my Department will undertake a targeted consultation on the use of the clause in the coming days and weeks. That consultation will present my preferred policy that unlicensed community amateur sports clubs get the enhancement of 100%. Given the law of unintended consequences, I think that it is wise and logical to have a starting point for developing policy in that area.

I have taken heed of the views of other business sectors, which were reiterated and well articulated in front of the Finance Committee just before Christmas, and I think that it is safe to say that any club with a successful bar can already count itself lucky in comparison with commercial bars in their area and that getting a minimum of 80% relief on their sporting facilities could not exactly be deemed unreasonable. Ms Hanna made a valid point on that issue at Consideration Stage. I accept, having met Mr McKay last week, that policy can and should evolve over time and that this support measure can be refined in due course. While the preferred policy will take the starting point of enhanced relief in the sector, there is the case of community amateur sports clubs that operate a small bar that serves a few pints to members and visiting teams after a match. I and, I am sure, my successor will be happy to review that issue at a later stage.

We have a review of the whole system of business rates running at the moment, and that is asking some difficult questions about the way reliefs are targeted. That includes the rules around the existing 80% scheme for amateur sports clubs and whether that needs changed. I do not think that there is a way that we can develop a balanced, sound, effective and working policy to allow some clubs with bars to get 100% rate relief and for the regulations to be taken through the Assembly by September.

I would like to put on record that I am happy for such matters to be looked at further in light of the outcomes of the specific consultation exercise on that area and in the fullness of time when we have looked at the whole issue of reliefs in the round following the wider non-domestic rating review.

Incidentally, that review highlighted the differences in valuation treatment of clubhouse bars and restaurants compared with normal licensed premises. In the final analysis, the valuation method is normally left to the courts to decide and is not something that anyone would normally legislate for. It is, however, a factor in considering future rate relief policy and the competition issues that make this policy area so complex. To understand how complex it is, I recommend that Members review the evidence sessions organised by the Finance Committee before Christmas, which will give them some indication of those complexities.

Should amendment No 1 pass, I am content with the final form of the clause and endorse the wording brought to the House by Mr McKay following our meeting.

I thank the proposer of amendment No 2 for his commitment to the issue. Mr Swann is out of the country, so I thank Mr Cree for meeting us this morning and having a discussion, albeit we would have preferred an opportunity for a longer discussion prior to the amendment being tabled, which created a difficulty and challenge for us. I underscore the commitment of Mr Swann — he has been a strong advocate on the matter — and his colleagues. Unfortunately, I am still in a position of being unable to support the amendment. The proposer will be aware from recent responses to questions for written answer from my predecessor and my response to him during the Second Stage debate that such an amendment is untenable. It is more appropriate that the change proposed in the amendment be in the subordinate legislation that lists prescribed sports and recreations. In response to his amendment, part of the usual standard for revision of the list of sports and recreations is a compulsory requirement for consultation with sporting bodies and representatives of local councils under article 31(6). Members will note that such a consultation process is not in evidence for this amendment.

Leaving aside the appropriateness or otherwise of the amendment, it is legally unworkable in practice as it expressly refers to a statutory rule, the Rates (Recreational Hereditaments) Order (Northern Ireland) 2007. The use of the express legislative reference in the amendment means that, if that statutory rule were to be replaced, the provision inserted by the Member would have no effect and would fall into disrepair.

I am happy to undertake a review of prescribed recreations for the Member, should he think that that would be of benefit. Such a process could, however, go both ways. The proposer of the amendment has, understandably, pointed out anomalies in the existing list — those were well listed by Mr Cree — such as model powerboating, model airplane flying and wildfowling. I agree with the Member that those pursuits are not exactly in keeping with the principle enshrined in the governing primary legislation that the activity should involve:

I estimate that the inclusion of those anomalous activities has no practical effect because no rateable premises are associated with them, so their removal from the list would be a straightforward tidying-up exercise, which I am sure the Member would support. Hopefully, a commitment for further review in this area will provide some reassurance to the Members who tabled amendment No 2.

Mr McKay: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. I will keep my comments relatively short. I thank the SDLP, the Ulster Unionist Party and, indeed, the DUP for giving their support to amendment No1. I fully take on board the Minister's comments that he felt that this work would be carried out anyway by the Department, but I think that it is worthwhile that the Assembly gets the assurance that, whoever the incoming Minister may be, there is pressure to ensure that it is done for community amateur sports clubs.

The Minister commented on the work of the Finance Committee, and it was quite interesting to hear the different views and options that were put before the Committee. I welcome the commitment from the Minister and the Department to review the issue of community and amateur sports clubs with bars. This is a complex area. There are different rates for different bars, and perhaps the Department could put forward proposals to bring some clarity. I do not envy it in that task, but I think that it is very worthwhile that we look at the issue and see what we can do for clubs that are not covered by the 100% exemption.

As I said earlier, we support amendment No 2. Mr Cree put forward the argument that other sports already included do not require much exertion at all, so adding pigeon racing to the list should not be a big ask. We will support amendment Nos 1 and 2.

Amendment No 1 agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister

Mr Speaker: We will start with listed questions. Questions 1, 4, and 6 have been withdrawn.

Social Investment Fund: East Belfast

2. Mr Newton asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister for an update on social investment fund projects in East Belfast. (AQO 9495/11-16)

Mr M McGuinness (The deputy First Minister): A Cheann Comhairle, with your permission I will ask junior Minister McCann to take the question.

Ms J McCann (Junior Minister, Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister): The social investment fund is a growing success story. It is at the heart of the Executive's Delivering Social Change framework, making life-changing differences to people in communities facing disadvantage. Twenty-five projects, valued at £37 million, have now commenced, with 10 operational and more in the pipeline. In addition, over 600 participants are benefiting from projects in areas such as early intervention, employment and childcare. We can expect these numbers to ramp up significantly as delivery continues.

Belfast East allocated £8 million to employment, education and capital projects. Good progress has been made on the capital side with two of the capital projects — Best of the East and Bryson Street Surgery — due to complete construction by 31 March 2016. Also, letters of offer have been issued to the approved components of the zone's capital cluster project. We are working to expedite approvals for the remaining three revenue projects.

Mr Newton: I thank the junior Minister for her answer. I do not think I have to spell out just how important the revenue projects are, but I ask the junior Minister if she will take on board the need to push forward, in particular, on the employment and education revenue initiatives. Does the junior Minister agree with me that, in addressing capital investment, it is much better to take a strategic approach in an area — I suggest the Clarawood estate — rather than a piecemeal approach to the development of any capital projects.

Ms J McCann: I totally agree with the Member's last comment. I think we learned the lesson, through the Urban Villages programme, that you have to make a connection with the council, particularly in terms of community planning. It is very important with capital projects that you are not doing one thing in central government and another in local government. These projects, particularly those relating to the social investment fund, were ones where the community came together and decided who would be in the steering groups. They were the ones who decided which projects were the most important going forward.

You are totally right about the early intervention and employment projects. In other areas, the other junior Minister and I have been at launches, and, from talking to people who have participated in the programmes, we know that they have been quite successful in the way they were rolled out.

Mrs D Kelly: Thank you, Mr Speaker. I scarcely recognise the description of the social investment fund as one of the most successful programmes of the Executive, given that we are so far behind in delivering it. Does the Minister not agree with me that, five years into the Programme for Government, we should be doing post-project evaluations and not trying to get letters of offer out? What will happen to the money that is unspent? Does the Minister anticipate that it will run into the next Programme for Government? Will it be another five years before it is spent?

Ms J McCann: I understand that everybody was frustrated that the programme took a while to be rolled out, but I remind the Member that £58 million has been committed since 22 January. A further £22 million of the £80 million has been allocated to projects that are in the approval process. There are about nine revenue projects that are in the process now and have started. Five capital projects are at the construction stage, two are due to be completed, as I said, by 31 March, and one has already been completed in Coleraine.

You have to understand that revenue projects are not just projects that you spend money on right away. Some of the revenue projects will be over a two or three-year period, so you do not just spend it right away anyway. They will have to be given money as they go along. We have to remember that this was a new programme. We are now in a position where £58 million has been committed and £22 million has been allocated to projects that are in the approval process. In my opinion, that is progress.

T:BUC: Rural Areas

3. Mr McCarthy asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister to outline the progress made in implementing Together: Building a United Community in rural areas. (AQO 9496/11-16)

Mr M McGuinness: The actions and commitments within the Together: Building a United Community strategy will impact on all areas of our society, including rural areas. Under the United Youth programme, 13 pilot projects have commenced, providing around 360 places. Young people from all areas can avail themselves of those, and one of the pilots is being delivered by the Rural Development Council in Mid Ulster. Of the five shared neighbourhoods under construction, two are in rural areas — Crossgar Road, Saintfield, and Burn Road, Cookstown. The three shared education campuses announced to date are located in rural areas: Limavady, Moy and Ballycastle. One hundred and one summer camps have been delivered in 2015 involving around 4,200 children and young people, mainly from rural areas.

The Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure is also considering the expansion of its cross-community youth sports programme into a rural area. As with all other Departments, the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development is represented on the ministerial panel and the good relations programme board. Under the strategy, DARD has committed to working with rural community organisations to encourage increasing openness and accessibility and to reduce the chill factors and fears that prevent open access. Contracts are in place with lead service providers for the delivery of a rural community development support service, which is promoting and supporting work in a number of areas, including community relations.

Mr McCarthy: I thank the deputy First Minister for a detailed response. He will know that, in some rural communities, divisions can often be subtle and less visible than elsewhere. Has his Department any separate or special regeneration plans to tackle that where they see that it may arise?

Mr M McGuinness: Quite obviously, the ministerial panel is consistently keeping under review how the programme is being delivered. Thus far, we have made good progress on it, not least in the allocation of £60 million through the Fresh Start Agreement over the next five years. If the Member has a concern about a particular area, my door is open and we are willing to have a conversation about it. I think that we are very focused on the need to ensure that all rural areas are included and that the programme is delivered in a very inclusive way.

Mr McElduff: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I am sure that the deputy First Minister will agree with me that community safety is at the core of cohesive rural communities. I invite him in his role as a joint leader with the First Minister comment on the situation developing in my community of West Tyrone, where in the past week five Masses have been targeted for car break-ins and thefts. I am really emphasising the importance of community safety in rural communities by making our communities cohesive and safe.

Mr M McGuinness: First and without hesitation, the First Minister and I would unreservedly condemn the actions of those who are involved in such criminality in or around any place of worship. There is obviously a huge responsibility whenever there is an outbreak for the local community, working in harmony with the Police Service, to ensure that it is combated as effectively as possible. Obviously, somebody out there knows that this is happening, and there are people with information. I encourage anybody with any information to pass it on to the police.

Mr Speaker: Congratulations to the Member for that imaginative use of his question.

Mr McCrossan: What progress has been made on implementing T:BUC in my constituency of West Tyrone?

Mr M McGuinness: We are very focused on ensuring that the delivery of the Together: Building a United Community project is implemented successfully in every single constituency. The detail of your constituency is something that I will write to you about.

Obviously, it is a very exciting programme. It is one that we are prepared to put a tremendous amount of funding into because it is absolutely vital that we ensure that we bring our community together. It is also important to recognise the huge responsibility that politicians have, not just to deliver the programme but to lead by example. We must also ensure, however, that we are not just bringing people together at a grass-roots level. The people at grass-roots level have to be able to see that the politicians here in the Assembly are prepared to work together for the common good. That it is why the negotiation of the Fresh Start Agreement prior to Christmas was so vital, as it showed the community that decisions can be made that will improve their lives. Of course, a whole range of decisions was made at that negotiation.

West Tyrone is a very important constituency, as are all the others. The programmes are being rolled out effectively, and we will write to you about what is happening in West Tyrone.

Mrs Overend: I wish to ask the deputy First Minister what the total spend has been, and how much of that is additional. How much would have been spent anyway?

Mr M McGuinness: We have allocated £10 million for this financial year. We agreed, as I said in my earlier answer, to put aside £60 million over the next five years, and that is extra money that we have budgeted for. We believe that the programme is worthy of not just one year or two years but an extended period of something like five years, as it will have enormous benefits in bringing our community together. In short, the answer is that the £60 million is new money.

Active Ageing Strategy

5. Ms Ruane asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister for an update on the delivery of the active ageing strategy. (AQO 9498/11-16)

Mr M McGuinness: With your permission, a Cheann Comhairle, I will ask junior Minister McCann to answer this question.

Ms J McCann: The Executive's active ageing strategy was published on the Department's website on Tuesday 26 January. The purpose of the strategy is to transform attitudes to, and services for, older people. It is important that we fully acknowledge the enormous contribution that older people make to our society and that we challenge the negative stereotyping of them. The strategy will provide direction for Departments' policies; make connections between strategies; and lead to the improvement of services for older people.

In developing the strategy, we worked closely with the former Commissioner for Older People, Claire Keatinge, and the ageing strategy advisory group, which included as members older people and people working for organisations that represent older people. The strategy sets out a vision for an age-friendly region, in which people, as they get older, are valued and supported to live actively to their fullest potential, with their rights and dignity protected. The strategic aims of the strategy are based around the UN principles for older persons. There are 18 of those, which are grouped under five themes: independence; participation; care; self-fulfilment; and dignity. The strategy's vision and strategic aims will be implemented by those Departments and agencies with the resources, expertise and specific responsibilities for key programmes and services that improve the lives of older people.

Ms Ruane: Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as a freagra. I thank the junior Minister for her comprehensive answer. I wonder whether she will outline the next steps in the active ageing strategy, especially given the number of older people in our society.

Ms J McCann: The next steps will be to monitor progress against the outcomes set out in the strategy, and we will consult on the draft indicators as well. Junior Minister Pengelly and I were at an event earlier today, called Dignity Action Day, which was organised by the National Pensioners Convention. Basically, we signed up to what was called a “dignity charter”, if you like. At that event, it was very clear that people’s dignity and rights need to be respected throughout their life. Just because someone gets older does not mean that they have any less of a contribution to make to society. When we were looking at the strategy, we were saying that it was a very live strategy. It is not just about the strategy; it is about how the strategy and those services are rolled out, and how those rights are protected and that respect is given to older people. Certainly, that is the way that we will be monitoring and progressing it.

Mr McGlone: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Mo bhúochas leis an Aire as an fhreagra. The active ageing strategy, in common with a number of other strategies included within the role of OFMDFM, will be transferred to the Department for Communities in the next mandate. Will the Minister outline what level of communication and discussion has taken place to ensure that that transition is as smooth as possible?

Ms J McCann: Obviously, there has been some discussion at Executive level on where different areas of policy responsibility should sit. The Member will be aware that, over the next period, we will have time in the Assembly to discuss the different functions that go into the different Departments. We have tried to keep that fit as well as it can be kept. The important thing for a strategy such as the active ageing strategy is that it is an Executive strategy, not an OFMDFM one. It is a strategy for which all Departments are accountable. They fulfil their responsibilities when they are caring for older people in society. That is done right across the board, in services or whatever. It is an Executive responsibility, as opposed to an OFMDFM one.

Commissioner Appointments

7. Mrs McKevitt asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister why they plan to retain in the new Executive Office the power to appoint commissioners, including the Commissioner for Older People for Northern Ireland and the Northern Ireland Commissioner for Children and Young People. (AQO 9500/11-16)

Mr M McGuinness: ‘A Fresh Start: The Stormont Agreement and Implementation Plan’ confirms the reduction in the number of Departments from 12 to nine, from May 2016, along with detailed proposals for specific aspects of implementation for which the Executive are responsible. That will reduce the number of Ministers, special advisers, permanent secretaries and staff working in central support functions.

As part of the agreement, it was proposed that the Department for Communities should assume sponsorship responsibilities for the Commissioner for Children and Young People and the Commissioner for Older People, with the exception of the appointment of the respective commissioners. In putting forward this proposal, it was considered that the roles of the two bodies were a more natural fit within the Department for Communities, given its focus on issues affecting citizens here. However, while the proposal provided a better alignment of roles and responsibilities, it was also recognised that the postholders in these significant posts should have the confidence of both the First Minister and deputy First Minister. This will also help to ensure that the important work that these bodies carry out will receive the appropriate cross-party support to ensure that they deliver on behalf of the community. These public appointments are, of course, subject to open competition, with appointments based on merit, and the process is subject to regulation by the Office of the Commissioner for Public Appointments.

Mrs McKevitt: I thank the joint First Minister for his response. Given that the commissioners will be under the new remit of OFMDFM, how do you think communications are going to work? You are the employer, yet they are under the remit of a different Department. Has there been any discussion of that?

Mr M McGuinness: Obviously, we think that it will work. The decision has been made that these important agencies will transfer to the Department for Communities. The responsibility that the First Minister and I have is an overarching one for the work of the Executive. I do not think that there will be any difficulty whatsoever in us working with whoever is the new Minister in that Department to ensure that there is continuity of service to the public.

Mr Cochrane-Watson: It is clear that the functions of the Executive Office have moved radically since they were first announced last March. It seems to me that it will now retain delivery functions and has moved away from the more coordinating role that was first envisaged.

Mr M McGuinness: Is that a question or a statement?

Mr Cochrane-Watson: It is a question.

Mr M McGuinness: What is the question?

Mr Cochrane-Watson: Will the deputy First Minister comment on that? It seems to me that it is now retaining delivery functions. Initially, the new Executive Office was to have more of a coordinating role. Why has that move taken place?

Mr M McGuinness: The decisions that have been made in relation to the reduction in the number of Departments and the transfer of various services to what will be, effectively, a new Department are part of a very natural process for us to be involved in. It is all about ensuring that we have proper delivery for the benefit of citizens. The First Minister and deputy First Minister, being in the lead in the Executive and representing the two largest parties, have a duty and responsibility for the work of the Executive, including coordination but also ensuring that all Departments in the Executive deliver in the context of the changes that have been made as a result of the decisions to reduce the number of Departments. It is about effective delivery against the backdrop of ‘A Fresh Start’, and I think that we are off to a good start in ensuring that we continue to deliver for citizens. We can do that as long as all parties in the Executive — there will be a new Executive after the election — recognise that the demand of the people is that we continue to work together for their benefit.

Mr Speaker: Mrs Judith Cochrane is not in her place.

T:BUC: Leadership

9. Mr Campbell asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister how they are showing leadership in progressing the Together: Building a United Community strategy. (AQO 9502/11-16)

Mr M McGuinness: Achieving our vision of a united community based on equality of opportunity, the desirability of good relations and reconciliation requires collective commitment and effort from everyone. Government must work alongside statutory, voluntary, community and private sector partners to achieve the shared vision and aims of the strategy. We acknowledge that continuing political leadership is crucial to the effective implementation of this strategy, and we will continue to give the leadership and drive forward this important agenda. Much wider than this, however, is the need to have a collaborative approach across society: everyone in society has a role in progressing this work, and everyone can make a contribution to achieving positive good relations outcomes and to building a united, shared and reconciled community.

Mr Campbell: The deputy First Minister indicated that everyone has a role to play, and that is welcome. How does he feel, while trying to show forward thinking and leadership to bring the community together, about the former terrorist who, when questioned by police in the Republic on Friday, followed his lead by declining to give any information about a person, still alive, who had been involved in the Birmingham pub bombs — given that the deputy First Minister took exactly the same stance when he was in the box at the Saville inquiry by refusing to name anyone involved in terrorism with him?

Mr M McGuinness: Sometimes, I think that this particular Member does not understand that he is asking a question of the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister. I am here to answer on behalf of the First Minister and deputy First Minister. I do not believe that his question is in any way appropriate.

Mr Campbell: It is like you to refuse to answer the question.

Mr Speaker: Order. I call Mr Chris Lyttle.

Mr Lyttle: I thank the deputy First Minister for his answer. Why, three years on from the publication of the Together: Building a United Community strategy, has the Department failed to introduce an enhanced good relations impact assessment for all Executive policies to ensure sharing over separation in all policies?

Mr M McGuinness: Huge progress is being made on the Together: Building a United Community policy strategy. The very substantial funds that we have allocated over five years are a clear indicator of our absolute belief in the need to ensure that good relations are regarded as a priority for the Executive. On the particular strategy that the Member mentioned, the delivery mechanisms that are now in place under the auspices of the ministerial panel are about putting in place not just the pilot projects but the very proactive structures and strategies that are required to ensure the ongoing bringing together of our community. If there is a particular aspect of that that concerns the Member, we are quite willing to meet him and discuss it.

Mr Boylan: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. What is the funding situation with the implementation of this strategy?

Mr M McGuinness: In my earlier answers, I clearly indicated that very substantial funds are available for the programme. Building a United Community represents a key building block of the Programme for Government. In recognition of this, £10 million revenue funding was made available in the 2015-16 Budget to aid implementation of the strategy, supplementing other good relations funding provided by OFMDFM. In addition, £1.27 million of capital funding was secured to enable Departments to progress work on the headline actions. Following ministerial approval of proposals, the subsequent allocations enabled officials to progress with the headline actions as well as various funding programmes.

As I indicated, the recent Fresh Start Agreement committed to the provision of £60 million over five years in support of the Executive's delivery of confidence- and relationship-building measures within and between communities contributing to the creation of a shared future. We are working with other Departments to identify their financial requirements, which will enable consideration in 2016-17 of proposed allocations of the £12 million available to us.

Mr Dallat: As Building a United Community is the responsibility of the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister, I hope that the children were all safely in their classrooms and did not hear the exchanges between Mr Campbell and the deputy First Minister. Does the deputy First Minister agree that this is the most serious subject, because children are our greatest asset, and the present generation do not deserve to be lured into the terrible deeds of the past? Does he also agree that summer camps on their own are only a beginning and that much more needs to be done?

Mr M McGuinness: I absolutely agree with the Member about the importance of the strategy. I agree that the huge priority in all this is the future of our young people. In the Assembly today, we have had young people involved in politics from three schools: two in Enniskillen and one in Omagh. Some of them were here for the early stages of this session. The Member is absolutely right. All of us have a duty and a responsibility to recognise the importance of building a better future. Unfortunately, a tiny number of Members are only really interested in recrimination and are not interested in reconciliation. That is very sad.

I spoke about this at the weekend at the Kinsale Peace Project in County Cork in a hugely well-attended conversation between me and people who are interested in what is happening here, particularly in the peace process. During that engagement, a man stepped forward and informed the audience that he is a former member of the Grenadier Guards. He was very generous in his remarks, and we shook hands. Encouragement comes from the fact that many people in our society were previously at odds with one another but recognise the need to be involved in this sort of work. The others, we can leave behind.

Mr Speaker: That ends the period for listed questions. We now move on to topical questions.

2.30 pm

North-west Ministerial Subgroup

T1. Mr Diver asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister, given today's OECD findings, which, unfortunately, indicate that some of our students are struggling with literacy and numeracy, and given the particular level of disadvantage suffered in the north-west and in the Foyle constituency, which is not immune to the skills challenge, why the north-west ministerial subgroup, which has been tasked with dealing with disadvantage in the north-west area, has met only on two occasions, the second of which was a meeting that was called with 24-hours' notice, and to state what he hopes the subgroup will achieve in 2016. (AQT 3401/11-16)

Mr M McGuinness: There have been, as the Member said, two meetings of the ministerial subgroup that came about as a result of a conversation between the previous First Minister and me. The present First Minister has clearly shown her intention to continue what is important work. Last year was very much taken up by negotiations, and that presented a huge difficulty. However, action has flowed from the conversations that took place, and that resulted in an allocation of £130 million in the recent Budget for improvements to the A6, which was a big demand in the north-west. Funds were also put aside for the first stage of the A5. There have been important conversations in recent times about how we can advance the situation in Magee university. That is without mentioning the fact that hundreds of millions are being spent on turning Altnagelvin into a state-of-the-art hospital for the north-west. What disappointed me about the events of the latter part of last year was the fact that the SDLP voted against the Budget that allocated those funds for the north-west. The SDLP needs to explain that.

Mr Diver: I will take the deputy First Minister's answer in relation to the other matters that he listed, but it did not address the point that I made about disadvantage and the lack of skills among our young people. It is a matter of very serious concern. I would like to know what the Executive will do to battle that.

Mr M McGuinness: The Member does a disservice to schools in the north-west and the city where he lives. I am proud that I was the Minister who took the decision to build the new St Mary's Primary School, the new St Cecilia's College and the new St Patrick's Primary School in Derry. They are first-class schools, as are all the other schools in the area. They provide first-class —

Mr Diver: [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order.

Mr M McGuinness: People can heckle from the sidelines if they want, but I work on the basis that the people heckling really do not want to hear the answer, which is that huge progress is being made, with first-class schools being provided for the people of Derry and the north-west.

On skills, we need to do work in relation to Magee university, and great work is happening at the North West Regional College even as we speak. We need to ensure that people have the skills so that, when we are successful in bringing in foreign direct investment, we have people with the ability to take up those vital jobs.

Brexit Referendum: June/September

T2. Mr Ross asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister, following speculation over the weekend that the Prime Minister is likely to look at a referendum on the European in-out question in early June, whether they share the concern that an early European referendum, rather than one in September, could cause difficulties with the Assembly election, given the possible danger of confusing the two messages. (AQT 3402/11-16)

Mr M McGuinness: I absolutely share that concern. It is obvious that we are not the only people concerned about that. I listened — I think that it was last weekend — to the First Minister of Scotland expressing her disagreement with such a referendum being held in such close proximity to their elections. It is an important matter, but even more important is what will be put to people in that referendum. Over the next, probably, two days, further important meetings will take place between David Cameron and senior representatives of the European Union, the outcome of which will probably decide what will be put to a referendum. It is no secret to anybody that I have huge concerns that the strategy that has been adopted by David Cameron is sleepwalking all of us into an exit from Europe.

Mr Ross: The debate around our membership of the European Union is important, and, in order to make sure that we have a proper debate, it is important that we have enough space between the Assembly election and the European referendum. What discussions has OFMDFM had with other devolved regions across the United Kingdom or, indeed, our national Government on the timing of the referendum and whether there is scope for negotiation on a September date rather than a June date?

Mr M McGuinness: The point made by the Member is important. Up until now, although there have been conversations, because of the inability to work out exactly when the referendum will be, it has been difficult to zero in on how we take things forward. On account of it being flagged up that there could be a referendum in June, it is important that the First Minister and I engage with David Cameron and others, including the devolved Administrations in Scotland and Wales, about the issue.

It is all on public record. The First Minister of Scotland has put it on public record, and it will come as no surprise to anybody that we share concerns about the close proximity of a referendum to the Assembly elections. We have not even dealt with the arguments on the merits of staying in or leaving. One thing we all need to bear in mind is how it could economically affect us in the North, particularly when you have, for example, the Confederation of British Industry in the North saying that over 90% of its members are against an exit.

Brexit: Financial Implications

T3. Mr G Kelly asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister to expand on the financial implications of Britain exiting the European Union, given that this region is a net beneficiary of the EU. (AQT 3403/11-16)

Mr M McGuinness: The financial implications are absolutely massive for us, not least for our farming community. The North of Ireland is a net beneficiary of the European Union. We have received significant support from the EU through a number of funding programmes to which, in the event of a Brexit, we would no longer have access. They include structural and regional development funds, comprising the European regional development fund, the European social fund, INTERREG and the Peace IV programme, which are worth €982 million over the period 2014-2020. Loss of that funding would be severely detrimental to society here and would be devastating for our local economy.

We would also lose access to funding under the common agricultural policy, which is worth approximately €2.5 billion in the 2014-2020 period. That represents a massive investment in the sector. We all recognise the importance of the agriculture sector to our economy and our rural communities, and CAP funding has been vital to its sustained growth and development for years. Furthermore, there is the potential loss of access to competitive EU funding, which, in the period 2011-12 to 2014-15, amounted to over €95 million. That would be a huge blow, particularly to the business sector and research and development, which are central to developing the economy.

Mr G Kelly: Gabhaim buíochas leis an LeasChéad-Aire as a fhreagra go dtí seo. I thank the deputy First Minister for his answer. Given what he said, does he feel that the British Government have kept the devolved regions up to date on the negotiations and involved them in them?

Mr M McGuinness: I cannot say that they have. My answer to the previous question addressed the issue; the British Government have informed but not involved or consulted OFMDFM on their negotiations on EU membership.

That is probably true of Scotland and of Wales.

Mental Health Spending: Barnett Consequential

T4. Mr Nesbitt asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister whether the £1 billion of spending to enhance mental health services in England, which was announced by the Prime Minister three weeks ago, has a Barnett consequential for Northern Ireland. (AQT 3404/11-16)

Mr M McGuinness: If he made the announcement in the context of it being for England, we need to explore whether it will have a Barnett consequential for us. I have no doubt that when such announcements are made the Department of Finance and Personnel will explore how we can benefit from them.

Mr Nesbitt: I thank the deputy First Minister. As he said to Mrs McKeivitt a few minutes ago, he has an “overarching” responsibility for the working of the Executive. It is on that basis that I asked that question and that I ask the follow-up question: will he support me in saying that if there is a Barnett consequential that money should be ring-fenced for mental health provision in Northern Ireland? I ask that because, while it is fine to build roads, create jobs and enhance skills, it is meaningless for the one in four of us who suffers from poor mental health and well-being, because of the debilitating nature of the illness.

Mr M McGuinness: I absolutely agree with the Member: if there is a Barnett consequential flowing out of that announcement, I believe that it should be ring-fenced, because I accept, absolutely, the argument that he has made consistently about the need to vastly improve our services to those who are affected by poor mental health.

Social Investment Fund: UUP Proposals

T5. Mr I McCrea asked the First Minister and deputy First Minister whether, if we had taken on board the Ulster Unionist Party's suggestions as part of its Budget proposals for the last financial year, which were to use up the money from the social investment fund, we would have been able to deliver the projects that we have been able to deliver. (AQT 3405/11-16)

Mr M McGuinness: Rather than focusing on what other people do, whether in relation to a party voting against the Budget, or parties not voting against the Budget but uttering criticisms of it, we prefer to focus on what we are doing: constructively and positively delivering for communities. Of course, the social investment fund has a bottom-up approach, in which local communities identify their priorities. We have been happy to go with that. There have been criticisms in the House about delay, but the delay is about getting it right. These are huge amounts of money, and we need to be sure that they are being spent properly in the interests of all of our people.

You can clearly see from the projects that are being rolled out that they are having, and will have, a very positive effect in communities. I remember an SDLP Member for West Belfast, at the beginning, when the social investment fund was being spoken about, trying to make out that it was a slush fund for paramilitaries. I think that the working out of all of this, and the very careful nature of how it is dealt with, has proven that statement to be totally and absolutely wrong. The social investment fund is bringing, and will continue to bring, huge benefits to local communities. It is they who have made the decisions, and all the projects that have been put forward thus far are highly creditable.

Mr Speaker: Ian McCrea for a very quick supplementary.

Mr I McCrea: Obviously, the £1.4 million investment from the social investment fund into my constituency is something that I welcome. I take it from the deputy First Minister's answer that he does not want to get into the, “He said, she said” aspect of those who were for and against it. Does the deputy First Minister believe that those who would oppose such a measure, or who intend or propose an alternative use for it, are, in essence, saying that they do not believe that these projects are good projects and that the Executive should re-prioritise their Budget?

Mr M McGuinness: There has been criticism from the party that the Member has identified. I think that that criticism was wrong-headed. Clearly, these projects, whether in mid-Ulster or elsewhere, will bring enormous benefits to local communities. It ill behoves anybody in the House to try to undermine projects that we are funding on foot of communities having identified for us developments in their areas which would bring them enormous benefits.

Regional Development

Structural Maintenance Resurfacing

1. Ms Ruane asked the Minister for Regional Development for her estimate of the level of structural maintenance resurfacing in the 2015-16 year. (AQO 9508/11-16)

Miss M McIlveen (The Minister for Regional Development): As the House may be aware, structural maintenance includes structural drainage, patching and surface dressing as well as resurfacing. I can advise the Member that, in respect of resurfacing, the current projected expenditure for 2015-16 is estimated at just over £21 million. It has been a challenging year for capital funding for resurfacing compared with previous years, and it is an area where I have had discussions with industry representatives to listen to their concerns.

I sought and obtained additional funding for structural maintenance in the November monitoring round. The Executive allocated an additional £5 million. I am aware that this was very much welcomed by the construction industry. The overall structural maintenance budget for 2015-16 is estimated to out-turn at around £44 million against the independently assessed requirement of £141 million. That is a significant shortfall for this year, but has to be seen in the context of an investment of £454 million over the last four years. I would like to assure the Member that I will continue to make strong bids for additional structural maintenance funds at every opportunity.

Ms Ruane: I am very concerned about the Minister's answer. As she will be aware, the annual average is £70 million, so there is an enormous gap. Obviously, that has led to deterioration of the roads. I would just like to let the Minister know that the Tamnaharry Hill road in Hilltown has subsided. I would welcome an update — in writing, if she does not have the answer today — on when it will be dealt with.

Miss M McIlveen: I thank the Member for her question. Obviously, the structural maintenance budget for 2016-17 is estimated to start at some £46 million. Compared with 2015-16, that is a much better starting place than where we were last year. While I appreciate the Member's concerns, I hope that she understands that I share those concerns about investment and will continue to call for additional money to be spent on the roads infrastructure. She has been very specific in relation to the Hilltown area. I will write to her with regard to that scheme.

Mr Weir: I thank the Minister for her answers so far. While there has been a welcome improvement in Transport NI's dealing with street lighting and potholes in north Down, there is obviously still quite a considerable backlog with regard to potholes. What is Transport NI's inspection process for potholes and the criteria that would apply for roads services?

Miss M McIlveen: I thank the Member for his question. My Department does have a duty of care to maintain all public roads in a reasonable condition. Irrespective of budgetary constraints, the Department still has been trying to meet that legislative requirement. Transport NI regularly inspects all road networks and defects are prioritised for repair depending on their severity. Earlier in the year, although roads were still being inspected as normal and defects prioritised for repair at that stage, there has been a build-up of a considerable backlog, as the Member said, of patching and other routine maintenance works.

Thankfully, as part of November monitoring, I sought and was successful in securing the additional £50 million of resource, which was prioritised by the Executive for road maintenance. That has allowed external contractors to be re-employed in many areas. I am hopeful that Members will actually see that work is being carried out quite quickly in their areas — certainly much more quickly than before. I am keen for the public to see the difference quickly, but I also ask for understanding from Members with regard to the fact that there has been a backlog.

Mr Dallat: Far be it from me to suggest that we are going back into the Dark Ages when those wonderful Roman roads all but disappeared due to lack of maintenance, but the situation is now so radical and so serious that some roads are not due for resurfacing for 102 years. Does the Minister agree with me that, for the sake of the ratepayers, taxpayers and contractors, there has to be a new approach to how we maintain our roads?

Miss M McIlveen: I thank the Member for his question. I am of the same mind in that a stitch in time saves nine, and we should look after the roads that are currently part of our infrastructure. There has been a major consequence of reduced funding, and maintenance costs are likely to increase the longer we leave our roads without increasing the amount of patching and so forth. I am of a similar vein to where the Member is with regard to that. I see that as a priority, and it will continue to be a priority for me while I am in the Department. I will certainly be lobbying for additional moneys if and when they become available.

Mr Speaker: Before we move on, I inform Members that question 7 has been withdrawn.

Sea Defences: Antrim Coast Road

2. Mr Lyons asked the Minister for Regional Development what action her Department has taken to prevent landslide risk and improve sea defences along the Antrim Coast Road. (AQO 9509/11-16)

Miss M McIlveen: I can advise that, over the past five years, extensive maintenance work has been undertaken to prevent landslides and rockfalls and to improve sea defences along the A2 Antrim Coast Road. In the last two years, Transport NI has delivered a £950,000 structural maintenance programme to repair and strengthen sea defences and minimise landside risk. The required work had been identified following detailed inspections by Transport NI staff. As you will be aware, in a recent visit to the area, I witnessed the ongoing challenges faced by my Department through storm damage and coastal erosion. I was also able to see at first hand the crucial engineering works that are being carried out to address the engineering problems and maintain the integrity of that key route.

In light of the severe storms and heavy rainfall this winter, a further detailed inspection of the sea defences and slopes will be undertaken this spring with a view to identifying further work and funding required along that strategic part of our road network. In the meantime, Transport NI engineers will continue to monitor the road closely and will carry out temporary and/or permanent repairs as appropriate in a bid to keep that vital transport corridor open.

Mr Lyons: I thank the Minister for her answer. She will be aware of how important the coast road is to the promotion and development of tourism in the wider east Antrim area. She obviously notes its importance as a route, so, further to her answer, can she give more detail on the nature of the structural maintenance that has taken place and outline what areas specifically are most at risk of landslide?

Miss M McIlveen: I thank the Member for his question. I can advise that the majority of the work entails strengthening of the sea defences or construction of new sea defences where existing structures were damaged beyond repair. Other work includes the construction of landslide-retaining walls at Glenarm, soil nailing of slopes at Carnlough and construction of new roadside parapet walls in the vicinity of Ballygalley.

With regard to areas at risk, I am advised by officials that, due to the soil conditions along the A2 coast road, it is extremely difficult to predict where or when a slope may fail and cause a landslide. Efforts are being focused on active areas where slides that affect the road occur, and remedial works are undertaken to minimise further deposits affecting the road in future. Unfortunately, with the current levels of rainfall, slopes are susceptible and there could be failures. Those are inevitable, and they may present future funding issues for my Department. I recently visited the area and am very conscious of the challenges there. I pay tribute to the engineers who work very hard to keep that road open and to keep it safe.

Mr Beggs: If additional work is required, improving the sea defences along the coast road could involve a range of agencies: the Department of the Environment in planning; the Northern Ireland Environment Agency (NIEA) in the environment; the Rivers Agency at river mouths; and the Department itself has responsibility for roads. Whether it involves protecting the public road or private property that is being endangered, how can all those groups be coordinated to allow speedy decisions to be made and speedy results to emerge so that the necessary work, by Roads Service or to a private property that needs additional defences, can occur?

Miss M McIlveen: I thank the Member for his question. He will understand that I, too, represent a coastal constituency and am very aware of the issues. Sometimes, putting in defences is not necessarily the right thing, and there may be alternatives.

He will be aware that I coordinated a group before Christmas. I brought together representatives from councils, the Rivers Agency and the National Trust to discuss exactly what he described. It is about looking towards a lead Department, which, until this point, has been absent in this place. The conversations are ongoing, and I hope to have another meeting within the next few weeks to set in place a strategy for the incoming Minister to take forward. I accept the point that he made. The issue is being recognised and, hopefully, can be dealt with.

A5: Draft Order

3. Mr McAleer asked the Minister for Regional Development when she will agree the draft order to enable the A5 project to advance to its next stage. (AQO 9510/11-16)

Miss M McIlveen: The Member will be aware that included in the Fresh Start Agreement is a commitment by the Executive to advance the A5 western transport corridor project. The Irish Government have made a commitment to contribute £75 million match funding towards the project. That funding commitment is intended to ensure that, subject to the successful completion of statutory procedures, construction of the New Buildings to Strabane section can commence in 2017, with an estimated completion date of 2019.

In December, I invited landowners to meet me. That was an open and frank discussion, and I have since followed up on concerns that they raised. Work on the new draft statutory orders and environmental statement is now complete. The next step is their publication, and I hope to make an announcement on that shortly.

Mr McAleer: Go raibh maith agat. I thank the Minister for her answer. I understand that signing off the draft orders will trigger a six-week public consultation. I know from questions to your predecessor that there will be public exhibitions on the back of that. Can the Minister give us any clarity on when those will be signed off and when the six-week consultation will start?

Miss M McIlveen: The Member will be aware that I have been doing considerable work on this. That is in addition to the announcement that I am looking to introduce a land acquisition and compensation Bill to assist landowners as we move through the process. That, accompanied by work that I have been doing in relation to land agents, is part of the preparation that I wanted to complete before moving on to any announcement. I am hopeful that an announcement will be made quite shortly.

Mr Clarke: I thank the Minister for her answers. I welcome the article in 'Farming Life' at the weekend that referred to enhanced compensation for those losing their land to vesting. I welcome that announcement, but why was this or something like it not announced or done sooner in this mandate?

Miss M McIlveen: I thank the Member for his question. To be honest, I cannot answer that, other than to say that I really do not know. Since coming into post, I have made it my business to have conversations to see what the issues have been with the A5 and A6. As I said in answer to a previous question, I met land agents, who highlighted a number of concerns, one of which was about land acquisition and compensation.

I have sought and am seeking Executive approval on the introduction of a land acquisition and compensation Bill. I will be seeking accelerated passage for this Bill to bring compensation levels into line with the rest of the United Kingdom, particularly England and Wales, around compulsory land purchase. This is a clear anomaly, and I want to ensure that landowners in Northern Ireland are treated fairly and equitably. That is the purpose of the request around this Bill.

Mr McCrossan: Will the Minister agree that there is a serious legacy issue relating to infrastructure in the north-west? What additional funding or financial backing will be allocated beyond this point, given that the draft Budget for 2016-2021 does not allow for major investment in infrastructure in the north-west?

Miss M McIlveen: I thank the Member for his question, although I am a wee bit perplexed by it given that the flagship projects for the A5 and the A6 have recently been announced in the Budget statement. This will significantly help the connectivity around the north-west. If the Member has other projects that he thinks would be of significance and would assist with all of this, I am more than content to meet him to discuss his concerns.

Mr Allister: With eight miles of this stage having to be constructed through a floodplain, why is her Department not able to say how much that will add to the cost of this project? Does cost not matter when it comes to this project? Is cost only an inhibitor when it comes to fixing our potholes?

Miss M McIlveen: I thank the Member for his question. Obviously, cost does matter. In relation to this particular scheme, a considerable amount of work and research has been undertaken to find the appropriate route. Once the announcements are made, the Member will see what that is.

Belfast Bicycle Network

4. Mr Lyttle asked the Minister for Regional Development for an update on the Belfast bicycle network. (AQO 9511/11-16)

Miss M McIlveen: The Member will be aware of my recent announcement about three bicycle routes in Belfast that are under construction. Work started on these last week, and Members who have been in the city centre may have seen the activity in Alfred Street. I expect these to be completed by Easter. These routes will link existing cycle tracks from the west and south of the city to the city centre and will provide greater protection for people who choose to make journeys in the city by bicycle. The schemes will also support the successful Belfast bike share scheme and help more people gain the confidence to use the bicycle as an enjoyable sustainable mode of transport. For example, the Alfred Street scheme will link the two docking stations at the Gasworks with the docking station behind Clarence Court in Alfred Street and the docking station in Arthur Street.

These schemes are three of the five schemes consulted on last summer. Designs for the other two schemes, which will link the east of the city to the city centre, are still being considered, taking account of comments from the information days held as part of the consultation process. Those schemes will complete a 2.5-kilometre route from the Westlink shared foot and cycle way through the city centre to Titanic Quarter station and on to the Ballymacarrett Walkway, the Connswater Community Greenway and the Comber greenway.

Mr Lyttle: I warmly welcome the investment that the Minister has outlined. Adequate investment is essential to delivering safe cycle routes in Northern Ireland. The DRD cycle strategy aims for £10 to be spent per person, and the DRD/Sustrans Bike Life report shows that Belfast residents support a £25 per person spend on cycling. Given that the spend in 2014-15 was £4 per person and in 2015-16 is £3 per person, does the Minister think that that is an adequate level of investment? What will her allocation be for cycling in the 2016-17 budget?

Miss M McIlveen: I thank the Member for his question. Obviously, I have been quite active, in the short period that I have been Minister, in relation to cycling, and I hope to continue that in the coming weeks. This year, it is anticipated that the Department will spend £2.4 million on cycling. This includes expenditure on the Active School Travel programme. In 2014-15, a total of £7.5 million was spent on cycling. That included quite a significant amount of capital for active travel demonstration projects. Other Departments also contribute to the spend on cycling. It is very difficult, then, to calculate exactly how much there is from the Executive overall.

I am aware of Sustrans's manifesto and plans. You will be aware that my Department is undertaking to develop a bicycle network plan for Belfast that will guide the development of infrastructure around the city for the next 10 years. I also have plans for a greenway strategy, and I am hopeful that any incoming Minister will see the benefits of both those plans when allocating funding.

Mr Douglas: I welcome the Minister's answers today. Since the 2014 Giro d'Italia, there has been a big increase in cycling. Will the Minister outline what steps her Department is taking to promote and foster cycling in east Belfast?

Miss M McIlveen: All politics is, obviously, local. The Giro d'Italia was a wonderful showcase event that focused on a remarkable interest in cycling, not just in east Belfast but across Northern Ireland. Cycling is, of course, an important, healthy and sustainable way of travelling for everyday purposes. As I have said, to support and promote the growth of cycling, we are taking forward elements of the 2015 bicycle strategy, which includes a number of flagship schemes in Belfast city centre, the development of the Belfast bicycle network plan and the strategic plan for greenways. Those are all very relevant to east Belfast where we have seen the development of a number of excellent greenways, which I am keen to improve and extend, where possible. I am particularly keen that the Comber greenway joins the Connswater Community Greenway as a first-class facility.

Mr Lynch: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Can the Minister give an update on the usage rates of bicycles in the Belfast scheme?

Miss M McIlveen: I thank the Member for his question. I am delighted to say that there have been 150,000 journeys to date through the bike share programme, and that is in just nine months. I am also really pleased that the Belfast Trust and Belfast City Council are working to further expand Belfast bikes across three Belfast hospital sites. I understand that a decision on those schemes is due to be taken at the council today, and they are expected to be in place by Easter 2016. It should include a link from the Royal Victoria Hospital site into Belfast city centre, and that will give people more confidence to be able to make journeys by bicycle. I think that the announcement is very timely given the ongoing works that my Department is undertaking in order to provide a safer space for bicycles in the city centre.

A6: Dungiven Bypass

5. Ms Maeve McLaughlin asked the Minister for Regional Development following the commencement of the Moneynick section of the A6, will the Dungiven bypass be her next priority. (AQO 9512/11-16)

Miss M McIlveen: The A6 Londonderry to Dungiven dualling scheme, which includes a bypass of Dungiven, is well advanced in its development. It has been through a public inquiry, and the inspector has produced a report embracing various recommendations. My officials have prepared a report addressing the recommendations arising from the public inquiry and are reviewing the extent of the scheme, which can be built with the funding allocated in the December 2015 Budget statement. Once I have received those reports and considered them in full, I will make a decision on how the scheme should proceed.

The indicative allocations for the 2017-18 to 2020-21 period will allow my Department to construct elements of the A6 Londonderry to Dungiven scheme, which will include a bypass of Dungiven. Subject to making statutory orders, approval of the final business case and successful procurement, it is possible that the first phase of the Londonderry to Dungiven scheme could commence in the latter part of 2018-19.

Ms Maeve McLaughlin: Go raibh maith agat. I thank the Minister for that and, indeed, for the commitment to address the issues coming from the public inquiry, but I am probably going to pursue this a bit harder.

Will she provide any more detail on timelines? I think specifically about the Dungiven-Claudy, Claudy-Drumahoe and Drumahoe-Maydown sections.

Miss M McIlveen: I thank the Member for her question and for her perseverance. At this stage, I cannot give any specific timeline, other than to say that any announcement will include the Dungiven bypass. I am hopeful that an announcement on the scheme will be made in the coming weeks, once I have received all the final reports and been able to set in place a timescale for delivery.

Mr G Robinson: Does the Minister agree that the completion of the much-needed road project will enhance the tourist and economic potential of this large area of Northern Ireland, including smaller towns such as Magherafelt, Dungiven and Limavady?

Miss M McIlveen: I thank the Member for his question. I am conscious of the areas that he represents. It is a key corridor, and the scheme has been on the cards for a long time. I feel privileged to be in a position in which I will be able to make an announcement shortly and to see the area open up and be able to fulfil its tourist potential.

Mr Diver: I thank the Minister for her responses so far. Does she agree that it is shocking and bitterly disappointing that we are still discussing the issue half a century after the initial decision was made to bypass Dungiven?

Miss M McIlveen: I thank the Member for his question. I share his frustration — probably not quite as much, as the area is not in my constituency — but I have travelled that road many times to see its condition and the time it takes to get to Londonderry through Dungiven, and I share his concerns. However, as I said, I should be able to make an announcement on it very shortly.

Mrs Overend: Will the Minister provide an update on her Department's work with landowners on the Moneynick section of the A6? Do any outstanding disagreements need to be resolved? What action is in place for that?

Miss M McIlveen: I thank the Member for her question. I understand that officials are liaising with landowners, but, if there is something of a particular nature that, the Member feels, needs to be resolved, I am more than content to meet her and the said landowners.

Structural Maintenance Underspend

6. Mr Milne asked the Minister for Regional Development for her assessment of the Quarry Products Association's assertion that the £97 million underspend on structural maintenance in 2015 has cost the local economy a further £122.2 million and 650 jobs. (AQO 9513/11-16)

Miss M McIlveen: I am acutely aware of the pressures facing the local industry as a result of budgetary pressures on capital funding for structural maintenance. I met a delegation from the Quarry Products Association on 30 November to discuss the impacts that budget pressures are having on jobs, the loss of skills in the industry, the need to work across the water and the impact that that has on families.

You will appreciate that I have been in this role for a relatively short time, but I have been active in that time. Structural maintenance is one of my highest priorities, although I am conscious, as I am sure the Member is, that there are many competing priorities at departmental and Executive level. The structural maintenance budget for 2015-16 is estimated at £44 million, leaving a shortfall of £97 million when compared with the independently assessed annual funding requirement. However, that has to be seen in the context of a £454 million investment over the last four years.

I do not doubt that budgetary pressures are impacting on jobs. I met the Minister of Finance to discuss the funding arrangements for structural maintenance. It has to be recognised that the Executive have invested in many high-profile capital road projects over a number of years, which has been a significant boost for the local industry. I am pleased to say that the starting position for structural maintenance in 2016-17 that was announced in the recent Budget is £46 million. I will continue to make strong bids for additional funds as we move through the process.

3.15 pm

Mr Speaker: Thank you. I am afraid that we are out of time for listed questions. We now move to 15 minutes of topical questions.

Rail Link: Belfast International Airport

T1. Mr Lunn asked the Minister for Regional Development for her assessment of the prospect of a rail link to Belfast International Airport. (AQT 3411/11-16)

Miss M McIlveen: I thank the Member for his question. I imagine that he is talking about the Knockmore to Antrim branch line, which is maintained by Translink.

The DRD investment prioritisation strategy for Northern Ireland, which was published in May 2014, sets out a vision for future railways over the next 20 years. There is obviously an economic benefit relating to the Antrim to Knockmore line, and there are opportunities to establish a rail link to Belfast International Airport, although my understanding is that the usage of the airport would need to increase to around 10 million passengers to make that rail link viable. I suppose that, in some ways, it is aspirational, but if we were able to open such a line again it would be seen as very positive for Northern Ireland.

Mr Lunn: I thank the Minister for her answers so far. The economic case for reopening the Knockmore line, with the link from the Dublin line to the north of the country and the airport, is fairly obvious, although it would be expensive. Does she not agree with me that Ryanair coming to Belfast International Airport will obviously produce a major uplift in the number of passengers? Do we really need to wait until we have 10 million plus one passengers before we do something about it, or can we not anticipate what is liable to happen in the next few years?

Miss M McIlveen: I thank the Member for his question. Sustainability is obviously key in everything that we do, particularly in relation to our public transport routes. You need only speak to colleagues in East Antrim about the Larne line and Members from Newry about the services that they have. We need to look at cost. That is also key to where we are. The Member also needs to be aware that we have a very good bus link from the international airport to the city centre.

Park-and-ride Facility: Portadown

T2. Mr Anderson asked the Minister for Regional Development for an update on the proposed park-and-ride facility in Portadown, along with the potential costings for the project. (AQT 3412/11-16)

Miss M McIlveen: I thank the Member for his question. Translink has appointed a design team that has very advanced plans for a 340-space park-and-ride facility beside the rail station in Portadown. Several very successful meetings have been held between Translink and Transport NI, which owns the site. I have met other Members about this, and our next step is a pre-planning meeting with the council, in the hope that a planning application will be put in place somewhere in mid-2016, with the project commencing somewhere around 2016-17.

Mr Anderson: I thank the Minister for her answer. Are any other park-and-ride facilities proposed for the Upper Bann area?

Miss M McIlveen: I thank the Member for his supplementary question. I meant to say that the cost of the project in Portadown is in the region of £3 million. I understand that areas in and around Lurgan and Banbridge are also being considered for park-and-ride facilities. Those are obviously in his constituency.

York Street Interchange: Update

T3. Mr G Kelly asked the Minister for Regional Development for an update on the York Street interchange project. (AQT 3413/11-16)

Miss M McIlveen: I thank the Member for his question. My officials are reviewing the inspector's report on the public inquiry into the scheme that was held towards the end of last year. I have not been updated on that at this stage, but I hope to receive that very quickly, hopefully in advance of going into purdah, so that we can make a decision on the way forward. I expect that to be with me in the next few weeks. Subject to a satisfactory outcome, the notice to proceed and the designation order will be published.

Mr G Kelly: Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire le haghaidh a freagra go dtí seo. I thank the Minister for her answer. Is this project eligible for TEN-T funding or any other EU funding?

Miss M McIlveen: I understand that the interchange scheme has already received £1.2 million of EU funding as part of the development and is one of very few schemes to be pre-identified for future funding. The proposed construction programme of November 2017 to December 2020 aligns the funding profile expected for the next call. Therefore, the scheme will be in a pretty good place to have a good strong bid. The project lies on the North Sea/Mediterranean corridor in the TEN-T network. Officials have successfully negotiated for the interchange's inclusion as a pre-identified project in the corridor work plan.

Enniskillen Bypass: Update

T4. Ms McGahan asked the Minister for Regional Development for an update on the Enniskillen bypass. (AQT 3414/11-16)

Miss M McIlveen: The preferred alignment for the A4 Enniskillen southern bypass was published in June 2015. Further progression of the project, through the statutory procedures to construction, are dependent on the availability of finance. Should finance become available, it would take around 18 months to two years before work could start. So it is still some time off.

Ms McGahan: Go raibh maith agat. I thank the Minister for her response. Does the Minister agree with me that, following the capital funding for the A5 and the A6, it is vital that this bypass becomes a priority?

Miss M McIlveen: I thank the Minister for her question. Obviously, this matter is a priority in Fermanagh. However, the pace of the development of all major road schemes is very much dependent on financial resources and, at this time, the Executive's priority is being given to the A5, A8, A6, A26 and the Magherafelt bypass. So, while it is a priority, it has other projects ahead of it.

Roads: Flood Damage

T5. Ms Ruane asked the Minister for Regional Development for an update on her Department's plan to deal with roads damaged by flooding in South Down, given the severe weather conditions, the lack of investment and the deteriorating effect that that is having on our roads. (AQT 3415/11-16)

Miss M McIlveen: I thank the Member for her question. The severe weather has taken its toll on all our roads, not just those in South Down. We have a duty to keep all public roads in reasonable condition, and, despite budgetary constraints, the Department has been trying its hardest to keep roads open and in good condition. I ask the Member to contact me if there are particular roads in her constituency that she feels need to be attended to. I will certainly look into it and give her a response.

Ms Ruane: I thank the Minister for her response. I certainly will write and let you know the names of the roads. I told you of one earlier: the Tamnaharry Hill road in Hilltown. Can the Minister outline how much of the £1 million earmarked for flood-hit roads will be spent in the South Down constituency?

Miss M McIlveen: At this time, the priority has been in Fermanagh and in areas around the A1 and Portadown. I will get back to you about South Down.

Derry to Coleraine Rail Line: Completion

T6. Mr McCartney asked the Minister for Regional Development whether she has a completion date for phase 2 of the Derry to Coleraine line, including the halt at Bellarena, which featured on a Radio Foyle news broadcast this morning. (AQT 3416/11-16)

Miss M McIlveen: I thank the Member for his question. I visited the halt at Bellarena to see the progress on it. I understand that it is on schedule to be substantially completed by the end of this year.

Mr McCartney: Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as an fhreagra sin. I thank the Minister for her answer and for visiting the site. Having seen that work, does she have an update on progress on phase 3 and the sort of capital investment that will be required for it?

Miss M McIlveen: My understanding is that phase 3 will take place in and around 2020 or 2021. The project would have to be established in order to take phase 3 forward, and it would be after phase 2 is complete. That is still on the cards to be looked at.

Woodburn Forest: Exploratory Drilling

T7. Mr Ross asked the Minister for Regional Development, given that she will be aware that DETI has granted an exploratory drilling licence for Woodburn forest in the East Antrim constituency, where Northern Ireland Water owns a portion of the land, what plans are in place to allow that exploratory drilling to take place. (AQT 3417/11-16)

Miss M McIlveen: I thank the Member for his question. Northern Ireland Water owns the land at Woodburn forest, and it has agreed to lease a small portion of the forest for the drilling of the well. This work will be undertaken by an independent company under a licence, which, as the Member said, has been awarded by DETI. Planning functions, as he is aware, transferred to local government with effect from 1 April 2015, and the issues of permitted development rights and any requests for a certificate of lawful use of development are the responsibility of the local council planning department. In this instance, the council responsible is Mid and East Antrim Borough Council. I understand that all work will be subject to the approval and agreement of the council, DETI, and DARD's Forest Service, which owns the trees and manages the land as a forest.

Mr Ross: The Minister will be aware that any time drilling is involved, there is, quite rightly, concern among the public around safety issues, particularly around water supplies. Has she assessed whether there is any risk to the water supply following on from the exploratory drilling?

Miss M McIlveen: I thank the Member for his question. My understanding is that the exploration project at Woodburn has been designed to prevent liquids on site from soaking into the ground below it, thereby protecting the local water courses and ensuring that there will be no adverse impact on the Woodburn river and the dam's catchment. Northern Ireland Water, as the licensed public drinking water provider, has a duty under drinking water quality legislation to assess all potential risks to drinking water sources in the catchments and to put in place appropriate sampling and, where required, any possible mitigation measures. Northern Ireland Water has advised that it is satisfied that the proposed work will have no detrimental impact on the impounding reservoirs or the public water supply.

Blue Badges: Application Delays

T8. Mr McCrossan asked the Minister for Regional Development, given that she will be aware of the considerable delays felt by new applicants and those who are renewing their applications to the blue badge scheme, whether current badge holders who are awaiting renewal can use their outdated badge. (AQT 3418/11-16)

Miss M McIlveen: I thank the Member for his question. I am more than aware of the issues around delays in processing blue badges. The blue badge unit has been given additional staff to help deal with the backlog of applications, and I am pleased to say that the backlog has reduced quite considerably from over 8,000 applications to 4,602 at present. Staff are dealing with assessed applications that were received in early December 2015 and the automatic eligibility applications that were received on 30 December 2015. At present, the new application can be completed online. I also want to assure the Member that my understanding is that those badges are still valid while the new badges are being processed.

Mr McCrossan: I thank the Minister for her answer. She has, more or less, answered my supplementary question. I just wanted some details on how the new scheme will be rolled out, and the time frames for it.

Miss M McIlveen: I thank the Member for his question. A project is ongoing to modernise the blue badge application process, and that is similar to the system that is available in the rest of the United Kingdom. This should make the application process much easier and less susceptible to fraud, and it will make all aspects of application easier with regard to renewal and duplicate requests being available online. This is all good news moving forward.

3.30 pm

Mr Speaker: Mr Daithí McKay is not in his place, and nor is Mr Sammy Douglas. I congratulate the Minister on a very busy and brisk Question Time; well done. The House will take its ease while we wait for the next Minister. Thank you.

Executive Committee Business

Housing and Planning Bill: Legislative Consent Motion

Mr Bell (The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment): I beg to move

That this Assembly endorses the principle of the extension to Northern Ireland of the provisions in the Housing and Planning Bill dealing with enforcement of the estate agents legislation.

The Housing and Planning Bill was introduced in Parliament on 13 October 2015 by the Department for Communities and Local Government. The overall purpose of the Bill is to make changes to the law in England and Wales concerning housing, rent charges, planning and compulsory purchase. In addition, the Bill was considered to be a suitable legislative vehicle to introduce changes that the Department for Business, Innovation and Skills considered necessary to make to the UK-wide Estate Agents Act 1979, which I will refer to as the 1979 Act. These changes relate only to the 1979 Act's enforcement responsibilities.

Before outlining these changes, I will give a brief history of these enforcement responsibilities and provide some information on the scope of the 1979 Act's provisions. The 1979 Act is largely limited to regulating the activities of estate agents in selling property on behalf of their clients. When it was enacted, the then Office of Fair Trading — the OFT, as it was commonly known — had certain responsibilities under the 1979 Act, most notably the power to ban unfit persons from carrying out estate agency work.

The 1979 Act also contained other enforcement responsibilities that were carried out by local authority trading standards departments within their respective areas in Great Britain and by my Department in Northern Ireland. The responsibilities falling to trading standards departments include requirements relating to the handling of clients' moneys, and ensuring that requirements to provide vendors with certain information are complied with. Essentially, all complaints about estate agents under the 1979 Act were investigated and assessed by trading standards departments, who referred the most serious complaints to the OFT to consider, with a view to warning or banning an estate agent. In 2007 the OFT was given additional responsibilities following the amendment of the 1979 Act by the passing of the Consumer, Estate Agents and Redress Act 2007. These amendments gave the OFT powers to approve consumer redress schemes for complaints concerning estate agents, and the power to require estate agents to join such a redress scheme.

In 2011 the UK Government consulted on proposals to reform the consumer protection landscape in Great Britain. These proposals included a review of the OFT's functions under the 1979 Act and, in particular, whether these functions could be more effectively carried out by a trading standards department. The responses to this consultation supported the proposal to transfer the OFT responsibilities under the 1979 Act to a trading standards department. Consequently, in 2014, the UK government decided to appoint Powys County Council as the lead enforcement authority for the 1979 Act. This transfer of functions involved both an order made under the Public Bodies Act and a tender process involving a contract for a three-year term.

In September 2015, the Secretary of State for the Department for Business, Innovation and Skills (BIS), the Rt Hon Sajid Javid MP, wrote to me concerning the proposed amendment of the 1979 Act's enforcement arrangements. The Secretary of State asked for my agreement, in principle, to seek the consent of the Assembly for those amendments to extend to Northern Ireland. The UK Minister was seeking to amend the 1979 Act because the contract awarded to Powys County Council to carry out the role of lead enforcement authority will expire in 2017. Furthermore, there is no scope in the Public Bodies Act to carry out a further transfer of the responsibilities of the lead enforcement authority under the 1979 Act.

Without the proposed amendment of the 1979 Act, Powys County Council would continue to be named as the lead enforcement authority after its contract to provide the role expires in April 2017. Therefore, an amendment to the provisions dealing with the 1979 Act's enforcement arrangements is necessary so that a new lead enforcement authority could be appointed in the event that Powys County Council should no longer be considered best placed to provide the role, and to ensure the continued effective enforcement of the Act's provisions. A failure to amend the 1979 Act could result in unfit and fraudulent estate agents being allowed to continue to operate. That would cause increased harm to consumers and prevent compliant estate agents operating on a level playing field.

The proposed amendment of the 1979 Act would allow the Secretary of State for the Department for Business, Innovation and Skills, or a person whom they have appointed, to take over the role of lead enforcement authority for the UK. The person chosen by the Secretary of State could be any local authority trading standards department in GB or the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment in Northern Ireland. In effect, the provision will allow the Secretary of State to appoint a new lead enforcement authority for the 1979 Act from time to time as necessary.

The proposed amendments of the 1979 Act deal with a transferred matter, as they enable the possible appointment of DETI as the lead enforcement authority for that Act. Such a change to departmental functions falls within the definition, in Standing Order 42A, of a devolution matter requiring a legislative consent motion. The inclusion of DETI in this provision will necessitate a minor amendment to the generic set of enforcement powers for consumer legislation in the Consumer Rights Act 2015. That amendment would allow DETI to use the enforcement powers in part 3 of schedule 5 of the Consumer Rights Act for the purposes of the 1979 Act, in the event that DETI might at some time in the future be appointed as the lead enforcement authority for the UK.

Although it is difficult to envisage a scenario in which my Department would seek to be appointed as the lead authority for the 1979 Act, the same assessment could be made of many of the approximately 200 trading standards departments across the UK, which, because of their size, for example, may not wish to put themselves forward for the role. However, it is appropriate that my Department should also be in a position to be considered for the role of lead authority in the same way as any of the existing enforcement authorities in the UK. Therefore, my Department should be included in these proposals.

I commend the motion to the Assembly.

Mr McGlone (The Chairperson of the Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment): Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. On 9 October 2015, the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment wrote to the Committee to advise that the Secretary of State for Business, Innovation and Skills had informed him that proposed provisions to amend the Estate Agents Act 1979, which are included in the UK Housing and Planning Bill, were required to enable the Secretary of State for BIS to appoint a new lead enforcement authority, as necessary, by means of a tender process. The enforcement authority could be any trading standards department in GB, as the Minister said, or DETI in Northern Ireland, through the Trading Standards Service.

The Committee noted that, although BIS carried out a broad-ranging consultation in 2011, which included Northern Ireland, there were no responses from Northern Ireland to the proposal. It was unclear from the information provided by the Department whether DETI would apply to become the new lead enforcement authority.

The Committee asked the Department if, when the legislation is changed, it is envisaged that the Trading Standards Service would respond to a tender for the appointment of a new lead enforcement authority for the UK. The Department responded that it considers it unlikely that DETI would respond to any tender to become the lead enforcement authority but that, on balance, DETI should be included in the proposed amendment of the Estate Agents Act 1979, so that it is treated on an equal footing with all the other existing enforcement authorities in the UK and Northern Ireland.

Having fully considered the proposals, the Committee supports DETI in seeking the Assembly's endorsement of the legislative consent motion.

Mr Dunne: I, too, support the legislative consent motion. It is important that we allow the Secretary of State for Business to amend the Estate Agents Act 1979. I believe that the LCM is the most appropriate means of legislating in this area and will ensure that Northern Ireland is brought into line with the rest of the United Kingdom. This is a very important area of work, and it will lead to greater accountability within the estate agent sector, which will ultimately improve the sector for the agents and the public. It will also allow for the possible appointment of DETI as the lead enforcement authority for the Estate Agents Act.

As this is the most effective means of updating the legislation, I am happy to lend my support to it. I welcome this motion, and I am happy to commend it to the House.

Mr Bell: I thank both Members for their supportive and helpful contributions. I also thank my colleagues in the Executive and the Enterprise, Trade and Investment Committee for considering the matter in such a timely manner, which has allowed the debate to take place today. The brevity of the Chairman's remarks does not reflect the seriousness and professionalism with which his Committee addressed the matters. By carrying out the role in the way that it has become known for — scrupulously and fairly — it allowed the motion to come to the House today. I personally thank the Committee and the Chair.

I hope that, from both the responses that we have had today, Members know why we should vote for the consent motion. By passing the motion, the Assembly will ensure that consumers and businesses in Northern Ireland continue to benefit from the effective enforcement of the Estate Agents Act 1979. I commend the motion to the Assembly and thank all Members for their support.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly endorses the principle of the extension to Northern Ireland of the provisions in the Housing and Planning Bill dealing with enforcement of the estate agents legislation.

Housing (Amendment) Bill: Consideration Stage

Mr Speaker: I call the Minister for Social Development, the Lord Morrow of Clogher Valley, to move the Consideration Stage of the Housing (Amendment) Bill.

Lord Morrow (The Minister for Social Development): Thank you, Mr Speaker. I beg to move amendment No 1. This is one of three amendments that —

Mr Speaker: Thank you for coming in by accelerated passage. We are just taking your proposal for Consideration Stage at this point. Will you just confirm for me that the stage is moved? That is all we need.

Moved. — [Lord Morrow (The Minister for Social Development).]

Mr Speaker: Members will have a copy of the Marshalled List of amendments detailing the order for consideration. The amendments have been grouped for debate in my provisional grouping of amendments selected list. There is a single group of three amendments that deal with the criteria for information disclosure. Once the debate on the group is completed, any further amendment in the group will be moved formally as we go through the Bill, and the Question on each will be put without further debate. The Questions on stand part will be taken at the appropriate points in the Bill. If that is clear, we shall proceed.

No amendments have been tabled to clause 1. The Question is that clause 1 stand part of the Bill. All those in favour say Aye.

Some Members: Aye.

3.45 pm

Notice taken that 10 Members were not present.

House counted, and, there being fewer than 10 Members present, the Speaker ordered the Division Bells to be rung.

Upon 10 Members being present —

Clause 1 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 2 (Disclosure of information relating to anti-social behaviour)

Mr Speaker: We now come to the amendments for debate. With amendment No 1, it will be convenient to debate amendment Nos 2 and 3. These amendments deal with the criteria for information disclosure. I call the Minister for Social Development to move amendment No 1 and address the other amendments in the group.

Lord Morrow: I beg to move amendment No 1: In page 3, line 4, leave out subsection (4).

The following amendments stood on the Marshalled List:

No 3: In page 4, line 2, leave out from "(convictions" to end of line 3 and insert

"(conduct and convictions) (whether or not the order is also sought on other Grounds);".— [Lord Morrow (The Minister for Social Development).]

Amendment No 1 is one of three Government amendments that were discussed in some detail during the Social Development Committee's clause-by-clause scrutiny of the Bill. I am pleased that the Committee was able to support the amendments, and I thank its Chair and members for their constructive scrutiny. The amendments all relate to clause 2, which provides that certain information relating to antisocial behaviour may be disclosed to the Housing Executive and registered housing associations for certain purposes. The amendments are being dealt with in a single group.

I should first explain that the Housing Executive or a registered housing association can apply to the court for an order for possession of a secure tenancy where certain statutory grounds apply. Ground 1 relates to breach of a tenancy agreement. Ground 2 relates to conduct causing nuisance or annoyance and convictions for certain offences. Ground 3 relates to acts of waste, neglect or default that have caused the condition of a property to deteriorate.

Clause 2, as introduced, would have allowed any person to disclose to the Housing Executive or a registered housing association information relating to behaviour that would be grounds for possession under grounds 1, 2 or 3 where the information is disclosed for the purposes of applying for, or deciding whether to apply for, orders for possession on those grounds. The purpose of clause 2 is to facilitate the disclosure of information to the Housing Executive and registered housing associations to enable those landlords to take appropriate action to deal with antisocial behaviour.

The clause therefore made specific provision that, in relation to applications for orders for possession on ground 1, information could be disclosed only where the breach of tenancy agreement involved behaviour causing annoyance or nuisance. However, the Social Development Committee took the view that any application for an order for possession that relates to any description of antisocial behaviour can be made under ground 2, and that it is not necessary for clause 2 to provide for the disclosure of information relating to any other grounds. I accept this view and have therefore tabled amendments that would remove the references to grounds 1 and 3 from this clause.

Amendment No 1 would remove the provision that information that indicates or suggests that the condition of a dwelling has deteriorated owing to acts of waste by, or neglect or default of, certain persons is "relevant information" that may be disclosed to the Housing Executive or a registered housing association.

Amendment No 2 would remove the provision that applying for, or deciding whether to apply for, an order for possession on ground 3 is a "relevant purpose" for which information may be disclosed to the Housing Executive or a registered housing association.

Amendment No 3 would remove the provision that applying for, or deciding whether to apply for, an order for possession on ground 1 is a "relevant purpose" for which information may be disclosed to the Housing Executive or a registered housing association, while ensuring that applying for, or deciding whether to apply for, an order for possession on ground 2 will still be a "relevant purpose" even if the order is also being sought on other grounds.

Mr Maskey (The Chairperson of the Committee for Social Development): Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for moving the Consideration Stage this afternoon and for his comments so far. The Committee for Social Development welcomed the Bill and noted that it encompasses three key areas, as the Minister outlined.

They are the sharing of information relating to empty properties; the disclosure of information relating to antisocial behaviour; and the registration as a statutory charge of certain loans. During the briefings and evidence sessions, stakeholders and members raised a number of issues about the Bill.

We have voted on clause 1, so I move swiftly on to clause 2, "Disclosure of information relating to anti-social behaviour". The Committee report deals with a number of issues on the clause, and I will deal with a couple of them now. The Committee considered stakeholders' concerns on the appropriateness of the information-sharing provisions that relate to antisocial behaviour and related definitions in the Bill. The Bill will introduce new powers for information sharing for the purpose of pursuing possession action in accordance with grounds 1, 2 and 3 of schedule 3 to the Housing (NI) Order 1983. The Committee agreed with the Housing Rights Service, which said in oral evidence that it believed that the definitions of "relevant information" and "relevant purpose" went beyond what was necessary. The Committee discussed that issue at length with the Department. Ultimately, the Department stated that, while the Minister did not believe that the references to grounds 1 and 3 went beyond what was necessary, if the Committee requested their removal, he would accept that in order to ensure the Bill's timely progress through the Assembly. The Committee very much appreciated that commitment from the Minister. At its meeting on 10 December, the Committee agreed that references to grounds 1 and 3 in clause 2 should be removed by way of an amendment provided by the Minister.

The second key issue that I will deal with today is the fact that private landlords will not be included under the information-sharing provisions of clause 2. The Committee was concerned that that created an imbalance and that tenants engaging in antisocial behaviour could be pushed into the private sector. While the Committee believed that there was a legitimate argument to include private landlords, it recognised the serious concerns about individual landlords being equipped or not equipped to handle personal data in accordance with data protection legislation. The Committee, therefore, decided against amending the legislation to include an enabling clause for information sharing with private landlords. Crucially, the Committee welcomed the fact that the issue had been well discussed with the Department and had been included in the recently launched discussion paper 'Review of the Role and Regulation of the Private Rented Sector'. In other words, members and others had concerns about this being a missed opportunity and a gap being left in the regulations process, but, given that it will be dealt with in the 'Review of the Role and Regulation of the Private Rented Sector', the Committee was content to leave the situation for now. The Committee, therefore, is supportive of the Bill and the amendments tabled by the Minister.

Ms P Bradley: I support the amendments as listed by the Minister for Social Development. As we heard, the Bill has three aspects. While it is relatively short, it was not without debate, especially on clause 2, "Disclosure of information relating to anti-social behaviour". As MLAs, we should all be acutely aware of the impact of antisocial behaviour on our communities. The Northern Ireland Housing Executive and registered housing associations already have a duty of care to protect their tenants from antisocial behaviour as well as a duty to protect other people from antisocial behaviour caused by tenants of social housing. During 2013-14, the Housing Executive received and processed 3,206 reports of antisocial behaviour, the most common of which was noise.

As I said, the effects of antisocial behaviour have a great impact on our communities. Those who suffer most are often the most vulnerable, including older people. It most certainly causes added strain to those with poor mental health. From my constituency, I know that those living in areas where antisocial behaviour exists suffer great fear and intimidation. When I was planning to speak at Consideration Stage today, I thought about information sharing. It is good that it is becoming information sharing at this level because we already have information sharing in many social housing areas. I know, as will many MLAs here who are actively part of their community and working in their social housing areas, that a lot of information is already being shared, and they often know who people are and their background even before they move in. It is good to see that becoming an official practice instead of just being down to the jungle drums in our social housing areas.

Turning to the amendments from the Minister, I welcome the removal of clause 2(4). In Committee, we heard from many stakeholders, in particular Housing Rights, who felt that the clause could lead to persons with poor mental health being unduly penalised. It is not just about the penalties that could be imposed; there is a need for sensitivity in the disclosure and sharing of information. In conclusion, I welcome the Bill and the amendments and hope that it can lead to a difference in our social landlord areas.

Mrs D Kelly: I will be brief, given that colleagues have covered most parts of the Bill and said much of what needs to be said. Ms Bradley eloquently talked about the issues facing us as MLAs. Antisocial behaviour is, without doubt, one that comes across our desks day and daily.

I welcome the amendments and thank the Department for having listened to and worked with the Committee to produce a better Bill that reflects the concerns that have been raised by a number of stakeholders. I support the amendments and look forward to the Bill progressing.

Mr Beggs: I and my Ulster Unionist colleagues also continue to support the Bill, recognising the benefits that it can bring in addressing community issues that arise as a result of empty homes and antisocial behaviour. Sharing information on vacant properties between the Department of Finance and Personnel, the Department for Social Development and the Housing Executive will, I hope, mean that antisocial behaviour can be headed off at an earlier stage and that concerns can, therefore, be addressed, minimising disruption to neighbours.

The sharing of specific information on antisocial behaviour will help to better manage such situations and hopefully address issues earlier. There was a situation in the Monkstown estate a few months ago that could have been addressed earlier if the information had been shared. The Bill will, when it comes into effect, bring about some practical benefits.

Clause 2 deals with the disclosure of information relating to antisocial behaviour, particularly the sharing of information between the Housing Executive and social landlords. I would have thought that sharing that information should enable social landlords to be better aware of difficulties that have caused annoyance and a nuisance to neighbours, such as where a tenant had previously been involved in a dwelling that was being used for illegal purposes or had allowed or incited others to engage in antisocial activity. I welcome and support that aspect of clause 2.

As others have indicated, there was some discussion of how widely the information should be shared. In principle, it should be widely shared so that private landlords are aware of what they might be taking on. However, it was pointed out to us that there were issues regarding data protection and data security, because information falling into the wrong hands could endanger individuals. That being the case, I am content with the general wording of clause 2.

Amendment No 1 would take out clause 2(4). The Housing Rights Service expressed concerns and asked whether it was necessary or went beyond what was necessary to address antisocial behaviour. We are dealing with a Bill that is trying to address empty homes and antisocial behaviour. The Committee relayed the concerns of the Housing Rights Service to the Minister, who has, ultimately, tabled the amendment. Having reflected further on this area and on clause 2(4), I ask the Minister what is wrong with sharing key information if someone has carried out an act of waste or has damaged public property, whether it is a Housing Executive property or a housing association property.

I think that if a tenant is moving to a different landlord, it would be appropriate, where there has been a difficulty, to pass that information on with a constructive mode in mind so that the new social landlord will know that they will need to take particular care of the tenant to ensure that no further acts of waste might occur in the new social housing property. I seek an explanation from the Minister as to why he thinks that it should be removed. He and his officials have not made much of a defence of that area when questions have been posed. It would be helpful if we could have that.

4.00 pm

I turn now to amendment Nos 2 and 3, which refer to clause 2(8). Again, if those amendments go through, it will remove the ground 1 and ground 3 aspect of transferring relevant information. That is another area on which the Housing Rights Service expressed concern. If you wanted to put it under a heading of "antisocial behaviour", I can see how it may not be seen as antisocial behaviour that is affecting others, but it is certainly antisocial behaviour affecting a publicly owned property. I seek an assurance from the Minister that if he moves amendment Nos 2 and 3, resulting in the removal of this area of information that can be transmitted, he is satisfied that adequate powers will remain to ensure that those who damage public property will be identified, and that that warning signal will be transmitted to the new landlord so that more regular inspections can, perhaps, occur to allow a new tenant to get off to a positive start in their new property, not be carrying any legacy from the past and making sure that previous difficulties will not be repeated.

Other than that, I am generally satisfied with the Bill; it has brought about improvements elsewhere. The registration as statutory charge of certain loans is new to Northern Ireland and may enable further innovative forms of support that might not otherwise be available. I am supportive of the rest of the Bill and the clauses.

Mr Dickson: I too support the Bill and, indeed, welcome it back to the House. As Members have heard, it is a short but important piece of legislation. I note that most of the information-sharing has been limited to the Housing Executive. Although, on principle, that does not present me with concerns, it is important that there are synergies between the relevant parties and the property users to ensure that those who need, and should have, access to such information can obtain it in an easy, timely and efficient manner. That includes working effectively with housing associations and local government, which is, unfortunately, often forgotten in a top-down process. The Bill will also create a duty to do so.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Dallat] in the Chair)

I note with interest that DSD intends to work with councils to provide information, where possible. However, without meaningful regeneration powers, the role of local government is rather limited. It is disappointing that the Department decided to drop the entirety of the Regeneration Bill. Most of this information will originate from DFP, but, at Committee Stage, it was suggested that utilising the resources of Land Registry could provide considerable benefits with regard to information collected. We were told that DSD would explore that option, so perhaps today the Minister could provide us with further information on whether that may be a viable way forward and whether he would require further legislation in that respect.

As others said, antisocial behaviour is a very difficult issue and is a scourge on many communities. The Bill is a step forward, although I think that I have to share some of the concerns voiced by the Housing Rights Service to the Committee regarding the relatively wide scope of incidences in which disclosure could be made. The Alliance Party is generally content to support the Bill at this Stage. We look forward to its coming back.

I apologise to the House and the Minister because I have another meeting to attend and will not be able to remain for the remainder of the debate.

Lord Morrow: I am grateful to Members for their contributions to the debate on the amendments. As I explained in my earlier remarks, the amendments had been agreed by the Committee and will ensure that clause 2 is focused on conduct that constitutes antisocial behaviour as the term is generally understood. I noted that some Members focused on the antisocial behaviour aspect. It is right that that should be done. Some have also noted that, while this is a small, short Bill, it is nevertheless a very necessary one. I welcome those remarks.

In response to the question that Mr Beggs posed regarding information about acts of waste being shared between social landlords, I will just say that the Housing Executive's role in allocating all social housing and assessing individual eligibility for such housing means that the issue would be addressed when tenants are transferring to other social landlords. I hope that that goes some distance to reassuring him.

I will close my remarks by, again, thanking the Committee for its work on the matter and all those Members who have spoken today.

Amendment No 1 agreed to.

Amendment No 2 made:

In page 4, line 1, leave out “or 3”.— [Lord Morrow (The Minister for Social Development).]

Amendment No 3 made:

In page 4, line 2, leave out from “(convictions” to end of line 3 and insert

“(conduct and convictions) (whether or not the order is also sought on other Grounds);”.— [Lord Morrow (The Minister for Social Development).]

Standing Order 39(1) and Standing Order 37A(1), (2) and (3)(b) & (c): Suspension

Mr Nesbitt (The Chairperson of the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister):

I beg to move

That Standing Order 39(1) and Standing Order 37A(1), (2) and (3)(b) & (c) be suspended in respect of the Exceptional Further Consideration Stage of the Public Services Ombudsman Bill [NIA Bill 47/11-16].

The purpose of the proposed suspension is to enable an exceptional Further Consideration Stage of the Public Services Ombudsman Bill to take place. Standing Order 37(A) makes provision for an exceptional Further Consideration Stage, but it does so only in strictly limited circumstances where a provision of a Bill is outside legislative competence or a Bill has a serious technical defect as a direct consequence of an amendment made to the Bill, which is not the case at this time.

The Committee has agreed to seek to amend clause 50, which provides for non-disclosure notices, in response to a concern raised by the Attorney General that it might be outwith the Assembly’s legislative competence. However, that concern does not arise from any of the minor amendments to clause 50, and, accordingly, Standing Order 37A, as it stands, would not facilitate a further amending stage. The Committee sought the advice of the Speaker on the appropriate procedure to bring the matter before the Assembly, and, in light of that advice, the Committee agreed to submit today’s motion to suspend in part Standing Order 37A and Standing Order 39(1).

The House will recall that some Members and parties have consistently opposed the non-disclosure notice power in clause 50 but, notwithstanding that, have been willing to support the Bill in the round as a reforming measure and, to that end, the pragmatic way forward that the Committee is proposing by way of this motion and the amendment to clause 50. Approval of the motion would remove the requirement that the issue of legislative competence arises from an amendment to the Bill. The suspension is limited to the Exceptional Further Consideration Stage of the Ombudsman Bill. Subject to Members’ approval of this motion, that will be the next scheduled item of business and will provide the House with the opportunity to consider the Committee’s proposed amendment.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Before we proceed to the Question, I remind Members that the motion requires cross-community support.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved (with cross-community support):

That Standing Order 39(1) and Standing Order 37A(1), (2) and (3)(b) & (c) be suspended in respect of the Exceptional Further Consideration Stage of the Public Services Ombudsman Bill [NIA Bill 47/11-16].

Public Services Ombudsman Bill: Exceptional Further Consideration Stage

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): I call the Chairperson of the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister, Mr Mike Nesbitt, to move the Bill.

Moved.—[Mr Nesbitt (The Chairperson of the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister).]

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): A single amendment has been tabled for debate. Members will have received a copy of the Marshalled List, which provides details of the amendment. The amendment deals with a reference to public safety. I remind Members who intend to speak that they should address their comments only to the amendment. If that is clear, we shall proceed.

Clause 50 (Disclosure contrary to public interest)

Mr Nesbitt (The Chairperson of the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister): I beg to move the following amendment: In page 20, line 2, leave out from “the safety” to “United Kingdom” on line 3 and insert “public safety”.

The Committee agreed to bring the amendment to address a concern that was raised by the Attorney General that clause 50 was outside the legislative competence of the Assembly. Prior to exercising the power in clause 50 to issue a non-disclosure notice, a Northern Ireland Minister or the Secretary of State must form the opinion that disclosure of a document or information would be prejudicial to the safety of Northern Ireland or the United Kingdom or otherwise contrary to the public interest. The Attorney General’s concern arises from the reference to the “United Kingdom” in clause 50, which he considers may mean that the clause would be outside the legislative competence of the Assembly because of section 6(2)(a) of the Northern Ireland Act 1998.

Section 6(1) of the 1998 Act provides that:

“A provision of an Act is not law if it is outside the legislative competence of the Assembly.”

Section 6(2) states:

“A provision is outside that competence if any of the following paragraphs apply—

(a) it would form part of the law of a country or territory other than Northern Ireland, or confer or remove functions exercisable otherwise than in or as regards Northern Ireland”.

The Attorney General considers that conferral of the power to issue such a notice would take clause 50 outwith legislative competence because of the inclusion of the term “United Kingdom”. It might be used where the danger in disclosing the document relates to, for example, only Wales and not in or as regards Northern Ireland.

4.15 pm

While the Committee does not agree with the Attorney General, it was mindful that referral by the Attorney General to the Supreme Court would inevitably delay Royal Assent and create uncertainty about commencement and implementation planning.

Accordingly, the Committee engaged with the Attorney General’s office and the Northern Ireland Office to see whether a pragmatic solution could be found. That solution is reflected in the amendment before the House.

In essence, it replaces the reference in clause 50(1)(b):

“prejudicial to the safety of Northern Ireland or the United Kingdom”

with the words:

“prejudicial to public safety”.

A Northern Ireland Minister or the Secretary of State would, therefore, have to form the opinion that disclosure of the information or document in question:

“would be prejudicial to public safety or otherwise contrary to the public interest”.

The Attorney General and the Northern Ireland Office are content with that amendment.

While some Members and parties have consistently opposed this type of power in principle, they have, nevertheless, consistently supported the Bill as a whole as a worthwhile measure of reform and have recognised the need for the amendment to progress the Bill. The Committee is mindful that this power has existed in our ombudsman legislation since 1969 and, so far as anybody knows, has never been exercised here.

I commend the amendment to the Assembly.

Mr Lyons: The Chair of the Committee set out the reasons why we have had this Exceptional Further Consideration Stage. Obviously, the Attorney General had an issue with clause 50. The Chair is absolutely right in saying that we have found a way to combat that, even though there were disagreements about the effect it might have. However, we came to a consensus, you could say, by the fact that we have this amendment. I think nobody wanted to see the Bill derailed at this stage. That is why we have the amendment and why I am more than happy to give it my support.

Mr Maskey: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. The Committee Chairperson alluded to the fact that a number of members on the Committee, as a matter of principle, consistently voted against the provisions in the Bill that would provide for non-disclosure, as was described by, I think, the term “national security”.

Obviously, our party has been consistent in this matter. We see absolutely no need whatsoever for such a provision in the Bill and in the role of the ombudsman, presently to be the NIPSO. We have made that very clear on the record since the Bill was tabled.

We were content to support the suspension of Standing Orders to have an Exceptional Further Consideration Stage. However, I put on the record on behalf of Sinn Féin that we still see no need whatsoever for any provision relating to what is called “national security” in the NIPSO Bill. We will vote against the amendment, but we will not push the Assembly to a Division.

Mr Attwood: I acknowledge the role of the Assembly structures and the Speaker in allowing this Exceptional Further Consideration Stage. This is a very rare moment in the life of the Assembly. I think it might have arisen once before in this mandate, although I will stand corrected on that. It is a proper interpretation of the role of the Assembly and the processes on legislation that this Exceptional Further Consideration Stage has been enabled to deal with this outstanding matter, not least because of the reasons the Chair outlined.

This is a worthwhile measure of reform that has been in gestation for probably as long as some of us have been Members and certainly longer than some others have been Members. Therefore, having got to this stage of creating an office of some authority — time will tell whether its authority is all that it should be — and given that the legislation has got this far after this long period of time, it would be unfortunate if it was derailed.

As the Chair indicated, there were members of the Committee — maybe all the members, although I will stand corrected on that — who might differ from the Attorney General's interpretation of things. That is healthy, because the Attorney General may have a particular role in respect of the law in Northern Ireland under the relevant legislation, but he is another lawyer, and people can accept or reject legal advice. The view of many people, maybe on other issues beyond this one, is not to accept the advice of the Attorney General. Certainly, my view on this matter is that the Attorney General may be false in his interpretation and may be in a different place from many other interpretations on this legislation.

It is curious, of course, that, as the Chair read into the record, the references to issues of disclosure now refer to those that are prejudicial to public safety or otherwise contrary to the public interest. They are very wide words, and, therefore, they themselves could be interpreted in different ways and, indeed, be open to abuse. They do not refer to the issue of national security, although that may well be captured or, in the view of some, will certainly be captured in those words. It is curious that, when we come to legislate, we do not refer to those words even if other words are meant to capture that particular issue. I think that it is better of us to do it in that way than to rely upon these highly charged words of "national security", which is in the gift of the British Government and exclusively interpreted by the British Government. I think that it is good that we are not using their language, even if those words may be very extensive. Given the narrative and the history around all this legislation, our party, in line with Mr Maskey's comments, will not support this particular approach, but we will not force a Division in the House on this occasion.

Mr Nesbitt: I thank the three Members who contributed. Mr Lyons was content. I acknowledge again that Mr Maskey and his party had deep concerns and expressed them consistently and rightly the whole way through the debate or certainly the part of it that I was around for. As Mr Attwood said, this has been in gestation for longer than some of us have been Members of the House. In fact, in my case, it has been in gestation for more than twice as long as I have been a Member. It has taken 11 years to get to this point. I can put it no more starkly than to say that, when the passage began, few if any of the Members of the House had ever heard of Barack Obama, and we will just get this into law before he completes his second and final term as president of the United States.

As I said, I think that there has been an entirely pragmatic approach by all to this legislation, which will improve services and, particularly, the ability of our citizens to complain when they believe that they have been let down by public services. I commend all the members of the current Committee and thank them for their cooperation and their pragmatism in getting us to the stage where we will back, I hope, next week for the Final Stage of the Bill.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): That concludes the Exceptional Further Consideration Stage of the Public Services Ombudsman Bill. The Bill stands referred to the Speaker.

Public Petition: Development Proposals to Discontinue Little Flower Girls' School and St Patrick's College, Bearnageeha

Mr Speaker: Mr Alban Maginness has sought leave to present a public petition in accordance with Standing Order 22. The Member will have up to three minutes to speak.

Mr A Maginness: Thank you very much, Mr Speaker. It is my honour to present to you this petition in relation to education in north Belfast; in particular, the proposals put forward by the Council for Catholic Maintained Schools (CCMS) and the Education Authority to discontinue Little Flower Girls' School and St Patrick's College — development proposal Nos 440 to 442 — and to amalgamate both schools.

The petition is a spontaneous and genuine expression by concerned parents, particularly at Little Flower Girls' School. The parents have read the proposals and believe that they should be given the option of a single-sex girls' school and, indeed, a single-sex boys' school in the Catholic sector in north Belfast. They feel very strongly about that. They went about obtaining signatures, of which there are now 1,617, and those continue to flow in.

There could be many more signatures, such is the strength of opinion. They are saying that, for girls in particular, it is advantageous to have a single-sex school. They believe that the Little Flower school has had an excellent performance and, in the recent past, it has had excellent inspection reports. Indeed, no later than Friday, the headmaster of the school, Mr Jim McKeever, won the best principal award given by Blackboard. That is some achievement.

They also look at the grammar-school sector and see St Malachy's College, which is single sex, and the Dominican College, which is a single-sex girls' school. They also look at the controlled sector and see that the Boys' Model School — an excellent school in north Belfast — is single sex, as is the Girls' Model School. They look at the cooperation and partnership between St Patrick's College in north Belfast and Little Flower Girls' School. It is a wonderful cooperation and a wonderful partnership, particularly at sixth-form level, and they say, "If it ain't broke, why fix it?" They are saying very strongly to the Education Authority and to CCMS, "Let's leave this alone". So, I am pleased to bring to the Table the petition against the development proposals.

Mr A Maginness moved forward and laid the petition on the Table.

Mr Speaker: Thank you very much, Mr Maginness. I will forward the petition to the Minister of Education and send a copy to the Committee.

Assembly Members (Reduction of Numbers)

Bill: Consideration Stage

Mr Speaker: I call the junior Minister Ms Jennifer McCann to move the Bill.

Moved. — [Ms J McCann (Junior Minister, Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister).]

Mr Speaker: One amendment has been tabled. Members will have a copy of the Marshalled List of amendments detailing the order for consideration. The amendment deals with bringing into operation the reduction in the number of Members per constituency by May 2016.

Mr Lyttle: I beg to move the following amendment: In page 1, leave out subsection (2) and insert

“(2) The amendment made by subsection (1) comes into effect on or before 28 March 2016; and has effect in relation to the Assembly elected at the poll on 5 May 2016 (the Assembly election) as well as its successors.”.

I welcome the opportunity to move the amendment. We had a robust debate on the proposed reduction in the number of MLAs at the Second Stage of the Assembly Members (Reduction of Numbers) Bill. The Alliance Party has long supported the principle of the reduction of the number of MLAs in line with the proposal from 108 to 90; that is, from six to five MLAs for each of the 18 constituencies. Indeed, every political party appears to support that principle.

Today, therefore, is about granting every MLA in the Assembly the opportunity to deliver and vote for that change that everyone agrees with in principle in time for the 2016 election, rather than delay for another five years and waste possibly as much as £11 million on this issue.

Everyone appears to agree that this is the right thing to do. Why do they agree that it is the right thing to do? We can look at over-governance in Northern Ireland and compare it with other regions in these isles. It is my understanding that Scotland has one MSP per approximately 40,000 people, Wales has one AM per approximately 50,000 people, but, here in Northern Ireland, we have one MLA for 16,000 to 17,000 people. That is a drastically different ratio by any assessment.

Secondly, we would save around £11 million over five years. Those may seem like modest savings to some, but, to put it into some perspective, the OFMDFM childcare budget alone for 2011-15 was approximately £12 million. That £11 million is a significant amount of public money that could be redirected to other vital front-line services that are in need of investment at this time.

Thirdly, the change is also in line with wider, ongoing Assembly reform. We are taking through the Assembly reasonably significant changes in the reduction, renaming and transfer of functions within Departments in Northern Ireland and through the introduction of an opposition, all with the aim of creating more efficient and effective Executive and Assembly processes. We, therefore, believe that it is the right time to include the reduction in the number of MLAs in that wider reform. There has been a lot of mention of wanting to see delivery and to have less talk and more action on those issues in the Assembly.

Today, Mr Speaker, we are presenting all MLAs with the opportunity to vote in favour of action on this issue, rather than delay.

One of the arguments that was made most notably and emotively at Second Stage was about inclusion. I asked this question at that stage, and I will ask it again today: how will the impact of the change on inclusion be different in 2016 than in 2021? I genuinely do not understand that argument, and I hope that people have perhaps reflected on it.

As I said, Alliance is granting every party in the Assembly the opportunity to deliver the change, which they all agree with in principle, now in 2016, rather than to delay for another five years until 2021. We hope that the amendment will be supported.

Mr Frew: I will speak on the legislation and on the amendment that has been moved by the Alliance Party. I will again put on record our support for the legislation and the welcome change that it will bring with the reduction in numbers of MLAs, as well as the reasons why that is the case. Of course, we rehearsed those at the last debate, and we will not need to go over the same ground — hopefully.

I also welcome the change in stance by the Alliance Party. I very much welcome that it is now on the same plateau as us in the DUP. It is a pity that it has taken all parties so long to get on the same wavelength as us and to get an agreement on a reduction of numbers. I again welcome that we have finally reached agreement, albeit painstakingly, year in and year out, and then, of course, during the days of negotiations that led to the Fresh Start Agreement.

It is only a small part of the Fresh Start Agreement to have a Bill that proposes a move from six MLAs per constituency to five. Of course, we would like to have gone further. We wanted to reduce more MLAs per constituency, and we would like to have done that before now. In fact, as I said the last time, we would like to have done it yesterday. This party, the DUP, has been campaigning on such a move since 2002. We rejoice that we are here today at this stage of the Bill and that we will get agreement that will see that aim of this party finalised, agreed and realised for 2021.

We wish that we had done it sooner and that we had it now, but we could not do it. We realise that through the agreement that we have made.

One thing that we do in this party is honour the agreements we make. It is not everything we want. Of course we want more. We will keep going until we get more but we will bank the progress we have made and will continue to bank it when we can every time that we can.

10.45 am

I do welcome the change in stance and policy of the Alliance Party.

Mr Lyttle: Will the Member give way?

Mr Frew: Yes, I will.

Mr Lyttle: Will the Member clarify the stark difference that he is attempting to set out in the different timescales of support in relation to this particular policy between the DUP and Alliance? This has been a long-standing policy position of the Alliance Party. My only regret today is that the DUP is unable to stand behind its own policy position in relation to this issue.

Mr Frew: I thank the Member for his contribution. Again, it comes back to the very point that I made the last time we talked about this: we negotiated an agreement. We signed the Fresh Start Agreement and, within that, we banked the progress that we had fought for for so long. The Member talks about his party having this policy for so long. It is a shame that, even as recently as the Stormont House Agreement, the Alliance Party could not support the DUP in its position of reducing the number of MLAs in each constituency to four. Through the Chair, I ask the Member why that is the case. The Stormont House Agreement was only a number of years ago, and the Alliance Party, along with all the other parties, could not support the DUP in going to four per constituency. Mr Speaker, I will gladly give way on that point.

Mr Lyttle: I thank the Member for his contribution. Why, then, is the Member from the DUP not bringing forward proposals for a reduction to four MLAs in this legislation? We have brought forward constructive proposals that we are debating here on the Floor of the Assembly. I do not see any from the DUP of the nature to which the Member refers.

Mr Frew: The Member will know fine well about bringing any amendment to the Floor of the House without having first sought out the other parties' views on it, spoken to them and negotiated with them to see where they stand on it. He will know fine rightly that the majority of amendments like that will fail, especially when we were all party to the Fresh Start Agreement, which actually settled this point in this mandate and was agreed by the very MLAs who were elected in this mandate.

The Member will know fine well that this amendment of his could be construed as an election stunt. I hope that it is not and that the Alliance Party will stick to this policy, even in the next mandate, when we see this agreement come to fruition. I hope the Member and his party will stick with us in working towards an agreement to reduce it to four Members per constituency. That is where we want to get to, and we will keep going, we will keep working, we will keep influencing and we will keep negotiating with all parties in this House, come what may, after this election in order to achieve that. That is how progress is made.

The DUP could have brought a raft of amendments to this Bill, but we have already agreed what could be agreed as part of the Fresh Start Agreement. We pushed for more, we got what we got and we are going to bank it. Why would any party that agreed the Fresh Start Agreement bring forward amendments? That could well unravel —

Mr Lyttle: Can the Member give way?

Mr Frew: I will in a minute.

It could well unravel or jeopardise the Fresh Start Agreement — not only this aspect of it, but the whole agreement. The Member will know full well the issues and problems that we had before the Fresh Start Agreement. Does the Member want to go back to those days? Does the Member want to go back to the days when nothing was agreed, government and politics stagnated and the hard decisions were not made for our people? Does the Member want to go back to those days? I worry that amendments like these, which can be seen as stunts, could well unravel and jeopardise the very agreements that we have made through painstaking negotiations.

I will give way, if the Member still sees fit.

Mr Lyttle: I thank the Member for giving way. I ask him to clarify his contribution, which painted a picture that every MLA in this House somehow agreed with the Fresh Start Agreement. As far as I am aware, there are two particular parties that stand behind the Fresh Start Agreement.

I am also becoming increasingly frustrated, Mr Speaker, at being told that MLAs in this Chamber are not allowed to use the Assembly due process of Consideration Stage to bring forward perfectly legitimate amendments to legislation that is coming through the Assembly. That is our job. The other parties are perfectly entitled to respond robustly to those amendments, but the DUP argued vociferously that the public support this position and want to see it happening. If it is an election stunt to bring forward sensible and legitimate amendments that are in the interest of the common good and the public, perhaps the DUP could bring forward some of those types of amendments.

Mr Frew: I thank the Member for his intervention. If the Alliance Party were so keen to see this amendment through — they are speaking passionately on it now, and I am glad that the Member acknowledges that I am trying to challenge the party robustly — why has it come so late in the day? Why was it not in the Fresh Start Agreement? Why did they not stand side by side with us when we wanted these changes? Why did they not speak up in the Stormont House Agreement? Why did they not push this view then, when we could have got agreement on this and could well have had it settled? Maybe we could have got what the Member now wishes for, which is a change at this election.

We are where we are, and we have the Fresh Start Agreement. Again, I ask the Member this: why would we jeopardise that good work and that agreement? Why would this party jeopardise that when we can see that it will help to move this country and our people forward?

Mr Dickson: Will the Member give way?

Mr Frew: I will give way.

Mr Dickson: I invite the Member to expand for us his concerns about jeopardising the Fresh Start Agreement. Surely any reasonable person would understand and accept that a saving of some £11 million to the public purse is something that we should be moving towards as quickly as possible. There does not seem to be any justification for not supporting the amendment in respect of a reduction in numbers from six to five Members in constituencies. It is a simple matter of an instruction to the electoral authorities that that is the number of Members that the Assembly wishes to return to the next mandate.

I also ask Mr Frew to explain why he would consider using the word “rejoicing” in delaying until the mandate beyond the next one for these changes to take place. It does not seem to be a matter for rejoicing but a matter for regret.

Mr Frew: I thank the Member for his contribution, albeit a wee bit downbeat in demeanour. I apologise for that; I try to rejoice every morning when I wake, and I try to be forward-thinking and positive in my outlook.

Mr A Maginness: I agree with that.

Mr Frew: Mr Maginness acknowledges that and agrees with it, just for the benefit of Hansard.

Mr A Maginness: Every day is a bonus, especially when you are 65.

Mr Frew: Every day is a bonus. I thank the Member for his contribution. That is the way that we should come to politics. That is the way that we should come to the table. We should not be regretful or negative. I would say to Mr Lyttle that, if it is about saving money, why not have in his amendment a reduction to four Members per constituency? That would be more meaningful and it would suit our agenda and our aims and objectives much better. It is not just about simply saving money. I want to sprinkle some of my rejoicing over the way in order to get the Bill passed, get it banked and make progress for the good of all our people.

I have said enough at this point, Mr Speaker, so thank you very much for the time that you have given me.

Mr Maskey: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I will not detain the House any longer than necessary, so I will not be taking any interventions, thank you.

As the Member who proposed the amendment made very clear in his earlier submission, this matter has been well rehearsed. I reiterate, on behalf of Sinn Féin, that we support the Bill as tabled. That is, to reduce the number of MLAs from six to five per constituency before the elections in 2021. We entirely acknowledge that there is a significant public perception that there are too many MLAs, but that is not a position that we accept at all. We remind people of the original discussions that brought us to the Good Friday Agreement, which wanted to enshrine inclusivity and to maximise participation in a fledgling democratic process.

I think that the events of the last number of months very much underline the need for such prudence, given the fact that we have been, to some extent, alienated from the general public. Perhaps a lot of people feel disaffected towards the Assembly, and that indicates that vehicles are still needed that bring people closer to the political process, so we support the Bill as tabled.

We remind people, as we did in the last debate, that, when we talk about over-governance and we compare here with Scotland or somewhere else, this is not Scotland. Thankfully, Scotland did not experience some of the situations that we have had to deal with here. It is not comparing like for like, so there is a need for continuing, greater inclusivity. Neither I, nor Sinn Féin — or anyone else — knows whether the political process will be more inclusive in 2021 than it is now. I hope it might be, but I do not know. We are certainly prepared to begin the process of reducing the number of MLAs from six to five per constituency, and we do that heartily and gladly.

As I said, we oppose the amendment for that reason, and I would remind people that, when we talk about over-governance, we still have fewer than 200, and more than 150, quangos. Some of those, such as tribunals and other bodies, are very important and need to be in existence, given the nature of them. There are some very professional people providing public service on many of those bodies, but there are also a lot of quangos that should no longer be in existence. They were only ever really there when we had direct rule, when we had a very clear democratic deficit. There is no justification, in our view, for retaining quite a number of those bodies. That is where we need to start making a real difference in reducing the democratic deficit, because, let us remind ourselves, a lot of those bodies discharge a significant amount of public money. They also discharge quite a number of public services, and, as far as Sinn Féin is concerned, we need to look at the existence of a number of those bodies and remind ourselves that we have over 2,000 persons appointed to those bodies. We talk about the number of elected representatives, but there are a lot more non-elected people involved in discharging public services here and discharging a lot of public largesse, if you like. They are not elected and they are less accountable. On that basis, Sinn Féin supports the Bill and opposes the amendment.

Mr A Maginness: Thank you very much, Mr Speaker. The SDLP opposes the Alliance amendment, and it is right and proper for us to oppose it, as indeed do the DUP and Sinn Féin, as I understand it. There a number of reasons why, in fact, this amendment should not be supported. It is important to remember that we come out of a very terrible history, where this society was engulfed in political and sectarian violence. We suffered appallingly and we arrived at a political agreement called the Good Friday Agreement or the Belfast Agreement. Through that agreement, we worked out a new political system. It might be imperfect — it might not be to everybody's liking — but at least everyone in this Assembly is engaged in it. We brought about a degree of peace, stability and political progress of which we can be rightly proud. I say that as someone who has gone through the whole process, from 1998 until now. Indeed, beyond that, I was involved in all sorts of negotiations.

I am old enough to remember the old Stormont Parliament, a model that did not serve the people of this region well. We should congratulate ourselves on the progress that we have made. Everybody in the House, from every political party, or perhaps most political parties, would say that the involvement of people at the highest possible level in government is very important. The principle of inclusivity, which was referred to by Mr Frew and Mr Maskey, is very important. We must involve our people in order to get greater engagement and build on the peace that we have achieved. That peace should not be taken for granted. If we take that peace for granted, we are on a perilous road. I am absolutely certain that that is not what is intended by the Alliance Party, but, unfortunately, I think that that party is taking for granted the peace, this institution and the considerable progress that we have made. I do not think that we should do that.

The reduction in the number of MLAs set out in the Bill is, I think, a suitable compromise. We are on a political journey, and politics are organic, not static. We are on a journey to try to improve what we have. We, in the SDLP, buy into the principle of that improvement. The Bill allows for a development in the numbers in the next five years. As Mr Maskey says, he does not know whether there will be greater inclusivity by 2020 or 2021, but we hope for it, and there is consensus in the House on that and on the Bill. As Mr Frew said, we have achieved an agreement, and it was not an easy agreement to reach. The Stormont House talks 1 and 2 were very difficult, but we achieved agreement.

I take it that the Alliance Party amendment is well intentioned. I am not certain that I buy into the point that Mr Frew made — that it is an election stunt. I take it that the amendment is well intended, but the road to hell is paved with good intentions.

Mr Lyons: — positive.

Mr A Maginness: I did not quite hear what my DUP colleague across the Chamber said.

Mr Lyons: Be positive.

Mr A Maginness: I think that the amendment is well intended. However, it misses the point that we have achieved a lot but cannot take things for granted. If we change the number of MLAs for the May election, we will undermine what we have achieved, and it is no mean achievement. The postponement of the reduction to 2020 or 2021 is not unreasonable. A period of four or five years is not too long in our history.

I want to make one further point. It is one that Mr Maskey also raised and it is important. We cannot compare our ratio of representatives to population with that in other jurisdictions in these islands — Scotland, Wales or the Republic.

The reason for that is that we are a society with many different and significant points of view, and they should be articulated. There should at least be the opportunity to articulate them through election to the Assembly. It is up to the people. I do not know what the people will do in May; none of us in the Assembly knows. The commentators might know, because they tend to know more than any of us. However, I believe that it is within the gift of the electorate to decide, and they are not stupid. They will make their decision wisely.

In five years' time, what will the people be thinking? They may think quite differently, and there may be different political formations. We cannot predict the future. Politics is an organic process, and humankind makes different decisions. We know now that we have a period of imperfect stability and progress. To use Mr Frew's term: we should bank it. It is important for us, therefore, to support the Bill as it stands and to reject the Alliance Party amendment.

Mr Allen: I apologise for coming slightly late to this important debate. The amendment was tabled by the Alliance Party because it was unable to secure agreement in the talks. The Ulster Unionist Party supports the reduction in numbers at the Assembly as part of the wider measures in the Programme for Government to bring about a more streamlined public administration that is more effective and efficient, and delivers better government for all our people. That is what we should all strive for. It is not about whether it should be six, five or four Members; it is about delivering effective, streamlined and efficient government for all our people, making sure that they are represented to the best of our ability. When I was offered the chance of coming into the Assembly, I thought long and hard about it. What made me come in was my passion and desire to deliver a better Northern Ireland for our people.

We need to make sure that the Assembly is diverse and inclusive, which is why the amendment is too important to get wrong and why we in the Ulster Unionist Party will not support it. We would love to have been able to support it, but we believe that it has been brought in too late in the day. We want government that delivers the best for our people.

Mr Lyons: I welcome the opportunity to take part in today's debate. It is good that we are at another stage along the process to cut the number of MLAs and, hopefully, to make our government more efficient and effective.

The amendment tabled by Alliance Party Members has come forward for one of two reasons: either it is a genuine attempt to cut the number of MLAs in time for the 2016 election, or it is a case of political grandstanding. I think that it is political grandstanding. If the Alliance Party wanted to cut the number of MLAs in time for the May election, it might have taken a different approach in the talks. Perhaps, both at Stormont House and during the Fresh Start talks, it would have brought the issue forward and tried to convince the other parties. It would have tried to gain consensus with other people. Of course, the Alliance Party would pride itself on trying to get consensus and agreement among parties before anything is pushed forward. It would never want to push any amendment through if a wider consensus could first be agreed.

The reason why I think that this is happening only because we are in the run-up to an election is that it did not bring forward these proposals at an earlier stage. Indeed, when this was discussed at the Stormont House talks and the DUP asked the other parties who wanted to go for four MLAs in 2016, not a single party put its paw up. They did not want to agree to that at all. So, as much as the Alliance Party talks about wanting to save money and all the great things that can be done with that, it is a shame that, earlier in the process, it did not agree to a cut that would have taken place sooner and —

Mr Lyttle: I thank the Member for giving way. I appreciate that the DUP is attempting to find a fig leaf to cover its lack of immediate delivery on this issue by introducing the idea of four MLAs and all the rest of it at this stage. What is a more genuine approach to delivering on an issue than by interacting with the legitimate legislative processes of the Assembly?

Mr Lyons: I completely agree that the Member has every right to bring amendments here. It is a good thing for people to use the democratic process that we have in the Assembly. However, the system in which we operate requires consensus and the support of more than one party, so, of course, this was the right way to bring this forward. We have a Bill in front of us, for goodness' sake. We are using the proper legislative processes in the Assembly to bring this forward.

Mr Frew: I thank the Member for giving way. Is the Alliance Party comparing the work that it has put into what will be a failed amendment with the progress that this party, the DUP, has made over those years in securing the agreement, banking it in this mandate, and ensuring that this will come to pass? Is it comparing that work and energy with an amendment that is clearly going to fail in the House?

Mr Lyons: That brings me to a very important point. We know that we need to get proper support in the Chamber if anything is to pass. To be fair to the Alliance Party, it brought it to the Assembly in a private Members' motion. In fact, Mr Dickson was very exercised with the Deputy Speaker at that time because it did not even go to a vote in the Lobbies as it was not able to get enough support. The fact that it proposes an amendment at this time demonstrates even more that it is an election stunt. The Alliance Party brought it to the Floor within the last few months and was not able to get the necessary support.

I have another query for the Alliance Party. I have 'A Fresh Start' here, an agreement that the Alliance Party did not sign up to. It quotes from the 'Stormont House Agreement', which it did support. It says very clearly:

"The number of Assembly members should be reduced to five members per constituency, or such other reduction as may be agreed —"

— which could have been four —

"— in time for the 2021 Assembly election".

I did not hear any opposition 12 months ago; I did not hear any complaints from Alliance Party Members. However, it is coming up now, and I think that that is grandstanding because we are in the mouth of an election. Although it is the DUP that has been championing reform of this place for well over a decade, the Alliance Party is trying to jump on the bandwagon now, get some of the plaudits, and make themselves be seen as great reformers.

I do not agree with all that Mr Alban Maginness said, but he is right that this has been a process. It takes time. There are a number of concerns that need to be taken into consideration when we talk about adjusting the structures of this place. I think that we are doing it in the right way. To be very honest, I would be more than happy to see the number of MLAs reduced for the election this year. I have no objection to that, and that is well known.

Mr Dickson: Support it.

Mr Lyons: Mr Dickson asks why I will not support the amendment. I will not support it, first, because, as I said, I believe that it is nothing other than political grandstanding.

The second reason is that we have an agreement. We worked at it and negotiated it. It was long — very long — and difficult. A lot of work went into it. Perhaps we would like to see a few changes. Perhaps there are some things that we might like to see happen sooner. But the deal was made. It was agreed, and we are going to stick to it.

I welcome the Alliance Party's desire to see the reform of government. I hope that this debate can be taken up again in the next mandate and that we can go further. Cutting the number of MLAs does not necessarily mean that we will have the most efficient or effective government, but, hopefully, it will help and will be a move towards it. Let us have that discussion and debate. In the meantime, as my colleague Mr Frew said, we have made progress and we are banking it.

Mr Frew: I thank the Member for giving way. It is important that we acknowledge the movement that the Alliance Party has made to come on to our ground. We hope that it will stay there and will work with us in the new mandate to make even greater progress.

Mr Lyons: I certainly agree with the comments that Mr Frew made. Indeed, there is great rejoicing in heaven over a sinner who repents.

The Alliance Party may say, "Oh, we've been calling for this for a long time". We have been calling for it since at least 2002, if not before. The Alliance Party has joined us late, but we welcome that very much indeed. It has obviously proposed the amendment because it wants to cut in 2016. We want to stick to the agreement that we made. I do not know; maybe there is some fear on behalf of the Alliance Party and it wants to stop the march of the Green Party, or it is fearful of increased support for —

Mr Lyttle: Will the Member give way?

Mr Lyons: I will give way to Mr Lyttle.

Mr Lyttle: It is my understanding that the Green Party supports this policy, but it can clarify that for itself. Maybe we should welcome the new-found agreement and cordiality between the DUP and Sinn Féin. The Member is, in effect, saying that he is blocked from supporting his party policy on this today because of a deal that he has with Sinn Féin.

Mr Lyons: Not at all. We have made an agreement. We are getting towards where we want to be. It is going to happen in 2021. Could we have had that sooner? Yes, but we are where we are. We have a deal, and we are going to stick to it.

The time has come for me to finish my remarks. I am very pleased that we have this Bill. It should proceed unamended. I think that it is a significant change that we have guaranteed overall in what we are doing. Yes, the reduction of MLAs is important, but I think the changes happening with Departments will be where the real efficiency is.

Mr Dallat: Will the Member give way?

Mr Lyons: Of course I will give way to Mr Dallat.

Mr Dallat: I realise that the Member is coming to a conclusion. Before that, will he perhaps agree with me that, given the very nature of Northern Ireland and its history, we need the broadest possible representation? That is something that we should always put at the forefront in the representation in the House and in the wider community. I regret that the Civic Forum has been, apparently, buried. We cannot function without as inclusive a body of people to support this place as we can get.

By way of finishing, I express amazement that the Alliance Party is so worried about reducing the number of Members when, for the last decade or so, it has enjoyed having two ministerial posts with eight Members when my own party, with 14 Members, has only one.

Mr Dickson: That is called sour grapes.

Mr Dallat: Apparently, that is called sour grapes. It might also be called hypocrisy.

Mr Lyons: I thank the Member for his intervention. I am not going to get involved in any spat between the SDLP and the Alliance Party.

The Member made a point about making sure that people feel included and that there is proper representation. I welcome the SDLP support for the Bill. I understand why it is making some of the points that it is making. I think there should be an awful lot of concern for people if we were moving to a first-past-the-post system. However, we are going to continue to have a PR system. There may be fewer MLAs in the Chamber, but it will be a PR system, which means that the Chamber will roughly reflect the population. I think that is why the Bill has broad support.

It is not as though you are saying, "Right. We are going to get rid of 10 or 12 Members. We will get rid of the SDLP Members." The system will still be a proportional one, which I think is to be welcomed.

As I said, reducing the number of MLAs is part of a wider package of reforms. It is not just about reducing the number of MLAs and the number of Departments; it is about making sure that functions are located within the right Department. That is why I will support the Bill as it makes its way through the House and why I will be unable to support the Alliance amendment.

Ms J McCann (Junior Minister, Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister): Go raibh maith agat, Mr Speaker. I oppose amendment No 1, which is the only amendment tabled. The purpose of the amendment is to have the proposed reduction in the number of MLAs returned from each constituency come into effect in time for the May 2016 election, rather than in 2021. That has been subject to lengthy discussion and debate over the last few weeks and months, most recently last week during the Second Stage debate.

The time that the Bill's provisions should take effect was first raised in the Chamber on 23 November last year, less than a week after the publication of the 'Fresh Start Agreement' and the Executive's agreement to the Bill. At that time, a private Member's motion from Alliance Party Members, whose party tabled the amendment today, was debated. That motion, in common with the proposed amendment that we are discussing today, called on the Executive to ensure that the proposed reduction in the number of MLAs applies to the 2016 election. Following a full debate, that proposal was resoundingly defeated without even the need for a Division.

Next, we had consideration of the Bill by the Assembly and Executive Review Committee on 19 January, when my colleague junior Minister Pengelly and I explained to the Committee why the Bill needed to progress by accelerated passage. During that discussion, all but one of the Committee members supported the provisions of the Bill, including the proposed timescale for them to take effect.

Consideration of the matter continued during last week's accelerated passage and Second Stage debates, when, once again, a significant majority of Members demonstrated clear support for the Bill, including its effective date. It is therefore the case that there has emerged a clear majority agreement on a specific point of timing, and the Assembly, including even Members from the Alliance Party, might have reasonably concluded that it was now a settled matter.

In spite of that level of agreement and evidence of overwhelming support for the Bill taking effect for the Assembly election after that in May this year, the Alliance Party still considers it necessary to pursue the matter through this amendment. After all the debate that has taken place and the arguments that have been aired, it is difficult to do anything other than reiterate that, while we respect the position of the Alliance Party that we should move almost immediately to a reduction in the size of the Assembly, the view of the other parties is that that should be moderated by a period in which the Assembly and the parties represented in it can consider and address the implications for equality and inclusiveness that have also been raised and that are equally valid to the Alliance Party's urgent desire for downsizing.

Therefore, I ask Members to join me in voting against the amendment.

Mr Dickson: We have had an interesting debate this morning on the matter. Indeed, on occasion, it has been somewhat jovial, but it is a serious matter, and I think a serious response is therefore required to the comments that have been made.

This is not a political stunt, and it is not about grabbing headlines. This is genuinely about trying to deliver efficient and effective government for all the citizens in Northern Ireland. If we do not start in this place, I think it will be very difficult for us to start anywhere else.

First, I will comment on the words of Mr Frew. I will describe them as mañana politics. He is quite happy for the change to take place but not now. It seems to me that that is a difficult argument for the DUP and Mr Frew's colleague Mr Lyons, who was not even an MLA when much of these discussions started, to make.

It seems to me that the DUP wants to support the amendment that we are proposing but cannot because it is tied to its so-called Fresh Start Agreement with Sinn Féin. My colleague has already described the words that have been used as a "fig leaf". I think that that perhaps is exactly what the DUP is attempting to achieve for itself today. On one hand, it is trying to compliment us for our move — a genuine move — to try to provide for better government in this place but, at the same time, it has to stick with the agreement that it has made with Sinn Féin. I simply cannot understand what will change between now and 2021.

Mr Maskey made reference to the fact that much of the public feel alienated from this place and many of the people who act as representatives in it. I do not disagree with him in any way. However, I throw the challenge back to him. How better to re-engage with that alienated public than by us taking a bold and strident initiative to reduce the numbers in this place and to provide for an effective connection with those people who elect us and expect us to do a job for them?

I have a great deal of time and respect for the comments of Mr Maginness, and I wholeheartedly accept and respect the journey that he and his party and, indeed, many of us in the Chamber — I ask him to include the Alliance Party in that — have taken. We all have made that journey to peace together. I respect the comments that he made about his caution in respect of these changes but, equally, I say to Mr Maginness that change is difficult and that perhaps the time has come for us to face up to that change. There are those who are reluctant to face change, and there are those of us who wish to eagerly stride forward and take ourselves into that area of change. While I certainly have respect and understanding for the journey that the SDLP has made, together with many of us in the Chamber, I cannot accept that we must always be looking backwards. The time has come for us not to be afraid of change, to grasp it and to grasp it now. I assure him and those who thought that our amendment may not be well intentioned — I assure every Member — that it is well intended; it is intended to deliver good government for all citizens in Northern Ireland.

Mr Lyons: I thank the Member for giving way. He has said that this is well intentioned and genuine and that he thinks it would be a very positive development for the House to take. Perhaps he could let us know when he consulted with the other parties, how he tried to build consensus and what meetings he has had. Before bringing this to the Floor, and giving us all a few days' notice, what attempts did he or his colleague make to ensure that there would be the necessary support for it to pass?

Mr Dickson: As I intimated, Mr Lyons perhaps is not au fait with all of the discussions that have taken place over an extremely long period. If he checks the records of Fresh Start, Stormont House and many of the discussions and meetings that have taken place, which Mr Maginness has made reference to, he will see an acknowledgement by the Alliance Party of a need to provide not only inclusivity in this place but effective and efficient government. That is an argument that my party has long made here and in all of those meetings that have taken place outside the Chamber.

I note Mr Allen's comments regarding the Ulster Unionist Party's support for the reduction but I do not understand why, like others, it cannot do it today. Perhaps that is the attitude of a party that seems to have checked out of this place quite some time ago.

It is important that we balance the arguments. Others have made reference to the skills of the Alliance Party in attempting to build consensus. Despite the type of debate that we have had today, that is exactly where the Alliance Party sits in respect of this matter. We are trying to build that consensus. We did not achieve that through all the talks and events that have taken place and which have brought us to where we are today in respect of this agreement between Sinn Féin and the DUP.

However, there are times when it is important for us as a political party to step up to the plate for ourselves and say, "This is what we in the Alliance Party believe is important to deliver for the electorate." I understand Mr Lyons's need to stick to his agreement with Sinn Féin, but, clearly, he and his colleague Mr Frew have indicated very strong support for the change and reduction in numbers, and I think that, in that respect, they have clearly failed in their Fresh Start Agreement. For me and my party, and for many people out there, that is and should be a matter of regret.

I listened carefully to the words of the junior Minister and her reference to debates in the Chamber and also to the so-called Fresh Start Agreement. I respect the mandate of the Chamber and that I failed to gain even a vote in that debate, but what cannot be denied is that the debate took place and that our voice was heard in it and by the public outside. Certainly, it is what we want. For me, it is all about delivering equality and fairness in the Assembly; it is all about giving space to every voice in the community that can deliver a political mandate to sit in the Chamber. Perhaps the junior Minister wants to reflect on the inequalities that her party seems to have delivered in one constituency in the selection of its candidates for Fermanagh and South Tyrone.

On that point, I will leave the debate. I predict the outcome as a further defeat for the amendment. Nevertheless, it reflects, in my view, the failure of the Assembly to embrace change. I encourage the Assembly to embrace that change.

Question put, That the amendment be made.

Departments Bill: Final Stage

That the Departments Bill [NIA Bill 70/11-16] do now pass.

This is a very short Bill, consisting of only three clauses and two schedules. Yet, it is a Bill that will have significant implications for the way that our institutions do business in the future. In moving the Bill at Second Stage, I spoke about how, at the heart of 'A Fresh Start: The Stormont Agreement and Implementation Plan', there is a common commitment to a better way of doing business together. One of the ways that the agreement aims to achieve that is by progressing the reduction in the number of Departments from 12 to nine in time for the 2016 Assembly election.

Of course, reform of the structures of government here has been an issue for a long time. In 2012, the Assembly and Executive Review Committee produced a report on the reduction in the number of Departments that identified areas of commonality broadly comparable to the departmental restructuring now being put in place. The policy proposals underpinning the Bill were the subject of detailed consideration during the process that led to the Stormont House Agreement in December 2014. That agreement determined on a nine-Department model to be established in time for the 2016 election, with the future allocation of departmental functions to be agreed by the parties. The Executive discussed departmental restructuring on several occasions in early 2015 and decided on the names and responsibilities of the future Departments. Those names are reflected in the current Bill.

In a statement to the Assembly on 2 March 2015, the First Minister announced the decisions that had been reached by the Executive on the new departmental structures in consequence of the Stormont House Agreement. He set out a future model of nine Departments with all the powers, functions and services of the current 12 Departments. The allocation of responsibilities was further refined during the talks process that led to the publication of 'A Fresh Start' on 17 November 2015.

'A Fresh Start' offered a way forward on a range of challenging issues and enabled us to look forward to a period of greater cooperation.

With institutional reform, it reaffirmed the commitment to reduce the number of Departments from 12 to nine in time for the 2016 Assembly election and provided greater clarity on the functions of the nine future Departments. It also committed to having a Departments Bill introduced in the Assembly by the end of November 2015.

In fulfilment of that commitment, the Departments Bill was introduced in the Assembly on 30 November 2015. Its purpose is to create a statutory framework for the new model of nine Departments. It sets out the names of the future Departments and makes necessary changes to the Departments (Northern Ireland) Order 1999, which provides the basis for the current departmental system. However, important provisions of the 1999 Order on the legal status of Northern Ireland Departments generally and on the exercise of their functions were not affected by the Bill.

As I said, it is a short Bill that now consists of three clauses and two schedules. Clause 1 renames seven existing Departments and dissolves three Departments — DEL, DCAL and DOE — as required to establish the new structures. There is no reference to the Department of Education and the Department of Justice, which are not affected by the Bill. It applies the Departments (Northern Ireland) Order 1999 to the new set of nine Departments.

Clause 2 references schedule 2, which contains essential repeals. Clause 3 gives the title of the Act and arrangements for the commencement of clauses 1 and 2 on a day or days to be appointed by the First Minister and deputy First Minister.

Clauses 1 and 2 are likely to be commenced very shortly after the election in May 2016. Schedule 1 lists all nine future Departments under the titles that they will carry from 2016. Schedule 2 repeals provisions in the Departments (Northern Ireland) Order 1999, as subsequently amended, and in two other Acts that added the names of the Departments to the Departments Order. It has the effect of removing references to the outgoing 12-Department model.

On 8 December 2015, a motion for the Bill to be progressed by accelerated passage was debated in the Assembly, with junior Minister McCann and I having previously attended and gained the support of the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister to the request. During the accelerated passage debate, it was recognised that progression of the Bill, as with other Stormont House Agreement matters, became possible only as a result of the consensus that had been reached on 'A Fresh Start' a few weeks previously. We had moved immediately to have the Bill introduced in the Assembly, consistent with the commitment to do so by the end of November 2015. There was only limited Assembly time available before dissolution in March 2016. The Bill has to complete its passage in sufficient time for statutory processes, including the debate and affirmative motion relating to the separate transfer of functions order, so it was necessary for us to seek accelerated passage. The Assembly agreed and voted with cross-community support to allow the procedure.

The accelerated passage debate was followed by the Bill's Second Stage on the same day. That suggested that there was broad support for the principles of the Bill. No amendments were tabled at the Bill's Consideration Stage on 19 January 2016, and the Bill's clauses and schedules were voted unopposed to stand part of the Bill.

The Bill's Further Consideration Stage was taken yesterday, when two ministerial amendments were agreed. Those were purely technical adjustments that were needed to maintain consistency with the Public Services Ombudsman Bill, which has now reached its concluding stages in the Assembly.

I take this opportunity to thank all those who have contributed, through their support and through constructive debate, in getting the Bill to this point. It will help to put into effect the decisions taken by the Executive on restructuring. The Bill will create the framework for the most extensive reorganisation of the departmental system since 1999. Its passage at this time will help to ensure a leaner, more streamlined and efficient administration from the outset of the new mandate. I commend the Bill to the Assembly.

Mr Maskey: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I apologise on behalf of the Chairperson and the Deputy Chairperson of the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister. They are unable to attend this morning, and I have been asked to speak on behalf of the Committee on the Final Stage of the Departments Bill. I thank the junior Minister for her opening remarks and welcome the Final Stage of the Bill.

At its meeting on the 30 November last, junior ministers McCann and Pengelly briefed the Committee on the Departments Bill and the rationale for seeking to progress it through the accelerated passage procedure. As has been said, during that meeting we heard that the reduction in the number of Departments from 12 to nine will provide for a leaner, more streamlined and efficient Administration. For example, there will be fewer Ministers, departmental hierarchies, as they have been described — those are not my words — permanent secretaries, central management units and press offices.

12.00 noon

The dissolution of three Departments will involve the reallocation of their existing functions, and there is to be some additional rearrangement of the functions of others. Members will be aware that those details are not dealt with by the Departments Bill. Instead, the reallocation of statutory functions will be provided for in a separate transfer of functions order. The Committee received a briefing on that draft order from departmental officials at its meeting on 27 January. As a Committee, we will give the matter further consideration at our meeting, along with comments from other Statutory Committees. The Committee aims to convey its views on the proposed order and, indeed, the views expressed by other Committees, to OFMDFM by 12 February, as requested.

(Mr Principal Deputy Speaker [Mr Newton] in the Chair)

The Bill before us for Final Stage is, therefore, simply about dissolving three existing Departments and renaming some others. Whilst some Members expressed concern at the lack of time to scrutinise the Bill, it is fair to say that there was general support for its principles. On behalf of the Committee, I support the Bill.

Mr Frew: I, of course, support the Departments Bill. As I have said before, I think that it is a good move and a great thing for the Assembly, the Government and the people of Northern Ireland, as it will go some way to streamlining government. I hope that it will go some way towards breaking down the silo mentality that we have in some of our Ministers and parties and lead to a more streamlined, focused Government all going in the one direction, as opposed to what we have sometimes witnessed and experienced, whereby parties go their own way on solo runs.

It will not happen without Ministers making hard decisions. I share many of the frustrations of other Members, and, over the last number of years, we have seen at first hand that all our people suffer when Ministers do not make hard decisions. We are in the House and Ministers are in the Executive to make hard decisions, and I would like to see that happening more quickly and efficiently.

I hope that the Bill will not be the end. My party has fought hard and struggled long to get a reduction in the number of MLAs and a reduction in the number of Departments. We would like to go further, but we will bank what we have in this mandate and move on accordingly. We will not let up, and our energy will not reduce in trying to meet the aims and objectives of the DUP in that regard. We will push on to get to a point at which we have a voluntary coalition with a proper opposition. I will leave it there. I welcome the Bill.

Mr Allen: The Ulster Unionist Party supports a reduction in the number of Departments. We want to see a more effective, efficient and streamlined Administration in Northern Ireland in order to deliver real change and make a positive difference to the lives of the people. We are content to support the Bill, which will reduce the number of Departments from 12 to nine and which will be the biggest restructuring since 1999.

It is a short Bill, but it will be far-reaching in its implications and consequences. Its passage through the Assembly should be relatively uncontentious and the real meat will no doubt be at a later stage when we come to debate the transfer of functions and decide what the exact responsibilities of each Department should be. That, however, is for another day, and we are content to support the Bill.

Mr Lyttle: The Alliance Party has a long-standing manifesto commitment to supporting the reduction in the number of Departments, on this occasion from 12 to nine, in time for the Assembly election in 2016.

We support the Bill and welcome its progress to Final Stage, hopefully, because it will introduce more efficient, effective government and will allow us to make savings that we can invest in better-resourced public services for the good of everyone in Northern Ireland. We also believe that we need to see further legislation that could better mandate cooperation and collaboration between all Departments. Ultimately, as other MLAs have mentioned today, we need to see more collaboration and better will between Ministers so that we can have a truly effective power-sharing Government for the common good of everyone in Northern Ireland.

A number of MLAs have mentioned the importance of the transfer of functions order, which will deal with the specific transfer of functions in addition to what we are dealing with today, which is the number of Departments and the naming of Departments. I realise that is not up for debate today, but I would like to put on record my concern about the time given for consideration of the order, which a number of MLAs have consistently mentioned as being the most significant part of this change. The OFMDFM Committee was presented with the draft order on Wednesday 27 January, giving us a little over two weeks to respond by the deadline of Friday 12 February. This relates to something that a number of MLAs have referred to as the most extensive reorganisation of government in Northern Ireland since 1999. As MLAs, we are being given a little over two weeks to consider the detail of the transfer of functions order. I do not think that is acceptable. It is an extremely short time, and there has been no public consultation on the order. MLAs and relevant Committees have a serious task ahead to respond robustly to that transfer of functions order, which will be laid in the Assembly as an affirmative resolution. We will be given the opportunity only to yea or nay the order. That is not good government or a fresh start to government.

We need to see changes to allow the Assembly and its Committees to properly scrutinise something of such significance. However, we welcome the reduction and the process at this stage of the Bill, and we will support it today.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I am happy to call Mr Alex Attwood, but he was not in his place when he ought to have been. There will be a concession this time.

Mr Attwood: I thank the Deputy Speaker for that concession, and I apologise to the House. I was delayed upstairs at another meeting. I will just make three or four points.

First, as everybody will acknowledge, a reduction in Departments is only a reduction in Departments. It is nothing more or less. It does not follow from the reduction in Departments that we will have efficient and effective government. What we will have is fewer Departments with more functions. You hope that, because of that and because of the evolution of our democratic structures generally, they will end up being more efficient and effective, but it does not follow that what we are doing today leads to anything, unless the evidence is there to back it up in the next mandate.

With the reduction of MLAs, whenever that happens, the reduction in Departments, which is now happening, and, we hope, on the far side of this afternoon's debate, a move further towards having in law an opposition in the Chamber, we need to ensure that we manage the internal democracy of the Good Friday Agreement in a way that does not put some of the reasons why we had the Good Friday Agreement in jeopardy. Whilst we may be changing systems and structures in government, this is not the time to go further down the road in the way that some suggest. We will touch on that this afternoon and in subsequent debates.

Another point of caution based on my experience of government is that there is potential for the people who populate the higher levels of government and will lead the new Departments to argue that, as we now have larger Departments with more functions, we have to leave that to bed in. There is a risk that — I am picking this up already — the bigger Departments could lead, in the short term, to a degree of paralysis as those Departments settle themselves and embed into the wider life of government. While there are many good officials, there is a tendency at some levels of government management to err on the side of caution and conservatism. As I said, I make that point because I am picking it up that, in some places in government, at a senior management level the scale of what senior managers are about to undertake in terms of having wider functions in fewer Departments is already being used as an argument to tread slowly, when the people of Northern Ireland are looking for government to tread boldly. Too often, in too many Departments, that has not been the character of devolution over the last 10 years.

I concur with Mr Lyttle's point. It will be difficult to make this point, because it is not really that relevant to today, but it is a related matter. When the transfer of functions order comes to the House, it will be by way of affirmative resolution, which means that you take it or leave it and you will not have the opportunity to change it. There are issues around the transfer of functions order when it comes to individual Departments that, on the face of it, do not make much sense, yet we will not have the opportunity to amend it. That is the nature of the democratic processes of the House, but we will not have the opportunity to amend it. Indeed, when OFMDFM officials brought the processes around this to the attention of the OFMDFM Committee last week, as Mr Lyttle indicated, the Committee agreed, as far as I can recall, that individual parties rather than Committees would be given the opportunity to respond to what may or may not be in the transfer of functions order. That is inevitably the consequence of doing all this work very quickly as we run down to the end of the mandate, but what does that mean?

We have a situation now arising — this was touched on at Question Time yesterday — where significant functions of OFMDFM are going to the Department for Communities, but OFMDFM will retain the power of appointment of the heads of the public bodies that will be part of the responsibilities of other Departments — to name two, the Commissioner for Older People and the Children's Commissioner.

Mr Dallat: Will the Member give way?

Mr Attwood: Yes.

Mr Dallat: Does the Member agree that, in dismantling what is called the scaffolding of this place, there is a danger that we dismantle the structures that were embodied in the Good Friday Agreement, which sought to give ownership of this place to the wider community through the Civic Forum and other institutions? Does he also agree that Stormont is not Wales, Scotland or England, where democracy is quite different, and we still need to embrace the widest possible support for these institutions, which, to some degree, are still in their infancy?

Mr Attwood: I very much agree with what Mr Dallat said. People should listen to Mr Dallat. He is about to leave the Chamber, and he is one of the wisest, most experienced and longest-standing politicians in Northern Ireland. Those points should be taken fully on board, not least because the reasons, the sentiments and the principles behind the structures of the Good Friday Agreement that were, in our view, falsely changed at St Andrews and then further changed with the devolution of justice were born of decades of bad experience, bad politics and a denial of democratic standards to too many people in this part of Ireland. That is why those structures were created. Given that they were born as a consequence of decades of misrule, we should be careful about how far we go and how quickly we go in changing the structures born of that experience, unless we are convinced that the current experience of our people of parties, of government and of democracy in Northern Ireland is such that they should be changed.

To go back to the point that I was making before Mr Dallat's intervention, this Chamber cannot change the transfer of functions order. Therefore, we will have to take it or leave it that, when functions go to one set of Departments, OFMDFM retains the power of appointment for those senior public personnel. At the Committee, the officials could only name one example of why that was the case. Indeed, it was me who had to prompt the officials to remind them that there was actually at least one other case — namely, the appointment of Victims' Commissioner — where OFMDFM had that responsibility. Why keep the power of appointment over the Older People's Commissioner and the Children's Commissioner when you give every other responsibility in that area of our life lock, stock and barrel to a different Department?

You would wonder why that one power is retained by one office, when everything else is given to the Department for Communities — mindful, of course, that in the abortive negotiations on legacy matters, which the junior Minister will be very familiar with, if there was something that seemed to emerge, it was that OFMDFM would not appoint the Historical Investigations Unit (HIU) director. On one hand, it seems that OFMDFM, or the DUP and Sinn Féin, are moving away from having power of appointment in those negotiations but, when it comes to the transfer of functions, they retain it. I do not understand what that is all about, so maybe the junior Minister, or her officials, might want to explain it sometime or other because, to me, they did not seem to give a very convincing explanation when they were at Committee.

Mrs Pengelly: I am grateful for the contributions that we heard today and I will deal with those before making my final remarks about the Bill. I will attempt to clarify any queries that have been raised, but I should highlight that I do not intend to get into the substance of the transfer of functions order issues, as those matters have the option to be aired in the Chamber in due course.

Regarding Mr Alex Maskey's comments on behalf of the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister, I welcome the Committee's support. I also welcome the remarks by Mr Andy Allen about his support for further streamlining. I am very pleased to be able to stand here today to confirm the delivery of these measures that will help to support better streamlining of our Departments.

A range of other matters was raised by my colleague Mr Paul Frew, Mr Chris Lyttle and Mr Alex Attwood. Turning first to Mr Frew's comments; I absolutely agree. This is a significant step but it will only work with dedication and hard work. We need to break down the silos within Departments, and we need to push forward for a better way of working.

Mr Lyttle echoed many of the sentiments of the comments from Mr Frew and Mr Attwood. We absolutely agree that these measures are welcome and necessary but they will not resolve everything. We have been very clear: we want to see better processes; we want to see better collaboration and cross-departmental, cross-policy working; and we want to see an increased focus on outcomes, ensuring that all we do focuses on improving people's lives. We also want a focus on delivering excellent public services for all. Today, this piece of legislation and the reforms that we are bringing in are a critical and important step in making that happen.

On his specific points about the transfer of functions order, as I said, I am not going to get into the detail of that. I understand that it was sent to the Committee on 19 January, not 27 January, for consideration, and I highlight to him that, although there is considerable detail in that order, it has been clear that there are only a small number of issues on which people have a range of different views. I suspect that the Committee will focus on that small range of issues in due course. Certainly, the organisations involved in those, should they be arm's-length bodies or others, have communicated their concerns and issues and have already brought about some changes in relation to them, up to the point of the transfer of functions order.

In relation to the specific comments by Alex Attwood, I can confirm to the Member that this work must happen. I know that from my experience of working with a couple of key policy areas, as special adviser and, now, as junior Minister. Those two examples are the Delivering Social Change agenda and the social investment fund. Both of those big policy areas were cross-departmental. They have a number of different policy objectives, touching on a number of different Departments and agencies, and they were incredibly difficult to bring about because of that. We have faced this in the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister. We are convinced that, in order to find a new way of working and to bring about better outcomes and changes, this work must happen. It is worth the difficulties that we face but it requires a change of culture for officials, for the way that Departments do business and also, perhaps, in the way that Ministers speak to, and work with, one another in bringing forward collaborative policies and initiatives with, perhaps, collaborative working on funding.

I thank Members again for their contributions to the Final Stage debate on the Departments Bill and for the issues they have raised. It is only a short Bill, but it is one that will have significant implications for how our institutions do business in the future. Reform of the structures of government here is overdue. It has featured as a Programme for Government commitment since 2011. The Assembly and Executive Review Committee carried out a review in 2012 and identified areas of commonality broadly reflective of our current proposals. Together with the reduction in the number of MLAs, which we are also legislating for, this shows our commitment to a leaner and more efficient structure of government here. This is a good day for government in Northern Ireland. This a good day for a better way of doing business, and it is a good day for delivery.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That the Departments Bill [NIA Bill 70/11-16] do now pass.

Rates (Amendment) Bill: Final Stage

Mr Storey (The Minister of Finance and Personnel): I beg to move

That the Rates (Amendment) Bill [NIA Bill 75/11-16] do now pass.

Before providing Members with a recap of the content of the Bill in its final form, I will briefly take the opportunity to thank Members for the support that has been shown for the passage of the Bill through the Assembly and the Finance and Personnel Committee for all the work that has been undertaken to date. I look forward to continuing that working relationship.

Yet again, we have an example of a piece of legislation that has come through the House with good practice in the relationship between the Committee, which has a statutory responsibility to scrutinise legislation, and the Members of the House, who have a duty to ensure that they are content with the legislation brought forward.

As I said in earlier debates on the Bill, I, along with many other Members, would have preferred that it had been possible for the Bill to have been progressed by normal means. However, factors outside my Department's control contributed to the need for accelerated passage. I thank Members for the efficiency with which they have conducted affairs at this busy time for the House.

As I have already explained during previous debates, and as Members will be aware from their consideration, the Bill is short, and I trust that that has facilitated Members' consideration. I see the Bill as the conclusion of a series of fundamental changes to the rating system since devolution was re-established.

The House can be proud of its work on rating matters, including the delivery of an Executive review of rating that implemented a series of critical measures between 2008 and 2010; the implementation of intervention measures during the economic downturn; a non-domestic revaluation; and adjustments to respond to the reorganisation of local government. The non-domestic review will ensure that the new Executive continues that work with a renewed evidence base, which is vital.

I turn to the detail of the Bill, which makes some final adjustments in respect of commercial rating. First, there is the sport and recreation provision, which I have already mentioned. By amending the article 31 sports and recreation exemption in the Rates (Northern Ireland) Order 1977, the final version of the Bill provides a power for the Department to provide full rate relief for many sports clubs, subject to conditions. The conditions that I have in mind are that the club in question should be unlicensed and registered as a community amateur sports club. Following the outcome of further consultation, I will set these out in regulations, subject to affirmative resolution, after assurance was sought that they would be brought to the Assembly.

This approach recognises the competition issues that have already been raised with my Department and the Finance Committee by the hospitality sector. I know that this does not satisfy everyone in the House and that many sports clubs with bars feel that they are disadvantaged by the measure. We also need to be mindful of business interests when we take forward policy in this area. Aside from this being the right thing to do, I also need to protect the Department from the risk of challenge should we wish to adopt a more lenient policy. That said, I know that there are community amateur sports clubs that operate a small bar for members and visiting teams after a match, and I am sure that my successor will be happy to review that issue at a later stage. I do not think, therefore, that there is any way we can develop a balanced, sound, effective and workable policy to allow some clubs with bars to get 100% rating relief and for the regulations to be taken through the Assembly by September, as I noted in my comments at Further Consideration Stage. Policy may well develop in this area over the next mandate, informed by the ongoing review of rating policy.

There is one other point that I would like to make about rating relief for sports clubs, and that concerns the amendment carried yesterday, which at a stroke extends the list of prescribed sports to pigeon racing — the issue almost had us all in flight. There are lessons to be learned on due process in policymaking from the short but eventful journey of this Bill. One is starting to discern that Members do not apply the same standards to private Member's Bills and tabled amendments as they do to Bills from Departments. That leads to poor policy, and Members need to remember that rates revenue pays for vital public services; there is a knock-on effect where that revenue is reduced; and some standards need to be brought to bear on taxation policy. My party took the exceptional step of opposing the private Member's Bill with a petition of concern during its passage through the Assembly. That was on the grounds that proper consultation had not taken place and that there was an alternative, and more appropriate, legislative vehicle available for changing policy.

On the face of it, the pigeon racing amendment is probably a worthy measure, but it could and should have been subject to consultation and taken forward through a change in the regulations containing the list of prescribed sporting activities — not as part of this primary legislation.

Everyone outside my party voted for the amendment because, of course, no one wanted to appear to be against it. That is all too easy, and, forgive me for saying it, but it is not the way that we should be making laws. We need to reflect on what has happened, but, as the saying goes, we are where we are.

12.30 pm

The second policy contained within clause 2 came as a result of a suggestion from the business community. Thankfully, this amendment has proved a lot less problematic. This provision will ensure that, where shopfronts or shop-window displays are used in empty retail premises, the shop owner will effectively continue to receive 50% empty property relief. This measure is novel and unique to Northern Ireland. For this reason, it is time bound within the primary legislation but can be easily extended if the policy proves successful. I thank Members, in particular Ms Hanna, who recognised the innovative nature of this measure, which builds on other positive policies delivered during this mandate, such as the empty shops rates concession.

In summary, this is a short Bill that helps amateur sports clubs and shopping areas by providing further rates concessions. I look forward to Members' support in ensuring that the Bill clears its Final Stage. I commend the Bill to the House.

Mr McKay (The Chairperson of the Committee for Finance and Personnel): Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. If I can, I will make some personal comments and comments from a party perspective before speaking on behalf of the Committee. I first undertook to introduce legislation to reduce the rates burden on amateur sports clubs three years ago. The end result after the regulations are introduced, three years and two Bills later, will be a better deal for amateur sports clubs. I would not say that it is a fair deal, but it is a better deal. I welcome the fact that we will see the new regulations in place in the coming months.

Community and amateur sports clubs without bars will benefit to the tune of a maximum of £750,000. That will cover pitches, clubrooms, storage facilities and sports club stands. The clarity provided by Brian McClure on that is very welcome. From the consultation that I carried out for the private Member's Bill, I know that there is a lot of confusion amongst clubs about what is rated, what is not rated, and what relief is applied in the present system, so that clarity is very welcome. I look forward to the targeted consultation that will take place in the coming weeks regarding amateur sports clubs rates. I welcome the commitment from the Minister and the Department to review the issue of clubs that run a small bar to serve a few pints and operate on a much smaller scale than some of the cases that were highlighted to the Finance Committee by Pubs of Ulster. Again, I thank the Minister for his cooperation with me in recent weeks during the passage of the Bill.

As for the Committee perspective, I welcome the opportunity to briefly reflect on the work of the Finance Committee in relation to the Bill. Admittedly, because of the absence of a Committee Stage, the scrutiny has been fairly cursory in nature. Nonetheless, I believe that the work of the Committee prior to the introduction of the Bill has facilitated stakeholders in airing some key issues for consideration. This was especially so in the evidence sessions with the sporting bodies and hospitality sector in relation to the provisions in clause 1. This work has, in turn, helped to inform the subsequent passage of the Bill through the House. Whilst, ideally, a Committee Stage would have enabled some of the policy issues to be bottomed out at this point, the Finance Committee recognised the merit of ensuring that the passage of the Bill is completed before the end of the mandate. With that in mind, and having received the necessary assurances from the previous Minister, the Committee gave its unanimous support to accelerated passage.

Turning specifically to the envisaged regulations under clause 1 to provide enhanced rate relief to prescribed sports clubs, I welcome the enabling power in the Bill and believe that it will result in tangible benefits for the wider community. Given the complexities around the issues to be considered on the scope of the enhanced relief, it will be important for the various stakeholders to input to the forthcoming consultation on the regulations. There will also be a need for the successor Finance Committee to actively engage in this process, with a view to helping inform and influence the development of the regulations that will flow from clause 1.

The provisions under what is now clause 3, which applies a disregard to the commercial use of window displays, are seen by Committee as a positive and innovative initiative given the challenges facing the commercial sector. In more general terms, we, as a devolved Assembly, must continue to look for innovative measures that help to support and nurture businesses in and around our towns. Therefore, I welcome the review of the non-domestic rating system and look forward to the outputs from that and seeing how those will translate into concrete proposals that will benefit the wider economy. In so doing, we will, of course, need to ensure that the revenue-raising potential of the rating system is utilised judiciously for the benefit of the public.

The new clause 2, in regard to pigeon racing, has not been considered by the Committee, and it does not have a view on it. However, I take the opportunity to congratulate Mr Cree and Mr Swann on what has turned out to be a bit of a coup in terms of the amendment. On behalf of the Committee, I support the Bill.

Mr I McCrea: In respect of the Bill and the work of the Committee, alongside that of the Minister and his officials, if nothing else, it has certainly been evidenced that, where people are of a similar mind, we can get business done and deliver something of benefit to our community. A lot of debate and discussion has happened around amateur sports clubs with the sector and officials and whatnot in the Committee. Whilst the Chair does not believe it to be a fair deal, when it is realised and put into practice, the benefits that the community amateur sports clubs will see as a result of the change in legislation will be welcomed.

Carrying on from the Member's final remarks, I think we got a lesson yesterday on pigeon racing; I learned things that I never knew. I learned that pigeons are used as a means of dealing with gang culture in America. If that is the case, whilst we maybe do not have the gang culture that they have in some parts of America, who knows what this will do for the future of pigeon racing in Northern Ireland and the benefits that it will have in combating criminal gangs and whatnot? Maybe we will see them all going out of business. Maybe they should have introduced this some time ago and we would not have had the struggle in Northern Ireland over the last 40 years. Nonetheless, maybe we will see a pilot scheme happening at some stage soon in Northern Ireland. Hopefully, it will deal with the culture of crime and whatnot that we have. In respect of the community amateur sports side of things, it is to be welcomed.

The provisions on window displays and the 50% rate relief is a good news story that the Assembly will send out today. I think that Claire Hanna said in a previous debate that we should not want this type of measure and that we should be trying to ensure that our shops are filled and we do not need to provide this rate relief for empty shops. However, it is trying to show the business community, which has struggled over the last number of years, that the Assembly is listening and will do what it can, where possible, under the constraints that it has financially, to help that community. It is certainly something that will be welcomed across our town centres.

For a number of years, I was on Cookstown District Council, which successfully marketed our town with the "Cookstown, Looking Good, Looking Great" slogan. This legislation will bring even more benefits than that strategy. For example, with empty shops, if there is some form of advertising on the windows and the owners receive the 50% rate relief, it will help. All in all, I commend the Minister for bringing the Bill through the House. He had little to do with it in its early stages, but he certainly had plenty to do with it as it went through. It is good legislation, and people will see the benefits as soon as it is introduced.

Mr Diver: I welcome the opportunity to contribute to the debate at the Final Stage of the Rates (Amendment) Bill.

As has been outlined, there are two substantive clauses in the Bill, and the SDLP is supportive of the Bill in general. My colleague Claire Hanna made a significant contribution to the debate and referenced the use of accelerated passage. We are content with the use of accelerated passage, but we urge caution on its use generally, as, in our considered view, it does not give legislation the scrutiny that we should aim for in the House.

The Bill had two clauses when it was first introduced in the House. We had the addition of clause 1A yesterday to include pigeon racing, and we flocked to support it when it was voted on. Perhaps we will all end up being amateur ornithologists after this.

The first clause provides for a power to enhance rates relief for community amateur sports clubs. That is subject to criteria that will be prescribed in subordinate legislation and subject to affirmative resolution in the Assembly.

The second clause enables commercial window displays to be disregarded from occupation for rating purposes. As we heard at Committee Stage, that clause was mainly proposed by the business sector. I agree with other Members that its inclusion shows that the Assembly is responsive to the needs of the business community and that the Department has made some efforts in that regard. The measure is untried anywhere else in the UK, and it is time-bound in the new clause until 31 March 2017, with the potential for extension. Obviously, we hope that it will be successful.

The law on rates already provides for 80% relief in the case of charitable purposes. The Bill proposes to extend that to community and sporting clubs, and we welcome that. A private Member's Bill was introduced during this mandate, the thrust of which was that community and sporting clubs should have 100% rates relief. The SDLP supported the principles of that Bill and the proposals in the Bill before us today.

The hospitality sector raised competition issues with the proposals in the private Member's Bill. Those concerns were over the fact that any proposal to enhance sport and recreation relief to 100% could place licensed sporting clubs, particularly those with an alcohol licence, in a very advantageous position. The train of thought was that that advantageous position would have a large effect on other businesses working in that sector. Those concerns were outlined to the Committee on a number of occasions. The issues over the sale of alcohol and profitability should not be a barrier to the progression of relief. It is for that reason that we supported the Sinn Féin amendments at Consideration Stage and Further Consideration Stage.

As was referenced at Second Stage, in England and Wales registered community amateur sports clubs receive 80% relief on the rates for premises that are wholly or mainly used for the purposes of that club. In Scotland, mandatory rates relief is given to registered charities and registered community and sports clubs where the premises are wholly or mainly for charitable or club purposes. It is right and proper that we too extend rates relief, and I welcome the fact that the Bill has reached its Final Stage.

In reference to clause 2, it is a good idea that we will help owners plagued by vacancy. The measure will not regenerate the local economy with sweeping effect.

However, it is a small part of the range of measures that we need to bring forward in the House and that will need to be adopted to help our businesses, many of which are struggling at this very difficult time with the state of the economy. Vacancy rates are still much too high and profitability rates too low.

The SDLP has been supportive of this legislation since it was introduced. It will provide good relief and assistance to organisations whose purpose is not financially driven. I hope that the outstanding issues around the sale of alcohol and profitability will be resolved in the coming mandate.

Mr Cree: At this stage, everything has been said. I was pleased to be able to help Mr McCrea with his knowledge of things in the west. He certainly needs to get out more, but, again, I will help any time that I can.

This is a good example of where democracy works. There are problems with accelerated passage, but I think that we have demonstrated that democracy, despite what some people may think, is still alive and well in the House. The Chairman covered all of the points in depth. It has been a good example of where a Committee has worked with the Department and produced a good result from both ends. I hope that that will continue. We are happy to support the Bill, as amended. Again, I thank the Minister for the undertaking that he has given us this afternoon.

Mr Storey: I thank the Members who have made a contribution on the Bill this afternoon. I want to make a number of brief comments.

I want to touch on the point that was made by Mr Diver. Obviously, he made a point about his concern about using accelerated passage and how there was no opportunity for the House to give the scrutiny that was due. However, he and his colleagues went through the Lobbies yesterday to vote for an amendment on which there had been no consultation or due consideration. Even the Chair said that he was not going to comment on the issue.

That brings us back to the issue of pigeons, which were much to the fore. I have to say that I smiled when I noticed that, in a new survey, Northern Ireland ranks as the happiest place in the United Kingdom. The "Top of the morning" feeling peaks in Fermanagh and Omagh. I do not think that that has anything to do with the fact that we will pass legislation in the House today in relation to pigeon clubs; it might have more to do with the fact that we now have a First Minister who is from Fermanagh. I am glad that that has brought happiness to the people of Northern Ireland.

In closing, I want to take the time to thank the Speaker's Office and the Bill Office as well as the Assembly staff and all who have done so much to facilitate the passage of the Bill. I also note and place on record our thanks to the Office of the Legislative Counsel and the staff in the legislative programme secretariat in OFMDFM for their work in supporting my Department through the passage of the Bill. I also thank my officials who have worked tirelessly on the preparation of the Bill and on the extensive deliberations they have had with the Committee. I want to ensure that they are thanked for the work they have done. I also commend the work of the Finance and Personnel Committee. Mr Cree made a valid point: this is an example of how, for all the deficiencies, Bills can come forward in the House, there can be agreement and we can find a solution, even when there are difficulties. I conclude by thanking all who have been involved in the process and everybody who has helped us to bring the Bill to this stage. I commend the Bill to the House.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Before we proceed to the Question, I remind Members that the Bill requires cross-community support at Final Stage.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved (with cross-community support):

That the Rates (Amendment) Bill [NIA Bill 75/11-16] do now pass.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: As there are Ayes from all sides of the House and there are no dissenting voices, I am satisfied that cross-community support has been demonstrated. The Rates (Amendment) Bill has passed.

Public Service (Civil Servants and Others) Pensions (Consequential Provisions) (Amendment) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2016

Mr Storey (The Minister of Finance and Personnel): I beg to move

That the draft Public Service (Civil Servants and Others) Pensions (Consequential Provisions) (Amendment) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2016 be approved.

Schedule 13 to the Pensions Act (Northern Ireland) 2015, introduced in June 2015, now provides for the abolition of contracting out by way of amendment to the Pension Schemes (Northern Ireland) Act 1993. The 2015 Act modifies the definition of cessation date and introduces a specific date of 6 April 2016 for the abolition of contracting out for salary-related schemes.

Members should note that the regulations relate specifically to the Northern Ireland Civil Service pension scheme. However, as Finance Minister, I should inform you that, following my Department's instruction and that of Her Majesty's Treasury, this change to the Pension Schemes (Northern Ireland) Act 1993 will apply to all public-sector pension schemes in Northern Ireland. Indeed, Members will be aware of the debate that took place on 19 January 2016 on the Police Pension (Consequential Provisions) (Amendment) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2016, which were affirmed without issue.

The changes are technical in nature. They ensure provision for the continued protection of increases in guaranteed minimum pensions for employees who were contracted out of the second state earnings related pension scheme between 6 April 1978 and 5 April 1997. The draft regulations before the House were the subject of a targeted four-week consultation that ended on 16 November 2015, and no responses were received. The regulations were subject to an equality screening exercise, and no equality issues were identified.

On 13 January 2016, the Committee for Finance and Personnel agreed that it was content with the draft regulations. It is with its support that I bring the draft regulations before the House. I therefore commend these modifications to the House.

Mr McKay (The Chairperson of the Committee for Finance and Personnel): Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. The Minister has outlined the purpose of the regulations. These are subject to affirmative resolution because they modify provisions in the primary legislation.

The Committee considered the proposal to make the statutory rule at its meeting on 9 December 2015. Noting that, in response to DFP's short, targeted four-week consultation, the representative trade unions had no objections, the Committee agreed that it was also content with the policy implications of the regulations. The formal statutory rule that is before the Assembly was subsequently considered at the Committee's meeting on 13 January 2016, together with the accompanying report from the Assembly's Examiner of Statutory Rules. The Examiner raised no issues by way of technical scrutiny. The Committee therefore agreed to recommend that the Public Service (Civil Service and Others) Pensions (Consequential Provisions) (Amendment) Regulations (NI) 2016 be affirmed by the Assembly. On behalf of the Committee, I support the motion.

Mr Storey: Maybe this should be the duration of most debates on changes to legislation. I thank the Chair for his comments and want to place on record my appreciation for the help given when the issue was brought to the Committee for Finance and Personnel. I commend the motion to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That the draft Public Service (Civil Servants and Others) Pensions (Consequential Provisions) (Amendment) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2016 be approved.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Business Committee has arranged to meet at 1.00 pm. I propose, therefore, by leave of the Assembly, to suspend the sitting until 2.00 pm. The first item of business when we return will be Question Time.

The sitting was suspended at 12.54 pm.

2.00 pm

On resuming (Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Dallat] in the Chair) —

Oral Answers to Questions

Social Development

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Members, questions 13 and 14 have been withdrawn.

Supporting People Review

1. Mr McAleer asked the Minister for Social Development to outline the work his Department has undertaken following the publication of the final report of the supporting people review. (AQO 9523/11-16)

Lord Morrow (The Minister for Social Development): The Supporting People review final report included 13 recommendations for improvements to the efficiency and effectiveness of the Supporting People programme. My Department has established an implementation steering group to drive the implementation of the 13 recommendations while working with key partners. I will publish an action plan in March of this year setting out implementation scales for my Department and for our delivery partners, including the Northern Ireland Housing Executive and the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety. My aim is to have the implementation process largely complete by March 2018.

Mr McAleer: Go raibh maith agat. I thank the Minister for his answer. What measures will his Department be taking to implement the recommendation of the Equality Commission report?

Lord Morrow: In keeping with all recommendations of the report, my Department will apply itself to all the recommendations. As far as it lies within it — I hope that it is in totality — it will be implementing that aspect of it completely.

Women's Centre Childcare Fund

2. Mrs D Kelly asked the Minister for Social Development, given that it provides 88,000 childcare places, to outline how he will ensure the future of the women's centre childcare fund, which is due to end on 31 March 2016. (AQO 9524/11-16)

Lord Morrow: The women's centre childcare fund was introduced as a temporary emergency funding package, pending the implementation of a coordinated childcare strategy for Northern Ireland. It was established in April 2008 following on from the children and young people's fund as part of an emergency departmental response to ensure that key childcare services provided in women's centres were kept open, pending an Executive decision about their future funding. The fund supports 14 women's centres across the region at a cost of approximately £850,000 per annum.

My Department stepped in over the last number of years to provide funding in a way that has ensured continued delivery of the women's centre childcare fund. I remain committed to that position. My predecessor Minister Storey indicated last year that, in terms of the Budget process, this would be the last year. However, given that we have an OFMDFM childcare strategy that will not come into operation until 2017, there is the issue of what we do in the interim. To that end, my officials recently submitted a bid for funds to DFP; unfortunately, however, it was rejected. This issue remains a priority for me, and I have to work now to ensure that we have a transition that, as far as possible, is not detrimental to the delivery of the service.

Mrs D Kelly: I welcome the Minister's commitment, but the people, particularly women, who work in the sector and those who depend upon the service that it provides need some surety and guarantee. We are, after all, in the month of February, and people will be getting redundancy notices shortly. I am sure that the Minister will agree that the service provided promotes social inclusion etc. In exploring other funding options, given that the social investment fund has been unable to spend its money, might that be a source that the Minister could tap into at least to assure women's centres of funding for the year ahead?

Lord Morrow: I thank Mrs Kelly for her question. Let me assure her that I am totally committed to that matter. She mentioned the social investment fund. I am not quite sure whether that can be applied there or not, but I assure her that no stone will be left unturned. I accept what she says about the staff all being on their exit notice. That brings a degree of uncertainty. I hope that I will be able to get gap funding, but, at the moment, I cannot give any guarantee, except that I will do my best. I hope that, in this instance, my best is good enough.

Ms P Bradley: I thank the Minister for his answers so far. I agree with Mrs Kelly on the essential need for more information. I welcome the Minister's commitment to do his utmost to secure that funding for women's centres, but what is his assessment of the work that is supported by the women's centre childcare fund?

Lord Morrow: My Department recently commissioned an evaluation of the women's centre childcare fund, which has been an emergency measure since 2008, as I said. The evaluation concluded that the programme provided a wide range of positive impacts in relation to the development and well-being of children and in supporting parents to access services and opportunities.

Before I came into the Department, I was totally committed to this scheme. Now that I am in a position to do something about it, I can assure the Member, and the previous Member who asked the question, that this is something we are going to move — well, not literally heaven and earth, but we are going to make strident moves to ensure that it does not collapse.

Mr Beggs: The Minister will be aware that childcare provides an essential service to enable many to move from welfare into employment. In many areas, there may be under-provision of childcare facilities. Does the Minister acknowledge that the staff involved, and the parents currently being supported, will get little comfort from the thought that there is a strategy to be implemented in 2017? What is going to happen before then?

Lord Morrow: I thought I answered that. The present scheme has been receiving year-on-year funding from 2008. We are now in 2016 and funding has been available, and is continuing. I am very hopeful that I can continue that funding for a further year. By then, hopefully, the childcare strategy will have kicked in, but that will be a new situation and will be for the Minister at that time. However, I am determined that 2016-17 will be funded, and I hope that I have not overstated that.

Girdwood Community Complex

3. Mr G Kelly asked the Minister for Social Development to outline the timescale for further progress on the Girdwood community complex in North Belfast (AQO 9525/11-16)

Lord Morrow: I would like to confirm my Department's ongoing commitment to the delivery of the agreed master plan conceptual framework in its entirety. My Department is finalising the site infrastructure at Girdwood Park, which has facilitated the delivery by Belfast City Council of its flagship community hub, and the provision by Apex Housing Association of 66 new houses. As the Member will be aware, the Department's infrastructure project includes the provision of a new multisport pitch.

My officials have already been engaging with other statutory bodies and stakeholders in the wider community to take forward important preparatory work for an indoor sports facility and mixed-use economic facilities. Delivery of those elements of the master plan conceptual framework will, of course, be subject to satisfactory business cases and the availability of budget. I am pleased to note that Belfast City Council has set aside £6 million for the development of the indoor sports site, and I am confident that, with cross-party support, the Executive will be able to commence the next phase of delivery in the spending review period beginning in April 2017.

Mr G Kelly: Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as a fhreagraí go dtí seo. I thank the Minister for his answers up to now, and welcome that the Department is still committed to the entire project. Does he have any comment to make on departmental engagement with local communities on the management of the facilities?

Lord Morrow: My Department is investing £6 million in essential infrastructure, including roads, services, landscaping and a synthetic pitch to support the wider development at Girdwood Park. This is in line with the agreed conceptual development framework.

This work is scheduled to be complete by March 2016. The infrastructure works will support the Belfast City Council community hub, which recently opened new social housing units by Apex Housing Association that are due to be available around May 2016, and the future development of the remaining sites.

Mr Anderson: I thank the Minister for his answers so far. He may have touched on this. What plans are there for future housing development on the Girdwood site?

Lord Morrow: In line with the agreed conceptual framework, an area of land along Cliftonpark Avenue has been identified for housing. The site is currently not listed for development due to lack of demand. Following the allocation of a social housing scheme on the nearby Oldpark Road by Choice housing association, demand in the area will be reviewed in the coming months. It is envisaged that affordable homes will be delivered on this site.

Mr A Maginness: I thank the Minister for his interesting reply, and I congratulate him on his appointment. I did work with him before in various guises and I know that he brings a lot to this position. As you know, housing on the Girdwood site has been a contentious issue. How soon will the review that the Department intends to undertake on housing take place, and what progress does the Minister feel might be made in augmenting the proposals for housing on the site?

Lord Morrow: I thank the Member for his comments and, as I am aware that it is not his intention to return to the Assembly, I wish him all the best for the future, wherever the future takes him.

On the future of this site, I have to say that, as I am sure he will readily agree, this has been a matter for some debate and discussion over recent times. It has still some distance to go, but my Department is totally committed to the development of the site and the review. I hope to be in a position to come back very soon or whoever is the Minister then should be coming to this, certainly within this calendar year.

Regeneration Powers: Transfer Timescale

4. Mrs Overend asked the Minister for Social Development for an update on the timescale for the transfer of regeneration powers to local government. (AQO 9526/11-16)

Lord Morrow: The decision to transfer regeneration and community development powers to local government ultimately rests with the Executive. The new Department for Communities (DFC) will have a much wider range of responsibilities. In this context, it would be prudent to wait until the new functions have been assimilated in the DFC and then the Executive can determine when any of those responsibilities would best be delivered at a local level. The timing would be subject to the successful completion of the legislative process. The fundamental aim of the reform programme remains the same: to transform local government, putting decision-making on local matters in the hands of locally elected representatives. Ultimately, the Executive will decide the way forward in the context of the newly formed Department for Communities.

Mrs Overend: I thank the Minister for his response. Will he agree that, while there is ambiguity about the timescale for the transfer of these powers to our local councils, they will remain in some sort of limbo and that there should be some sort of commitment to a timescale for the transfer of these powers in the Programme for Government?

Lord Morrow: I do agree with the sentiments expressed by the Member that it is important that the uncertainty is dealt with as quickly as possible. I do accept that it is important that we come to this situation as quickly as humanly possible. We had hoped that we would be coming to it in 2016, but the truth of the matter is that we will not be. However, we can look then to 2017 and, hopefully, we will be. I assure the Member that I and my party are totally committed to this, and we will be making every effort to ensure that it happens in as short a timescale as possible.

Mr Campbell: Will the Minister outline whether the resources originally envisaged to be allocated to local authorities for the important duties that will be transferred across will be reflected in reality?

Lord Morrow: Councils had been advised of the budgets anticipated to transfer to them should the Regeneration Bill have successfully completed its legislative passage. Unfortunately, we know that that will not be the case. However, as this is no longer the case, there will be no specific allocation to councils to deliver services to tackle deprivation in 2016. That responsibility remains with my Department.

Mrs McKevitt: I congratulate the Minister on his new position; this is my first opportunity to do so.

Mr Campbell has already touched on the resources. Will the budget for the delivery of that function also transfer to local government? What guidance is his Department giving to, and what discussions is it having with, local government in order for it to be ready?

Lord Morrow: I thank the Member for her kind remarks and well wishes to me for the future in this Department.

I think that there would be something very amiss if the budget were not transferred at the same time. It has to be, otherwise it will not be an effective form of government. Given that the Executive have only recently agreed the final Budget for 2016-17, I now need to consider the impact that the settlement will have across my Department's remit. Yes, the budget is a very important factor. If it does not go with the powers, why should powers transfer at all?

Independent Advice Centres: Funding

5. Mr Lyttle asked the Minister for Social Development for an update on funding for independent advice centres. (AQO 9527/11-16)

Lord Morrow: Through its community support programme, my Department provides £1.6 million of funding to front-line advice services each year. That is supplemented by approximately £1.9 million from local councils, which then commission front-line advice centres for their local areas. Additionally, my Department provides funding of £1.3 million annually for regional support services for front-line advisers. Budget allocations for 2016-17 have not yet been agreed.

Mr Lyttle: I thank the Minister for his answer. Does he agree that independent advice services provide vital assistance to ensure that people in our community receive the social security assistance to which they are fully entitled? In my constituency of East Belfast, the independent advice centre works on a shoestring budget of £70,000 per year and generates multi-million-pound take-up, to which people are fully entitled. Is the Minister, therefore, willing to follow up on a commitment given by his predecessor to meet the Northern Ireland independent advice service sector and me to ensure that advice centres have adequate resources to achieve what they are able to achieve?

Lord Morrow: Mr Lyttle talks about the advice centres having limited resources. I can rub thumbs with him on that: I have a finite budget also. However, I am quite prepared to meet with him and those who provide the service to discuss the issue in the future. As Mr Storey has already given that commitment, I am prepared to stand by it.

Mr Diver: Will the recommendations from the recent Evason panel regarding funding for advice centres be implemented in full? Can people have assurances that they will have high-standard advice on an ongoing basis?

Lord Morrow: I thank the Member for his question. I also wish him well, having recently come in to the Assembly in place of, I think, Mr Ramsey.

Professor Evason's report recommended additional funding for front-line advice services of £1.25 million per annum for four years. The Executive have now agreed the implementation of the recommendations, and I have asked my officials to consider how best to take them forward.

Mrs Cameron: I thank the Minister for his answers so far and welcome him to his new role as Minister for Social Development.

When will the funding for front-line advice services be confirmed?

Lord Morrow: I thank my colleague Pam Cameron for her well wishes.

The Budget allocations for 2016-17 have not yet been agreed. Front-line advice providers and local councils will be advised as soon as is humanly possible.

Ms McCorley: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as a freagraí go dtí seo. I thank the Minister for his answers thus far and also congratulate him on his new role.

I, like others, had intended to ask the Minister about the additional resources, but he has already answered that. How confident is he that vulnerable people will be well served in the new arrangements?

Lord Morrow: I thank the Member for her well wishes. As for attending to, looking after and providing a service for vulnerable people, I believe that society owes it to them and, as one who has an advice centre, like many others in this Chamber, we deal with those sorts of issues on a daily basis. They are very close to my heart and, if it is down to me to do it, I assure you that it will be done, and there will be no gap in that service.

NIHE Dwellings: East Londonderry

6. Mr McQuillan asked the Minister for Social Development how many Northern Ireland Housing Executive dwellings in East Londonderry are inhabitable. (AQO 9528/11-16)

Lord Morrow: The Housing Executive has 4,444 properties in the East Londonderry constituency area, which all meet the standard.

Mr McQuillan: I thank the Minister for his answer and congratulate him on his elevation to the Front Bench. What investment is being made in Housing Executive properties in East Londonderry?

Lord Morrow: I thank Mr McQuillan for his well wishes. I suspect that this honeymoon period will end some time, but I will enjoy it while it is happening.

In line with the interim investment planned, the Northern Ireland Housing Executive has five schemes already under way or planned to commence in the next year in East Londonderry worth a total investment of approximately £1.483 million. Further necessary investment has been made in properties in East Londonderry and continues to be made through planned and response maintenance, with around £21 million committed to schemes during the last two and a half years.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Mr Chris Hazzard is not in his place.

Equality Obligations: DSD

8. Mr McKay asked the Minister for Social Development, following the recent publication of the Equality Commission's investigation report on the Department for Social Development's compliance with its equality scheme commitments, to outline the progress that has been made by his Department on meeting its equality obligations. (AQO 9530/11-16)

Lord Morrow: My Department is continuing to work with the Equality Commission for Northern Ireland to take forward the four recommendations that were made as a result of its investigation. The breaches related to the Department's 2001 equality scheme. No breaches were identified against the current equality scheme. As recently as 22 January, a meeting was held with representatives from the Equality Commission to ensure that the Department was addressing the concerns raised.

On a general note, my Department adheres to its equality scheme and received positive feedback from the Equality Commission on our section 75 annual progress report, which set out the work undertaken to meet our equality obligations in 2014-15.

Mr McKay: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I also congratulate the Minister on his appointment.

Is he satisfied that the current legislative and policy framework on procurement of housing support services in relation to Supporting People is delivering the required outcomes?

Lord Morrow: I thank the Member for his well wishes, too. He has asked a very direct question; he asked whether I am satisfied. The answer is as direct, and it is yes.

Mr Douglas: I thank the Minister for his answers so far. Will the Minister outline the current position of the Department's equality scheme work and the work on the housing strategy?

Lord Morrow: The Department has published the final version of the housing strategy, alongside a midterm update on the 33 actions in the housing strategy action plan and an updated equality screening exercise. The midterm updates show that 27 screenings had been completed to date. The action plan update shows that the strategy is delivering on its vision to ensure that everyone has the opportunity to access quality housing at a reasonable cost

Social Housing: Funding

9. Mr Diver asked the Minister for Social Development to outline the funding his Department will provide to increase the building of social and affordable housing. (AQO 9531/11-16)

Lord Morrow: I have just approved the Housing Executive's new social housing development programme for the three-year period 2016-17 to 2018-19. Budgets for the 2016-17 social housing development programme and beyond have yet to be agreed. However, the Housing Executive has based its indicative programme for 2016-2020 on delivering 8,000 new starts over that period.

The Northern Ireland Co-ownership Housing Association continues to be my Department's main delivery partner for affordable housing. My Department has secured nearly £95 million of financial transactions capital (FTC) loan funding for the co-ownership scheme for the period from 2015 to 2018-19. It is anticipated that that funding, in conjunction with its private funding, will permit the Northern Ireland Co-ownership Housing Association to deliver over 2,600 additional affordable homes across Northern Ireland.

Mr Diver: I thank the Minister for his assurances. Anybody on the housing list will welcome the fact that new homes are being built. There is debate and consultation about housing associations potentially acquiring former Housing Executive properties. If there is such a policy decision, can current Housing Executive tenants be assured that they will not be detrimentally affected by that process or change?

Lord Morrow: I want to be fair to the questioner. That is a question that I want to look at before I give a definitive answer. I think that I am right when I say that that is the case. However, I will come back to you on that and provide a full answer because I recognise that it is an important issue, not only for Members but for tenants and those who are hoping to buy their own homes one day.

Mr G Robinson: I congratulate the Minister on his elevation to his new post. How is housing need calculated?

Lord Morrow: I thank the Member for his well wishes, too. It is good that so many are wishing me well, right around the House. I hope that, in the months to come, it will also be that way and that, when I have maybe not delivered something for them in their area, they will still be prepared to wish me well. I suspect that that might not be the case.

Housing need is calculated through a process. As someone who has been a long-time councillor in his area, as I was in mine, the Member will know that that is a subject that keeps coming up. I assure him that there is a very fulsome and robust method that determines how that is done. I will send the Member the exact details. I think that he will be convinced, as I am, that it is a true and trusted method that ensures fairness and equality in the whole scheme.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): I call Mr Phil Flanagan for a very short supplementary question.

Mr Flanagan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I will dispose with wishing the Minister well, if that is your intention.

Can the Minister provide us with an update on how his Department and the Housing Executive are trying to overcome the barriers faced by people who are trying to develop social and affordable housing in rural places like Ederney in Fermanagh, where the waste water treatment plants are full and no further development can be connected?

I genuinely do wish the Minister well; I was only joking.

Lord Morrow: I thank the Member for his well wishes, too. He has raised an issue about rural areas that I, too, am concerned about. I am not sure whether he was at the latest development in Fivemiletown the other day, where we have upgraded the sewage treatment works.

Those are the sorts of scheme that we want to see developed. I accept that the infrastructure in certain places prohibits development in rural areas. If the Member knows of an area of great concern to him — he mentioned Ederney — he can contact my office, and I will look into it in person to see how we can ensure that homes are provided for rural communities. Rural communities are as entitled to homes as urban ones.

2.30 pm

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): I am sure that it is superfluous for me to assure the Minister that I did not wish to deprive him of good wishes. [Laughter.] The time is simply up for listed questions, and we will now move on to topical questions. Topical question 1 has been withdrawn.

Bangor Town Centre: Regeneration Update

Mr Dunne: I too welcome the new Minister and thank him for his recent visit to north Down. We are looking for a lot of good things from him.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Is there a question?

T2. Mr Dunne asked the Minister for Social Development, while recognising work to date by DSD, for an update on the regeneration of Bangor town centre, including the long-awaited Queen's Parade development. (AQT 3422/11-16)

Lord Morrow: I thank Mr Dunne again for his good wishes. He is right: I spent a very good day in Bangor last Thursday. It was good to see the sparkle back in Bangor, something, as I said on that day, that had been missing in earlier years. In response to the Member's question, let me say that, over the last three years, my officials have been working in partnership with the council to design, develop and deliver a major £8 million public realm improvement scheme for Bangor. Significant progress has been made to the works programme, and these are due to be completed three months earlier than expected, on 31 March 2016. It is not often that you hear something like that. During my recent visit to Bangor to officially open the YMCA's new premises on High Street, I saw for myself how this substantial investment is already beginning to inject renewed vibrancy into the town centre, making it a modern place to visit and spend time in.

Significant progress has been made on Queen's Parade since my Department stepped in and took direct control of the scheme. In March 2015, my Department obtained planning approval for a scheme that would provide for in excess of 25,000 square metres of floor space. The new development includes a mix of residential, retail, commercial and hotel accommodation, restaurants, cafés, a courtyard plaza and public open space for marine gardens. The plans will complement the public realm works and restore the area as an attractive, vibrant and inclusive place for everyone to enjoy. It will also enhance the town's reputation as a key tourist and shopping destination.

Mr Dunne: Thank you, Mr Deputy Speaker. I am assured that your visit has already paid off, but can the Minister clarify the actual start date for Queen's Parade? We would prefer it in writing, Minister. The project has gone on so long, and we would like to see work begin on site as soon as possible.

Lord Morrow: I do not know about the writing aspect, but I suspect that whatever I say now will go down in Hansard. I am not sure whether that is enough to satisfy the Member.

The granting of planning permission in March 2015 was a key step in the development process. The next major step is to complete site assembly. The majority of the property is now in the ownership of DSD. My officials have been negotiating with the three remaining property owners for over 12 months to achieve agreement by mutual consent. I do not know whether the Member can assist us with that or not. Negotiations are ongoing. However, it is unlikely that agreement will be reached for all the properties, and the Department has issued notices of intention to vest the remaining properties. My Department has requested a public inquiry into the decision to adopt a development scheme for Queen's Parade and the issue of vesting notices. That is set for 3 February 2016. A final decision on the making and enacting of the vesting order will be made following the public inquiry. My Department is working closely with the council and hopes to appoint a private sector development partner in September 2016 to take forward the proposals. It is estimated that the groundwork will commence about 12 to 18 months after the appointment of the developer.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): I call Mr Adrian Cochrane-Watson, who has just got to his place.

Mr Cochrane-Watson: Is this a topical question? Question number 2, Mr Deputy Speaker.

A Member: We are on topicals.

Mr Cochrane-Watson: I apologise, Mr Deputy Speaker. I have been away all morning at a hospital appointment. I do not have a question.

Housing Benefit Fraud

T4. Mr Lyons asked the Minister for Social Development what action his Department is taking to deal with housing benefit fraud and what progress has been made. (AQT 3424/11-16)

Lord Morrow: The issue of fraud, whether it is housing benefit fraud, social welfare fraud or whatever, is one that my Department and I take very seriously, as should every MLA. I assure the Member that it is very high on our list of priorities because the money taken away by fraud means that there is less to go to those who really deserve it. I assure the Member that, like him, I am concerned about the scale of fraud. Whether it is at a low or a high level, it has to be tackled, and I assure him that it will be tackled.

Mr Lyons: I thank the Minister for his answer. A specific case brought to my attention was that of the resident of a Housing Executive property. She abandoned the property but continued to claim housing benefit and left her dog there to starve to death. Obviously, that is not acceptable on a number of levels. Can the Minister assure me that his Department will take every action possible to ensure that people claiming housing benefit are entitled to it? Will he also assure me that his Department will continue to invest so that action can be taken against housing benefit fraud? As the Minister rightly says, any welfare money that is spent on those who do not need it is taken away from those who do.

Lord Morrow: I thank the Member for his question. Frankly, I found the story that he related absolutely horrendous. I say to him and everyone else within the sound of my voice that, if they are aware of any of this sort of behaviour going on, we all have a moral and civic responsibility to report it to the authorities to ensure that it is stamped out immediately.

The estimated level of benefit fraud has reduced from £60.9 million of public money back in 2001 — I took up the conversation in 2001 when I was last in DSD — to an estimated £25.2 million in 2014, with a further estimated £18.4 million lost through housing benefit fraud. My Department has a dedicated team of fraud investigators who work right across Northern Ireland, so there is no let-up on that, Mr Lyons, I assure you. The incident that you reported is horrendous. If you have any information that can help my Department or the police, please speak to us.

Private Rented Sector: Review

Mr G Kelly: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. In continuance of the warm glow around you, Minister, I add my best wishes as you take up your responsibilities in the Department.

T5. Mr G Kelly asked the Minister for Social Development to outline the areas that will be covered in his Department's recently announced review of the regulation of the private rented sector. (AQT 3425/11-16)

Lord Morrow: I thank the Member for his well wishes. The review that he speaks of will be very comprehensive. It will take in all aspects and, if there are areas that the Member has concerns about or he feels that he could feed into and would like to see considered, we are ready to listen to him and hear what he has to say on this issue.

Mr G Kelly: Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as a freagraí go dtí seo. I thank the Minister for his answer and, indeed, his offer to feed into the review. He said that it would be comprehensive. I ask for some assurance that the antisocial behaviour issue is looked at. As he knows, there are some regulations in the social housing sector that give the ability to deal with that when it happens. At times, perhaps not often, that can destroy a whole street or area. If we could look at that in the private sector, it would be very helpful.

Lord Morrow: Antisocial behaviour comes up constantly as one of the big issues that public representatives get through their door, with complaints virtually on a daily basis. I think that the message that antisocial behaviour is not acceptable in this day and age still does not seem to have got out. I want to make it very clear that, as far as my Department and me are concerned, antisocial behaviour has to be tackled head-on. Sometimes, that means putting our heads above the parapet, but that has to be done. I will ensure that, in this review, which, as I have already said, will be comprehensive, antisocial behaviour will be one of the issues looked at from every angle to see how it can be reduced. It would be better if it could be stamped out altogether.

Holylands: Regeneration

T6. Mr Ó Muilleoir asked the Minister for Social Development about an issue that he would remember from his last stint as Minister, which was the Holylands, where there are continuing efforts to create a family friendly and vibrant community, and, given that, as he knows, the city is changing, with up to 5,000 purpose-built units for students, would he consider revisiting the efforts to regenerate the Holylands as a vibrant community. (AQT 3426/11-16)

Mr Ó Muilleoir: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Ba mhaith liomsa fosta tacú agus tréaslú leis an Aire as a cheapachán. I also congratulate the Minister on his appointment. Your predecessor tells me that he left a little note for you to deal sympathetically with my questions, so I hope you received that, Minister.

Lord Morrow: I did not understand part of the Member's question, but I did take from him that it was well wishes, too. One thing that has struck me since the First Minister appointed me to this Department is the number of people there who remember me. I thought that there was nobody still living to remember me there, it was that long ago. [Laughter.] Now that you speak of the Holylands, I do remember, and I have some memories of that. However, I do not remember the details, to be truthful. I think that, if I am going to come up to speed on that one again, you should bring it to my attention, and we will certainly have a look at it. I have listened to it in the news in the past, and I know that there are some quite unsavoury things that have been going on there. Those things need to be looked at and tackled.

Mr Ó Muilleoir: Thank you very much, Minister, for your response. I did not mean to spring that on you. I suppose it is topical because St Patrick's Day is coming round, and you will remember that that is always a very tough time for the families and residents of the Holylands. Perhaps, Minister, in the time remaining before Parliament breaks up, I could invite you to come back to the Holylands. Maybe you will visit south Belfast and meet some of the residents. In short, Minister, I presume that you would like to see a vibrant, family friendly community that does not have the sort of antisocial behaviour that we have seen on St Patrick's Day in previous years.

Lord Morrow: Yes, I think it would be very good if we could avoid what has happened on St Patrick's Day in previous years. I am not sure whether I can be there before St Patrick's Day. I suspect that, even if I were there, it may not totally influence what is going on or what might go on. Suffice it to say, let us hope that the behaviour that has been witnessed there in the past is not a feature this year, and that people show respect and regard for others.

Housing Executive Maintenance Delays

T7. Mr Frew asked the Minister for Social Development whether Housing Executive maintenance and capital delays are unique to the North Antrim constituency, where there have been massive delays over the last number of years, some of which have lasted for over a year and a half and counting, including roofing schemes in Ballykeel and Harryville and some external works in Cullybackey and Ballymena north; and whether he will investigate these delays. (AQT 3427/11-16)

2.45 pm

Lord Morrow: I do not think that those delays are unique to North Antrim. Having said that, I do not say that they are on a par with everywhere else. If the Member wants to come and talk to me, write to me or send me a question about it, I will get a look at it and see exactly what is going on in the North Antrim constituency that he cherishes so much. If there is something unique about the delays in North Antrim, we will take action to change it.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Time is up. I remind Members to keep their questions short and then, perhaps, more people will have an opportunity to ask questions.

Agriculture and Rural Development

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Questions 1 and 9 have been withdrawn.

Farming: Administrative Burden

2. Mr Cochrane-Watson asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development by how much her Department has reduced the administrative burden on farmers and agrifood businesses since 2007. (AQO 9538/11-16)

Mrs O'Neill (The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development): A well-regulated industry is vital in underpinning trade and, increasingly, it is a strength that the agrifood industry is exploiting in securing new export markets.

Following a joint DARD/DOE review of better regulation in 2009-2010, DARD implemented an action plan, taking forward 61 recommendations, to reduce the administrative burden on the agrifood sector. By 2013, a 10-4% reduction had been achieved. Since 2013, we have continued to make good progress. Most notable is the recent achievement of official brucellosis-free status, allowing the relaxation of controls and leading to savings in compliance costs for the primary production sector of £7 million per annum, as well as £8 million in savings for the taxpayer. Another area where we have progressed is in completion of land eligibility inspections by remote sensing, using satellite imagery rather than by on-farm inspections. In 2015, DARD completed 86% of basic payment scheme inspections using remote sensing.

Despite my desire for a simpler CAP regime, the new schemes are greater in number and more complex to administer. However, my officials are working to ensure that they are as easy as possible to understand, with information and tools available to help farmers and others comply with the least amount of bureaucracy attached as possible. I have also made a separate approach to Commissioner Hogan in Brussels in an attempt to make the penalty regime applied in cases of over-declaration in some schemes as simple as possible. I am pleased that there has been some movement on this with the latest announcements from the Commissioner.

I want to continue to focus on ensuring that complying with rules and accessing services is further simplified. The continued roll-out of enhanced digital services with appropriate support will speed up processing and help customers' businesses to succeed.

Mr Cochrane-Watson: I thank the Minister for her response. However, many farmers will be sorely disappointed that there has been an abject failure by the Department to reduce its own administration costs. Previous targets, such as those contained in the 2007-2011 Programme for Government have now been abandoned. Does the Minister feel that it is acceptable that the total DARD administration bill is now over £45 million centrally in this financial year, as supplied by DFP, compared to a reduction of £5 million five years ago?

Mrs O'Neill: I note that your party has taken up this issue and run with it in the media, using figures that it has manipulated for its own benefit to try to pull a headline out of it. I am very happy to explain to the Member the difference in the figures that we are talking about. If he is asking me whether I am apologetic for putting more resources into services that help us to deliver farmers' payments, I am not.

Mr McAleer: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I note and welcome that, in the Minister's response, she expressed a desire for less bureaucracy and more simplification. In that context, will she consider making provision for part payments?

Mrs O'Neill: We all recognise that it has been an extremely difficult year for all sectors across the farming industry. I will do anything I can. A lot of these things are commercial matters and lie outside my Department's control, but some things are within my control and one of them is ensuring that we pay the maximum number of people. Year-on-year, we have seen improvements in the number of people we have been able to pay in December. I want to put on record that I give credit to all the staff, who, in comparison with all other paying agencies on these islands, have outperformed by ensuring that we have paid 96% of people at this stage. I think that all credit is due to the staff involved in delivering that work.

I also indicated, as the Member said, that part payment is an issue that the industry has consistently asked me to look at, and my focus initially was on making sure that we maximised the payments and increased the numbers inspected with remote sensing. Now that we have been able to do that, I have told officials that my intention is to make sure that we can get to a position where we will make part payments, up to 50% of direct payments, on 16 October, following submission of the single application form. That option, as I said, has not been available until now. I think it is good news for the industry going forward that we will be able to come to the scenario where we will be able to make advance payments to about 80% of eligible farmers in October.

That said, us being able to deliver on that promise will very much come down to working with the industry itself. I need more farmers to apply online. The application process for this year is coming up very shortly. My clear message to the industry is this: help me to help you. The more applications we receive online, the better. Ideally, we would want over 70% to be made online. Last year, there was a significant improvement; I think the figure was over 40%. If we can increase that again this year, the Department will be in a position to deliver those part payments in October.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): I call Mr Declan McAleer. I am being too generous. I call Mr Jim Allister.

Mr Allister: If the Minister's blind enthusiasm for the EU permits her, will she undertake to publish a schedule of all the administrative burdens and regulations placed upon the farming community and identify which originate in the EU and which originate in her Department? Will she undertake to do that or would that come too close to exposing the hideous burden that the EU puts upon our farmers?

Mrs O'Neill: That is not even a problem. I do not have a problem setting out very clearly what legislation we work under within the EU, but I also do not have a problem with publishing the benefits that our industry receives from the EU, particularly the single farm payments, the rural development programme, the Peace programmes — the list goes on. I am very happy to publish all that information because it is important that you look at the situation in the round.

There are diktats from Europe that we find very difficult to administer and that we find are very difficult for the farming industry in particular. Is there room for improvement? Absolutely. It is our job to do that; we are elected to do that job, and our MEPs are elected to do that job. We have a job of work to do in reforming the EU. Let us take on that challenge, and let us not rob our rural industry and agrifood sector of much-needed support.

If you look at the most recent statistics on farm incomes, you will see that, without the subsidy and support, farmers would have been in a negative situation. There would not have been one penny of profit; there would have been a negative loss-making scenario. I think that, when we look at the future within Europe, we need to look at it in the round and at the benefits that are there for our local industry.

Mr Beggs: The Minister was unapologetic about increased administrative costs. With a reducing budget and the efficiency savings that we are hearing about, one would expect the administrative burden to go down. Does she accept that farmers expect to get a higher percentage of the funding, rather than it being absorbed by administrative burdens?

Mrs O'Neill: Farmers and the rural community at large can be very confident in knowing that I have delivered the largest ever rural development programme that has been seen in the North. I think that in itself speaks volumes about my commitment and about how I deliver for farmers and rural dwellers.

Where the admin costs are concerned, I am very happy to provide a breakdown of the figures that have been set out and the £5 million that your party is referring to. It is not as simple as subtracting one figure from another, as your party has done. I am very happy to explain the difference in the baseline figures and the figures that they were compared with. I will provide the stats to you in writing, rather than go through them now, but I can give you the headline figure of £2.5 million for depreciation in Land and Property Services valuation. It is very simply explained. I stand over my point that I am not apologetic about putting in more admin resources to make sure that we paid the maximum number of people their single farm payment in December. We delivered on that, and now 96% are paid as a result of my refocusing and making sure that I had enough people on the front line to be able to deliver the money.

Brexit: CAP Contingency Plans

3. Mr Lunn asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development what discussions she has had with her counterparts in London and Edinburgh concerning contingency plans in the event of the withdrawal of payments to farmers under the common agricultural policy should the UK vote to leave the European Union. (AQO 9539/11-16)

Mrs O'Neill: First, a referendum in favour of Brexit would be disastrous for agriculture and rural development in the North because it would hinder access to vital EU markets and lead to reduced agricultural support. That is a point I have made consistently in the House.

As for contingency planning, if there were a Brexit scenario, notification would be submitted to the EU. It would take up to two years following that for a withdrawal to be complete, and I am told that that number of years can be extended. The period between the decision to withdraw and the withdrawal actually taking effect would be used to negotiate the terms of withdrawal from the EU. It would also be used by the Assembly to negotiate with the British Government on what contingency plans might be developed to replace existing EU rules and financial support systems following EU withdrawal.

Over the 2014-2020 EU budget period, pillar 1 payments to our farmers would amount to €2.3 billion. In addition, €228 million of EU funds is devoted to our rural development programme, resulting in a total planned expenditure under CAP of €2.53 billion. Importantly, the Assembly could not maintain this level of funding unless additional funds were provided by the Treasury. The British Government have consistently pushed for reductions in the support going to farmers and rural development under the CAP. They do not regard that spending as value for money, so I believe that the Treasury would be unsympathetic to our calls for some of the money saved from withdrawing as a member state from the EU to be used to maintain support to farmers and rural communities. A significant reduction in direct support would leave many of our farmers in real and long-term financial difficulty. A reduction of funding for farmers and rural communities would have knock-on effects for the environment.

Mr Lunn: I thank the Minister for that answer. Frankly, she has more less answered any supplementary that I might have come up with. However, for the benefit of others who are present, does she agree with me that this would be an absolute disaster for Northern Ireland and that the British Government would have neither the will nor the ability to replace the payments like for like?

Mrs O'Neill: Yes, I totally agree with that. As I said, we are talking about €2.53 billion of supports for the agrifood sector and rural communities. The current Tory Government have no intention to replace that. We have seen cuts to our block grant year on year. If those are the projections for the future, I do not hold out much hope with the Tories, who have an ideological position opposed to subsidy. They have been trying to reduce year on year. They voted against the financial package in Europe. They voted to reduce the payments that go to the farming and rural sectors. I am not confident about what they would bring into place.

I have consistently said that the biggest concern that the industry has is that there are so many uncertainties. We do not know what the future holds. We do not know what a post-Brexit situation would look like. Without all those certainties, it is hard for anybody to make a rational choice going forward. However, €2.53 billion is significant and speaks volumes on what it means to our local economy, what it means to the agrifood sector and what it means to everybody: if farmers are not subsidised to produce food, all consumers will pay more for food that we will have to import from other countries. Where do we get that from if we cannot trade openly and freely in Europe? We need to consider a number of significant challenges in terms of where we are and how things will be in the future in a Brexit situation.

Mr Campbell: Does the Minister not agree that talking about nightmare situations in the context of a Brexit position does not help the discussion, which should be a rational discussion of whether the UK and Northern Ireland as part of the UK stay in Europe or leave it? The uncertainty about the financial assistance that may be on offer to our farming communities, which she rightly talked about, exists equally whether we stay in Europe or leave it.

Mrs O'Neill: I have made my position clear: we need to have a rational discussion. We need to up the ante in having the debate. We have had this discussion at each of my last two or three Question Times. We need a real and meaningful debate around our future, but €2.53 billion of investment in our local economy speaks volumes. Agrifood is the mainstay of our local economy. It is one of the main drivers of growth. The stats around farm incomes that were published towards the end of last week clearly point to the fact that, without that subsidy and that payment going to farmers and rural people, they would be in a negative situation. We need to be serious about what this means.

I think that we all can agree that Europe needs to be reformed — absolutely. We can all stand and say that there is room for improvement of some of the regulations, the red tape and everything that goes with it, but we were elected to do that job. It is our job to make sure that we challenge where things are not right and could be made better. I was able to successfully challenge on CAP reform for some simplification around greening, so we can point to examples of where we have been able to make a difference. I am elected to do a job. I am the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development. I will fight my corner for the local industry in Europe. That is what I should be doing. That is the job that I concern myself with. I am 100% concerned, as are the industry and the business community, about what a post-Brexit situation would mean. If we take it purely in terms of the agrifood sector and the rural economy, it would be a significant blow if we were to withdraw from Europe.

3.00 pm

Ms McCorley: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as a freagraí go dtí seo. I thank the Minister for her answers thus far. What is the current level of trade between the North and other EU regions?

Mrs O'Neill: The latest available figures indicate that 73% — again, this points to the significance of trading in Europe — of our agrifood and drinks-processing sector trading was to destinations outside the North of Ireland. In terms of exports from the North, 60% of exports of all goods and 90% of food and drink exports go to other EU countries. Therefore, it is no exaggeration to say that the EU markets are critical for the North's agrifood industry.

As well as the trade in processed food products, there are high levels of live animal and raw milk trade across the border with the South. In 2015 alone, almost 28,000 live cattle came North, while 332,000 sheep and around 20% of milk produced in the North went South. When you look at the stats, even those that have been very quickly put together, you see how important the implications for trade will be in a post-Brexit situation. Our level of trade in the EU is so significant to our local industry. Those are the factors that we need to take into consideration when it comes to deciding on our future.

Wind Energy

4. Ms Maeve McLaughlin asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development for an update on her plans to use the forest estate for the development of wind energy. (AQO 9540/11-16)

Mrs O'Neill: A strategic outline case to support the work of Forest Service to commercialise its wind potential has already been approved. I am pleased to report that the next stages of business case work will be presented to me shortly for consideration. It will inform how best to commercialise the potential that exists on the forestry estate. There have been significant policy changes in the renewables area throughout 2015 locally and at Westminster, which has led to inevitable delays as Forest Service considers how best to integrate the changes into its proposals. The proposals coming forward now have taken the changes into consideration. Clearly, revenues for my Department or, indeed, communities will be dependent on sites becoming operational. I am sure that you would all welcome, as I do, the opportunity to generate revenue from public assets, particularly given the current budgetary situation that we find ourselves in.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Before taking a supplementary, I appeal to Members to check their mobile phones, please. There is significant feedback, and that, of course, affects the recording equipment.

Ms Maeve McLaughlin: Go raibh maith agat. I thank the Minister for her answer. Specifically in light of policy changes, how does the Department now intend to manage the environmental impacts of wind farm developments?

Mrs O'Neill: Obviously, wind farm development is subject to robust planning assessment by the councils or DOE, depending on the scale of the development. Planning consideration is against robust planning policies, and each proposal on the forest estate will be subject to a full environmental impact assessment. As with any planning application, interested parties have the opportunity to raise concerns or objections. Wind energy development on the forest estate is likely to involve some felling of trees in the immediate environment of turbines to accommodate the installation of wind farm infrastructure. Any of our proposals will be assessed against environmental standards and the planning standards that already exist for wind farms. In assessing the forest estate for wind energy potential, my Department has shown leadership. As part of its process, Forest Service has excluded environmentally designated areas such as special protection areas, known as SPAs.

All-island Animal Health and Welfare Strategy

5. Mr G Kelly asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development to outline the achievements of the all-island animal health and welfare strategy. (AQO 9541/11-16)

Mrs O'Neill: I welcome the progress to date of the all-island animal health and welfare strategy, which has the wide support of industry on the island and is an excellent example of what can be achieved if we take a joined-up approach. It provides a valuable forum that enables discussion and practical cooperation on a wide range of animal health and welfare issues. Positive outcomes include cooperation on contingency planning for exotic disease outbreaks; agreement on a common chapter in the respective epizootic contingency plans for foot-and-mouth disease, avian influenza, African horse sickness and bluetongue; cooperation on testing regimes for TB and brucellosis in border areas; cooperation in relation to the exchange of data to facilitate trade in bovine animals, following the lifting of the BSE export ban; the development of a largely similar system of sheep identification; and the introduction of a BVD programme that will require herdkeepers to tag and test all new born calves for BVD in the North.

That will put herdkeepers here on an equal footing with those in the South, where a BVD eradication programme is already in place.

Officially brucellosis-free (OBF) status was approved by the EU Commission, which means that OBF status has been achieved in both jurisdictions. Attaining OBF status has allowed me to further relax our testing regime in the North.

All of those examples demonstrate that there are considerable benefits resulting from the strategy in animal health and welfare on the whole of the island. Those can help to protect us from disease outbreaks that may have serious consequences for trade and public health. There is an ongoing and active work programme in place, supported by close cooperation from officials, to help ensure the delivery of the strategy.

Mr G Kelly: Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as a freagraí go dtí seo. I thank the Minister for her answer, which was very comprehensive. Will she elaborate on the ultimate aim of the strategy that she just outlined?

Mrs O'Neill: The ultimate aim of the strategy is to develop policies that will facilitate free movement of animals across this island. In implementing the strategy, both Administrations are guided by a number of key principles, including the achievement or maintenance of consistently high standards of animal health and welfare, improved public health and effective capacity to deal with emergencies within a policy framework. To work towards that aim, three key strategic areas have been identified: partnership; further cooperation on trade, animal identification and movement policies; and further cooperation on developing disease control and animal welfare policies.

Mr Irwin: The Minister talks about an all-Ireland animal health strategy. Does she accept that the Irish Republic has reduced TB to a much lower level than that in Northern Ireland through a badger cull and a deer cull? Have the Minister and her officials looked at how the Irish Republic has been able to reduce TB levels? Will she take the same action?

Mrs O'Neill: The levels in the South are different to our levels, but they are not consistent across the board so, depending on the area you are looking at, there might be higher or lower levels.

The Member knows that there is no simple solution to TB. There is no quick fix, because if there were I would have done it long before now. Looking towards all our neighbours and across Europe, nobody has a simple solution.

We are working our way through a number of areas of work, and you will be well aware of the work of the TB strategic partnership group, which is looking at TB in the round. It is looking at all the contributory factors, including the wildlife issue and the issue of compensation. That group will report to me; it has reported on an interim basis and it will report to me again in the next number of months in relation to a firm strategic approach.

We all share the same aim of eradicating the disease. We have been very successful with brucellosis, and I hope to get to the stage where we are as successful in relation to TB. The strategic approach that we are adopting as a result of the work of the partnership will be key to us being able to deliver.

Mrs McKeivitt: I thank the Minister for her answers thus far. In your answer to the substantive question, you said that the strategy is a fine example of what can be achieved by using a joint approach. What discussions are under way to merge other areas of agricultural policy on an all-island basis?

Mrs O'Neill: We have the North/South Ministerial Council, which recently met, and we look at a number of key areas where we can cooperate. Animal health and plant health are obviously key areas, and we also look at the implications for trade, our engagement with Europe and marketing. One of the new bodies being established under the Going for Growth strategy is the new marketing body, which will have very close links with Bord Bia to work together on getting what we have to offer into new markets. Whether a calf is born in Tyrone or Cork, it is a high-quality product that we can market across the world together.

There are quite a number of areas where that collaboration is ongoing, particularly in plant health in relation to some of the challenges that we have with plant disease. There is quite a broad range of work being done, and I want to continue working with the Department in the Twenty-six Counties to find new areas of cooperation. It is fair to say that we have very strong links. Particularly in relation to research, there are really good opportunities with the Agri-Food and Biosciences Institute (AFBI) and the College of Health and Agricultural Sciences in the Twenty-six Counties, which we are exploring.

Mr Lyttle: Will the Minister provide an update on the review of the Welfare of Animals Act?

Mrs O'Neill: That is not really relevant to the substantive question, but I can give the Member an update. As he will be aware, I have corresponded with Minister Ford on the sentencing issue. He has agreed to take that forward, so we are progressing some of the main asks from the review. A number of recommendations were put forward, and I think that we can deliver on all of those. It is important that we send the very strong message that we will not tolerate animal cruelty, that we have some of the strongest legislation on these islands and that there are proper deterrents in place. I believe that the initiative that Mr Ford and I have taken will lead to that situation.

Rural Development Programme

6. Mr Dunne asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development when the rural development programme will be open for applications. (AQO 9542/11-16)

Mrs O'Neill: The European Commission has approved our proposals for a rural development programme (RDP) worth up to £623 million. That is an increase in funding of almost 16% from the current programme and gives us our largest ever RDP.

We are rolling out the programme in a staged and coordinated way. Two months ago, I launched several major programmes within the RDP. The first phase of the farm business improvement scheme — the business development groups scheme — opened in November 2015. Over 3,000 applications were received. The farm business improvement scheme will be a package of measures aimed at knowledge transfer, cooperation, innovation and capital investment, and it will help to support sustainable growth in the sector. The first phase focuses on knowledge transfer. With a funding allocation of £28 million, it is intended to help farmers to identify their needs clearly ahead of any capital investment and to make informed decisions about developing their business.

The LEADER programme, which includes £70 million of funding to support rural communities, is also under way. Opening for applications under LEADER is a two-stage process. The first stage is for local action groups (LAG) to hold funding workshops. Those events have already started and will increase over the next month.

Up to £17.4 million has been allocated for forestry grant schemes, which I also launched last November.

I shall also make available £10 million for a rural tourism scheme. A business case for the scheme is under way, and we are working to ensure that we open our first call for applications in March or April. We are continuing to develop the business case for further schemes, including the capital investment schemes and the environmental farming scheme. I hope to announce the timetable for opening further RDP schemes before the conclusion of the current mandate.

Mr Dunne: I thank the Minister for her answer and the information that she has given today. Does she recognise the need for prompt action on the programme, given that farmers who are desperate to gain financial support see it as an opportunity to diversify and, in many ways, develop their supporting business?

Mrs O'Neill: Yes, as I said in the conclusion of my answer, I have already launched a swathe of funding opportunities for the wider agrifood and rural sector, particularly the grants. The first phase of the farm business improvement scheme is under way, and I hope to be in a position to launch the scheme itself over the next short while. I know that farmers keenly await its launch, but it is not the only scheme. It is very important that we open up the LEADER scheme as well. I hope to be able to support the LAGS in opening their call for applications so that they can go live over the next number of weeks. We would certainly like all LAGS to have opened up for calls by mid-March.

Quite a large number of schemes have been opened. It is the most significant and largest rural development programme that we have ever achieved. My priority is making sure that we get the spend on the ground as quickly as possible.

Mr McCarthy: What provision has the Minister made for increasing the availability of shared space in the rural development programme?

Mrs O'Neill: There will be opportunities under the rural development programme through the LEADER approach. It will look at basic services and shared services, and at how those applications have a grass-roots, bottom-up approach. The Department does not tell communities what they need; the beauty of the rural development programme is that the community identifies a project or something that they want to take forward and applies to it. There will be lots of opportunities in all the measures within the programme for shared space projects to come forward.

Young Farmers' Scheme

7. Mr Flanagan asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development for an update on the success of the young farmers' scheme. (AQO 9543/11-16)

Mrs O'Neill: The young farmers' payment is providing young farmers with a valuable incentive to take full responsibility for a farm business. In 2015, the number of applications received demonstrated the commitment of the sector to the regeneration and development of the local industry.

The young farmers' payment attracted 2,086 applications. I can confirm that 1,776 applications have been processed and decisions issued. Over 80% were successful. Applicants who were not successful can seek a review of the decision or make a fresh application this year. Approximately 500 young farmers are undertaking the level 2 qualification with the College of Agriculture, Food and Rural Enterprise (CAFRE), which shows that there is still significant interest in the young farmers' scheme going forward into next year, even for those who did not succeed this year.

3.15 pm

Mr Flanagan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as ucht a freagra. I thank the Minister for her answer. Can she elaborate on the comment she made about the review, which is open to appeal, and when it will conclude? Can she also provide an update on the processing of outstanding applications with regards to the discrepancies with active farmers?

Mrs O'Neill: Yes. With the review, young farmers have an opportunity to go through a two-stage appeal. They all take different lengths of time. I could not give a definitive length of time, but suffice it to say we know how important it is for their payments to be processed in as speedy a manner as possible.

Where active farmers are concerned, letters were issued to just over 3,000 businesses giving a deadline of 3 August last year to produce evidence, I suppose, to clarify that they were, in fact, active farmers. Two hundred and forty-nine businesses that did not respond to the active farmer letter were subsequently rejected for not providing any type of evidence of activity. Administrative and technical assessments of the responses are ongoing. All businesses that received a request for additional evidence must have submitted it by 29 January. We had a significant number of people do that by last week, and we hope to have those all turned around and payments made by March.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Order. Time is up for listed questions. We now move on to topical questions. Mr Edwin Poots is not in his place.

Rural Needs Bill

T2. Ms Ruane asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development what difference her rural proofing Bill will make to our rural communities. (AQT 3432/11-16)

Mrs O'Neill: Absolutely, and I am so delighted that we will be able, hopefully, to get the Bill to Final Stage before the end of the mandate. It is a significant Bill, in that it aims to promote a fair and inclusive rural society by ensuring that the consideration of rural needs is embedded in government policymaking and service delivery. The Member will know that the legislation places a duty on public authorities to take into account rural needs when developing, adopting, implementing or revising policies, strategies and plans and when designing and delivering public services. Whilst I think that all Departments have been signed up to rural proofing since 2002, the Bill goes that stage further and makes sure that it compels all Departments to give due consideration to policy or strategic changes that will have an impact on the lives of people in rural areas. Going forward, we want to make sure that rural people can be assured that the Executive and Departments will prioritise and make sure that they take proper account of their needs. For me, this legislation has been a priority in safeguarding the rights of rural communities.

Ms Ruane: Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as an fhreagra sin. I thank the Minister for her answer. Will she outline when she expects the Bill to have completed the legislative process?

Mrs O'Neill: Some considered amendments have been put forward by the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development that further reaffirm the Bill's broad principles. I am seeking the Executive's support to include them in the legislation. With Consideration Stage and Further Consideration Stage being proposed for February, I expect that the Bill will complete its passage in the Assembly by the start of March. I am certainly looking forward to being able to say that we have delivered it to protect the rights of rural dwellers.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Question 3 has been withdrawn.

Rivers Agency Headquarters: Construction Progress

T4. Mr I McCreá asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development for an update on progress on the Rivers Agency headquarters at Loughry, following her announcement in July 2015 that the contract had been awarded to QMAC Construction, with the hope that, as she has loads of notes and Post-its, she will have an answer to this constituency-based question. (AQT 3434/11-16)

Mrs O'Neill: I am delighted that the project is going full steam ahead. The old premises were demolished and building work is starting. It will deliver 80 public-sector jobs into the mid-Ulster area. It is obviously part of my wider project to decentralise the Department. That means the whole of the Department, with the headquarters going to Ballykelly, Forest Service going to Fermanagh, fisheries going to Down and Rivers Agency headquarters going to Loughry. I was delighted that, as a result of the tender process, a local company also achieved the work. That will create local employment and bring ongoing benefits, such as increased footfall in the Cookstown area. All those benefits, I think, are brilliant. It gives more people an opportunity to access a public-sector job, because we are taking a whole Department out of Belfast.

Mr I McCrea: Is the Minister therefore content that everything is going according to schedule and that there will not be any slippages? I had a conversation with her regarding Gas to the West. Has the Department or the construction company had any contact with either DETI or the people involved with the Gas to the West project to ensure that the heating system is up to standard when gas passes that way?

Mrs O'Neill: All those things are taken into consideration when you are designing a new build. I will confirm that for you in writing, but I am quite sure that it has been a factor. Gas to the West will benefit not just Rivers Agency headquarters but all businesses in the area that are struggling. The sooner we can get it, the better, but it is a number of years down the line. As with any new build, we will build in flexibility so that we are able to adjust when we have gas in the west.

Food Produce and Meat: All-island Label

T5. Mr McElduff asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development whether we are any closer to developing an all-island label for food produce and meat. (AQT 3435/11-16)

Mrs O'Neill: Yes. To set it out clearly, farmers across this island produce a product, and its quality, traceability and high standards are recognised worldwide. When we go out to seek new markets, we can always stand over that very high quality. The Member will remember the issue of nomadic cattle, which pointed out, in the first instance, the issue of labelling. I have focused on resolving that issue since EU country-of-origin labelling began to take effect on this island. That had a major implication for all-island trade of cattle, due to the penalties being imposed on beef processors in the North. Since then, the regulations have been extended to other produce, including lamb, pork and poultry, and that is having a specific impact on the North/South trade in lamb. I have met the marts, processors and farmers who have been impacted and have made representations to Minister Truss, the Minister for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs in London, Minister Coveney in Dublin and Commissioner Hogan in Brussels. Minister Truss and Commissioner Hogan recognise the impact that the regulations are having on the island of Ireland, due to the anomaly of partition, and have offered their support in us securing a resolution with our colleagues in the South by way of an island-of-Ireland food label.

Mr McElduff: I thank the Minister for her answer. How would she characterise Minister Coveney's attitude to the debate? Might the North/South Ministerial Council provide further opportunities to pursue the matter in the future?

Mrs O'Neill: Yes. It has been disappointing, to say the least, that we have not been able to resolve the issue more speedily. It certainly has not been for the want of trying by me. Given that we have DEFRA and the European Commissioner on board, it is unfortunate that Minister Coveney has not got on board and shown leadership with me in assisting the industry to deliver an all-island label. The island-of-Ireland food label that I referred to in the initial answer would solve the issue for the beef sector and other sectors that are impacted as a result of country-of-origin labelling. So I hope that Minister Coveney will join me in showing that leadership and in trying to resolve an issue that has had, and will have, an impact across all sectors.

We have a traditional trade pattern on this island, whether it be for beef, poultry, pork or dairy. All sectors have a traditional trade pattern. That has been going on for a considerable time. It is important that we remove any barriers to trade, whether that be North/South or South/North. I hope that Minister Coveney will join me in accepting an invitation that we received recently from the South's key farming representatives — the marts, the processors and the farmers— because that will be an opportunity for us to jointly show leadership and to jointly press the need for the issue to be resolved. I believe that there is a solution to it. It is just about having other Ministers involved in taking it forward.

Transatlantic Trade and Investment Partnership

T6. Mr Ó Muilleoir asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development to spell out the implications of the transatlantic trade and investment partnership (TTIP) to the agricultural industry across the island. (AQT 3436/11-16)

Mrs O'Neill: I have always said that I have grave concerns about how those negotiations have been advanced. They have been taken forward in a secret nature that runs contrary to democratic transparency. More importantly, there are potential threats to agriculture here and across Europe. The net impact of TTIP is likely to be in favour of US farmers, especially on beef, if tariffs are fully removed and if there are significant reductions in non-tariff barriers.

There are also anticipated risks for the pork and poultry sectors. Furthermore, TTIP has the potential to lower production standards. Some agricultural organisations have consulted their members on issues such as the use of chemical rinses and sprays in the decontamination of meat, which are currently banned in the EU.

That highlights the growing pressure that farmers feel to decimate their standards. Farmers fear that they will be backed into a corner — degrade their product now or risk being frozen out of the market later. Therefore, I have to question the potential impact of that trade deal on food safety and on the EU's quality From Farm to Fork policy. The first-class reputation that we have will be severely impacted on as a result of a TTIP negotiation, particularly one done in secret and not in a transparent manner.

Mr Ó Muilleoir: Go raibh maith agat. Mo bhuíochas fosta leis an Aire as an fhreagra sin. Minister, you have been a formidable advocate and battler for the fishing industry and the dairy industry, but what can you do to oppose the Transatlantic Trade and Investment Partnership as a Minister in this small part of the world?

Mrs O'Neill: It is an issue that is regularly discussed with myself and other Ministers in these islands. I recently met Martina Anderson, our own MEP, to discuss her concerns on the significant impact that she and I believe TTIP would have if implemented. I also recently raised the issue with DEFRA and with Liz Truss, the agriculture Minister, to set out my concerns about TTIP. I took up the issue with Commissioner Phil Hogan to highlight the concerns that we have in relation to the environment, workers' rights, consumer confidence and public services.

Whilst it is unlikely that a TTIP deal will be concluded any time in the near future, we need to continue to monitor developments and exert our influence from an early stage and make sure that we use all avenues open to us to lobby on our behalf.

Beef Prices

T7. Mr Beggs asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development, given that beef prices being offered to local farmers are considerably less than those being offered to farmers in Scotland, which is literally a few miles away across the Irish Sea, what actions she and her Department are taking to reduce that disparity and to improve the income of local farmers. (AQT 3437/11-16)

Mrs O'Neill: It is sometimes hard to compare the prices that our farmers receive with Scotland or even the South. That can be for a combination of reasons, such as exchange rate factors or supply and demand issues. A lot of those are outside my control in that they are commercial matters.

For my part, my role is to deliver where I can. That is making sure that we get single-farm payments out as quickly as possible and looking for new market opportunities, which we have been successful in doing over the last number of years. We will continue to do that because part of our strategy for the industry to be sustainable and grow is looking for new market opportunities. Price volatility will always be an issue. The most significant thing that the Executive can do to help the industry is to open markets, which creates more opportunities and guards against volatility.

Alongside that is to work with farmers on their individual efficiency. We have a farm business improvement scheme coming online, which will help us to support farmers to become more efficient on-farm, thereby reducing their costs and, hopefully, adding to their profits. There is a combination of issues, and a combination of ways that we can help the industry, not just the beef sector but all the other sectors that are struggling.

Mr Beggs: One issue that I have heard referred to has been discontinuity of supply. Are the Minister and her Department talking with the farming industry and food processors so that there is a better supply chain to enable them to reach UK mainland prices, which have generally been the highest of this region, and that we do not just look South but where there is the highest return for local farmers?

Mrs O'Neill: I think that I just addressed the issues that you raise. It is about looking for new markets, helping people to be more efficient, and fairness in the supply chain, which is one of the issues that you touched on. I have been the champion of making sure that there is fairness in the supply chain. The cornerstone of the Going for Growth strategy to help the industry is recognition that there is only one supply chain. To that end, I established a supply chain forum, which is about challenging the relationships, forward thinking and planning, and communication from the farmer to the processor, the retailer and the big chains. Without that proper conversation and ongoing forward planning with farmers, we will always find ourselves in a challenging situation. Alongside opening up new markets, helping farmers to be efficient, providing advice, establishing business development groups and all our investments in rural communities, it is important that we continue to challenge that relationship and work with the industry — initially, it is an industry issue — on making the supply chain effective so that all its elements get to enjoy the risk and the benefits.

3.30 pm

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): I call Mr Chris Lyttle for a very short topical question.

Cairn Wood

T8. Mr Lyttle asked the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development whether she would be willing to meet him to discuss the potential transfer of Cairn Wood to DARD's Forest Service. (AQT 3438/11-16)

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Minister, can you make that equally short?

Mrs O'Neill: Yes.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Members, before we move on to the next item of business, you will want to take your ease while we change the top Table.

(Mr Speaker in the Chair)

Private Members' Business

Assembly and Executive Reform (Assembly Opposition) Bill: Consideration Stage

Mr Speaker: I inform the House that a valid petition of concern has been received in relation to clauses 13 and 21 and schedule 1. I must, therefore, advise the House that today's proceedings on the Bill will stop after the Question that clause 12 stand part.

The group 1 debate may proceed as normal, after which the Question on the amendments and the clauses stand part will be put until we reach clause 13. At that point, today's proceedings on the Bill will conclude.

Members will understand that there is clear procedural precedent for considering Bills in a strict sequential order. Tabling a petition of concern is a significant matter and has consequences if tabled on the day that a vote is scheduled to take place. I will therefore ask the Business Committee to reconvene at an appropriate opportunity to consider the scheduling of business as a consequence. I will move on.

Mr Allister: On a point of order, Mr Speaker. Can you clarify, in relation to the delay in the vote, which I understand is specified, whether 24 hours have to pass from the lodging of the petition until the vote takes place, or can it happen the next day, even though that is less than a 24-hour gap?

Mr Speaker: That is exactly the question that I asked as well. There is clear precedent for operating on the basis of the next day. The Business Committee can consider that in terms of how we proceed from this point onwards. So, it does not have to be 24 hours, and there is precedent in that respect.

We are at the Consideration Stage of the Assembly and Executive Reform (Assembly Opposition) Bill. I call the sponsor, Mr John McCallister, to move the Bill.

Moved. — [Mr McCallister.]

Mr Speaker: Members will have a copy of the Marshalled List of amendments detailing the order for consideration. The amendments have been grouped for debate in my provisional grouping of amendments selected list. There are two groups of amendments, and we will debate the amendments in each group in turn. The first debate will be on amendment Nos 1 to 29 and on opposition to clauses 1 to 24 stand part, which deal with proposed arrangements for an opposition contained in the clauses of the Bill. The second debate will be on amendment Nos 30 to 40, which deal with the content of an Assembly and Executive reform motion contained in the schedule to the Bill.

I remind Members intending to speak that, during the debates on the two groups of amendments, they should address all the amendments in each group on which they wish to comment. Once the debate on each group is completed, any further amendments in the group will be moved formally as we go through the Bill, and the Question will be put on each without further debate. The Question on stand part will be taken at the appropriate points in the Bill. If all that is clear, we shall proceed.

Clause 1 (Purpose)

Mr Speaker: We now come to the first group of amendments for debate. Mr Raymond McCartney has signalled his intention to oppose the Question that clause 1 stand part of the Bill. With that Question, it will be convenient to debate amendment Nos 1 to 29 and the opposition to clauses 2 to 24 stand part. These amendments relate to the proposed arrangements for an opposition, opposition to an Assembly and Executive reform motion and a Budget Committee.

I point out that amendment No 1 is mutually exclusive with amendment Nos 2 and 3, amendment No 5 is mutually exclusive with amendment No 6, amendment No 14 is mutually exclusive with amendment No 15, amendment No 27 is mutually exclusive with amendment No 28, and amendment No 8 is mutually exclusive with clause 5 stand part. I will remind Members at that point.

Mr Speaker: I call Caitríona Ruane to address opposition to clause 1, the amendments and the opposition to clauses 2 to 24 stand part of the Bill.

Ms Ruane: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Sinn Féin believes that the Fresh Start Agreement, published on 16 November 2015, makes provision for parties elected to the Assembly to form an opposition. These provisions do not impinge upon the principles of equality, inclusiveness and representativeness underpinned in the Good Friday Agreement (GFA) and, subsequently, in the St Andrews and Hillsborough agreements.

The provisions for an opposition outlined in the Fresh Start Agreement do not require, in our view, any legislative change. We have heard in the media and will, no doubt, hear today from some parties that they want to be in opposition, yet they still have their seats in the Executive. Some would say that that is abdicating responsibility. Sometimes, the debate around the need for opposition is anchored or based in majority rule or majoritarianism. Any structure of governance depends on the circumstances. We have the arrangements in place that best suit our needs, and we are a society coming out of conflict. The safeguards in the Good Friday Agreement are there for very good reasons.

I believe that my colleague from South Down John McCallister came to this with good intention, but the outworking of his Bill could lead to majoritarianism and the potential undermining of the Good Friday Agreement. Sinn Féin would like to put on record that we have engaged with John at every step of the way. There are many things that we can support in his Bill, but we do not believe that we need legislation to do them. In fact, the vast majority can be done through Standing Orders. The Assembly Business Committee today agreed to put a motion from the Executive Committee for a statement from the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister of proposed entitlements of an official opposition.

In the Assembly and Executive Review Committee, we listened to evidence from a wide range of sources, and many academics and experts queried and raised concerns about aspects of the Bill. I will use one example, and that is from Professor Coakley. In his evidence to the Assembly and Executive Review Committee, he said:

"The result risks being some kind of Frankenstein's monster with key principles in the majoritarian model grafted onto a body that is essentially consensus based or consociational in conception."

To conclude, we believe that the Fresh Start provisions for an official opposition are the best and most appropriate approach on the issue. Sinn Féin, therefore, supports the provision for an official opposition, as set out in the Fresh Start Agreement.

In relation to the Assembly Opposition Bill, throughout Committee Stage, Sinn Féin outlined its concerns that aspects of the Bill can and do impact on the principles of equality, inclusiveness and representativeness, as set out in the GFA. As Sinn Féin supports the provisions for opposition in the Fresh Start Agreement, we do not support the Assembly Opposition Bill. We will vote against it, and, in particular, we have lodged petitions of concern, along with the SDLP, to clauses 13 to 21 and also the schedule, because of our view that they could undermine the principles of the Good Friday Agreement.

Ms P Bradley: I rise to speak initially on behalf of the Assembly and Executive Review Committee, and then I will make some remarks in my capacity as a member of my party. During Committee Stage, the Committee considered written evidence from 25 organisations, including the Secretary of State, political parties represented here in this Assembly, the Speaker of the Assembly, the Human Rights Commission, as well as a number of academics from the UK and Ireland.

The Committee undertook six oral briefings, and our deliberations were further informed by papers prepared by the Assembly Research and Information Service. I would like to take this opportunity to thank the stakeholders who provided written and oral evidence to the Committee. I assure all stakeholders that we studied their views and suggestions carefully and greatly valued their support at the Committee Stage. I also thank the Bill's sponsor, Mr John McCallister, for attending a number of oral sessions and for providing clarification and written responses to Committee queries on quite a tight timescale.

With your indulgence, Mr Speaker, before dealing with the amendments, I will make a few general remarks on a number of issues that arose during the Committee deliberations. As highlighted in our report on the Bill, the Committee debated whether legislation was, indeed, required for the formation of an official opposition in the Assembly. In some cases, the Bill instructs that changes be made to Standing Orders, and, in others, the Bill allows for an Assembly and Executive reform motion to be submitted to the Secretary of State asking for changes to be made to the Northern Ireland Act 1998.

The fact that many provisions in the Bill could be introduced in the Assembly via means other than legislation was raised by a number of stakeholders in their responses to the Committee. The Committee considered the views of a number of academics on the matter and, in turn, considered the arguments for legislation put forward by the Bill's sponsor, Mr John McCallister.

The Committee also considered the concerns raised by a number of stakeholders regarding the legislative competence of certain provisions in the Bill and, in particular, the schedule.

The Committee sought and considered its own legal advice and was content that those concerns were unfounded.

Finally, the Committee considered the concerns raised by a number of stakeholders that certain provisions in the Bill and the schedule potentially depart from d'Hondt and the cross-community principles of the Belfast Agreement and its further iterations in subsequent negotiations. The Committee used its oral evidence sessions to explore those issues further with academics and the Bill sponsor.

3.45 pm

Group 1 covers a range of amendments, some of which were not considered by the Committee. I will confine my remarks to those amendments that the Committee considered either partially or in full.

The Committee had previously considered part of amendment No 1 that relates to the criteria for a qualifying party but not the amendment to exclude technical groups from forming the opposition. The Committee divided on the sponsor's amendment to the criteria for a qualifying party and agreed by vote that it did not support it.

The Committee did not have sight of the sponsor's proposal in amendment No 1 to exclude technical groups from forming an official opposition. However, it considered in some detail the views of stakeholders who considered that the Bill's proposal for technical groups to be able to form an official opposition was disproportionate and ill-advised. The Committee recognised the role of technical groups in other Parliaments and examined, in particular, the operation of technical groups in the Dáil. The Committee heard that, whilst there may be merit in making provision for the formation of technical groups in the Assembly, it was not advisable to extend those arrangements to allow technical groups to form an official opposition.

I now turn to proposed amendments to clause 3, namely amendment Nos 4, 6 and 7, which relate to the timing of the formation of the opposition. The Committee divided on these amendments and agreed by a majority vote that it was not content that they be made.

Amendment No 8 proposes a new clause 5A that relates to the dissolution of the opposition. The Committee notes that the wording of that new clause is broadly similar to the wording of an amendment to clause 5 that was proposed by the sponsor. The Committee divided and agreed that it was not content with this amendment.

I now turn to the sponsor's 10 amendments that deal with alternative titles for the offices in the leadership of the opposition; in particular, amendment Nos 9 to 13, 16 and 17, and 21, 22 and 25. The Committee noted the comments made by a number of academics that the Scottish Parliament and Welsh Assembly do not have such formal titles but use the more flexible designation of leader of each party not in the Executive. The Committee noted the sponsor's explanation that these amendments are intended to address the concerns raised by the stakeholders and the Committee. The Committee divided on these amendments and agreed by a majority vote that it was not content for them to be made.

With respect to amendment Nos 17 and 20 concerning enhanced speaking rights, the Committee noted the views that were expressed by a number of stakeholders regarding the implications of these enhanced speaking rights for the operation of the Assembly and the speaking rights of Back-Benchers. The Committee divided on these amendments and agreed by vote that it was not content for them to be made.

Clause 19 provides for the establishment of a Budget Committee in the Assembly. Although the Committee did not have sight of amendment No 26, it considered amendment No 27, and both amendments broadly reflect the views of the sponsor that were discussed during the Committee Stage of the Bill. The Committee noted the purpose of the proposed Budget Committee as set out by the sponsor but also noted the conclusions of an inquiry that was undertaken by the Committee for Finance and Personnel into the role of the Northern Ireland Assembly in scrutinising the Executive. The Committee noted the conclusions set out in the third report of that inquiry that the proposal to establish a centralised Budget Committee should be reconsidered in the future if the proposed reforms to processes and procedures fail to deliver. The Committee noted that work on a draft memorandum of understanding between the Assembly and the Executive to deliver those reforms is still ongoing. The Committee divided on the wording proposed in amendment No 27 and agreed by vote that it was not content for this amendment to be made.

Finally, I wish to address the opposition to the clauses in the Bill. The Committee divided and agreed that it was content with clause 1, which sets out the purpose of the Bill, but divided and was not content with clauses 2 to 24 as drafted.

I will make a few comments as a DUP member of the Committee. I personally thank Mr McCallister for all his labours and resilience in trying, at every stage, to find a suitable agreement within Committee. He has to be commended for that.

As you are aware, we tabled several amendments in group 1, and we will be opposing many of the other clauses. We will be supporting the first clause, because we believe in the general principles of the Bill and also, as set out in the Fresh Start Agreement, its proposals for an official opposition. That said, there are areas of the Bill we cannot agree with, one of which is technical groups. You will note that many of our amendments will remove them from the Bill. I know that, in amendment No 1, Mr McCallister has removed technical groups from clause 2, which is on the formation of the opposition, but we are still not entirely comfortable with the lower limit of 5% for a qualifying party to form an opposition. That could be something that the Member might wish to consider at Further Consideration Stage.

Mr McCallister: I thank Ms Bradley for taking an intervention. Would she and her party colleagues look at that more favourably if it were set slightly higher, at, say, 8%?

Ms P Bradley: Thank you, Mr McCallister. I cannot give you a definite answer, as I am not here to make that decision on behalf of the party, but I think that would be more like what we have in mind.

Moving on to clause 5 and to amendment No 8, we are happy to support the amendments. I have got to the stage, Mr Speaker, where I cannot read my own writing. As I said on behalf of the Committee, there are several amendments in the group that look at the difference in the wording between the phrases "leader of the opposition" and "leader of the party in opposition". Those are amendment Nos 21, 22, 25 and amendment Nos 9 to 13. We do not have any major concern with any of those amendments. Amendment No 14, which is to clause 6, is on the removal of technical groups, which Mr McCallister addresses in amendment No 15. We support that clause if amended.

We also support clause 7 with amendment No 18. We cannot support Mr McCallister's amendment on speaking rights as set down in amendment No 19. We are happy to support clauses 9 through to 15, with the exception of clause 12. We will be opposing clauses 16 and 17, which, again, deal with technical groups. We will also be opposing clause 19, as well as all associated amendments. We will be opposing clause 20, and, as Members know, we have tabled a petition of concern to clause 20. We know that, earlier today, it was agreed that OFMDFM will be called the Executive Office.

In conclusion, we will be opposing clause 21 and supporting clauses 22 to 24. I know that other Members of my party will be speaking on this, and I will leave them to speak further on our amendments.

Mr Attwood: Thank you Mr Deputy Speaker. I intend to speak to amendment No 28 and to the other amendments in the group.

I share the comments made by others about Mr McCallister's work on this Bill, private Member's business and Bills in general. The range of his interest is demonstrated by the fact that, on one hand and extreme, he has sponsored and seen through a Bill on caravans, and on the other hand, he may, by the end of this mandate, have seen through another piece of legislation on opposition. So, from caravans to opposition, Mr McCallister has demonstrated the range of his interest and his contribution. If you look at Lord Morrow's Bill and other legislation before the Chamber, or historically that which has been sponsored by private Members and become law, you will see that it is a reflection of the person and the power of one. On the far side of all that, good legislation is being achieved. For all those reasons, Mr McCallister deserves a lot of acknowledgement.

He has attempted to put into law that which now seems to have been accepted and practised by everybody and all parties over time. It bemuses me that, while so many of the structures and processes of the Assembly are established in law, we would not establish opposition in law. Putting things in law creates more certainty, avoids doubt and creates more authority, whatever the nature of the matter that is being put into law. It is inconsistent to rely on the words of a document — in this case, the 'Fresh Start' false start — and not elevate the issue to the point of putting into law the principle that is being accepted by all parties on opposition.

As was said in the debate earlier today on reducing the number of MLAs, the problem with government in Northern Ireland is not its structures and systems. That is not at the heart of the view of a growing number of people. Whether or not we like it — it is a comment on all of us — the problem is the politics, the parties and the persons rather than the processes that govern the conduct of government and the Assembly. Anybody who thinks that there is a fix to the public detachment from the Chamber or the doubts about the good authority of devolution should not consider that new systems, even a system of opposition, will somehow turn the corner on any of that.

Failure of government is in people's hearts and minds when it comes to their concerns and anxieties about whether this model of devolution is living up to people's ambitions and expectations. Whatever new management and engineering there might be for Departments, the number of Members, petitions of concern or the idea of opposition, the fundamentals will not be addressed. Ministers knowing the difference between being in government and being in power is not addressed by having an opposition. Ministers in all parties being fully committed to all the arrangements arising from the Good Friday Agreement and other agreements is not resolved by having an opposition. Living up to the values of equality, parity of esteem, reconciliation and healing is not addressed by having an opposition. Those issues are dealt with in the hearts and minds of parties, people and politicians, and will not be dealt with or properly addressed by a further re-engineering of the current structures and systems of government.

Since 2012, the SDLP has been on public record as saying that there should be legislative provision for an opposition in the Assembly in the next mandate. In the summer of 2012, the then Secretary of State undertook a consultation that asked parties and people in the North what provisions should be included in a miscellaneous provisions Bill in Westminster on the governance of the Northern Ireland Assembly. People might have forgotten that, but, at that time, the questions covered the date for an Assembly election, the size of the Assembly, fixed terms and dual mandates. The Secretary of State consulted the parties on all those matters and on opposition. When the consultation document was published, the SDLP outlined its views on all those matters and on opposition. The SDLP made the following comments, which governed our thinking then and continue to do so now.

These were the points that the SDLP made at that time to the British Government, which they chose to ignore. They took forward some of the issues on which they were consulted, but the British Government, at that time, chose to ignore the argument that the SDLP made about opposition. In making the argument, the SDLP said:

“Power-sharing, and its provisions, as an essential element of the Good Friday Agreement should endure. The analysis outlined in the SDLP document ... confirms why this approach is necessary and right in the current, more volatile environment. This means that FM/DFM are elected by cross-community vote”.

I will come back to that point, because the SDLP — and I flag this up for Mr McCallister — might yet table amendments at Further Consideration Stage that revert to the pre-St Andrews Agreement process of election on this Floor of the First and deputy First Ministers, rather than the degradation of the Good Friday Agreement and the philosophy that informed it. It came through at St Andrews, was consented to by Sinn Féin, but pushed by the DUP that the process for appointing the First Minister and deputy First Minister should be by way of nomination rather than by election from the Floor.

In addition to the First Minister and deputy First Minister being elected by cross-community vote, ministerial offices are allocated on the basis of a democratic mandate and the principle of D'Hondt. We then argued:

“The creation of any structure, and material support for an opposition in this architecture of the Assembly is without prejudice to the existing entitlements of any party under D'Hondt, and the right of any party to claim that entitlement.”

Then, we concluded:

“It is in this context, the SDLP concludes that an opposition option should be built in to the structures of the Assembly in a future mandate. It would not be 'mandatory' that an opposition is formed. Parties would be guaranteed their D'Hondt entitlement under powersharing arrangements if a party chooses to claim that entitlement. FM/DFM would be elected by cross-community vote to ensure a government of the political traditions ... The SDLP believes that this approach ... both protect the architecture and requirements of the Agreement and enable the evolution of democratic politics in a balanced manner going forward.”

That was our view in 2012, in writing, and those principles, and that view, informs our approach to the principles that underpin this Bill from Mr McCallister. For those reasons, whilst I will make comments about our own amendment, and other clauses and amendments to the Bill, we support the principle of this Bill, and we look to seeing it pass in this mandate and receive Royal Assent thereafter, subject to the comments and concerns that I am about to raise.

I will deal first with the substantive content of the Bill, with our amendment No 28 that deals with the proposal for a Budget Committee. The SDLP has long argued, and has probably produced proposals in this regard, that the budgetary arrangements for democratic oversight by the Assembly are lacking; they have been lacking for many's a long day. As far as I am aware, we are the only government institution in these islands that does not have an annual budgetary process. The option that is chosen here is for a Budget that is revised quarterly with monitoring returns. We believe that there should be an annual budgetary process with ongoing budgetary oversight by the Assembly. That informs amendment No 28.

The SDLP feels vindicated in that argument, because look at how the budgetary process has been handled for the 2016-17 Budget that will be debated in this Chamber over the next few weeks. Accelerated passage, on the one hand, with Ministers being given very little time to engage with DFP in bringing forward their departmental spending proposals and ambitions.

The experience even of the last two months should warn us that, in future years, we should have a more rigorous budgetary process. We hope that, on the far side of this mandate, for example, in the negotiations around the Programme for Government, parties recognise that, as part of a Programme for Government, you should build into the architecture of government greater budgetary oversight in order to ensure that those matters are properly addressed.

That situation will be made more acute by the fact that we will have new Departments and the Statutory Committees of the Assembly will be stretched even more than they have been in this mandate. Therefore, in a situation where you have a smaller number of Departments, with a smaller number of scrutiny Committees but a wider range of functions to consider, when everybody has an ambition for better politics and good governance, it seems to us that we should build into the Assembly better budgetary oversight. There will be a need for it. Two of the mechanisms for doing that are in relation to the budget on welfare and the Budget generally. The Budget generally is the issue that we try to address in amendment No 28, where we call for a dedicated Budget Committee that would, as the amendment says:

“consider quarterly budget forecasts, reports, estimates”

and so on. We say that, given the change in the number of Departments and the additional pressures that may likely fall on the Committees of the House, having a Budget Committee, in the absence especially of an annual budgetary process, seems to us a sensible and wise arrangement.

We also made that argument in relation to the welfare issue. In this month last year, we tabled an amendment in the House that we should borrow from the example of the Scottish Parliament, which has a dedicated Welfare Reform Committee. It is separate from the other Committee oversights of the Departments of the Scottish Government and is dedicated to the oversight of welfare reform. Just last Friday, the SDLP held a welfare seminar for our staff on Eileen Evason's proposals for mitigation and the coming programmes of welfare reform. People from the welfare advice sector were making the argument that the Welfare Reform Committee in Scotland was more and more showing good authority on a cross-party basis in order to intervene in what was happening on welfare reform. We should borrow from that experience. It is a matter that the SDLP intends to return to, given that in this House last year the proposal for a welfare reform Committee was voted down.

Mr McCallister: I am grateful to the Member for giving way. Does he also accept, in his support for improving our budgetary process, that this becomes even more important if we devolve the power to vary corporation tax? If we seek to follow other regions of the UK and have other tax-varying powers devolved, we really need to lift our skills in dealing with the Budget process.

Mr Attwood: Absolutely. If there is to be any enhanced function for the Northern Ireland Government and Assembly — in this case, two years away, when it comes to corporation tax — surely it follows that the responsibility falling to Members and parties in the House to have better democratic accountability and oversight is becoming more urgent.

There is a danger that, in the rush to devolve corporation tax, we are not working through the requirements of all our regions in order to benefit from a reduced corporation tax percentage. Working that through means working through the skills and infrastructure that are necessary in order to ensure that foreign direct investment is attracted to all regions of Northern Ireland. A situation may well arise over the next period where, because of the infrastructure and skills cluster around the greater Belfast area, FDI benefits the greater Belfast area. Whilst that would be welcome to all of us who live in Belfast, represent Belfast or look for work in Belfast, it does not benefit those outside the greater Belfast area. The experience of the Southern economy is that, while FDI is attracted by lower corporation tax, interest in investment has been sustained because of access to the European market, because of skills and because of the infrastructure. The Assembly should have a dedicated Budget Committee to, for example, interrogate the loss to the block grant of £300 million or more on the far side of the devolution of corporation tax. We could then see what that will mean for the overall Budget and what we do to deal with the FDI conundrum, which is that greater Belfast has the skills and infrastructure and other parts of the North, because of the failure of government, not least over the last 10 years, do not have sufficient of either. I therefore urge Members to consider that approach for the reasons I have outlined.

I will now comment on some other matters related to clauses 1 to 24, the subjects of this group of amendments, in no particular order — in fact, probably starting at the end. First, I confirm that the SDLP will support clause 20, the renaming of the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister. It is a declaration of what is self-evident: it is an office of equal First Ministers, whatever their titles. It is curious that the petition of concern lodged by the DUP isolates the matter, as I understand it, and that Sinn Féin, while not petitioning it, intends to vote it down. I remember Sinn Féin Members in the Chamber openly referring to joint First Ministers — I think it was Ms Ruane who would, on occasion, proudly claim that it was an office of joint First Ministers.

Mr McCartney: Will the Member give way?

Mr Attwood: Yes, I will.

Mr McCartney: Just to inform the Member, we are standing in opposition to all the clauses. It is not that we are singling out one over another.

Mr Attwood: I accept that you are standing in opposition to all the clauses, but you are standing in opposition to something that your Member has declared to be her view, namely, that it is an office of joint First Ministers.

Mr Allister: Will the Member give way?

Mr Attwood: I will in a second.

If you claim that it is a self-evident truth, then, even if you oppose every other clause, you should not oppose this one. I will give way to the Member.

Mr Allister: Patently, it is a joint office. Even the deputy First Minister contradicted the opposition that his party has tabled by his utterances on television not so long ago, unless they were simply for the optics, when he said that he would offer to change the title of the positions to Joint First Minister. From one side of their mouth, Sinn Féin says that they are happy with the title of the office as it is in law and in fact — joint First Ministers — while, on the other hand, they come to the House to block that.

Mr Attwood: The Member, as is often the case, is accurate when he says that the inconsistency of Sinn Féin spokespersons extends from their Whip in the Chamber to the joint First Minister. That said —

Mr McCartney: Will the Member give way?

Mr Attwood: I will in a second.

That said, the contradiction that Mr Allister referred to does not surprise me. In this year, the 100th anniversary of the Easter rising, when people began to assert the independence of Ireland, the independence of this part of Ireland has been surrendered to the British Parliament by the surrender of welfare powers to a Tory austerity Government and all that will follow on the far side of the Welfare Reform and Work Bill that is going through the Chamber.

So, contradiction in what Sinn Féin says and does is everywhere to be seen, not least in relation to that matter. I give way to Mr McCartney.

4.15 pm

Mr McCartney: First, on the particular clauses that we oppose, I have already said that we are opposing all the clauses to be consistent in our approach. On contradictions, it is interesting that you use the 1916 rising, which was asserted in arms, because the SDLP is on record as saying that there is absolutely no justification for the use of arms. Where is the contradiction there?

Mr Attwood: I am very keen to answer that question, Mr Speaker, and, if you are not going to stop me, I intend to proceed.

Mr Speaker: Do not tempt me. [Laughter.]

Mr Attwood: I will not press you very far on this one, Mr Speaker. Let us be clear about it for Mr McCartney. Whatever circumstances arose in 1916 or with a war of independence that had a democratic endorsement and the support of the people of Ireland, that is a million miles — [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order.

Mr Attwood: It is a million miles from what transpired in Northern Ireland for 30-odd years.

Mr McCartney: That is not the point. We are talking about the contradiction.

Mr Speaker: Order.

Mr Attwood: Let me explain. The difference is that, in 1916 —

Mr Speaker: You should return to the debate now, I think.

Mr Attwood: — the people of Ireland believed that they had no alternative but to revert to arms whereas, for 30 or 40 years in the North, difficult though it was, there was a constitutional and democratic way forward.

Mr Speaker: Please resume your seat for a second. He invited you to comment on that and I permitted you to comment on it, but I think that it is now time to return directly to the debate.

Mr Attwood: I agree, but, given that I was being interrupted from a seated position, I will say that the conditions were objectly different. There was a democratic alternative. Those who took up arms after 1968 and 1969 had a margin of support in the people of Ireland and so on and so forth.

Mr Speaker: Did you hear me?

Mr Attwood: I will defer to the Speaker in that regard.

I will deal now with clause 21, "Departments to be single legal entity". This is a clause that we have petitioned against. I think that Sinn Féin has petitioned against this clause as well. We have done that because, in the Good Friday arrangements, we negotiated the good authority of Ministers. This clause moves or adjusts the good authority of Ministers and the separate bodies corporate that currently exist, namely ministerial Departments, into a single body corporate stretching across all Departments. We believe that that compromises the authority of Ministers and, for that reason, we oppose that clause.

We will support clauses that give particular authority to those who might want to form an opposition. Whilst there are some issues to be determined in respect of the threshold for a qualifying party, we support proposals that there be a leader and deputy leader of an opposition made up of the qualifying parties. We support the proposals in respect of topical questions and enhanced speaking rights for an opposition. We very much support the proposal for an opposition's right to chair the Public Accounts Committee. Whilst experience in other democratic chambers in relation to who chairs a Public Accounts Committee is different, we believe that that is a good principle and one that has served the people of Ireland well in Dáil Éireann. We also support the proposal that the opposition should have a member on the Business Committee of the House.

We do not support the proposals for financial assistance and salaries for office holders of the opposition. We think that that crosses a bridge that should not be crossed at this stage. However, in all other ways, if there is going to be an opposition, we believe that it should be subject to the threshold matter. We believe that it should have structures and substance to do the work that it will be expected to do. Save for those comments, we are prepared to see the Bill proceed, subject to those matters that we have indicated on record that we will oppose through a petition of concern, as well as other matters that we will oppose by way of vote only.

Mr Kennedy: I am pleased to speak on behalf of the Ulster Unionist Party on this private Member's Bill. I join with others in acknowledging the amount of work that the Member has put into the measure. He may well feel that some of that work is unravelling before his very eyes, but such is politics and such is the politics of the Assembly. I also thank the Chair and members of the Assembly and Executive Review Committee for their scrutiny of the Bill, and the present Clerk and her officials for their guidance.

From memory, I was a member of the original Assembly and Executive Review Committee charged with looking at these matters, but that was way back in a previous mandate, when the expectation was that the Executive would bring forward suitable legislation to improve the structures of the Assembly, including measures to provide for an opposition. Frankly, the more things change, the more they stay the same; we are some time away from that.

Given the significant number of amendments and proposed changes to the Bill at this stage, including petitions of concern, it is clear that the two largest parties in the House are not key supporters of the Bill and prefer to see limited changes being made using the mechanism of Standing Orders and other procedures of the House, as outlined in Fresh Start. That has become increasingly apparent, not only at the Committee but through the course of this debate.

Such are the changes to the Bill intended by the largest parties that they confirm my view that private Member's Bills have little or no chance of progressing to the statute book unless they are sponsored by Members of the two largest parties. That conclusion supports my view, and that of my party, that these changes would best be brought about by using Westminster legislation. What suits parties today to change by Standing Orders can easily be amended in the future by amending Standing Orders and, basically, allowing dominant parties, whoever they may be, to dictate changes on their terms. Therefore, I am deeply —

Mr Campbell: I thank the Member for giving way. Is he seriously suggesting that some of us are not concerned about the mechanism by which we arrive at the destination, as long as we arrive there? Is he seriously suggesting that, if the Assembly and Executive arrived at a conclusion via Fresh Start, whatever he thinks about it, about establishing an opposition, then at some point beyond that the Executive parties, large or small, having established an opposition by whatever means, would then row back from that? Surely he is not suggesting that?

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member for his intervention. I am simply conveying to the House my view that the methodology being used by the two largest parties presently in the House is one that undoubtedly suits their requirements set out under Fresh Start. The other parties and Members are right to be cautious about accepting that wholesale change.

I am deeply disappointed to see that a petition of concern has been tabled against a clause of the Bill that could have made Westminster legislation a reality. I understand that there may have been concerns about proposals to remove community designation, but I think that, at this stage, the baby has been thrown out with the bathwater. I can only imagine the disappointment and concern of the sponsor of the Bill.

I see no party or individual in the House wanting to go back to majority-style rule when it comes to the structures of the House. Everyone has to be realistic about that and, in some cases, finally accept it. I say that particularly to the nationalist and republican parties in the House. I hear no one advocating such a position. I think that the concerns about community designation are something of a misrepresentation and are almost an invention by people who are trying to persuade themselves that there are parties here who want to do them down on traditional lines. There was an amendment tabled to remove that section that would have received the support of my party. It is frustrating that the debate has not really properly taken place, meaning that there has not been a proper chance for those fears to be allayed without the need for a petition of concern, which will remove the entire schedule.

We thought that amendment No 1 from Mr McCallister was pragmatic. We gave thought to the issue of whether the opposition should be available to those who are eligible for Ministries or whether it should include anyone who is not in government. To us, the amendment strikes a balance, providing for parties that are not in government and acknowledging the prospect of larger parties taking up places there. Given that the Assembly is evolving and should continue to do so, that proposal will go towards future-proofing any opposition arrangements. It potentially gives space for any future changes in the size or make-up of the Assembly. I heard the sponsor of the Bill saying that he is open to increasing the threshold, and we await developments on that issue at Further Consideration Stage.

We welcome the changes made on technical groups. We had been concerned because, although we were looking to create measures to enhance democracy in the Assembly, the prospect of a group of individuals being able to come together to gain the same rights as a party elected with a considerable mandate seemed to work against that aim. We heard the examples of the existence of technical groups in other Assemblies, Parliaments and legislatures, but we are concerned that we could be trying to run before we can walk. We are beginning to reshape structures that were set up to support a very fragile society, so it is important that we move at a pace that allows us to grow and evolve but does not undermine confidence.

We welcome the amendments regarding leaders of the non-Executive parties. We have never been convinced of the need for formal titles within the opposition and prefer that it be more relaxed. A more rigid set of titles does not necessarily work in an Assembly such as ours, and we point to the Scottish Parliament's use of titles as what we should aim for. The mix of identities and the nature of this Assembly mean that it would not necessarily be workable to have one leader of an opposition. We think that what is proposed in the amendments reflects that better.

We think that the proposals to afford enhanced speaking rights to the opposition strike a reasonable balance. Ultimately, we want to see a good, steady flow of legislation passing through the House rather than the endless motions that we too often see on the Floor. We think that giving a minimum of 15 business days to the opposition, taking into consideration its ability to be made up of more than party, does not hinder the legislative timetable and allows opposition parties a fair opportunity to have their voice heard. The 20% enhancement for opposition speaking rights also seems pragmatic, given that it will be based on party strength.

4.30 pm

Mr Attwood's speech included discussion of a Budget Committee. If we are moving away from the coterminous model of Committees matching Departments, there could be other possibilities. There could, for example, be a Committee looking at our relationship with the European Union and how we benefit or could do better from that. Others in the House may have other ideas, and it is not hard to see how that could run on.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Beggs] in the Chair)

The other big factor for us is that the Fresh Start Agreement outlines that the Executive plan to establish an independent fiscal council for Northern Ireland. It is early days, but, given that we are told that the council will prepare annual assessments of the Executive's annual review streams and funding proposals as well as of the sustainability of the Executive's public finances and the effectiveness of long-term efficiency measures, we need to tease out what the proposed relationship would be between the two bodies.

We will oppose clause 12. We simply do not believe that it is appropriate that, a time when we are looking at how we can lessen the expense of the Assembly to the public purse, we should provide salaries for newly created positions, even within the opposition. You do not go into opposition for a salary; you are there to provide scrutiny of the Government and to offer yourselves as an alternative to the present Government. That is very much the view of the Ulster Unionist Party.

On balance, the sponsor, Mr McCallister, is entitled to feel disappointed by the amount of political manoeuvring that is now rife around his Bill. However, when the smoke clears and the Bill emerges from the various amendments, petitions of concern and Fresh Start proposals, we will look closely at the nature and shape of it. At that stage — the next stage of the Bill — we will give it further consideration.

Mr Lunn: I will start with the point that Mr Kennedy finished with: we will wait and see what happens after the various political machinations, manoeuvres, petitions of concern and people taking dogmatic opposition to the entire Bill. We will look, at Further Consideration Stage, at what comes out of this wreckage, when we will have a clearer idea of what is being proposed.

The Bill represents an enormous amount of work by Mr McCallister and his team. It was a worthwhile attempt to upgrade, modernise and improve the structures and procedures of the Assembly. It is extremely disappointing that, after all that work, we find ourselves in the position that we now do. Mr McCallister must be almost in the position of somebody with an elderly relative who is very, very ill — still hoping that they will recover. To me, however, this has the look of a basket case, but we will see.

Sinn Féin indicated its intention to kill the Bill by opposing every clause at the AERC. The Acting Chair, Ms Bradley, said today that the Committee divided on this, and it did. The Committee divided on every clause, but only because I voted in favour of every clause. That is the AERC for you, frankly.

There are so many contradictions around what is going on here that you really have to smile.

Mr Attwood highlighted the position of Sinn Féin on the naming of the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister. He is absolutely right: senior members of Sinn Féin have supported that regularly, but now, because of their total opposition to the Bill, they have to oppose it. It is a difficult position to start from if you say that you will oppose every aspect of this by voting against every clause, even though there are bits of it that surely even Sinn Féin could support. It is a strange scenario that we find ourselves in.

The argument is, of course, that 'A Fresh Start' will take care of all this and we do not need the Bill. Frankly, you would need to have more confidence in 'A Fresh Start' than I have at this time. If it goes the way of other fresh start agreements that have been round this place since I came here in 2007, we will just have to wait and see. The jury is out on what is possible. Mr Campbell is smiling; he has heard me at this before. Really, time will tell.

I would have thought and I still hope that the better parts of the Bill, on which we could perhaps agree, will not be killed by Sinn Féin and that we may be able to produce something from the wreckage. Mr Campbell is indicating support. I hope that that is the case. I would say that the DUP abstained from the vote on just about every clause in the AERC.

Mr Campbell: Not them all.

Mr Lunn: I tell a lie: you did not abstain on every clause; you opposed some of them, along with Sinn Féin. I forgot about that.

We are glad that the Bill is receiving some sort of scrutiny today. We will see what arises from the ashes.

As far as the amendments and clauses are concerned, I will not comment on all of them. Sinn Féin has given notice of intention to oppose various clauses, which I understand to be 1, 2, 3, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 13, 14, 15, 18, 20, 21, 22, 23 and 24. We will not support the Sinn Féin attitude to those clauses.

I will look at the other amendments very briefly. Amendment No 1 relates to the qualifying parties for opposition. The amendment mentions 5%. There is talk of a qualification level of 8%. Earlier, somebody behind me said, "Fix". Well, it is a political compromise. Either way, we would support that. We have no problem with amendment Nos 2, 3 and 4. We intend to oppose amendment No 5. I will not even bother giving reasons, Mr Speaker. We support amendment Nos 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12 and 13. We oppose amendment No 14. We support amendment Nos 15, 16, 17, 18 and 19. As you can probably tell, our support for the Bill was actually quite wide-ranging, and it still is. I am sorry to the sponsor, but we intend to oppose amendment No 20.

Sorry about this, Mr Speaker. It is just as well that we are not time-limited. I will have to come back to one of them.

We are OK with amendment No 23. We will support amendment Nos 24 and 25. Amendment No 26, along with No 27 and the SDLP amendment, No 28, relates to the Budget Committee. Keen observers will probably remember that that is the one amendment that I voted against at the AERC. I am now persuaded to be a bit more open-minded about it. I have listened to Mr Attwood's explanation of what he would like to see and what happens in other jurisdictions, and I do not believe that we would oppose the amendment at this time.

I am really sorry about this, Mr Speaker; I have got my papers in the wrong order. Amendment Nos 2, 6, 14, 15 and 17 and clause 17 relate to the technical groups. We are happy with some of those proposals but are less keen on those that allow a technical group to enter opposition or the Executive. We think that this is a change, in principle, to the power-sharing arrangements, which specify that it should be done on the basis of party strength. While we might be prepared to see a technical group get some speaking rights and, perhaps, Committee positions, we do not think that it should include entry into a formal opposition or into government. As I said earlier, frankly, we will wait to see what comes out of this. We will look at it at Further Consideration Stage and see where we are.

The petition of concern on clause 13 effectively renders the schedule meaningless, so we will probably have to talk about that at some stage. It does seem to be particularly perverse to render the entire schedule to the Bill meaningless at this stage. It took the support of some members of the SDLP to make that petition worthy. I do not understand why on earth the SDLP would support a petition that renders meaningless its own very worthy amendment — amendment No 30 — which is to do with petitions of concern and qualified majority voting. If Mr Attwood wants to intervene, I will be happy to let him. It seems particularly, to use the word again, perverse to deny a carefully thought-out amendment that we would have supported. I think we can still debate it at some stage, but it does not mean a thing because the petition that your guys signed has rendered it useless. Do you want to intervene?

Mr Attwood: I am not straying into the second debate, but the substantive issue is the content of the schedule, which introduces the concept of weighted majorities. That is the substantive point that we have difference with, in addition to a series of particulars in respect of the schedule. Clause 13 refers to that. There may be ways in which the schedule can be substantially reworked so that it is consistent with the Good Friday Agreement, in which case something more appropriate might be agreed. I am prepared to look at that, but that is the thinking. The schedule does violence to the agreement. Clause 13 is only consequential to that.

Mr Lunn: I thank Mr Attwood for that, and I wish him luck. If there is some way to bring the amendment to which I refer into the ambit of the Bill again before it is too late, we would certainly be inclined to support it. If it is along the lines of what is already written down, it looks good to us. I am not sure that it would receive the backing of the House because, frankly, it really does not matter what we do in these circumstances as the decisions will be made by the two larger parties. I will conclude here. We will see what comes out of the debate today and have another look at the issue in the cold light of day on a future date.

Mr Allister: Given that this institution parades itself as a democratic legislative Assembly, I still find it amazing that we are at the point of talking and dithering over whether this democratic institution should have an opposition.

Ask any class of 12-year-olds to identify three or four key components of a democratic legislature, and I guarantee that in the top three every time will be the existence of an opposition — it is so elementary. Yet, here, that basic proposition is provoking all the contortions of so many to try to deny the import of that.

We have one party that would just block, if it could, the entire Bill. Of course, we know that there is a tradition with some that the way to deal with opposition was a bullet in the back of the head, but this is supposed to be a democratic institution, and it beggars belief that within a democratic institution there should even be debate about whether you need, and should permit, an opposition. Yet that is the pitiful situation that the House, after all these years, is still in. What an indictment of this place that the matter still has to be debated and decided upon. It is so self-evidently an indictment of the House that, really, I find it staggering that it takes this debate to allow the subject even to be ventilated, never mind the intent of some to kill it off.

Of course, Mr McCallister, who has done a huge amount of work on this, has had all these supercilious compliments today from the very people who are about to kill his Bill, insofar as they can kill it. The reeking insincerity of some speaks for itself.

Mr McKay: Will the Member give way?

Mr Allister: I will, indeed.

Mr McKay: The Member's point about opposition suggests that we are in a unique position. However, in Scotland, there is no official opposition; in Wales, there is no official opposition. We are not in a unique position. This is the type of Assembly that we have. It is not a mini-Westminster.

Mr Allister: The Member deludes himself if he thinks that the Conservatives, for example, in Edinburgh are not in opposition, or that the Labour Party is not in opposition to the SNP Government. Of course they are, and of course they are facilitated and provided with time, proper respect and positions in order to facilitate that opposition. Of course all the other devolved institutions have an opposition.

The Member might aspire to a system that would operate in somewhere like North Korea, but, really, it is Northern Ireland, and quibbling over whether we should have an opposition is quite astounding. The answer of some — the answer of Sinn Féin and the rather more cloaked but probably similar answer of the DUP — is that we have the Fresh Start Agreement. Let us think about Fresh Start and its approach to opposition.

It took this Consideration Stage debate on the Bill to get the Executive into gear — yesterday — to produce a motion. It took two and a half months after Fresh Start supposedly embraced opposition for the Executive even to bring something to the House on that concept. I sit on the Committee on Procedures, and, at every meeting since Fresh Start, I have asked, "Is there any suggestion that maybe we, the Procedures Committee, should be looking at Standing Orders to facilitate the supposed commitment to Fresh Start?". No — nothing.

I seriously question the sincerity of the commitment in Fresh Start to an opposition, and, of course, no steps have been taken to lay the groundwork and prepare. Here we are within weeks of the end of this mandate, and there is not a cheep to the Committee on Procedures about drafting Standing Orders — not a cheep. The threshold that Fresh Start sets for opposition is pitched as high as they can pitch it: you get into opposition only if you have made the sacrifice of declining the offer to sit in government with those who will deign to give you the right to be in opposition. Only if you meet that threshold will they even contemplate for you lesser mortals the possibility of recognising an opposition.

Fresh Start is a poor and pitiful proffering in respect of opposition. What about 'A Fresh Start' and the sincerity of that document? Fresh Start has something to say about petitions of concern: it tells us that there is a new dawn for petitions of concern. They will be used only in — wait for it — "exceptional circumstances". When they are used, page 53 of 'A Fresh Start' solemnly states:

"where a Petition of Concern is tabled, this should state the ground or grounds upon which it is being tabled and the nature of the detriment which is perceived as arising from an affirmative vote on the matter".

That is the Fresh Start pledge. What did the people who made that pledge do today? They produced three petitions of concern. Not one of them sets out the grounds as to why a petition of concern is necessary. Not one of them says what the nature of the detriment is that the petition is seeking to prevent. Even the signatories and those who laud Fresh Start, by their actions, depart from and ignore their Fresh Start commitments and give us three petitions of concern that defy the very content of Fresh Start on that subject. They give us three petitions that simply name the clause, with no explanation that they are going to petition and oppose. I seriously question the bona fides of those who tell us that, under Fresh Start, all these things will evolve and happen when, on the very day that it is first put to the test for petitions of concern, it distinguishes itself by defying those very tenets that are set forth.

We then have the idea that technical groups must be killed off. Sinn Féin is obviously determined to kill off the idea of technical groups. The DUP is determined to kill off the idea of technical groups, which is really rich coming from the DUP, given that, for 34 years — more than one third of a century — its MEP has sat as a member of a technical group in the European Parliament.

Yet, when it comes to this House, what is good for the DUP in Strasbourg is to be denounced in Stormont. It is not do as I do, it is do as I say, as far as the DUP is concerned. For 34 years, it has been the beneficiary of sitting in a technical group. Some of the benefits of that are, of course, that members of a technical group get a proportionate share of speaking time. Its MEP has only ever got to speak because she is a member of a technical group and gets a share of that speaking time.

Mr Campbell: It is more than you did.

Mr Allister: I hear someone, from a sedentary position, who is still with us, apparently. I think that his party would like to know whether he is going or staying, but he seems to be with us still. He says that it is more than I did. I may not be very proud of it, but I would remind the Member that, for three years, I was that MEP in the technical group from the DUP. Yes, I did take advantage, and in the hundreds of times that I spoke in the European Parliament, I spoke on the basis of being a member of a technical group.

Mr Campbell: Bullseye.

Mr Allister: His party's current MEP can speak in the European Parliament only by virtue of being a member of a technical group.

It does something more: it gives you an input into the business committee of the legislature. In the European Parliament, they call it the Conference of Presidents. Mrs Dodds, by virtue of being a member of the technical group called the Non-Inscrits or the Non-Attached, was the technical group's representative on that business committee for a couple of years. Yet, the very thing that the DUP has been prepared to take advantage of — and is right to take advantage of, because it is right that it is there — is the very thing that it would now deny to the House. Such seems to be the paranoia about this short corner Bench that it is determined that it will cut off any oxygen that enables this Bench, lest it should be more effective. So there is gathering of vested interests to make sure that the idea of a technical group in the House is killed off.

I raised this as a member of the Committee on Procedures a couple of years ago. I pushed the proposal, and every one of the other Members from all the parties of the Executive voted it down. So it is quite clear that there is a calculated determination to extinguish the very idea of a technical group, which some parties take advantage of elsewhere. What are they scared of? What are the big parties of this House scared of from a technical group? My goodness, are Steven Agnew, John McCallister and the rest of us who sit here so terrifying that you cannot even have a technical group to give us the opportunity to dare, as six Members of the House — think of it — to have any input into the business of the House and to dare to have a representative sit on the Business Committee? To think of it: that these jumped-up individuals who are members of some technical group should dare to have a basis of equality with the rest of us — very important Members of very important parties. Who do these people think they are that we would allow them to have a technical group so that we would have to listen to them in the Business Committee — the Business Committee? Who do they think they are? That is the attitude, and it is one that speaks more about those who hold that attitude than it does about those they hold it about.

5.00 pm

Some of the practical consequences are that you cannot, in this corner of this Chamber, ever get an Adjournment debate in this House unless some of the bigger parties give away one of their places, because they are allocated only to those parties on the Business Committee. I might have the most pressing of constituency issues that would lend itself readily to an Adjournment debate, but it is not possible because Members in this corner are treated as the second-class Members of this House. That is the way that the rest want it. That is why they do not want to afford the opportunity of a technical group that might be empowering for the collective influence of the six or whatever number it would be in the future who occupy these Benches. I really wonder what it is they fear. Obviously it is something sufficient to cause them to be prepared to suppress the very idea of a technical group in a House where the attitude seems to be that, if you are not in the Government, you do not count.

In fact, as Mr Maskey almost told us one day in this House, if you are not supporting the Government, you should not really be here. That seemed to be the attitude. I am sorry, but technical group or no technical group, there will be voices raised in opposition in this House. It is a matter for the greater number as to how they facilitate that. They can seek to suppress it as much as they like, but that voice will be heard. They should do the decent thing and allow a technical group. They should allow equality of opportunity, and they should allow parity of esteem in that regard.

To return to the DUP petition of concern, it is interesting and informative that it was used about the clause that would blow away the pretence that there really are two separate offices of First Minister and deputy First Minister. It was ordered to maintain their own self-delusion that, somehow, the First Minister is different from and better than, and has more powers than, the deputy First Minister. The DUP has tabled that petition of concern because it knows, but does not want the public to know, that, in law and in practice, it is one office politically joined at the hip — one unable to even sign a letter without the other. Of course it is a joint office, and it is a joint office by design. The DUP thinks that, if it can table a petition of concern, it will help to delude itself and conceal from the public the reality that it is a joint office when, every day of the week, it operates it as such.

Ms Ruane said that Sinn Féin was opposed to the Bill because it would allow the creation of a Frankenstein model. Has she ever looked at this House? Has she ever looked at what this House does, sucking the blood out of basic democratic principles by denying the —

Mr Kennedy: That is Dracula.

Mr Allister: A close relative of the same ilk — [Laughter.] — sucking the blood out of normal democratic practices by denying the people who are meant to matter — the voters — the very fundamental democratic right to vote a party out of government, to change the Government and now to even have an opposition? The party that would do all that and does all that raises the spectre of creating a Frankenstein model. What do you think you have got? You have got a model that is held in increasing disdain by the general public because the consequence of its dysfunctional, unworkable nature is that it cannot, and will never, deliver good government in Northern Ireland.

That is why the barometer of public opinion is at an all-time low, and will continue to be there so long as the structures continue as they are.

Mr McCallister's Bill is not all that I would have wanted to see, but, my goodness, he has bent over backwards to get as much support as he can. All that he has got is a knife in the back from those who are going to try to kill his Bill. Even the modest component parts of the Bill are, it seems, too much for those with a vested interest, who are quite happy to carry on propping up the most dysfunctional, undemocratic, unworkable system of government anywhere in the western world. You had a chance with this Bill to be seen to do some tinkering to help, but it seems that the attitude of that vested interest is "not even that will we allow." Hence the conspiracy and desire to kill the Bill and to use petitions of concern where necessary. In itself, that is all a commentary on this House.

Mr Agnew: Our priority should be good governance. That is certainly what the electorate want. There has been debate in the Chamber today about the balance of power within the House and within our systems of government. We have done a lot of work collectively to improve delivery from the Assembly. I welcome the Departments Bill, which will reform the number of Departments, hopefully to make a more efficient system and get better joined working between Departments. The Children's Services Co-operation Bill, which was the result of my private Member's Bill, was very much about getting that joined-up working. The transition in the number of Departments, and that Bill, which will require Departments to work together for children, can help us change the culture of governance in Northern Ireland. Coming down the line, we will have a reduction in the number of MLAs. Collectively, those send out a message that we are looking to improve governance in Northern Ireland.

Mr Campbell: I thank the Member for giving way. He is alluding to the private Member's Bill that he introduced and, of course, there were other private Member's Bills that Members in that corner in particular were able to get, contrary to what we just heard in the rant from Mr Allister. He is now elaborating on some of the further progress that we need to make. Does he agree with me that, whatever about the degree and the rate of progress, we are going in the right direction — when some said that we would never get there?

Mr Agnew: I thank the Member for his intervention. I always articulate my view of how far we have come in Northern Ireland as being proud of how far we have come since 1998 and frustrated that we have not gone further faster. It is important to remember both aspects, but it is the frustration that drives me towards seeking change and improvement.

It is concerning that we may simply dismiss the Bill out of hand. It is important. It is a complex piece of work, and credit to Mr McCallister for tabling it. It is important that we have amendments and that, from people's different perspectives, serious attempts have been made to improve on it. To simply dismiss the Bill altogether and oppose all its clauses would be an opportunity wasted to really show that, collectively, we are working together to improve these institutions. The institutions have been effective in delivering peace. They have not been effective in delivering good governance, and, ultimately, that should be where we now seek to get to. If 1998 was about peace and stability, to a large extent that objective has been achieved, although of course there are still problems within many of our communities. In 2016, we need to look at good governance and good delivery for the people who elect us.

Moving away slightly from the power debate between opposition and the Executive, I think that one of the key clauses in this Bill is clause 21, which is about collective government. I am not in the Executive, but when the Executive lose credibility, people do not always make a distinction; for example, I get stopped in the street and asked, "What are youse doing up there?". So, when we have a situation in which one Government Minister takes another Government Minister to court, we do harm to all of these institutions and our governance.

It should not be a big ask that our Executive act as a single corporate entity. We have a coalition in Northern Ireland and have seen the difficulties faced by the Conservatives and Lib Dems. However, we saw both those parties stand up and speak in favour of things that, privately and behind the scenes, they were not entirely happy with, but they spoke as one Government. We see it in the Republic of Ireland, which continuously has a coalition Government, where the Government speak as one and take the criticism as one.

Mr Allister is fond of saying that we have no opposition here. Sometimes my problem is not that we have no opposition but that everybody thinks they are in opposition. As soon as a decision is made that is unpopular, every party steps out and says, "That was not my party; it was them-uns. We stood up and argued". We are very fond of doing that in Northern Ireland politics.

Are you a Government? Are you an Executive? Are you a collective? Or are you just a collection of parties in the Executive? If we are to be taken seriously in Northern Ireland, and if we are serious about reforms towards good governance, it is essential that we have collective decision-making and corporate governance in the Executive. I cannot understand opposition to clause 21. I think it is fundamental in terms of the changes which should, in my view, lead to an improvement in the performance of the Executive and the accountability of Executive parties.

As regards membership of the opposition and who should be permitted to be in opposition, we are told that 'A Fresh Start' is the way forward. I remember reading 'A Fresh Start' with incredulity. I saw great provision for opposition. I thought that it was a step forward that had been agreed. Then I read the detail and saw that it effectively says that, in order to be a member of the opposition, you have to first be a member of the Government. I read it again because I thought that I had it wrong, but that is what it said: you must first qualify to be in government, then you can decide to be in opposition. So only the Government could be in opposition. I thought that, clearly, this was not a serious proposal and attempt to move towards an effective — sorry, I will not say effective, because I think we have an effective opposition — but to have a recognised and formal opposition in this Assembly.

Let us rewind back to when the Ulster Unionists took their seat in the Executive; that was a time when we had no opposition. It seems to me that, given our current circumstances, we can still have that situation.

We could still implement, through changes to Standing Orders, the rules to have an opposition, but the parties who qualify for government might say that they are happy enough in government and do not need an opposition. They can continue suing each other, working together when it suits them and in opposition to each other at other times, but effectively they still take the ministerial portfolios. They can still say that they are in government when good decisions are being made, and when bad decisions are being made, they can blame the other parties.

5.15 pm

Amendment No 1, in Mr McCallister's name, sets a reasonable threshold. I do not hope for my party that it will forever have one MLA; I hope that, on the other side of May, we will be a stronger party, comprising more than 5% of the number of MLAs. That is something that we should campaign for and aspire to, so I think that it is reasonable to set a threshold. I do not think it should simply be a case of, "I'm here and I want". I have to grow my party if I want it to have increased influence in the Assembly. I have no problem with that but saying, "No, you must qualify for government but if you choose not to be in government then you can be in opposition" means that we can have a situation — I do not think it is good governance — where we move between having an opposition and not having an opposition, depending on the decisions of individual parties on whether to take ministerial seats.

The Fresh Start proposals on opposition are poor, and we have an opportunity here to have a credible and resourced opposition. I take the points on salaries. I have no problem with the leader of the opposition etc not being salaried differently from those of us on the Back Benches, but it is important that support resources and access to research and drafting are in place to ensure that the opposition can fulfil its functions as the opposition does in other chambers.

We on these Back Benches are often referred to as the "naughty corner". It is probably a badge that some of us wear with honour. Why are we tagged with that? We sit at the back of the class, and that is maybe part of the reason, but we cause trouble for the authority — the Executive — because we provide challenge. We do not accept what we are told, and we will not be talked down to. It is clear from the opposition that Mr McCallister has faced to his proposals that there are those who do not like that scrutiny or that challenge or the fact that, despite our small numbers, we make a big difference and a big noise in the Assembly. We should be confident in our democracy, and a confident Executive would welcome a well-resourced and formal opposition. The three of us who are here right now have, through the private Members' Bills that we have brought in, made a contribution. We are not simply making up the numbers. We can make a difference, but it is important that we have provisions in place. At the moment, we do it in spite of the structures of the Assembly not because of them. In that regard, we should facilitate a stronger opposition to ultimately achieve that aim of better governance.

Mr McCallister: First, in responding to the debate, I thank the Committee for its report and all the parties, not only for contributing to today's debate but for their engagement over a number of months and maybe even longer than that. That engagement has been useful in developing the process and, in listening to that, it will not have been lost on many of you that some of the amendments that I have tabled have been very much a reflection of listening to what has been said in Committee and to some of the evidence from outside, shaping the thinking that we need to do.

What are the changes to opposition that I want to see? When you mention the word "opposition", many people think that it has to look like Westminster. We are different from Westminster, primarily because we use a different electoral system to Westminster. That is one of the key things, and it is a system that I think is good. It will give you a coalition Government no matter what. The Republic of Ireland uses the same electoral system, and I do not think they have had a majority Government since roughly 1977 — a long number of years. I do want to tackle one of the comments made at the outset by Caitríona Ruane on the move and the quote from Professor Coakley about majoritarianism.

In his evidence, Professor Coakley said that there were basically two types of parliamentary system. There is the majoritarian model of Westminster or the Dáil or the more consociational model like Belgium or Switzerland. Those are two examples that he gave. We do not have either. Professor Coakley said:

"It accepts that democracy requires rule by a majority, but it goes further in suggesting that democracy also needs to be inclusive"

The key line is:

"The logic of that system is based on the pursuit of compromise"

We are not good at pursuing compromise, particularly in this Executive. We stall everything. The fact is that, instead of seeking compromise, we use the petition of concern.

In response to a question from Mr Kennedy about whether he could think of another consensus-based model that had a mandatory coalition, Professor Coakley stated:

"I cannot immediately think of any examples of mandatory power-sharing. The closest might be Belgium, but it is not mandatory all-party power-sharing there. There is provision in the constitution that the Government must consist of an equal number of Dutch-speaking and French-speaking Ministers but the Dutch-speaking and French-speaking Ministers can be drawn from any of the three traditional political families”.

We do not fall neatly into that. Our system here was designed to deal with and help us to address our historic divisions. What I have put forward in the Bill in no way damages how we might address those historic divisions. It does not move away from d'Hondt — much to the disappointment, I am sure, of others. It does not move away from that; it stays very firmly with it. In no way would it move us back. You have two safeguards there. D'Hondt cannot be changed, and there was no attempt to change it. D'Hondt is your key to government. Our electoral system — a proportional representation system — also means that you cannot change it.

I listened to the evidence at Committee Stage from academics who talked about needing to maintain stability. In the almost nine years that I have been a Member of the House, it has almost collapsed on numerous occasions. Virtually every year, we have a chat about there being an election before the autumn, before the spring or before the summer — every year. What do we have to do? This is where, I think, Mr Agnew nailed it: we have to get to the point where we deliver good governance.

People out there are crying out for good governance and leadership. Yes, they want safeguards, but neither the Bill nor any of the amendments does any damage to those safeguards and that protection. We should have the confidence, 18 years after the agreement, to move forward and change this.

People say that this is maybe moving too much, but do not forget that we put through a Departments Bill that reduces the number of Departments from 12 to nine. Nearly everyone in the House welcomed it as a good thing, but that Bill changes the d'Hondt calculation slightly; that ups the bar for meeting the d'Hondt calculation. People seem to have missed that. When you reduce the number of Assembly Members from 108 to 90 — and, if during the next five years, we lose two Westminster seats and that reduces the number further to 80 — that changes the chances of some parties being included in the d'Hondt calculation. Those two things change that, and it is almost as though some of the debate and commentary around the Bill ignores that. Those changes are important, and I welcome them, but it is important to note that at no point has anyone suggested that we move away from this and towards some type of majoritarianism. Some of the commentary, certainly at the Committee Stage, was incredibly ill-informed on that, instead of people actually reading what the Bill said.

I turn to the groups of amendments. I accept that Sinn Féin Members oppose all the clauses, but I thank them for their engagement across the process. It now looks as though we will pass a Bill in some form, so that is why I am not incredibly downbeat today because we are going to get a Bill that, for the first time, puts opposition into primary legislation. I think that we will, over the next few stages, get a Bill that does that. I accept that we have a petition of concern to the schedule and to clause 13. That debate is for another occasion. It is slightly ironic that a petition of concern has been used to petition of concern changes to the petition of concern. I would like to have seen those changes.

Looking at what is left in the Bill, there are still significant opportunities in it to create space for an opposition. I welcome the possibility of going beyond just saying that it has to be a d'Hondt party that forms the opposition. I think that, otherwise, you lessen the chance of getting an opposition. Why would someone choose to go into opposition when they can have all the trappings of the Government? Mr Agnew made the point of asking this: why would you go into opposition when you can be the internal opposition in the Government? That is the problem. I said it at Second Stage, and I say it again: that has bedevilled us now for years. We have a Government and an opposition, but they are just all the one people. They are the same Members. Government and opposition need to be separate and distinct roles.

Look at the amendments that I have tabled on the changes of title. That was done in order to consociationalise much more the names of the title. In response, Mr McKay made the point about Scotland and Wales in an intervention to Mr Allister. I would say on that subject that we should not confuse not having the title “leader of the opposition” with being in opposition. I do not think that Mr McKay's party colleague Mr Adams has the title “leader” or “deputy leader of the opposition”, but I suggest that he considers himself very much in opposition in Dáil Éireann, and will possibly continue or might be in the Government in a few months. But those are changes.

5.30 pm

In the Scottish Parliament, as Mr Allister rightly pointed out, the Conservatives, Labour and the Lib Dems are all in opposition to the SNP Government. The Labour Government in the Welsh Assembly are opposed by the Welsh Conservatives, Plaid Cymru and the Lib Dems. So, do not make that mistake. That is why I listened to some of the evidence in Committee and said, “Look, I am prepared to move on these titles and to ask whether that is something that people might feel more comfortable with”. I am perfectly comfortable with the titles “leader of the opposition” and “deputy leader of the opposition”. I think they bring clarity, but if others were more comfortable with changing those to “leader of the largest non-Executive party”, which would be more reflective of what happens in Scotland, I am comfortable with that. I have no doubt what it means.

Mr Agnew: Will the Member give way?

Mr McCallister: Certainly.

Mr Agnew: I appreciate the point he is making. I made reference in my speech to the lack of understanding that there perhaps is of the difference between our Executive and our Assembly. Surely the language of government and opposition is much more familiar to people.

Mr McCallister: I take Mr Agnew's point. It is much more familiar, and we are used to it. That is probably a simple reflection of our coverage of Westminster, and it gives that familiarity. If that is voted through when the Question on clause 6 standing part of the Bill is put, I will happily not move the amendments. By simply tabling them, I wanted to give the Assembly the opportunity to say that it preferred the other titles or, indeed, to make space and provision in Standing Orders for those other titles. I think that is something worth looking at.

Before turning to all the amendments, I will make a few key points. The first is on my amendment No 1, which will create qualifying parties. I think that is a very important amendment. I am prepared to not move it today but to come back at Further Consideration Stage with more or less the same amendment but with the figure changed to 8% from 5%. For that reason, I will not move amendment No 1, and I think that amendment No 3 is the other one that is linked to those changes.

Mr Allister: Will the Member give way?

Mr McCallister: Yes.

Mr Allister: I am sure the Member has considered all the ramifications. Could he advise the House what difference accepting 8%, which, I think, would equate to nine MLAs, is likely to make to the qualifying threshold for a place in government under d'Hondt?

Mr McCallister: I am grateful to the Member. D'Hondt is just a mathematical calculation, and it can depend, of course, on where all the parties are. For example, in 2011, had the Ulster Unionists one more Member, the Alliance Party would have been outside the d'Hondt process, and that would have knocked it about. My best guess is that you are probably looking at a d'Hondt calculation requirement of 12 or 13 MLAs for one Minister. It might reduce down to that somewhat, although it might be higher. Do not forget that there will be nine Departments, so that is why the number will be up slightly. But it again depends on where other parties come. This will reduce it and will give the option to smaller parties if they grow and are more successful. Indeed, the Alliance Party is currently very near that level; if they were to turn down the tempting offer of Justice, perhaps, in the next mandate.

That is why I think it is important. There are several things. It is not only about being a d'Hondt party but about asking parties to come out of government. I have concerns about the wording in Fresh Start that says that parties have to declare whether they are going into government before they are permitted to take part in the Programme for Government negotiations. That might cause some difficulties in how the process would be managed. That is what I propose to do with amendment No 1. I hope to get agreement from across the House when it comes back at Further Consideration Stage.

I turn to the broad issues of technical groups and the Budget Committee. As Mr Attwood said, the Budget process has been very unsatisfactory for a long time. A full five years ago, at the end of the last mandate, the Finance and Personnel Committee did its own report examining legislative provisions to allow for a Budget Committee to be established and whether an amendment to legislation is required, and considering the potential membership of a Budget Committee and whether there would be the possibility of a conflict of interest if you were to sit on it and on another Statutory Committee. There was also to be a memorandum of understanding signed between the Assembly and the Executive. I think that I am correct in saying that that has not been signed yet — a mere five years after the fact. I will quote from the Committee's conclusions:

"a scrutiny model which included a central budget committee warranted more consideration in the future, and stated 'In the longer term, there is a case for the Assembly considering how its financial scrutiny system, including committee structures, could be reformed for enhanced effectiveness' ... the idea of reforming the Assembly financial scrutiny system to establish a more powerful central budget committee should be reconsidered in the future, if the proposed reforms to processes and procedures that are set out in this Report fail to have the desired outcome."

It is fair to say that the desires of that report have not materialised, so it is now time that we look seriously at our Budget process. As I pointed out in an intervention to Mr Attwood, if we are serious about devolving more powers to this House and about being at the forefront of the larger conversation and debate that is going on across the UK about what powers devolved regions of our nation have, and, if some parties like Sinn Féin are serious that they want their hands on more of the fiscal levers that operate this — that is something that I am supportive of, but devolving corporation tax powers or certain income tax powers comes with its own difficulties — we need to lift our game significantly.

We would then become more than just an Assembly and Executive that spends money without thinking about the consequences for how you raise money or cuts corporation tax without thinking about how you fill the gap in skills funding. We would have to deal with all the questions that flow from that. We would need to look at our economic data. If we are getting the Northern Ireland fiscal affairs council to tie in with that and have that scrutiny where it belongs in our representative democracy here in the Assembly, that is very much in need of reform. I encourage Members to support changing that. I hope that, even though Sinn Féin opposes the clauses, it will look at amendments like that and, even at this late stage, recognise that there is likely to be a Bill passed and try to shape some of it.

I accept that, during the work on the Committee report, the issue of technical groups vexed many Committee members. I can tell you that there was a look of fear when the very idea of Steven Agnew being some sort of leader of the opposition assisted by Jim Allister was mentioned; that was just too much to bear.

I accept, from the Committee report and process, that I have, through amendments, stripped technical groups of the right to form an opposition, but technical groups are very much in line with many other Parliaments that make up our United Kingdom and these islands. I gave some examples to the Committee. The European Parliament was mentioned by Mr Allister, who is a former Member of it. He took advantage of being in a technical group. Its threshold is 3.3% to qualify for a technical group. In Dáil Éireann, it is just over 4%. In the Scottish Parliament, it is five Members out of 129, which is 3.9%. That does not prevent other parties doing that. In the Republic of Ireland, there is a huge tradition of independents. I think that, as the research carried out during the Committee Stage showed, there were 21 members of the Dáil technical group. That is one more than the largest opposition party of Fianna Fáil, but the technical group does not get the rights; Fianna Fáil does. The technical group gets the speaking rights, which is right and proper. I was happy to concede that my original thinking of technical groups was that they could form an opposition if no one else was willing to step into that role.

Technical groups would make a useful addition. They would have very limited additional rights, but perhaps they could have the right to have a seat on the Business Committee. At the minute, we have no way of tabling motions. We cannot even table an Adjournment topic, as has been said before. The Democratic Unionist Party has eight Members, or 1.2% of the seats, in the House of Commons, and yet it is allocated some Opposition Day debates. Nigel Dodds, as DUP leader in Westminster, gets picked fairly regularly to ask a question to the Prime Minister. I am glad that it has the rights to do that. Let us have some rights for the affectionately named "naughty corner" here. Over time, this corner has played an important role in bringing forward and pushing for legislation. Sometimes, it is almost like the children's fairy tale: somebody has to say that the emperor has no clothes in this place. The Government are not always right on things. They need to be told that and held to account, but that should not come from inside the Government; that makes our Government look, to use Peter Robinson's phrase, "dysfunctional". It means that we become a laughing stock outside. The case for technical groups — I accept that they are stripped of the right to form an opposition — is very strong. I encourage Members to support that proposition.

Some of the costs are very modest; there is actually a saving. We are about to get rid of three Departments. That means that we will go down by three Committees as well, which saves over £500,000. Even if we were to have a budget committee, we would still be about £300,000 better off. Even if we were to hold a review of financial assistance to political parties and give some more support to opposition, we would still be in a position to save money. If we looked beyond that, at why the Assembly pays all ministerial salaries, you could save more money from that as well. This Assembly's Budget is beholden to the Executive arm of government, which is a problem that needs to be addressed. So implementing all the changes could be cost-neutral because of the change in the Committee structure.

5.45 pm

Others have questioned the need for salaries. In Scotland and Wales, leaders of opposition or non-Government parties get a salary, regardless of whether they take it or use it to employ people. I am relatively relaxed about that. However, I made the point at the Committee that, when it comes to an opposition holding the Government to account, if you have even four parties in a coalition, you end up with nearly 100 Members from governing parties, with all the financial assistance that that brings. You end up with Departments that have a total of 25,000 civil servants working for them, and you end up with 18 or 19 SpAds. Yet, somehow, people are fearful of an opposition of nine or 10 Members or a technical group in the corner that does not get opposition rights but gets modest funding.

We want to get to a point where we have scrutiny, deliver good governance and deliver for the people who send us here to represent their interests. It is an enormous privilege to do that.

Before I go through the amendments, I will set some context by outlining what was said in the debate. Ms Ruane made a point about majoritarianism, and I nailed that myth: there was never — in any of my plans, in this Bill or in any of the amendments that have been tabled — any attempt to do that. I want to see, and I have always said this, genuine power-sharing and people working for the common good, not this shared-out power. That is worth looking at.

Ms Bradley talked about the technical groups, which I have dealt with.

If the Assembly votes to accept clause 6, which would create a leader and deputy leader of the opposition, the change of titles in amendment Nos 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 17, 21, 22 and 25 would probably become unnecessary.

There are several points that I want to make in response to Mr Attwood. I agree with him that this is a chance to put this into law. There is a chance to do that, which will make it difficult for future Executives to take it away. That is a point that Mr Kennedy made at Second Stage: enshrining it in law was a good thing. He said:

"Our preferred option has also been to enshrine the right of the opposition in legislation because we believe that simply changing Standing Orders leaves the future existence of the opposition in the hands, potentially, of the largest parties in this or any future Assembly. Let us not forget that the Stormont House Agreement promised formal opposition structures by March 2015; here we are in October and still there are no opposition rights for parties that are not in the Executive." — [Official Report (Hansard), Bound Volume 108, p103, col 1].

Here we are in February — I almost said "January" — and still there are no opposition rights. I very much agree with Mr Kennedy's point.

Mr Attwood also talked about OFMDFM being elected. I warn him that petition-of-concerning clause 13 may leave it difficult for him to table the amendment on electing the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister. He could have petition-of-concerned the schedule and not clause 13 and still left such an amendment as a viable option. Clauses 13, 14, 15 and the schedule sought to trigger debate on issues that we could not deal with. The SDLP might have just killed that part of the Bill off.

There is one point on which I disagree with him strongly. He made a comment about the authority of Ministers and the rationale of power-sharing. I take a contrary view, because, by doing it in the way that we do it, we end up, as Eoin O'Malley, who gave evidence to the Committee, said, with a situation in which:

"Northern Irish ministers and departments operate almost as dictators within their own portfolio, not subject to the requirement to have cross-community support in areas that don't require primary legislation. This seems at odds to the purpose of the institutional structures set up in the Belfast Agreement."

That is an important point. The thread throughout the Bill about the single unitary government, which Mr Agnew talked about, collective Cabinet government and agreeing a Programme for Government before you run d'Hondt — all those measures — have been seeking to drive us down a road where you are forced to build consensus and look like a Government that are going in the one direction and know roughly where they are going, instead of pulling in many different directions, with Ministers, as Dr O'Malley said, able to act like "dictators" in their own wee fiefdom. That seems very much at odds with the spirit and principle of the Good Friday Agreement.

Yes, Mr Kennedy seemed to be making the argument about legislation, but what he really meant was legislation at Westminster. I will point out what Lord Empey proposed to bring in the House of Lords. He wanted the opposition to have speaking rights; that is in my Bill. He wanted it to have supply days; that is in my Bill. He wanted it to have Chair and Deputy Chairperson of the Public Accounts Committee; that is in my Bill. He proposed that those be allocated in a manner that is appropriate to their status in the Assembly; that is in the Bill. He also proposed that the Speaker should determine what is proportionate, and that that be set out in Standing Orders. Again, it is in the Bill that we would work that. Furthermore, Westminster legislation would determine that we only change Standing Orders. That is exactly what this is doing. We have the competency to do it here; why would we not do it here? Why would we let Westminster do it? I also point out that Lord Empey set the number for opposition at the very low level of just one Member, which might be good news for colleagues in a party here.

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member for giving way. Mr McCallister's problem is that, whilst all of that is in the Bill at the moment, will it stay there? I think that events today, and the manoeuvres that are ongoing, make that very uncertain. Hence, Westminster legislation gives better protections from the sheer political ambitions of the big power blocks here at present.

Mr McCallister: I am grateful to Mr Kennedy, but he should consider that, since the Good Friday Agreement, Westminster has changed, at St Andrews, things like the way in which the First Minister and the deputy First Minister are elected or appointed, and the fact that we never formed an Ad Hoc Committee to look at the likes of petitions of concern. His party has probably suffered from the debate about the First Minister and the deputy First Minister situation. I warn him: he might want to be careful about what he wishes for from his friends in here, but maybe he should not get too excited about what he will get from his friends at Westminster. I agree that it is better to have it based in legislation, as you and Mr Attwood said. I think that it is important that it stays, and why the Bill is here.

I am not as downbeat about the Bill as Mr Kennedy or Mr Lunn are.

I think that there are still many measures in the Bill that we have the competence to deal with here. We can and should deal with them. People are debating the principle of having an opposition. The fact that the SDLP and others accept the principle of opposition — even Sinn Féin, while it wants to do it by a different way — is a huge advance from where we were three or four years ago. When I started this process and the debate about opposition, not many to my right would even have mentioned the word instead of making it up. It may have been longer ago for Mr Attwood; he is not as recent a convert.

I have dealt with the important issues around Mr Allister's points on the technical groups, from his experience both at the European Parliament and his time here, and the difficulties in doing that. I agree with him. I know that it has certainly been problematic. Sometimes, when you seek certain rights, it can be batted about between the Business Committee and the Committee on Procedures, with nobody quite wanting to make a decision. Again, that comes back to why the Bill is so important. Over the next few hours and possibly next Monday, Members have to make a decision on what they are voting for. That is why the Bill just cannot go the way of another report.

You cannot just say, "Well done, everybody. That was a fascinating read". This has to be voted on. People have to say yes or no. They have to show the colour of their money. That is very important.

I just want to deal with a couple of Mr Agnew's points. I agree entirely with his point that we have been good at the peace process but we need more than government by peace process negotiation. We need to do better than to simply say, "We have hit a crisis so we'd better ring David and Enda to see if they can come and help us out", and then say to them, "Can you come and gently nudge us through? And don't forget to bring the chequebook with you". We need to do better than that — everyone here — as parties that are working and investing in actually developing the policies, ideas and politics of aspiration for the people we serve. Otherwise, why are we here? Why is this institution here? What are we seeking in politics?

I genuinely believe that most people come into politics to pursue noble causes and better the lives of the constituents in the areas that they live in and represent. I have no doubt about the motivations of most people in the Chamber, but you want to get on and deliver that. Sometimes, I see Ministers who want to get on and deliver some type of reform but cannot do it. We are four and a bit years into Transforming Your Care. How much of it have we delivered? I might not like the direction of travel of some Executive policies — that is fine — but if, at least, the Executive were agreed on them and were going in that direction, I could understand that and respect it. When the Executive hit a difficult decision and everyone runs for cover, it makes you look dysfunctional. It is not the way to conduct government.

It is about getting good governance that is held to account by an opposition that provides the voting public with an alternative at a future election. We are in the politics of zero consequences, politics where elections do not really matter that much. We might change a few faces here and there, but, overall, the same numbers will come back. Think how different it might have looked in the autumn, when we were in crisis, had there been a viable opposition challenging the lead parties in the Government. There might have been a real fear factor about having an election. It might have been a real motivator to sort out the problems. That is the difference. That is why we need to get that.

It is true that we all get tarred with the one brush. Many a time, I am asked, "What are youse all doing up there?". People do not see delivery. They see an economy languishing behind the rest of the UK, never mind behind the Republic of Ireland. They see hospitals and the health service in difficulty and do not see reform coming. They see limited reform on education. We see all that right across government. The Bill is all about driving us to a point at which we build consensus between government parties and have negotiations and government parties then sort their internal problems behind closed doors, present a policy and a united front and stand by that policy rather than all heading for the hills when something gets slightly difficult and they are pushed to uncomfortable places. That is not what governing is or should be about. We all lose credibility.

The Tories and Lib Dems were pushed to uncomfortable places: the Lib Dems over tuition fees and the Conservatives over House of Lords reform. We read bits and pieces about it, but the Government did not collapse. They did not need somebody to come in from Europe to sort out their problems or a former US senator to help them through the difficulties. Look at the difficult decisions that the Republic of Ireland has had to make over the last eight or nine years. That is why a single unitary Government and a collective Cabinet make such a difference to the way in which they do their business. That is why I put it in. You have the authority of Ministers acting here, but it is acting in a shared-out way and saying, "There is so much for you, and there is so much for you". We need government to act, speak and deliver as one unit. That is what I call genuine power-sharing. It is genuine power-sharing based firmly on the principles of the Good Friday Agreement and genuine power-sharing that will deliver for the people of Northern Ireland. On some of the amendments —

Mr Kennedy: Will the Member give way?

Mr McCallister: Certainly.

Mr Kennedy: I am interested in what the Member has just said, but quite profound ideological reasons have separated parties, even around the Executive table. His remarks do not seem to take full account of that.

Mr McCallister: I accept that there are ideological differences between parties, but it is up to them to agree what they can agree and to start to deliver. Our big difficulty is that they barely deliver even on the stuff that they agree on. That is the problem. That is probably difficult because you have five parties in government, and it is difficult to negotiate.

Mr Kennedy: Four.

Mr McCallister: Sorry, four parties now. It will probably be back to five after the election.

We are not the only place in western Europe that has to address these issues. We are not the only place in western Europe that uses a system of PR and has coalition Governments. Our ideological divides might be quite profound, but the Belgians can do it. In one case, they took a long time to get agreement on forming a Government, but they got agreement, formed a Government and governed, whereas we just use the system, get into government and then think about what we will do. We have to get beyond that, or the voting public will not be interested in coming out to support any of us, never mind with any enthusiasm. So many of our young people are now more interested in Westminster politics than in what happens here, even though the Assembly has huge powers over every aspect of their lives.

I will do a quick run-through on the amendments. I will not move amendment No 1 and will bring it back at Further Consideration Stage with the figure changed to 8%. Amendment Nos 2 and 3 are about taking technical groups out of the Bill. Amendment No 4 is probably unnecessary if others are made. Amendment Nos 5, 6 and 7 deal with technical groups.

I will probably not move some in that sequence, and the eight or nine amendments on changing titles. Amendment Nos 9, 10, 11, 12 and 13 are about changing titles, so I will wait and see what the House decides on that matter.

The next set of amendments removes technical groups. Amendment No 16 is important in that we should, at least, allow Standing Orders to provide for different names or titles — or, indeed, no title — for the equivalent of leaders of the opposition.

Amendment No 18 is important because it commits to speaking rights. Mr Kennedy and others alluded to it being important that that issue stayed. Amendment No 19 is, again, around speaking rights. Amendment No 20 states that after a Government is formed, speaking rights for the opposition will be enhanced by 20%: if we have an opposition.

Amendment Nos 21 and 22 are, again, about the names of opposition leaders or positions. My amendment Nos 23 and 24 relate to the right to allow a technical group. I appeal to Members to consider it. I have pared them way back to allow us just to have technical groups in here. It is a recognised right. It was a right used in the Dáil by Sinn Féin before they exceeded the seven seat threshold. So, it is a right that they used, and we should have it here, if so desired. That technical group would also have access to the Business Committee.

Amendment No 25 is, again, about opposition names and may not be moved. Amendment Nos 26 and 27 are about the Budget Committee. These are hugely important amendments and add significantly to the Bill because of the way our Budget process has been handled. I do not think that anyone looks on the way that our Budget is done with a great sense of pride. We need a better system and we need to do it much better. Amendment No 28, from the SDLP, is about that issue. It might be worth looking to see whether the party would consider an independent fiscal council for Northern Ireland at Further Consideration Stage and if that would be a useful addition. I am supporting amendment No 29, which is a DUP amendment about the removal of technical groups.

That concludes my remarks at the end of the group 1 debate.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Mr McCallister: Are you wanting more? [Laughter.]

Mr McCartney: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Thank you very much, Mr Speaker.

I would like to put our position on the Bill on the record. It is founded on the fact that the Fresh Start Agreement of last November made provision for an official opposition to be put in place by administrative means and not requiring primary legislation because it is an excepted matter. We feel that that position is the way that can deliver the need and demand for opposition in the Assembly.

Today, as part of the commentary, we were accused of being inconsistent over a number of clauses. The clause that Members talked about most was clause 20, and that somehow because we might be in favour of it, that we were being inconsistent or, perhaps, that we should be voting for it. I would rather be here to defend a consistent position than one of inconsistency, because I can well imagine that if we had stood in opposition to all clauses except clause 20, then people would have been pointing out that inconsistency. So, that is the basis on which we have done this.

There is no doubt that the case for an opposition has been accepted. That is why it has taken root in the Fresh Start Agreement. Members have talked about the slowness of bringing those proposals to the Assembly, and, yesterday, the motion was tabled, and I suppose that we are seeing some movement on that. Bear in mind that two other aspects of the Fresh Start Agreement on changing the architecture of the Assembly have already been put in place. Those are the Departments Bill and the Assembly Members (Reduction of Numbers) Bill. I think that we all accept that it will be a number of weeks before this Bill, which tries to set up an opposition, can get assent, so it not as if we need this Bill through to ensure that we have opposition next Monday or Tuesday. We are not getting that. Sometimes, the criticism of the Fresh Start is nearly because people are lukewarm about it, and that is fine. I think that most Members are suggesting that the need for an opposition is for the next mandate, and I have absolutely no doubt that it should be in place for that.

One thing that I suppose is common to a number of pieces of legislation is that, when you bring it into Committee Stage, you get a better sense of what people are trying to achieve. Other people, particularly experts and academics, come to the table and start to talk about this. One of the common features, which I accept was a bit of a surprise to me, is that a lot of oppositional models are not brought about by primary legislation. Indeed, the academic and research papers that we got at Committee Stage said that there is nearly an absence of legislation in setting up oppositional models in many parliamentary systems across the world. The route to it, in many ways, is by convention or, if you like, political maturity or political demand. I see Fresh Start as the way of doing that. Sometimes, when people speak about oppositional models, they feel that there is a perfect model. Sometimes they look to Westminster and try to create the image that somehow that is locked down in legislation and immutable.

Mr McCallister: I am grateful to the Member for giving way. Will he accept that Westminster is significantly older than this Assembly by a huge number of years? As I said in Committee, this Assembly is a creature of statute. It is set up by statute. Effectively, the 1998 Act is our constitution, and that is why I think that it was important to give confidence in doing that in Standing Orders. The debate that has resulted from the Bill having been tabled has literally all been done in public session. It has been good that that has been done, and people know exactly what they are signing up for. That is why I think that putting it in primary legislation is so important.

Mr McCartney: I understand the point that the Member is making, but what I am trying to say is that Fresh Start and most of the clauses in your Bill, particularly those dealing with this aspect of it, make a demand that this has to go through procedures and Standing Orders, so it shows that the Assembly can affirm it. That public debate, which obviously was part of the Committee Stage, can also take place in the Procedures Committee and allow us to do that.

I want to reflect back, because I think that we have to ask the question. We have certainly asked ourselves whether there is a need for legislation to bring about an opposition. I think that the answer is very clearly no. This can be done, and we have seen many models in many other different places. I have heard, maybe here in the Chamber but certainly in the public airwaves, the idea that it is somehow not democratic that the Chair of the Public Accounts Committee is from a party that is in the Executive and that the Chair must be a Member from a non-government party or, indeed, an opposition party. When the academics presented to the Committee, they took 21 examples from across the world. Personally, I was waiting for them to say it was 21 out of 21, because, let us face it, everybody told us that that the perfect model was that the PAC Chair had to be in opposition. It was actually the opposite; it was only three out of 21. The idea that there is a perfect model that we have to follow blindly is, in my opinion, wrong. This Assembly came out of a particular set of circumstances, therefore we have to be mindful of that.

Many Members have talked about the need for an opposition. In fairness to Alex Attwood, he talked about the SDLP talking about it as far back as 2012, I think he said. However, there was not much talk about it in 1998.

From 1998 up to a few years ago, there was not much talk about opposition. You often wondered and asked yourself why that was case, and I think that people have to be honest about that.

6.15 pm

The way John McCallister has come at this has been informative. From his discussions with the Committee and with our party when we met him a number of times, nobody doubts the genuineness of what he is trying to do. However, when he talked today about other things, there was this idea that, if we had an opposition, all else would flow. I do not think that that is the case: that, all of a sudden, whatever criticisms people have of the Assembly, whether it is dysfunctional or whether it does not work as well as it should, will be addressed. I think that Danny Kennedy was right when he pointed out that there are big differences across the Executive. It is right that those should come out and that, every now and again, there should be blocks to progress because there is an ideological difference. On the idea of opposition equalling perfection, equalling all our ills being cured, I think that, if you went to England, for example, people there would say the exact same thing: all that lot up there are useless. Sometimes, they will not make the distinction between people in Government and people in opposition. As a matter of fact, you have heard people talk time and again about the change in Government — Tweedledum to Tweedledee. So, again, this idea of the perfection of opposition can be overstated.

Jim Allister — I notice that he is not in his place — gave us a lecture about going into a classroom full of 12-year-olds who would tell you, "Here are the basic tenets of democracy: a democratic institution has to have the following or else they will not recognise it as a democratic institution." I do not know if that is true, but you could ask the same 12-year-olds this: is it right to have a one-party state; is it right to have gerrymandering; and is it right to skew elections and not give people equal franchise? I think that all those 12-year-olds would say no. That is one of the reasons why we have this model, why we are very guarded and why, in all our discussions here, at Committee and in private conversations with you, we have always pointed that out. We are not going to allow this House to slip or sleepwalk into the idea of majority rule being better or Westminster being better so let us try to creep towards that. That is not going to happen.

Jim Allister obviously misquoted Caitríona Ruane when he tried to give the idea that she said that what you are proposing is somehow "Frankenstein's monster". That came from one of the academics who very clearly said that, in his opinion, grafting one system onto the other is "Frankenstein's monster". I think that he has good credibility to say that. You can see the desire, and you can see where people are trying to do it with community designation, that it is well intentioned, but the reason why it is in is firmly rooted in the reason why the type of democratic institution that we have here is necessary. It is the same with weighted majorities.

On the issue of — I know that this is for the next set of amendments — petitions of concern and an Ad Hoc Committee, there was an Ad Hoc Committee on welfare reform. It was very clearly down on one particular position, but then there was a vote and the vote overturned the working out of the Committee. So the idea that you have a Committee that might scrutinise something, but if it comes down to weighted majorities, sometimes you can have the wrong result because people vote along party lines, political lines and ideological lines. That is why you have a weighted majority and the mechanisms to ensure that minorities are protected. In my opinion, anything that undermines that principle is —

Mr McCallister: I am grateful to Raymond for another intervention. There were a couple of things throughout his comments. First, the World Bank recommends that opposition parties chair a public accounts committee. Moreover, there is nothing in the Bill that points to a “Frankenstein’s monster”. Our electoral system and d’Hondt are all your guarantees into Government. On moving away from designation to a weighted majority, a weighted majority still protects people, and you can set it at whatever level you think appropriate. I agree that all those protections should be there.

However, you cannot then start to complain when others use the petition of concern. It is part of the system, and that takes away your right to complain when others use it against equal marriage, for example. It would have been a huge sacrifice by the DUP because it could have triggered a weighted majority vote. However, unless the DUP gets about 45 seats after an election, it does not have the numbers to block it.

Mr McCartney: Thank you for that point. I suppose that the discussion about the petition of concern is for the next stage.

I want to finish on this point: if, on behalf of Sinn Féin, I was making the case that this idea was like “Frankenstein’s monster”, I would understand why you said that. However, we did not say that; it was said by someone who had cast a cold eye on the Bill. They warned you, and cautioned us, not to do this because it tries to blend two different models, and one model, the one that we have here, was set up for particular reasons. Those reasons still exist, and any tampering with that model could lead to a slide. That is why we oppose this aspect of the Bill. We fully support opposition as designated by the Fresh Start Agreement.

Mr Speaker: Before I put the Question, I remind Members that we have debated Mr McCartney’s opposition to clause 1, but the Question will be put in the positive as usual.

I must, therefore, advise the House that today's proceedings on the Bill will now stop. The Business Committee has scheduled the remaining part of the Consideration Stage for Monday 8 February.

The last item, and the most popular item of the day, is the adjournment.

Adjourned at 8.02 pm.

Northern Ireland Assembly

Monday 8 February 2016

The Assembly met at 12.00 noon (Mr Speaker in the Chair).

Members observed two minutes' silence.

Assembly Business

Mr Cochrane-Watson: On a point of order, Mr Speaker. Do you agree that the place to make announcements is in this House? I refer to the announcement made after 6.00 pm on Friday by the Enterprise, Trade and Investment Minister on his proposal to close the Northern Ireland renewable heat incentive. That will have a very detrimental effect on jobs and local business. Do you agree that the Minister should have brought such an announcement to the House, prior to releasing it in the press?

Mr Speaker: I am aware that a question for urgent oral answer on that same topic was not accepted. I draw it to the Member's attention that points of order should not be used in that way. I have urged Ministers to bring forward their statements in the way that is most accommodating for Members' interests as well. However, ultimately, at the end of the day, when to issue a statement is a matter for the Minister, not the Speaker.

Committee Deputy Chairperson Appointment

Mr Speaker: Before we proceed to today's business, I have some announcements to make. I wish to inform the House that I received correspondence from Mr Dominic Bradley, resigning his position as Deputy Chairperson of the Committee for Finance and Personnel with effect from 4 February 2016. Furthermore, the nominating officer for the SDLP has informed me that Ms Claire Hanna has been nominated as Deputy Chairperson of the Committee for Finance and Personnel. Ms Hanna accepted the nomination, and I am satisfied that the requirements of Standing Orders have been met. I can confirm that the appointment took effect on 4 February 2016.

Standing Orders 10(2) to 10(4): Suspension

Mr Dickson: I beg to move

That Standing Orders 10(2) to 10(4) be suspended for 8 February 2016.

Mr Speaker: Before we proceed to the Question, I remind Members that this motion requires cross-community support.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved (with cross-community support):

That Standing Orders 10(2) to 10(4) be suspended for 8 February 2016.

Committee Membership

Mr Speaker: The next item on the Order Paper is a motion regarding Committee membership. As with similar motions, it will be treated as a business motion and there will be no debate.

Resolved:

That Mrs Dolores Kelly replace Mr Seán Rogers as a member of the Committee for Education; that Mr Alex Attwood replace Mr Patsy McGlone as a member of the Committee for Justice; and that Mr Patsy McGlone replace Ms Claire Hanna as a member of the Committee for the Environment. — [Mrs McKeivitt.]

Assembly and Executive Reform (Assembly Opposition) Bill: Consideration Stage

Debate resumed.

Clause 13 (Assembly Executive and Reform Motion)

Mr Speaker: Order. Last Tuesday afternoon, a valid petition of concern was tabled to clause 13 during the Consideration Stage of the Assembly and Executive Reform (Assembly Opposition) Bill. That meant that, under Standing Order 28, the Question on clause 13 stand part of the Bill could not be taken at that time and would be required to be taken on a cross-community basis. Members will also note that valid petitions of concern have been tabled to clauses 20 and 21 and to the schedule. Each will therefore require a cross-community vote.

We will now move on to the Question on clause 13. Mr McCartney's opposition to clause 13 stand part has already been debated. Before I put the Question, I remind Members that clause 13 requires cross-community support due to a valid petition of concern.

Casement Park: Adjacent Houses

1. Mr McCausland asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure when and how she first became aware that it might be necessary to purchase and demolish houses adjacent to Casement Park to provide adequate emergency exiting. (AQO 9552/11-16)

Ms Ní Chuilín (The Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure): I thank the Member for his question. It has been alleged that I and departmental officials were aware of a suggested need to purchase and demolish houses adjacent to Casement Park as far back as the summer of 2012. That is utterly untrue and unworthy of belief. As the design team for the project was not formally appointed until 3 September 2012, there would not have been any design information, even preliminary sketches, available for discussion prior to its appointment. I understand that designs were first considered by the safety technical group (STG) on 11 February 2013.

As previously stated, I was unaware of allegations in relation to concerns around emergency exiting at Casement Park prior to Paul Scott's appearance at the Committee for Culture, Arts and Leisure on 30 April 2015. Indeed, I made that point clear in my evidence at a subsequent Committee appearance on 21 May 2015. I still stand by that statement.

Mr McCausland: I thank the Minister for her answer, but, with respect, it is not a full answer, and that is a matter we will return to. Will she acknowledge that she should have been aware of the serious issues around emergency exiting when the then chief executive of Sport Northern Ireland, after one year in post, had a full-page interview in the 'Belfast Telegraph' in which she referred specifically to serious issues about emergency exiting? Was the Minister not aware of those concerns at that early stage?

Ms Ní Chuilín: All those allegations have been countered by a sequence of independent reports. That article has been referred to on at least two other occasions. I would assume, as the Member, indeed all Members, should assume, that anyone working with the Department, particularly around these alleged safety concerns, really should have brought them to my attention, and they did not. I say again that the first I was made aware of this was when Mr Scott appeared in front of the Committee on 30 April last year.

Mr Lynch: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as an fhreagra sin. Minister, did Sport NI's chair, board members or staff at any stage raise any concerns with you regarding emergency exiting at Casement?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I thank the Member for his supplementary question. The answer is no. No one at Sport NI — not the previous or current boards, chief executives or chairs — made me aware at any stage of any concerns that they had around emergency exiting at Casement Park. For the information of the Member and other Members, Sport NI also sits on the stadium programme sponsor board, which I chair. If people have concerns, that is the place for them to be raised, and they never raised any issues around emergency evacuation. As I said — and I say again — the first I was made aware of any such allegations or concerns was when they were raised by Mr Scott at the Culture, Arts and Leisure Committee in April 2015.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): Question 2 has been withdrawn.

Archery

3. Mr McMullan asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure to outline the departmental support and opportunities available to athletes competing in archery. (AQO 9554/11-16)

Ms Ní Chuilín: I thank the Member for his question. In the three years until March 2016, Sport NI will have awarded almost £50,000 from its athlete investment programme to the NI Archery Society towards costs in implementing a training and competition programme for targeted athletes. In the same period, Sport NI invested £75,000 in the society from its own performance focus programme. The investment relates in particular to talent identification and development. I am content that that support helped to provide opportunities for athletes from across the North to achieve considerable success at various international and national archery competitions during the past year. It is remarkable that four individuals won a total of 14 medals and that two teams won a gold and silver medal respectively. I take this opportunity to congratulate each and every one of them on that fantastic achievement.

Mr McMullan: I thank the Minister for her answers to date. What is the Minister's Department doing to help all athletes in general who wish to compete in the 2016 Olympics in Rio?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I thank the Member for his supplementary question. It is quite important that all Members be aware that Sport NI is doing everything that it can to provide support to athletes from other sports who intend to compete in the 2016 Olympic and Paralympic Games. The performance focus programme, which also supports the employment of expertise in sports and development in the high-performance systems, has been very beneficial for athletes and, indeed, their governing bodies in the past. As well as this, the athlete investment programme provides assistance towards costs incurred by athletes to undertake the required training and competition programmes and in support of elements of the athletes' living costs, which I know the Member has raised previously. Those programmes also provide planning, sports science and sports medicine services, which have been serviced by the Sports Institute.

Mr McCausland: The Minister referred to support for the NI Archery Society, which I assume refers to the Northern Ireland Archery Society. I welcome the support for a Northern Ireland-focused organisation. Will she also therefore be supportive of the Northern Ireland boxing association in its efforts to secure recognition and support from Sport NI?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I am absolutely not supportive of a separate boxing association, as the Member will know. In fact, I feel that not only the Chair of the CAL Committee but his colleagues and others have ended up putting some of the athletes under terrible pressure in a year in which they will be competing in the Rio Olympics. I think that that is disgraceful.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): Patsy McGlone is not in his place.

Football Stadia: Funding

5. Mr Weir asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure when she will announce funding for the subregional football stadia. (AQO 9556/11-16)

Ms Ní Chuilín: I thank the Member for his question. In March 2011, the Executive endorsed an investment of £36 million for subregional stadia development for football as a priority in the next comprehensive spending review period. The subregional stadia programme for soccer has a 12-week consultation, which commenced on 30 November 2015 and will run until 22 February 2016. Once the stakeholder consultation exercise is complete and the programme has been finalised, I expect it to be open for applications. That will be later in 2016, and my officials will be available to offer advice and support to potential applicants throughout the process.

Given our growing reputation and ability to attract large-scale events for sports and entertainment, there is a need for the provision of international-standard facilities capable of hosting major events. The provision of subregional training facilities suitable for hosting major events such as the Rugby World Cup is also essential. It is my intention to submit a bid for funding for a second phase of the subregional programme to meet the needs of soccer, Gaelic and rugby in the next comprehensive spending review.

Mr Weir: I thank the Minister for her response so far. The Minister said that, whatever emerges, her officials will be available for advice and support to football clubs. Obviously, it is likely that, whatever the final announcement, it will have some element or cocktail of matched funding being required. Can the Minister give a particular assurance that there will be assistance to the clubs from her officials in helping to find that matched funding?

Ms Ní Chuilín: It is not my officials' job to find matched funding, but it is their job to try to give them assistance with information. Through discussions that I have had personally with local government and the councils and, indeed, with some clubs, I know that this is a difficulty for them. Some clubs are looking at what they can do on a geographical basis to try to make sure that there is a facility in an area. As I said, this is still open for consultation. It is important that, once clubs have established that they can apply and that they meet all the criteria, it is our officials' job to signpost them to information regarding other potential sources of funding but not to make their applications for them.

Mr Milne: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Is Derry City FC eligible to apply for funding? Can the Minister give an update on the Daisyfield project?

Ms Ní Chuilín: In short, yes, it is eligible to apply for funding, and I anticipate that it will do so. I also confirm that the commitment I made to secure funding of £2 million to invest in Daisyfield playing fields, which is part of the project being taken forward by Derry City and Strabane District Council to redevelop the Brandywell Sports Centre and, indeed, the adjacent Daisyfield playing fields, will be assistance that will cover some of the costs of refurbishing of a full-sized pitch. Certainly, my officials, Sport NI and, indeed, the council have been working very closely together, and I understand that the council is considering its options for the location of the facility, which will be subject to council approval and, indeed, full planning permission.

Mr Cree: I thank the Minister for her replies so far. Minister, just for clarification, the cost of this project for the stadia appears to be £9.75 million. Is that figure ring-fenced, and what proportion of that project cost is available for the subregional football stadia programme?

Ms Ní Chuilín: There is £36 million for the subregional programme. As I said in response to Mr Weir, clubs are already in discussions not only with each other but, indeed, with other potential sources of funding to try to ensure that they get every opportunity. I already know that there is not enough money in this to meet all the needs out there. I do not think there is ever enough money in anyone's Department to meet all the needs, but that is certainly the case with this. That is why I anticipate a third level of subregional funding to try to ensure that groups, particularly grass-roots groups, get better access to better facilities, because, to be honest, a lot of the clubs run on a voluntary basis do not have the professional wherewithal but provide vital services and support to keep young people fit, healthy and safe. I anticipate that clubs like that will need to get additional support, and I am looking at the options for what other support we can give to them, but those will not become real until the consultation closes.

Mr McCarthy: I thank the Minister for her answers. Can she give the Assembly a cast-iron guarantee that, when the money comes to being divided out, it will be done fairly and squarely and that there will be no preference for either of the two major parties — Sinn Féin and the DUP — in selected teams, grounds or whatever?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I think what the Member is really suggesting is that we and the DUP would box clubs off — that is basically what he is suggesting. I would like to use this opportunity to completely refute that. It is public money, as the Member will know, and it needs to be scrutinised. That includes the decisions about how the money is spent. I anticipate that the process, which is completely open and completely transparent, will be scrutinised. Hopefully, that gives some assurance to the Member.

Voluntary and Community Organisations: Funding

6. Ms Lo asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure, in light of the recent Budget and the cuts to be made to her Department, whether she is planning to offer any level of protection to voluntary and community organisations funded by her Department. (AQO 9557/11-16)

Ms Ní Chuilín: I thank the Member for her question, and I wish her a happy new year. As she will know — I have said this repeatedly, but it is worth repeating — the Tory Administration have, once again, imposed massive cuts on our block grant and, indeed, on our community, and my job is to try to allocate funding and to work against the worst impacts on service provision. I am content that my Department and its arm's-length bodies (ALBs) are taking every step to minimise the impacts on front-line services, particularly and including those provided by the community and voluntary sector, which does a massive amount of work, by extracting as many savings as they can from administration and overhead costs.

As the Member will appreciate, that work is ongoing, and I hope to bring it to a conclusion once I have settled on budgets by the end of this month. I am, of course, keenly aware of the work carried out by the community and voluntary sector. It is not enough for me just to give those assurances. I will certainly have to justify the budget that I settle on at the end of the month, but I want to give the Member as much assurance as possible that I will look at every opportunity to try to reduce costs so that maximum spend happens within the community and voluntary sector.

2.15 pm

Ms Lo: First of all, Mr Deputy Speaker, I wish you and Members of the House a happy Chinese new year today.

Mr McCarthy: Hear, hear. What is that all about?

Ms Lo: Time does not allow me to expand on that.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): Can we have a question?

Ms Lo: I thank the Minister for her response. I know that she really cares about funding for the community and voluntary sector, and I thank her for her very positive comment. What steps has the Minister taken to ensure that when DCAL goes into the big, new Department — the Department for Communities — the priorities for culture, arts and leisure will be high up on the agenda of the new structure?

Ms Ní Chuilín: The Member will be aware that the consultation on the overarching arts and cultural strategy for 10 years will close this week. When I leave the Department, it is crucial that, for the first time ever, there will be an overarching strategy, and Departments will have their role to play in the delivery, investment and funding for arts and culture going into the next 10 years. I believe that that is critical, because it has been missing, and, frankly, I could never understand why there was not an overarching strategy for arts and culture in the same way that there is for sports.

Mr McGlone: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. My apologies for earlier. Things seem to have proceeded a lot faster than expected, and I missed my question, so apologies for that.

In light of the important input of the community and voluntary sector, what level of engagement has there been between the Minister and senior representatives from her Department around that particular sector with a view to identifying sources of funding in the Department or to facilitating it to identify alternative sources of funding elsewhere?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I thank the Member for his question. If he wishes, I will try to get to him in writing the answer to the previous question that he missed, so that he can have that. In the response that I gave to Anna Lo, and I am sure that it will come up again, I said that I have been using the consultation period to engage very actively and proactively with members from the arts and cultural sectors right across the board. My officials have been there as well, and they will respond to the consultation. I have not settled on the budget yet, but I intend to at the end of the month. Already, we are asking the ALBs, where possible, to look at how they can make savings in order for us to try to get it out to the voluntary and community sector.

The Arts Council has been very proactive in trying to secure other sources of funding or give information in particular around council areas but also in Europe and some of the trusts. I believe that NICVA has also been very proactive, as well as some of the area partnerships. So, I believe that as much as can be done has been done.

Mr Ó Muilleoir: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Guim Bliain Úr faoi mhaise d'Anna fosta. I wish to express a happy new year to Anna. Anna, you are too diplomatic to mention that it is the year of the monkey where the media can insert their own joke.

One of the great difficulties of the Fresh Start was that we did not get the budget that we wanted from London. What particular steps has the Minister taken to offset the impact of those Tory cuts? I think in particular of Outburst Queer Arts Festival, which launches tomorrow. That is a newer festival in the city and a great arts event looking for funding. I wonder what steps can be taken generally to offset the impact of the Tory cuts.

Ms Ní Chuilín: I thank the Member for his supplementary question. Some of what I have answered to Anna Lo and to Patsy may have gone some way to answering his question, but it is worth repeating that, in subsequent Budgets, statements and Budget settlements, we have received ongoing cuts from our block grant by the Tory Government. That will have an impact on delivery. It is quite shocking, given the level of need, support, development, inspiration and aspiration that the cultural and arts sector have provided; they help to regenerate the economy and keep people well and safe and healthy. It is really important that we use the last days of the consultation to make those arguments for additional money for arts, because it has proven not only to be money well spent but that it can help to generate money.

I met Outburst festival, and I wish it all the best, but there is an example of where you put a small investment in and there will be a big return for the host city or town.

Mr B McCrea: Minister, many of the ALBs are working to budget cuts of 5-7%. Do you envisage changing that so that, for example, Libraries NI might get a lower reduction and the Arts Council might get a bigger reduction?

Ms Ní Chuilín: Basil, I am not dodging your question. I am sure that you know that I have never dodged your questions, or anyone else's for that matter. I am still actively considering those budgets, and it would be completely inappropriate for me to indicate what the settlement will be for each ALB at this stage, particularly as I am still getting in the information. I will happily keep the Member, and not only members of the CAL Committee but Members of the House, posted when those decisions have been made.

Irish Education and Learning: Demand

7. Mrs Overend asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure what the source of the figures for the growth in the demand for Irish-medium education and adult learning of Irish was, as quoted in her written ministerial statement of 24 January 2016. (AQO 9558/11-16)

Ms Ní Chuilín: I thank the Member for the question. The source is the Department of Education's school census figures for 2010-11 to 2014-15, which show a remarkable 24% growth in the numbers in Irish-medium education in just five years. A similar trend applies to adult education in Irish.

The 2013 Economic and Social Research Institute (ESRI) survey is the most comprehensive and authoritative source of information about Irish in the 21st century. The survey indicates strong and increasing support for the Irish language, North and South, and that there is an expectation that government should do more to promote the language. My Department's initiative to promote Irish, Líofa, has been exceptionally successful, with over 17,000 people already signed up. That increase in demand for Irish and increasing public expectations that the Irish language will be properly promoted and developed by government form an important backdrop to my decision to take forward work within the framework of the Irish language academy.

Mrs Overend: I thank the Minister for that. The figures that she referred to were quoted percentages, which are relative. What were the actual figures for the Irish language academy?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I am sorry, but I did not hear the Member's last point. Is she asking for the actual figures?

Mrs Overend: Yes.

Ms Ní Chuilín: I will get the actual figures for the Member. I will get them for each of the percentages that I quoted. I see that the Member is turning her face up. If there is something that she wants to add, she can do so in writing, and I will happily respond to her.

Mr Campbell: The Minister has outlined the genesis and source of the Irish language percentages and numbers. Does she agree with me that the pursuit of any language can often be thwarted and stunted whenever people see the politicisation of that language, such as has been done by her colleagues in Sinn Féin inside and outside the Chamber on numerous occasions?

Ms Ní Chuilín: The Member really stretches it beyond belief. The only people that I have ever heard politicising a language, stretching a language and causing offence to people who use that language are you and your party colleagues, and some others. If I thought, for one minute, that the Member was genuine about trying to find out what we can do as a community to work with people who have or want to have Irish as their first language; what we can do as a community not to assault and cause offence to children who are learning Irish and who are educated through the medium of Irish language; and what we can do as a community to try to get over the petty, bigoted sectarianism that they have perpetuated —

Mr Campbell: I thought that you could not answer the question.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): Order.

Ms Ní Chuilín: — in the House against a language that belongs to everyone —

Mr Campbell: From somebody who said that she does not answer questions.

Ms Ní Chuilín: If the Member has any questions, I would like to hear what they are.

Mr Campbell: Does not avoid questions.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): Order.

Mr Campbell: She is avoiding that one.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): Order, or the Member shall be named.

I ask the Minister to continue with her answer, if she has anything further to say.

Ms Ní Chuilín: Thank you. I think that I have answered the question.

Mr Maskey: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for her responses so far. She will obviously be very aware — her Department has been a contributor — that the Cumann Ćluain Árd in my constituency has seen its biggest investment in maybe 50 years. That has been the cradle of Irish language learning for many people for many decades. Will the Minister congratulate those Irish language learners in my constituency and perhaps give examples of others?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I certainly congratulate Cumann Ćluain Árd, which, when I was a girl growing up in North Belfast, was seen as one of the authorities in learning and developing the language, particularly during the decades when it was not easy. Thankfully, there are many other organisations that not only have the experience of Cumann Ćluain Árd in Belfast but are growing right across the North and right across the island. In the survey that it produced last year, Foras na Gaeilge showed that a lot of people have taken up the formal learning of Irish. They are learning in places like Ćluain Árd. I was absolutely delighted to make an investment in that. The Member is also lucky enough to have Ceathrú na Gaeltachta in its own constituency, the Gaeltacht Quarter. I made an investment in that through Forbairt Feirste, which is the secretariat of Ceathrú na Gaeltachta. It will be taking forward a scoping exercise around an Irish language academy.

Mr McCrossan: I thank the Minister for her answers so far. Will the Minister outline when the House can expect the outcome of the assessment to determine levels of economic and social development and employment opportunities in relation to the Irish language? Can those levels be developed within the framework of the Irish language academy?

Ms Ní Chuilín: The first scoping study that we did around some of the topics that the Member raised highlighted the need for a purpose-built, stand-alone academy. That would not just be for the Irish language but would look at the some of the same things in Ulster-Scots culture and heritage. However, it was very academically focused and actually missed the point that the Member has raised. Therefore, taking into account some of the parts of the first scoping exercise, another exercise was developed to look into not only economic regeneration, development and job creation, but learning the language and how it can be blended in. One of the big and growing gaps in the first exercise was the question of what can be done for children and young people who are leaving the post-primary sector and not going on to third-level education.

We also need to make sure that, wherever adults go to learn the language, be it classes in Strabane, Ćluain Árd or anywhere else, they get the same standard and same level across the board. I am also looking forward to the results of that scoping study because, at the end of the day, the Irish language is regenerating the economy. Irish language activists are ratepayers and taxpayers too. They have rights, and I want to ensure that, collectively, we not only protect those rights but do so with an open heart.

Arts and Culture: EU Funding

8. Ms Hanna asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure for her assessment of the importance of EU funding to the arts and culture sector. (AQO 9559/11-16)

Ms Ní Chuilín: I thank the Member for her question. I believe that it is of significant importance for my Department and its arm's-length bodies to raise their profile in Europe and expand European engagement, including maximising potential funding sources. DCAL, through the Arts Council, has a dedicated resource in place to help artistic, cultural and creative organisations access competitive European funding, mainly through the Creative Europe funding programme.

During the previous funding round, the Arts Council facilitated the drawdown of an average of £300,000 a year to organisations in the arts and culture sectors. Since Creative Europe was established in 2014, a number of events have been delivered by a dedicated European engagement officer to the audiovisual and creative and cultural sectors across the North, with more than 1,000 participants attending. In addition, since that time, comprehensive support has been provided to 15 projects submitted to the Creative Europe programme. To date, the Arts Council and Foras na Gaeilge have secured funding from the Creative Europe funding stream.

Ms Hanna: I thank the Minister for her answers. I agree that the EU has been an important catalyst not just in funding terms but in the increased audience for our art and the less tangible benefits around diversity. Has your Department done any planning for how that funding deficit would be met in the unfortunate event of a UK withdrawal from the EU?

Ms Ní Chuilín: As the Member has pointed out, there is a lot of concern and anxiety around the whole Brexit argument. My Department is, along with others, looking into what the implications of that would be. I think that the sectors and the community should be heard. I heard some of the debates among the business community both in England and here, and 80% there and 90% here are for us not withdrawing but staying as we are. I think that, if you were to apply that same question across culture, arts and leisure and the community and voluntary sector, the figures would be similar. We are still trying to work through potential scenarios and look at how any gaps that are created can be met, if at all.

2.30 pm

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): That ends the period for listed questions. We will now move to topical questions.

Salmon Nets Licensees

T1. Mr Swann asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure for an update on what steps her Department is taking to buy out or close down salmon nets, given that, in response to a recent question for written answer, she told him that she had paid over £300,000 to a salmon nets licensee. (AQT 3441/11-16)

Ms Ní Chuilín: As the Member will appreciate, this has been an elongated process, particularly for the families concerned. This business has been in families for generations, and we want to be as fair as possible within the guidelines for spending public money. I do not have any definitive response about what to do about the remaining salmon net owners. I will respond to the Member in writing, but I will give him as robust an answer as I possibly can because I am aware that he is working with some of them in his constituency.

Mr Swann: I thank the Minister for her open answer. She is well aware of the work that was done on salmon fisheries, especially with regard to catch and release. If that amount of money has been attributed to the nets owners, and there is still more money outstanding to be paid to them, will she advise us whether she has any sort of counterbalance to give to angling clubs, which voluntarily took up catch and release at the start in order to drive the conservation of salmon.

Ms Ní Chuilín: Like the Member, I commend the angling clubs because they have enthusiastically and genuinely not only helped with the mandatory catch and release as it is now, but continue to act as guardians of the waterways. I understand that there is some concern, given the level of protections that they are engaged in, that some of the netsmen seem to be unwilling to engage in that process. I understand the sensitivities around the issue, but, notwithstanding that, I will try to get the Member the answers that he has asked for as quickly as I possibly can. I definitely hear what he is saying.

Scéim Pobal Gaeilge

T2. Ms Ruane asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure for an update on the Scéim Pobal Gaeilge programme. (AQT 3442/11-16)

Ms Ruane: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. An dtig leis an Aire eolas a thabhairt dúinn faoin dul chun cinn atá á dhéanamh i Scéim Pobal Gaeilge?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I thank the Member for her question. This is something that remains fairly topical in communities. The new arrangements for Scéim Pobal Gaeilge, which will see an increase in the number of groups from 19 to 25 to 27, will happen after July this year. I am thankful that the work that I have done with my counterparts will ensure not only that the scheme is extended but that there will be an increase towards some of the running costs. If you are looking for an example of what works on the ground, helping people who are learning Irish but also helping families and communities to get services through the medium of Irish, it is Scéim Pobal Gaeilge.

Ms Ruane: Go raibh maith agat. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as an fhreagra sin. I thank the Minister for her answer. What approach are her counterparts, Ministers McHugh and Humphreys, in the South of Ireland taking in relation to Scéim Pobal Gaeilge?

Ms Ní Chuilín: We agreed the revision of the scheme, so they are happy with that. We are still looking at what additional money we can get for Foras na Gaeilge, specifically for this scheme. We are looking at ways in which the groups that applied to the scheme can access other funding from Foras na Gaeilge and perhaps an increase in some of the running costs. Some of the running costs that have been awarded by Foras na Gaeilge to the groups will, potentially, inhibit them from operating, and that was not the original intention. We are having discussions and, hopefully, we can conclude this before we leave our respective offices. I know that officials in both Departments are working very closely on this as we speak.

Casement Park: Alternative Venue

T3. Mr Weir asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure, in light of some of the problems that have arisen with Casement Park, whether the GAA is seeking an alternative venue. (AQT 3443/11-16)

Ms Ní Chuilín: I am not aware of any alternative venues, and there should not be any. The Member and some others in his party are in the awful position of lobbying for the 2023 Rugby World Cup bid, and there are other Members who are anti-GAA, anti-Casement Park and anti-west Belfast, and they do not want the investment going into that area. Not only am I completely unaware of any other venue, but if it is not Casement Park it is not anywhere.

Mr Weir: It is good to see that a wide range of alternatives is being considered. In light of some of the difficulties, what actions are being taken by her Department to find a solution and resolve the issues between local residents and the GAA?

Ms Ní Chuilín: There are several residents' groups. I know that the Member's party is working with the Mooreland Owenvarragh Residents' Association (MORA), as it is perfectly entitled to do. I met with MORA in the past, and I met with other residents' groups, and, indeed, other businesses in the community whose premises have been on the doorstep of Casement Park for generations. I will ensure that, when the pre-consultation period takes place in March, anyone with concerns will have them heard by the Ulster Council and, where appropriate, they will be rectified before any formal planning application is submitted.

Easter Rising Commemoration: DCAL Funding

T4. Mr Humphrey asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure how much funding she has allocated to the commemoration of the Easter rebellion. (AQT 3444/11-16)

Ms Ní Chuilín: A package of funding was made available by my Department for the decade of centenaries. I will get the Member a figure for this year, for the Easter rising and the Somme, as it is 2016 that we are talking about. I will get him a figure for how much is being spent, and what some of my Department's ALBs are doing as regards exhibitions, talks and discussions. Given the opportunities we had to go to lectures and events in other commemorations, I would like to ensure that all Members from all parties feel that they can go to, for example, the Linen Hall Library or the Ulster Museum, or whatever the case may be, to hear about certain aspects of the Somme or the Easter rising at first hand. I will get the Member those figures in writing.

Mr Humphrey: I thank the Minister for her answer, and I look forward to getting the figures; I will be interested in them. Given the rebellion's divisive nature, its attack on the state and democracy, and the fact that it had little or no support across Ireland, in particular in what is now Northern Ireland, is this the best use of public money?

Ms Ní Chuilín: The Member has his own perspective on history. From my perspective, I believe that the Enterprise, Trade and Investment Minister — and now the Member's party leader — and I entered into support for a decade of centenaries that included them all. There are certain aspects of the Member's history, and that of his community, that I feel are not palatable; I certainly do not feel that they were democratic. However, I am big enough to recognise that we need to celebrate and commemorate these events from the position of respect, and of dealing with facts, and a position from which we hope to regenerate — and generate discussions to, hopefully, build — good relations. Hopefully, the Member will have that in mind when he asks the question about something like this, because I have had feedback from the community — not just his, mine too — and it is up for this.

Dungiven Sports Complex

T5. Mr Dallat asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure, who said at the beginning of Question Time that she is coming to the end of her reign in the Department, whether she agrees that the recent controversy about the sports complex in Dungiven was shameful and should never have happened and whether she is satisfied that the money now set aside for that project is ring-fenced and that a future Minister with responsibility for culture, arts and leisure will not unravel it. (AQT 3445/11-16)

Ms Ní Chuilín: I am content that the money has been ring-fenced. Just to make sure, I will repeat that again: the money is ring-fenced for my Department for a sports facility. I think it is incredible — and that is as much as I will say — that, in 2016, we still have people who would rather cut off their nose to spite their face. I think it is ridiculous that, with public money, we are still looking at an us-and-them situation rather than at addressing need. I believe that the investment in Dungiven will benefit the people of the town and the outlying areas. The people I met came from across that community and the Member's constituency of East Derry. If there is any hint, or any saying of funny business, or that nothing is going to happen, that will not happen with my money.

Mr Dallat: I thank the Minister for her very positive answer. As someone who spent 33 years in Coleraine — the same time that our Lord spent on this earth — it was heartbreaking to see the performance that went on. Does the Minister agree that, 18 years into an Assembly, we should have matured beyond this sniggering at each other's misfortunes and beyond putting energy and synergy into trying to deprive a community of a space that it needs?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I agree with the Member that, 18 years after the Good Friday Agreement, there is an expectation that things should have moved on. Sometimes, when you look at issues or events that have happened, it is a real flashback to perhaps even further back than 18 years ago. People who want to go back to the past are severely deluded. There is no going back; we are all going forward. Some may need to be dragged forward, but forward they will go. At Dungiven, as with any other sports facility, it is about need, not creed. The days when people invested in facilities and then tied up the swings are well gone.

CAL Budget: Stakeholder Consultation

T6. Mr Allen asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure, given that the timescale for this year's Budget process is very tight and will not allow for the usual consultation, whether she has any plans to seek comments from key stakeholders. (AQT 3446/11-16)

Ms Ní Chuilín: I thank the Member for his question. Two fairly big consultations are under way in my Department: one on the subregional programme for soccer; the other on an overarching 10-year strategy for arts and cultures. They have been very beneficial, and people did not talk just about those subjects. Those who attended the meetings were from the community and voluntary sector. They represent a wide range of needs and used the opportunity to raise other concerns. As I said in answer to previous questions, that process has not been completed. It will be complete at the end of this month. My aim for the process will be consistent with the position that I have adopted in my Department: I will protect people, particularly the vulnerable, as much as I can.

Mr Allen: I thank the Minister for her answer. Does she anticipate any reduction or ending of school and community engagement programmes as a result of budget cuts?

Ms Ní Chuilín: I am not aware of the specific programmes that the Member has in mind. If he puts his concerns in writing, I will try to have them responded to. I repeat: my job is to try to protect people, particularly those who have had difficulty in the past in accessing front-line services. Through DCAL and its arm's-length bodies, I will try to make them a priority as best as I can.

Enniskillen Library

T7. Mr Flanagan asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure for an update on Libraries NI's proposals for the redevelopment of the library in Enniskillen. (AQT 3447/11-16)

Ms Ní Chuilín: The Member is aware that we are in the final stages of looking at the proposals for that. I hope that that exercise will be completed, if not by the end of this month, by the beginning of next. I will keep Members informed.

Mr Flanagan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. The Minister may be aware that, in Cookstown, the South West College campus is co-located with the library, which presents obvious synergies for the community and the student population. Does she accept that such synergies could be generated in Enniskillen, with the co-location of the Enniskillen library on the site of the proposed South West College at the old Erne Hospital site in the town?

Ms Ní Chuilín: Without coming down on a preferred site — the Member has been very detailed on his preferred option — I accept his point: to ensure the best use of public services, they should, as far as possible, be developed in parallel, if they are not to be neighbours. We have that in mind. In fact, Libraries NI, one of the ALBs in DCAL, has gone a long way not only with users of its service but with other Departments in having libraries as a focus and making them venues in which people can access other services that they find difficult or are reluctant to access elsewhere. In that way, we can maximise public investment and make a bigger return for ratepayers, taxpayers and people. In so far as we can do that, I am open to looking at it, but it is not appropriate for me to comment on the specific proposals that the Member mentioned.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): I call Gordon Lyons to ask his question quickly, as we are running out of time.

Libraries

T8. Mr Lyons asked the Minister of Culture, Arts and Leisure, given that she will know that last week was National Libraries Week, when he had the pleasure of visiting Whitehead library, and that libraries are more than just places to go to to borrow books, what action her Department is taking to ensure that people are aware of the different services that are provided and to ensure the sustainability of local libraries. (AQT 3448/11-16)

Ms Ní Chuilín: The Member is aware that, in the past, I have given a higher level of protection to libraries than to other ALBs in my Department because the services offered in libraries have an overarching aspect. They are about more than borrowing books. Information and generating awareness are key, and libraries have been very good at that. Not only have they brought in additional people who have become members, but they have brought in people who did not even know that the services were there in the first place.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): Time is up.

Education

GCSE Grading System

1. Mr Kennedy asked the Minister of Education for his assessment of the effect his decision not to implement the numeric GCSE grading system will have on the ability to compare local GCSE results with those in other parts of the United Kingdom. (AQO 9566/11-16)

2. Mr Dallat asked the Minister of Education, given his decision to maintain a letter-based GCSE grading system, to outline the steps being taken to ensure that students are not disadvantaged by being restricted to CCEA examination entries only. (AQO 9567/11-16)

13. Mr B McCrea asked the Minister of Education whether he plans to change the GCSE grading systems to match the system proposed for England from 2017. (AQO 9578/11-16)

14. Mr Anderson asked the Minister of Education for his assessment of the implications of the decision by the AQA and OCR examinations boards to withdraw from GCSE examinations in Northern Ireland. (AQO 9579/11-16)

Mr O'Dowd (The Minister of Education): With your permission, Mr Deputy Speaker, I will answer questions 1, 2, 13 and 14 together.

I believe that it is in the best interests of learners here to continue with the well-established grading using letters. Requiring all GCSEs here to be graded in that way will avoid unnecessary complexity. It is very disappointing that some organisations are choosing to put commercial interests ahead of the needs of our young people and will no longer offer their GCSE qualifications here. I assure pupils and parents that our young people will continue to be able to access a wide range of subjects and courses from CCEA, WJEC and other awarding organisations.

My Department has written to schools with initial guidance, including arrangements for pupils who are already working towards 9-to-1 GCSEs in maths and English literature provided by awarding bodies that have now decided to leave us. Further guidance will be provided shortly on the alternatives available to fill the gaps that emerge in the range of GCSEs on offer as a result of their decisions.

It is, of course, important, that qualifications offered here are relevant and appropriate for our young people and our economy. It is also vital that qualifications offered here continue to be recognised by universities and employers across these islands and beyond. Systems are already in place to allow comparisons to be made between exam outcomes here and in other jurisdictions across these islands and beyond. My decision on GCSE grading does not change any of that.

Mr Kennedy: I listened closely to the Minister's answer. A key selling point for the Northern Ireland education system is that, traditionally, our pupils get better A-level, AS-level and GCSE results than their compatriots in England and Wales. Does the Minister agree that we should protect that record, and does he agree that it is essential that we should compare and benchmark our performance against other parts of the United Kingdom, especially in key subjects?

Mr O'Dowd: Yes and yes, but none of the decisions that I have made to date will change that. We will still be comparable to England, Wales, Scotland and the South of Ireland. None of the decisions that I have made negates or does away with such comparability across these islands. It is vital that we measure our education system against those of our nearest neighbours or other jurisdictions. It is also vital that we are able to measure our education system against the leading education systems in the world. While I fully understand — it is only natural — why we compare our results at the summer awarding time with England's, we have to move beyond that. That is nothing to do with this decision, I have to say. We have to compare with the leading education systems across the world and ensure that our students match them.

Mr Dallat: I listened carefully to the Minister's answers. Does he agree that it is bad enough having two examination systems on this small island without introducing a third one? Does he also agree that, when employers assess people for jobs, they may not be as knowledgeable about the grades as the Minister is or as I am as a former teacher?

Mr O'Dowd: The reality is that we have two qualification systems on this island, and we now have divergence in GCSE grading on these islands. Wales has maintained the alphabetical awarding system, as have I. As you are aware, England has moved to a 9-to-1 system, and Scotland has its own qualifications. That is the reality of the situation and the reality of devolved government. Devolved institutions will make decisions that they believe are in the best interests of their students.

Employers now deal with qualifications from across Europe. The debate about Brexit and our relationship with Europe is relevant here, because, with the influx of European workers into our economy, employers — particularly major employers — deal with qualifications from a range of European countries. Our universities deal with a range of qualifications not only from Europe but from around the globe, and all manage perfectly well.

Mr Anderson: Minister, what discussions did you have with teachers and their representatives on this issue before you made your decision on the grading change?

Mr O'Dowd: Consultation on this matter took place over a 12-week period. There were consultation responses from teachers, teachers' organisations, parents and pupils, the business sector and other sectors. As with many consultation responses, there was a variety of opinions, whether among teachers or other professionals, about how you maintain qualifications and score those qualifications. However, the key message coming from the consultation responses is that we want to maintain, and ensure that there is no confusion around, the publication of examination results with a variety of numbers and alphabetical scoring on the one awards sheet that is given to pupils.

Mr Weir: In addition to the general concerns that have been raised on this matter by myself and others, I ask the Minister to comment specifically on the computer science GCSE. At the weekend, Professor Crozier of Queen's University expressed a concern about the removal of the more technical computer science GCSE, which is currently provided by the English boards, and that the current CCEA ICT computer science one is less technical and will leave Northern Ireland students at a disadvantage. What assurance can he give that a computer science GCSE that matches what is there from England will be put in place?

Mr O'Dowd: CCEA is developing a new GCSE in ICT. Importantly, CCEA is developing it in conjunction with local employers and industry leaders. The way forward in qualifications is to develop them in conjunction with employers and leading academics in the subject. I am confident that the new GCSE that will be introduced by CCEA will have the same rigour and fortitude as the one that the professor commented on over the weekend. We also have a very rigorous A level in ICT that is recognised by universities and others. I listened carefully to the concerns raised over the weekend, but I am satisfied that the course of action that we have taken will not put our students at a disadvantage in any subject, including computing.

Mr Allister: The Minister must have known when he made his decision that English boards were not going to establish a separate marking system for Northern Ireland students. Therefore, he knew — and presumably wanted — that the outcome would be to reduce the choice for schools and pupils in Northern Ireland. Is his agenda not as obvious as it is political?

Mr O'Dowd: No, it is not political — it is educational. I note that no one who has presented me with questions thus far has presented me with an educational argument not to take this decision. You have chosen a political question rather than an educational question to confront me about my decision, but I await someone challenging me for educational reasons. It was an education decision based on sound data, consultation and the needs of our local students. It would be a very unfortunate position for any Minister to start making decisions based on the commercial needs of companies that provide services to Health, Education or any other Executive Department. We have to make decisions that we believe are in the best interests of our young people. If commercial enterprises wish to follow, well and good. If they do not, so be it.

Post-primary Schools: Enniskillen

3. Mr Flanagan asked the Minister of Education how he will ensure the views of the local community are taken into consideration in relation to proposals by the Council for Catholic Maintained Schools (CCMS) on the future of the four post-primary schools in Enniskillen. (AQO 9568/11-16)

Mr O'Dowd: CCMS has a statutory duty to promote and coordinate, in consultation with the trustees, the planning of effective provision of Catholic maintained schools. The statutory development proposal process facilitates extensive consultation and has two distinct stages. Prior to publication, the onus is on the proposer, in this case CCMS, to consult the boards of governors, teachers and parents of the affected schools. The Education Authority also has a duty to consult all other schools likely to be affected. Once a development proposal is published, a two-month objection and comment period begins, during which anyone can make their views known directly to my Department. I endeavour to engage with concerned or interested parties during this stage to listen to their views on a proposal before I decide whether to approve it.

The 2015 strategic area plan for post-primary schools states that the trustees recommend the phased development of two large single-sex schools in Enniskillen. The statutory development proposals to support that intent have not been published. Until they are, neither my Department nor I have any role.

Mr Flanagan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as ucht a fhreagra. I thank the Minister for his answer. This issue affects people across Fermanagh, not just Enniskillen. The four schools in question — St Michael's, St Joseph's, St Fanchea's and Mount Lourdes — all provide excellent education to the students who attend them. At what stage will the Department and the Minister, whether he or his successor, become involved in the process to ensure that the views of the local community are heard on the matter and that a decision in the best interests of the young people of Fermanagh is reached?

Mr O'Dowd: The only point at which I or the next Minister will become involved is when development proposals are published in relation to the plans outlined by CCMS in one of its documents. At that stage, it is opened up to two months of consultation, where the Minister will engage with locally interested parties, including the schools and others, on the issue and take on board evidence, verbal and written, from the various parties on the matter. Only after that two-month consultation can a decision be made.

Mr Patterson: The Minister will probably be aware that there is a widely held view across Fermanagh that schools in the controlled sector have been treated very differently from those in the maintained. The controlled post-primaries in Kesh, Ballinamallard and Lisnaskea have all been closed, with the promise of a new build in Enniskillen, which, in reality, is some way off. Does he understand the frustration when local people see what is clearly an unfair approach taken with other valuable schools, such as the one in Brollagh?

Mr O'Dowd: I do not accept your view on that matter. I have been involved in wide-scale consultations with a cross-section of the community in Fermanagh over my tenure as Minister. I was the Minister who brought forward the new build for Devenish College, and I was the Minister who defended that new build when representatives from Fermanagh told me that it would never happen. I am sure that it was very desponding for the board of governors of Devenish College to hear elected representatives in the Chamber tell me that a build would never happen. The build is happening. Devenish College will rise up as a new school in the near future. Work is already taking place on site to deal with the difficult lay of the land in that area.

The delay in dealing with and improving educational facilities in the controlled sector in Fermanagh has as much to do with those who refuse to accept the need for change as it has with those who want to promote change. The judgement last Wednesday or Thursday shows that the decision that I made in relation to Portora and Collegiate was the correct one. The judge rejected 29 of the, I think, 32 original points of appeal, several of which were dropped during the case. The judge rejected every point of appeal brought forward and said that the Minister's decision was correct and rational. We now have the programme for change that is needed in the controlled sector, and I am determined to back it up with investment in new schools for the controlled sector in Fermanagh.

Mrs D Kelly: On the principle of shared education, have you, Minister, added any caveats or conditions that schools must comply with to avail themselves of shared education funding, such as having to participate in Key Stage 3 assessments?

Mr O'Dowd: I welcome the Member to her role as education spokesperson; I look forward to locking horns with her. This is an issue that goes back several months. I have included the caveat that schools should report on levels of progression. Why would I not? Why would I not insist that schools report on levels of progression when we are talking about a significant investment of public funds in a scheme that is about shared education and ensuring that it not only creates changes in our society but delivers high-quality education?

Several of the unions objected. I engaged in great detail with them, and we have now come to a compromise position; we are working our way through the levels of progression. Engagement with the unions will continue. That will be only for the betterment of creating levels of progression that all schools and unions are comfortable with. It will also ensure that the Education Department, the Executive, the Assembly and all the others tasked with looking after public money can be satisfied that it is well invested.

3.00 pm

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): Paul Girvan is not in his place.

Easter Rising: School Commemorations

5. Mr McElduff asked the Minister of Education for an update on any plans his Department has to support or facilitate schools in marking the centenary year of the 1916 Easter rising. (AQO 9570/11-16)

Mr O'Dowd: Since 2013-14, my Department has cooperated with the Department of Education and Skills in the South in running an all-island history competition for schools to commemorate the decade of centenaries. As part of the Ireland 2016 programme to commemorate the events of 1916, of which the Easter rising is one, three all-island schools' competitions will be held this year in history, drama and art. The cross-curricular nature of those competitions provides opportunities for pupils to learn about that important period in our history. Additionally, the Council for the Curriculum, Examinations and Assessment (CCEA) is working on a 1916 mutual understanding programme for schools, with the objective of providing curricular support and materials for teachers and learners that will allow them to explore the history and legacy of events associated with the 1916 year of centenaries, including the rising and the battle of the Somme. I have agreed to provide funding of up to £45,000 for that work by CCEA in 2016-17.

Mr McElduff: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. In commemorating 2016 as a year of centenaries, with its important milestones and historical anniversaries, can he assure us that schools will feel as comfortable about looking at the 1916 Easter rising as they might about looking at the First World War?

Mr O'Dowd: The all-Ireland competition we are running with the Department of Education and Skills in the South and the funding I am providing to CCEA are to ensure that schools can look at both significant events of 1916, with the centenaries of the rising and the battle of the Somme. There are schools that will choose to look at both events, and there may be schools that will choose to look at one or the other.

I know that, with my children, the conversations around the dinner table range from the 1916 rising to the First World War. I think that is very interesting. In fact, one of my sons asked me whether I was around during the First World War, and I had to convince him that I was not. There are opportunities for schools to look at both the major events of 1916 going through 1916 or to look at singular events. I encourage them to look at both.

Mr Hussey: Does the Minister agree that great care must be taken to not glorify the mistakes of history? For example, in the Easter rising, one of the first killed was a Dublin Metropolitan Police officer who was killed in cold blood.

Mr O'Dowd: Events in history are issues that there are always differences of opinion on. It is clear that death occurred on the streets of Dublin, as it did around the banks of the Somme. There are many studies and views on whether either of those battles was necessary and whether the great loss of life, be it in the First World War or the Easter rising and the proceeding war of independence, was inevitable or necessary. I want to ensure that schools have an informed debate, are comfortable in that debate and engage with each other. Yes, we should learn from the mistakes of history, but it is not only schoolchildren who need to do that: adults in the Chamber would do well to learn from the mistakes of history too.

Mr McCausland: I thank the Minister for his answer. In Ulster in 1916, there was no rebellion. The rebels gathered in Tyrone, and, apart from two of them shooting themselves when their guns went off accidentally, they simply went home on the train afterwards. Will the Minister assure us that that information will be incorporated into the same material?

Mr O'Dowd: The history of the rising will be interpreted by and taught through schools. I do not provide the material to schools and say, "You must teach it in this way". The information they get is open to interpretation by the schools.

The Member will be aware that there was a rebellion in the Six Counties: the UVF was still armed to the teeth. They still had the guns they landed in 1913 and were still threatening war against the British state if home rule was, in their words, imposed or if partition did not take place. So, there was a rebellion. It was a rebellion on the other side of the argument, perhaps, but there were certainly those who were hoarding guns — [Interruption.]

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): Order.

Mr O'Dowd: There were certainly those who were hoarding guns; there were those who were planning an armed uprising; and there were those who were threatening to carry out violence against the king and his forces. The Member may want to write that out of history; I do not.

History does not scare me. Learning about history does not scare me. Learning about the mistakes of history does not scare me. Learning about other people's perspectives on history does not scare me. What scares me is when we make the mistakes of history.

Schools: Budget 2016-17

6. Mrs Overend asked the Minister of Education when schools will receive notification of their budget for 2016-17. (AQO 9571/11-16)

Mr O'Dowd: Following the Executive's agreement of the 2016-17 Budget on Thursday 17 December 2015, which was subsequently passed by the Assembly on 19 January 2016, I am working through the impact of the Budget 2016-17 outcome on the education sector and have not yet come to any final decisions in relation to that. The budget settlement for education is challenging, partly as a result of the real-terms reduction to the Executive's resource budget by the Westminster Government. However, the position for education is significantly better than previously anticipated. My aim is to have reached final decisions on my Department's budget allocations within the next number of weeks to allow for early notification to schools.

Mrs Overend: I thank the Minister for his answer. The Minister will be aware that schools work to a three-year budget cycle and that, as it stands, they do not know what their budget will be for the 2016-17 year. Has he given any consideration in the five years in which he has been Minister to doing something about that and to change it?

Mr O'Dowd: Perhaps my memory is playing tricks on me, but do I recall the Ulster Unionist Party challenging the Executive over their four-year CSR Budget and calling for a year-on-year Budget settlement, rather than producing a four-year Budget at the start of the mandate? I think that the Ulster Unionist Party and, I believe, your colleagues in the SDLP opposed a four-year Budget at the start. We are in a one-year Budget cycle because we are facing into an end-of-mandate election. There will be an election in May; there will be a new mandate; and there will be a new Executive. It will be up to the new Executive, if they so wish, to approve a Budget period over four years. Schools will then have certainty around what their budget will be like for the coming period on the three-year plan. We are in a unique position. As I said, the election is coming. We have to set the Budget, and there is nothing we can do about it at this stage.

Mr Milne: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Will the Minister give us a little more information on what impact the increased capital budget will have on schools in the 2016-17 financial year?

Mr O'Dowd: The increase in the capital budget is a good news story for Education. We have seen a significant increase in the capital budget for the Education Department both in normal capital and the injection of money from the Fresh Start Agreement, which committed £50 million per annum for shared and integrated education and, indeed, shared housing. Hopefully, we will be able to work our way through a significant part of the minor works backlog that has built up this year. We are moving ahead with a significant new school build programme and a school enhancement programme (SEP). Indeed, I hope to be in a position in the coming weeks to announce several more projects that will move onto site shortly.

Schools: Heating Systems

7. Mr Clarke asked the Minister of Education what consideration has been given to replacing oil-fired heating systems with gas-fired systems in schools. (AQO 9572/11-16)

Mr O'Dowd: I am committed to ensuring that the schools estate plays its part in reducing greenhouse gas emissions and improving energy efficiency. I, therefore, continue to consider investment in gas conversions, within the budget available to me and within the availability of the natural gas network. In the 2014-15 financial year, I invested £10 million on a range of energy efficiency projects across the schools estate, including the conversion of oil-fired to gas-fired heating in 16 schools.

Mr Clarke: I thank the Minister for his answer. I welcome the fact that he is looking at energy efficiency in our schools. I had a recent meeting with Firmus Energy, which is a provider in the south Antrim area. I was alarmed to find out the number of schools that had not converted to gas. Given that we hear, quite often, in the headlines about schools from which oil has been stolen, I appeal to the Minister to do more in areas where gas is available. What assurance can the Minister give that he will do more for the schools in each of the constituencies where gas is available to give them security of supply?

Mr O'Dowd: I note the Member's comments on security of supply, but, at the moment, given that oil prices are so low, I suspect that many schools are quite happy to continue with oil-fired central heating. I also note the comments made on green energy, energy efficiency, and so on. As he will know, energy markets fluctuate. Gas is also at a reasonable price at the moment. World affairs can have a major impact on gas prices as well, so, as regards predicting future prices, it is a topsy-turvy sort of economy. My Department works with the Education Authority and the other managing authorities on conversions. Moving forward, we will make budgets available as we can to ensure that our schools have the most up-to-date energy systems.

Mr McMullan: Can the Minister tell us the number of schools that currently operate with gas-fired heating?

Mr O'Dowd: Currently, 739 sites in the education estate are connected to the natural gas network. Those include schools, school meals accommodation, youth clubs and administration buildings. I will provide the Member with a full breakdown in writing of the schools involved.

Transfer Tests

8. Mr McAleer asked the Minister of Education for an update on the number of schools that are continuing to use transfer tests for year 8 admissions. (AQO 9573/11-16)

Mr O'Dowd: For transfer in 2016, 62 post-primary schools are using children's results in unregulated tests as a basis for year 8 admissions. Although some schools appear to be wedded to the outdated notion of testing children for admission, an increasing number of grammar schools have chosen to abandon academic selection.

St MacNissi's College dropped selection in March 2010 when it amalgamated with two other County Antrim schools to become St Killian's College. Loreto College in Coleraine has been operating successfully as a non-selective grammar school since September 2012. St Patrick's Grammar School in Armagh has abandoned academic selection. St Ronan's College in Lurgan, which opened in September 2015, operates as a non-selective grammar school.

More Catholic grammar schools have announced that they are exploring the possibility of moving in the same direction. Loreto Grammar School in Omagh and Omagh Christian Brothers Grammar School have signalled that they wish to move away from academic selection on a phased basis, while plans are being developed in Fermanagh that could lead to the end of academic selection at Mount Lourdes Grammar School and St Michael's College in Enniskillen. St Louis Grammar School in Killeel is also exploring the possibility of moving away from academic selection. Furthermore, I will shortly be making a decision on a development proposal for the phased ending of academic selection at Dominican College in Portstewart.

Mr McAleer: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. The Minister referred to a number of schools in the Omagh area that have forwarded proposals to move away from academic selection. Can he outline the impact that he believes that will have on educational provision in the local area?

Mr O'Dowd: Given that those development proposals are live, in the sense that there is now pre-consultation, after which they will move to publication, it would be inappropriate of me to comment on them specifically, but I note that, in other areas where academic selection has been brought to an end, schools and the educational outcomes of their young people continue to prosper. That proves that you do not require academic selection to have a high-quality education system for our young people.

Mr Diver: I thank the Minister for the information provided on those schools that are trying to move away from the transfer test. Specifically, however, what support is being given to schools that are attempting to move away from the practice of transfer tests?

Mr O'Dowd: It will depend on the case and on whether it was an amalgamation or a closure and the beginning of a new school. It will depend on how the schools move away from academic selection. It is noted that the schools that have taken that step forward have not seen the predicted decline in numbers or in support from the local community. They have not seen the predicted decline in academic results or, indeed, educational results of young people. I encourage the boards of governors out there that are not considering ending academic selection to sit down and have a real conversation about how they believe they are contributing to the educational well-being of the entire community, not just some in the community, because I believe that those schools that have taken that step forward have shown the doubters that world-class education can be and is provided in the absence of academic selection.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): That ends the period for listed questions. We now move on to topical questions.

Schools: Wasted Money

T1. Mr Dallat asked the Minister of Education what he plans to do about the millions of pounds that have been wasted by boards of governors that have, against the background of teachers unable to find jobs, overcrowded classrooms and bad maintenance, rather than create posts, suspended teachers for up to three years, only to bring 99% of them back into service. (AQT 3451/11-16)

Mr O'Dowd: We have an education system and education legislation that devolve a significant amount of power to boards of governors. Boards of governors are the employing authority of schools and deal with their day-to-day management. The management of staff in schools is the responsibility of boards of governors. Therefore, it is the responsibility, first, of the managing authorities, whether it be the Education Authority or the Council for Catholic Maintained Schools (CCMS), and boards of governors to ensure that suspensions are dealt with as quickly as possible and that the rights of staff who are suspended and the rights of those who have made allegations against staff are respected and protected. Once you get into that, you can end up with quite significant delays in dealing with sometimes very complicated accusations against staff, or vice versa, and that is when you end up with lengthy suspensions. I believe that more can be done to shorten the length of suspensions. That would improve the morale of the staff who are suspended and, for those who have made accusations, would ensure that the issue is dealt with quickly. It would also save money for the public purse.

Mr Dallat: Mr Principal — sorry, Mr Deputy Speaker — you might be Principal Deputy Speaker in the next Assembly.

I am not sure if I am hearing the Minister right but, attempting to be positive, is he telling us that the monitoring of this was totally deficient in the past and that he will ensure that there is monitoring of all schools? I understand that many schools are not monitored at all. Will he convince the world at large that the squandering of £4.2 million in the past five years will not be repeated?

Mr O'Dowd: I wonder whether the Member has ever made any representations on behalf of a suspended teacher.

Mr Dallat: Yes, you know I have.

Mr O'Dowd: Right, OK. Therefore, you accept and defend the right of suspended teachers to be treated fairly and equally under employment legislation and under the rules that govern their school. Where do you draw the line with the £4.2 million that you say has been wasted? Is it that the money was not wasted on the staff you represented but that it was wasted on the staff you did not represent and on that side of the argument? Where do we draw the line?

I am being told by schools that they have to go through these procedures and that they are honouring the rights and entitlements of the teacher or member of staff, and honouring the rights and entitlements of the person who made the complaint. Once you get into all that technical stuff, it can end up being very protracted. Was it monitored properly in the past? I think that it could have been monitored more closely. I have asked my officials to bring forward more proposals on how we ensure that monitoring goes on and how we support schools and boards of governors to ensure that they have all the information and support at hand to deal with these matters as quickly as possible, but the bottom line is that people have rights and entitlements under the law and, when it comes to suspensions, you will find that they quite rightly use them.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): I ask that all remarks are made through the Chair so that Hansard is able to pick everything up appropriately.

Approved Schools: Enrolment Figures

T3. Ms Lo asked the Minister of Education why approved school enrolment figures are not included on the Department's Schools + website. (AQT 3453/11-16)

Mr O'Dowd: I do not know. That is the honest answer. We provide data through the Education Authority and give a school profile on every school. That should provide enrolment numbers at schools, their budget position, the number of children entitled to free school meals etc. That is available through the Education Authority's website.

Ms Lo: I thank the Minister for the confession that he does not know. I ask him to check on that website as soon as possible. Such very important information should be listed on the website.

Mr O'Dowd: I certainly will check for the Member. It may be that we are relying on the school profiles that, as I said, are published for every school on the Education Authority website, but I will follow the matter up.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): Alastair Ross is not in his place.

NI Students: OECD Report

T4. Mrs Overend asked the Minister of Education to comment on the BBC headline news story, "NI students 'among poorest skilled' in developed world countries", which referred to an OECD report, albeit wrongly interpreted. (AQT 3454/11-16)

Mr O'Dowd: The Member has answered her own question in many ways. I believe there was a printing error or other mishap in relation to the report and the details that were given to the media. The media, quite rightly, reported the information that they were given, but that was wrong, and it did present our students in a very dim light, which was unfortunate and unacceptable. I have already received a letter of apology from the OECD in relation to this matter, but it should never have happened in the first place.

Mrs Overend: I thank the Minister for that. I appreciate that OECD sent the Minister an apology, but the damage may be already done as regards how far this story has gone across the world. It was on the BBC UK website. How far has that gone? What has the Minister done or what does he plan to do to get the message out across the world that Northern Ireland students are highly skilled, because that report really could be damaging to the Northern Ireland economy?

Mr O'Dowd: I am not always a great defender of the media, but as soon as the BBC was made aware of this matter, it published the OECD's retraction on its website. I published a statement welcoming the clarification around the qualifications and abilities of our young people and expressing my severe disappointment with OECD in relation to the publication of the figures.

It did make headlines, thankfully for only a 24-hour period. However, the correction is now in place, and we will be able to allay anyone's fears or investors' fears in relation to that matter. The figures that OECD provided were completely wrong and did a great disservice to our young people. The apology that I received from OECD is not necessarily to me but to our young people and students, who performed so well in their studies. At any opportunity I have, I will certainly ensure that anyone's misconceptions about our education system will be corrected.

Schools: Refurbishment/Capital Rebuild

T5. Mr Campbell asked the Minister of Education for an update on the progress being made on major refurbishment and capital rebuild projects in primary and post-primary schools across Northern Ireland and particularly in East Londonderry. (AQT 3455/11-16)

Mr O'Dowd: As I said in previous answers, we have a significant building projects going on in capital and school enhancement programmes. There are a number of programmes in the Member's constituency. We have Rossmar School, a special school in Limavady. We have Our Lady of Fatima, formerly Craigbrack, Listress and Mullabuoy primary schools in Derry. Those are the two projects that are jumping out at me at the moment. If there are any more, I will certainly inform Mr Campbell in writing.

Mr Campbell: I notice that the Minister was looking down his list with increasing concern that he was not getting any more than the ones that were there. He did not seem to have difficulty in getting capital sums to support capital works in Dungiven for three local children for an Irish language school in East Londonderry, so can the same vigour and concern apply to the maintained and controlled sectors as was applied there, and with much more relevance and poignancy for the numbers of pupils and parents concerned?

Mr O'Dowd: With regard to investment, I could stand here and read out the list of projects that are being built across the North, and the Member will find that there is equality and fair play for everyone. In relation to the Member's constituency, perhaps he would like to inform me which schools he has been lobbying for and which I have turned down. I do not recall the Member lobbying that strongly for any schools in his constituency, and that may be the case.

When we come to a capital announcement, I go to the previous education boards, the CCMS and other managing authorities and ask them to bring forward a list of priority schools under their management. We will then run that through the system and match the schools that come out the other side with our budget at that time. We have made a significant investment in the various schools across the North over the last number of years, and we will continue to do so. Perhaps the Member would like to write to me in relation to the schools he feels have been left behind in his constituency.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): William Irwin is not in his place.

Wind Turbines: School Estate

T7. Mr Attwood asked the Minister of Education, given that an earlier question referred to conversion from oil to gas in greening the school estate, and the fact that a great school in west Belfast, St Mary's Christian Brothers' Grammar School on the Glen Road, has a wind turbine, whether he is aware of any other conversions within the school estate to wind energy and away from fossil fuels. (AQT 3457/11-16)

Mr O'Dowd: No, not off the top of my head. A number of schools have been very innovative in their energy consumption and preserving energy. Our new-build programme, I have to say, is very energy-conscious and very energy-efficient in ensuring that schools are able to monitor the amount of energy they are using, and that they are even able to reduce energy consumption over that period of time. I do not have, at hand, a list of the schools that have converted to wind energy.

Mr Attwood: That is very understandable. DOE runs a scheme whereby virtually every primary school in Northern Ireland is an eco-school. Given the challenge of climate change and the greening of the public estate generally in Northern Ireland, is it not time that there are interventions to encourage schools to seek planning permission and build wind turbines as part of their contribution to environmental change?

Mr O'Dowd: As you said, the vast majority of our primary schools have the eco flag flying from them. Schools are very active in relation to these matters. If the Member is suggesting that the Department should take it on as a project, it would mean that we would have to let go another project somewhere else. It would also require investment in those matters, which means that we would have to let something go somewhere else. All of these are competing priorities. I believe, at this stage, that the best way forward for our school estate is in relation to investment in its capital upgrade and its building infrastructure upgrade, and we are having quite good success in relation to that.

Little Flower Girls' School

T8. Mr Humphrey asked the Minister of Education whether he will commit to meet the parent representatives and board of governors from Little Flower post-primary school in North Belfast, who recently met with him and his colleague Nigel Dodds, in light of the fact that the board of governors is united that the school should be retained, with a petition recently presented to the Assembly, albeit that, sadly, however, CCMS refused to meet the parent representatives and the governors. (AQT 3458/11-16)

Mr O'Dowd: If the Member cares to write to me on the matter, I will certainly take it under consideration. There are proposals around a development proposal for that area. It may not be the case, but, if my memory serves me right, the consultation for that area may have closed around 19 January. If that is not the case, we can facilitate a meeting if the Member writes to me.

Mr Humphrey: I thank the Minister for that response, and I will certainly endeavour to do that. It is my understanding that the parents of pupils at Little Flower and those of pupils at St Patrick's are keen on the retention of both as single-sex post-primary schools in north Belfast. He should be aware that this is a viewpoint that is widely held across the community in north Belfast and, obviously, in particular, by the parents of the pupils attending both schools.

Mr O'Dowd: I take the Member's comments on board. Changes in the school estate can often result in a keen interest from the community, which is a good thing. I always take on board the views and commentary of local parents and local representatives in regard to that matter.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): That is the end of our time for topical questions. I ask Members to take their ease for a few minutes.

Assembly and Executive Reform (Assembly Opposition) Bill: Consideration Stage

Debate resumed.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): We now come to the second group of amendments for debate. With amendment No 30, it will be convenient to debate amendment Nos 31 to 40 and Mr McCartney's opposition to the schedule. Amendment No 32 is mutually exclusive with amendment No 31. Amendment No 33 is consequential to amendment No 32 and mutually exclusive with amendment No 31. Amendment Nos 35, 36 and 37 are mutually exclusive with amendment No 34. I call Mr Alex Attwood to move amendment No 30 and to address the other amendments in the group and the schedule stand part.

Schedule (Content of Assembly and Executive Reform Motion)

Mr Attwood: I beg to move amendment No 30: In page 7, line 7, at end insert

"Petition of Concern Reform

3. The motion may request that upon the tabling of a valid Petition of Concern under section 42 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998, voting be postponed and an Ad-Hoc Committee on conformity with Equality Arrangements, exercising the powers in section 44 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998, be established within the Assembly to scrutinise the effects on human rights and equality of the proposal in question. If this committee should report adverse findings to the Assembly the vote on the matter should require cross community support as defined in section 4(5) of the Northern Ireland Act 1998. However if the committee should report no adverse findings the petition shall be deemed to be invalid and the vote shall proceed on a simple majority basis."

The following amendments stood on the Marshalled List:

No 31: In page 7, leave out paragraphs 3 to 6.—

No 32: In page 7, line 16, leave out from "and," to end of line 17.— [Ms P Bradley.]

No 33: In page 7, line 19, leave out sub-paragraph (2).— [Ms P Bradley.]

No 34: In page 7, leave out paragraphs 7 to 14.— [Ms P Bradley.]

No 35: In page 7, line 28, at end insert"(aa) that the Deputy Speakers be elected in a secret ballot under a weighted majority vote,".— [Mr McCallister.]

No 36: In page 7, line 28, at end insert"(ab) that at least one of the following must be female—

(i) the Speaker,

(ii) a Deputy Speaker,".— [Mr McCallister.]

No 37: In page 8, line 30, leave out "four" and insert "two".— [Mr Kennedy.]

No 38: In page 8, line 31, at end insert

"Legislative timetable

13A. The motion may request that the Executive Committee be obliged to lay a legislative timetable before the Assembly at least once a year.".— [Mr McCallister.]

No 39: In page 8, line 33, leave out paragraph 14 and insert

"14. The motion may request that the function of statutory committees becomes to scrutinise Ministers and to advise and assist Ministers in the formulation of policy.".— [Mr McCallister.]

No 40: In page 8, leave out paragraph 15.— [Mr Eastwood.]

Mr Attwood: In starting, I should probably advise the House that there are two pieces of good news. First, I do not intend to detain the House very long in debating this group.

A Member: Hear, hear.

Mr Attwood: Thank you for that.

Secondly, in the previous group, there were, I think, 23 separate votes in opposition to each clause; whereas, this time, at least there will be only one vote in opposition to the schedule.

One vote that we will have is on amendment No 30, which relates to the petition of concern reform. All who signed up to the Good Friday Agreement, in whatever way they chose to do so — some of the ways were a bit ambiguous, vague, cryptic or delayed, but we will put all that aside — should sign up to amendment No 30 because it is sourced in the words of the Good Friday Agreement at paragraphs 11, 12 and 13, which are the particulars of the agreement that deal with strand 1 issues.

Mr McCallister: I am grateful to the Member for giving way. I am supportive of and have no issue with his amendment, but he does realise that, even if his amendment is made, his petition of concern would remove it.

Mr Attwood: Yes. Obviously, I am fully aware of that. Therefore, as I will indicate later in my contribution, the SDLP is working with others — hopefully, others in the Chamber; certainly, others in the Building — to produce a new clause 13, which is the procedural device, to bring matters to the Floor of the Chamber. Those matters would then be referred to in a new schedule, and that new schedule will, I have no doubt, anticipate the points that I am about to make on the reform of the petition of concern.

I will go back to the substantive point about the reform of the petition of concern. Those who endorsed the agreement should endorse that proposal because the amendment reflects faithfully that which is in paragraphs 11, 12 and 13 of the Good Friday Agreement. Those deal with strand 1, and paragraph 11 states:

"The Assembly may appoint a special Committee to examine and report on whether a measure or proposal for legislation is in conformity with equality requirements, including the ECHR/Bill of Rights."

If only we had a Bill of rights. Paragraph 11 continues:

"The Committee shall have the power to call people and papers to assist in its consideration of the matter. The Assembly shall then consider the report of the Committee and can determine the matter in accordance with the cross-community consent procedure."

Paragraph 12 states:

"The above special procedure shall be followed when requested by the Executive Committee, or by the relevant Departmental Committee, voting on a cross-community basis."

Paragraph 13 concludes:

"When there is a petition of concern as in 5(d) above, the Assembly shall vote to determine whether the measure may proceed without reference to this special procedure. If this fails to achieve support on a cross-community basis, as in 5(d)(i) above, the special procedure shall be followed."

As is clear, the words of the Good Friday Agreement are replicated in the words of the amendment. I encourage people who are faithful to the Good Friday Agreement to go back to its words and to endorse the amendment.

Since the agreement, a failure and fault line in Assembly processes has been that people have not availed themselves of the procedure or it was not fully legislated for in Standing Orders when it came to the business of the House. Although it is unlikely, for reasons that I will explain, that we could have been in a different place with the use of and reliance on a petition of concern, if, in the early days of the Assembly, people had relied not on a petition of concern per se but on the procedure for establishing a special Committee — an Ad Hoc Committee of the House — to determine whether there are equality or human rights dimensions for a matter that is subject to a petition of concern.

If we are not to reduce a petition of concern to a mutual veto on anything that moves in the Chamber, it is better to source the use of a petition of concern on equality or human rights matters and to have a process to define those issues, take evidence, interrogate and make a judgement. If that process and procedure had been in place, the widely perceived and, indeed, wider truth of the abuse of a petition of concern may not be the shadow on the Assembly that it has been. There are occasions when you have to deploy a petition of concern, which is why, with so much of the schedule, the SDLP and others have decided to do so. We are trying to reform the petition —

Mr Allister: Will the Member give way?

Mr Attwood: I will in a second. We are trying to reform the petition of concern, and I think that it is the broad view of Members that it should be reformed. In various negotiations and proposals that have emerged from those negotiations, there have been some moderate proposals, including a protocol to encourage best behaviour. This, however, goes further than best behaviour by creating a structure to mainstream best practice on the use of a petition of concern and to have it and issues therein grounded in human rights and equality matters. I will give way.

Mr Allister: To give the amendment as good a wind as I can, I will ignore the fact that the Member is relying so heavily on the Belfast Agreement as his birth parent. Will he explain what timescale he anticipates for this procedure? Take the petition of concern that he tabled today — we are in the dying weeks of this Assembly — would its effect not be to kill off legislation because it would take so long for an Ad Hoc Committee even to reach a view? Would it not slow down the interminably slow processes of the House even further?

Mr Attwood: I will not draw conclusions from the bad practice of so much legislation coming before the House in the last days of this mandate as an argument against a procedure that could apply, subject to the will of the Assembly when appropriate, in every month and year of a mandate.

Yes, there are time pressures now; yes, that is unfortunate; yes, that could see a negative outcome in the form of legislation that comes forward at the end of a mandate. However, a mandate is not two months or four months; it is four years and could be longer. In all those circumstances, the issue should be whether that is an appropriate mechanism that can be deployed in the life of an Assembly, even if, at the end of the life of the Assembly, it might be a mechanism that could be deployed for negative reasons. I understand the points that have been made, and I welcome the fact that Mr Allister said that he will give it a wind. To be fair to Mr Allister, I think that it was a fair wind. The correct point that he made about the potential negative consequences of using the device at the end of a mandate should not influence people definitively about its use in every other month and year in the life of the Assembly.

The more fundamental point that he might have made is whether legislation could be derailed by interminable delay in relation to this device. That will happen. I am sure that Sinn Féin will also make the point, when it enters the debate, that it could also be derailed by the fact that there are too many examples when matters go to a Committee and it is as clear on the nose on your face what that Committee should be thinking and judging in relation to that matter, only for the weight of numbers to prevail. Whatever the evidence and whatever the equality or human rights consequences, there are examples in Committees in the House when it is very clear what actions should arise, not least in relation to Members of the House, and it ends up that weight of numbers or party position seek to derail what should be the right outcome in favour of the wrong outcome. Unfortunately, even this proposal — this is why I say that Sinn Féin might —

Mr Ross: Will the Member give way?

Mr Attwood: I will in a second.

That is why I say Sinn Féin might touch on that. The proposal is vulnerable to being abused by the members of an Ad Hoc Committee, who might take a view that is partial rather than one that is consistent with equality and human rights standards.

Mr Ross: I thank the Member for giving way. It is a bit of an odd debate, given that we will probably remove the whole schedule even if people support his amendment, but he has just highlighted one of the issues with his proposal. If his logical position is that the Assembly cannot be trusted to make those decisions, and therefore it has to be looked at from a human rights perspective, would it not be more sensible or logical for an outside body or individual to be tasked with determining whether the petition of concern should be used? Would a more sensible and radical approach to the problem of petitions of concern not be to move to weighted majority voting, which his party seems to oppose in other elements of the Bill?

Mr Attwood: We should be very precious and protective of the powers of the House and the rights of Members of the House to determine their affairs. For example, we should have been very precious before one or two parties in the House decided to surrender welfare powers to London. When we have achieved a political and governmental purpose in the powers of the House, after the history of this part of Ireland, we should be very protective and keep our powers. Whether it is about giving powers to the London Parliament or, as the Member suggested, to somebody outside the Building, those decisions, having been given to politicians, should be jealously guarded. In jealously guarding them, we should not then systematically abuse them. Whilst this is not a perfect model, it is a better model to try to create some discipline in law and practice when it comes to petitions of concern.

To go further and to answer the Member's point, the Committee would be an Ad Hoc Committee; it would not be a standing Committee of the House. That would indicate to the House that this is not something to rush to when the opportunity presents itself. It should be relied on when it is appropriate to rely on it and, by keeping it ad hoc, you create the perception and, hopefully, the reality that it is not meant to be something that people should routinely rely on.

To go back to the Member's point, the Committee would take evidence. Who would you take evidence from on the European Convention and equality legislation but the specialists and experts in those matters in Northern Ireland. It might be stretching the point, but you would like to think, on the far side of taking evidence from equality and human rights experts, when the petition of concern has been discredited because of its abuse and overuse, and people are looking to the next mandate to show better authority, then the advice from an Ad Hoc Committee looking at the equality and human rights implications of any particular matter, would be taken, rather than it being, unilaterally and for sectional reasons, ignored and derailed.

3.45 pm

Mr McCallister: Will the Member give way?

Mr Attwood: Yes.

Mr McCallister: I know that our colleagues who sit on the Assembly and Executive Review Committee will have heard from the Human Rights Commission with regard to this. I suggest that the Member read what it actually says, and I will be reading it in my contribution to the debate. It is very much about questioning whether our designation system is compliant with the European convention, with it coming to the firm conclusion that it is not.

Mr Attwood: I will read that and listen to it. I heard those arguments about the Patten proposal of 50:50: that, somehow, it would be implicitly discriminatory against one section of the people of Northern Ireland. In those circumstances it was not compatible. Yet the European authorities gave a dispensation that —.

Mr Allister: A dispensation?

Mr Attwood: Yes. As far as I recall, it may have taken a dispensation, but it was nonetheless granted. That was because there are particular circumstances in which interventions that might be presented as discriminatory are necessary in order to achieve a general good and wider purpose. Whilst I will hear what the Human Rights Commission has to say, there are examples, even in our own recent history, where that which may be viewed as in conflict with human rights requirements is ultimately seen to be on the right side of those requirements. I hope that Members will hear that.

We can either trundle on with a protocol around a petition of concern, relying on people's good intentions, even when history has demonstrated too many bad intentions, or we can, in addition to a protocol, build into the life of our institutions a structure sourced in the Good Friday Agreement. Whilst it has been, in our view, adjusted and changed in a negative way, the great body of the Good Friday Agreement has stood the test of time in terms of our past and present history — although I know where Mr Allister will come in this. It would be timely to revisit the relevant paragraphs of strand 1 of the Good Friday Agreement in regard to the petition of concern.

I will now touch upon the content of the schedule and the amendments visited upon it. The SDLP is having conversations at the moment as regards trying to redraft a schedule for Further Consideration Stage. Despite the 23 votes, where people tried to vote the Bill down clause by clause, the Bill should primarily have been about opposition. Other matters have been captured in Mr McCallister's draft of the Bill and in the various clauses, especially the schedule, but the Bill should be, and primarily is, about opposition. The substantial body of clauses 2 to 12 confirms that fact. We are very concerned to protect the clauses that create an opposition because we believe that that is a better model than relying on the non-legislative approach, some of which we will hear about later this afternoon.

We have not petitioned the Bill because we believe that the principle of opposition is a valuable one that is consistent with the standards of power-sharing and the entitlement to d'Hondt, further to a democratic mandate. In any case, in our view, the schedule — this is why we petitioned it — goes beyond issues of opposition and even the issues identified in it. Let me give you an example. Paragraph 1 of the schedule says that any motion coming forward to the Chamber:

"may include, but is not limited to, the provisions set out in this Schedule."

That could end up in a free-for-all, meaning that a motion could come forward on anything that touches on the life of the Assembly and the Executive. We think that better and tighter drafting is to name in the schedule the matters that come forward and only the matters that can come forward. In any matters that come forward, we oppose paragraphs 3 to 6 of the schedule, which replace cross-community support with a weighted majority.

Previously in the Chamber, the SDLP outlined its belief that there is a need for various reforms in areas of institutional life arising from the Good Friday Agreement: a reduction in the number of MLAs; a reduction in the number of Departments; and procedures for the petition of concern or just some expressions of that. There are roads that we should not travel down —

Mr Agnew: Will the Member give way?

Mr Attwood: I will. One of those roads is replacing cross-community support with weighted-majority voting. In this phase of the life of the institutions, even though it is nearly 20 years since the Good Friday Agreement, there is a far, far longer road that should be travelled before we ever get near to thinking about replacing cross-community support. I will give way.

Mr Agnew: In his scope of reforms that he believes are needed to the institutions, does he agree that the situation whereby the so-called cross-community vote excludes cross-community parties is one of the areas that is very much in need of reform?

Mr Attwood: We are prepared to hear what the Member has to say on that, but, fundamental to the Hume thesis, which drove the political analysis of parties and governments, which is outlined in the opening language and paragraphs of the Good Friday Agreement and which he outlined in 1979 in the American magazine 'Foreign Affairs', was the contention that the conflict in Ireland in its expression at that stage was between two political traditions; those who were unionists, who called themselves British and who valued the link with the Crown and the Union, and those who had a different tradition, who called themselves Irish, who wanted to share in the life of the rest of the island and who were nationalist.

That analysis, which was radical in thinking in politics at that time, became the analysis that, over time, was shared by more parties and by all governments, and it became the template against which to judge political outcomes. That was the assessment. I recognise that people's sense of identity, of being cross-community, or Northern Irish, is changing and evolving, but the political analysis that Hume outlined and that then became the orthodoxy of political progress and that was at the heart of everything he did, eventually became the heart of everything that the two Governments, endorsed by the American Government, did. That analysis remains enduring in our politics and in the life of these institutions. Given how some in the Chamber still try to lord it over the other in justifying what they did in the past, holding to those provisions remains the right course.

Mr Ross: I thank the Member for giving way. I am just a little bit confused when he says that we are not in a place yet where we can move towards weighted majority voting because we need to maintain cross-community voting. How is weighted majority voting not cross-community voting? It depends on the weight that you set to it, but in any utterance that I have heard from any party that proposes weighted majority voting, it will be set at a level that requires — of course it would require, by its very nature — cross-community support, but what it does is to remove a veto from a single party and give it to a community. Surely that is progress, rather than what the Member says, which is about some sort of return to the past?

Mr Attwood: If that is the case, maybe, when he comes back to speak during the conduct of the debate, he will explain the DUP position on the petition of concern. Maybe he will explain to the House why, if we are in this new order of things where the Member believes that we can begin to adjust these mechanisms, the only issue in the entire Bill tabled by Mr McCallister where the DUP tabled a petition of concern was what? It was to resist the notion that there were joint First Ministers. [Interruption.] No, it is important — [Interruption.] It is important.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): Order. Order. Can all remarks be directed through the Chair?

Mr Attwood: The Member makes an argument about weighted majority voting and that that is a model of cross-community and that we are in a moment in our history where these matters can now be interrogated and changed. Why then is it that, when it came to the interrogation of the clause on the joint First Ministers, the Member did not just vote it down but actually tabled a petition of concern about it? There is an inconsistency there. We know why, of course, the Member's party voted against joint First Ministers. It was because it would remove from the DUP, as it would remove from Sinn Féin, an issue to beat their chests on when they come to the doors in the election: "Make us the biggest, because we will then be First Minister." Well, you cannot be the biggest if you are joint First Ministers, which is, in fact, the case. So the Member, on the one hand, says let us go down these roads, because it will demonstrate evolution of our politics and maturity in the House, yet he is not prepared to put into law that which is, in fact, the case, and which should be self-evident to everybody: that there are joint First Ministers, and that this argument about who is the First Minister is actually a false one that is perpetuated for narrow political and electoral reasons. That is another reason why discretion on some of these issues, rather than a headlong rush, is the right course.

Mr Ross: I thank the Member for giving way. I am more than happy to go on to that issue when I make my own contribution, but it was this very simple question that I posed to the Member: how is weighted majority voting not, by its very definition, requiring cross-community support in the Chamber?

Mr Attwood: I am not saying that it is not. I am just saying that we are not in a situation where the institutions and the conviction in relation to the conduct of parties in this Chamber is such to move in that direction.

Mr Allister: Will the Member give way?

Mr Attwood: I will in a second. On the role of the Speaker, there are issues that deserve interrogation: the issue of how he or she is elected; the issue of why people needed the protection of being Principal Deputy Speaker, rather than being an ordinary Deputy Speaker; the issue of the Speaker's independence; the issue of whether the Speaker should contest subsequent Assembly elections. There are issues about it. We oppose the proposal for a weighted majority in that regard as well. The issues about the Speaker, save for the narrow deals done by the DUP and Sinn Féin, have curiously not been the subject of much discussion in the political negotiations that have been held over the last number of years. We would welcome a conversation on the issue of the Speaker, to see that role, the election of the Speaker and ancillary matters to all that be further investigated.

Sorry, I will give way to the Member.

Mr Allister: I want to take the Member back to when he was displaying his blind allegiance to all things Belfast Agreement and telling us about the immutability of Mr Hume's vision and, of course, the manifestations of that in the Belfast Agreement.

4.00 pm

He may be one who, from time to time, will rebuke some others for living in the past, but is that not exactly what he is doing? Would he not be better and more progressively occupied if he were to take the advice of a successor of Mr Hume's and set about dismantling some of the "ugly scaffolding” of the Belfast Agreement, which, today, he is clinging to and trying to keep in place? Would not qualified majority be an excellent move in beginning to diminish and remove some of the ugly scaffolding of the Belfast Agreement that is not working?

Mr Attwood: I welcome the fact that the Member referred to the immutability of the Hume vision.

Mr Allister: Your vision. Your immutability.

Mr Attwood: No. Those were the words that the Member used. I very much welcome them. It seems to be the first expression of that conviction from the Member.

Mr Allister: I was speaking of you, not me.

Mr Attwood: In any case, I very much agree with the principle, even if he does not, about the immutability of the Hume vision, because, after years in which the conflict was defined by interference in Irish affairs and resistance to the democratic will of the people of Ireland, the nature of the conflict was redefined. Thousands of people died or were injured, and all our people lost immense opportunity in the period when the small number resisted the immutability of the Hume vision, because, having established his thinking in the run-up to 1979 and thereafter, it was nearly 20 years before those who endorsed the Good Friday Agreement endorsed that vision in the opening words of paragraph 1 of the Good Friday Agreement. Therefore, I certainly welcome that.

As to the Member's reference to “ugly scaffolding”, I note that a Member from Sinn Féin used the exact same words during a debate on Assembly reform two weeks ago. Whatever about the nature of the words, we have been looking at the architecture of the Good Friday Agreement. That is why we have endorsed various interventions that rework that, but in a sensible and moderate way, not in a way that could have fundamental consequences for the character of power-sharing, d'Hondt entitlements, and so on.

I made the point about the renaming of the positions of First Minister and deputy First Minister. We note what the schedule states about collective responsibility, but it is not defined. Those are very important principles and concepts. Therefore, in the absence of further detail in that regard, we are cautious about signing up to words that might have all sorts of consequences when they are not defined in the legislation.

We note, for example, what Mr McCallister says about the Programme for Government. That will be an acute matter, because, in ‘A Fresh Start’, the DUP and Sinn Féin say that parties have to commit to an Executive in advance of a final Programme for Government being agreed, after which — when it is agreed — d'Hondt will run, the First Minister and the deputy First Minister will be nominated, and other parties inclined to go into government will take their choices.

I need to be careful what I say here, because it could be slightly unparliamentary. That is coach before horses, or words to that effect, when it comes to the Programme for Government. You have to commit to entering a Government before you conclude negotiations on what the Programme for Government will mean. That is what the Fresh Start Agreement says: you have to take this great leap into the unknown about a Programme for Government as a basis of being permitted to enter the Executive.

Is there any parliamentary institution, certainly on these islands, that says, “You have to commit without knowing what you are committing to”? That is what Fresh Start says. Those who are most loyal to Fresh Start — we have heard from them during the debate — really have to explain themselves. If you had had to commit yourself to the outcome of the St Andrews, Hillsborough or Good Friday negotiations before discussions about the detail could be concluded, people would have said that it was not a very democratic or inclusive way to proceed. Yet, here we are, 18 years after the new political order was established, and we are being told — this is not the proposal from Mr McCallister — that you commit in advance, take what you are given, and then you choose what Ministry you might be entitled to under d'Hondt. It is a very strange version of democracy but, sure, we have seen some very strange versions of democracy over the last period.

As with the other arguments, we are resistant to the fundamental surgery that would arise from the schedules in respect of the threshold for nomination to Minister, the simple majority for Budget approval and other matters. I will reply to the debate, so I will listen attentively to all that people have to say.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): I call Paula Bradley, who will be contributing on behalf of the Assembly and Executive Review Committee.

Ms P Bradley: Of the amendments in the second group, the Committee considered only the four amendments tabled by the Bill sponsor. Amendment Nos 35 and 36 concern the election of the Speaker. The Committee acknowledged the importance of independence and impartiality in the role of the Speaker but queried whether legislation was required to further enshrine the existing conventions. The Committee also had concerns about the election of the Speaker by secret ballot. The Committee noted the point raised by some academics that the existing system provides the Speaker with some kind of cross-community legitimacy in carrying out that role. Although the Committee discussed the matter at length during its deliberations, it did not reach a definitive Committee position with regard to the election of the Speaker.

The Committee also considered the provision in the schedule that the Executive set out a Programme for Government at the outset. The Committee noted the concerns raised by stakeholders about the possibility of gridlock should the Executive fail to agree a Programme for Government and Budget outlines within the specified period. The Committee noted the response of the sponsor that the four-week period allowed in the Bill is more generous than the two-week period provided under ‘A Fresh Start’. The Committee also noted the sponsor's amendment that the Executive Committee be obliged to lay a legislative timetable before the Assembly at least once a year. The Committee divided on this amendment and agreed by vote that it was not content for it to be made.

With respect to the role of Statutory Committees of the Assembly, members considered the response provided by a number of Statutory Committees. In particular, members considered the response and amendment proposed by the Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment. The Enterprise, Trade and Investment Committee considered that, although there is a role for Statutory Committees to scrutinise Ministers, they should retain their ability to assist and advise Ministers to ensure that they continue to have a broad remit. The Assembly and Executive Review Committee noted that the Bill sponsor supported this view and agreed to bring forward an amendment. The Committee divided on this amendment and agreed by vote that it was not content for it to be made.

The Committee divided and agreed by vote that it was not content with amendment Nos 35, 36, 38 and 39. The remainder of the amendments to the schedule have been tabled since the close of Committee Stage and, therefore, the Committee has no view on them. With respect to opposition to the schedule, the Committee divided on all 15 paragraphs of the schedule and agreed by vote that it was not content with them as drafted.

Mr McCartney: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. In the debate on the first group of amendments, Caitriona Ruane and I laid out on behalf Sinn Féin our belief that the Fresh Start Agreement says that there is no requirement for legislation to create an opposition. We are very much of that view, and that has informed our position on the schedule. Some aspects of the schedule cannot be carried out by the Assembly, but other aspects of it should and could be. That is our broad position.

We broadly support what Alex Attwood said on behalf of the SDLP in relation to paragraphs 3, 4 and 5 of the schedule. The SDLP had an amendment down to stand part, and we would have supported that. There is now a petition of concern around the whole schedule, and we are comfortable with that idea as well.

Mr Attwood spoke about amendment No 30. The Fresh Start Agreement laid down the provision that there should be an examination of the petition of concern. That is something that we could all contribute to. I think that all of us know and accept that the petition of concern, a concept that was designed all those years ago, has been brought to the Floor in ways that are not what it was designed for or how it was laid out initially. Mr Attwood said that he foresaw some of the reservations that we would have with the amendment. In many ways, he is right that the commentary can be found in the Good Friday Agreement, but the last sentence of his amendment states:

“However if the committee should report no adverse findings the petition shall be deemed to be invalid and the vote shall proceed on a simple majority basis.”

Even if the schedule had not been petitioned, we would not have been in support of the amendment on those grounds. He said that the petition of concern was vulnerable and had been abused. In the past, there have been Ad Hoc Committees that have heard expert witnesses, but, as he said, political priority or party political interests lead people to vote in a particular way. Whereas the intention of this may be good and one could say that it is well intentioned, in our opinion it is premature. We believe that the record of voting would show that, if a majority had one political position, even though the report might give rise to the petition being valid and the vote proceeding with cross-community support, party political lines would dictate otherwise. We do not believe that that is the way to go. We think that that is a lessening of the principles of the Good Friday Agreement in protecting minorities. Therefore, we will not support the amendment. We are satisfied that the SDLP has joined us in supporting a petition of concern to ensure that paragraphs 3, 4 and 5 of the schedule, in particular, fall.

I want to stress a point that I made on the first group of amendments. No one doubts the intention of John McCallister on the need or, indeed, the demand for an opposition. I see commentary this morning that the Ulster Unionists and the SDLP have already entered into some sort of negotiation around how they can take this forward. In fairness, the SDLP has denied that anything took place, but we will maybe work that out for ourselves as we proceed. The need and demand for an opposition is there. There will be a discussion later this afternoon about how the Assembly can lay provision. People genuinely feel that there is a need for an opposition, but Standing Orders, the convention that we spoke about in the first group of amendments and much of the evidence that we heard at the AER Committee lead me to believe that, despite the feeling that is projected by some that all other parliamentary systems have opposition locked down in legislation and every aspect of it is there in statute, the opposite is the case. Most models of opposition come about through convention and political maturity or political growth. I agree with Alex Attwood's contention that we are just not there yet on some aspects of this. However, we certainly support the idea of the need for an opposition, and we will fulfil the terms laid out in the Fresh Start Agreement.

4.15 pm

Mr Kennedy: I think I am grateful for the opportunity to contribute to the debate, even though I have a sense that much of the discussion has already been predetermined by petitions of concern and their impact on the private Member's Bill tabled by Mr McCallister. Of course, many parts of the schedule are aspirational, but they are too much too soon for many. However, we should aspire to evolve as a society and as a democratic institution. There are many parts of the schedule that will, at least, spark constructive debate for the future.

I will touch on a number of the amendments, but the debate seems futile given that a petition of concern has been lodged against the schedule. It is extremely disappointing and frustrating that four petitions of concern have been lodged, especially that against clause 13, which would have seen a request made for the opposition to be legislated for. The Ulster Unionist Party believes that this is extremely important in safeguarding the future of any opposition structures or status in the Assembly. Therefore, the Ulster Unionist Party has decided to abstain on votes on clauses that have petitions against them — we did that earlier today — given the futility of those votes.

I come to that petition of concern and the non-debate around amendment No 30. The SDLP is seeking support for an amendment that it, in turn, scuppered because of the use of the petition of concern. I hope that people at home are following this closely; it is jolly interesting. We recognise the need for reform of the petition of concern to avoid it being used as a one-party veto. Some of the uses of the petition that we have seen could not be further away from the original intention. It is a shame that some in the House have not been able to show restraint during this term. However, we are not convinced that the amendment provides the solution. I listened closely to Mr Attwood. We welcome what was a constructive contribution from the SDLP. I do not think that anyone would deny that that party is anything but passionate about preventing the misuse of the petition. However, we are concerned that an Ad Hoc Committee populated by the party or parties causing the blockage through the petition would not do anything to resolve matters. We are also concerned about the lack of a time frame for that Committee to come up with a resolution of these matters. We will look at any new schedule indicated by Mr Attwood at Further Consideration Stage.

In terms of community designation and amendment No 31, it is largely aspirational. It is a place that we hope society can get to. It is desirable that, one day, we will be in a place where community designation is not required, but we do not believe that we are there yet. We should remember that it was a long, hard journey to arrive at what we did in 1998. We should always strive to see the institutions maturing and changing positively, but we have to be realistic: we cannot run before we can walk. Official opposition will be something significant that the Assembly in the new mandate will need to adapt to. That, again, will provide its own challenges. As with other parts of what is currently proposed in the schedule, we recognise that this is where we would like to move to, but, in the context of Northern Ireland, we must always be mindful of ensuring maximum public confidence in the institutions.

On amendment No 34 and the position of the Speaker, we were not convinced by the proposals for re-election, particularly the fact that someone running for election would never represent the people who elected them. Equally, we were not convinced by the proposal that the Speaker not be allowed to stand at the Assembly election subsequent to their taking up post.

The proposal that relates to the First Minister and deputy First Minister does not get to the root of the problem. A name change, without something to differentiate between the two roles, could serve just to make things even more dysfunctional. Given the already dysfunctional nature of the office, that move could bring about further stalemate. A return to the original method of joint election, which comes from the 1998 Act, will be the only way to curtail the political jostling that goes on.

In terms of amendment No 37, if the requirement to establish a Programme for Government is to remain part of the schedule, we want the time frame brought down to two weeks, as outlined in the past two agreements that came out of Stormont House. A two-week deadline as opposed to a four-week one would help to concentrate minds. We have long cited agreement on a Programme for Government before the running of d'Hondt as a game changer. That would allow a blueprint to be drawn up for the mandate before Ministries are taken up and the famous silo mentality settles in.

The legislative timetable seems pragmatic, and it should be common practice. We have seen the huge build-up of legislation over the mandate and the amount going through via accelerated passage this year — there is a bit of a rush to the gate as we approach May. Laying a legislative timetable would allow for a more normal passage of legislation, maximising, therefore, the time for scrutiny.

The idea of a simple majority for Budget approval, as referred to in amendment No 40, has, in the Northern Ireland context, the potential to undermine confidence. It is an aspiration to one day be in a position where a Budget could be passed by a simple majority, but I do not think that anyone thinks that we are at that stage yet. A Budget passed on a cross-community basis is still required.

Overall, we await and will assess the outcome of the decisions made today, the decisions made in the aftermath of last week's debate and the votes on the amendments that will be put to the House tonight. The statement later today by the First Minister and deputy First Minister will have a considerable impact on the prospects of this private Member's Bill becoming meaningful legislation.

We will, therefore, look at the issues again at Further Consideration Stage, but I have a suspicion that, ultimately, the two big parties in the Executive will do what they want to do and what they think is the way forward, particularly for them.

Mr Lunn: As others have said, there is an element of shadow boxing and, as Mr Kennedy said, futility about the proceedings this afternoon. Like him and others, we will probably have to wait until the next stage to see what emerges from all this. That sounds suspiciously like what I said last week, but that is the way it is. I will run through the amendments briefly as if we were going to vote on them and that the votes would matter.

Amendment No 30 from the SDLP relates to petitions of concern. We have the same concerns, if I can put it that way, about petitions of concern, as will the other smaller parties. The amendment means that you would have to set up an Ad Hoc Committee every time a petition of concern was lodged. In this mandate, which is about to finish, we are approaching 150 petitions of concern. The Ad Hoc Committee, as, I think, Mr Kennedy hinted at, would have to reflect the balance of the parties in the Assembly. How would that take us forward? It could be that such a Committee would occasionally decide that a petition of concern was frivolous and did not need to be proceeded with, but, frankly, I have my doubts.

At the time of the welfare reform considerations, an Ad Hoc Committee was set up for the House, which I had the privilege to chair. We went across to London to talk to the Westminster version, which is a Standing Committee. It is not a standing ad hoc committee, as I am inclined to say, but a Standing Committee on human rights and equality issues. It scrutinises everything that goes through. If we are to have a Committee to scrutinise each petition of concern, something like a more permanent Standing Committee might be the answer.

Amendment No 31 relates to cross-community votes versus qualified majority votes. We are long-standing opponents of anything to do with petitions of concern, although I must admit that I recently spoiled my record by signing one. Hopefully, that will never happen again. We certainly favour majority weighted voting, if such a thing could be achieved.

Amendment No 32 is a requirement that a petition of concern be signed by people from three or more parties. Given that we do not want them in the first place, I will not comment on that.

Amendment No 33 relates to the requirement that independents are counted as separate parties. We have some sympathy with that idea. It would bring the residents of the so-called naughty corner more into play, perhaps, but, as I said, we will have to wait and see what emerges from all this by way of the SDLP's revised schedule, when it appears.

Amendment No 34 is wide-ranging, deleting everything from paragraphs 7 to 14 of the schedule. The motion may request:

"that the Speaker be elected in a secret ballot under a weighted majority vote."

We support that — absolutely. It may also request that:

"the Speaker ceases to be a member of all political parties".

The Speaker is supposed to be above politics, so there would be no harm in that, and it would probably be a good thing. The motion may also request that:

"the Speaker ceases to be the elected representative for the constituency for which the Speaker was returned,".

This is revolutionary stuff, but it sounds like good sense, as does paragraph 7(d), which states that the nominating officer for the party which he no longer belongs to could nominate somebody else in his place. That has not been brought up before, but it sounds worthy of consideration. Paragraph 7(e) states that the motion may request:

"that the Speaker not be subject to the direction or control of any political party or any person in the Assembly,".

I am sure that that would flow naturally from the other conditions that I mentioned. Paragraph 7(f) states that the motion may request:

"that the Speaker is not eligible to stand for election in the next Assembly elections subsequent to becoming Speaker,".

I disagree completely. You would probably end up with a succession of Speakers who were in their last term in the Assembly. In other words, it is very likely that you would never get a young Speaker.

Mr Allister: You would be in with a chance. [Laughter.]

Mr Lunn: No. Paragraph 7(g) means that the Speaker is invited back to the beginning of the new Assembly, perhaps to conduct the business of electing a new Speaker or to be elected Speaker again. I am not sure about that.

Right now, frankly, it does not really matter much, does it? When we get to the last vote, are we going to torpedo all these things?

(Mr Speaker in the Chair)

4.30 pm

"The motion may request that the First Minister and deputy First Minister are renamed as the First Ministers."

Well, they are First Ministers; everybody knows that. Why do we continue to make something out of that? They are joint First Ministers. If they are annoyed by the titles of First Minister and deputy First Minister, perhaps we can do something about it.

"The motion may request that the Ministerial Code ... includes provision that Ministers uphold the principle of collective responsibility."

That would be a revolution, would it not? That is a given, but, if we have to ask Westminster to enshrine it in legislation for us, that is no bad thing.

"The motion may request that a political party must have a minimum of 16.6% of the total number of members of the Assembly before that party is eligible to nominate a person to hold Ministerial office".

That is far too high, clearly. The principle that we run the d'Hondt system right through for Ministers, Chairs and Deputy Chairs, all in one operation, seems perfectly sound to me. I think that Mr Kennedy's party has suggested reducing the period from four weeks to two weeks to give political parties time to establish a Programme for Government and Budget outlines. Two weeks is possibly long enough. Four weeks is perhaps comfortable. Maybe we will come back with an amendment for three weeks. It is a valid idea. As to whether it is two weeks or four weeks, the jury is out.

"The motion may request that the function of statutory committees ceases to be to advise and assist Ministers in the formulation of policy and instead becomes to scrutinise".

Frankly, I do wonder what is the difference. I think that we are playing with words a wee bit here. The word "criticise" is not mentioned there, but that is actually what Committees frequently do. We will see what new suggestion is brought forward.

As regards the simple majority for Budget approval, we wonder why one of the major decisions that the Assembly has to make every year should suddenly become the subject of a simple majority vote when so many other — perhaps even less important — matters would ideally be the subject of a weighted majority vote. Frankly, we would not go with that at all.

As I have said, there really is an element of shadow-boxing in all this, given that the very last item on the list is the opposition to the schedule, which has been brought forward by Sinn Féin with the help of a petition of concern. That kind of negates everything that we are saying. We will go through the process and take the votes. Something will emerge from the wreckage, and we will come back and consider it next time it is due.

Mr Ross: I will use this opportunity to apologise to you, Mr Speaker, for missing my topical question today. I meant no disrespect to the House or the Speaker. It was an unfortunate oversight on my behalf. I will endeavour not to do it again.

It is an interesting debate. Other Members — every Member, I think — have acknowledged that it is a bit of an odd debate given that opposition to the whole schedule has been tabled and a petition of concern is there. Nevertheless, some interesting areas have been put forward by Mr McCallister. Interesting debate took place in the Committee around some of them as well. It is worthwhile having debate or discussion on them even though they are doomed to failure.

On the first amendment in the group, amendment No 30, Mr Attwood took some time to outline the rationale behind the proposal. In fairness to him, at least he acknowledged that he is also trying to petition-of-concern it and that, even if the House supported it, he would seek to remove it from the schedule. That was strange, but at least he was upfront about it in his initial comments. I think that it is fair to say that everybody acknowledges that the petition of concern is not perfect. I think that, at one time or another, everybody has misused or abused the petition of concern. Nobody's hands are clean. Indeed, even Mr Lunn acknowledged the fact that he has signed a petition of concern. He seemed quite ashamed by the fact and endeavoured not to do it again. It is an issue. Sometimes, it has a legitimate use; at other times, Members will question the legitimacy of it. When petitions are tabled, I often hear people say, "That is not in the spirit of the intention behind it" and all that sort of stuff. The fact is that it is there in legal language in the Northern Ireland Act and you cannot have a spirit behind a legal text that is in that Act. If it is there, parties will use it. I think that the Fresh Start Agreement has tried to make parties think a little bit more about whether we can get to a position where it is used less often by having take-note debates or something like that. That is a positive.

Mr Allister: Will the Member give way?

Mr Ross: Yes.

Mr Allister: He refers to what A Fresh Start says about the petition of concern. The proponents of A Fresh Start hold it up as the way forward on the subject. It now requires grounds to be given in support of a petition, yet the Member and his party and the other chief proponent of A Fresh Start, Sinn Féin, have tabled petitions on this Bill that do none of those things. They do not even live up to the putative expectations of A Fresh Start. Is there even any bona fides with what lies behind the contention that things will change under A Fresh Start when the practice post-Fresh Start is that nothing has changed?

Mr Ross: The Member will know that the protocol in A Fresh Start is a voluntary one agreed by all the parties. It is about how we can move forward in our debates in the Chamber and about moving away from private Members' motions where the use of petitions of concern is most problematic, because there is no legal authority behind those motions, and towards take-note debates. With legislation that will actually be implemented, the use of petitions of concern is slightly different and there is more rationale behind their use. That is how we have used it today — I will go on to explain that — and I think that it can be appropriate. Many of those who are most critical of the petition of concern and its use are those who cherish it most closely. I picked that up from Mr Attwood's contribution earlier. Indeed, Mr Attwood talks about human rights abuses and how it is used to protect against those, but it is very questionable whether his party's use of the petition of concern against the Welfare Reform Bill was valid, in his language, in the spirit of the POC.

I do not want to spend too long on this because I realise that we have quite a bit on the agenda today. Mr Attwood acknowledged some of the issues with his amendment. Mr Allister made the point about slowing up the process. If you table it, you have to create an Ad Hoc Committee, and that might take another week to get through the Business Committee. You then elect your Ad Hoc Committee and it will meet and appoint a Chairperson. Mr Attwood said that the Ad Hoc Committee would then take evidence. That takes time as well, because you would take another week before you invite interested bodies to come. It might take another couple of weeks before you get through all the evidence. So, you are adding an awful lot of delay to the process. That is one of the issues with creating another layer of bureaucracy around the use of the petition of concern.

Mr Lunn made the point about the reflection of community strength on an Ad Hoc Committee, as, invariably, you would have a unionist majority on it. I am not sure that that is what the SDLP would necessarily want, because a unionist majority could vote down any use of the petition of concern by nationalists. That seems to go against the argument that Mr Attwood made on protecting the community. I am not sure that it is a particularly logical thing to do. I am not advocating that we give power to someone outside the Assembly to make decisions that we should be taking ourselves; I was simply trying to make the point that it seems more logical to me that, if an individual outside the Assembly were to determine whether or not it was a legitimate use of the petition of concern, it may make it more practical in its outworking than it would be to have Assembly Members, with their party strength, making the decision on that Ad Hoc Committee.

I will move to amendment No 31. I made the point to Mr Attwood that I believe that we need to get towards weighted majority voting as a stepping stone towards normality rather than as a backward step, as he seems to see it. I made the point to him that it is getting away from a party veto towards a community veto that is a cross-community vote and which gives the protections for both communities and normalises politics somewhat as well. Weighted majority voting is where we need to get to in the future. As a party, we have held that position for quite some time.

Amendment Nos 32 and 33 are from our party, and Mr Lunn referred to them. It is the idea that parties are somehow more important than individuals. I think that individual Members are just as important as parties, also in reflecting that people from smaller parties do not have more authority or should have more say than those from larger parties. If you have the requisite number of signatures, it does not matter how many parties are represented on that.

Amendment No 34 is, again, on the issue of the Speaker. That is one of the areas that I think provoked most debate within the Committee, and there were some very interesting and radical proposals from Mr McCallister on it. There are difficulties, and I do not think that we all bought in to what he was proposing in this part of the Bill.

On the idea that you would cease to be a member of a political party, I do not think anybody has accused the current Speaker — I recognise who is in the Chair at the moment — of being party political in their role in the Chair, and I do not think anybody accused the former Speaker of the House of being party political when he was in the Chair either, so it is not an issue that I heard has caused concern amongst anybody. I certainly think that the public perception of the Chair is that they are independent whilst fulfilling their function. I do not think it is necessary that you would be required to cease to be a member of a political party. That does not happen elsewhere, as far as I understand. If a Chair was to be party political in that post, there are ways in which the House would vote to remove that individual. There are safeguards there, and I just do not think it is necessary to do that.

As for the idea that you would then replace a Speaker with another Member, the thrust of debates in the House in the last number of weeks has been how we reduce the number of Members. What we would be doing is creating an additional Assembly Member. The point that I made to Mr McCallister in the Committee and that I still hold is that one of the strengths of having a Speaker is that they are from the Back Benches of that Chamber. They are there to represent Back-Benchers in making sure that they hold the Executive to account. Therefore, I think it is important that the Speaker is from the elected body. I do not think we need to —

Mr Lunn: Will the Member give way?

Mr Ross: Yes.

Mr Lunn: On the point about whether the Speaker should be replaced by another member of what was his party, would you not agree that that could help parties to make their decision on whether to allow a Member to become Speaker, given that it would preserve the balance of the parties as they were? The Speaker is supposed to be above politics anyway, as they always are, of course.

Mr Ross: Where voting is concerned, that may well be the case, and it may put off smaller parties from putting forward names. It was an issue that particularly exercised the Alliance Party because in previous terms there always had to be an Alliance Member to try to get the support of the House. Obviously, with a smaller party, that impacts on its numbers. But I do not think it is a real concern amongst the body of the Assembly. Again, it does not seem to be a real problem; therefore, I do not think we need to try to find some sort of phoney fix to it.

I will make this point again, and this is the strongest point: it is important that the Speaker is from the body that has been elected and is there as a representative of that Assembly. That is the same as elsewhere.

Mr Lunn made the point about having to resign after your term of office. Again, I do not think it is necessary to put that into legislation, because convention dictates that a Speaker will move on. I doubt that the current Speaker will want to take up a position in the House of Lords, but convention is that it may well be offered. That may be a huge step forward and very progressive, but I do not think it is a problem because convention means that Members do not run again as party representatives. It would be difficult for them in some circumstances to go back to the Back Benches and reintegrate into their parties, so I do not see it as a specific problem.

Mr Lunn made the point that no young Members would be Speaker again. Convention would dictate that a Speaker tends to have the respect of the House; therefore, you will have been there a little bit longer. Perhaps if you are a younger Member put forward by your party, they are looking to shuffle you out, so you would be cautious about that, but again, I do not think that these issues are real concerns that need to be legislated for.

There is an idea about renaming the First Minister and deputy First Minister to joint First Ministers. We have opposed that. People make the argument that they have the same legal powers. Of course, we know the requirement of cooperation between the two offices — everybody knows that — but to say that there is absolutely no difference is wrong.

The larger party being reflected as First Minister and the second largest party as deputy First Minister is a difference. People may not recognise that difference in here, but internationally when there are protocols and when meeting international guests and chairing meetings, there is a difference between the First Minister and the deputy First Minister. Of course, Mr Attwood criticised the Democratic Unionist Party for holding that position, but it is he who has put a veto down on making that change, because he has petition-of-concerned the schedule, which refers to changing the names. He argues for changing the names, but he has put a petition down to make sure that that does not happen.

4.45 pm

Mr McCarthy: I thank the Member for giving way. I will give this example to indicate that there is very little difference between the First Minister and deputy First Minister. While I was the chair of the sports development committee in Ards, I invited Peter Robinson as First Minister to come to our sports awards evening. We had to wait some time, and, finally, we got a letter back to say that, unfortunately, he could not attend. The letter had to be signed by Peter and Martin. There we are. A simple act of responding to a request for the First Minister to grace Newtownards with his presence could not be done without the signature of the deputy First Minister.

Mr Ross: I am quite sure that it was their loss that they were not able to go to that event. There is a difference between the First Minister and the deputy First Minister. Perhaps the Member meant their legal authority.

Mr Allister: Will the Member give way?

Mr Ross: I will give way.

Mr Allister: Is the Member trying to obscure the legal reality that it is a single office incapable of its functions being exercised unless it is done mutually by both of them together? The First Minister or the deputy First Minister do not have a single free-standing function or power. They only have power within the single office when they exercise it together. Why is he trying to muddy the waters and pretend that it is otherwise?

Mr Ross: I am not trying to pretend anything. I think that there is an importance and a distinction between the two posts in the wider community. I think that there is a distinction in the wider international community as well, and I think that the larger party should be recognised as having the First Minister over the deputy First Minister. I just think that that is something that most people will appreciate.

Paragraph 9 of the schedule talks about collective responsibility, and Mr Lunn said that it should be a given that of course we should have collective responsibility. There was an element of this that took place in the debate last week around Mr McCallister's notion that we should have a single legal identity of the Executive. The difficulty, of course, with that is that our mandatory coalition form of government here is not like other Governments that are formed elsewhere, where the First Minister or Prime Minister has the ability to hire and fire members of their Cabinet or is able to speak on behalf of their Cabinet colleagues. That does not happen here, so there is a difficulty there. Of course, you will have collective responsibility around the Programme for Government, but other issues will come up where everybody will not be on exactly the same page. Therefore, if Ministers step out of line, I think that it is important that Ministers have the ability to sort that out by taking legal action in the courts against them if they have failed to live up to their responsibilities and their functions. That may move away from his notion of collective responsibility, but I think that it is the real world in which we live and, therefore, it has to be borne in mind as well.

Mr Agnew: I thank the Member for giving way. I hear his point, but, obviously, we have coalitions continually in the Republic of Ireland, and we have recently had a coalition in the UK. Surely, it has been a failure of our governance that we do not have collective responsibility, not a necessary consequence of it.

Mr Ross: Nobody is arguing against the point that we want to have collective responsibility. I am simply highlighting the reality that, in the situation that we have in Northern Ireland, from time to time, we will have fundamental differences between Ministers from different parties. Therefore, enacting collective responsibility as a single legal identity, as Mr McCallister was trying to do in another part of the Bill and this is reflective of that, is not something that, I think, is possible or would be advisable. I think that it is important that, if Ministers do take a decision that they should not have taken and have not brought it to the Executive, Ministers should be able to challenge that decision in the courts, as we have seen with successful challenges in the courts in the past when Ministers have failed to live up to their functions.

I think that Mr Lunn was the only Member who mentioned running the appointment of Chairs and Deputy Chairs as a single process. If you decide not to take up your Executive posts, you should not benefit from getting additional Committee Chairs. Again, Committee Chairs in most other jurisdictions are reflective of the strengths of parties in the election that preceded the appointment. I think that that is something that we should not be moving away from either.

There are a number of other amendments. Mr McCallister tabled amendments around the election of the Speaker. I do not think that there is a real issue with the current system, and we do not need to change it. The Speaker should be there on merit. The idea that one of the Speaker or deputy Speakers should be female is, I think, moving away from that merit principle. We have, of course, had a female Speaker here in the past. As a member of a party that has a female leader and a female First Minister who is there because she is the most capable person to lead the party and the most capable person to be First Minister, I do not think that we need any lectures from anyone on having quotas.

I think that we would always fiercely resist the idea of putting in quotas anywhere, because quotas show disrespect to females who are capable of fulfilling a function, whether that be as First Minister or as Speaker. I am sure that we will have a female Speaker again, and we will not need to legislate for it.

I am not particularly hostile to Mr Kennedy's amendment. At present, I think that the law dictates that the Assembly has to meet one week after the election. The Assembly then has two weeks to appoint its First Minister and deputy First Minister, so maybe three weeks would be more appropriate. Where there is an issue is not so much around getting a Programme for Government as getting a Budget through in that time. I do not think that that is possible, because the Budget tends to come in the autumn. That may be one area in which it would not be practically possible, but I understand the point that Mr Kennedy is trying to make.

I have no issue with amendment No 38, which is on the legislative timetable. It is actually a positive step. Mr Kennedy made the point that it would be useful to try to timetable how we get legislation through the House. We have seen Bills introduced very late in the mandate; indeed, this is the fifth year of what should have been a four-year mandate. When Ministers present something in the fifth year, you ask whether it was ever their intention to introduce it. Therefore, our own version of the Queen's Speech may be a useful thing to add annually. That would allow Members an opportunity to debate what they see as their priorities for the year ahead, and I think that there is great value in that.

Amendment No 39 corrects the way in which the Bill was drafted to ensure that Committees are there not just to scrutinise but to assist their Minister. It is an important amendment, and I know that the ETI Committee made that point. Much of the work that we have done in the Justice Committee with our innovation seminars has shown our initiative in policy development. If we were restricted in doing that, the Department would be in a worse position. We have been able to look at policy areas and make proposals to the Department, some of which have been utterly ignored, but that is not to say that we do not find value in trying to push our own agenda. Of course, in the past, many Committees initiated inquiries of interest in a particular policy area, and I would not want to see anything preclude them from doing that.

Of course, as other Members said, much of this is largely academic, given that there has been a petition of concern tabled, but I at least recognise that Mr McCallister has given us plenty of interesting areas to debate. It is unfortunate, not least for Mr McCallister, that much of it is doomed as a result of the petition of concern, particularly given the work that he has put into the Bill.

Mr Agnew: When we debated the first group of amendments, I focused very much on the need for good governance. It is fair to say that the petition of concern mechanism has been a stumbling block to getting good governance and to change being made by the Assembly. Mr Allister said that you could not talk about the spirit of the legislation, but I certainly think that the intention of those who came up with the idea of the petition of concern has been lost. It has become a tool of power rather than one of protection, which seemed to be its original intent.

In 'A Fresh Start', we have a proposed voluntary agreement on how the petition of concern should be used. As Mr Allister pointed out, that has already gone by the wayside, which shows you the stock that you can put in a voluntary agreement in politics. We have already had petitions of concern tabled since the Fresh Start Agreement and, as yet, have not seen one being tabled alongside the rationale for tabling it. I have criticisms of how 'A Fresh Start' tackles the issue anyway, but, given that the parties that signed up to it have already reneged on part of that agreement, we should be wary of a purely voluntary approach. We need a legislative approach, and we have an opportunity for change and to get agreement on this today. I would rather have seen alternative proposals come forward, as the SDLP did with amendment No 30, rather than a simple petition of concern to block the whole schedule. It has not been lost on many that proposals to amend the petition of concern have themselves been subject to a petition of concern. Again, that does not lend itself to the idea that what we have here is good governance or an Assembly that is able to come to an agreement to legislate for change. That, of course, is subject to a proposed rewritten schedule from the SDLP, and I will wait to see that. However, as things stand, Mr McCallister's good work in pulling together the schedule has been referred to, and we should be debating the individual merits of each paragraph rather than what we are doing, which, ultimately, is voting on whether or not to have the schedule.

There are two proposals, and there are three options. There is the status quo. There seems to be consensus that the status quo has been dysfunctional and has called into question the integrity of the Assembly. We have the proposal outlined by the SDLP in amendment No 30, and we have Mr McCallister's proposals for a weighted majority. My attraction towards a weighted majority is that we can get rid of community designation. It is time that we took that step. We talk a lot about normalising politics in Northern Ireland, but it is not normal to designate on signing in beyond the designation of your party to designate as "unionist", "nationalist" or — a completely unsatisfactory term — "other". I am not an "other". I stand for many things; I am not simply apart from unionism or nationalism. Indeed, I argue that those parties in the Chamber have more to say and more to define them than simply their position on the constitution. In the Good Friday Agreement, it is enshrined that the constitutional status of Northern Ireland will not change unless that is requested by the majority of people of Northern Ireland. It is not even really a matter for this House, so why are we designating as "unionist", "nationalist" or "other" on the day of our signing in?

I referred to the protection of the petition of concern and community designation. I do not see why we cannot achieve that through weighted majority, and I go further and challenge the SDLP and Sinn Féin on that. We have been asked to move forward as a society in many ways, and, indeed, unionism has been asked to adapt and to move away from majoritarian rule, share power and accept the new dispensation, the changes to policing and everything that has come with it. That was right, and those were things that I supported, but there needs to be a degree of trust from nationalism and republicanism in accepting, in working with the parties across the Chamber, that nobody wants to go back to unionist rule or simple majoritarian rule. There is a genuine commitment to sharing power and to working for all the people of Northern Ireland.

I listened to Claire Hanna talk today on the radio, and she spoke very well about the need to normalise our society in relation to bonfires. She said that it is not normal that you can simply build a bonfire unchallenged on someone else's land without their permission. I listened and thought, "I have a lot of sympathy with that". She asked why we did not have the normal rule of law in Northern Ireland in relation to those issues.

She spoke very well, and I was compelled by her arguments. I would apply the same rationale to the way that we do things in the Chamber. Why do we not seek to normalise things? Why do we not move away from designating as unionist or nationalist? If we want to move away from divided communities — I believe that all of us in the House will, at least, say that that is what we want — why do we continue to divide our politics by using the language of two communities and others? If we are going to use that language, I would much rather that we were referred to as single-identity parties and cross-community parties, but, to be honest, I would rather get away from the use of that language altogether. That would be a major step forward and would send a signal to society that our politics is willing to change and that our society should change with it.

5.00 pm

A weighted majority would give adequate protections to allow that step to be taken and to move away from petitions of concern and community designation. We should have an argument about whether we should set it at 60% or whether it needs to be a bit higher. We should have that debate. We should not be afraid of the move, afraid to take that step. It is not about those details, and we should not say that we must forever have that protection. It harks back to the past, and it is preventing us from further normalising our institutions. That would be my preference. That said, I see in the SDLP's amendment an alternative option. It is a smaller step perhaps, but it is, at least, a step away from our current provisions for petitions of concern.

I made a point when Mr Attwood was speaking, and I will make it again. Any reform of petitions of concern that retains the principle but seeks to reform it must reform out the iniquity that is a cross-community vote that excludes cross-community parties.

My argument is that, rather than my vote and the votes of the Alliance Party not being counted and being excluded in a weighted majority, and those who elected me not having their voices heard, they should be counted in both tallies. I represent unionists and nationalists. Indeed, there are unionists and nationalists in my party. That is the nature of cross-community parties. It is not about being other or neither of those things. It is about being those things and more. It is about saying that I may be a unionist or a nationalist, or I may not choose to define myself in that way.

Our politics is about more than those two stances in one part of our politics. It is about reflecting a much broader politics. I would like to get rid of designation, but, if we are to maintain it, we should recognise that a cross-community party can represent the interests of nationalists and unionists and the votes of a cross-community party should be split between the unionist and nationalist totals.

We can do better than that and can take a bigger step. We can and should remove community designation. It is clear that, with the petition of concern, that opportunity will be wasted today. Should we come back at Further Consideration Stage with an alternative schedule, in reflecting on the options, we can perhaps come back with the greater step of a weighted majority vote and get agreement on what that should look like.

Mr McCallister: All the work on the Bill, the group of amendments and, indeed, the proposals that are contained in the schedule has been about how we drive a consensus into our Executive arm of government. How do we get them to function and look and feel like a Government that have purpose and direction, with a vision and an appetite for where they are going, as well as the ability to deliver?

The difference we have at so many turns is that when our Executive fail, our Assembly fails. When our Executive hit the buffers, they look dysfunctional because they are dysfunctional, so much so that when the then First Minister used the word “dysfunctional” no one batted an eyelid. If the Prime Minister said that about his Government, or the Taoiseach said that about his Government, it would be a fairly big news story. Yet, we accept it in Northern Ireland, because it is terribly difficult to get everybody to agree on things. As I have said in the House before, when you look at policy initiatives you see that they read like a set of football results; with one in favour, four opposed, three in favour, two opposed, and this means that you cannot deliver on any policy.

I want to tackle a phrase that has been used about the Bill throughout the debate. It is the idea that the Bill is being used as a secret vehicle to get back to majoritarianism. I have not heard anyone, apart from Sinn Féin Members, speak seriously about majoritarianism, because no one is advocating for majority rule. Every single party has talked about how you can build a consensus and have a Government that work, are functional, and are held to account by a robust opposition. That goes right to the very heart of it.

Sometimes you think of Bertrand Russell's phrase about how, if you create fear, that drives us into a herd mentality. I want to quote from Professor Coakley, who gave so much useful evidence at the Committee. He compared some of the systems that are in place. The nearest one that we seem to be comparable to is that of the Belgians. In the Belgian system, you only need to have the same number of people from the two main communities in place. But there is no way of predicting what a future Belgian Government might look like. Here, we can roughly predict the numbers in what the Government will look like after 5 May. I also point to Professor Coakley's line stating that:

That is where we have to get to. There is an idea that, somehow, unionism could dominate in some way. Professor Coakley's own phrase indicated that unionism is much more fragmented, yet every unionist in here who has spoken is much more at ease with changing things. Even though there are five unionist parties and a couple of independents here, unionism, in our broad tribal definition, is much more fragmented than nationalism. That said, unionism seems quite relaxed as to how it might deal with that, and indeed the need to move away from those sorts of labels and designations. Weighted majority voting gets you to the point of being cross-community and addresses our historical divisions. Professor Coakley also makes the following point:

“to be fair to those who drafted the Bill, they introduced a figure of 16·6%, but that need not be the figure.”

He was talking about the d'Hondt threshold. That need not be the figure, as he goes on to say; it could change. You can move it in the same way that, at Further Consideration Stage, we are hoping to move the level at which you would qualify for opposition rights. So, all these things build in an answer to any question of moving to majoritarianism. There are so many inbuilt mechanisms here. One of the biggest is our system of election: proportional representation.

To move to anything like that, we would need a seismic shift in voting patterns. Broadly across the Assembly, some of the faces might change after 5 May, but I suspect that the seat numbers will not be much different. You cannot change things; the PR system of election and d'Hondt are built-in protections. Whether some parties know it or not, you have started to change some of the arrangements around d'Hondt in that you have reduced the number of Departments. You will run d'Hondt on eight Departments and elect a Justice Minister. That changes the level at which you qualify for d'Hondt. When the number of Members is reduced — to 90, 80 or 75 — that will make a big difference. All those things — the Departments Bill, the Assembly Members (Reduction of Numbers) Bill — make a change.

At least this Bill has been through all the processes, and all the arguments have been put out in the press. I have engaged with all parties, and I am grateful to you all for that engagement. However, the Departments Bill and the Assembly Members (Reduction of Numbers) Bill are going through by accelerated passage and have not had the same robust scrutiny. I am in favour of scrutiny because I think, having listened to the discussions and comments from Members, parties and academics, that my Bill is a better one for having had that scrutiny. We have to find a way to move from the binary tribal argument of “Them and us”. This is one way that we can continue, not by being naïve but by recognising that we need to address the historical divisions that, at times, dominated our past but we are moving away from that.

Many of us talk about how we might draw a line and change things from 10 April 1998. I say to Mr Attwood that I was and am a supporter of the Belfast Agreement. I voted yes and have never changed my mind. However, I recognise, like his former leader, Mr Durkan, that some of the ugly scaffolding needs to be taken down, albeit very carefully. We need to change and move on. We are getting further away from those times.

Many Members mentioned the situation pre 1972. I was a six-week-old baby when this place collapsed in 1972. I have no memory whatever of what this place was like back then. Northern Ireland is a changed place. Our population has changed; we now use a PR system; and we have d'Hondt and all the safeguards that go with it. What this has all been about is trying to drive consensus into the Executive that they work out the policy direction. As Mr Kennedy said, you have talks and negotiations, you get a Programme for Government, and the Government set about how they might deliver that. That makes perfect sense to every democracy, and it should be no different here. There should not be the idea that Ministers can go about doing whatever they think is right at the time.

I want to read a quotation that deals with elements of collective government. The strongest view probably came from Dr O'Malley:

“The argument is that the doctrine gives an Executive a great deal of power to get things through that they might otherwise find it hard to get through if divisions were exposed. Collective Cabinet responsibility is therefore often seen as important for stable government”

— something that we do not have —

“and to enable policy decisions that might not be terribly popular but are seen as necessary. We can see, then, that these rules, which apply in most parliamentary democracies, tend to provide stability.”

He goes on to highlight the major differences in Northern Ireland:

“you have the d'Hondt system, which enables everybody to get into government once they have a certain number of votes. That is probably necessary, given Northern Ireland's history. It means that in the Cabinet government system there is no need for Ministers to agree or for unanimity, confidence or confidentiality. That would be fine except for the fact that in Northern Ireland power tends to be shared out rather than shared. Ministers become dictators in their fiefdom. That is one of the difficulties that one might see with the current arrangement, in which Ministers have a great deal of power within their own area, especially when, as is increasingly the case, most legislation is by way of statutory instruments rather than primary legislation. The current arrangement therefore gives a great deal of power to individuals who are not sharing power across communities. As far as I can see, that is one of the areas that might need to be addressed in any reform of the current system.”

That is why I have consistently said throughout this process that you need to move away from sharing out power to genuine power-sharing. To me, that is one of the absolute key principles of the Good Friday Agreement: sharing power not shared-out power. It was never envisaged in the Belfast Agreement that we would share out power — “There's so much for your lot and so much for your lot” — and not look at the policy implications of that. That is not where the Belfast Agreement wanted us to go and is not where a great many people thought we would go: to a place where an Executive and Ministers collaborate on policies. This is laid bare in Transforming Your Care, which contains policies that are difficult to get right. The Minister of Health is, effectively, left carrying the responsibility for that, with no support from ministerial colleagues when things get difficult. University vice chancellors are talking about funding, but can we get a decision on that? We talk about education delivering on reform and a skills agenda, but we have set aside £105 million in the Budget for welfare reform and £5 million for skills: is that really the policy that the Executive want to follow?

For nine years, we have been told that the economy is our number one priority. If we went into the centre of Belfast and asked businesses whether they felt that the economy was the number one priority of the Executive, I am not sure that we would get that answer. All those policy areas fall foul of the dysfunctionality of the Executive. When we talk about —

5.15 pm

Mr Allister: Will the Member give way?

Mr McCallister: Certainly.

Mr Allister: Does the Member not think that you arrive at that point of dysfunctionality because of a simple situation: if you do not have to be agreed about anything to be in government, parties are even less likely to agree when they are in government. Whereas, if a weighted majority was the requisite threshold for parties that could agree a Programme of Government and command the requisite majority of a weighted majority, they would be agreed before they got into government, so you would have stability. Is a weighted majority not, in fact, the passport to stability rather than the present system, which guarantees the dysfunctionality that evidences day and daily?

Mr McCallister: I am grateful to Mr Allister for that. Agreement is probably the passport to stability, which we are struggling to get. The only part of that on which I disagree with the Member is that I think that we have to stick to d'Hondt. He and I disagree on that. On collective Cabinet government, many in the House have a longing to be in an all-Ireland republic, but I will quote article 28 of the Irish constitution:

“The Government shall meet and act as a collective authority, and shall be collectively responsible for the Departments of State administered by the members of the Government.

The confidentiality of discussions at meetings of the Government shall be respected in all circumstances save only where the High Court determines that disclosure should be made in respect of a particular matter”.

I quoted Eoin Daly at Second Stage, and this goes to the very heart of the issue:

“Collective responsibility of Government is not simply a political convention but rather a legal principle enshrined in the Irish Constitution. While article 28 of the Constitution states the government must be collectively ‘responsible’ to Dáil Éireann, it also stipulates that it shall ‘meet and act as a collective authority’. This means that observance of the rule is not simply a matter of political convention, as in Great Britain – in theory, it is legally binding and justiciable at least in some instances ... it prevents government by faction, and ensures that executive power is located in a single accountable authority. For government to be effectively responsible, it must first be a collective – a single unit – rather than a cluster of undisciplined factions. Indeed, the principle first developed in Great Britain as a means of wresting executive power from King to cabinet.”

The key phrase in that is:

“a single unit – rather than a cluster of undisciplined factions.”

Mr Allister: Will the Member give way?

Mr McCallister: Yes.

Mr Allister: I suggest to the Member that he has a rather simplistic view of collective responsibility if he thinks that it fits like a glove with mandatory coalition. The very nature of d'Hondt mandatory coalition is, as I say, that you do not have to be agreed about anything. Therefore, collective responsibility is not the natural complement to places as of right in Government. However, if you make your entry point into Government the need to agree on what you are going to do in Government, and make the cross-community hedge the qualified majority, then you only get in Government, whoever they are, those who are agreed on the fundamentals about health and everything else. Then collective responsibility fits like a glove, as it does in voluntary coalition, but it never fits like a glove in mandatory coalition because that idea is totally incongruous with collective responsibility.

Mr McCallister: I am grateful to the Member for that. As we know, coalitions are difficult to negotiate for any group of parties. After the last election, it was a five-party mandatory coalition with fairly diverse views — and not just on the constitutional position.

What I seek to do is this. Look at the direction of travel as set out, not only by this Bill, but by other agreements such as the Fresh Start Agreement. That is the direction in which they are moving. Whether parties here realise it or not, that is the direction of travel that you move in when you reduce the number of Departments and when you move to a single Executive Office that is going to coordinate. That is where this is going in other pieces of legislation, so that is why it is important to have it debated and looked at in this Bill. That is the direction, whether or not Sinn Féin or the SDLP fully accepts it. That is the direction of travel with the reduction in the number of MLAs, the reduction in the number of Departments, and OFMDFM changing to the Executive Office, getting rid of its departmental responsibilities and moving to a coordinating role. All that is designed to move you much more in the one coordinated direction that the Government are meant to be going. Whether or not it entirely moves in that direction, I think very few Members or parties in the House disagree with the idea that we should have an agreed Programme for Government after the election and before d'Hondt is run. That seems now to have entered into the main thinking of every party. Not that many elections ago — certainly when I was elected here almost nine years ago — that was not talked about. It was just as he said: you qualified under d'Hondt, you took your seats in Government, and, effectively, we left it to the Civil Service to write the programme and decide what Ministers were going to do. That is why, I think, this has to change and why all these reforms, taken together, point in that direction.

I would like to look at the issue around replacing designation. Eighteen years after the Belfast Agreement, we really ought to be at a stage where we are ready to move away from that.

I remind Members — I jotted this down while Mr Agnew was speaking — that we did not, almost two years ago when legislating to reform local government, write designation into local government, even though much criticism had been made that our boundaries reflected splits between orange and green. Two council areas in south Down exemplify the difference. The largest in geographical terms is Newry, Mourne and Down, which has something in the order of 41 or 42 councillors, almost 30 nationalist and from the SDLP or Sinn Féin. The other council area, which I live in, is Armagh, Banbridge and Craigavon — I almost put my former council at the top of the list — with about 41 or 42 councillors. Probably close on 30 are unionist, from the DUP and UUP, with maybe some from UKIP and one from the TUV. However, we did not write it into the legislation that councillors, when elected, would have to designate. We had the confidence, and most of us, including me, made speeches arguing that the last thing that we needed to do in local government was to devolve our own dysfunctionality. That is why we did not do it. Not many argued for it; they wanted to leave that to councils and to stay away. I know that councils have their call-in mechanism, based on a weighted majority vote mechanism, that they can use in areas of concern and were very much moving to that.

I quoted briefly from the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission's response to the Bill. It said, at some length:

"The Commission advises the Committee that the cross-community vote mechanism may be open to legal challenge under ECHR Article 3 of Protocol 1 taken in conjunction with Article 14. The Commission further advises that, while it considers that the mechanism is compliant with the blackletter of the law in light of the 'broad latitude to establish constitutional rules on the status of members of Parliament' given to the State, it questions whether the mechanism meets the spirit of the Convention taking account that the provisions of the ECHR are 'living' to be interpreted in light of present day conditions. The Commission therefore advises the Committee that the Bill affords an opportunity to scrutinise the proportionality of the current cross community vote mechanism. Establishing a reasonable and objective justification requires continuous review. The Commission also advises the Committee that it should consider whether or not the proposed weighted majority voting mechanism is a more proportionate way of achieving the same aim which is ultimately directed at safeguarding community interests."

We are left in this strange place. I am broadly content to support Mr Attwood's amendment — amendment No 30 — on setting up an Ad Hoc Committee to look at the human rights implications of petitions of concern. We talk much in the House about human rights and the Equality Commission, yet, when our Human Rights Commission, set up in Northern Ireland to safeguard human rights, warns us that our designation system, mainly because it is not based on ethnicity — unionism or nationalism is not an ethnic identity — and does not fit easily with the European Convention, we choose to ignore it. We should be looking seriously at how to change that. Therefore, to those who want to hold on to designation, I say that weighted majority gives us all that protection.

5.30 pm

The whole schedule, as a mix, says two things. First, you should have a collective Cabinet Government. Why would the Government use petitions of concern against their own policies? Only in a place this dysfunctional would you have a petition of concern against the Government's own policy but, of course, that can, and may continue to, happen. On the issue of the petition of concern, some have said that Fresh Start gives us all the cover. All that Fresh Start tells us is, "As long as you do not table something that offends me, I will not petition-of-concern it." We are supposed to say, "Well, that is all very good", but I do not feel that it is going to get us where we need to go on these issues.

In both this and the threshold debate, to use Professor Coakley's line, 60% need not be the level. It is about establishing the principle that we move to cross-community vote. I will give Members some idea of the numbers. At 60%, with 108 Members, it is 65 Members. If you raise it to 65%, you go to 70 Members. If you hit 70 Members, on today's terms, you would need the equivalent of every designated unionist, the SDLP and three independents or the Alliance Party to vote to get you to that level. There is your guarantee of cross-community vote; or, if you do not like those labels, you could be counted in that as well. At no point and in no way could anyone ever accuse any of this Bill of majoritarianism. All the protections are built into it: that you negotiate; that you drive consensus into the Executive arm of government; and that you build on the principles of the Belfast Agreement about including people in genuine power-sharing and in a properly funded working opposition that is included in the political process.

The Human Rights Commission spoke against the cross-community vote. However, a weighted majority vote gives all of that protection. The changes that I proposed around the petition of concern, with 30 signatures from three different parties required, simply mean that you have to get more of a consensus. It urges the Government to think again about a policy direction, which is what it was always intended for. That is much more like the system that we devolve down to councils. It could be a recall system or something to get into a weighted majority vote. That is all that that is about. Dealing with all of that is the direction in which this is moving.

As I have said, the threshold could quite easily have been moved up to what Members are more content with. That may have needed to be 65%, 66% — some votes in the US Senate need a two thirds majority — or 70%. My warning about putting it too high was that, if the numbers here change at some point, a Government might not be able to get its business through. You want to be careful what you wish for. You could also let each new Assembly determine what that cross-community vote should look like. It certainly seems very strange that the eight Members of the Alliance Party and Mr Agnew and the Green Party, as Members from cross-community parties, do not count. They do not even count to run an event here. You still have to have a unionist or a nationalist signing up to that. Those are the changes.

Mr Speaker, on your role, I would not suggest that, at any time, there was anything wrong with how you did your job, but I would just want to make sure about it in future. I am grateful for your contribution to the Bill. I will quote from some of that contribution:

“only those who have had the privilege of being Speaker have experience of how difficult it is to balance the role of Speaker with that of a constituency representative during an active Assembly. The responsibilities of Speaker often restrict your time and take you away from the constituency. While Ministers may always be inclined to respond to requests for meetings, you do not have the same tools that are available to other Members to pursue an issue such as speaking on the floor of the House or tabling motions or questions. Neither do you have the ability of a Minister to pursue issues through your influence within the Executive. Similarly, you have to be careful about becoming involved in issues which you may end up presiding over on the floor of the Assembly and the nature of any constituency meetings you attend. The amount of media activity you can take to highlight an issue is limited particularly if it is critical of existing provision by a department or agency.”

I am grateful to Mr Ross for at least acknowledging some of the ideas and thinking around changes relating to the Speaker. There seems to be a great concern about what a retiring Speaker would do. Given the fact that he is Lord Alderdice, you do not have to guess where he went to; Eileen Bell retired from the Assembly; Lord Hay went to the House of Lords. I am not sure whether the Speaker will take up his peerage, if offered, but most people do. It is the pinnacle of somebody's career to get to be Speaker of the Assembly.

The idea of replacing the Speaker in their constituency means that it does not upset the balance of that constituency. The current Speaker is the only elected Sinn Féin nationalist in the South Antrim constituency. The previous Speaker, Mr Hay, was the only unionist in the Foyle constituency. We are not ready to do it exactly the same as the Dáil, where we would drop South Antrim in May to a five-seat constituency and automatically return a Speaker. That causes its own problems. There is certainly a difficulty for a Speaker in attracting media attention. If they sought re-election, they would have to be selected by their party and get elected without having had the same constituency visits as others.

Mr Ross: I thank the Member for giving way. That was the point that I was trying to make. Convention dictates that the Speaker is somebody with that kind of respect in the community and in their party; they are somebody with such experience that it means that that is not a problem. In the case of Speaker Hay, he was re-elected after a term as Speaker even though he did not have the profile on constituency issues, because he is held in high regard in his constituency and party. Is it not the case that we do not need to legislate for that because convention shows that the type of person we will have as Speaker will not need that support or help because they are held in high regard and will have no difficulty should they wish to stand for office again?

Mr McCallister: In Lord Hay's seat, that was probably easier to do. If Mr Ross, for example, was Speaker — I know that he may feel that he is 30 years too young for such a role, but, if he were to be asked, he might accept it — and stood in his constituency of East Antrim, where he is competing with candidates from not only other parties but, I suggest, his own party, he might find it slightly more problematic to be selected and elected having not visited all the things that his colleagues would be able to visit. That is why the Speaker should be treated differently.

A secret ballot is what happens in the House of Commons, and Dáil Éireann seems to be moving to it. Some members of Sinn Féin were critical of the Taoiseach for not doing it before the election, but it seems to be heading that way after the election. That seems to be a better way of ensuring that the role of Speaker is truly viewed as a gift of the Assembly and not of any parties or a deal between parties.

That is why we should be looking to move to that system. I accept some of the arguments against, but, over time, we need to be moving to that type of system. Plus, it changes the numbers. When the current Speaker was elected, it made it slightly harder for Sinn Féin to get a petition of concern. When the Alliance Party held the post of Speaker, its number of Members was reduced, which is particularly difficult for a smaller party to deal with.

The amendment that I tabled for the Deputy Speakers to be elected in the same way pretty much reflects the contribution from the Speaker on the Bill. It makes perfect sense to elect the Speaker in that way, and we should also aspire to have at least one female Deputy Speaker, if not a female Speaker. It is something that we should be looking at.

I have touched on the issue of collective responsibility.

On the threshold for the nomination of Ministers, I will take paragraphs 10 and 11 together. Again, 16·6%, or 18 Members, need not have been the figure. It could have moved down if Members thought that it was too high or moved up if they thought that it was not high enough. That idea and of d'Hondt running in one line from Ministers through to Chairs is about starting to drive the consensus into the Executive arm of government: with a smaller number of parties in government, it is easier to reach agreement on various policy issues.

Mr Ross said that he was opposed to running d'Hondt in that way because a party below the threshold would get an extra Chairperson. However, that party would be excluded from getting a Ministry. His party might get an extra Ministry that it did not have a d'Hondt entitlement to, so it would be right, on the opposition side, for the parties outside of government to get an additional chairmanship instead of a Minister's role. That is where the measure would work. It would be another incentive to go into opposition and take on the role.

On the issue of agreeing a Programme for Government, whether it is two weeks, three weeks or four weeks — under the Good Friday Agreement, you were allowed about six weeks to form the Government — it will take about two days to count the votes and a few days for people to recover before they get into meaningful Programme for Government negotiations. Those negotiations have to be meaningful, and two weeks would be a pretty tight timetable. Listening to Mr Lunn, he reckons that the answer lies somewhere between two and four weeks. I am relatively relaxed, however, if people think that they can do it in two weeks.

I am concerned by Mr Attwood's point about the Fresh Start provisions for the Programme for Government, which mean that you have to decide whether you are definitely going into government before you enter the negotiations. It would be a huge mistake to force that on people, and it would be very difficult to do.

On the changes to Statutory Committees, I accepted the ETI Committee's recommendation. That was a useful intervention. I note Mr Ross's comments on that and on the work that the Justice Committee has done to help on policy.

I move on to the reasons for having a simple majority vote for the Budget. Who are we kidding when, for the past few Budgets, two of the government parties voted against them? At the most recent debate on a motion about the Budget, two of the four government parties voted against. In the 2011 Budget process, four out of the five parties in the Government voted against it. I am not sure whether the SDLP has voted for the Budget since it held the Department of Finance and Personnel, yet it stays in the Government and gives that pretence.

5.45 pm

It seems to me that moving to a more collective government, a reduced number of Departments, an Executive Office and an agreed policy between those in government would be a natural progression towards starting to normalise things, taking away the pretence. Effectively, it allows smaller parties in government off the hook to know that the two big parties have the numbers to carry the Budget, so it is easy to vote against. This place might look very different if one of the smaller parties in government could collapse the Budget process, because that would have serious implications for where the Government were and what they would do. There is nothing much more fundamental than voting against your own Government's Budget. It is fine for the so-called naughty corner to do it. I do not get the great privileges of being a Minister and carrying that burden of responsibility but, if I did, I would want to vote for my own Government's Budget, whereas people here do not need to face that responsibility; they can vote against it. That, again, feeds into the dysfunctionality.

I will touch briefly on some of the comments that were made. I appreciated Mr Attwood's summary on hoping to bring back something of clause 13 at Further Consideration Stage and his willingness to work on that. I am certainly open to working with him to do anything that I can in that regard. I appreciated his comments around the speakership. I also appreciated the comments of Ms Bradley, who spoke on behalf of the Committee. Mr McCartney talked about the Fresh Start Agreement and the reform to the petition of concern. The reforms to the petition of concern in the Fresh Start Agreement and the working out of a protocol are very lightweight. We need to do something better, whether that is upping the number of signatures or putting more diversity into those signing it. Something has to change, because the petition of concern is probably the one thing, in respect of this Building, that I tend to hear most criticism of when I am out in my constituency. People say that it has to change and that it has to move on.

Mr Kennedy talked about aspirational change, and I agree with that. I think we need to be moving and setting an aspiration. We are 18 years on from the Belfast Agreement. It is not going to be too many years until we are an entire generation on from the first ceasefires. That is a considerable length of time. We need to start to change and not be devolving our dysfunctional make-up, continuing to cry out on the tribal headcount and seeing everything through the prism of unionism or nationalism. We do that on every issue. The welfare reform debate looked like unionist versus nationalist even though there were many other points of view about the implications of that. I have no doubt that an EU debate will end up looking a bit like unionism versus nationalism. We should have the confidence to do it. I accept that Mr Kennedy has long had reservations around the speakership changes. I suspect that, if he thinks that I am being a bit aspirational on the OFMDFM name change, he is being very aspirational if he thinks that we are going back to what is in the 1998 Act. I wish him well on that journey. I accept his view but I disagree with him on changing it. I agree with his use of "dysfunctional". Who gets to be First Minister has been one of the instruments used to beat up his party at elections. That is something he should be keen to change.

Mr Lunn was supportive of the changes in respect of the Speaker — that is good — and OFMDFM. He thought that 16.6% was too high. As Professor Coakley pointed out and all Members know, that could have been changed quite easily. He was less supportive of a simple majority with regard to the Budget.

Mr Ross pointed out that everybody had abused the petition of concern. I would point out that, in the nine years that I have been a Member, I have never signed one.

Mr Kennedy: You are a saint.

Mr McCallister: A saint. I hope that Mr Kennedy follows that up with something. I am not sure whether, if I tell you that Mr Allister has never signed one, he would say the same about him. He seems a little more hesitant, Mr Speaker. [Laughter.] The petition of concern has been used —

Mr Kennedy: To be fair, he would not be advocating sainthood for himself.

Mr McCallister: Just for clarity, Mr Speaker, I was not advocating sainthood for myself, but it is always nice to be mentioned in the same phrase. If I were awarded it, I am sure that I could share it with Mr Allister since Mr Attwood kept mixing the two of us up.

The petition of concern being used against welfare reform caused us huge problems. It almost brought the Assembly crashing down. Meanwhile, two of the three parties that signed it were in government, implementing with mitigation measures their own policy and torpedoing their own policy. That is the type of thing that looks dysfunctional. To be fair to Mr Agnew, he is not in government and does not carry that burden.

On the issues around OFMDFM, it was a valiant attempt, Mr Ross, to continue to maintain that there is a difference between the offices of First Minister and deputy First Minister. I am not sure that many out there see it. It raises the question of whether you would take the deputy First Minister's job if your seat number came behind another party. Indeed, if you did not, would you then try to negotiate to have them made the same? It just looks to me like unionism is getting itself in a bind about that, when it would be safer just to say that it is an equal and co-joined office and that one practically cannot order a cup of coffee without the other. We should call it what it is.

The Member talked about court challenges and collective Cabinet government. It probably goes to a point that Mr Allister also made, which was that the two do not always fit neatly hand in glove. I would say that it is the direction of travel that his party, Sinn Féin and other signatories to 'A Fresh Start' have put in place: you are moving more towards this system. Having court challenges between Departments makes us look — to use the D-word — dysfunctional. As I have mentioned before, running d'Hondt would get you an extra ministry and an opposition party would get an extra Chair. The two would balance out. That builds inclusion into the political process.

A legislative timetable is a very good idea, considering the amount of business that we have over the next few weeks. Again, Mr Ross welcomed the amendment.

Mr Agnew talked about the weakness of the Fresh Start Agreement around the petition of concern. Whatever comes out of this on the schedule and what we come back with at Further Consideration Stage, we have to find a mechanism that more accurately reflects the votes here. Not only is it unfair that the votes of Alliance and Green Party Members do not particularly count in a cross-community vote, it is unfair to the people who vote for those parties. That is why it is important. It is why a weighted majority vote made so much sense to me — because of that need to normalise and change. The irony has not been lost on me that a petition of concern has been used to block reform of the petition of concern.

I am happy to support the SDLP amendment No 30, although I suspect that it will not be made, and other amendments. I wish that they had not used the petition of concern on the schedule, but, hopefully, we can find some mechanism to move forward and get some of this. If not, it has been a useful and necessary debate to set out ideas and outline an aspiration of how we might change and how this place needs to change. I can tell you that, when we get through an election, Members are returned and we hit problems a year in, the old bugbears of collective responsibility and how we get a Government working as one when the wheels start to come off and difficult decisions on policies need to be made will come back. We have to get to a more normalised policy-based programme. It has to be bigger than "The Brits should send us more money". It has to be more than that, because, when I speak to people in South Down and across Northern Ireland, their one cry is that they want, need and deserve good governance. The driving force behind all the work that I have done on the Bill has been how we can address our historical division but deliver good governance and build in protections. I think that I have achieved that balance, but the overriding aim of this has to be to deliver good governance for the people of Northern Ireland.

Mr Attwood: As I said in my opening remarks — I probably did not honour it — I do not intend to detain the House long, save to make a small number of points.

Mr McCartney: Please do not promise.

Mr Attwood: I can reassure Mr McCartney that this will not take that long.

Earlier, Mr Lunn said that there was a sense of shadow boxing around the debate. I would rather use the terms that there has been probing and interrogation of what is in John McCallister's Bill to see where we may create positions of strength that can earn the confidence of the House and become law on the far side of the Final Stage. That is the process that I think we are in. It is not shadow boxing but more assessing, at this stage in the evolution of the Assembly, what we can achieve and what is beyond even the reach of Mr McCallister in the clauses he has drafted.

A number of things are pretty clear about the political response of various parties to the Bill. I am not saying this in any hostile way but by way of commentary. Sinn Féin puts all its eggs in the Fresh Start basket, in that the proposals therein are the shape of what it thinks should be achieved and no further than that. Whilst we have agreed with Sinn Féin on one or two matters, it has attempted to stop every clause of the Bill during Consideration Stage. The DUP appears to have a slightly hybrid position in that, whilst it put a lot of its eggs in the Fresh Start basket, it also recognises that it may be necessary to put some things in law. In that way, it is a hybrid between what is outlined in 'A Fresh Start' and the clauses of the Bill that it has endorsed during the day. We will see if that position is held at Further Consideration Stage and Final Stage.

The SDLP has taken the approach of trying to gather around the principle of opposition in law, creating processes around how that might be realised and, at the same time, taking the opportunity to address a small number of issues. Any amendments that we table at Further Consideration Stage will have as part of their narrative those three principles. Gathering around opposition in law will go further than 'A Fresh Start' and, in that way, will be very sympathetic to the body of the Bill that Mr Allister — Mr McCallister, I correct myself — has outlined.

Then, through an amended clause 13, we have processes for how to bring those matters to life. At the same time, in the schedule, we try to outline a small number of matters that might win the confidence of the House and not be blocked. All of that is subject to the call of the Speaker because these clauses were subject to a petition of concern at Consideration Stage. Therefore, we intend to try to shape them in a way that wins the confidence of the Speaker in their being brought to the House at Further Consideration Stage and, on the far side of that, the confidence of the House generally.

I want to make only three or four points on the substance of the debate. Whatever way the issues fall today or after today, it is curious that a lot of them were not dealt with in our rolling negotiations over the last number of years. Certainly, some were dealt with in the reform agenda for petitions of concern, the number of Departments and MLAs, and opposition. However, the other matters that Mr McCallister's Bill touches upon, in the schedule in particular, have not been part of the body of the negotiations. That may well be because they were viewed by some parties as being beyond the reach of those negotiations, but, given their absence, the matters that Mr McCallister has included in the schedule to his Bill have been very useful in informing the mind at a political level and outside the Chamber.

I will make only two or three points, simply to see whether, in probing them, there might be some opportunity to get a better position through Further Consideration Stage. The first point is on the Programme for Government. There is a view, as touched upon by Mr Kennedy, by Mr McCallister in the schedule and by the SDLP, that the model outlined in 'A Fresh Start' is not the most desirable. I will remind Members of what it says at paragraph 61:

"After the Assembly meets following an election and before the FM-DFM are selected and the d'Hondt process runs, representatives of the parties who are entitled to take up places in the Executive and who confirm their intention to do so will meet to resolve the draft Programme for Government."

Maybe for probing reasons or maybe for material reasons, we will table an amendment at Further Consideration Stage on how the First Minister and deputy First Minister are elected as opposed to selected. It is a blunt instrument to say to parties that may or may not wish to go into the Executive that, in advance of resolving a Programme for Government, they have to confirm their intention to do so. It may well be that the people who support that approach are saying that, on the far side of the election, and before the First Minister and deputy First Minister are selected and d'Hondt is run, there will be so much backroom work between the parties that people will have a very good idea of what the Programme for Government might look like, and it is at only the very last minute, before a draft Programme for Government is resolved, that parties have to confirm their intention to go into government. We do not know — it is open to interpretation.

One way of resolving that is an amendment in the schedule that lays down the pivot point — whether it is two, three or four weeks — of when people go into the Executive or not. The SDLP view is that only after the election and Programme for Government negotiations can a judgement be made by any party, including the SDLP, on whether or not the ambition of going into government, which should be the ambition of all parties and is certainly the ambition of the SDLP, can or cannot be realised. That matter could be usefully looked at at Further Consideration Stage.

Secondly, nearly everybody's view on petitions of concern is informed more by worst fears than best hopes. Given the experience of the last number of years, people rely on and cling to the current model of petitions of concern and look to moderate their operation only by way of protocol because of worst fears about what other parties or blocks in the Assembly might want to achieve. Even the good intentions of a protocol amount to little and cannot be relied on in the event that others in the Assembly want to rely on the existing model in order for their views to prevail.

Mr McCallister: Will the Member give way?

Mr Attwood: I will, but, before I do, the same can be said about the SDLP's model of creating a structure for an Ad Hoc Committee. With an Ad Hoc Committee, you can still have a situation of worst fears whereby the views of one group or tradition in the Ad Hoc Committee could prevail, contrary even to the advice of specialists brought in to advise on equality and human rights. Nonetheless, a structural approach seems to us to be an advance on relying on a protocol and best intentions, which, as we know, might amount to very little.

Mr McCallister: I will make two points briefly. First, changing the voting mechanism from a cross-community vote to a weighted majority vote is quite a concession from the DUP, in that it would give up its automatic right or ability to block things. It might be able to lodge a petition of concern, but it would not be able to block something as it does not have 40% of the seats. That is quite a change. Secondly, on the idea of having a Committee system, one of the difficulties that I see is that it will be a micro version of the Assembly.

Mr Attwood: Yes, the potential is that the sins of a large number of people in the Chamber are visited on a small group of people, except that the structure would be established in law. At least on the face of it, that would have to measure itself against equality and human rights standards. That would be tested by bringing in experts who would be able to advise on equality and human rights standards. The process could be materially different from the one on the Floor at the moment, when no expert is brought in to advise. No one states what the equality and human rights issues might be, and simple numbers can prevail. Whilst there are risks with either, it seems to us that there are potential benefits in one over the other. I urge Members to think a bit further in the event that amendments are proposed at Further Consideration Stage and accepted by the Member.

Thirdly and finally, as I was saying, some of these issues have not had a full hearing for a long time. Let us be honest about that. Weighted majority and whether the DUP is given a concession or whether —

Mr McCartney: Will the Member give way?

Mr Attwood: I will in a second. The Bill has been interrogated in the Chamber as opposed to elsewhere. Mr McCallister makes a fair point that, when local government was reorganised, options for models of power-sharing or cross-community voting or thresholds to mitigate abuse were left. They had to choose from a menu of options, but they had to choose. In that way, you could argue that there is tension between where we are here and where we are elsewhere.

It all comes down to a matter of judgement. I will let Mr McCartney come in shortly. We are going through what is, by Mr McCallister's own admission, a significant re-engineering of government, because reducing the numbers of Departments and MLAs has consequences for entitlements and for the shape and look of government. Given that we are already undertaking significant government reform that can work itself through with significant changes in the character of what government looks like and who is or is not there — that is separate from the issue of opposition — a judgement has to be made about where we are with the evolution of our architecture and what is the right way to recalibrate it at this stage.

I will give way to Mr McCartney.

Mr McCartney: You have moved on from the point, but in relation to how the issue of weighted majorities and some of the other issues were addressed, that was carried out at Committee Stage. Perhaps that is the more appropriate place to debate it, rather than here on the Floor.

Mr Attwood: The point I was making is that, on the party political government side, a select range of issues were being interrogated in those negotiations, and Mr McCartney will be fully aware of that. Yes, other issues were being interrogated in a separate stream, if you like, in here, and I think that that has been very healthy, but it is curious that it has not been washed over to the wider political negotiations. That is the only political observation that I was trying to make.

Given that we are already past our teatime, Mr Speaker — never mind that it is very long until our bedtime tonight — I will leave it there. We are intending to bring forward amendments to reconfigure clause 13 and the schedule. I have shared some of the thinking on that with the Chamber in response to the debate.

Question, That amendment No 30 be made, put and negatived.

Mr Speaker: Amendment No 31 has already been debated and is mutually exclusive with amendment No 32.

Ministerial Statement

Court Estate: Rationalisation

Mr Speaker: The Minister of Justice wishes to make a statement.

Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice): I wish to make a statement on my decisions following the consultation by the Northern Ireland Courts and Tribunals Service (NICTS) on proposals to rationalise the court estate. Looking to the future, Northern Ireland requires a court estate that is capable of providing appropriate access to justice for its people and that has the capacity and flexibility to manage the changing landscape of court business, including the changes in business volumes. A rationalised court estate must be one that can be maintained and that, where possible, improves the facilities and services for court users by focusing available funding on a reduced number of venues. It must also be affordable in the long term. It is with those objectives in mind that the consultation was launched and that I made the decisions that I am announcing today.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Dallat] in the Chair)

The consultation process, which was extensive, began 12 months ago and involved seven public events and a series of meetings with council delegations and other elected representatives. Ninety-seven written responses were received by NICTS, many of them expressing concern at the possibility of closing a local courthouse. I thank all those who took the time to provide their views on the proposals. I am also grateful for the constructive input from the Justice Committee as we sought to develop and refine the proposals.

At the outset, I acknowledge the proposals' sensitive nature and the concerns about the potential impact that closures will have on court users. I also wish to stress that rationalisation of the court estate is part of a wider process of modernisation, which involves NICTS assessing not only where it delivers court and tribunal services but how those services are delivered. The objective is to make greater use of technology; to provide courtrooms and other facilities for victims, witnesses and other court users that are fit for purpose and can operate in a way that meets people's needs; and to ensure that working practices efficiently deliver access to justice for all our citizens.

I have taken extensive time to consider my decisions. In doing so, I have sought to balance the concerns expressed by local stakeholders against the facts, including the unprecedented financial pressures facing my Department, the clear evidence that many of our courts are underutilised because we have too many of them and business volumes are falling, and the pressures in the Courts and Tribunals Service as a result of falling staffing levels in the context of wider public-sector reform.

In common with other public-sector organisations, the Department of Justice has seen very significant budget reductions in recent years. Those reductions have had, and will continue to have, a significant adverse impact on the entire justice system, including the Courts and Tribunals Service. I previously indicated that, in allocating resource budgets, my priorities are to protect, as far as possible, front-line policing; to ensure that the PSNI has adequate security funding; and to protect, as far as possible, other front-line areas across the Department, with the aim of protecting outcomes for the public. Consistent with those priorities, my Department has delivered a proportionately higher level of financial savings than the front-line justice agencies for which it has responsibility. Notwithstanding the steps I have taken to protect the front line, the amount of money that is available to the Courts and Tribunals Service has significantly reduced.

Since 1 April 2014, the NICTS funding allocation has reduced by £4.5 million, or 10.8%. In addition, its income from court fees has reduced by £2.9 million due to falling business volumes. As a result of the Department of Justice's Budget allocation, the NICTS budget will be reduced again significantly in the incoming financial year. NICTS has made significant efforts to deliver savings to minimise the impact on service delivery. Over the past two years, NICTS has reduced the number of staff posts by 77, or 10.5%, relocated the Coroners Service, the Enforcement of Judgements Office, the Tribunal Hearing Centre and the Parole Commissioners from leased premises to other existing accommodation; reduced the size of its senior management team; streamlined its corporate services function; and reduced the costs associated with contracted services. However, those measures alone will not be sufficient to allow the service to operate within budget in future years.

Given that operating and maintaining the court estate alone accounts for £9 million a year, it is no longer feasible to continue to manage the estate in its current form. In the context of the financial pressures facing the public sector and in line with the Executive's commitment to public-sector restructuring and reform, NICTS launched a three-year modernisation programme, the objective of which is to:

"deliver an Agency which is structured and resourced to provide efficient and effective service delivery to users; and to have a workforce that is equipped to work in a new and increasingly challenging environment."

One element of that programme is focused on the rationalisation of the court estate. The objective is to ensure that NICTS serves the community in buildings that are capable of hearing the full range of court business while allowing the agency to focus diminishing resources on a smaller number of venues. The decision to consult on the rationalisation of the court estate was not taken lightly, and the process has not been rushed. I have thought long and hard about what is needed in the context of business need, service delivery and affordability. Even if NICTS were not facing the financial constraints that I have described, it has to be acknowledged that we simply no longer need the number of courthouses currently in operation in Northern Ireland.

In his recent report on the adequacy of the court estate, the Chief Inspector of Criminal Justice has highlighted the inefficiencies in the Courts and Tribunal Service, noting that court business volumes are falling and that many court buildings are underutilised. Utilisation rates are measured on the basis of actual sittings against maximum sittings available in a venue. In 2014-15, the utilisation rates in the courts under consideration for closure were as follows: Armagh, 29.6%; Ballymena, 38.8%; Enniskillen, 42.8%; Limavady, 23.3%; Lisburn, 59.8%; Magherafelt, 20.7%; Newtownards, 62.6%; and Strabane, 29.7%. The Chief Inspector of Criminal Justice summarised the position when he commented that:

"The cost of maintaining a significantly underused court estate has hastened the closure of some courthouses and more must follow, particularly those where the facilities do not reach the current standards."

The reality is that Northern Ireland does not need the number of courthouses that we currently have and we can no longer afford to retain and operate them. I have carefully considered the views that were expressed during the consultation, both in the formal responses received and at the public meetings. In reaching my decisions, I have sought to take account of the concerns that were raised. While it is simply not feasible to maintain the status quo in regard to court accommodation, I have sought to limit the overall impact and to consolidate our estate into the larger or more modern buildings. Consequently, I have concluded that, in addition to the closure of Limavady courthouse, which was announced in 2012, the following court venues should be closed: Armagh, Ballymena, Lisburn, Magherafelt and Strabane. Having listened to the strong arguments advanced in relation to Enniskillen, I have decided that it should be retained and that it should become a hearing centre. This means that Enniskillen courthouse will remain open on the days when a court is sitting, generally two or three days each week. On the days when there is no court sitting, the office will be closed.

The consultation paper outlined a proposal that would have involved the closure of Lisburn and Newtownards courthouses and the creation of a family justice centre in the Old Town Hall building. While creating a family justice centre remains an aspiration, the capital funding that would be required to make this happen is simply not available at this time. Consequently, the building will remain closed on a temporary basis, and its future use will be considered in the context of the wider DOJ estate strategy. Notwithstanding this decision, the closure of Lisburn courthouse and the transfer of that business to Laganside Courts is achievable. However, as this is a minor variation on the original proposal in the consultation paper, consultees were given a further opportunity to submit any further views they had. Having considered the further representations received, I remain satisfied that Lisburn courthouse should close. It is not, however, practicable to accommodate the court business currently dealt with in Newtownards at Laganside, and I have therefore decided that the Newtownards court should be retained at this time. Its longer-term future will be determined as and when decisions are taken in relation to the future use of the Old Town Hall building.

The closure of these six courthouses, along with the continued temporary closure of the Old Town Hall building and the proposed changes at Enniskillen, will result in a much-needed recurrent saving of over £1.1 million per annum. When taken with other accommodation reductions planned or recently implemented by NICTS, the rationalisation programme will deliver recurrent savings of over £2 million per annum. While I have no doubt that some Members, some court users and some members of the public will have concerns about specific closures,

I am satisfied that, in the current financial climate and in the context of falling business volumes and the significant underutilisation of the current court estate, it is appropriate to proceed with the six closures. I have therefore asked NICTS to develop an implementation plan to allow the commencement of a programme of closures in the summer of this year. I believe that the closures I have announced today, along with the other strands in the wider modernisation programme being taken forward by NICTS, will enable us to achieve the objective that I outlined earlier.

Mr Ross (The Chairperson of the Committee for Justice): One could be forgiven for being a little bemused by some of the Minister's statement. He speaks of improving the facilities and services for court users but acknowledges that there is no money available to improve or upgrade the remaining court buildings. He speaks of the extensive consultation process but ignores the fact that he ignored the consultation responses. He speaks about modernisation and utilising technology, but there has been no indication from him that he is willing to move ahead with innovative solutions, such as online dispute resolution, even when identified by the Committee.

In the modern age, no one argues that every market town should have a courthouse, but will the Minister, first of all, share my concern that Mid and East Antrim will be the only council area that does not border Belfast to be left without a courthouse? Secondly, can he confirm the annual recurring cost of maintaining the courthouses earmarked for closure and whether that cost is included in the very modest projected savings of £1.1 million per annum? Finally, can the Minister outline what he intends to use the buildings for, once they cease to be fully functioning courthouses, and whether he is open to turning many of them into community justice centres that could house voluntary and citizen advisory organisations?

Mr Ford: As usual, the Committee Chair has managed to get in a significant number of questions. I hope that I have most of them noted down. He refers to the issues of modernisation and online alternative dispute resolution. There is no issue in the Department of Justice against the suggestions that the Committee has made in that respect, but the reality is that we are not there and are not ready to do that yet. The work that is being taken forward in other aspects of the Department's work is showing that as an opportunity that will, of course, reduce further the requirements for courtrooms.

The Member refers specifically to Mid and East Antrim as the only council area not bordering Belfast without a court: yes, but the issue is not the provision of courtrooms in every council area, as it was not under the previous pattern of local government. The issue is providing an appropriate pattern of courthouses, as far as possible, that have modern facilities, are fit for purpose and are capable of meeting the needs of victims and vulnerable witnesses and those of people with disabilities and having them within reasonable travelling distance of all those who would use them. That does not mean that they tie into a council pattern.

The savings outlined take account of the fact that, for the immediate future at least, the Courts and Tribunals Service will continue to maintain the redundant buildings, provide security for them and so on, but, obviously, the aspiration is that they will be utilised for other purposes as far as possible. The normal procedures will apply. They will be offered to other statutory bodies. After that, there will be the issue of placing them on the open market if no others take them up, or, depending on the outcome of work that is being done elsewhere in Departments, we will look at community asset transfer. However, the buildings will be maintained and kept safe by the Courts and Tribunals Service until those issues are resolved.

Mr McCartney: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. In relation to the closures, I think it is very obvious that the Minister is doing this for cost savings only. I use the case of Strabane as an example. The moving of Strabane cases to Omagh will present a massive case management problem for the PSNI. They cannot take the cases to Derry because of capacity issues. Also, I visited Omagh courthouse, and it is very obvious that Omagh is not ready to take the caseload from Strabane because of disability access. I ask the Minister to reflect on that decision.

Mr Ford: I appreciate Mr McCartney's point, in the sense that Omagh is probably the least modern of the courts being retained. However, this is not an issue of costs only, as he suggests. It is a cost issue, but it is also an issue of falling business volumes. The point has to be to make appropriate use of public facilities. It is not possible to maintain the pattern of services that we have had in courts up to now.

The Member raises the issue of additional costs for the PSNI, but, frankly, I am not sure that I see any significant difference between travelling 15 miles from Strabane to Derry or 20 miles from Strabane to Omagh. The PSNI and, indeed, other services have not identified problems with the rationalisation proposed.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): I remind Members that, because this is a statement, they do not have to rise in their place; you simply give your name to the Clerk. I also remind Members that questions should be concise.

Mr McGlone: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle, agus gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as a ráiteas. Thank you very much, Mr Deputy Speaker, and I thank the Minister for his statement. How many representations did the Minister receive in relation to Magherafelt courthouse, including meetings between his Department and the local community and those acting on behalf of the local community and with local solicitors? If he does not have access to that detail today, could he please provide it to me in writing?

Mr Ford: Mr McGlone correctly predicts that I do not have access to those figures today, and I will provide them in writing.

Mr Kennedy: The Minister has delivered a grim statement to the House. I welcome, at least, the reprieve given to Enniskillen and Newtownards courthouses, but I express deep concern about and opposition to the proposed closure of Armagh courthouse, in particular, and the others. I implore the Minister to reconsider his decision on Armagh, given the impact that will have on the local economy. In the event that he is not willing to do that, will he, at least, give an assurance to me and to the House that, if the building is to be sold, every effort will be made to sell it to another Department or government body, including local government, so that appropriate alternative use can be made of what is a landmark building in the centre of Armagh city?

Mr Ford: I appreciate Mr Kennedy's point about what he describes as a "landmark building", but the function of the Department of Justice is to provide access to justice, not to maintain landmark buildings. I have already said and will repeat that the Courts and Tribunals Service will maintain all the relevant buildings until they are disposed of to others.

I will repeat the basic facts about Armagh. The utilisation rate is 29.7%. That means three half-days per week, on the basis that, if even one case is heard, that counts as a half day. That is simply not sustainable. Of the business that was disposed of in 2014, criminal cases were down 3% on the previous year and civil cases down 51% on the previous year. That is the pattern across courthouses throughout Northern Ireland, and that is why it is simply not sustainable, in the face of all our financial difficulties, to maintain that estate.

Mr Dickson: I thank the Minister for his statement. The reality is, as the Minister has just stated, there is a reduction in the number of cases, which is clearly welcome, because it means that there is a reduction in crime. Indeed, as the Chair of the Committee said, there are alternatives to dispute resolution other than civil cases. Also, the Minister is correct in stating that the court estate is about providing efficient and modern facilities and not about maintaining buildings of significant architectural heritage. Can the Minister assure the House that, in making the reductions, he has stretched his budget as far as he can; that the only alternative would be for the Executive to provide more resources; and that, even if they did so, the sensible action would be to continue to close those courthouses?

Mr Ford: I thank my colleague for his comments. Certainly, it is welcome that crime figures are on a downward trend, although there is, of course, always the occasional upward blip. When he refers to modern buildings, he will know that, in my career as a social worker I spent time in the single room in Carrickfergus town hall that is still called the "Court Room", although it has not been used as the court room for a long time.

I then spent time in the Newtownabbey petty sessions office, as it was. All those cases are now taken at Laganside, where they get the benefit of much more modern facilities that have the ability to segregate witnesses and avoid the problem of witnesses, defendants and victims all being together, which frequently occurs in the older courtrooms.

The reality is that the budget is stretched and has to be dealt with in a way that meets the key needs of society, which relate to public protection. I am afraid that it is not about maintaining a courtroom in every former market town. That, compared with allowing people to use modern facilities even if they have to travel a bit further, is not what meets the interests of justice,

Mr Poots: Burglaries were up by around 30% in the last few months. Perhaps, if the other end of Mr Ford's Department ensured that more people were brought to court, better use would be made of the court facilities. The one that stands out is Lisburn courthouse. We have looked at other courthouses with 20% or 30% usage. Lisburn courthouse has just short of 60% usage, yet it is being closed, and Enniskillen, which has 42% usage, is being kept open. There is clearly something wrong, and Mr Ford has ignored the facts —

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): We really need a question shortly.

Mr Poots: Thank you for drawing me to that, Mr Deputy Speaker. Does the Minister accept that his case lacks robustness? Does he also accept that he will cause immense pain, hurt, anxiety and anguish to those who now use the family court in Lisburn but will be sent to the mayhem of Laganside, which is already bursting at the seams in the mornings?

Mr Ford: When somebody uses words such as "mayhem", it is hard to take their point seriously. If Members are not aware of the specific geographical issues that affect somewhere such as Enniskillen and the distances that have to be travelled there compared with the distance from Lisburn to central Belfast, I do not think that they are taking account of the realities of that aspect of access to justice. A key part of the consideration was looking at appropriate and reasonable travel times to courts, acknowledging that some people would travel further. That was inevitable with any rationalisation, but there is a significant difference between travelling by the quality of public transport that is available in and around greater Belfast and travelling in rural Fermanagh and Tyrone.

Mr Milne: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I cannot welcome the Minister's statement. It seems that south Derry is being deprived of yet another public service. Does the Minister accept that his efforts to cut costs will have a detrimental impact on the people of south Derry and that the number of service users appears low because cases that could have been heard in Magherafelt have been diverted to other areas for some time?

Mr Ford: I accept, of course, that this change will have an impact on some who use the courts. However, I cannot accept that it is seriously detrimental for people to travel a bit further to get the benefit of the much more modern facilities in somewhere such as Dungannon. If Mr Milne is acknowledging that, in his view, the number of cases in Magherafelt is already down because they are being heard elsewhere, that suggests that closing the courthouse will not make a huge difference.

Mr Douglas: I thank the Minister for his statement, which referred to the aspiration of creating a family justice centre in the Old Townhall Building in Belfast. Will the Minister outline whether that building is structurally sound? It was built in 1871, restored in 1983 and severely bombed in 1985. Does he have any idea of the estimated cost of its restoration?

Mr Ford: Mr Douglas raises a significant point. It was very much my aspiration to be able to develop a specific family justice centre based at the Old Townhall that could have served the needs of a fairly wide area. Unfortunately, the reality is that the money is not currently available. I do not have the figure in front of me, but my understanding is that we are talking about close to £3 million to renovate the building. The latest condition survey of the Old Townhall, which was carried out five years ago, showed that it was structurally sound. However, it would need a significant refit at a cost of £3 million. If Mr Douglas or anybody else won the lottery this week, I would be happy to take that money from them and use it in a worthwhile way by setting up a specific family justice centre. At this stage, as much as I would have wished to, it is not possible to proceed with that.

Mr McCrossan: This is, to say the least, a most unwelcome statement. It is very depressing for the people of my town of Strabane, who have now lost another public service. In Belfast, we have seen how the closure of smaller courts can often have an unintended negative impact on others, such as the closure of the Old Townhall and the effect on Laganside. Will Strabane lose another public service, given that it had its busiest year last year, with the negative consequence of that being heaped on the courthouse in Omagh?

Mr Ford: I am not sure whether it is precisely accurate to say that Strabane had its busiest year last year. Business disposed of was down 1% last year on the previous year on the criminal side, given that civil and family business goes to Omagh anyway. This is part of the unfortunate reality that Members have to acknowledge: it is simply not possible to maintain the range of courthouses that we have. A significant part of the Strabane district is not significantly further away from Omagh than it is from Strabane, although that is clearly not the case for those in and around Strabane town. The access issue is about ensuring proper courtrooms where cases can be heard, and we get the best possible facilities. I acknowledge that Omagh is not in an ideal position compared with others, but nor is Strabane, whose utilisation rate last year was 29.8%, and fewer than three out of 10 half-days were used.

Mr Hussey: Like Mr McCartney and Mr McCrossan, I am also disappointed to hear that Strabane courthouse is to close. The Minister referred to the 30% usage. I am sure that he has taken into account the fact that Strabane is one of the most deprived areas in Northern Ireland and the objections that were put forward by the legal fraternity. He always refers to the Courts and Tribunals Service. Clearly, you have never attempted to settle a tribunal in Omagh courthouse, where there is very little room for tribunals. In fact, there is very little room for the people who represent people at tribunals. With the change in welfare legislation, there will be an awful lot more tribunals, so what steps will you take to ensure that Omagh is capable of dealing with all the cases that will be brought to it in addition to those from Strabane and that people in Strabane will have fair representation in tribunals?

Mr Ford: Representation is an issue for those who provide representation, whether they be legally qualified, people from advice centres or whatever. Mr Hussey highlighted a specific issue about the suggested crowding of Omagh, and that has been raised in a number of cases. Listing arrangements are an issue for the judiciary. I have discussed it with the Lord Chief Justice, and officials from his department and mine are looking at how to manage the listing better. There is no doubt that some of our courthouses are busy at 10.30 am, but very few are busy even an hour and a half later. There are fundamental listing issues that are more for the judiciary as to how we maximise the use of what are expensive buildings to run.

Mr Frew: This is another sad day for Ballymena and yet another kick in teeth for the town and the area. How much will it cost to maintain Ballymena courthouse in its closed state? What savings are to be made by closing it? Is it not a short-sighted decision by the Minister that short-changes the Assembly and will have a devastating effect on the only council area — Mid and East Antrim Borough Council — that will not have a courthouse that borders Belfast?

Mr Ford: I have already answered Mr Frew's point about councils. Courthouses provide services to the public; they are not there to tick boxes against old or new councils. He asked how much will be spent on the maintenance of Ballymena courthouse. I do not have that figure in front of me, but I will write to him. I repeat that the savings, even allowing for the ongoing costs of ensuring that the building is maintained and security is provided, will be £221,900 a year. That is the level of saving needed.

Mr I McCrea: I too am unable to welcome the statement. Given the rural aspect of my constituency and the difficulties that there are with transport there, can the Minister ensure that this decision will not have a detrimental impact on the administration of justice, especially for the most vulnerable, in Mid Ulster? Does he disagree with the Lord Chief Justice, who warned about the potential impact on the administration of justice if the closures go forward?

Mr Ford: I have discussed how we manage to provide access to justice with the Lord Chief Justice, and that is an issue that is clearly making a change.

Mr McCrea talked of the needs of a rural area like Mid Ulster, and I can assure him that the issues of time taken to travel to courts and public transport, even though only 6% of those who use courts use public transport, were taken into consideration to ensure that the great majority of people will not have a significantly long journey, given that most will travel by private vehicles anyway and that those who use public transport will have a reasonable length of time for bus journeys. This is an issue that is clearly exercising a number of people, but it is very surprising that very few people have mentioned anything other than the concerns about their constituencies. Nobody has given me any suggestions as to any alternative ways of saving money.

Mr G Robinson: Will the Minister consider meeting some of the Limavady legal profession to explain the rationale behind the ludicrous decision to close Limavady courthouse after a full consultation exercise involving elected representatives, mainly from the DUP, local councils, the legal profession and others? It is a much-needed local facility that will still require financial commitment to maintain it after closure. That closure will cause great inconvenience to the vast majority of court users, the legal profession and the PSNI, particularly considering that Londonderry and Coleraine courts are overflowing.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Can I have a question, please?

Mr G Robinson: Done.

Mr Ford: This "ludicrous decision", as Mr Robinson called it, was taken on the basis of a utilisation rate in Limavady of 23.4%. Criminal business received was down 26% and disposed of was down 23% in the last year, with civil and family business already dealt with in Londonderry courthouse. Will I meet delegations? No, I will not meet delegations, because that facility was offered during the consultation period and was taken up by a number of local authorities and other groups. That was the appropriate time to have that discussion, not after a decision has been announced.

Mrs McKeivitt: Minister, your announcement this evening is a huge blow to the status of Armagh city. Mr Kennedy was correct to describe the court as an iconic building in the city. Members of the legal profession tell me that it is one of the best-equipped and most functional premises in the entire court estate. That is from those who practise in it. I call on the Minister to review this bad decision, because citizens will be denied access to justice. We have united political opposition to the closure of Armagh courthouse, and there is a strong case for keeping it open.

Mr Ford: I congratulate Mrs McKeivitt for being the first Member who has not just done special pleading for the constituency she currently represents. To say that this decision is denying access to justice to the people of Armagh is just rubbish. Access to justice is not a building in the town; it is the justice system functioning, and the ability to use modern courts with appropriate facilities, as I have outlined. It is not about maintaining historic buildings, however important they might seem. If there are those who have concerns about an historic building in Armagh, they will have options to raise them. It is simply not feasible for the Department of Justice, which is funded to provide access to justice, to maintain buildings for the sake of maintaining buildings.

Mr Swann: The Minister referred to engaging with local councils. He engaged with Mid and East Antrim Borough Council with regard to Ballymena. Did he listen to it? He talked today about closing Ballymena courthouse. How many jobs has he just removed from Ballymena?

Mr Ford: The answer to the question on the number of jobs is that the number of jobs will be maintained when business moves from Ballymena to Antrim. I accept that there is an issue with Ballymena, which has concerned a number of people in recent days, but to compare it with the 2,000-odd jobs that we are talking about in two major factories is somewhat unrealistic.

The key question from Mr Swann was on whether I had listened to representatives of Mid and East Antrim Borough Council. Yes, I listened. My officials sought to engage with them, but no realistic proposal was put forward that would have meant that it was possible to retain Ballymena courthouse. It is rather unfortunate that members of the council have chosen to attack the decision, without having put forward any proposal that would have made it possible to keep the courthouse open.

Mr Givan: The Minister has indicated that he has deliberated on this issue for a long time. First, given that the consultation on Lisburn courthouse closed last week, can he explain why he has been able to rush to the House to announce its closure? Secondly, whilst he has indicated that he listened, he clearly has ignored the consultation responses from the legal profession in my constituency. The price is being paid by the most vulnerable victims, witnesses and families because of the failure by this Minister to effectively and efficiently run his Department.

Mr Ford: If the former Chair of my Committee could tell me, from his time when he had the opportunity to scrutinise the budget closely, where there was an inefficiency in the way in which the DOJ budget was run, I would be interested to hear about it, because I do not remember any significant suggestions coming forward, other than the times when the Committee delayed the proposals to reform legal aid when he was Chair.

The issue with Lisburn was specific. An extension to the consultation was allowed because of the variation in the original plan from using the old town hall as a family justice centre, including Lisburn. The reality is that the responses were not significantly different from the responses that had come back previously. Therefore it did not require many days after the closure of that consultation last week to confirm the position. Had specific new proposals been raised, and had there been specific issues relating to family justice that had shown a different way of addressing it, I would have taken longer, but the responses merely repeated what had been said, by and large, in the first round of consultation.

Mr Allister: May I express my dismay that the Minister has decided to kick Ballymena when it is down? We have lost hundreds of jobs, and now the Minister robs us of the last remaining courthouse in north Antrim. He pretends that it is about economics, but his Department spent £1.7 million on upgrading Ballymena courthouse —

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Order.

Mr Allister: — and now he wants to close it. Where is the economic sense in that?

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Order, please. Earlier, I requested Members' cooperation and asked them to ask questions. This sounds very much like a speech.

Mr Allister: Where is the economic sense in spending £1.7 million on a courthouse and then closing it?

Mr Ford: Money was spent because it was necessary to renovate Ballymena courthouse to make it compliant with the Disability Discrimination Act and to look at other matters. That does not mean that it is feasible or possible, in the circumstances that have changed significantly for the worst in my Department's budget since that time, to continue on that basis. Mr Allister starts off by saying that I "kick Ballymena when it is down". It seems to me that the only people who are kicking Ballymena when it is down are those who are making out that this is another major blow to the Ballymena economy comparable to JTI or Michelin. That is simply not the case.

My job is to provide appropriate buildings for all the people of Northern Ireland to see that justice can be done and that access to justice is available for people. For Mr Allister to kick Ballymena in a crude attempt to kick me does nothing for him or his constituency.

Mr Hazzard: At the fear of being one of very few people to welcome the statement — or, more accurately, to welcome the information that is not in it, which is that Downpatrick courthouse has been saved and is no longer on the list — can I ask the Minister to outline what opportunities exist for those courthouses remaining in the court estate going forward, including Downpatrick, to upgrade their facilities? Go raibh maith agat.

Mr Ford: I am not sure whether Mr Hazzard read the detailed paper that came out early on. A number of specific issues relating to public transport links in Downpatrick meant that it was not recommended for closure. The consultation, therefore, did not deal with it. It is very noticeable that nobody in South Down rushed to suggest that it should be closed. At this stage, I do not have the details before me about what may or may not be appropriate for Downpatrick, but the key issue will be that, by making savings through closing a number of other courthouses, there will be some freeing up of money. It will not be much, because it is largely to deal with the cuts that are being imposed on my Department, but there will be some freeing up that may make possible further minor changes that are needed to any of the existing courthouses. As I made it clear when I was talking about the Old Townhall, there will be no massive capital investment in the immediate future.

Licensing Bill: Further Extension of Committee Stage

Resolved:

That, in accordance with Standing Order 33(4), the period referred to in Standing Order 33(2) be extended further to 19 February 2016, in relation to the Committee Stage of the Licensing Bill [NIA Bill 69/11-16]. — [Mr Maskey (The Chairperson of the Committee for Social Development).]

Executive Committee Business

Credit Unions and Co-operative and Community Benefit Societies Bill: Further Consideration Stage

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): I call on the Minister of Finance and Personnel, Mr Mervyn Storey, to move the Further Consideration Stage of the Credit Unions and Co-operative and Community Benefit Societies Bill on behalf of the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment.

Moved. — [Mr Storey (The Minister of Finance and Personnel).]

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): As no amendments have been tabled, there is no opportunity to discuss the Credit Unions and Co-operative and Community Benefit Societies Bill. Members will, of course, be able to have a full debate at Final Stage. The Further Consideration Stage of the Bill is therefore concluded. The Bill stands referred to the Speaker.

Official Opposition: Statement of Proposed Entitlements

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): The next item on the Order Paper is a motion on the statement of proposed entitlements for an official opposition. The Business Committee has agreed to allow up to one hour and 30 minutes for the debate. The proposer of the motion will have 10 minutes to propose and 10 minutes to make a winding-up speech. All other Members who wish to speak will have five minutes.

7.15 pm

Mrs Pengelly (Junior Minister, Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister): I beg to move

That this Assembly endorses the statement of proposed entitlements for an official opposition, as set out at appendix F4 of the Fresh Start Agreement; and calls on the Speaker to take forward the implementation of these provisions before the end of the current Assembly mandate.

The purpose of today's motion is to seek the Assembly's endorsement of the statement of proposed entitlements for an official opposition as set out at appendix F4 of the Fresh Start Agreement. The statement of proposed entitlements sets out a number of provisions for an official opposition that, if agreed by Members today, will grant you the authority to decide how each element should be taken forward, including which aspects could be implemented through administrative changes or Speaker's rulings and which could require changes to Standing Orders.

The origins of the development of the statement of proposed entitlements for an official opposition date back to the period leading up to the Stormont House talks in 2014. At that stage, the creation of an official opposition in the Assembly was cited as one means by which the Executive could be made more accountable and more responsive to the Assembly. The devolution settlement and the Northern Ireland Act that underpins it are based on the principle of inclusive government whereby all political parties with sufficient electoral strength are entitled to participate in the Executive through the nomination of a Minister or Ministers to it. The Northern Ireland Act does not, therefore, make any provision for the concept of, or mechanism for, opposition. While it is, of course, open to any eligible party to forgo its Executive seats, as the Ulster Unionist Party did, no special status or entitlement is attached to that action at present.

The recognition of and means of support for an official opposition were therefore discussed in the Stormont House talks, together with other aspects of institutional reform. The 2014 Stormont House Agreement stated that arrangements would be put in place to enable those parties that are entitled to ministerial positions in the Executive but choose not to take them up to be recognised as an official opposition and to facilitate their work. The agreement also indicated that —

Mr Allister: Will the Minister give way?

Mrs Pengelly: Sorry.

The agreement also indicated that those arrangements should include provisions for cost-neutral financial and research assistance and designated speaking rights. Following the Stormont House Agreement, a subcommittee on institutional reform was established and remitted to consider what entitlements a future official opposition should receive. The subcommittee deliberated on that and reported to the party leaders' implementation group.

The measures that we are proposing today reflect those discussions and represent the measures on which there was the broadest consensus. Those are outlined in appendix F4 of the Fresh Start Agreement and are as follows. It is proposed that the provisions to be made for an official opposition will be made available to and restricted to those parties that would be entitled to ministerial positions in the Executive but choose not to take them up.

Mr Allister: Will the Minister give way on that point?

Mrs Pengelly: Sorry, I want to finish this initial speech. You can then respond to that, and I am happy to pick up your points in the winding-up speech. That would be a more appropriate way to deal with it.

Such parties should elect to go into opposition at the time they decline the offer of a ministerial position in the Executive when d'Hondt is run at the start of the mandate to fill ministerial offices. The provisions to be made for an official opposition will be put in place by way of administrative or other means not requiring primary legislation. That will be a matter for you, Mr Speaker, and the Assembly to progress. Parties noted that giving the provisions a legislative footing would require Westminster legislation.

It was agreed that a major element of the provision to be made for an official opposition should take the form of enhanced speaking rights during plenary business in the Assembly. That is in common with the provision typically made for official oppositions in jurisdictions elsewhere and would apply to the range of business undertaken in the Chamber.

During Question Time, the official opposition will be permitted to ask the first supplementary question after the tabling Member for the first three listed questions for oral answer to each Minister. During topical questions, they will be allocated the first topical question to the Minister outside the usual ballot for such questions. During questions for urgent oral answer, the official opposition will be permitted to ask the first supplementary question following the Member who tabled the question. For Executive business concerning Budget and Programme for Government debates, the official opposition will be permitted to be the first contributor following the Minister.

When Executive legislation is being taken through the House — Bill debates, subordinate legislation motions and legislative consent motions — the official opposition will be the first contributor in such debates following the relevant Statutory Committee Chairperson, if appropriate. The official opposition will be able to table the first question to a Minister following ministerial statements and be the first contributor, after the tabling Member, to a Matter of the Day. It was agreed that it would be for the Speaker, in consultation with the Business Committee, to determine the frequency with which opposition debates were to be scheduled.

Concerning the provisions to be made on enhanced speaking rights, it was agreed that, were the official opposition to comprise more than one party, the apportionment of speaking rights among parties would be determined by such parties on the basis of party strength. That process might mirror that used for the allocation of private Members' business by the Business Committee.

While it is acknowledged that, once an official opposition comes into operation, custom and practice is likely to lead to titles being conferred on Members from parties that form part of the official opposition, there was broad agreement that no formal provision for titles should be made. A further element of the provision relates to cost-neutral financial and research assistance for opposition parties. It was agreed that that should be provided through the financial assistance for political parties (FAPP) scheme or the ring-fencing of Assembly research facilities.

As might be expected in discussions involving the five parties that at that point were represented on the Executive, there were other proposals that did not receive general support. They were not therefore included in the statement of proposed entitlements.

The motion seeks the Assembly's endorsement of these measures and remits the Speaker to commission the necessary work to ensure that they are in place for the start of the new Assembly mandate in May. We cannot predict which parties — indeed, whether any parties — may choose to forgo their entitlement to a seat on the Executive. However, if we accept the principle that an official opposition should be recognised, it is important that its status be made meaningful and effective through the implementation of the provisions outlined in this statement of proposed entitlements for an official opposition. We do not expect the measures to be definitive, but they provide for a broad range of provisions to be made available immediately for the official opposition that future Assemblies will be able to review and, if they wish, enhance. We do not believe that their introduction will compromise any future consideration of the statutory underpinning of an official opposition.

Mr Speaker, it is for those reasons that we seek the Assembly's endorsement of the statement of proposed entitlements for an official opposition and for the implementation of the provisions to be taken forward by you before the end of the mandate.

Mr Speaker: I call the Chairperson of the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister, Mr Mike Nesbitt.

Mr Nesbitt (The Chairperson of the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister): Mr Speaker, you surprise me.

I welcome the statement from the Minister. I think that the Committee is certainly aware of the proposals, but I stand to be corrected. I do not believe that the Committee has taken a position on the proposals for an official opposition, so, with your permission, I will take off the hat of the Committee Chair and speak as an individual.

As the Minister said, the Ulster Unionist Party has already voluntarily withdrawn from the current Northern Ireland Executive. We promote the introduction of an official opposition. We see that as the next mature step towards a normal democracy in Northern Ireland, so it is not about undermining anything; it is about improving and acknowledging, in fact, that these institutions are here to stay. For the avoidance of doubt, let me say that, in calling for an opposition, this is not about some sort of play for a return to majority rule. When we talk about “normal democracy”, we understand that, for the foreseeable future, the Executive must be led on a cross-community basis and that, therefore, the largest parties of the two main traditions will form the core of the Government or at least have first refusal.

I am extremely keen to put it on record once again that the Ulster Unionist Party felt that the creation of an official opposition had to be cost-neutral compared with what we currently spend on running our government. There could be no increase, and, therefore, we were not looking for salaries for any leaders in an official opposition, nor were we looking for anything other than perhaps some ring-fenced access to Assembly research. Again, the junior Minister has made it clear that that facility is envisaged in the so-called Fresh Start Agreement. As she said, there were arguments that we made but lost. We would very much have liked to see the official opposition having first refusal of a number of Committee Chairs: that is not going to happen. Indeed, more broadly, we would have preferred if the mechanism to create an official opposition had been primary legislation coming out of Westminster. Call us cynical, but maybe we believe that what you can give in a debate like this one day you can take away the next. That is the rough and tumble of politics. We made our case and lost some of the argument, but we won the big argument, which is that we should have an official opposition.

I very much welcome the junior Minister making it clear that, after the election, when we go into the negotiations on the Programme for Government, it will be at the point that d'Hondt is run that a party will have to make the call as to whether it takes its entitlement to be at the Executive table or withdraws to form part or the whole of an official opposition.

Mr Speaker: Let me congratulate you on that quick recovery, although I have to say that the podium misled me: I thought that you were sitting there as Chairperson and had the podium on that basis. Very well done indeed.

Mr Lyons: It is good to take part in the debate, and I very much support the motion before the House. We have made considerable progress in recent weeks with the implementation of the Fresh Start Agreement and the important reforms that are found in that. We have already discussed reducing the number of MLAs and reforming and cutting the number of Departments, and the fact that we are starting down the road of having an official opposition is another important part of the reform process. Although what has been set out today is not legislative change, it, in effect, places some responsibility on your shoulders, Mr Speaker, to make sure that the changes are implemented through our Standing Orders or wherever else those changes need to be made.

I say that we are beginning here; we are not saying that this is the end of the journey or that we have this all right. We are saying that we start here and it will be up to those in the next mandate to decide where they want to go after that. We will now have arrangements in place at the start of the new mandate, and that is very important.

Opposition really comes down to two issues: time and money. We see that time will be given to those who wish to be part of the official opposition. It is significant that, at Question Time, the first supplementary question after the tabling Member for the first three listed questions will go to someone who is not a Member of any of the parties that are in government. The first contributor to debates following the Budget and the Programme for Government will also be someone from the opposition parties, as will the first contributor to ministerial statements and Matters of the Day. Opposition parties will also have an entitlement to opposition debates, so there is certainly the time for those who are not in government to ensure that their voices are heard and to ensure that they have the time to scrutinise the work of the Executive.

As well as having time, we have money; there is financial assistance available to those who wish to form the opposition. I agree very much with Mr Nesbitt that it is a good thing that this is done on a cost-neutral basis, because we have not cut the number of MLAs and Departments to save money in that way in order to spend more on funding an official opposition.

7.30 pm

I think that what we have here is a very positive start. We can obviously return to it later, but I very much welcome the progress that has been made, and I will support the motion this evening.

Mr Maskey: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. On behalf of Sinn Féin, I also support the motion and endorse the provisions of entitlement. If, as we hope, the Assembly endorses the motion this evening, you, Mr Speaker, will have the fairly onerous task of working with the Business Committee and, within the entitlement of the Speaker, making your own rulings as well.

As far as our party is concerned, we are quite happy to support the provision and enablement of an opposition, although, speaking for myself and many others, I would much prefer it if all those who have an electoral mandate were around the table working together and sharing the burden of trying to tackle all of the many outstanding difficulties that we as a society have yet to resolve. I do not think that it is fair if parties get a mandate and then stand away from shouldering that responsibility, but that would be their choice, and that is fair enough. The provisions, if endorsed here today, enabling you, Mr Speaker, to take this forward, will provide for that.

As I have said, I think that the provisions are generous for the circumstances that we live in. They will certainly be adequate for those who want to put themselves into opposition. As I said, our party is more than happy to support this. It has already been said that this does not mean that it has to be definitive or that, in the future, there would not be some further legislative underpinning of such provisions if they are required and people want to make those arguments in due course. Our party will be keen, as always, to listen to those arguments and to move forward on that basis.

So, for now, and particularly for May — right at the beginning of the next mandate — there will be provision for an opposition. I just hope that some of those who are seeking the right to have an opposition do not ever regret getting what they ask for.

Mr Attwood: Mr Speaker, I apologise that I missed the junior Minister's opening remarks. In that regard, and in order to create certainty and avoid doubt, I will ask a series of questions, and I would ask for definitive responses.

This was touched upon by Mr Nesbitt and may, therefore, have already been covered. The statement of proposed entitlements for an official opposition is set out on page 55 of 'A Fresh Start'. Paragraph (i) of that statement states:

"Those parties which would be entitled to ministerial positions in the Executive but choose not to take them up, to be recognised as an official opposition. Those parties which choose to go into opposition should elect to do so at the time they decline the offer of a ministerial position in the Executive when d'Hondt is run."

I think that Mr Nesbitt referred to that.

I refer to paragraph 61 of 'A Fresh Start' and ask the junior Minister to confirm that the only and proper interpretation of paragraph (i) about entitlements in section F and of paragraph 61 is the one that Mr Nesbitt referred to. It says in paragraph 61 of 'A Fresh Start':

"After the Assembly meets following an election and before the FM-DFM are selected and the d'Hondt process runs, representatives of the parties who are entitled to take up places in the Executive and who confirm their intention to do so will meet to resolve the draft Programme for Government".

So, my question to the junior Minister is this: does this mean that parties have to declare their intention to enter into government before the Programme for Government is concluded, or is it the case, which seems to be the more proper position, that it is only at the time when d'Hondt is run that parties may choose to go into opposition or into government?

There is a difference between the two, and there may be a tension between the two, in that one says that you decide when d'Hondt is about to run while, in the other, essentially, you decide when you are about to resolve the draft Programme for Government and before d'Hondt is run. I ask for clarification as to which it is from the junior Minister. I think that there is a proper way to handle this matter in the event that any party wants to go into opposition, and there is a less than proper way, which is to declare what you are doing before the Programme for Government is finally resolved.

What follows in paragraph 61 is this:

"Changes to Westminster legislation (as soon as time permits) could extend the time available from seven days to fourteen days".

This is in respect of the Programme for Government. My second question to the junior Minister is this: have there been any conversations with London in relation to any Westminster legislation, not necessarily in respect of the extension from seven days to 14 days but in respect of the previous point I made, namely about confirming your intention to enter into government in advance of a draft Programme for Government being resolved? Have there been any conversations with London? If so, what were they? Is there any legislation coming? I presume that the answer to all of this is negative but, subject to the Minister's comments, I ask for answers to that.

The SDLP has been arguing since 2012, in a submission that was presented to the then Secretary of State in respect of his consultation around a miscellaneous provisions Bill for Northern Ireland, for legislation to put in place an opposition with entitlements in the Assembly. In as much as this statement moves in that direction, that is the right direction to move in. We always argued for that, consistent with entitlements under d'Hondt and the democratic mandate, and it is our intention and that of every party, I presume — to touch on the point made by Mr Maskey — that you seek a democratic mandate to enter into negotiations on the Programme for Government, on the far side of which you enter into government. That, clearly, is the ambition of any and all parties, and it is the ambition of the SDLP. Subject to those two questions and the potential tension between those two paragraphs, the SDLP is prepared to see the statement move forward.

Mr Dickson: Mr Speaker, I will be brief. I am speaking on behalf of my colleague Mr Lyttle, who is unwell this evening. I want to place on record that the Alliance Party supports the establishment of an opposition. However, we are not in a position to endorse the proposal this evening, not least because of some of the issues that others have raised and because a party could qualify for an Executive position but could choose to form part of an opposition. However, I wish to leave the House clearly understanding that the Alliance Party is in support of those moves towards an opposition.

Mr Allister: I note that it is almost three months since the Fresh Start had the revelation that we would have an opposition. Indeed, the motion only came to fruition when Mr McCallister's Bill was about to hit the Floor of the House.

I can draw some conclusions from that. One can also draw conclusions about the appetite for opposition from the two parties that, in the main, support Fresh Start: they have happily conducted business for years without opposition. I am glad that they are at least, kicking and screaming, being dragged somewhat in that direction. Of course, they are trying to take a de minimis approach, in that they are trying to make it as hard as possible to be in opposition. They want to set the threshold at being eligible for and then turning down a position in government, in the hope that all other parties will be imbued with the same greed as they have for office and will not turn down government office. They hope that the lure of the limo will be as strong for everyone else as it obviously is for the two proponent parties. Thus, they have set the threshold as high as they could. Given the drop in the number of Departments, that means that, quite possibly, it could take 11 or 12 seats to qualify for an Executive place after May. As many as 30 Members, maybe a third of the House, could be ineligible for inclusion in the Executive and, therefore, not eligible to be in opposition because the threshold has been set so artificially high in order to discourage the practice of opposition.

The first challenge to the Department is this: if those two parties are, as they would belatedly like to have us think, so genuinely keen to see an opposition, why are they making it as difficult as possible to establish an opposition by putting the bar as high as they can —

Mr Lyons: Will the Member give way?

Mr Allister: — and contemplating the situation in which you might have 30 or more Members in the House who are not eligible for participation in the Executive and, equally, not eligible for participation in an opposition? I will give way.

Mr Lyons: I thank Mr Allister for giving way. He made the point that he thinks that the bar has been set too high. However, we have an extensive list of opportunities for Members in the official opposition to speak in the Chamber. You said that there could be up to 30 Members in opposition, but what if there are only three, four or five? That would mean that they were the first to speak in Budget and Programme for Government debates and have the first three questions in Question Time. Surely it would be unfair to other Members for such a small number to have such a huge influence.

Mr Speaker: The Member has an extra minute.

Mr Allister: I do not know which 'Fresh Start' document Mr Lyons has been reading, but it is certainly not the one published on the OFMDFM website, which anticipates those powers for opposition only if the parties concerned have turned down a place in the Government. The suggestion that 'Fresh Start' states that three or four people could exercise those functions is really nonsense. I have made the point that you could have as many as 30 Members of the House who are not eligible for government and not eligible for opposition, while OFMDFM merrily and happily carries on.

That brings me to a point that the junior Minister was surprisingly timid about, in that she would not even give way. The question for the junior Minister is this: when her party offered, during last Tuesday's debate on John McCallister's Bill, a threshold of 8% as the qualification for being an opposition party, was it only playing games with Mr McCallister? Is it wedded to what 'Fresh Start' says, or is one half of the Fresh Start proponent parties in the camp of saying that it is quite happy to reduce it to 8%? The House is entitled to know. Is the DUP playing games with Mr McCallister's Bill, is it serious about saying that the threshold could be 8% or is it wedded to what it is putting before the House tonight, namely, the 'Fresh Start' document? That self-inflicted confusion needs to be clarified, and clarified very thoroughly, by the junior Minister. I hope that she will not duck, dive and dodge that question. It is a simple question: is her party playing games with Mr McCallister or is it serious about accepting 8% as the threshold? If it is serious, where does that leave the 'Fresh Start' document? Perhaps we could get an answer to that.

7.45 pm

As for its being cost-neutral, I have an idea for Minister Pengelly. We could fund this by culling a lot of the special adviser posts in OFMDFM because we have eight, which is the same as the Welsh Government. If we want to make this cost-neutral, would it not be a good start to reduce the number of those posts and putting it to better use than at present?

Although the junior Minister is not willing to take interventions, I hope that she will not dodge those issues and will try to answer the questions.

Mrs Pengelly: I thank Members for their contribution to this important debate on the provisions to be made to give recognition to an official opposition and to facilitate the work undertaken by parties entitled to ministerial positions in the Assembly but who choose not to take them up. I will respond to some of the issues raised by Members during the debate. I welcome the broad support of the leader of the Ulster Unionist Party for the motion.

The statement of proposed entitlements does not include everything that was asked for, which will be a source of frustration for some. It does, however, in my view, constitute a strong basis for the way forward. As we enter into the next term, it gives an opportunity for further discussion and consideration on how we could improve, enhance and build on this progress of establishing an official opposition.

I welcome the support of my colleague Mr Gordon Lyons for this key move towards building a more normal way of working. Everyone in Northern Ireland wants to see this way of working, and, although this is not the final step, it is an important step towards that normality.

I welcome Mr Alex Maskey's support. I reference his comments that he seeks for all parties that want to be included and involved should be included and involved. I also welcome his remarks that this should be a choice for some of the parties as opposed to their being forced to be included and involved. We have seen the outworkings of that uncomfortable relationship in the past.

As regards Mr Alex Attwood's specific questions, we acknowledge that there is a tension between the issues. It is difficult at all points to get a satisfactory conclusion that suits all purposes. We wanted to ensure that parties would have the opportunity to consider what the Programme for Government is, what has been negotiated and agreed, and to make a decision on whether they wanted to be in government in order to operate the Programme for Government. It may be the case, however, that there are political parties that have no intention of being in the Government of Northern Ireland and operating the Programme for Government. Instinctively, I think that there is a perversity about a party that has no intention of being in government negotiating a Programme for Government to be operated by the Executive. There is a tension within those issues, and we welcome parties' views. However, we certainly would not want to close off the opportunity to those who want to give it the best chance and perhaps feel that they could not sign up to what eventually comes out of the process of negotiation.

Mr Nesbitt: Will the Minister give way?

Mrs Pengelly: Yes.

Mr Nesbitt: How would you know that a party has no intention of taking its seat or seats? If a party withdrew at the point of running d'Hondt, could the remaining parties decide that they wished to redraw the Programme for Government and take out some compromises that may have been put in specifically to please the party that withdrew?

Mrs Pengelly: I agree with the Member that it would be difficult to prejudice those issues. It may also be the case that some parties will go into the election process being very upfront about the fact that they intend to go into opposition. If that were the case, that is the best way to assess it.

It would be a very strange situation if you had an agreement that is a compromise that the parties negotiated and effectively signed up to, and one political party then decides, despite that fact and its input and seeing its work in the Programme for Government, that it will tactically or strategically disengage and want to go into an official opposition.

As I outlined, there is a tension between those issues. We want to provide a fair and equitable approach to everybody in relation to this. As I mentioned, we would welcome the views of parties on how to seek an effective way to address the tension between those issues.

Alex Attwood made a point about the change from seven days to 14 days. I am happy to confirm for him that there have been substantial discussions with the UK Government and that the Secretary of State proposes to publish a Bill in relation to these implementation issues very shortly.

Mr Attwood: Will the Minister give way?

Mrs Pengelly: Yes.

Mr Attwood: If a Bill is published soon, is there any indication of when it might be tabled and when it might be passed? Is that Bill to contain any other proposals other than a change from seven days to 14 days — in particular, going back to the point that I made recently, about any proposed change in relation to that clause about “confirming their intention” to enter into government? What are the clauses of that Bill likely to include?

Mrs Pengelly: I can advise the Member that the purpose of publishing the Bill will be to have that consideration about what is included, but the purpose is very much to implement ‘A Fresh Start’. It will look at the issues that pertain to the responsibility of the British Government. There have been ongoing discussions, through a process of implementation, on the logistical side of that, which have been led by the head of the Civil Service. I am happy, if there are specific issues, to write to the Member in due course.

With the greatest respect to Mr James Allister, I think that most people in Northern Ireland would struggle to see that the bar of getting one ministerial seat was, in his words, particularly high; in fact, I think that most people would consider it to be quite low. I do not think that it is unreasonable that that is the bar that has been negotiated and agreed. In relation to the other issues that he mentioned, I am not sure whether the Member is familiar with the concept of compromise and agreement, but what is presented in ‘A Fresh Start’ is a compromise and an agreement. By its very nature, we do not get everything that we want, and nor does anybody else. We come together for the good of the people of Northern Ireland to try to find a way through difficult and challenging issues, to get agreement in order to build a better and brighter future and ensure that these institutions, devolution and local government can exist for the people of Northern Ireland. That requires compromise and agreement.

Mr Allister: Will the Minister give way?

Mrs Pengelly: Yes.

Mr Allister: Those are very nice platitudes, I am sure, but what about addressing the question? If, after the election, when maybe it will take 11 or 12 Members to qualify for the Executive, there are 30-plus Members in the House who are incapable of qualifying for the Executive, does she think that it is right that there should, in those circumstances, be no provision for an opposition? Will she answer the question? When her party suggested last week that it would agree, in Mr McCallister’s Bill, to reduce the threshold to 8% — in other words, nine MLAs — was she playing games, or is she wedded to ‘A Fresh Start’ and it is that or nothing? Can we have answers to those two questions, please?

Mrs Pengelly: Perhaps the Member does not understand the way that this works. I stand here today as a Minister in the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister, and I am responding to the debate as a junior Minister in the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister. I suggest to the Member that, perhaps, if he does not understand and he wants a party response, he should ask the party speaking as the DUP and not a junior Minister responding on behalf of the Department. [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order.

Mrs Pengelly: I have made it clear that I stand here today making it absolutely clear that we are presenting what is necessary to give rise and give effect to the Fresh Start Agreement, an agreement that was a compromise. It was an agreement between parties, and that is what we are honouring here today. The discussion that the Member is so eager to get into will take place in the midst of another debate that is ongoing at this time in relation to John McCallister’s private Member’s Bill.

I bring my remarks to a conclusion by thanking Members once again for their contributions to the debate — positive and otherwise — and for the questions and issues that they raised. I hope that I have been able to answer them to their satisfaction. ‘A Fresh Start’ has provided a basis for addressing a range of institutional reform issues relating to the Assembly, not the least of which is the important issue before us for debate today. However, we must move now if the matter is to be concluded by the end of the current Assembly mandate, and that requires that the motion before us be passed by the House. Therefore, I ask the Assembly to approve the motion today as yet another step towards normal politics here. I welcome that, and I believe that Northern Ireland will welcome it.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That this Assembly endorses the statement of proposed entitlements for an official opposition, as set out at appendix F4 of the Fresh Start Agreement; and calls on the Speaker to take forward the implementation of these provisions before the end of the current Assembly mandate.

Spring Supplementary Estimates 2015-16; Vote on Account 2016-17; and Supply Resolution for the 2013-14 Excess Vote

Mr Speaker: The next three motions relate to the Supply resolutions, and, as usual, there will be a single debate on the motions. I shall ask the Clerk to read the first motion on the 2015-16 spring Supplementary Estimates and call on the Minister to move it. The debate on all three motions will then begin. When all who wish to speak have done so or when the time limit is reached, I shall put the Question on the first motion. The second motion — the 2016-17 Vote on Account — will then be read into the record, and I will call the Minister to move it. The Question will then be put on that motion. After the Question has been put on the second motion, the third motion — the 2013-14 Excess Vote — will then be read into the record, and I will call the Minister to move it. The Question will then be put on that motion.

The Business Committee has agreed to allow up to four hours 30 minutes for the debate. The Minister will have up to 60 minutes to allocate at his discretion between proposing and making a winding-up speech. All other Members will have seven minutes. If all that is clear, I shall proceed.

Mr Storey (The Minister of Finance and Personnel): I beg to move

That this Assembly approves that a total sum, not exceeding £15,770,704,000, be granted out of the Consolidated Fund for or towards defraying the charges for Northern Ireland Departments, the Northern Ireland Assembly Commission, the Assembly Ombudsman for Northern Ireland and Northern Ireland Commissioner for Complaints, the Food Standards Agency, the Northern Ireland Audit Office, the Northern Ireland Authority for Utility Regulation and the Public Prosecution Service for Northern Ireland for the year ending 31 March 2016 and that total resources, not exceeding £17,135,765,000, be authorised for use by Northern Ireland Departments, the Northern Ireland Assembly Commission, the Assembly Ombudsman for Northern Ireland and Northern Ireland Commissioner for Complaints, the Food Standards Agency, the Northern Ireland Audit Office, the Northern Ireland Authority for Utility Regulation and the Public Prosecution Service for Northern Ireland for the year ending 31 March 2016 as summarised for each Department or other public body in columns 3(c) and 2(c) of table 1 in the volume of the Northern Ireland Spring Supplementary Estimates 2015-16 that was laid before the Assembly on 2 February 2016.

The following motions stood in the Order Paper:

That this Assembly approves that a sum, not exceeding £7,899,052,800, be granted out of the Consolidated Fund on account for or towards defraying the charges for Northern Ireland Departments, the Northern Ireland Assembly Commission, the Assembly Ombudsman for Northern Ireland and Northern Ireland Commissioner for Complaints, the Food Standards Agency, the Northern Ireland Audit Office, the Northern Ireland Authority for Utility Regulation and the Public Prosecution Service for Northern Ireland for the year ending 31 March 2017 and that resources, not exceeding £8,680,276,400, be authorised, on account, for use by Northern Ireland Departments, the Northern Ireland Assembly Commission, the Assembly Ombudsman for Northern Ireland and Northern Ireland Commissioner for Complaints, the Food Standards Agency, the Northern Ireland Audit Office, the Northern Ireland Authority for Utility Regulation and the Public Prosecution Service for Northern Ireland for the year ending 31 March 2017 as summarised for each Department or other public body in columns 4 and 6 of table 1 in the Vote on Account 2016-17 document that was laid before the Assembly on 2 February 2016. — [Mr Storey (The Minister of Finance and Personnel).]

That this Assembly approves that resources, not exceeding £6,031,448.89 be authorised for use by the Public Prosecution Service for Northern Ireland for the year ending 31 March 2014, as summarised in Part II of the 2013-14 Statement of Excesses that was laid before the Assembly on 2 February 2016. — [Mr Storey (The Minister of Finance and Personnel).]

The Supply resolutions debate is a key element in the legislative process that governs our finances. The debate commencing this evening primarily covers the final spending plans for the 2015-16 financial year but also the first few months of 2016-17 through the Vote on Account. For today, I have tabled three Supply motions for debate. Through the first motion, I seek the Assembly's legislative approval of the Executive's final spending plans for 2015-16. As Members will be aware, these final spending plans are detailed in the spring Supplementary Estimates. The second motion requests interim legislative cover for resources and funding for the first few months of 2016-17 in the form of a Vote on Account. The final motion seeks the Assembly's approval of an Excess Vote for the Public Prosecution Service in respect of the 2013-14 financial year.

I request the levels of Supply set out in the motions under section 63 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998, which provides for the Minister of Finance and Personnel to make recommendations to the Assembly, leading to cash appropriations from the Northern Ireland Consolidated Fund. The amounts that I now ask the Assembly to vote in Supply for 2015-16 are substantial — some £15.8 billion in cash, £17.1 billion of resources and £2.6 billion of accruing resources.

8.00 pm

These amounts are to be used by Departments and other public bodies in Northern Ireland to deliver public services. As I mentioned in the first Supply motion, they relate to the spring Supplementary Estimates, which reflect all in-year changes made since the Main Estimates were approved by the Assembly last June. That includes any funding surrendered by Departments, allocations received or other technical transfers of funding proceeded through the monitoring rounds in this financial year.

(Mr Principal Deputy Speaker [Mr Newton] in the Chair)

That, of course, reflects not only departmental expenditure limit (DEL) changes agreed by the Executive during monitoring rounds but annually managed expenditure (AME) funding agreed by the Treasury since the approval of the 2015-16 Main Estimates. In that way, this legislation process simply ratifies budgets already agreed by the Executive.

When my predecessor, Mr Simon Hamilton, presented the spring Supplementary Estimates in the Assembly this time last year, he spoke of the difficult financial environment that the Executive had to deal with. He also spoke of the recently agreed Stormont House Agreement, which provided a sound basis on which to move ahead, not least on public finances. Unfortunately, as all Members are now well aware, the Stormont House Agreement unravelled in the months following my predecessor's speech. However, with the Fresh Start Agreement, we now have an agreed way forward, and I sincerely hope that this agreement will be honoured by all parties. We need to stand by and capitalise on this agreement to ensure that we continue to deliver for the people of Northern Ireland.

The Fresh Start Agreement reignited the plans for the Assembly to take on new powers to vary our rate of corporation tax. The Executive are now committed to a rate of corporation tax of 12.5% from April 2018. That is an important milestone and one that I believe can act as a powerful lever to transform the Northern Ireland economy. There is certainly a case to ramp up skills investment in the coming years to maximise the potential benefits associated with a lower rate of corporation tax. I also state my commitment to provide a further £20 million for skills after the May election. I am also supportive of an additional £20 million to help to address pressures in our schools. That will be funded from the first £40 million available in the next monitoring round in June. Although that allocation cannot be ratified until the incoming Executive consider their funding priorities, I am sure that they, too, will recognise the importance of the skills agenda and education. I believe that it is important to provide education institutions with this early indication of my commitment on extra funding.

The restructuring of our Departments was also confirmed with the Fresh Start Agreement. That will see the current 12 Departments reduced to nine from May 2016. That should help to rationalise our Civil Service and bring benefits of a more streamlined delivery of public services. Fresh Start also paved the way for an agreed Budget for 2016-17 on the new nine-Department structure. That was ratified by the Assembly only last month. The departmental restructuring also has an impact on the 2016-17 Vote on Account, but I will say more on that later.

For now, I will return to the detail of the 2015-16 in-year changes, which are the focus of the debate. I reiterate this to Members as we embark upon the debate: that is what we are debating, and, no doubt, I am sure that Members will pay heed to that advice as we proceed through the rest of the evening.

We began the 2015-16 financial year with much uncertainty over our public finances due to the ongoing political discussions around the Stormont House Agreement. That uncertainty impacted on the normal in-year monitoring process, which usually consists of three monitoring rounds in June, October and January. In this financial year, the Executive agreed a technical exercise in June, which did not address the wider departmental pressures. The main purpose of this round was to ensure that technical transactions within and between Departments could take place to ensure the smooth functioning of government. The usual October monitoring round was also cancelled due to the ongoing political talks, although it was replaced by a monitoring round in November.

A key issue in this round was allocations to Departments from the public sector transformation fund to finance the voluntary exit scheme across the public sector. In total, just over £183 million was allocated to the Departments for the voluntary exit schemes, with more than half going towards the Northern Ireland Civil Service exit scheme. It is estimated that the voluntary exit schemes in the public sector will exit some 4,000 staff during 2015-16. This is estimated to generate pay bill savings of around £39 million this year alone, with full-year savings expected to be £149 million. Of course, the actual savings figures will not be known until the end of the financial year.

As Members will probably be aware, these voluntary exits were funded through additional reinvestment and reform initiative (RRI) borrowing, and there is an additional £500 million available over the next three years for this purpose, although the Executive agreed in its 2016-17 Budget to use £25 million of this towards capital projects.

With a significant number of public-sector workers leaving, business continuity planning will be critical. It is vital that we can continue to deliver essential public services in the context of reducing staff complements. I know that the Departments and the wider public sector bodies are working hard to ensure that this is the case.

The November monitoring round reallocated a significant amount of funding. There were reduced requirements on the resource side of £33 million and just over £20 million on the capital side. Funding was also freed up from the centre, not least from funding previously set aside for welfare mitigation measures. All of this meant that the Executive could make resource allocations totalling £87.4 million and capital allocations of £13.7 million. The bulk of the available resource funding — £47.6 million — went to the Department of Health to help reduce hospital waiting lists. There was also significant funding for the Department for Regional Development and the Department of Education.

Given that a reallocation exercise took place in November, the Executive agreed that the January round should be restricted to technical issues, again to allow the smooth running of government.

It should also be noted that the in-year monitoring process provided for a significant reallocation of ring-fenced financial transactions capital, with the Department for Social Development receiving some £94 million for housing schemes. I think that that was down to the previous Minister's work and lobbying on that issue.

All of these in-year movements have brought us to the position that I am presenting to the Assembly today in the 2015-16 spring Supplementary Estimates.

Before I conclude my opening speech, I would like to say a few words about the 2016-17 Vote on Account. As I have already highlighted, the second motion introduced today seeks approval to the issue of a cash and resource Vote on Account to ensure the continuation of services into the next financial year. The amounts of cash and resources proposed are an advance, which is necessary to enable services to continue into 2016-17 until the Main Estimates are presented to the Assembly for approval in June.

In normal circumstances, that advance would amount to 45% of the previous year's provision. However, this year's Vote on Account is complicated by the fact that the 12 Departments will remain in place until May and be replaced by the nine new Departments after the election. There is a need to ensure that all 12 existing Departments have enough cash and resource cover to see them through until May when they cease to exist. Equally, the nine new Departments will need to have cover from early May until the Main Estimates and associated Budget Bill receive Royal Assent in July 2016. In particular, that will affect the nine Departments that will effectively continue to exist as new Departments post May 2016. The Vote on Account figures provided for each of the 12 Departments reflect that position and will be necessary to ensure that our Departments can continue to function until and beyond the restructuring to nine new Departments.

The final motion relates to an Excess Vote for the Public Prosecution Service. On 19 March 2014, a fair employment tribunal ruled against the Public Prosecution Service on an equal pay and indirect discrimination case. Owing to the timing of the case, the Public Prosecution Service was unable to bid for funding cover during any of the 2013-14 monitoring rounds. The necessity to make provision for those costs at year end breached the Public Prosecution Service annually managed expenditure budget allocation for 2013-14. The Assembly is now being asked to provide the additional resources — some £6,031,448 — through an Excess Vote. The Public Accounts Committee has recommended that the Assembly approve that.

In conclusion, I commend to Members the 2015-16 spring Supplementary Estimates, the 2016-17 Vote on Account and the 2013-14 Excess Vote. I look forward to a lively and informed debate and will endeavour to deal with as many of the issues raised by Members as possible.

Mr McKay (The Chairperson of the Committee for Finance and Personnel): Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for his opening remarks and for his explanation of the spring Supplementary Estimates. It saves me doing the same.

I will make a quick personal comment. The Minister commented on corporation tax and 'A Fresh Start'. I am fully supportive of the Fresh Start Agreement, but I believe that we need a fresh start and a fair start. The Committee received a briefing on the latest developments with corporation tax. It is important to keep an eye on Scotland. At the moment, according to some newspapers, there is devolution deadlock on the funding proposals for further devolution to the Scottish Parliament. That comes down to the rival interpretations of the no detriment principle that was contained in the Smith commission report. It is important for the Minister, the Executive and the Assembly always to keep a wee eye on Scotland and Wales. If the British Government at Westminster cede principles to any of the other devolved Administrations, we should be demanding the same fair deal for here. We know that there will be tax consequences from any reduced rate of corporation tax, and we need to ensure that we maximise the benefits of that to our coffers here in Belfast.

The Committee for Finance and Personnel took evidence from DFP officials on the SSEs for 2015-16 and the Vote on Account for 2016-17. Those are routine requirements, although, by necessity, they are quite technical matters. I thank the officials for their assistance to the Committee in that regard. During the evidence session, the Committee examined the reconciliation between the departmental expenditure limit figures in the Main Estimates Budget position and the SSEs Budget position before us today. It was an informative exercise, during which the Committee received helpful clarification from the DFP officials on the extent of the in-year technical changes to the resource and capital allocations for 2015-16 for a number of Departments. In some instances, the figures involved were substantial. I shall not go into the specific figures for individual Departments on the in-year movement of money. The DFP breakdown of the figures has been shared with the other Committees. Suffice it to note that almost £256 million was made in resource allocations and £143 million in capital allocations.

As regards the in-year easements, roughly £343 million resource and £109 million capital has been released through the in-year monitoring process. When I questioned officials on that high level of easements, it was confirmed that the overall figure was higher than normal. However, the officials pointed out that that could be explained by the high amount of financial transaction capital (FTC) that needed to be allocated in year and also due to a resource reduction for student loans in the Department for Employment and Learning.

It is important for the Finance Committee to establish clarity on those significant technical adjustments as it exercises a cross-cutting scrutiny function in respect of Budget Bills. Moreover, the scale of these technical changes, combined with the cumulative changes resulting from the normal reallocations through monitoring rounds, will, in some cases, have resulted in significant differences between the opening and closing resource and capital allocations of Departments. In that regard, it is vital that all Statutory Committees have satisfied themselves as to the reasons for as well as the timing of any significant levels of easements or returns of moneys during the in-year monitoring process.

In the scrutiny of the Department's input into the in-year monitoring rounds, I can report that, while the Committee received briefings from officials on the June and November monitoring rounds, no briefing was received in relation to any technical adjustments made during January. Therefore, the Minister might take the opportunity to clarify whether the Department made any adjustments here. As regards the motion relating to the Vote on Account, the Committee has noted that some flexibility has been provided for Departments particularly affected by the restructuring process.

Finally, I turn to the issue of the Excess Vote for 2013-14. The Assembly is being asked to approve this and make provision for costs as a result of a fair employment tribunal ruling against the PPS on an equal pay and indirect discrimination case. Members noted that, due to timing, the PPS was unable to bid for that during 2013-14. Therefore, the Assembly is now being asked to provide additional resources through the Excess Vote mechanism. The Committee is content with that, bearing in mind that the PAC also recommended it on 25 March last year. The Committee has approved accelerated passage for the Budget Bill, which will be introduced by the Minister later this evening.

I will make a couple of brief comments in a personal capacity. I am sure that all Members have read the large SSEs document. The new net provision maintains the significant budget of Invest NI in DETI. Of course, Invest NI does a lot of good work in attracting inward investment to the North, but there is a significant challenge that it needs to meet in Ballymena. The Minister will be aware of the rally in Ballymena on Saturday, which was organised by Unite. It highlighted starkly the work that needs to be a priority for Invest NI and the new Economy Minister. We in Sinn Féin will certainly continue to support the relief for manufacturing. I hope that all other parties will maintain that position. There needs to be a change in approach and tack to Invest NI's current position. We need to see a beyond Belfast strategy that secures more inward investment for the likes of Ballymena. We always hear that the rationale for the existing position is that most companies are interested in Belfast and no further. I do not believe that to be the case. No good salesman or saleswoman would limit their sights in what they can —

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I ask the Member to conclude his remarks.

Mr McKay: — sell to inward investors. We will not be giving up on investment in Ballymena or the rural areas. We will not give up on manufacturing. We have a world-class manufacturing workforce that has a quality that trumps lower-wage economies. I would be interested to hear the Minister's comments on that as well.

Mr Ross (The Chairperson of the Committee for Justice): The Department of Justice faced substantial financial challenges in 2015-16, and that pattern is set to continue in 2016-17. It is therefore imperative for the Department to proactively identify new ways of working to improve the efficiency and effectiveness of the justice system and implement them swiftly so that the same or better outcomes are achieved for the public for less money.

As usual, the cost of legal aid was identified as the main funding pressure early in the 2015-16 financial year. In June, the forecast shortfall in funding was £23.9 million. That was revised downwards to £21.2 million in September and £12.5 million in November. By January of this year, the estimated shortfall was £5 million.

The reduced legal aid pressure is not due to any action taken by the Department to reduce the cost of legal aid. Rather, it is due to the deadlock between the Department and some members of the legal profession in relation to the current rates of legal aid remuneration for Crown Court cases. The result of some solicitors and barristers coming off record and initiating a judicial review followed by an appeal has been a substantial reduction in the volume of Crown Court cases heard during 2015 and early in 2016. That has resulted in a backlog of almost 800 cases. Therefore, when the situation is eventually resolved and the cases start to move through the system again, the Department will be faced with a very large legal aid bill, which will create an immense pressure on its budget. Given that it has been unable to live within the legal aid budget in normal circumstances in any year since the devolution of policing and justice and that bids for additional resources have consistently been made to the Executive, that is of great concern. The stalemate has been going on for far too long and needs to be addressed as soon as possible. It is incumbent on the Department to engage with the legal professions to find a satisfactory resolution, and I urge the Minister of Justice to do just that.

Given the reduced pressure, the Department has been able to manage legal aid funding within its 2015-16 budget allocation due to a range of proactive savings and reductions in other areas, particularly from the PSNI, which committed to finding in-year budget cuts of 2.5% that provided savings of £22.6 million. That has meant that the Department has been able to fund all identified pressures and achieve a lower cost trajectory for any further reductions in baseline budgets in 2016-17.

The Police Service of Northern Ireland savings have been achieved largely as a result of capital investment in transport and accommodation, which has provided efficiencies, and a reduced number of police officers compared to the target figures, as recruitment is scheduled for 2016 rather than earlier in the financial year. Whilst the PSNI achieved those savings in 2015-16, its budget is still under considerable pressure, particularly given the need to maintain police officer numbers in line with the findings of the resilience review.

Whilst the decision to limit reductions to its core budget in 2016-17 to 2% and the provision of an additional £32 million for security funding from the Fresh Start Agreement are welcome, the police have outlined a range of likely impacts as a result of the 2016-17 budget allocation. The Committee will have an opportunity to discuss the PSNI budget and financial challenges with the Chief Constable when he appears in front of the Committee later this month. We will be looking to him to explore the options for availing of shared services as a means of reducing costs further in the PSNI budget.

Turning to the Vote on Account, the aims of the Department of Justice are, amongst other things, to prevent crime and reduce the risks of reoffending. The Committee met with the Minister of Justice last week to discuss the funding for voluntary and community organisations, particularly those that work with high-risk offenders in the community to reduce the risk of reoffending and help keep communities safer and that are delivering core services. The funding for such organisations is being reduced again in the 2016-17 financial year, and whilst the Committee appreciates the pressures faced by the justice budget, the proposed reductions are still a large decrease to relatively small amounts of funding.

Of more concern to the Committee is the fact that the reductions appear to have been decided without any proper assessment of the need for the services, the impact of the voluntary organisations reducing or being unable to provide the services and, if that happens, what the alternative delivery mechanism is and how much it will cost.

In relation to the 2015-16 budget, the Committee raised similar concerns and expressed the view that the closure or reduction of services provided by a range of voluntary and community organisations to address offending behaviour and provide support services to prevent or reduce the occurrence of reoffending and assist in rehabilitation would very likely result in increased costs elsewhere in the system, namely for the PSNI, the courts and, ultimately, the Prison Service.

The Committee believes that an approach to cutting spending that does not include a cost-benefit analysis and an analysis of the likely impact on, and cost to, other areas of the criminal justice system is a false economy and a flawed basis on which to proceed. The Committee continues to be concerned about the approach being adopted to reducing such budgets without proper analysis and discussion on the policy implications and the likely impact, and it will no doubt wish to highlight that as a key area to be scrutinised by the next Justice Committee.

Other areas of the budget that will require close monitoring include the Court Service and the Northern Ireland Prison Service. The Minister's statement to the Assembly earlier today outlined a number of court closures and the potential detrimental impact on court users and on the administration of justice, which, of course, the Lord Chief Justice has highlighted on a number of occasions. The Committee has concerns regarding the Minister's decisions, particularly in the absence of any plans to modernise court operations and improve the facilities that remain, which are already under pressure to cope with the volume of business.

The Committee has said, on many occasions, that the current court estate is not fit for purpose. Reducing the number of courthouses would, I think, strike some resonance with the public if there was additional money to upgrade the remaining courts, but that does not seem to be the case. Therefore, the public will find it difficult to see the rationale for closing courts for such a minimum saving.

In relation to the Prison Service, the difficulties, particularly with Maghaberry Prison, have been well aired over the past months. There are clearly issues with staffing levels there, and the need to replace and refurbish accommodation has been ongoing for a considerable time. The capital funding provided for 2016-17 is welcome, but difficult decisions will still have to be made on what the priority projects will be.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker, I will leave it at that point. I look forward to going into some of those areas in some depth tomorrow during the Budget debate.

Ms Hanna: I welcome the opportunity to take part in the debate as SDLP finance spokesperson and a new member of the Finance and Personnel Committee. The spring Estimates before us today are unique in these islands in that they are just a one-year Budget — and a one-year Budget that is being proposed by accelerated passage on the back of a partial two-party deal that has by no means got consensus in the House. I think that, procedurally, that represents a failure in the Budget system.

I think that this is the only governmental institutional on the islands that does not have an annual budgetary process, and we do not think that this system is serving Northern Ireland well. In part, that is why we voted against the 2011 Budget and the various subsequent adjustments. It is not, as many in the Chamber have tried to imply, that we are opposed to allocating money to Departments and the functions they perform but that we recognise the failures of the process. It does not mean that we do not want money to be spent in health, education and culture; we want more scrutiny over a Budget that is amounting to almost £16 billion. As we will debate further today and, again, tomorrow, at the Second Stage of the Budget Bill, we have a number of concerns with the allocations in the Estimates.

Obviously, we cannot blame the Ministers unreservedly in this regard, due to the long delay to get even partial agreement at Stormont House. We know that they were given very little time to bring forward their spending allocations to DFP. The almost inevitable result is that there are inconsistent increases and a number of unexplained cuts. In the period between the Main Estimates last year and the spring Estimates that we have in front of us, many allocations were not scrutinised by the relevant Committees. That diminishes the role of this body, and it diminishes the role, scrutiny and transparency that we are elected and paid to provide.

One worrying example that we notice is an increase in the OFMDFM support for government fund of £231,000, which takes it to £13.8 million. This means that we have allocated more money within OFMDFM to support government and administration than we have, for example, for the Victims and Survivors Service.

There is also £16 million for the Strategic Investment Board. During the debate last month, I listened to a Member opposite give a very strong defence of a £2 million project in his constituency that was funded by the Strategic Investment Board. So, this is not an attack, necessarily, on the work provided and carried out through funds like this. Rather, I am pointing out the need to have much greater transparency and scrutiny over amounts of that size.

Further, I think it is worthwhile to note that, in a climate of efficiencies across every public, private and voluntary sector body, the administration budget for OFMDFM has risen by 23% since 2012-13. We cannot consent to further administrative increases without knowing exactly what they are going to be used for. In the Finance and Personnel Committee transcript that I read, they are down as briefings and policy assistance. That is not enough detail.

I want to turn to the proposed SDLP amendment, which was not taken. We proposed to extract £880,000 from the OFMDFM government support silo —

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I ask the Member not to speak about an amendment that was not accepted by the Speaker.

8.30 pm

Ms Hanna: OK. I will address a suggestion that might be made to extract money from administrative support to put into delivery. The amount projected to be required to maintain funding for the Women's Centre Childcare Fund is £880,000. The fund was established in 2007 and is due to run out of money at the end of next month. The money currently allocated to administration in the Estimates could secure up to 100,000 two-hour childcare slots that would remove a financial burden from working families, help with child development through structured play and help more women back into the workplace. Instead, we have spent it on administration. OFMDFM is supposed to lead on a childcare strategy, but the Department has become a black hole: it is all input and very little output. It is where strategies linger, consultations drag on and delivery is, in most cases, an eventuality, not a constant reality.

There are inconsistencies in areas other than OFMDFM. In DEL, there has been a substantial reduction in employment and skills funding and a significant cut in student support and postgraduate awards. I expect that there was an anticipated reduction in the student support required due to university places being cut, but we cannot understand the scale of the reduction. Much has been said in the Chamber and in Budget debates about the need to prepare properly for the much heralded reduction in corporation tax in 2018, but the SDLP has maintained that we have to invest properly in skills training if our workforce is to have any chance of aligning with the demands and needs of foreign direct investment and the new job opportunities that it could create. We recognise that there has been an extra allocation of £5 million for skills in the 2016-17 Budget, but the spring Estimates include a £10 million reduction in funding for employment and skills. These are contradictory points, and we cannot laud a £5 million increase while cutting £10 million. In skills investment, it is a case of robbing Peter to pay Paul.

In last month's debate, there was a good illustration of the point that we need more clarity on and scrutiny of the Budget. The education budget has been given an overall allocation of £1.9 billion but with little or no detail of where, how and why that will be spent. In an ideal world, we would trust the leadership and direction of a Department of that scale. However, when we look, for example, at the confused and discriminatory policy on teacher training redundancies, which means, we think, a short-term gain but a very long-term detriment, we are not content to sign that budget over without a more detailed breakdown of how the money will be spent.

There is the same lack of clarity on infrastructure. We were told that there would be £1.1 billion for the A5 and A6. We have seen where the £100 million up front from the Stormont House Agreement will be spent, but not how that shortfall will be made up. We asked about that in January and still do not have an answer. We are in a state of uncertainty and perpetual flux.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I ask the Member to conclude her remarks.

Ms Hanna: Reducing the number of Departments from 12 to nine presents opportunities, but there are challenges as well. We do not think that this budgetary process gives enough scrutiny or allows Members to properly challenge these budgets.

Mr Cree: Once again, we have the opportunity to address the Supply resolutions, which, as usual, are debated together. The Finance Committee has taken evidence from departmental officials in the last few weeks. The timetable is even tighter this year, and accelerated passage has been agreed. The Chairman covered much of the detail, so I will not go into the specifics of the Committee's work.

The Supply resolution seeks the Assembly's approval of the Executive's final spending plans for 2015-16 as detailed in the spring Supplementary Estimates, which include all the changes agreed at the monitoring rounds and are largely technical in nature. They require Assembly approval and are the final spending plans for the year. The figures in the Supply resolution and the Budget Bill are the same as those in the corresponding spring Supplementary Estimates. Both are routine requirements at this stage of the financial year to obtain legislative Assembly authority for spending resources and associated cash requirements for the revised 2015-16 position. The Vote on Account is needed to ensure that the flow of cash continues to Departments and authorises spending for the early months of the new financial year. It was around 45%, but I notice that that figure has been removed. Is the Minister satisfied that there is adequate cover until July 2016?

It is not an ideal situation when we have to approve a significant proportion of the Budget but are unable to scrutinise the detail. That problem and many others could be resolved by the adoption — I will try it one more time — and implementation of a modern financial process similar to the one that was approved by the House several years ago. Mr Principal Deputy Speaker, as you will remember, the Executive have still to make a decision on that. I feel like John the Baptist: a voice crying in the wilderness.

The Public Prosecution Service has an indebtedness of £6 million arising from an equal pay and indirect discrimination case in 2013-14. A Supply resolution for an Excess Vote is before us today and will have to be approved, but I want the Minister to clarify why, as the ruling was decided on 19 March 2014, it was not brought forward before now. I would have thought that it would have been dealt with some time in 2014-15.

I want to ask the Minister a few questions about the spring Supplementary Estimates. The voluntary exit scheme anticipated significant savings in the current year against the utilisation of up to £200 million, and the Minister touched on that. How successful has the scheme been? Has it achieved the planned target? Are the savings for the next Budget year secure? Are any further tranches included in the various Budget projections? I notice that there are two easements in his Department's figures from VES: is that correct? There are two in the table.

The Minister recently confirmed that no overcommitment was contained in the current Budget. I notice that there is a considerable amount of capital allocation in easements. As it is rather late in the year, is he satisfied that those will happen according to plan and that no moneys will be returned to the Treasury? Financial transactions capital of £96 million has been allocated to the Department for Social Development as an in-year change. Will the Minister assure the House that those are actual projects that will be carried out? FTC seems to be used like pass the parcel between Departments. The existing Budget recognised that investment in infrastructure was a key driver of economic growth, and £100 million was included for that purpose. It is difficult to see whether that money has been spent. Will the Minister confirm that, and, if so, did it achieve the planned result of providing direct economic benefits to facilitate growth?

I also notice that the Public Accounts Committee reported last week on two further Excess Votes in 2014-15 amounting to over £69 million. The Northern Ireland Assembly Commission breached its net resource limit by £950,000, and the Department of Finance and Personnel did so by £68.33 million. Will the Minister explain from which reserve that money was taken — indeed, if it has been paid — and when the motion for the Supply resolution will be brought before the House? He will remember that, at the final stage of this year's Budget, the Executive had set aside £133.2 million to cover increased costs arising from the revaluation of public-sector pension schemes. A reduction in the pressure of £10.7 million was obtained. Is the valuation of the pension schemes now correct, and did the £68.33 million that I referred to play any part in that matter? Pensions are a major cost, and we cannot continue to have unexpected additional charges each year.

Mrs Cochrane: I welcome the opportunity to speak on the 2015-16 spring Supplementary Estimates and the Supply resolution for the 2016-17 Vote on Account. As we approach the end of the mandate, it is a shame that we still have not moved on with the reform of the financial process and that the Finance Committee's report, which made many recommendations, seems to be gathering dust on a shelf somewhere. I will not dwell on that and will pay heed to the Minister's reminder to stick to the motions that are before us this evening.

Mr Cree said that he feels like John the Baptist: I feel somewhat like a parrot, in that most of my points and queries have been raised by others. Others have explained how, at this stage of the year, the Estimates include all the changes from the monitoring rounds and are largely technical in nature. Essentially, the spring Supplementary Estimates show how the Main Estimates have evolved through the year, and the Assembly must now give the final sign-off.

Others have said that the Vote on Account, which is needed to ensure that Departments have the authority to spend at the start of the 2016-17 financial year, normally provides 45% of what a Department needs to get through to the Main Estimates approval process in June. This year, however, it is slightly more complex, with the existing 12-Department structure in place until the transfer of functions order in May, when the nine-Department structure becomes a reality. The Vote on Account percentage this year has been increased to give sufficient cover and manage any anomalies should they arise. While it is not an ideal process, it is one that we accept because of the changing circumstances.

We also have the matter of the Excess Votes before us. It is not a position that any Department or public body would wish to find itself in. However, I understand that, due to the timing of an employment tribunal, the PPS was unable to bid for funding in those monitoring rounds and, as a result, breached its annually managed expenditure allocation. The Public Accounts Committee looked at that and recommended that this be approved, and Alliance is willing to accept that proposal.

The Alliance Party wants to see a prosperous, sustainable and ambitious society in which there is opportunity for all. Our Ministers voted against the Budget when it was before the Executive as they did not think that it was strategic enough to deliver our aspirations for Northern Ireland. In tomorrow's Budget Bill debate, I will take more time to lay out some food for thought on how we could make our Budget more effective. For now, however, I will support the mainly technical motions before us.

Mr McCausland (The Chairperson of the Committee for Culture, Arts and Leisure): It is a pleasure to speak as Chair of the Culture, Arts and Leisure Committee to make some initial remarks and subsequently to make some personal remarks as well.

The members of the Committee have looked at the budgets and have ongoing concerns about the adequacy of the finance for culture, arts and leisure. The Department is one of the smallest, and so is its budget, but we believe that it contributes much to the quality of life of people in Northern Ireland, to the sense of well-being, to health and to the economy and tourism. The Department covers areas of arts with the Arts Council; funding for the national museums and other museums; sports, through Sport NI; and languages. Members noted that there was pressure on budgets in a number of areas. There is a need for a dedicated art gallery and to redevelop Belfast Central Library, which is a regional library for Northern Ireland. They noted the inadequacy of provision at the Ulster Museum to display all the art that should be on display. They also noted, for example, that two vessels at the Ulster Folk and Transport Museum had been awaiting refurbishment for almost 40 years, so there are a lot of things that we see as pressures, and there is a concern about that.

Speaking in a personal capacity, I and, I think, most members of the Committee find it difficult to monitor and scrutinise the finances of the Department because of the way that it operates. The word "inescapable" has taken on a new definition. It normally means contractual commitments or a health and safety issue, but in the case of DCAL it seems to mean whatever the Minister wants it to mean. It reminds us a wee bit of the children's story where the character said, "Words mean what I want them to mean". There is also a large element of "ad hoc-ery" in the Department, whereby things are not really handled in a strategic way. That makes it difficult to monitor and scrutinise the finances and budgets. Programmes have been funded that have been neither advertised nor announced to enable applications to be made.

Mr McKay spoke about the need for a fresh start and a fair start. "A fair start" is a good phrase, but, sadly, it has been lacking in the area of culture, arts and leisure. We saw earlier this year the Minister carry out what can only be described as a smash-and-grab raid to fund her personal preferences and, in so doing, smash and grab money from long-established and well-performing arts organisations across Northern Ireland. Then, when there was an outcry, we saw her backfilling that money with other money but still keeping the money that she had smashed and grabbed to fund her pet projects, such as her cultural programme and so on.

8.45 pm

The work of the Committee has also been heavily dominated by our inquiry into emergency exiting at Casement Park, which has taken up considerable time and raises concerns about budget lines in regard to the delivery of a stadium in due course. There are concerns about the difficulties faced by the Committee in monitoring and scrutinising the finance of the Department, and, speaking once again on behalf of the Committee, there is a concern about the adequacy of the funding for areas that are sometimes not given the recognition that they should be given. Those are the areas that are contributory to the well-being of society with sport and culture and the arts.

Ms Maeve McLaughlin (The Chairperson of the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety): I welcome the opportunity to address the House as Chair of the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety. The motions, as is stated, deal with the moneys required by Departments for the remainder of the financial year and also the funds needed for the 2016-17 financial year.

We, as a Committee, sincerely hope that the Department of Health will be able to balance the books by 31 March 2016, despite the significant pressures that it faces and not incur an overspend, as was the case a couple of years ago. The motions today also look forward to the budgets for Departments for 2016-17, and the Committee welcomes the additional £128 million allocated to Health. However, even with that increase, the Department will face a difficult year of budgetary pressures. The cost pressures facing the Department continue to increase, year on year. They are roughly running at between 5% and 6% and are typically linked to pay and non-pay inflation, the costs of meeting the healthcare needs of an ageing population, and continued developments in healthcare technologies and treatments. That trend is expected to continue into 2016-17 and, indeed, beyond.

To meet those pressures and to supplement its baseline budget allocation, the Department is attempting to identify savings from trusts, from other arm's-length bodies, and from its own administrative costs. From what we have heard, that will prove difficult, given the savings that have already been made in previous years.

Of key concern to the Committee is how the Department will allocate its budget for 2016-17 across a range of spending areas. Indeed, when officials were before the Committee in January, we directly asked them for information on the Minister's priorities. That information is crucial because, logically, spending decisions should be informed by ministerial priorities. However, officials were able to provide us with only a very broad-brush picture of the Minister's priorities. They told us that the Minister's

"overall aim and vision is to build a world-class health and social care service"

Who would argue with that? They said that he wants to:

"drive up the quality of health and social care for patients, clients and carers, to improve outcomes, to safeguard the vulnerable, and to ensure that patients, clients and carers have the best possible experience in every aspect of their treatment, care and support".

Those are laudable principles; nonetheless, there is no detail on a list of priorities. Nobody could disagree with those high-level objectives, but they provide us with absolutely no detail of how the £4.88 billion will actually be spent in 2016-17. The officials advised us further that the Minister's priorities would be set out in the commissioning plan direction for 2016-17 and, indeed, that a draft of it would be forwarded to the Committee by late January or early February. However, that document has still not been received by the Committee for its consideration. That is extremely disappointing, as the commissioning plan direction should be the key document in setting out the services that the Minister wishes to fund in the coming year.

For example, members of the Committee were very keen to hear how the Department will approach the significant waiting times for elective-care appointments. Officials again could not advise us how much money was going to be allocated to that; they said it would depend on what savings could be found in other areas. In the Committee's eyes, the rationale behind that approach is certainly not clear. Surely if something is a priority, the money should be allocated to it.

Committee members were also concerned that, in the areas where savings would be made, there would be a tendency to look for quick savings, rather than taking a longer-term approach. For example, the Committee was firmly of the view that we did not want to see trusts cutting back on domiciliary care packages as a quick fix to balancing their budgets for 2016-17.

Key questions about the spending plans for 2016-17 remain unanswered — questions that are vital and of interest to Members, healthcare professionals and the wider community. Those are questions such as this: will a pay award be found for nurses within the 2016-17 budget?

To conclude, while the Committee welcomes the additional money allocated to Health, we remain disappointed at the level of detail available on how the Department's budget will be spent.

Mr Wells: First of all, I welcome that we have restricted time on this debate, because I have been here a very long time — I suspect that I have been here since before Ms Hanna was born — and every Budget debate in the 22 years that I have been here has involved a succession of MLAs standing up and pleading for more money for their pet project, their particular Department or some cause that they have been lobbied upon. I suspect that, today and tomorrow, we will have a succession of MLAs standing up and making a speech that, no doubt, will look wonderful in their local newspapers the following week but that will not actually add any light to the proceedings whatsoever.

If somebody stands up and says, "Yes, I want extra expenditure on x, y and z", they will never for one moment suggest where they feel that money will come from. The difficulty is — I do not envy the Minister's situation — that the Budget is fixed; it is allocated to us from Westminster. Whilst we can tinker round the edges in where it is spent, we cannot increase the quantum of that Budget. The actual number of sources that we as an Executive and an Assembly have to increase money are few and far between. Rest assured, if we did try to increase vehicle licensing testing, the regional rate, the charge for the MOT or whatever, there would be an outcry from those very same Members. Even if you doubled some of those sources of income, it would still be a drop in the ocean in comparison with the overall needs of Northern Ireland.

I believe that, as an Assembly, we need to mature. There is no sense in standing up and saying, "More money for my project", if you are not prepared to say where you want that money to come from. We have been here 17 or 18 years in this Assembly's present format, and I think that we need to exercise a degree of maturity. I have seen this now from both sides. I have been banished to the Finance Committee, probably for the rest of my life, for some misdemeanour in the past or in a previous life, but it has not actually been as bad as I assumed it would be. It can be very interesting at times, and it gives MLAs an interesting insight into how budgets work and the pressures upon the Minister of Finance. I certainly found it interesting because I was there at the other side for a very brief period as the Minister of Health. During that period, we had to land the spaceship of expenditure in the DHSSPS on a postage stamp called a neutral budget, and we did it. We did not get any credit for it, but we managed to land a £5 billion budget within one percentage point in income, expenditure and capital. I was expecting at least an OBE for that, but it just did not come. I congratulate the staff who were able to achieve that. I could see from that just how difficult a process it was. Given that it was almost half the entire Budget for Northern Ireland, it was an incredibly difficult process.

We did not run back, cap in hand, to Mrs Foster or Mr Hamilton, or whoever the Finance Minister was, demanding more money; we had to cut our cloth accordingly. It was extremely interesting to see that process in action with such a huge amount. Therefore, I empathise with Mr Storey who is trying to do that with a figure that is slightly double what we had to deal with.

The voluntary exit scheme has been mentioned. I recall at the time when it was introduced that the unions said, "Our members will not be bought. They will not queue up for the money. Our members will be loyal to the Department, and they will not take it". My understanding is that there have been absolutely no difficulties whatsoever in obtaining volunteers coming forward in order to reduce the budgets of the relevant Departments and produce savings. That has been a success, and the savings will accrue in future years. Whilst there may be some concern about who has left and who has not, the reality is that that has been well worth pursuing. That is probably one of the very few instruments that we have to save substantial amounts of money, and it has been very successfully implemented to date.

So, I do not envy the Finance Minister Mr Storey's role at all. There will never be enough money to finance Northern Ireland's needs. It is an impossibility, but the people of Northern Ireland will start to take us seriously when we start to take the really difficult decisions. After almost 18 years, maybe it is time that we sat down and had a look at ourselves and said, "What is best for Northern Ireland?" not, "What is best for my political party or my electorate?".

When we get the election in May out of the way, and we all come back, hopefully, with our substantial majorities, maybe we will feel that we can relax somewhat and start to make those difficult decisions, because we have been reared, to use an Ulsterism, under three decades of direct rule where we could call for the sun, the moon and the stars and blame the direct rule Ministers, confident that we would never have to take any responsibility for their decisions. Those days are over. Devolution is here and here to stay after many crises. Therefore, we are going to have to be much more mature as politicians and take the difficult decisions, and, maybe, come 6 May, we should start to do that.

Mr Ó Muilleoir: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. I am almost worried when I hear Mr Wells talk about how old he is because he is my generation, and if he is not mature by now, there may be a long wait ahead of some of the younger Members. I want to tease a few matters out with the Minister that we can come back to over the next number of hours, but, first, I welcome Claire Hanna to the Finance Committee as my new Deputy Chair. She was at the prayer breakfast in Washington last week praying for a financial bonus. It got mixed up, and the financial bonus was that they made you Deputy Chair of the Finance Committee, which may not be what you had in mind.

In the round, I think that we have taken some difficult decisions in this Budget because the money was not what we wanted. The Budget could not meet all the needs that we identified, and one area where I am content with the settlement, although I would like to see the money increased in the time ahead, is for the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment, where we have managed to set aside £170 million for Invest NI, which is a considerable amount of money to give it the ability to do the job that we want it to do, which is building the economy; £27 million for Tourism NI; £11 million for Tourism Ireland; and a smaller amount of £3 million for InterTradeIreland. The latter two will be more than doubled; twice the money will come in from the South.

One of the questions that we need to ask in the time ahead, as we move towards trying to harmonise corporation tax levels on the island and trying to make that affordable, and it is my conviction that we will be able to do that, is how do we give Invest NI the extra marketing spend to get the message out that countries, especially in North America, should come to this location for optimum investment. We will have to work very hard to prepare for the introduction of a reduced level of corporation tax by skilling up our people and trying to provide more funding for universities, but we also need to put that message out there.

I did not make it to the prayer breakfast, but I made it to Boston at the weekend for a breakfast addressed by Invest NI, and it remains the fact that, no matter how good we are at trying to change the narrative, there is a chasm between many people's perception of this place and the reality. The Minister will have to get his pencil out and put his thinking cap on as to how we give Invest NI that extra boost to their budget in the time ahead. I think that it will have to happen this year if we are going to do a job of selling corporation tax harmonisation in order to attract more investment.

9.00 pm

Mr Wells brought up another point that I would also like to tease out of the Minister. Can the quantum be increased? Having looked at the review of non-domestic rates, it is my belief that there are some who are getting a free ride, particularly in Belfast. I think of those who are sitting on derelict premises and those who are land-banking key sites in Belfast, such as the Sirocco site, which belongs to our friends in Cerberus. There are other sites across the city centre that we would like to see developed that speculators are sitting on. Of course, they pay no rates or taxes on those sites. That is something that we need to correct in the time ahead. The burden needs to be shared out. I look forward to engaging with the Minister and his successor on how exactly we do that.

If it is OK for small cafes such as Kaffe O on the Ormeau Road and the Arcadia deli on the Lisburn Road, or the Cambridge barbers, also on the Lisburn Road, to be carrying a fairly substantial rates burden, the large businesses — I think of the banks that own large sites across the city and of Cerberus and other equity funds — have to start adding to the quantum. We need to say to them that they need to put more money into the kitty and pay their way so that we can ease the burden on other people.

(Mr Speaker in the Chair)

In that respect, I read in the 'Belfast Telegraph' last week that the roof was being removed from Carryduff shopping centre in my constituency, which is, sadly, a veritable ghost town because it is being held by a developer who did not develop it. Of course, the roof being removed pushed out the last business, but, more than that, it is my feeling that parts of the roof were removed because you do not pay rates on buildings with no roof. If that has been done by the owner, it is a very cynical ploy. Our response to whoever is trying to game or play the system to avoid paying their fair share has to be to look at the system. We should say that, even if people take off the rafters to try to avoid their responsibilities and pay half rates for empty premises, we will make sure that they pay something and fulfil their obligations. I look forward to the rest of the debate tonight and tomorrow. I relish the opportunity to get into the issues.

Mr McGlone (The Chairperson of the Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment): Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Mo bhuíochas fosta leis an Aire as an ráiteas a thabhairt os ár gcomhair. When I was listening to the debate earlier and heard all the references to age, I did not know whether it was the Spring Supplementary Estimates or the spring chickens Estimates, but anyway.

The Committee received an oral briefing from DETI officials on the departmental budget at its meeting on 19 January. Officials informed the Committee that cuts to the Invest NI budget reflect a decrease in selective financial assistance in 2016-17 as a result of the impact of a reduction in allowable aid intensity, effective from July 2014. A bid to promote Northern Ireland in the light of the decision to devolve corporation tax was not met, and the Department is aware that that will be an added pressure to be addressed in Invest NI. Invest NI's budget has been cut by 7.1% from the 2015-16 baseline.

In many respects, this year's briefing from the Department was similar to the briefing that was received by the Committee on the budget last year. Last year, officials informed the Committee that the proposed Invest NI allocation meant that the organisation would have to scale back its targets. That was considered a key concern for both Invest NI and DETI, as around 93% of Invest NI's budget was already committed. That would have left little additional funding to attract new investment.

This year, the Committee was told that a significant amount of Invest NI's allocation reflects existing commitments. Officials said that DETI will work with Invest NI to make sure that all commitments for existing agreed projects would be covered through the allocation. They said that DETI is working with Invest NI to ensure that there is an allocation in the budget that would allow it to enter into new commitments if and when they come forward. The Committee was informed that the coming financial year will be challenging for Invest NI and that, if there are new projects that Invest NI is not able to cover from within its budgetary allocation, funding would be raised through in-year monitoring and could be covered "if money was available".

The economy is the number one priority. We are trying to attract inward investment to grow indigenous businesses and create jobs. We will also have corporation tax devolved from April 2018. However, year on year, Invest NI's budget is cut, and officials have informed the Committee that it will have to scale back its targets and that new projects can be covered only if money becomes available. There is no funding available to promote Northern Ireland as a destination for inward investment in a low corporation tax environment. We need to start attracting those businesses now, not in two years after corporation tax has been lowered. We need to have them up and running in two years, actually creating jobs and benefiting from the new tax environment.

That leaves me in a position, as Chair of the Committee, where I have to ask the same two questions that I asked the Finance Minister last year. The Committee has been led to believe that there is a guarantee in place from the Executive — the industrial development guarantee — that no worthwhile proposal for eligible support to economic development or investment would be lost through lack of funding. Will the Minister provide firm assurances that, first, the budget allocation is sufficient to ensure that Invest NI will not have to scale back its targets, and, secondly, that the industrial development guarantee remains steadfastly in place? I would also like to hear the Minister's views on how Northern Ireland can be promoted as a business destination, following the announcement on corporation tax, without any additional funding to do so.

I welcome the announcement from the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment that InterTradelreland is to receive an additional allocation of £206,000 through January monitoring. When the Irish Government match this on a 2:1 basis, the result should be an uplift of £618,000 for the 2016 calendar year. Will the Minister confirm that this is the case? It should be noted, however, that this still represents a cut to InterTradelreland's baseline budget, which has been cut by 30% since 2008. This has happened despite a high and growing demand for its services across the entire island of Ireland, and despite the good work of growing business and increasing exports that everyone recognises it to be doing. Further cuts to InterTradelreland's budget can probably be expected in coming years, as the starting baseline for its 2017 budget will be the original baseline for 2016, not the uplifted budget following the new allocation. This will create further uncertainty for InterTradelreland and, more importantly, will remove and diminish support for the small, growing and fledgling local businesses that rely on its services.

Officials informed the Committee on 19 January that North/South bodies such as InterTradelreland and Tourism Ireland can make bids in the usual way through monitoring rounds. However, with the need to receive match funding from the Irish Government, this could present difficulties because there seems to be no formal mechanism for allocating funding, North and South, through monitoring rounds to synchronise the effects. The Committee understands that InterTradelreland was able to avail itself of January monitoring because its budget is based on the calendar year and that this can be matched by the Irish Government in their 2016-2017 Budget. It is unclear, however — this is the challenge — whether there is a mechanism for match funding through other monitoring rounds. The Committee has commissioned some Assembly research into that, and I will ask the Committee to share that research with other relevant Committees because this will apply not only to InterTradelreland and Tourism Ireland but to all North/South bodies. We need to be absolutely clear about what these bodies can and cannot do to obtain in-year allocations, and subsequently resolve any problems that we identify.

Mr Nesbitt (The Chairperson of the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister):

I thank the Minister of Finance and Personnel for bringing forward the debate on these important issues. The Committee is normally briefed in advance of monitoring rounds, but because of the way in which the rounds took place this year, we had only one advance notice, which was for June monitoring. The updates on the November and January monitoring rounds, or technical exercises, did not come our way until January.

At the June monitoring, the Department declared an easement of £5 million capital for the social investment fund (SIF), advising the Committee that £9.5 million would be sufficient for the commitments for the year. However, a further £7.2 million was returned in November, meaning that £12.2 million of the £15 million capital allocation for SIF had been returned in-year. Officials advised us that this was because the processes to bring projects forward take considerable time. We will continue our scrutiny in that regard in the coming year.

Of the £5 million easement declared for SIF in June, £3.2 million was reallocated to Together: Building a United Community (T:BUC) to provide funding for work towards creating the 10 shared education campuses, the removal of peace walls and the creation of urban villages. Allocations were made in respect of centrally held funds for T:BUC and Delivering Social Change (DSC) in June and further allocations in November and reallocations in January resulted in the full expenditure of £14 million for DSC.

OFMDFM incurred a 7% increase in administration costs, as the Member for South Belfast mentioned, between the opening position and November monitoring. During our briefing on 13 January, the officials advised that the Department has taken on a number of additional significant functions that require administrative support, such as T:BUC, Delivering Social Change and support for the historical institutional abuse inquiry (HIAI).

Committee members were informed that OFMDFM surrendered £1 million resource from the funding for the historical institutional abuse inquiry in the January monitoring position. The Committee sought assurances from the Department that, in future, the HIAI will continue to receive its required resource. At the meeting on 13 January, the departmental officials also addressed the 2016-17 Budget allocation for the new Executive Office. Unfortunately, a breakdown of proposed allocations in the Department and its arm's-length bodies was not available.

Members heard that the Department's key objectives will be to protect programme spend and ensure that the Department's statutory functions are protected. There may be further staffing reductions, but officials believe that these will be achieved through an ongoing embargo on the filling of vacant posts. Members heard that consideration will be given to individual factors affecting the Department's arm's-length bodies, including the extent of reductions to their budgets last year, the impact on statutory functions and the amount of underspend for each body.

While unable to give detailed breakdowns of allocations, officials confirmed that £5 million will be allocated to the historical institutional abuse inquiry and that the Department will meet extra costs should they be required. The inquiry chairman, Sir Anthony Hart, is considering the issue of redress to victims. However, officials advised that there will be no budgeting plans with regard to potential redress until after the inquiry report is finalised.

Officials confirmed that they expect the allocation of £6 million in capital funding to be spent on Urban Village projects, the Ebrington site and Maze/Long Kesh. Financial transactions capital (FTC) of £6 million has also been allocated, and that may be used to develop the Ebrington site, although it is not yet clear whether FTC can be used for that purpose — perhaps the Minister can enlighten us.

A number of funds will be held centrally, including £14 million resource and £15 million capital for Delivering Social Change and the social investment fund. A further

£8 million will be held for Atlantic Philanthropies under the DSC agenda. Twelve million pounds resource is provided for 'A Shared Future' to deliver on the T:BUC strategy and, finally, £30 million for dealing with the past will be held until agreement is reached on how this issue is to be addressed. The Committee is now awaiting clarification on whether this funding can be carried forward should it not be fully utilised in the 2016-17 financial year.

I would now like to make some remarks in a personal capacity. I hope that I will please Mr Wells, as he exits, by not asking for money from somewhere for some sort of a project. In fact, I will do quite the opposite.

I suggest that, when we say that we are going to spend money, we actually spend it. The prime example is the social investment fund. As I said in my remarks as Chair, in this year 81% of the proposed capital allocation was returned, not spent. Indeed, if you look at the Programme for Government, you see that what the Executive promised was that people living in dereliction and deprivation and people living in poverty could expect the Executive to spend £80 million and have it all spent by the end of March last year. Actually, £1.5 million was spent, less than 2% of the budget. Pro rata, that is the equivalent of David Cameron saying to the people of England, "I am going to spend £2.4 billion on poverty". If he spent less than 2%, his backside would not touch the floor on his way out of Downing Street. It would not be tolerable in London, Edinburgh, Cardiff or Dublin, so why is it tolerable in Belfast?

9.15 pm

Mr Wells: The Member knows that any money not spent in-year is returned via the monitoring rounds to other equally deserving projects. The £80 million he talks about was no doubt diverted into Health or Social Development for the alleviation of poverty or to some other needy cause. DUP Finance Ministers have been extremely adept at using monitoring rounds to meet the demands for essential services in-year, so the money has not been lost to the people of Northern Ireland; indeed, it has probably made a major contribution to the alleviation of poverty in Northern Ireland.

Mr Nesbitt: I thank the Member for his intervention. I admire his loyalty to the DUP Ministers, but I put this point to the Member from South Down: we promised people living in poverty that we had £80 million to spend on them, on their poverty, on their deprivation and on their dereliction and that we would do it in a given and published time frame. It was a horrible and a titanic failure, and a little humility might go a long way to restoring the public's faith in this devolved institution.

Very briefly, the other point is that Sir Anthony Hart has made it clear that he will recommend some form of redress for people who were subjected to institutional abuse. Let us remember that there were many people who were subjected to clerical abuse in non-institutional settings. This is a game changer for them. They need their own process, and I urge the Executive to give that urgent consideration.

Mr Speaker: I now call the Minister for Finance and Personnel to respond. You will be aware that you have a significant proportion of your allocated time available. It will be for you to decide whether you need it.

Mr Storey: Thank you Mr Speaker, and I thank you for giving me that bit of latitude on time. I am sure that there are a lot of Members watching this in their offices who will be delighted to know that I have more time because, I think, earlier on, they were taking wagers on how long I would take for my winding-up speech.

The process we are engaged in tonight raises a variety of issues. While I would not call myself a spring chicken, as I was referred to and as some of us were referred to earlier on, I have been in the House long enough to realise that there are no systems that any Government have that are in any way perfect.

If Members would just pause for a moment and reflect on where we have come from as a society, they will see that Northern Ireland today is a different place. As someone who grew up in the Province and has enjoyed his 51 years living here, I realise and recognise that we are in a different place today. My colleague Mr Wells has left the Chamber, but he talked about maturity, and it has been referred to by a number of Members in the past: I think that we are making progress on that issue, but I have to say that there is a great sense of immaturity in parties that are in the Executive — in particular, on this occasion, I refer to the SDLP — voting against the Budget and allowing themselves to have the best of both worlds. Not only do they have the privilege of being in the Executive but they take for themselves the privilege of being in opposition. Really, it is time for the SDLP and others to be honest with the electorate. It will be interesting to see what happens when other parties in the House go to the polls in a few weeks' time. When they are asked at the doors, "Are you going to be in government or in opposition?", maybe political maturity will dawn, and they will at least have the honesty to tell their electorate what faces them.

Returning to the purpose for which we are here this evening, I thank the Members who have contributed and, in particular, those who spoke on behalf of their Committee. I pay tribute to the Committees, whose work indicates to the House the maturity that we have in our process. I was Chair of the Education Committee and, as I said in a previous debate, a member of the Finance Committee. My colleague Mr Wells seemed to think that being put on to the Finance Committee was retribution, but he should know that, when I was appointed Minister of Finance, I wondered whether that was some form of retribution. The Committees have done an immense job. I will not pick out an individual Committee because all have done a job of work. You have only to look at the amount of work that they do in the reports that they produce and the scrutiny that they give. That is to be welcomed, and, as Minister of Finance, I place on record my appreciation of that work.

I will now attempt to respond to the issues raised by Members during the debate. I want, first, to refer to the comments made by the Chair of the Finance Committee, Mr McKay, and say a word of appreciation and thanks to him and the Committee for their work and support during the process that brought the motions before the House. Mr McKay referred to the January technical exercise and the moving of money by the Department. There were 36 technical moves between DFP and other Departments, and the most significant of those was £2.7 million to the Department for Social Development for the Strabane jobs and benefits office.

Mr McKay also referred to the challenge in manufacturing. Like him, I was present at the rally in our constituency on Saturday. I was glad to be there as a public representative. No one can overestimate the sense of loss in Ballymena as a result of the JTI and Michelin announcements. It is a reflection of the calibre of the people of Ballymena and the wider area that they have always risen to challenges and difficulties and have always endeavoured to ensure that, whatever comes their way, they face those difficulties with the fortitude that is at the heart of that community. However, we have to set what has happened in recent days in context.

I do not want in any way to lessen the genuine concerns expressed at the rally, but we have to set them in context. Northern Ireland manufacturing is rich in knowledge, skills and experience, and it is founded on a strong heritage.

It drives exports, research and development, all of which are key to generating wealth. We have seen those two companies do that in Ballymena. I would, however, say this: we need to be careful about the use of the word "crisis". While the focus has been on the big job losses — that is not to lessen them or in any way diminish their impact — it should be noted that some 830 jobs were added during the last quarter of 2015, bringing the total number of manufacturing jobs to over 80,000 for the first time since 2008. I might also refer, for example, to recent announcements, even in my constituency of North Antrim. In my home town of Ballymoney, McAuley Engineering announced some 87 jobs. Not far away, in Kilrea, Hutchinson Engineering made another announcement. We have also had some announcements from Lisburn. Of course, let us not forget what Ballymena has in Wrightbus and the help and support that it is continually given to ensure that it remains at the forefront of bus manufacturing. Local manufacturing output has recovered by almost 20% since its low point in the third quarter of 2009, almost three times the growth of UK manufacturing output over the same period. That sets some context for manufacturing.

The old saying "eaten bread is soon forgotten" is very true. Since the start of this Programme for Government in 2011, Invest Northern Ireland has provided a total of £254.6 million in assistance to manufacturing firms in Northern Ireland, more than to service-based businesses. That gives us some sense not only of the importance that is placed on manufacturing but of the challenges in manufacturing.

I move on to other comments made by Ms Hanna on the one-year Budget and related issues. Of course, the reason for that process is the electoral cycle. It would be unwise to agree a multi-year Budget when we are reducing the number of Departments in May. We have had to take a pragmatic and practical view, so that, when the House returns with a refreshed mandate, those Ministers and Departments will be able to set their priorities for the way they spend their money.

When I was in DSD, I made it clear that the childcare fund was a priority. I went to great lengths to have discussions with my colleague in the Department for Social Development, Lord Morrow, and I believe that the issue will be addressed. It is only right and proper that, until we have agreed the way in which the childcare strategy will be funded, we do not, as it were, pull the rug from under the feet of those who continue to make an invaluable contribution to the provision of childcare. I am quite confident that my colleague Lord Morrow will be able to deal with the concerns adequately.

Ms Hanna also raised concerns about the allocation of an additional £16 million to the Strategic Investment Board. I can assure the Member that this increase in financial allocation was subject to Committee and Executive scrutiny through the normal in-year monitoring process. There were two financial transaction capital allocations totalling £14.5 million for Queen's University Belfast, plus a £2 million allocation for the Urban Villages programme under Together: Building a United Community.

9.30 pm

The Member made reference to the detail in the Budget. Whilst the Budget document did not provide much detail on the Department of Education budget, as expressed by a number of Members, it is expected that this detail will be provided in the summary once the new Education Minister is in place after the May elections. Indeed, it is expected that all new Ministers will have an opportunity to reallocate their Budget allocations internally and that revised positions will be published thereafter. I trust that this will provide the transparency that the Member is seeking.

She also rightly raised the skills agenda, which is an important issue. In the 2016-17 Budget, there was an allocation of an additional £5 million to the Department for the Economy for the skills agenda. As I have already said, I will support a further £20 million being allocated to the skills agenda in the June monitoring round on the return of the new Departments after the election. These allocations will go a long way to addressing the skills agenda.

However, I have to say to the Member that all this comes from a party that voted against a Budget. That party tells us what we ought to do in preparing for corporation tax but was not prepared to support us on the reduction of corporation tax. That highlights again the unfortunate situation that we find ourselves in in the House, where there are those who want to have their cake and eat it. They want to salve their conscience somehow that they have put it up to us. As Mr Wells referred to, they come into this House and tell the Finance Minister and every other Minister about their ills and shortcomings, but they have not been able to identify to the House or the electorate how they would spend the money differently, how they would deal with the political challenges and how they would deal with the crisis. Let us remember that there are parties in the House that had that opportunity when they were in the Executive and these institutions collapsed and collapsed and collapsed —

Ms Hanna: Will the Member give way?

Mr Storey: That is the difference between the current Executive and the one that her party was part of. Yes.

Ms Hanna: Tomorrow, we will outline that. Today, we are addressing the deficits and the failures in this Budget, as is appropriate when dealing with the spring Estimates. Tomorrow, we will set out some alternatives with the limited information. Does the Member agree that part of the reason for the failure in the initial years was that the two parties that are now leading the Executive did everything in their power to pull down and wreck the power-sharing institutions in the first two to 10 years of their existence?

Mr Storey: No, what my party was engaged in was ensuring that we got a fair deal and a better position to build for the future than an infrastructure that could not give us the stability that we now have. I will speak only for my own party; it is up to others to say what they did. Let us remember that, while we have made progress, there is still much more to be done, but it is immensely better than where we were previously when we had the SDLP and the Ulster Unionist Party in power. Of course, the proof of that is that, in successive elections, the people of Northern Ireland have said who they prefer to have governing. I have no doubt that, come the election in May, the people of Northern Ireland will give their verdict yet again. As a democrat, I will accept their verdict because, ultimately, they are the people whom we are here to serve.

I welcome the fact that the Member is now on the Finance Committee. I trust that she will continue to make a positive contribution, along with her colleagues, and that, collectively, we will endeavour to bring to Northern Ireland days of better prosperity and better outcomes.

Let me move on to my friend, Mr Leslie Cree. One thing that you can always be sure about is that he will ask very specific and pointed questions. That is appropriate and right; it is what the process is about. He raised a number of issues, and I will try to go through them. If I do not cover them all, I promise that we will pick them up in Hansard and reply to you in writing. He made reference to the Vote on Account and said that he had concerns about whether there was sufficient cover. In order to ensure sufficient cover for resource and cash, it is necessary to increase the Vote on Account over some Departments. That is what we have done. It will help to minimise any risk of Departments running out of cash in the first part of the 2016-17 financial year. That is an issue. I appreciate the concern that he has. That is why it has moved from somewhere in the region of the 45% that we would normally have to nearer 69% or 70%. We have to have a degree of flexibility. We appreciate that there will be a greater demand in some Departments, given the nature of the business that they are engaged in. However, we have it adequately covered. I am reasonably confident about what we have done in that regard.

He made reference as well to the delay in bringing forward the PPS and the 2013-14 Excess Vote. That was also raised by some other Members. I will take some time to set that in context. The fair employment tribunal did not announce its judgement until 19 March 2014. That meant that the PPS was unable to secure the required funding through in-year monitoring, and thus it breached its budget provision for 2013-14. As per the process, the PPS wrote to DFP Supply and the NIAO to notify them of the breach. A breach of any of the budgetary control limits or the cash limit results in the need for expenditure to be regularised through the Assembly Excess Vote process. The Public Accounts Committee scrutinises the reasons behind each Department's excess of allocated resources and reports to the Assembly on whether it has any objections to making good the reported excesses. Once the Committee has reported, a Statement of Excess will be presented to the Assembly to be voted into the Budget Act. The passing of that Act authorises the additional grant by the Assembly to regularise the excess incurred by the Department.

The Public Accounts Committee completed its report in March 2015 and recommended that the Assembly agree the additional funds. Following that, DFP Supply put forward the Excess Vote to the Assembly, and so the 2015 spending review announced by the UK Chancellor on 25 November 2015 set out the Government's long-term economic plan in relation to that. I trust that we have covered the rationale as to why it was necessary for us to do it in that particular way.

Mr Cree raised an important point about the Northern Ireland Civil Service voluntary exit scheme (VES) and asked about the benefits that can be delivered through it. I assure the Member that the objective of the exit scheme is to deliver an immediate and permanent pay bill reduction that is necessary to allow Departments to live within their 2015-16 Budget allocations and beyond. The scheme business case estimated a reduction of about 2,551 full-time equivalent posts, which is about 11% of posts in the Northern Ireland Civil Service, delivering a pay bill saving of about £94 million a year. I think that that is a significant amount of savings. I pay tribute to all those who have been involved in the process. It has been challenging, and I am well aware of the challenges that there have been. I have to say, however, that I have been pleased by the very small number of issues that have been raised. Obviously, in a process like this, when you are dealing with a considerable number of people, you will find that particular issues are raised from time to time. However, in the overall scheme of things, having got to where we now are and having had this success, I think it is something to be welcomed. To have the £94 million a year pay bill saving is of benefit to the overall financial position of the Executive.

He also raised the Budget exchange carry forward and the financial transactions capital. As always, we aim to remain within the Budget exchange scheme limits, and, this year, those amount to some £59.5 million for the resource, £9.6 million for capital DEL and £1.9 million for financial transactions capital. I confirm that all the financial transactions capital has been allocated and that no funding will be returned to Her Majesty's Treasury.

Let me move on to the issues that were raised by the Chair of the Health Committee. She raised a number of issues on the detail of the Health budget, and while I will not attempt to respond to all the issues raised, I assure her that my colleague the Health Minister and I agree that our staff in the health service are our greatest asset in delivering health and social care. I think that goes without saying, but it needs to sometimes be rehearsed and reiterated because, in the midst of all the toing and froing that goes on in the Chamber and in the public debate on our health service, we could easily lose sight of the importance of our staff and the service that they deliver to us as a community and as the people of Northern Ireland on a day and daily basis.

While the Health Minister fully recognises the hard work and contribution to health and social care of all staff, his first priority is to protect front-line services and ensure that they are properly staffed to secure the provision of safe and effective services. I believe that the Health Minister made a statement to the House on 8 January 2016 setting out the 2015-16 pay award for health and social care staff. That will allow for a 1% non-consolidated payment for staff at the top of their pay band and an average spine point rise of 3.7% for those not at the top of their pay band. Salaried doctors and dentists at the top of their pay band will also receive the 1% payment.

The Health Minister is aware of the RCN decision to ballot its members in Northern Ireland for industrial action, and he is, of course, disappointed by it. While the right of members to take industrial action is fully recognised, it is regrettable that we get to the stage of industrial action on these issues.

Reform across the health service and the social care services is ongoing, and I remind Members that Transforming Your Care is not about reducing our investment in health and social care services; it is about making the best use of the resources that are available to us.

That leads me on to the comments that were made by my colleague Mr Wells, who gave us all a reality check. We have to live within our means. As Finance Minister, I would like to be in the position to give more resource to Departments. However, we have to recognise that, as a devolved Administration within the United Kingdom, we are the recipients of what comes to us from the Government at Westminster. We have to then make choices.

When speaking to some at the rally in Ballymena on Saturday, I said that we all will have to live with the consequences of our decisions. I have no doubt that there are decisions that parties will have advocated and been seen as the champion of, but on which, in the cold light of day, they would have preferred to have made other choices. However, we are all subject to the choices that we have made, and we, therefore, have to live within the means that are at our disposal.

9.45 pm

I have to say that Mr Wells has a better prospect than Mr Cree. Mr Cree made reference to the fact that he thought that he was maybe John the Baptist. I remind Mr Cree in a very friendly way that John the Baptist was beheaded. I trust that that is not the fate of my friend Mr Cree.

I move now to the comments of Mr Ó Muilleoir. I welcome those comments; I will come on to some of them in a minute or two, particularly those in relation to Invest NI. Let me deal with the business rates review, first. The Member raised the issue of the business rates and an issue that, for many of us, is always prevalent in our constituencies — derelict sites. My Department is engaged in a comprehensive review of the area, which was the subject of a 12-week public consultation process. The consultation lasted for a period of 12 weeks up until 25 January, but I said that I would not be prescriptive about that if other comments came in after that. During that time, we have sought the views of interested parties and invited them to provide their views on the future direction of business rates in Northern Ireland. The review has been wide-ranging. The aim is to focus on how best to raise revenue from the business community in Northern Ireland. It will include consideration of the current system of rating relief and exemptions. My Department is also keen to understand whether there are any other forms of taxation that could be used to replace or supplement a portion of the revenue that is currently raised from the rates. That debate has commenced. We have had a number of public events at which views have been expressed. This is not a vain, empty consultation process; it is a genuine attempt to ensure that we get the best possible outcome and an agreed process on that issue. It is important that we get an agreed way forward to deal with an issue that is prevalent in our constituencies.

The Member also raised the Invest Northern Ireland budget. He welcomed the budget that was available to Invest. I share the Member's views that that is money well spent. Invest Northern Ireland's 2015-16 mid-year performance update highlighted the outstanding progress that was made, with the agency on course to exceed the majority of its corporate plan targets by 31 March 2016. The Member will also recognise that skills investment is vital to our economic development and note that, in addition to the additional £5 million that was made available to the new Department for the Economy as part of the 2016-17 Budget process, a further £20 million will be made available for the area as part of the June monitoring round. Of course, he made reference to the ability of Invest to be able to market and promote. I would be very sympathetic to looking at that element of the Invest budget for promoting, particularly in relation to being prepared for the introduction of corporation tax.

On that issue, the Member will be aware that, in his constituency today, I had the pleasant opportunity to make an announcement regarding the investment that has been made by Alert Logic, in what is a growing portfolio of global ICT firms choosing to establish their offices here in Northern Ireland. The company is expanding. Its decision to locate in Northern Ireland will contribute a total investment of £3.9 million into the local economy. Of those 88 jobs, 30 people are already in post and the remainder will be in post by the end of 2017. That has been done and delivered by Invest NI prior to the introduction of reduced corporation tax. Let us remember that the average salary of those who will be employed is £44,000, contributing, as I said, nearly £4 million annually in salaries to the local economy. That is success in another growing element of the economy. Invest NI needs to be given every encouragement and support to continue the good work that it has done.

Let me turn to the comments made by the Chair of the Committee for the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister. He referred to the fact that funding had been returned to central funds during the monitoring round. That is exactly the purpose of the monitoring rounds; to reallocate funding. It ensures that no funding is lost and that we make good use of all our resources. I know that he raised particular issues as to why certain things were not achieved. However, with regard to overall control of the budgetary process, these monitoring rounds are important. There are issues that we need to ensure that we keep constantly under review. I heard the comments about the process of looking at the overall way in which the Budget is delivered to the House and through the Assembly. Monitoring rounds are an important element of what we do so that we can re-evaluate, recycle and reallocate the resources that are available to us.

Therefore —

Mr Lyons: Will the Member give way?

Mr Storey: I will give way, yes.

Mr Lyons: The Minister has been talking about the importance of monitoring rounds. They are very important and have been in previous years when there has been an overcommitment in the Budget. Surely it is worth mentioning that this Budget is balanced; there is no overcommitment and that gives us even more scope in monitoring rounds to give money to those Departments that are in need.

Mr Storey: I thank the Member for his comments.

Obviously, I am endeavouring to do what I can to ensure that that is the case.

As I conclude, I remind Members of this: had we not got to the place where we now are with the Budget process, many Members in the House would not be here today. In fact, I doubt whether there would be devolution. I think that we would have seen the process come to end. However, good sense prevailed, and we have been able to find ourselves in the position that we are in today.

I want to thank —

Mr Nesbitt: I thank the Minister for giving way. I just want to assure him that I am as glad as he is that we have monitoring rounds to ensure that moneys that cannot be spent for whatever good reason are not lost. Would he express any regret whatsoever that 98% of the social investment fund was not spent in the allocated time as defined in the Programme for Government?

Mr Storey: I thank the Member for that. Obviously, I would like to see processes in place so that, when money is allocated, we are able to deliver what the allocation was for. However, with regard to the particular issue of SIF and the challenges that there have been, sometimes those challenges are not always within the control of the Executive or sponsoring Department with responsibility for particular amounts of money. Unfortunately, we then find ourselves in situations where planning issues and other practical issues come along that become an impediment and a hindrance to the way in which we would have originally intended the money to be spent.

I share the Member's concern, and I have to say that all Departments need to make every effort to have the allocations delivered in the budgetary framework we have set. However, I will put in the caveat that that is sometimes not possible because of other pressures that are brought to bear from without in trying to deliver these issues.

I have been in some areas recently to see the moneys that have been delivered to projects, and it has been worthwhile to see some of them on the ground. SIF has made significant progress, with commitments in the region of £58 million, and 25 projects have been delivered and are now well under way. If you go to the areas where those projects are being delivered — I am sure that the Member has visited some of them — people will tell you about the benefit they see as a result of the money that has come from government.

I will bring my remarks to a conclusion. I ask Members to support the motions on the 2015-16 spring Supplementary Estimates, the 2016-17 Vote on Account and the 2013-14 Excess Vote.

Mr Speaker: Before we proceed to the Question, I remind Members that the vote on the motion requires cross-community support.

Question put and agreed to.

Mr Speaker: We now move to the motion on the Vote on Account, which has already been debated. I remind Members that this vote also requires cross-community support.

Mr Speaker: We now move to the motion on the Excess Vote, which has already been debated. I remind Members that this vote also requires cross-community support.

Resolved (with cross-community support):

That this Assembly approves that resources, not exceeding £6,031,448.89 be authorised for use by the Public Prosecution Service for Northern Ireland for the year ending 31 March 2014, as summarised in Part II of the 2013-14 Statement of Excesses that was laid before the Assembly on 2 February 2016. — [Mr Storey (The Minister of Finance and Personnel).]

Budget Bill: First Stage

Mr Storey (The Minister of Finance and Personnel): I beg to introduce the Budget Bill (Northern Ireland) 2016 [NIA 77/11-15], which is a Bill to authorise the issue out of the Consolidated Fund of certain sums for the service of the years ending 31 March 2016 and 2017; to appropriate those sums for specified purposes; to authorise the Department of Finance and Personnel to borrow on the credit of the appropriated sums; to authorise the use for the public service of certain resources for the years ending 31 March 2016 and 2017; and to revise the limits on the use of certain accruing resources in the year ending 31 March 2016.

Bill passed First Stage and ordered to be printed.

Mr Speaker: I am satisfied that the Bill is within the legislative competence of the Assembly, and I can inform Members that confirmation has been received from the Chairperson of the Committee for Finance and Personnel, in accordance with Standing Order 42(2), that the Committee is satisfied that there has been appropriate consultation with it on the public expenditure proposals in the Bill and that the Bill can, therefore, proceed under the accelerated passage procedure.

10.00 pm

Health and Social Care (Control of Data Processing) Bill: Final Stage

Mr Hamilton (The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety): I beg to move

That the Health and Social Care (Control of Data Processing) Bill [NIA Bill 52/11-16] do now pass.

The main purpose of the Bill is to provide a clear, statutory framework with robust and stringent safeguards that will enable the use of Health and Social Care information that identifies individuals to be used for health or social care purposes that are in the public interest. The Bill will allow the potential benefits of using information to be realised, while safeguarding the interests of the individual, the health and social care sector as guardians of the information and information users. It will enable my Department to establish a robust, transparent and open process that will ensure that information is shared in very limited and strictly controlled circumstances for health or social care purposes that are clearly in the public interest. Any use of information must also still comply with the requirements of the Data Protection Act 1998 and the Human Rights Act 1998. In bringing forward the Bill, I seek to remove the ambiguity that surrounds the use of information for purposes other than direct care and, in so doing, safeguard the patient, their information, the health and social care sector and the information user.

During the passage of the Bill, I was greatly encouraged by the welcome given to it by individuals and organisations. The Bill has attracted widespread support, and it is maybe worthwhile reminding ourselves of some of the views expressed. This is a significant opportunity to secure the continued future of two key registers — the Northern Ireland Cancer Registry and the Cerebral Palsy Register — within a robust legal framework. It is imperative that this primary legislation is passed so that the true burden of health and social care can be captured and planned for. This will enable the work of monitoring cancer to continue while supporting research into the causes and outcomes of cancer. It will enable benchmarking of our care and survival nationally and internationally and, ultimately, improve care for patients.

Northern Ireland is excluded from participation in national audits due to a lack of a legislative framework for secondary users of data. As a result, it is not possible to compare healthcare outcomes in Northern Ireland with those in other nations. These positive messages of support mirror the response to the public consultation exercise that was undertaken during the summer of 2014, when 94% of respondents indicated that they agreed with the Department's proposals to introduce the legislation. That widespread support has been very encouraging to me during the passage of the Bill, and I thank all who took the time to contribute to the debate as the Bill made its way through the House.

Ms Maeve McLaughlin (The Chairperson of the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety): Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. On behalf of the Committee, I welcome the Final Stage of the Bill.

The objective of the Bill, as the Minister has outlined, is to provide a clear, statutory framework for sharing identifiable information for secondary uses. The Committee is content that, after having gone through the amending stages, the Bill will meet that objective. Most importantly, it will have stringent safeguards that will go a long way to protect individuals' information and privacy and ensure that those who have access to such information do all that is required of them to process it properly and, indeed, protect it.

This Bill has been significantly improved and strengthened by the amendments that the Health Committee persuaded the Department to make and by the two substantial amendments that the Committee itself made. I thank the Minister for his cooperation and approach and for taking the majority of the recommendations from the Committee on board.

A number of amendments that were made deserve particular mention because of their significance in making the Bill a more robust piece of legislation.

One of the main issues for the Committee was the definition of "public interest". Stakeholders and members agreed that the definition was far too wide. The Bill, as introduced, appeared to give the impression that two separate issues were going on: processing information for health and social care purposes and processing information that was in the public interest. The Committee was particularly concerned about the potential for sharing information on the grounds that it was in the public interest without any health or social care purpose. The Committee raised its concerns with the Department, and, in response, the Department proposed an amendment to make it clear that sharing would not be permissible solely on the basis of public interest; rather, all uses must be connected to a health and social care purpose.

The Committee and stakeholders also had concerns about the breadth of the term "social well-being", which cannot be easily defined. The Committee wrote to the Department to ask whether it would be prepared to remove the term "social well-being" and replace it with "social care", which is already defined in the Health and Social Care (Reform) Act 2009. The Department proposed the amendment, which, again, was very much welcomed by the Committee.

Throughout Committee Stage, members raised significant concerns that the Bill did not provide a mechanism to allow individuals to opt out of having their personal information shared for secondary processing purposes. It was the Committee's view that there should be a robust and clear mechanism to allow people who do not want that information shared in any circumstances to have that wish complied with. The Committee tabled an amendment to put opt-out provision in the Bill. Although the Minister was not prepared to support the Committee's amendment at Further Consideration Stage, he made a commitment that the Department would work with the Committee to strengthen opt-out provisions via secondary legislation. The Committee's amendment, however, means that the authorising committee established by the Bill will not be able to authorise the processing of a person's confidential information if the person has opted out.

Important amendments were also made about the authorising committee, which is the committee that is now established to authorise the processing of confidential information. The Committee was firmly of the view that the establishment of the committee should be mandatory. Members felt that that safeguard was of the utmost importance in ensuring that confidential information was protected and that due process was followed when applications were received and considered. The Committee was also concerned that the regulations to be made by the Department under the Bill did not have to specify that a person's confidential information could be processed only if authorisation was granted by the authorising committee. Given that the authorising committee is one of the safeguards now built into the Bill, this was a very important point. The Committee wrote to the Department asking it to remove any ambiguity and to strengthen the safeguard through an amendment that would mean that information could be processed only if it was authorised by the new authorising committee. The Department did just that, and, as a result of the amendment, the authorising committee safeguard has, in our view, been suitably strengthened.

Other important amendments related to the code of practice, about which the Committee had particular concerns. The Bill, as introduced, required bodies to have "regard" to the code when carrying out their work. The Committee felt strongly that the code had the potential to be a more robust safeguard against the unlawful processing of information and that it should be strengthened. We wrote to the Department outlining those concerns, and, as a result, the Department proposed an amendment that would require bodies to have "due regard" to the code. The Committee, however, felt that the code could be strengthened even further by providing that a court or tribunal may take into account a breach of the code in any proceedings that it considers relevant. The Department was not prepared to support the amendment, but the strength of feeling in the Committee was such that it decided to table the amendment itself. We believe that, with the Committee's amendment, the code carries more weight, and the deterrent against breaches has been increased.

I conclude by saying that the Committee is pleased to see the Bill come to Final Stage. I thank the stakeholders who engaged and the staff, who worked diligently. The sharing of confidential personal information is a significant public issue, and the Assembly can congratulate itself on getting the Bill onto the statute book.

Mr Easton: I rise to speak on the Final Stage of the Bill and aim to be very brief. Overall, the Committee worked well together on the Bill and found common ground on the vast majority of it. It also worked well with the Minister and the Department, although amendment No 8 proved rather challenging. The aim of the Bill is to provide a clear statutory framework that will enable the use of health and social care information that identifies individuals to be used for medical or social care purposes that are designed to benefit health and social care or achieve some other tangible benefit that might reasonably be described as being for the public good.

The Bill will enable regulations to be made that establish a process that will ensure that information is shared only in very limited circumstances that are proven to be for medical or social care purposes and will benefit health and social care or achieve some other tangible benefit that might reasonably be described as being for the public good. The Bill will impose conditions on the use of the information and include penalties for those who fail to comply with it. That will protect the service user, the holder of the information and the individuals or organisations applying to use it by establishing a clear and unambiguous framework to govern the secondary use of information.

There was also an amendment on an opt-out system, and the Committee looked at removing all ambiguity from the Bill. All in all, the Bill was well supported by the Committee.

Mr McKinney: I welcome the opportunity to contribute to this important final debate on the Health and Social Care (Control of Data Processing) Bill and do so as health spokesperson for the SDLP and as a member of the Health Committee, which, as you have heard, considered the Bill in detail and received a number of briefings from the Department on amending the legislation.

The SDLP supports all measures and actions undertaken to ensure that the provision of health and social care services is the best that it can be and that patients receive the most up-to-date and effective treatment for their illnesses. Disclosing patients' data can improve diagnosis and treatment outcomes, but that can only be welcomed when effective checks and balances are provided where consent is not expressly given.

We must acknowledge the work of all the clinicians and others involved in medical research and clinical audits, and I put on record our appreciation of their invaluable work in improving health outcomes. It is important that we look at ways of building systems and devising ways of working that meet the standards in services that clinicians, researchers and the public expect. It is through engaging with many clinicians and charities on today's Bill and in considering the invaluable work undertaken by the cancer registry at Queen's, mentioned by the Minister, and, indeed, other disease registers that it has become explicitly clear that there is a need for change. The disclosure of patient data without the patient's consent is governed currently by common law, involving a public-interest test as part of the duty of confidentiality. It is clear, however, that that alone is not enough. We have seen England and Wales move to close the legislative gap, and I am glad that we, too, have now reached the Final Stage of this Bill.

It is important to take the opportunity to commend all those involved in bringing forward today's Bill. It has been an arduous task, as other Members said. We must thank all the stakeholders and departmental officials who have engaged and consulted with the Committee — they deserve recognition.

As has been outlined, I and other colleagues raised issues where we felt that the Bill fell short in offering that equitable level of safeguarding and protection for patients whose data may be shared without their consent. I am glad that the Minister and the Committee tabled amendments aimed at addressing those concerns. A major issue with today's Bill concerns the definitional problems that could have afforded, as described, a wide margin that could lead to the potential for the commercialisation of patients' data. Those issues, too, were raised at Westminster, where similar legislation to today's Bill had drawn criticism from some MPs and privacy groups.

However, I am glad that the Minister listened to the Committee's concerns and tabled amendments to clause 1. These tightened the legislation and provided more robust definitions to ensure that patients' data is not shared with those who are not the intended recipients.

Importantly, the opt-out clause is there, prescribing a mechanism in law for patients who do not want their data shared and have made that expressly known. The Minister made it clear that he was not keen to support the Committee's amendment at Further Consideration Stage, but, with legal advice and consultation with Queen's University, the view was expressed that such a provision would not impact negatively on the rights given under section 10 of the Data Protection Act. I am glad that the Committee's amendment was approved and found favour among Members at Further Consideration Stage.

This is a fitting example of how successful Statutory Committee and departmental collaboration can make sense and achieve a better outcome all round. Hopefully, the Bill will go a long way towards improving outcomes by supporting research into key areas such as cancer and diabetes. The bottom line through the work of the Committee and listening to some of the debates is that today's Bill is extremely important for the many patients suffering from illness. We, as legislators, try to make a difference and ensure that we invest in legislation now that will save the health service money in the future.

In conclusion, the SDLP supports the Bill at the Final Stage as we believe that it now affords greater protections and safeguards for patients when their data is being released. That can be done only under prescribed circumstances, with a robust committee scrutiny function, and a comprehensive code of practice for data processors.

Mr Hamilton: I thank all the Members who contributed to the debate, not just this evening but throughout the passage of the Bill through the House, for their supportive and positive remarks and, indeed, for their support for the Bill as a whole. What is clear from contributions this evening is that Members appreciate the potential benefits of sharing information with appropriate people. The safeguards contained in the Bill will ensure that sharing is controlled and secure and that sensitive and valuable information will be protected.

I am convinced that the outworkings of the Bill will be of great benefit to the entire population of Northern Ireland. Whilst there were some comments this evening, as there have been throughout the passage of the Bill, about people opting out, the experience of most working in this field is that, when they are talking to patients about sharing their information, most want to oblige and do so, particularly when it is about trying to find a cure or a new treatment for a particular ailment that they have suffered from.

I would like to take this opportunity to put on record and thank the Health Committee for the keen interest and support it has shown for the Bill. My Department had a very productive working relationship with the Committee, as the Chair and members outlined during their contributions, throughout the scrutiny of the Bill. I am also very grateful for the amendments proposed by the Committee, which, I believe, in the main, have succeeded in producing a better and stronger piece of legislation.

Once again, I am very grateful to everyone who contributed to the debate on this important piece of legislation.

Human Trafficking and Exploitation (Amendment of Slavery or Human Trafficking Offences and Relevant UK Orders) Order (Northern Ireland) 2016

Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice): I beg to move

That the draft Human Trafficking and Exploitation (Amendment of Slavery or Human Trafficking Offences and Relevant UK Orders) Order (Northern Ireland) 2016 be approved.

The draft order is made under powers conferred by section 11 of, and schedule 3 to, the Human Trafficking and Exploitation (Criminal Justice and Support for Victims) Act (Northern Ireland) 2015. Those parts of the Act make provision for slavery and trafficking prevention orders, henceforth STPOs, which courts may impose on individuals who have been convicted of a relevant human trafficking or slavery offence. Members will recall that the overarching aims of the STPO regime, as set out in schedule 3 to the Act, are to protect victims and to prevent reoffending.

Under schedule 3, courts may make an STPO against an offender who has been convicted of a slavery or human trafficking offence and who poses a risk of committing further such offences. In imposing an STPO, the court must be satisfied that the order is necessary to protect people from the physical or psychological harm that would result if the individual were to commit further such offences.

STPOs remain in place for at least five years, and their effect and extent are determined by the court. For example, where the court considers it necessary, it may specify in the STPO that the defendant must not work in a particular industry or enter a certain locality. An individual who is subject to an STPO is also required to comply with the associated notification requirements that are set out in Part 2 of schedule 3 to the Act and in regulations. Members will see, therefore, that STPOs are a valuable tool in managing and minimising the risk that is posed by those who commit those gravely exploitative crimes.

The draft order is intended to enhance the STPO regime by giving courts in Northern Ireland the powers to deal with offenders from other jurisdictions within the United Kingdom. It does that in two ways. First, the draft order will allow courts in Northern Ireland to make STPOs against individuals who have been convicted of modern slavery offences in the other jurisdictions of the UK. It does that by amending the list of relevant offences that can trigger an STPO in Northern Ireland, as set out in paragraph 1(4) of schedule 3, to include modern slavery offences in England and Wales under sections 1, 2 and 4 of the Modern Slavery Act 2015 and Scottish offences under sections 1 and 4 of the Human Trafficking and Exploitation (Scotland) Act 2015.

In practical terms, an individual convicted of one of these offences who comes to Northern Ireland could be subject to an STPO if the court considers it necessary. That means that the risk posed by offenders who have been convicted in England, Wales or Scotland can be managed locally by way of prevention order where necessary. Secondly, the draft order will ensure that courts in Northern Ireland will be able to enforce equivalent or similar civil orders that have been made elsewhere in the UK where those are breached in Northern Ireland. That includes slavery and trafficking prevention and risk orders made by the courts in England and Wales under Part 2 of the Modern Slavery Act 2015 and trafficking and exploitation prevention and risk orders made under the Human Trafficking and Exploitation (Scotland) Act 2015. Although the Assembly has not legislated to provide a power for courts in Northern Ireland to impose risk orders on individuals who have not previously been convicted of a modern slavery offence, such risk orders are available to courts in the other United Kingdom jurisdictions.

The order, therefore, is essential to ensure that courts in Northern Ireland will be able to enforce such risk orders that have been made elsewhere in cases where they have been breached in Northern Ireland. That safeguard will help to ensure that those subject to risk orders cannot bypass the restrictions that are placed on them by traveling to Northern Ireland.

The draft order provides that any breach of the orders elsewhere in the UK constitutes a criminal offence in Northern Ireland, attracting a maximum sentence of six months on summary conviction or five years on conviction on indictment.

I believe that the order will help to ensure that the police and courts in Northern Ireland have comprehensive powers to respond to and manage the risk that is posed by slavery and human trafficking offenders, including those who come to Northern Ireland from other parts of the United Kingdom. It will also help to protect people here who may be vulnerable to exploitation. My intention is that the STPO regime should commence immediately after the passage of the secondary legislation. I commend the draft order to the House.

Mr Ross (The Chairperson of the Committee for Justice): I am pleased to speak briefly this evening on the motion on behalf of the Committee for Justice. The Minister comprehensively set out the background to the proposed rule, so I will not rehearse the detail at this stage of the day or detain Members any longer than is absolutely necessary.

My colleagues on the Justice Committee heard first-hand the devastating impact of human trafficking during its consideration of Lord Morrow's Human Trafficking and Exploitation Bill. The Committee was supportive then and remains supportive today of all efforts to tackle human trafficking.

Back in October 2014, at the Consideration Stage of Lord Morrow's Bill, the Committee supported an amendment to introduce slavery and trafficking prevention orders. At that time, MLAs were advised of the Committee's position on that and of the other amendments that were being brought forward by the Department. In June 2015, the Committee was advised by the Department of its plans to consult on the subordinate legislation under our consideration today, and, in November, the Committee considered the results of the consultation and the Department's proposed rule. The Committee agreed that it was content with the policy intent of the proposals to ensure that slavery and trafficking prevention orders may be made in Northern Ireland for offenders who have been convicted of human trafficking and slavery offences in other parts of the United Kingdom. At the meeting on 28 January 2016, the Committee agreed to recommend to the Assembly that the rule be approved.

Therefore, Mr Speaker, on behalf of the Committee for Justice, I support the motion brought forward by the Minister of Justice.

Mr A Maginness: I was not going to speak, but I just rise to support the subordinate legislation and to put the cat out after this debate.

Mr Ford: Yet again on one of these brief occasions, I have to go into lengthy responses to all the contributions that were made, most notably by Mr Maginness just now. I make a serious point on this occasion when I thank the Committee for the attention that it pays to the detail of these pieces of legislation. It may only be secondary legislation, but it is very significant and important. As the Chair says, the order really completes the work on the STPOs, which were included in the then private Member's Bill on human trafficking that Lord Morrow so ably piloted, including the bits that I did not disagree with. This was one aspect of the Bill on which there was complete agreement. It is absolutely right that we should ensure that there is a comprehensive regime in place for the courts and the police to deal robustly with all slavery and human trafficking offenders, wherever they may have come from, and whichever UK jurisdiction there may be convictions in place. I am grateful for the brief words of support from Mr Maginness and the detailed work of the Committee outlined by Mr Ross. Indeed, we can commend Lord Morrow on the fact that a further piece of his work was completed tonight.

Environmental Better Regulation Bill: Final Stage

Mr Durkan (The Minister of the Environment): I beg to move

That the Environmental Better Regulation Bill [NIA 55/11-16] do now pass.

I am delighted that the Environmental Better Regulation Bill has at last progressed to its Final Stage. The Bill is a very worthwhile and positive development and, as I said during the Second Stage debate, is to be welcomed by all Members. I am grateful that that has proved to be the case thus far.

First, I express my thanks to the Environment Committee for the broad support that it has given to the Bill following its detailed and thorough scrutiny of the clauses and for its further engagement with a wide range of key stakeholders. The Committee's constructive and helpful recommendations brought about some amendments at Consideration Stage that improved and strengthened what was already a very solid Bill. I also express my thanks to my Executive colleagues and to Members for their ongoing support for the Bill, right from the start of the process to its present Final Stage.

Aristotle is credited with saying:

"Even when laws have been written down, they ought not always to remain unaltered."

Currently, Northern Ireland environmental regulators operate under 230 pieces of environmental legislation, which has produced a complex and unwieldy legislative landscape that is difficult for the regulated to understand and for the regulators to enforce. It is clearly a system that should no longer remain unaltered. The Environmental Better Regulation Bill aims to harmonise and simplify aspects of that body of environmental legislation. Better environmental regulation will mean a cleaner, safer environment for all. It will also mean that businesses will benefit from the simplification and reduction of the legislative burden under which they operate, while the Department will benefit from a more cost-effective use of its resources.

The Bill is an important step in my Department's regulatory transformation programme, which will deliver an innovative and streamlined regulatory system that supports sustainable growth and increases compliance in the 21st century. The programme includes an ambitious and extensive programme of legislative reform, operational delivery and modernisation of supporting frameworks to create a more effective and intelligent regulatory system that is risk-based and outcome- and customer-focused. The overall agenda is to develop a framework for smarter, better regulation that works in partnership with businesses and contributes to a new strategic objective for the Department.

The Bill, as I have said previously, is primarily enabling legislation, and has already been thoroughly examined and spoken about in great detail during its passage to this point. I will therefore refer only briefly to its key provisions.

Part 1 and schedule 1 enable my Department to introduce an environmental permitting regime to replace the existing array of permits. This will reduce red tape for compliant operators and allow the Department to focus on higher-risk activities. Subordinate legislation, supporting measures and guidance will be developed to deliver the new regime. It is intended in particular that regulations made under the power will simplify and rationalise a wide range of existing measures relating to pollution prevention and control, waste management licensing, the water environment and radioactive substances. The aim is to move towards a single regulatory structure that will be significantly easier to use for both the Department and the businesses carrying on regulated activities.

Part 2 commits my Department to a review of all environmental powers of entry and associated powers to ensure that the powers are still justified and are used proportionally. During that review, my Department will also examine whether similar powers could be consolidated with a view to a more transparent and simplified regime for businesses and regulators. A report will be produced after the review, outlining findings and proposals on how my Department intends to reform powers of entry and associated powers, using the enabling powers outlined in the Bill. The report will be laid before the Assembly, and any enacting of the reforms outlined in the review through future legislation will be subject to consultation, as outlined in the Bill.

Part 2 also commits my Department to prepare a code of practice that authorised persons must have due regard to. The code, which will be laid in draft before the Assembly, will set out in detail the guidance and considerations that apply before, during and after powers of entry and associated powers are exercised. The purpose of the code is to ensure greater consistency in the exercise of powers of entry and provide greater clarity for those affected by them.

Part 3 contains amendments to the Clean Air Order 1981 that will provide for a new streamlined method for listing authorised fuels and exempted fireplaces for use in a smoke control area. The new arrangements will streamline the process for authorisation, with newly approved fuels and exempted fireplaces being authorised for use in smoke control areas each month, rather than the lengthy preparation of six-monthly regulations by my Department. It will also reduce the delay that manufacturers and consumers currently face when new fuels and fireplaces are brought onto the market.

Part 4 contains amendments to the Environment (NI) Order 2002, which are deregulatory measures to remove the requirement for a further assessment when an air quality management area has already been agreed. That will allow district councils to prepare and implement air quality action plans more quickly and avoid duplicating information already gathered, either in the earlier detailed assessment stage or in the preparation of the air quality plan. The change will have no impact on businesses and is in line with the view of local authorities in the rest of the UK, who see further assessments as an unnecessary burden that is an impediment to the speedy preparation and implementation of local air quality action plans.

Part 5 contains amendments to the Water and Sewerage Services (NI) Order 2006, which will transfer responsibility for the regulation of drinking water quality for public supplies from DRD to DOE. DOE currently has responsibility for private drinking water supplies. That will result in a more streamlined, efficient and transparent administrative structure that is in line with the aims of the better regulation agenda. It will help businesses and consumers by removing the potential for confusion over which Department is responsible for the regulation of public and private supply. There will be no changes in regulatory impacts on businesses, as my Department's Drinking Water Inspectorate's regulatory functions will remain the same.

I commend the Environmental Better Regulation Bill to the House.

Ms Lo (The Chairperson of the Committee for the Environment): On behalf of the Environment Committee, I welcome the opportunity to speak on the Final Stage of the Environmental Better Regulation Bill.

The Bill was introduced to the Assembly in June 2015, and the Committee undertook its detailed scrutiny of it and reported to the Assembly in November. The Committee recognises that, as environmental regulation has developed over time, it has become complex, with different inspection regimes and different rules making it confusing for businesses. The Committee is aware that the Bill is one aspect of a wider regulatory transformation programme aimed at reducing the burden of regulation on business.

The Bill is in essence a skeleton Bill, meaning that the real operation of the Act would be made entirely by the regulations under it. The Committee recognises the merits of better regulation. However, it is important that, as the subordinate legislation programme is developed, standards are not lowered as a result of simplifying and streamlining environmental regulation. A balance must be struck between streamlining the regulatory regime and not compromising the Northern Ireland Environment Agency's compliance and enforcement role.

The Bill has been improved and strengthened because of amendments that the Environment Committee persuaded the Department to accept in the following specific areas. As the Bill is an enabling Bill, the Committee ensured that the level of protection afforded to the Assembly in the scrutiny of the regulations was sufficient. The Committee sought an amendment to extend this scrutiny to the Department's draft code of practice in relation to powers of entry and associated powers. The Committee expressed concern that the Bill gave the Department broad powers and that the definition of "environmental activities" in Part 1 of the Bill was wide-ranging and all-encompassing. Therefore, the Committee sought the removal of powers provided to the Department in schedule 1 to further define or modify the definition of "environmental activities" and to specify additional environmental activities. The Committee also ensured that the purpose of the Bill — streamlining and reducing the regulatory burden while protecting and improving the environment — was reflected in the Bill. I believe that the Committee's detailed consideration of the Bill has ensured that there is sufficient scrutiny of the regulations and that the protection of the environment remains at the forefront of any regulatory programme.

10.45 am

I would like to conclude my comments by taking this opportunity to place on record my thanks to all those organisations and individuals who took the time to provide written and oral evidence to the Committee and the members of the Committee, past and present, for their contributions during Committee Stage. I also thank the Minister and his officials for their positive engagement with the Committee, during and after Committee Stage, and for taking the Committee's amendments on board. Last but not least, I thank the Committee staff for their valuable assistance during the entire process of the passage of the Bill. On behalf of the Committee, I support the Bill.

Mrs Cameron: As a DUP member of the Environment Committee, I welcome the opportunity to speak on the Final Stage of the Environmental Better Regulation Bill.

While this is largely a technical Bill and many of the key points have been covered, not only today but in previous stages, I wish to voice my support for the Bill and the principles on which it is based. The core function of the Bill is to streamline environmental regulation while robustly protecting the environment and, in turn, ensuring that businesses are able to operate in a more efficient and cost-effective manner.

The Bill will amend the Clean Air (Northern Ireland) Order 1981, the Environment (Northern Ireland) Order 2002 and the Water and Sewerage Services (Northern Ireland) Order 2006 to provide a framework that is easier to regulate, understand and operate. Under the Bill, the existing separate regimes governing waste, pollution, water and radioactive substances will be brought together into a single piece of legislation ensuring greater uniformity and ease of use.

In passing through the various stages, the Committee has sought to ensure that those who comply with environmental regulations are free to continue their good practices unburdened by red tape, and that will, in turn, I hope, free up resources to pursue those who are failing in their environmental responsibilities. By freeing up those resources, serial offenders or those who seriously breach regulations will be dealt with severely and quickly. On the other hand, businesses that have breached the regulations through error or misinterpretation will receive support and guidance to help achieve compliance.

At Consideration Stage, I used the example of the disproportionately high levels of fish kills in my constituency of South Antrim and will mention it again, as it highlights the tangible difference that the Bill will make. During the last five years, 20 pollution incidents have occurred, decimating fish stocks and the associated delicate ecosystems of major tributaries of Lough Neagh. Yet only half of these have resulted in prosecution. Such incidents of environmental crime are happening right across Northern Ireland, and, as the culprits are continually going unpunished, they are free to carry on flouting the law. Passing the Bill will release much-needed capital to allow our statutory bodies to use additional resources to swiftly bring offenders to justice.

Parts 1 and 2 of the Bill will make businesses more aware of what is required of them and make it easier for the Department to assess and implement compliance. It will also include parts of EU legislation that have previously been excluded and simplify the rules for powers of entry. During scrutiny of the Bill, I am pleased that we were able to add some much-needed clarity to Parts 1 and 2 to allow for greater understanding of the purpose and objectives of the Bill. It also better outlines the basis of what will be enforced in the future.

Parts 3, 4 and 5 provide streamlined methods for listing authorised fuels and exempted fireplaces for use in smoke-free zones, which will mean that businesses will have to wait for only one month before they are passed for use, instead of the current six. These Parts also transfer the regulation of drinking water quality from DRD to DOE, and I believe that to be a pragmatic and sensible approach given the Department's expertise in dealing with water quality matters. Given the amalgamation of the Departments of Environment and Agriculture in the next mandate, I also feel that this is a practical move to reduce red tape.

This Bill is to be welcomed for the environment and for businesses in Northern Ireland. Whilst I fully appreciate that over- and, indeed, under-regulation can only result in poor outcomes, this Bill strikes an appropriate balance and takes a user-friendly approach to environmental regulation. I would like to reiterate that the Bill is not intended in any way to dilute the importance of environmental regulation. Its sole purpose is to reduce bureaucracy and make it easier for businesses to fulfil their environmental obligations. That is to be welcomed.

I am assured that it will be of vast benefit to our environment through quicker, more streamlined action for those who fail to comply with regulation and that less cumbersome legislation can only provide better results for Northern Ireland businesses. I support the Bill.

Mr Boylan: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. Ba mhaith liom labhairt i bhfabhar an Bhille. I will speak in favour of the Bill at its Final Stage. I start by putting on record my thanks to the Chair for the way in which she conducted business on the Bill and for all her work as Chair of the Committee. I know that she is leaving at the end of the mandate, and I thank her for her contribution. I take this opportunity to thank Mr Alban Maginness, who has made a valuable contribution to the Environment Committee over the last number of years. I also thank the departmental officials and the Minister for the way that they worked with the Committee.

The Minister outlined that the Bill will bring about a simplified regime and harmonise all environmental regulations, especially EU regulations and regulations on environmental practices. This is good legislation, but, as the Chair said, it is a skeleton Bill. The devil will be in the detail of the way in which the regulations are rolled out, and maybe the Minister will touch on that. We are going into a new and bigger Department, and I want to ensure that what we legislate for today will not be lost in the bigger Department. How the legislation and the regulations roll out will be telling.

On the face of it, what we are trying to do will mean that there is less of a burden on businesses. It is vital that, when we bring forward further regulations, we talk to and engage with businesses. Through the scrutiny process in Committee, we suggested amendments at Consideration Stage. Those were then brought forward by the Minister, and that is to be welcomed. If we are to get this right, we must continue to work with businesses. We have struck a balance in what we are trying to do with the Bill: some of the regulations and the subordinate legislation will strike a balance between helping and supporting the industry and improving our environment. I welcome the Final Stage of the Bill.

Mr A Maginness: I support the Bill — no surprise there. This is another example of good work and cooperation between the Environment Committee, the Department and the Minister, Mr Durkan. It is fashionable to be very critical of this institution — the Assembly — and say that we are all wasters, we are doing nothing, we are bringing politics into disrepute and so on. That is the view expressed by the commentators who populate television, radio and the press, but, in fact, lots of valuable work is done by the Assembly. I congratulate everybody in the Assembly who contributes to that work, particularly on Committees. This is a good example of the Committee working very well to bring about good legislation in cooperation with the Minister and under the very able chairmanship of Anna Lo. I pay tribute to her work on the Committee over a number of years. In the period that I have been on the Committee, I found that she gave considerable and significant leadership. She brings a particular passion to the whole issue of the environment. As Committee members, it is right and proper that we acknowledge that, as, indeed, Mr Boylan mentioned.

The two Members who spoke before me referred to the Bill as a skeleton. Flesh will be put on the bones. That flesh will be the regulations as they come through. You need this basic piece of law to build on in order to bring about what the Minister quite properly said is his objective: to get the right balance, to simplify the burden of regulation for those involved with the environment, to remove a level and burden of cost on individual businesses and individuals, and to streamline the regulatory framework and make it innovative. The Minister is right that this will establish a more intelligent framework and context in which we address the issue of the environment. That must be the strategic objective for the Department of the Environment. Mr Boylan quite properly said that the Department of the Environment will be subsumed and divided, like Gaul, into three parts. However, it will continue to exist in successor Departments. It is very important that, in dealing with the environment, we set the proper regulatory and legal basis for it to continue its good work. I hope that the successor Departments will take that challenge seriously. I know that the Minister has taken it seriously; Minister Durkan has proven to be a very able, effective and innovative Minister. I hope that that position will remain with whomever takes over from Mr Durkan in the near future.

I congratulate everybody involved — the officials, the Department and the Committee. I reiterate that the Committee has undertaken good work in relation to the Bill. I hope that the House will be unanimous in supporting it.

Mr Speaker: As this is Mr Alastair Patterson's first opportunity to speak as a private Member, I remind the House that it is the convention that a maiden speech is made without interruption.

Mr Patterson: I very much welcome the opportunity to make my first contribution to the House. Before I make a few wider comments, as the Ulster Unionist Party's new spokesperson for the environment, I will say that I am glad to see the Bill completing its legislative process. I was also pleased to see that, when the Assembly previously debated the Bill, it resulted in several further amendments being made. It was Sandra Overend who sat on the Committee. I know, from talking to her, that it was maybe not the most typical of Bills, even to someone completely new to the House. The Bill sounds well-meaning, but it is, undoubtedly, light on detail in new policy direction. Having read the Committee report, I realise that the Bill is what is considered to be enabling legislation. Therefore, I wish the new Department well in its efforts to reform and modernise our new regulatory framework through regulations. However, I urge the next Minister to realise the importance of genuine consultation with not only the Committee but the industries that will need to comply with the new framework.

I am deeply humbled and honoured at my recent selection by the constituency association of Fermanagh and South Tyrone to carry on the mandate and excellent work of the elected Member Tom Elliott MP, who was an outstanding representative for Fermanagh and South Tyrone in the House since his first election here in 2003.

Tom has been a tireless worker for the people of his constituency and for all the people of Northern Ireland. Following his success in the election of May 2015, he proudly represents our constituency and the Ulster Unionist Party in our mother Parliament at Westminster.

11.00 am

I also pay tribute to my predecessor Mr Neil Somerville, who sadly resigned due to ill health. I am pleased to inform the House that, at a recent handover meeting, Neil informed me that his health is improving and that he is doing much better. I am sure that the entire House would like to join me today in wishing Neil continued, improving and good health in the days, weeks, months and years that lie ahead. Neil made the brave decision to resign from the House, and I want to put on record my thanks to him for all that he has done for Fermanagh and South Tyrone. I wish him, his wife and his family God's richest blessing going into the future.

Representation of the people of Fermanagh and South Tyrone has been passed to me. I certainly look forward to the challenges that lie ahead over the next few busy weeks in the House as the term comes to an end. I want to build on the legacy of my predecessors and provide strong representation. I promise to work tirelessly for all the people of my amazing and picturesque constituency, which has so much to offer.

I want to bring my 20 years of successful business experience in the construction industry to the House and work towards building a better future for all our people, regardless of religion, political stance, race or gender. I want to build a Northern Ireland that we can all be proud of and that people from all over the world want to visit.

Representing Fermanagh and South Tyrone, an area of outstanding natural beauty where tourism is extremely important, I pledge myself to working with all Members to promote, whenever and wherever we can, what Northern Ireland has to offer, especially in this year of food and drink. We must ensure that we promote hospitality to all. I confess to having a vested interest in the area of hospitality, as my wife, Olga, is chair of Hospitality Ulster. Trust me, Mr Speaker, going home does not even bring about quietness, as I am often lobbied there on the needs of our hospitality industry and its request to reform Northern Ireland's outdated licensing laws.

Health will be one of my priorities in the House. On behalf of our people, I will be pressing our Health Minister on the need for more resources, in particular for the South West Acute Hospital, which sadly does not even have full-time doctor cover at weekends. That is extremely sad. It seems that you are not allowed to be sick at weekends. Another issue that has shocked me already is the sheer length of time that patients are forced to wait for diagnostic tests and treatment. In particular, it is extremely unacceptable that the number of people forced to wait longer than the maximum 18 weeks for an appointment with a consultant in the South Tyrone has jumped from 16 three years ago to a massive 1,414 at the end of last year. There was a similar upsurge at the South West Acute Hospital from 38 to 1,566. Keeping so many people waiting for so long, all of whom are experiencing a great deal of anxiety and many of whom are in pain, is simply unacceptable.

Education will be another priority —

Mr Speaker: I am obliged to remind you that we are discussing an environment Bill. I would be very happy if you would contain your remarks to the subject matter in front of us.

Mr Patterson: I will be seeking clarification from the Education Minister about why, after 10 years, the pupils of Devenish College still do not have the new school that they were promised. The cramped conditions of their existing, outdated school campus certainly are not helping their education.

On this day, I make it clear that it is my priority to represent all the people of my constituency of Fermanagh and South Tyrone. I make it clear to all Members that I will extend the hand of friendship to them all to work for the benefit of all the people. I was brought up in a very traditional home, and I was taught by my mother and my late father to show respect to all. I want to build an approach to all business in the House on the strong foundations of mutual respect and understanding and to play my part in building a strong Northern Ireland that we can be proud of.

I will finish with an extract from a sermon that I delivered in my church on Sunday 31 January, which I feel should be our aim. It was this:

“If we fail to give our highest priorities our greatest attention, something of lesser significance will quickly take their place and fill up our time”.

Let us, the elected representatives, ensure that the people we represent are our highest priority and get our greatest attention.

Mr Durkan: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I thank Members for their contributions to today's debate and throughout the legislative process. In particular, I thank the Chair of the Environment Committee, who today made, as always, a telling contribution. I take the opportunity to reassure Ms Lo and, indeed, the House that environmental standards will not be lowered as a result of this simplification of environmental regulation.

Mrs Cameron also spoke today. She never misses the opportunity to raise fish kills in her constituency. Like her, I am sure that the improvements in regulation will lead to a reduction and ideally, some day, a complete eradication of incidents of that type.

Mr Boylan spoke of the “skeleton” Bill. The Assembly will be kept informed and, indeed, consulted as flesh is put on the bones of the Bill through regulations. I am glad to hear Mr Boylan articulate his concerns about whether primacy will be given to environmental regulation in a new Department. That should serve as a reminder to us all that we all have a duty and will have a duty in the next mandate, hopefully, to promote the importance of protecting our environment.

I thank Mr Maginness for his kind words. I am certainly going to miss him. I congratulate Mr Patterson on his elevation to the Assembly. The transition from frying pan to fire is never easy, but he made a fine maiden speech. I am sure that we will hear much more from him. I join him in wishing his immediate predecessor Mr Somerville well. Mr Patterson said that he hoped that the new Minister would be aware of the importance of consultation: I do not think that I am over-egging the pudding or blowing my own trumpet when I say that I think that good, strong and thorough consultation have been a hallmark of my Ministry. I also concur with Mr Patterson's views on health, education, the economy and much, much more. [Laughter.]

Mr Speaker: I remind the Minister that we are discussing the Environmental Better Regulation Bill. [Laughter.]

Mr Durkan: I conclude, a Cheann Comhairle, by thanking, as did other Members, the Committee staff for their work throughout the process and, indeed, my own officials.

It has been a particularly complex piece of legislation, and they have worked hard to answer the many questions that I, for one, have had to ask them.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved:

That the Environmental Better Regulation Bill [NIA Bill 55/11-16] do now pass.

Enterprise Bill: Legislative Consent Motion

The following motion stood in the Order Paper:

That this Assembly endorses the principle of the extension to Northern Ireland of the provisions in the Enterprise Bill dealing with the Small Business Commissioner. — [Mr Hamilton (The Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety).]

Motion not moved.

Employment Bill: Consideration Stage

Moved. — [Dr Farry (The Minister for Employment and Learning).]

Mr Speaker: Members will have a copy of the Marshalled List of Amendments detailing the order for consideration. The amendments have been grouped for debate in the provisional grouping of amendments selected list. There are two groups of amendments, and we will debate the amendments in each group in turn. The first debate deals with tribunals and assessments and comprises amendment Nos 1 to 8, 18 and 19 and the Minister's opposition to clauses 4 and 8. The second debate will be on amendment Nos 9 to 17, which deal with information, employment rights and traineeships.

I remind Members intending to speak that, during the debates on the two groups of amendments, they should address all the amendments in each group on which they wish to comment. Once the debate on each group is completed, any further amendments in the group will be moved formally as we go through the Bill and the Question on each will be put without further debate. The Questions on stand part will be taken at the appropriate points in the Bill. If all that is clear, we shall proceed.

No amendments have been tabled to clauses 1 to 3. I propose, by leave of the Assembly, to group these clauses for the Question on stand part.

Clauses 1 to 3 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Mr Speaker: We now come to the first group of amendments for debate. The Minister for Employment and Learning has signalled his intention to oppose the Question that clause 4 stand part of the Bill. With this Question, it will be convenient to debate amendment Nos 1 to 8, 18, 19 and the opposition to clause 8 stand part. These amendments relate to tribunals and assessments. Members should note that amendment No 8 is mutually exclusive with the opposition to clauses 4 and 8.

— [Dr Farry (The Minister for Employment and Learning).]

Mr Speaker: I call the Minister to address his opposition to clause 4 and to speak to the other amendments in the group and his opposition to clause 8 stand part.

Dr Farry (The Minister for Employment and Learning):

At the outset, I want to place on record my appreciation to the Chair, members and staff of the Committee for Employment and Learning for their extraordinarily efficient and speedy processing of the Bill’s Committee Stage and the publication of their Committee report. It is particularly constructive in light of the pressing timetable as we approach the end of the mandate. That has of course been completed while giving full and thorough scrutiny to the Bill.

I turn first to my opposition to clause 4. Clause 4 deals with the proposed process of neutral assessment as it relates to industrial tribunal claims or potential industrial tribunal claims. I refer Members also to clause 8 because it has the same purpose except that it relates to claims or potential claims to the Fair Employment Tribunal. I am opposing the inclusion of those two clauses because, as drafted, they are more restrictive than key stakeholders have now suggested they ought to be. As the provisions stand, they allow an independent assessor, with parties' agreement, to provide a view on the likely outcome of a particular case that may be or has been referred to a tribunal. That would be in the context of the Labour Relations Agency (LRA) trying to promote a conciliated settlement between the parties.

The drafting of both clauses reflects the approach originally envisaged by my Department to the new neutral assessment service. It was always intended that the detail would be developed following a process of further engagement with stakeholders.

I now oppose the clauses because feedback received in response to the Employment and Learning Committee's call for evidence on the Bill has raised issues with the original approach, and it is right to take the opportunity to address them. There was concern that the implications for other services, particularly the arbitration scheme operated by the LRA and the early neutral evaluation process being piloted by the tribunals, had not been fully considered. On the basis of that feedback, I have re-engaged with the tribunal service and the Labour Relations Agency. Each organisation has a key role in helping to develop practical solutions on the delivery of neutral assessment, with the key being to provide parties with a clear sense of direction when dealing with a dispute.

Taking account of my discussions and the evidence to the Committee, I have concluded that the clause, as it stands, does not set the right enabling framework for the service. The proposed neutral assessment service will be the first of its kind in these islands. It is important to take on board points that have been raised about the framework under which it is to be developed and to improve the enabling legislation so that, when the service is established, it is fit for purpose.

In moving amendment No 6, I am proposing the inclusion in the Bill of new clause 9A, which is a rethinking of the enabling provisions originally in clauses 4 and 8, taking into account the issues that have been raised. Clause 9A is intended to replace those clauses and give the Department power to establish the service and to determine the means of delivery through regulations. Neutral assessment could, as originally envisaged, be delivered by the employment relations experts appointed by the LRA who have a strong practical experience of workplace practice. It could also be delivered by employment judges who have authoritative knowledge of case law and of what a person will need to do to succeed in presenting a case. It could also be that some other prescribed person identified in the regulations would be the most appropriate to deliver the service.

The regulations will be able to set out the means of delivery, the scope of the service and the steps involved. The regulations will be developed on the basis of evidence gathered from the forthcoming review of the LRA's statutory arbitration scheme; an evaluation of how the new early conciliation arrangements in the Bill are bedding down; and consideration of the effectiveness of the early neutral evaluation process that is already being offered on a pilot basis by employment tribunals. To be clear to the House, this is not a step back from the intention behind the policy, which is to provide people with an early assessment of the issues in their case so that they can make better informed decisions about how to deal with it. On the contrary, it is a recasting of the enabling provision to ensure that the legislative framework gives sufficient flexibility to develop a process that is fit for purpose and which works well for its users.

I will turn to the issue of tribunal deposits, which is dealt with in clauses 5 and 9. There are four proposed amendments that are relevant: amendment Nos 1, 2, 4 and 5. Clause 5 gives my Department broader flexibility than has been available to it before to make provision dealing with the placing of a requirement on parties to industrial tribunal proceedings to pay deposits in order to continue with those proceedings. It does so by amending the enabling power in article 11 of the Industrial Tribunals (Northern Ireland) Order 1996. Clause 9 makes a comparable amendment to the Fair Employment and Treatment (Northern Ireland) Order 1998. The amendment fulfils the same purpose in respect of proceedings before the Fair Employment Tribunal.

During the Employment and Learning Committee's consideration of those clauses, members expressed concern about the potential for revised enabling powers to be used to introduce a requirement on parties to pay more than one deposit in a given tribunal case. My officials accepted that that was a potential use to which the revised enabling powers could be put. The question of whether there should be the option of requiring more than one deposit in a case was an issue on which, among many others, my Department consulted from July to September last year. My officials indicated to the Committee that no change along those lines would be made without fully considering the potential impacts on access to justice.

Members of the Committee remained concerned, however, that such a change could be brought about by regulations subject to the negative resolution procedure. I fully appreciate that changes to the tribunal deposits regime have the potential to be contentious. It is certainly clear from responses to the public consultation on developing more efficient, effective and modern tribunals that there is both opposition to and support for that type of measure. I think that we have a responsibility to consider options to encourage tribunal claimants and respondents to think very carefully before bringing forward for the tribunal's consideration matters in which they are unlikely to succeed. When weak claims or responses are presented, other parties can incur costs in contesting them.

I want a system that is focused on the areas that have substance and merit, and it is right that there are proportionate mechanisms to discourage people from bringing to our tribunals matters with little substance. At the same time, I fully accept that people have the right to access the employment tribunal system for a judgement, and, if they believe strongly that they have a case, they should be entitled to pursue it. That is why there are safeguards around a party's ability to pay when the imposition of a deposit is considered.

Having thought carefully about the issue and taken on board the points made in Committee, I seek the agreement of the House to amendment Nos 2 and 5, which, respectively, would make any regulations that utilise the deposits provision for industrial tribunals or the fair employment tribunal subject to the draft affirmative procedure before the Assembly. I believe that the amendments establish the safeguard that the Committee seeks, in that any relevant regulations will need to be positively endorsed by the Chamber.

I do not, however, support amendment Nos 1 and 4 tabled by Mr Flanagan, Mr McCann and Ms McGahan. There has been a public consultation focused on developing a better tribunal system, and policy decisions still need to be taken forward following full consideration of the evidence presented by stakeholders in response to that consultation. I do not believe that it is the right approach for us at this stage to rule out any possibility of regulations dealing with multiple deposits when the evidence is still under review. The proposed amendments would establish exactly that restriction, closing off options even if the evidence suggests that they should be explored. Given that amendment Nos 2 and 5 will give the House the ultimate say over whether regulations dealing with deposits are introduced, I hope that Members will agree with me that it is premature to close off options at this stage with regard to the enabling powers. We can now ensure that full safeguards are put in place to guarantee that the views of the Assembly are to the forefront. The amendments from the respective Members are not necessary at this stage.

Amendment No 3 relates to clause 7. As it stands, clause 7 amends the Fair Employment and Treatment (Northern Ireland) Order 1998 to provide for an extension of the time limit for making a claim to the fair employment tribunal to allow for early conciliation under the auspices of the Labour Relations Agency. In reviewing the clause, officials established the need for a small technical amendment. I seek the agreement of the House to amend clause 7 to remove from article 46(1) of the Fair Employment and Treatment Order a reference to statutory dispute resolution procedures that are no longer operative. The procedures were repealed by the Employment Act (Northern Ireland) 2011. This is simply a tidying amendment to remove statutory references to procedures that no longer apply, and I hope that Members will support it.

Amendment Nos 18 and 19 are related. They apply to schedule 3, which sets out repeals. Amendment No 18 removes references from the Fair Employment and Treatment Order that relate to statutory dispute resolution procedures that were repealed by the Employment Act (Northern Ireland) 2011. Amendment No 19 repeals provisions of the Employment (Northern Ireland) Order 2003 that relate to the same procedures. They are also tidying amendments, reflecting the fact that the statutory dispute resolution procedures in question have ceased to have effect.

I turn now to amendment Nos 7 and 8, tabled by the Chair of the Committee for Employment and Learning. Amendment No 7, which is new clause 9B, requires my Department to review the entirety of the Labour Relations Agency's conciliation service at the end of one year and again after three years following commencement of the early conciliation provisions of the Bill. It also requires the Department, having consulted relevant stakeholders, to lay a report before the Assembly setting out the findings of the review. Amendment No 8, which is new clause 9C, establishes the same requirements in relation to neutral assessment.

I am content with the objective of the proposed review clauses. While my Department, the Labour Relations Agency and the tribunal service consider the effectiveness of their work on an ongoing basis, I have no difficulty in general with the requirements. However, I have a concern about aspects of the proposed wording of subsection 3(c) in each clause. As the draft stands, the Department would be required, among other things, to report on the time taken for each case and the outcome of each case. Those requirements seem reasonable at first glance, but the phrasing is important. An analysis or report that touches on information about each individual case has implications for confidentiality. The LRA is under a legal duty to maintain confidentiality in delivering its services. Indeed, that duty is expanded on by clause 20. It is important that early conciliation is not compromised by a reporting requirement that touches on individual cases.

A similar issue arises in relation to neutral assessment. Although the regulations establishing that service have yet to be developed, there is a real possibility that confidentiality could be an important consideration. A reporting requirement that does not touch on individual cases but seeks aggregated information on cases would deal with this concern. I understand the Employment and Learning Committee's rationale for tabling the amendments, and I know that the Committee has been made aware of the issue. I look forward to hearing the Chair's remarks on the matter.

On a more technical point, if, as I hope, Members are positively disposed to new clause 9A on neutral assessment and the exclusion from the Bill of clauses 4 and 8, there will be a need to look again at proposed clause 9C to reflect that position. In conclusion, I look forward to hearing the views of Members on the amendments in the group.

Mr Swann (The Chairperson of the Committee for Employment and Learning): I am happy to speak on behalf of the Committee for Employment and Learning at Consideration Stage of the Employment Bill. First, I also pay tribute to and thank the staff and members of the Committee for their work over the time that we have put in in scrutinising the Bill. The Minister described it as an extraordinarily efficient use of legislative time through the Committee. I do not think that he has used such an adjective often in reference to the work of the Committee. We will take note of what he said, and I note from his opening comments that he has taken due cognisance of the recommendations and concerns that were brought forward by the Committee.

The Committee for Employment and Learning recognises the Minister's aims in bringing forward the Employment Bill: to make provision for early resolution of workplace disputes and to create an assessment service; to introduce significant reform to the law around public interest disclosures; and to allow the Department to make provision for careers guidance, apprenticeships and traineeships through regulations. The Committee has always supported the Minister in that endeavour. On behalf of the Committee for Employment and Learning, I thank the Minister and his officials for his open engagement throughout the course of the Bill and in responding promptly to Committee concerns.

The Employment Bill was introduced on 7 December 2015 at the First Stage. The Committee wrote to key stakeholders and inserted public notices in the regional newspapers seeking written evidence by 21 December. The Bill reached Second Stage on 12 January 2016 before being referred to the Committee for scrutiny on 13 January 2016. At this stage, I pay tribute again to the Committee staff for having everything in process. It may be a legislative record that the Committee Stage started one day after the Second Stage was read in the House. A total of 10 organisations responded to the request for written evidence, of which four provided oral evidence to the Committee. Those four organisations were the Labour Relations Agency, the Law Centre Northern Ireland, the Northern Ireland Committee of the Irish Congress of Trade Unions and the Northern Ireland Commissioner for Employment and Skills. The Committee greatly valued the input of all of the stakeholders in assisting the scrutiny of the Bill at Committee Stage.

I will first speak on amendment No 2, which amends clause 5. Clause 5 concerns the payment of deposits at industrial tribunals. The Committee raised concerns with the Department on 6 January 2016 about why negative resolution was being used for enabling powers relating to tribunal deposits as opposed to the draft affirmative procedure. On 20 January, the Department briefed the Committee on outstanding issues in the Bill and advised that it had taken the concerns on board and had drafted an amendment to clause 5 so that deposits would be subject to the draft affirmative procedure. The Minister confirmed that today in his opening comments. The Department advised that this would provide a full opportunity for Members to consider the merits of any proposals brought forward in this area. The Committee accepts the logic of that decision and is content with clause 9 as amended.

Amendment No 5 amends clause 9. Clause 9 is the same as clause 5, except for the fact it relates to deposits to the fair employment tribunal instead of industrial tribunals. The Committee accepts the Minister's amendment to clause 9 to make deposits subject to draft affirmative procedure as opposed to negative resolution and is content with clause 9 as amended.

I now turn to amendment No 6, which concerns a departmental amendment to insert new clause 9A. The Committee was advised by the Department on 19 January that it was proposing a revised approach to the neutral assessment service. The Department was doing so on the basis of the evidence presented to the Committee on 6 January, in particular the concerns raised by the Labour Relations Agency about the operation of the service. Clause 9A is drafted so as to replace clauses 4 and 8 and give the Department power to make regulations conferring on a specified person power to deliver a specified process of assessment.

The Committee is content with proposed new clause 9A and that the Minister has opposed clauses 4 and 8.

11.30 am

I will now speak to the Committee's amendments, which the Minister referred to. Amendment No 7 inserts new clause 9B into the Bill. Clause 9B will place a duty on the Department to conduct a systematic review of the early conciliation service. At its meeting on 9 January, the Committee heard from stakeholders about their concerns regarding the operation of the early conciliation service. The Committee therefore agreed to table an amendment to insert a review clause into the Bill. Clause 9B will review the operation of the early conciliation service one year after it commences and, from then on, the service will be reviewed every three years. It has come to the attention of the Committee that subsection 3(c) of clause 9B may breach confidentiality requirements. On 3 February, the Department advised the Committee that it would be content to support the Committee's amendment, provided that the Committee redrafted subsection 3(c) of clause 9B and tabled it with the Bill Office to be debated at Further Consideration Stage. That will be debated at the Committee tomorrow, with agreement from the Minister.

If the opposition to clauses 4 and 8 is supported by the House and, equally, if the House agrees the new clause as tabled by the Minister in amendment No 6, I expect that the Committee's amendment No 8 will not be called. It is the Committee's intention to accommodate the changes brought by the removal of clauses 4 and 8 and the insertion of amendment No 6 by re-tabling an updated version of our amendment, as we are very keen to see that policy intention placed in the Bill.

I will now make a few brief comments as the Ulster Unionist spokesperson for employment and learning. We will be opposing clauses 1 and 4, as we believe that the draft affirmative resolution procedure will provide as adequate an amount of scrutiny by the House as was achieved by the Committee. There will be a move from negative resolution to draft affirmative resolution as proposed in the original Bill. We will be supporting clauses 2 and 5. That concludes my opening remarks.

Mr Buchanan: I welcome the opportunity to speak on the Consideration Stage of the Employment Bill. Like the Chair, I thank the Minister, the Department and even the Committee staff for all the work they have done in bringing the Bill to this stage.

Very briefly, I welcome amendment No 2 to clause 5 and amendment No 5 to clause 9. Those two amendments are similar, in that they deal specifically with deposits: clause 5 dealing with industrial tribunals; and clause 9 dealing with fair employment tribunals. Those amendments will ensure that deposits will now be subject to the draft affirmative resolution procedure of the Assembly and that any regulations that utilise the deposits provision for either of the two tribunals will require Assembly approval before being made. I think that that cuts out any concern that there is on those issues.

Amendment No 3 to clause 7 is simply a technical amendment, which has already been outlined by the Minister, and is necessary to include provisions on conciliation to help employers and employees.

Amendment No 6 to clause 9A, which replaces clauses 4 and 8, will be welcome news for many stakeholders, in particular the Tribunals Service and the Labour Relations Agency. The flexibility that that will provide will allow for the structuring of the neutral assessment service to better provide and deliver for the purpose that it was designed for.

Amendment Nos 7 and 8 from the Committee have been laid out in detail. The Committee Chair mentioned them, and I do not intend to reiterate those points.

Turning to amendment Nos 1 and 4 in the name of Mr Flanagan, Ms Bronwyn McGahan and Mr Fra McCann, let me say first of all that we will be opposing those amendments. I have heard and listened to the arguments for the purpose of those two amendments and the concerns about the implications of having more than one deposit of £500 on any single claim. However, it is fair to say that this is a potentially contentious area and that there is support for and opposition to any change of this kind. That is why the Committee pressed for this to be brought in under the affirmative resolution process, rather than being placed in the Bill.

I believe that, should the amendments be made, they will close off the option on which a policy decision remains to be made in light of the outcome of the public consultation on the future of tribunals. I do not believe that we should be in the business of closing down the option that we have to look at those issues following the consultation process. That is why we will oppose those two amendments today, but with the assurance that the individual taking a claim is protected from multiple deposits, as that would require Assembly approval first. With that, I will conclude on this group of amendments.

Mr Flanagan: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I welcome the Consideration Stage of the Employment Bill, and I commend the Minister for getting it this far. As I said at Second Stage, he has had some difficulties in progressing it, but he is flying through it now. I commend the Committee staff and my colleagues on the Committee for the speedy and diligent approach that they took to scrutinising the Bill and progressing it through Committee Stage.

Robin highlighted the two amendments that the Committee has brought forward. I largely agree with what others have said, so I do not intend to rehearse the discussion that has taken place around the Committee amendments. Instead, I intend to focus my contribution on amendment Nos 2 and 5, which deal with the need for future regulations on deposits in fair employment and industrial tribunals to be approved by draft affirmative resolution, and amendment Nos 1 and 4, which are tabled in my name and that of my colleagues, which would prohibit multiple deposits against somebody taking a claim to either of the two tribunals.

First, I welcome the Minister's tabling amendment Nos 2 and 5. I proposed in Committee that we should ask the Minister to bring that forward. Everybody accepts the need for it. When the Minister presented his response to the Committee, he indicated that, historically, deposits at tribunals have not been a contentious issue and, as such, negative resolution may have worked well in the past. However, if we look at what is happening in Britain and how denying people the right to access a tribunal is being used to erode workers' rights, it is very clear that tribunals are becoming a contentious issue. There have been a number of legal challenges in England with regard to the whole issue of tribunals, fees and multiple deposits. So, the whole issue of deposits and fees at tribunals is an area of contention, and I am glad to see that the Minister has accepted the Committee's proposal to make sure that any future changes to deposits must have the consent of the House before the change is made.

In the past, that was not required, and we could have had a situation where a change was made to a deposit or a tribunal, and Members in this House could then have dragged the Minister or his successor back into the Chamber to reverse that decision. So, this is for good governance reasons, and it will send out clarity and surety to people who are involved in tribunals, which are a very complex business. The testimony that we received as a Committee about tribunals indicates that it is very complex, and people do not really want to go there, but when they do, it should be made fairly easy for them to do it. So, it is good that there will now be surety for people in that they will know what the maximum deposit is, and subsequent change will need the approval of the House before it happens.

As I said, I am concerned about the direction in which tribunals are going in England. There was a massive push to introduce fees, and I am glad that the Minister very quickly stepped away from introducing fees for accessing tribunals. In England, where the introduction of fees has taken place, there has been a 79% decrease in the number of tribunal cases taken against employers. I do not think that we want to go down a similar route. I think that it would be better if we could see a reduction in the number of cases that make it to court, but that needs to happen through the Minister's proposals for early conciliation and trying to get as many of these things settled amicably as early as possible, instead of just denying people the right to get their day in court, to get their good name restored and to get any compensation or back pay that they might be entitled to.

The introduction of fees or overly high deposits is a barrier to justice. It largely impacts on the most vulnerable workers in the economy, those people who do not have the same protection as others, who are in non-unionised workplaces and part-time workers. Therefore, it would disproportionately impact on women who are trying to take a case to a tribunal to get a fair hearing. So, I am glad that the Minister did not pursue the issue of fees, but the issue of deposits being a prohibitive barrier for people trying to access justice remains. Currently, a deposit of up to £500 can be imposed by a fair employment or industrial tribunal in cases where the person who will now be referred to as an employment judge decides that there is little possibility of success. If claimants wish to continue and lose the case, they will forfeit the deposit.

Clauses 5 and 9 establish enabling powers that would allow the Department to introduce regulations that are subject to negative Assembly procedure. As we have all said, the change will move that to affirmative resolution. As it stands, without the two amendments that we have tabled, the Bill would allow for multiple deposits to be imposed within one case, and the current maximum of £500 would be set aside. You could see a scenario in which an aggrieved or former employee takes a case to a tribunal for four, five or six different reasons. The judge, or chairperson as they are still called, could say that each of those claims was subject to a £500 deposit. Somebody who has recently lost their job, is working part-time, is in a very low-paid job or who has been badly treated by an employer may be subject to a deposit of £1,500, £2,000 or £3,000 depending on the number of claims.

A deposit of £500 is sufficiently high. If somebody has recently lost their job and wants to take a case to a tribunal, asking them to put up a £500 deposit that they might not get back is a sufficient barrier to stop them taking what employers claim are cases that have no prospect of success and that are only there to waste their time. I think that £500 is sufficient. Going down the road where £500 can be applied to each claim instead of to each claimant would present a massive barrier to people who are trying to access justice.

I hear what the Minister has said about any future changes needing to come to the House for approval before they take effect, but the reality is that we are being pushed down a road where workers' rights will be eroded. In the second group of amendments, we will deal with other issues that affect the rights of working people but, in this group, we are dealing with the rights of people —

Mr F McCann: Will the Member give way?

Mr Flanagan: I will surely, Fra. Go ahead.

Mr F McCann: The point that you are making is important. I accept that the Minister has said that he is leaving room for changes down the line, but who is to say who will be back here in the near future and whether they will hold to the promises that are being made by the present Minister? When we discussed this, one of the things that we were concerned about was the fact that there are many people who, by the very fact that they will have to pay the deposits, will shy away from taking a case. Justice is being denied to people who wish to go down that road.

Mr Flanagan: I thank the Member for his intervention and I agree with him. There are enough problems with people being unable to get to a tribunal. Imposing multiple deposits on claimants would be a regressive step and we should not allow it. I accept that the Minister has said that it is not in the Bill, but it is allowed for. By passing our amendment, the Assembly would write into the Bill that multiple deposits would be prohibited. That would be a good step for us to take. It would send out a message that we will not implement any changes to tribunals that would dissuade or discourage people from taking cases, beyond having to pay a £500 deposit. We have tabled an amendment to put a rule into the Bill that multiple deposits would not be allowed. That is a fairly pragmatic approach.

The Minister has carried out a consultation on multiple deposits and other changes to tribunals. I might be misquoting him — it is a good thing that he has the chance to respond at the end — but I think he said that there was no evidence to support the introduction of multiple deposits. I do not see why some are opposing that change when there is no evidence to support the introduction of multiple deposits. In essence, they are a bad thing. As I have said on several occasions, they deny people access to justice, and that is not the purpose of the Bill.

Anything over £500 would be a substantial sum of money for people to pay. When you go to an employment tribunal to have your employment rights enshrined, you are not entitled to legal aid and, as a result of European directives, case law and a range of appeal decisions, it has become so legalistic and complex that most people need a solicitor or barrister to represent them. Most employers feel that they need that representation and, when one side goes in with a solicitor or barrister, those who make claims often feel that they need to do it as well. So, on top of the issue of deposits, there is also the cost of going to employment tribunals.

I am very keen for us to send out a message through the Bill that we will not allow multiple deposits. It is all well and good for the Minister to say that it is not a proposal on the table, but it might come back at some stage. If we make the amendment, it will stop any future Minister trying to bring in a regulation that would not be subject to the same level of scrutiny as primary legislation.

I accept that this proposal has not been subject to much, if any, scrutiny. It did not go through a consultation process apart from the one carried out by the Minister, in which no evidence was found that introducing multiple deposits was a good thing. It does not protect anybody and does not give employers better rights; all it does is introduce yet another barrier for workers trying to get to a tribunal to access justice.

The Minister, in his opening remarks, claimed that it was premature to close off the options for multiple deposits. I think that I speak for a significant number in the Chamber when I say that I will never support the introduction of multiple deposits to employment tribunals. It would be good to hear the Minister say that. He says that he does not want to close off the option: can he say that, in the future, he will not support the introduction of multiple deposits? We could have a situation in which a majority of MLAs supported their introduction. We heard Mr Buchanan teeter on the edge of being in favour of it, and we know there are conflicting views on the subject. Maybe he is taking the line of the employers who really want to abolish fair employment and industrial tribunals of any nature so that workers do not have any right to recourse through the legal system. I know that that is what some employers want, but I hope that not too many MLAs would adopt such a position.

I say to the Minister that affirmative resolution would be an improvement. I am glad that he has accepted the rationale that the Committee put forward, but it would be a mistake for the Assembly not to have a clause prohibiting the use of multiple deposits. That would be a very slippery road to go down, denying people the right to go to an employment or industrial tribunal in order to get back pay, to get an unfair dismissal overturned or for any other reason.

We all see how employment rights are being eroded all the time. It is important that we protect workers at every opportunity. This is not about making a change; it is about keeping what is currently enshrined in legislation. I am not saying that, at this stage, we should give workers additional rights; I am saying that we maintain what we have at present and do not allow a situation to develop in which former employees trying to take to a tribunal a case against an employer who, they feel, has treated them illegally are forced to pay a deposit of several thousand pounds just to get their day in court.

That is all I have to say on this group of amendments. I hope that the Minister has reflected on that and look forward to his response to the comments made.

Mr Diver: I welcome the opportunity to contribute to the debate. As a new member of the Employment and Learning Committee, I come to this late. On behalf of SDLP Members, I express our appreciation to the Minister, the Department and the members of the Committee. Even from reading the genesis of the Bill and what has happened over the last few years, I know that considerable time, effort and energy has gone into it, and we would like to put that on record.

We made a number of points at Second Stage about the Labour Relations Agency, particularly on neutral assessment. Under the Bill, the LRA would be required to establish a neutral assessment service that, by agreement, could give disputing parties an idea of how their case might be decided should they not resolve it between them. It seems that, as stakeholders such as the Equality Commission expressed, an extra layer of relatively informal adjudication would serve only to protect employers from a burdensome process. We are glad, therefore, that clauses 4 and 8 may be removed and that the amendments seem to be more rational mechanisms to provide for neutral assessment and good practice. The question that still needs to be answered is whether that facilitation of early dispute resolution is as fair to those taking a case to tribunal as it is to employers.

We are happy that amendment Nos 7 and 8 and the new clauses providing for a review of early conciliation and neutral assessment are to be included. It is right and proper that we examine whether this addition is working in the interests of employers and claimants.

The LRA addition is not the only change to tribunal procedure. The Bill includes enabling powers that relate to tribunal rules, and it brings tribunal rules and regulations into line with current practice, permitting the chairmen of employment tribunals to be referred to as employment judges. Secondly, it includes enabling powers to allow the Department to specify in employment tribunal rules the additional circumstances in which a tribunal may order a party to pay a deposit in order to continue with proceedings. That measure is intended to attach a consequence to bringing claims or responses that have little prospect of success.

What again may be apparent in the second stage of the tribunal process is the potential for a greater burden on the claimant. As the Bill is only at its Second Stage, it is important that the House consider the implications of that extra requirement on the claimant and whether it may prevent access to a fair resolution. That is particularly true when an extra amount of money is required; for example, a deposit to proceed with the tribunal. I share the concerns that Mr Flanagan and Mr McCann outlined around deposits and how that could be detrimental to the interests of achieving justice for those taking a tribunal. I am sure that, as public representatives, we have all dealt with people who have had difficult experiences and been treated badly in work situations. We would not want to have anything in the Bill that will present a problem in taking it forward in the interests of natural justice.

We welcome the amendments, and I look forward to speaking on the second group.

Mr Anderson: As a member of the Employment and Learning Committee, I welcome the opportunity to speak to some of the amendments in group 1. The Committee has been favourably disposed to the Bill, and a lot of work went into the scrutiny of it. I record my thanks to the Committee staff and all who have helped to bring the Bill to this stage.

The Bill has been some time in the making, but we accept that there is a need to modernise employment law. If we are to be a growing economy, we want to see good industrial relations, which can only be in the best interests of employers and employees. We must also ensure that we reduce bureaucracy to a minimum so that businesses can develop and expand without the need to attend to endless regulations and red tape.

I will now offer a few comments on the amendments in group 1, which come under the composite heading of "Tribunals and assessments". Clauses 1 to 4 deal with industrial tribunals, in particular early conciliation and neutral assessment. I very much support early conciliation and neutral assessment, because we must do all that we can to reduce confrontation and encourage resolution. That overall aim is not affected by the amendments. The Minister has indicated that he will oppose clauses 4 and 8 and that they will be replaced by new clause 9A, which is tabled as amendment No 6. New clause 9A will provide the Department rather than the Labour Relations Agency with the power to make regulations for the neutral assessment service. The Department believes that it will therefore be better able to prepare for the setting-up of that service. The regulations under new clause 9A will be made under the negative resolution procedure and will cover issues such as what the neutral assessment service will consist of and how it might deliver.

Amendment No 7 would introduce new clause 9B, which deals with the review of the early conciliation service one year after its introduction and then on a three-yearly basis. The clause needs to be slightly amended to address confidentiality issues, but that can be taken forward at Further Consideration Stage. Amendment No 8, which would introduce new clause 9C, is not being moved today, and I suspect that we will take that back to the Committee.

Amendment No 2 was tabled by the Minister in response to Committee concerns. It amends clause 5, which is one of the clauses covering industrial tribunals. It deals with the power to require a party to proceedings to pay a deposit. The amendment would ensure that regulations dealing with deposits are subject to the affirmative resolution procedure, and we welcome that change.

Amendment No 1 would amend clause 5 by preventing multiple deposits. I oppose that amendment, because clause 5 provides an enabling power, and regulations will be made in due course. We should not tie the Department's hands at this stage in the Bill in the way in which amendment No 1 would do.

Amendment No 3, tabled by the Minister, is a technical amendment to clause 7, which deals with the extension of time limits to allow for conciliation. It makes a necessary change to clause 7(1), which amends the Fair Employment and Treatment (Northern Ireland) Order 1998 and will remove an obsolete reference to provisions that have now been repealed by the Employment Act (Northern Ireland) 2011.

Amendment No 5 relates to clause 9. It is also a departmental amendment and is similar to amendment No 2, which deals with industrial tribunals. Again, it has been tabled in response to Committee concerns about the need for affirmative resolution. It amends the Fair Employment and Treatment (Northern Ireland) Order 1998 to ensure that any regulations that are made around deposits are done on the basis of affirmative resolution.

I also oppose amendment No 4, which is an amendment to clause 9. It does for clause 9 what amendment No 1 does for clause 5, and I oppose it for the same reasons as I oppose amendment No 1.

Amendment Nos 18 and 19 amend schedule 3 and are technical changes that simply tidy up references to provisions that have been repealed. I leave my remarks on group 1 there.

Mr Easton: I will speak on group 1, and I thank the staff for all the help that they have given on the Bill so far. I support the Minister in opposition to clauses 4 and 8. I support amendment Nos 2, 3, 5, 6, 7, 8, 18 and 19, and I will speak on amendment Nos 1 and 4.

The Committee was briefed by officials, who explained that there was no need for amendment No 1 as draft affirmative procedure would be used for regulations on deposits. The amendment would allow multiple appeals, which have the potential to be bogus and would potentially allow multiple appeals to go ahead without the appellant having to pay for them after the initial appeal. It could be costly and time-consuming for the Department and could be open to abuse. The amendment is ill thought-out.

On amendment No 4, which is basically the same, the Committee was briefed by officials, who explained that there was no need for the amendment as draft affirmative procedure would be used for regulations. As with amendment No 1 — I have to repeat myself, unfortunately — this amendment would basically allow multiple appeals, which have the potential to be bogus, and would allow appeals to go ahead without the appellant having to pay for them after the initial appeal. It could be costly to the Department and very time-consuming. The amendment is ill thought-out.

Mr B McCrea: One of the things that are quite strange in the debate is the point on affirmative resolution made by Mr Easton and by the Minister in his opening remarks. I was really struck by how we were making such a play to move from a negative resolution as suggested in, I think, amendment Nos 2 and 5. The Minister made a great play to Mr Flanagan and the supporters of their amendments, saying, “You do not need to bring this in. It is not necessary, because we will do it by order or by regulation, or it will come to the Assembly and you will be able to have it by affirmative resolution”. Here is the interesting dilemma. Members have spoken and have said, “We are not really happy with the way that you are going to move on this issue. We do not think it is necessary, and then we are going to move to affirmative resolution”. What is the difference? I have just been talking to Wallace High School, explaining to them the difference and explaining petitions of concern. Affirmative resolution means that you will have to get a positive “yes” vote to make a change. Of course, any vote that is positive “yes” can be opposed by a valid petition of concern. The movement from a negative resolution to a positive resolution means that you will be able to stop any changes. We are getting more stasis in the Chamber, and we will not be able to make amendments that we want to make.

I apologised to Mr Flanagan, who realised that I was not able to be in the Chamber to hear his contribution, and I read the Hansard report of the previous debate on the matter.

Members are rightly concerned about multiple claims and whether there will be some impediment. That tells me that many things in the Bill have not yet been resolved. We have said, “Do you know what? We will deal with that later under affirmative resolution and look at it in the new mandate”, but I do not think that we will be able to do that.

12.00 noon

I give notice that I will oppose the changes to affirmative resolution. I do not think that that is the right way to go forward. We should have the debate here and now. If Mr Flanagan can marshal his arguments, he should be in a position to win his debate. This is the proper way to do it rather than pushing it to another date in another way when there could be unforeseen circumstances.

Mr Flanagan: I thank the Member for giving way. It is good that he acknowledges that he was not here for earlier contributions, because some Members highlighted the fact that the Minister can introduce a change to the system, and, if the Assembly does not agree, it is up to the Assembly to call that in and to try to overturn it, which presents considerable difficulty. The best way to make changes of this nature, which can be controversial and contentious, is through affirmative resolution, whereby, if the Minister wants to make that change, it should be done with the prior approval of the House instead of the House overturning his decision, which, as I am sure you will be concerned, would present the place in a very poor light.

Mr B McCrea: I apologised for not being here. I thought that the debate might have run a little longer. In my discussions with Wallace High School, we listened to the debate in order to explain the implications of employment law for young people and our desire to get them jobs and employment in this part of the world.

The fundamental change from negative resolution to affirmative resolution brings petitions of concern into play. The Member raised the point, so he will be aware that our current set-up under the various agreements — the Good Friday Agreement, the St Andrews Agreement and the Fresh Start Agreement — is that the Executive have primacy. If you are a Minister, you are given executive control. I am sure that the Member and his party recognise that fact, and, for better or worse, it was a hard-fought-for political solution. It is not generally the case that this place can overturn ministerial decisions. In fact, what we have seen is the repeated use of petitions of concern.

To avoid doubt, I raise that issue here and now. This is a classic case of the dog that does not bark. If it has no meaning, why are we making such an issue out of moving from negative resolution to affirmative resolution? Here is what will happen: it will be impossible for the House to change any of these regulations in the face of a petition of concern. That is not the right way forward. I would much prefer to have an argument, discussion or resolution on the various points. Mr Flanagan should be entitled to win his argument, if he and his colleagues can do so without having to rely on some procedural motion.

I have made my points on the issues that I want to deal with. I cannot help but think that some things that we are trying to achieve have been lost in the haste to push the legislation through. Perhaps I will deal with those when I speak on the second group of amendments.

Dr Farry: In light of the constructive way that most Members approached the debate on this group of amendments, I will try to be relatively brief. I thank the Chair, members and staff of the Committee for the speedy and efficient way that they addressed the Committee Stage of the Bill. The Chair referred to several records that have been made. The Committee will no doubt be very much aware of those not only in the context of this Assembly but in the context of other legislatures around the world and how quickly it has dealt with the Bill. That was done without accelerated passage.

In reference to what Mr McCrea said, I would not suggest for one moment that we have rushed the Bill. The review of employment law started in 2012, and there has been a lot of discussion about issues in and outside the Bill in many fora. Today, we have issues on which it is possible to build a consensus across the House, and it is in that spirit that we should consider the amendments. In particular, the Committee has approached the Bill in a very pragmatic manner. There are issues for another day, and we will come back to them in due course.

I recognise the Chair and the Committee's understanding of the potential problem with confidentiality in proposed new clause 9C(3)(c). No doubt we will address that fully at Further Consideration Stage when we tidy everything up. I think that there is a mutual recognition that it is something that we need to address. I thank him for recognising the approach that we are taking to multiple deposits, which, it is probably fair to say, was the main issue of discussion in the House this morning in relation to this set of amendments.

The Deputy Chair of the Committee, Mr Buchanan, set the context very well when he spoke about the balance to be struck between the different perspectives on the benefits or otherwise of multiple deposits. It is worth stressing at this point that the Bill is supported by employers and employee organisations, that is, trades unions. They approach the issue from different perspectives, but there is a common understanding that the Bill works on everyone's behalf. This is not zero-sum politics, where a win for one side is a loss for the other. Of course, there are other issues that the interest groups want to be considered, and over which there are major differences of opinion, that are not in the Bill. Members are very much aware of them, and perhaps we will touch on some of them when debating the second group of amendments later.

I appreciate Mr Flanagan's comments on how the Bill has been taken forward. He acknowledged that the Department and I did not at any stage consider the introduction of fees for access to tribunals. I take issue, however, with his premise that, in some way, there is an agenda to compromise the rights of workers or that we are walking along a very fine edge. That is not my agenda. What we are trying to do is to find a system of employment relations for Northern Ireland that works in the interests of employers and employees more efficiently and effectively. Going to a tribunal, as is people's right and will always be their right, is the end point of the spectrum of interventions. It is in everyone's interest to address disputes further back along the spectrum, starting with prevention, which is about good practice in the workplace. Where disputes arise, you want to address them as much as possible through the different alternative dispute resolution mechanisms, and that is what we are trying to put forward in the Bill. That is the ethos behind the Bill.

There has been a lot of discussion, therefore, of the issue of multiple deposits and the shift. It has been the practice to handle multiple deposits through regulation. There is always a tension between what goes into a Bill and what is addressed through regulations. It is important for Members to bear in mind the distinction between a Bill, which is there for quite a long period — opportunities to amend primary legislation are fairly infrequent — and regulations, which can be changed more frequently. That is a factor in determining the level of detail that should go into a Bill. Issues to do with deposits have traditionally been viewed as suitable for regulations.

Obviously, and this touches on the comments made by Mr McCrea, if you move from handling something through negative to affirmative resolution, that changes the balance and how it moves through the House.

If you move to something having to be done by affirmative resolution, there is a risk because, when you are looking for active approval of the Assembly, a petition of concern could block a proposal from a Minister. However, that is a reflection of where we are in the Assembly. People want to change that in some ways, but that is the reality of the need to build a consensus around issues where people feel that there are potential breaches of people's particular interests.

That said, moving now to put in the Bill the outcome around multiple deposits is prejudicing the policy process that we are still undertaking. That process has not really been given full Committee scrutiny. In some ways, Mr Flanagan was implying that this was the sounder way of going about it. What is proposed today is actually curtailing people's rights and opportunities to have scrutiny of this issue. With a switch from negative to affirmative resolution, and indeed Mr Flanagan was to the forefront of this, the Committee has been very keen to ensure that the safeguard is in place that any decision will have to have the full approval of the Assembly, rather than adoption of the negative procedure as was the original draft of how we approach these things.

With that, there are full safeguards for the Assembly. Nothing is lost from the rights of the Assembly if it waits until the policy is fully evolved and full scrutiny has occurred. Frankly, to move ahead today with the amendments from Mr Flanagan and his colleagues would cut off any discussion of that process. That process, in all probability, will suggest that we do not have multiple deposits, but it is important that we listen to the stakeholders in our wider society and ensure that we find the right overall balance in how we address these issues. I stress that they are all about having a proper equilibrium between how we address the interests of employers and the interests of employees within a system.

We are doing all that we can, and we have avoided many of the changes in Great Britain. One of the pluses of having devolution in Northern Ireland is that we avoid many of the things that have impacted on the rights of individual workers that we have seen elsewhere. At the same time, we have to recognise that the process of tribunals can be very lengthy and very stressful. For companies, it can be a diversion of staff and other resources. For those taking cases, it can be a very difficult process as well. It can be a financially risky process, particularly if people feel obliged to spend some of their own resource on getting legal assistance. Therefore, it is in people's interests that we try to find that balance and try to invest as much as we can in alternative dispute resolution. I again urge the House to reject the amendments from Mr Flanagan and his colleagues, not because we necessarily disagree with where they are going but because they are not necessary at this stage and because, after the full process is done, the Assembly will still have exactly the same ability to influence an outcome.

Comments were also made on neutral assessment, first by the Chair and also by Mr Diver. I stress again that we are not moving away from neutral assessment. It has to be very much part of the spectrum of the different interventions that are available. We are simply moving from neutral assessment being telegraphed as something that the LRA would offer to a situation, with the amendments tabled today, whereby neutral assessment is there but we have a process to determine in which of the different types of bodies that are involved in employment relations it best sits. That could be the LRA. Equally, it could be the Tribunals Service, which is already piloting such an intervention, or a set of third parties.

I think that that covers most of the comments that were made at this stage. We look forward to moving to the second group in due course.

(3) The report shall in particular include—

(a) a synopsis of consultation responses;

(d) any savings directly attributable to the introduction of these provisions.

(4) The Department shall also review and report as in subsections (2) and (3) at the end of the period of three years beginning with the coming into operation of early conciliation.”.— [Mr Swann (The Chairperson of the Committee for Employment and Learning).]

New clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Mr Speaker: I will not call amendment No 8 as it is mutually exclusive with opposition to clauses 4 and 8, neither of which stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 10 to 13 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Mr Speaker: We now come to the second group of amendments for debate. With amendment No 9, it will be convenient to debate amendment Nos 10 to 17, which deal with information, employment rights and traineeships. I call the Minister for Employment and Learning to move amendment No 9 and to address the other amendments in the group.

Dr Farry: I beg to move amendment No 9: In page 10, line 28, after “Assembly” insert

“or to the Secretary of State for laying before both Houses of Parliament”.

No 17: In clause 20, page 13, line 31, after “only” insert “by or”.— [Dr Farry (The Minister for Employment and Learning).]

Dr Farry: I will deal first with amendment No 9, which is to clause 14. Clause 14 as introduced establishes regulation-making powers that require a prescribed person for the purposes of article 67F of the Employment Rights (Northern Ireland) Order 1996 to produce an annual report on disclosures. During consultation on that issue, the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission, which is a prescribed person for the purpose of matters that engage human rights, was supportive of the policy proposal but was concerned that a requirement for it to report to the Assembly could be outside the legislative competence of the Assembly. Having reviewed the legal advice and engaged with the Secretary of State on the issue, I am satisfied that it is appropriate to bring forward this amendment so that, where a report relates to the functions of a body in the reserved field, it will be sent to the Secretary of State for laying before Parliament, rather than to the Department for laying before the Assembly. I ask Members to support that amendment to take account of the fact that certain arrangements remain outside the remit of the House. Without it, my Department will be unable to develop regulations that apply to the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission or any other body that is in a similar situation with regard to accountability to the devolved institutions.

Turning to amendment No 11, which relates to clause 17, I acknowledge at the outset the context of the Committee’s inquiry into careers policy and practice and its desire for a statutory duty in relation to the provision of advice. As introduced, clause 17 enables my Department to make regulations concerning the impartial provision, by suitably qualified persons, of careers guidance that is identified as being in the best interests of those receiving it. I have been asked by the Employment and Learning Committee to strengthen the clause by bringing forward an amendment that converts the enabling power to make regulations concerning careers guidance into a duty on the Department to do so. Having given the issue some thought, I am proposing a revision that meets the Committee’s understandable desire to see action taken in that important area. The amended clause will require the Department to make arrangements to provide careers guidance for such persons as it considers appropriate. Such guidance must be provided in an impartial manner and be in the best interests of the person receiving it.

The new obligations on the Department do not require regulations to be introduced. The Department must simply comply with the requirements. However, the revised clause will still contain a regulation-making power. That is to enable the Department to deal in more detail with the provision of careers guidance, including the means of delivery and the qualifications of the persons developing or delivering it. The clause commits the Department to taking action and extends flexibility to flesh out requirements in regulations, where appropriate. The Committee’s proposal will help to strengthen clause 17, and I hope that Members will support the amendment.

I also propose to amend clause 18, which deals with apprenticeships, to include provision in relation to traineeships. That is the purpose of amendment Nos 12 and 13. Traineeships will be the new professional and technical training offer for 16- to 24-year-olds, as articulated in the recently published youth training strategy, ‘Generating our Success’. A completed traineeship will provide an individual with a qualification equivalent to five GCSEs at grades A* to C, including English and maths. The purpose of including a reference to apprenticeships and traineeships in the clause is to recognise that, while complementary parts of the new professional and technical training system, they are different offerings. Traineeships will be available in professional and technical occupations at skills level two. Apprenticeships will be available in professional and technical occupations from skills level three to skills level eight.

If amendment No 13 is agreed in addition to amendment No 12, the clause will also specify that regulations may make provision about the components of apprenticeships or traineeships. Components are the various elements that need to be in place for a particular training programme to be recognised as an apprenticeship or traineeship. The components will ensure that there are clearly defined requirements with respect to apprenticeships and traineeships and will ensure a high-quality offer and consistency across different occupational areas.

I now want to draw Members' attention to amendment No 16, which affects clause 19. Clause 19, as introduced, amends article 33 of the Employment Relations (Northern Ireland) Order 1999. As this is a somewhat technical issue, some context will be helpful. Article 33 of the 1999 Order requires my Department to make an order updating the maximum amounts of certain awards of industrial tribunals and other amounts payable under employment legislation for each year in which there have been changes to the retail prices index (RPI) between one September and the next. The amounts that must be updated include the maximum compensatory award for a finding of unfair dismissal and the weekly rate used for calculating statutory redundancy payments. Clause 19, as drafted, amends article 33(2) of the 1999 Order so that future changes to the relevant limits are to be made on 6 April each year, rather than, as is the current arrangement, "as soon as practicable". That provides greater certainty about when changes will be applied. Clause 19 also modifies the rounding calculation set out in article 33(3) of the 1999 Order so that changes in amounts are rounded up or down to the nearest pound. That ensures that they more accurately track the rate of inflation as measured by the RPI. Finally, clause 19 introduces a new paragraph into article 33 — article 33(7) — specifying that my Department may at any time make an order increasing or decreasing sums dealt with under article 33 without reference to the RPI. That will give the Department flexibility to review rates in a more fundamental way but with the safeguard that any order of that kind has to be laid in draft before, and approved by, the Assembly before becoming operational.

Since the Bill was introduced, there has been a realisation that, if amounts are revised by an order of this kind, there may be no need to make a further order that is linked to the RPI for that year. Amendment No 16 resolves that issue by providing that there is no need to make an RPI-linked order under article 33(2) where an order is made under the new article 33(7).

Amendment No 17 affects clause 20. Again, allow me to provide some background. Clause 20 introduces a new article 90B into the Industrial Relations (Northern Ireland) Order 1992, prohibiting the disclosure of information relating to a worker, employer or trade union that the Labour Relations Agency holds in connection with performing its duties. Article 90B(2) specifies the circumstances in which the prohibition does not apply. For example, it does not apply if the disclosure is made for the purposes of a criminal investigation, or in a way that means that no one to whom the information relates can be identified. Article 90B(4) of the order makes a breach of the prohibition a criminal offence, punishable by a fine. Article 90B(5) provides that the prosecution of such an offence requires the consent of the Director of Public Prosecutions.

Following discussions with the Public Prosecution Service (PPS), the Department has determined that a minor amendment to the wording is necessary to provide the PPS with increased flexibility in taking cases of this kind forward. The change will allow the director or a member of staff, on the director's behalf, to institute proceedings. That is consistent with the approach taken by the PPS to a range of issues.

I will now say a few words about a number of proposed amendments that have been tabled by Members, and which deal with matters that are not currently provided for in the Bill. Amendment No 10 has been tabled by Mr

Flanagan, Mr McCann and Ms McGahan. The amendment introduces clause 16A, which requires my Department to make regulations obliging employers to publish information dealing with gender pay imbalances. Where such imbalances exist, the clause requires employers to publish an action plan to eliminate them. The clause also requires my Department to publish an action plan on eliminating gender pay differentials. That is the essence of the clause.

That is an important policy area. The amendment essentially replicates section 78 of the Equality Act 2010, which applies in Great Britain only, albeit the relevant regulations have not yet been enacted. The Department with lead policy responsibility for gender pay is the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister. From May, the responsibility will pass to the new Department for Communities. At no point does the proposed clause 16A define "Department" which, in accordance with clause 25, must, therefore, be read as a reference to the Department for Employment and Learning and in future, therefore, the Department for the Economy. It also creates specific timelines for the introduction of regulations, which may prove to be unrealistic, especially with elections coming up, the creation of a new Department and the need for the Department to do the necessary policy work and consultation from a standing start.

12.30 pm

In Northern Ireland, gender discrimination on the basis of pay is prohibited by EU law and by two separate but related domestic statutes: the Equal Pay Act (Northern Ireland) 1970 and the Sex Discrimination (Northern Ireland) Order 1976. The former applies to contractual pay, and the latter covers non-contractual issues, such as recruitment, training, promotion, dismissal and the allocation of benefits. There is no legal requirement in either piece of legislation for employers to publish information about the pay of their employees. Engagement with OFMDFM officials suggests that they are not aware of any recent discussion on the issue, nor are there any recent proposals to introduce such a requirement.

An Equality Commission code of practice published in 2013 provides practical guidance for employers on how to promote equality of opportunity and avoid sex discrimination in pay structures. The code does not itself impose legal obligations, but it gives general guidance to employers regarding their legal obligations under the Equal Pay Act (Northern Ireland) 1970. The code is, however, admissible in evidence in any proceedings under the Act.

An OFMDFM statistics and research branch publication entitled 'Gender Equality Statistics 2015 Update' contains statistics on pay and earnings that show that in 2014 the average median full-time gross weekly earnings for a male were £460·50 compared with £444·40 for a female. Given the clear differential between male and female weekly earnings, I consider that the purpose behind the amendment is a positive one. However, it has not been raised with my Department throughout the preparations for the Bill, it was not raised at Committee Stage and no preparatory policy considerations have been undertaken, consultations carried out or impact assessments conducted. It is also not something on which the Executive have agreed a position or that we should approach in a rushed or ad hoc manner.

I think that Members will be in agreement that we want to see the elimination of gender pay differentials. I do not believe that is in dispute. As a Department, that is not our current responsibility, so as Minister for Employment and Learning, I cannot take a formal view on the matter in that regard. It is something that is very much in the hands of the Assembly. However, I am personally sympathetic to the intent of the amendment. Perhaps, given some of the potential pitfalls that I have raised so far, I suggest that the proposers may wish to opt not to move the amendment today and to table a revised version at Further Consideration Stage.

I turn now to amendment number 14. The new clause 18A that Mr McCrea is proposing through the amendment would increase from one to two years the period for which an individual must be employed before having the right to make a claim to an industrial tribunal of unfair dismissal. As I indicated at Second Stage, my Department has consulted extensively on the matter, and I am satisfied that there is insufficient evidence at this stage to support what would be a very significant change to our system of employment protections. I appreciate that there are strong views in favour of changing the unfair dismissal qualifying period. However, there are also strong views opposing change. Without wanting to oversimplify the matter, employer organisations have tended to support a change, while employee representatives have opposed it.

It is clear that there is no political consensus on the issue. Unfair dismissal is a very serious matter. It can affect an individual's livelihood, future job prospects, physical and mental health and sense of self-worth. In the absence of clear evidence and support for a move away from the present position at this time, I cannot support the new clause.

Mr Ross: Will the Minister give way?

Dr Farry: Yes.

Mr Ross: I know that, last week or the week before, the Minister was overseas helping to try to attract investors to Northern Ireland to create jobs. From his experience of working alongside the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment or, indeed, Invest Northern Ireland, does he understand their view on whether employers, when they are looking to invest in Northern Ireland, look at more flexibility to encourage them to create jobs and, indeed, whether smaller, family-run companies will be more likely to create new jobs if the risk of doing so is diminished by giving them more flexibility when it comes to unfair dismissal?

Dr Farry: I thank the Member for his comments. Maybe that is slightly jumping ahead of some of the things I was going to say. First of all, with regard to my inward investment efforts, I have not really received much representation about employment law issues. It is, however, something that is cited by employer organisations as part of their concern at this time. It is fair to say, however, that the evidence base is not yet established. I will move on, but I will just say that the issue does not die today, so we are not in the situation where we have to take a decision on it either way at this moment in time. Looking at our competitive position internationally, I would say that the qualifying period for collective redundancies where more than 100 redundancies are being made is probably a bigger issue in how we stand out compared with international practice. That includes both our neighbours, Great Britain and the Republic of Ireland.

Picking up on what Mr Ross said and more generally, I want to stress that, as I said at Second Stage, rejecting change now does not rule it out for the foreseeable future. If there is clear evidence and a degree of consensus to support it — there is not at present — a change to the qualifying period can be made through secondary legislation. I will retain an open mind on that issue and encourage other Members to do so.

Mr B McCrea: Will the Minister give way?

Dr Farry: Yes.

Mr B McCrea: Can you clarify whether that secondary legislation would be agreed via affirmative or negative resolution?

Dr Farry: We are about to come to that. It is by confirmatory procedure, moving to affirmative procedure. Clause 21 modifies the procedure for making such secondary legislation in that it ensures that no change can be made without the prior approval of the Assembly.

Mr B McCrea: Will the Minister give way?

Dr Farry: Yes.

Mr B McCrea: I want to clarify something about the move to affirmative resolution. What the Minister said raises the possibility of a petition of concern stopping the issue. His assertion that the matter is not finished could be open to a different interpretation — I shall put it that way — in that I think that this will be the end of the matter. If we vote no to my amendment and accept affirmative resolution for change, that is the end of it forever and a day; we will not get it through. We should maybe address the issue today.

Dr Farry: The point that the Member makes applies as much to what is happening today in that the Assembly could very easily table a petition of concern against Mr McCrea's amendment. That situation has not arisen today, for whatever reason. Members will know that I set a very high bar for when petitions of concern should be used, but that could well have happened in relation to Mr McCrea's amendment. We will have a democratic vote on that and perhaps a democratic vote in the context of a future Minister making a recommendation through draft resolutions to change the qualifying period. I do not think that we are any better or worse off through not having the amendment agreed today than we would be if we left it to the affirmative resolution procedure.

I want to make it clear that we propose to move from the current situation where it is done through a confirmatory procedure to the use of the affirmative procedure. That provides safeguards because, as the situation presently exists, any Minister could take a decision that might ultimately not be agreed to by the Assembly but would nevertheless remain in place for a short time until the Assembly voted on the issue. That would, at the very best, create confusion and, at the very worst, create chaos in employment law. That is why we are tightening it up and making it the affirmative procedure. Under both the confirmatory and affirmative procedures, there has to be a positive vote in the Assembly. In that context, the situation does not change in any respect.

I stress that, given the degree of sensitivity around the issue, we should approach it with the ambition of at least trying to get consensus in the Assembly. It may well be that, as we look to employment relations and employment law issues as a package, we will sometimes see that it makes sense to liberalise something in one direction at the same time as we look to put in place other protections elsewhere. That is perhaps a scenario down the line, and we could see some of these issues moving ahead in that way. I stress that the evidence is not yet established on this. However, I certainly retain an open mind, and I hope others will do so as well. The Assembly may well wish to return to the issue in the future; indeed, a future Minister for the Economy may wish to move in that respect and table regulations to the Committee and the Assembly and see what happens in that regard.

I come to amendment No 15. By way of the amendment, Mr Flanagan, Mr McCann and Ms McGahan propose the adoption of new clause 18A, which would prohibit the use of zero-hours contracts, as defined in that clause. I explained at Second Stage that I support reform of zero-hours contracts. However, I cannot support this clause.

It is a complex issue, to which a nuanced approach is necessary. We are seeing increased casualisation in the labour market in Northern Ireland and other jurisdictions. Zero-hours contracts are one example of that increased casualisation. They may work for some businesses in which flexibility is important. For some workers, they also may be beneficial, and that has been demonstrated through various surveys. For others, they are regarded as being exploitative, where there is uncertainty over pay and hours and potential impacts on family life and benefits, such as accessing mortgages.

There is a strong case that our employment law should keep up with employment practice. Therefore, there should be proportionate regulation. In the proposals that I originally had in mind, I wanted to see an approach developed that would support the responsible use and regulation of contracts of that kind and that could tackle the abuse of such arrangements without eliminating reasonable flexibility and choice. My Department consulted on proposals around zero-hours contracts in 2014 and put to the Executive in February 2015 a paper proposing a range of progressive measures to regulate the use of contracts of that kind.

The proposed reforms were more radical than the recent measures in Great Britain. They went well beyond simply banning exclusivity clauses, which affect only a small minority of those on zero-hours contracts, with the potential also for the creation of a statutory code and rights to request a regular employment contract after a prescribed period. I regret that no agreement was reached at the Executive on the issue. It is for others to explain why that was the case.

What is proposed today in amendment No 15 is an outright ban on zero-hours contracts. There has been no public consultation on an outright ban. The Committee for Employment and Learning has not yet had the opportunity to have detailed consideration and scrutiny of the issues. There has been no assessment of the potential impacts on business or on opportunities for employment. Even without a detailed assessment, however, it is clear that an outright ban would significantly impact on our economy, affecting many businesses and those whom they employ. At the same time as addressing abuse, it would eliminate what currently works for employer and employee. The amendment lacks the kind of proportionate approach that I originally wanted to pursue.

Any realistic opportunity for considering that important issue during the present mandate has now gone. There needs to be time for the proper scrutiny of any measures around zero-hours contracts to ensure that they will do what they are designed to do; namely, to prevent unforeseen consequences, build consensus and secure buy-in from stakeholders. That is something that regrettably we do not yet have, or have the time to accomplish.

Indeed, some immediate risks could arise from an outright ban. Once any measure became law, employers would be faced with changing the nature of employment contracts, and that may not be feasible in every situation, particularly where flexibility is at a premium. There is therefore a prospect that an outright ban could lead to the loss of thousands of jobs. My understanding is that the thousands of bank nurses contracted to the health trusts in Northern Ireland could be construed as being on zero-hours contracts. There are 10,000 names on the Northern Ireland Substitute Teacher Register (NISTR) who can also be regarded as being on zero-hours contracts, together with those on a number of such contracts in the further and higher education system. Therefore, the import of an outright ban on zero-hours contracts, if that were to be adopted, would be to create chaos in the health and education systems.

I also draw the attention of the House to a possible flaw in the definition of “zero hours contracts” in the Small Business, Enterprise and Employment Act 2015 — from which the definition in the amendment is drawn — whereby a contract will come within the definition, and therefore the protections of legislation, only if a worker is obliged to accept work when it is made available.

I appreciate that those are important matters, and I look forward to hearing the views of Members on the amendments in the group.

Mr Speaker: Before you sit down, Minister, can you confirm for the record that you formally moved amendment No 9?

Dr Farry: Yes.

Mr Speaker: Thank you.

Mr Flanagan: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Speaker: Too late. You are on the speaking list.

Mr Flanagan: No challenges here.

Mr Speaker: I call, then, the Chairperson of the Committee for Employment and Learning, Mr Robin Swann.

Mr Swann (The Chairperson of the Committee for Employment and Learning): Thank you very much, Mr Speaker. As Chairperson of the Committee, I welcome amendment No 11, which amends clause 17. Clause 17 concerns the provision of careers guidance. The Committee welcomed the Department’s intention to introduce regulations providing impartial careers guidance on the back of the recommendations from the Committee’s inquiry into careers education, advice, information and guidance. However, the Committee felt that the duty on the Department was not strong enough and asked the Department to strengthen clause 17. It agreed to do so, amending the wording from “The Department may make arrangements” to “The Department must make arrangements”. The Committee is therefore content with the proposed amendment to clause 17.

Amendment Nos 12 and 13 amend clause 18, which concerns the provision of apprenticeships. The Committee welcomed the introduction of a statutory duty regarding the provision of apprenticeships but took on board the concerns of stakeholders who called for this power to be broader. The Department took on board these concerns and seeks to amend clause 18 to make provision for traineeships as well as apprenticeships. At that, the Committee is content with clause 18 as amended. The Committee supports the Bill and will watch closely how it is implemented.

During Committee Stage, the Committee did not have sight of amendment Nos 10, 14 or 15, so I will be speaking as the Ulster Unionist spokesperson for employment and learning. Amendment No 10 came as a surprise as it was not raised at any stage in Committee. On behalf of the Ulster Unionist Party, I am happy with the intent of this amendment, but I ask its proposers to take forward the offer that the Minister has made to bring forward the appropriate amendments to this current amendment, which would see it being more flexible and more user-friendly so that we would be able to support it and deliver the intent of this amendment. We are content to support the intention and the overall thrust of the amendment if it can be properly delivered at Further Consideration Stage.

The issue that amendment No 14 seeks to deal with was discussed in Committee, but, again, has been mentioned and contained in regulations. Mr McCrea said that issues do not have to die today, but I feel that, with this piece of legislation, neither the Committee nor the House has received the evidence or had the foresight to receive what was going to happen in regard to this amendment. I am also led to believe that, because of the concerns that have been raised, there may be moves to table a petition of concern on this amendment. I think that Mr McCrea has raised the issue of moving from draft affirmative to regulations being possibly brought about in the House today. Rather than the cut and thrust of the debate and the democratic process being brought forward, Mr McCrea, you have been the author of your own destiny in this case.

Mr B McCrea: Will the Member give way?

Mr Swann: Yes.

Mr B McCrea: Before we move off that issue, the elephant in the room is that the qualifying period for unfair dismissal is a big issue. It is something that people have very strong views on. I have to say that I am surprised that the Ulster Unionist Party, which I previously thought was a party that supported the conservative position, is now taking a different view from the one that it had taken before. I am sure that, as Mr Ross mentioned, there are many small owner-run businesses that have supplied evidence to him and his Committee and his party to say that this is a very serious issue. I am far from being a prophet of my own doom; I actually think that this is where we should be having the debate. This is what we want to do. If a petition of concern comes forward, that is the process, but we should have the debate front and central. This is important. This is not a knee-jerk reaction. This is something that we need a considered opinion on.

Mr Swann: I fully agree with the Member's comments. He talks about the Ulster Unionist position, and I remember attending an Ulster Unionist group meeting where he and I had exactly the same conversation on whether we should move to two years rather than one year. At that stage, the party retained the one-year position, if I am correct. I think that he was Chair of the Employment and Learning Committee at that stage. When the first section of the Bill came forward, that was one of the issues that was raised. I think that the Member knows well my position and where we, as the Ulster Unionist Party, agreed our position at that time. The concerns of small employers and all of the rest of it were taken into consideration, and I think that that is where the Minister has given the opportunity here not to close the door on this. It will be unfortunate if a petition of concern does come down to bring that finality into this debate, because the abuse of petitions of concern in the House, which the Member has raised, has killed debate and continues to do so on this very issue and other issues.

We will be opposing amendment No 15. That is not because we do not want to see the abuse of zero-hours contracts ended. It is because we do not think that this amendment will bring about the intention that the Member sees in it. In regard to the concerns that have been mentioned, this amendment would introduce an outright ban on zero-hours contracts.

As Chair and Ulster Unionist spokesman on employment and learning, I know that concerns have been raised with regard to health bank nurses and supply teachers. Employers also raised concerns about what the amendment would deliver. One union, in particular, raised concerns about how the amendment would affect some of its employees and feels that the totality of zero-hours contracts and the problems that they bring about have not been fully addressed. That goes back to why the Bill was delayed for so long: this was one of the contentious issues on which the Executive parties could not agree. The opportunity to manage and bring about regulations on zero hours is not a problem for the House, but it was a problem that could not make its way out of the Executive.

The amendment is also somewhat lacking in its definition of zero hours. Looking at it from a layman's point of view, I could see employers who wanted to abuse the system moving very quickly to annualised hours contracts and one-hour-a-year contracts. There are options that move away from the very tight definition that the Members have brought to the House. That is why we will oppose amendment No 15. That concludes my comments.

Mr Buchanan: In this group, I welcome amendment Nos 11, 12 and 13. Amendment No 11 deals with impartial careers guidance, and amendment Nos 12 and 13 not only deal with apprenticeships but take into account traineeships, which were not originally in the Bill.

As the Committee Chair said, amendment No 10 has come as something of a surprise, in that it never appeared before the Committee, and there was no discussion about it at any time in the Committee. The Committee is where it should have come to be scrutinised and debated. However, we as a party are of a mind to support the amendment, if it is moved. I have to add that, as the Minister said, changes need to be made to it, and we would like its supporters to take the opportunity to make those changes in order to make it more amenable.

Amendment No 14 changes the qualifying period from one year to two years. Members will know that opinion on the matter is much divided. A lot of people feel that it is a missed opportunity, and that was stated at Second Reading. The Confederation of British Industry, the Federation of Small Businesses and the Engineering Employers' Federation were among those to express disappointment, saying that they felt that the Bill was a missed opportunity to extend the qualifying period for unfair dismissal. They argued that it would ensure Northern Ireland's competitiveness and encourage inward investment and indigenous growth, and we cannot turn a blind eye to that. Opinion has been divided, but we see from the Engineering Employers' Federation and from all the folk involved in business that they are not really that divided on it. All say that it would be good to move from a one-year to a two-year period. We are, therefore, minded to support the amendment that the Member has brought to the House today.

Mr Flanagan: I thank the Member for giving way. Perhaps he disagrees with what his party colleague, the Member for East Antrim, said on the matter. I am talking about Mr Hilditch, not Mr Ross. At Second Stage, Mr Hilditch said:

"I support the idea of not following suit with the rest of the UK by deciding not to increase the qualifying period for unfair dismissals from one to two years." — [Official Report (Hansard), Bound Volume 111, p103, col 1].

What has happened to the DUP policy since that stage?

Mr Buchanan: There was no consensus at Second Reading, and the Minister said that he would put forward a provision to deal with it. When we look at the issue before us, we see the strong concern coming from industry, and we cannot turn a blind eye to that. If we do, it will be at our peril, and we will be the losers in the long term. That is one of the reasons why we are of a mind to support the amendment.

Amendment No 15 relates to zero-hours contracts. We will not support that; we will oppose it. There has been no consultation on an outright ban on zero-hours contracts or assessment of the potential economic and equality impacts of such a ban. Even in the absence of an impact assessment, it is clear that an outright ban on such contracts would undoubtedly have significant impacts on many businesses and those whom they employ. An outright ban, as suggested by some, would have a disproportionate impact on flexibility in the economy and potentially remove some employment opportunities. Furthermore, employers could use diverse new means to obtain a measure of flexibility that circumvent any legislative response to the current situation.

Zero-hours contracts work well in some cases, although we are not turning a blind eye to the fact that there are some cases where they do not work as well as they should. That is why, as the Chair of the Committee said, we are not saying that the matter should not be amended, looked at or talked about and changed in some form or other, but banning it outright would close the door on that and have a detrimental impact on many small and medium-sized businesses across Northern Ireland. Therefore, we will oppose the amendment.

Mr Speaker: The Business Committee has arranged to meet at 1.00 pm today. I propose, therefore, by leave of the Assembly, to suspend the sitting until 2.00 pm. The first item of business when we return will be Question Time. The first Member to speak when we resume the debate will be Phil Flanagan.

The debate stood suspended.

The sitting was suspended at 12.56 pm.

On resuming (Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Dallat] in the Chair) —

Oral Answers to Questions

Employment and Learning

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): We will start with listed questions. I have to tell Members that questions 5 and 13 have been withdrawn.

Apprenticeships

1. Mr Newton asked the Minister for Employment and Learning for his assessment of the success of the employer-led apprenticeship programme compared to the programme-led apprenticeship scheme. (AQO 9580/11-16)

Dr Farry (The Minister for Employment and Learning): The new Northern Ireland apprenticeship strategy, Securing our Success, was published in June 2014, and the new youth training strategy, Generating our Success, was published in June 2015. Together, those strategies set out an ambitious programme of reform that has the potential to radically transform how professional and technical training is delivered.

My aim is to establish a world-class skills system that supports and meets the ambitions of our young people and provides Northern Ireland with a skills base capable of driving economic growth. Consistent with the best systems internationally, employers will be firmly in the lead of the reformed system. Through sector partnerships, they will work with curriculum experts to develop and agree the curriculum and content that will form the core of apprenticeships in each occupational area.

The new strategies are focused on raising quality, supporting a breadth of learning, underpinning progression and ensuring portability to deliver skills that will be recognised nationally and internationally as an exemplar. My Department is progressing with a number of projects that will allow the new system to be fully operational from September 2017.

Programme-led apprenticeships, which were introduced in 2009, were originally intended as a short-term contingency arrangement for apprentices who had been made unemployed as a result of the developing economic downturn. The aim was to provide participants with the knowledge, understanding and competence to work at a high level in their chosen occupation. Unfortunately, the downturn lasted much longer than was originally thought. The programme-led apprenticeship programme was successful in ensuring that young people continued to train at a time when there were no job opportunities. Fortunately, we are in a different place economically, and the new programme has been developed to support our economy and employers.

Mr Newton: I thank the Minister for that very detailed answer. I acknowledge that he has recognised the potential of the employer-led scheme, which, I understand, results in 80%-plus of apprentices ending up in employment with their host company. Why are we not seeking to further expand the employer-led scheme?

Employers recognise that they are meeting the needs of the industry, they have an input, and jobs are being offered to those who take part.

Dr Farry: I thank the Member for his comments. I assure him that our ambitions in that respect have no limits whatsoever. We want to see as much training happening through the apprenticeship system as possible. In essence, any professional or technical area can be addressed through the apprenticeship approach.

As the Member will appreciate, an apprenticeship is a job: someone will be in employment and will be trained on and off the job. Employers are in the driving seat. They determine where apprentice opportunities will be created, because, in essence, they are creating jobs. In the past, apprenticeships were awarded as part of contracts to suppliers who then tried to create jobs in particular areas. That is not the most efficient way of engaging with the market, particularly in evolving high-growth areas.

I suggest to the Member that we have the precise mechanisms in place. Our challenge is to make sure that we implement the strategy and get as much buy-in from employers as possible.

Mr F McCann: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for his answer to date. Employer-led apprenticeships were discussed at the Committee over a lengthy period. I raised some concerns. Whilst it is a good scheme, quite a number of people who would fit in the NEETs strategy would find it difficult to take part in it. How do you ensure that it does not move on and that those people are not left behind? I think that those are the types of people that Robin might have been talking about also.

Dr Farry: I thank the Member for his comments. It is important that we see our new apprenticeship system as part of a full spectrum of interventions. In addition to the new apprenticeship strategy, which covers level 3 through to level 8, we have the new youth training strategy at level 2. That is designed to address the needs of those young people who leave school, who perhaps do not yet have the qualifications to engage in the world of work, but who very clearly have that potential. Beyond that, we have to look at how we can assist those who are not eligible for the youth training scheme. That is why what we do with the NEETs strategy is so important, and that is supported by the European social fund at present.

In all those things, we have to recognise that we have to encourage people to progress and fulfil their potential, whatever that may be. We certainly have a challenge to ensure that we move as many people up the skills ladder as we possibly can. We know that, in the years to come, the profile of job opportunities will move more in the direction of intermediate and high-level skills and that opportunities for those with lower-level skills are set to diminish quite radically.

Mr Cochrane-Watson: I thank the Minister for his answer to the initial question. Does he believe that, as changes to apprenticeships alter the image of apprenticeship opportunities, that will then engage parents in the belief that apprenticeships are a positive means of getting their sons and daughters into the job market?

Dr Farry: I very much concur with what the Member is suggesting. It is important that we establish apprenticeships as a pathway with the same parity of esteem as the more traditional routes into college or university. Indeed, an apprenticeship will often be combined with college or university support, depending on the type of apprenticeship and the level at which it is offered. We should not see a hierarchy, whereby, for example, in the case of A levels, people who do not get into university then consider an apprenticeship. Apprenticeships have to be seen as being on a par. That is why we are developing a central service. We are trying to develop a portal that will market apprenticeship opportunities to young people. We are reforming the careers and guidance policy in Northern Ireland so as to ensure that we have a much more modern system, and one informed by where the opportunities lie in our economy.

We need to get the message out that people can often reach even greater heights, in society and where they are in the economy, through going down the apprenticeship route rather than the more traditional and familiar route. As the Member suggests, it is important that we convince parents of that change in approach. It is a much more lucrative approach, for the individual and for the economy as a whole.

Ms Lo: The Minister mentioned the new strategy for apprenticeships. What different outcomes can we expect from it?

Dr Farry: I thank the Member for her question. It is very much about how we can support the economy of Northern Ireland. Apprenticeships are not simply there as an end in themselves. It is about providing a much more efficient and effective way of delivering outcomes. We know that employers have often expressed frustration at not getting the particular skills that they require. This is the most effective way of remedying that situation. We also know, from the perspective of young people, that it will be the most reliable means by which they can find and sustain employment.

From looking around the European Union, we see that the societies that invest the most in apprenticeships and vocational training are those that are the most prosperous and have the lowest levels of youth unemployment. There are some very clear lessons for us to learn about what we can aspire to.

Apprenticeships

2. Mr Lunn asked the Minister for Employment and Learning for an update on the local implications of the proposed apprenticeship levy. (AQO 9581/11-16)

Dr Farry: The Chancellor of the Exchequer has announced his intention to introduce an apprentice levy for all UK private- and public-sector employers from April 2017. The levy will be set at half of 1% of an employer's total wage bill. All eligible local business and public-sector organisations will pay the levy, and all employers with an annual pay bill of over £3 million per annum are expected to be net contributors. Levy proceeds are to be used specifically to fund apprenticeship training in England. Apprenticeship policy is a devolved matter, so Northern Ireland and the other devolved Administrations will receive a proportionate share of the proceeds.

Although I fully support the development of a wider range of apprenticeships in both the private and public sector, in many ways, the UK Government's proposed apprenticeship levy could be viewed as an additional tax to business not only in Northern Ireland but across the UK. Furthermore, it has the potential to undermine the different apprenticeship strategies in each of the devolved regions and cut across the policymaking prerogatives of each of the Administrations on what is a devolved matter.

Northern Ireland employers will be expected to pay the apprenticeship levy, and I wish to ensure a fair and equitable reimbursement of the moneys raised to Northern Ireland and the other devolved Administrations.

I have held discussions with the Minister of Finance and Personnel, with my counterparts in Scotland and Wales, and with the Department for Business, Innovation and Skills (BIS) Skills Minister to press Northern Ireland's position and to ensure that any moneys due to Northern Ireland as a result of the levy's introduction are available to the new Department for the Economy to underpin the reforms that we are making to Northern Ireland's apprenticeship system and to support the wider skills needs of the economy.

Mr Lunn: I thank the Minister for his answers so far. Does he feel that the levy has the potential to undermine our local apprenticeship strategy and, if so, in what way?

Dr Farry: The strategy was designed by the Treasury as a means of raising additional revenue as part of its efforts to pay down the overall UK deficit. It is also based around the nature of the apprenticeships strategy in England, with very little consideration of the impact on the strategies in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland. In England, they are fixated on reaching the target of three million apprentices, and there is a danger that they end up badging any form of in-work training as an apprenticeship. You could have a bizarre situation where people are given certificates as an apprentice without ever knowing that they have been on an apprenticeship-type course. They are in a race around volume, with very little consideration of quality.

In the three devolved regions, we are very focused on building up quality brands around apprenticeships and ensuring that we address the particular needs of our economy. There will be a distortion in that, in Northern Ireland, some of our large companies will pay an amount of money in excess of their capacity to spend the equivalent on training. They will feel that, in essence, they have been taxed, and that will be viewed as anticompetitive. Frankly, it chips away at the positive intervention that we are making on lower-level corporation tax. We will see the potential for distortion for our local businesses and how they will spend their money and distortions in how the Northern Ireland Executive allocate their money. That will undermine our policy intent in what we are trying to do as a devolved Administration.

Mr McCrossan: Which industries or sectors have proved most supportive of the levy?

Dr Farry: I am not aware of any sectors being supportive of the levy. It is, essentially, a tax on business, and it is not necessary. Our system for funding apprenticeships is not so fundamentally broken that we have to move to a levy. The genesis of this lies with the UK Treasury wanting to rebalance the UK's public finances and seeing this as one route by which they can do it. This will have major impacts on different types of business, and those impacts will be greater on some businesses than on others. If you are in a very high added-value business and you are paying, for example, quite high wage bills and have low training needs, the levy will hit you disproportionately. It may affect others to a lesser extent; for example, if you are in a business in a declining sector such as the steel industry in parts of the UK where there is no real ambition to hire new staff, there is not the same onus on training as there would be in other fast-growing sectors. Irrespective of the nature of a business, however, or the nature of that aspect of the economy, businesses will, nonetheless, be taxed on the basis of the overall size of their wage bill. There is deep concern across the board felt by the business organisations and the trade unions, and they are united in their opposition to it.

Mr Newton: I thank the Minister for his confirmation that there will be a levy in 2017 on the various sectors of industry. Is this not really the first step in going back to the establishment of the sector skills councils or the industrial training boards?

Dr Farry: I have sympathy with what the Member is saying. At first glance, the notion of a levy seems a much more benign concept than a tax. If we had a levy that was hypothecated towards skills interventions on a stand-alone basis, that would be a good intervention. The difficulty here is that this will be a levy on business that will be paid by businesses in Northern Ireland. At the same time, we will suffer a negative Barnett consequential because there will be a massive cut to the budget for BIS in London, which will filter down to the each of the devolved Administrations. What we are seeing is simply a shift in how training will be funded but in a way that distorts our policy preferences. It will add a significant degree of administration at the same time, which is a leakage of money out of the system that could be better spent at the front line on training.

Consultation Reports

3. Mrs D Kelly asked the Minister for Employment and Learning when he will report on the completed consultation exercises for the employment strategy for people with disabilities and the Higher Education Big Conversation. (AQO 9582/11-16)

Dr Farry: The consultation on the employment strategy for people with disabilities closed on 27 November 2015. A total of 58 responses were received: 32 from individuals and 26 on behalf of organisations. In addition, information was gathered at four public consultation events and two smaller events with specific disability groups. The consultation period has enabled all interested parties to submit official responses and provide feedback on each of the key themes and subsequent proposals. This has been broadly very positive, and a number of constructive suggestions have been made that will inform the final strategy document. The Committee for Employment and Learning has been briefed by my officials and provided with a detailed summary and findings. The same will apply to the disability strategic working group, which helped to develop the strategy.

The Big Conversation was launched on 15 September as an innovative approach to engaging with people about the sustainability of our higher education system. It concluded on 23 October. During the Budget process for 2016-17, I wrote to my Executive colleagues to report on the findings of the Big Conversation, to outline the extent of our funding challenges and to present a range of potential long-term solutions. That paper has led to some encouraging budget outcomes for that financial year, which I hope can prevent further cuts to higher education, despite an overall reduction in my Department's equivalent budget. However, looking ahead, it will not be enough simply to protect what we have in terms of skills provision, and further consideration of the longer-term options available to us will be required in the context of the next comprehensive spending review.

My Department expects to publish a response to both of these exercises in the coming weeks.

Mrs D Kelly: I thank the Minister for his answer. Perhaps the Minister could share with the House his thoughts on moving forward, in terms of the scope, the nature and the criteria and how he could undertake to collaborate, particularly with the Minister of Health, given that many people who have attended day-care facilities will be finding a reduction in their services and seeking to have more positive lives and meaningful support in the community through further and higher education.

Dr Farry: It is important that Members understand what the disability employment strategy seeks to do. It is about supporting people with employment and will be very focused on those employment outcomes. It will, however, be part of a wider landscape of interventions that will work in collaboration with other Departments, as we look to ensure a much more rounded outcome. In that respect, I draw attention, first of all, to the Executive subcommittee's work on learning disability transitions and the fact that an action plan is in place to facilitate that. Secondly, we have an economic inactivity strategy that focuses to a considerable extent on disability issues. Within that, projects have already been identified that involve collaboration between other Departments and the Department of Health on the type of outcome that the Member suggests. While that strategy has been agreed by the Executive, there has been no significant funding allocated to it as yet. That is a situation that I find troubling, and I encourage those who are in office after May to consider remedying that as a priority.

Ms McGahan: Go raibh maith agat. I thank the Minister for his response so far. In the context of the Big Conversation, does the Minister acknowledge the absolute importance of part-time higher education and the significant impact that it has on the lives of individuals, in particular women, in providing opportunities?

Dr Farry: I certainly acknowledge the importance of the part-time route for higher education and postgraduate study. The Member will be aware that, last year, we engaged in a consultation on different funding models for that, and I have informed the House about how, in principle, I wish those to go forward. I hope to confirm that position in the coming weeks, and discussions are ongoing with the Treasury and the Student Loans Company on how we can implement the preferred way forward on the back of that consultation.

We absolutely want to see an increase in part-time study. That ties in, for example, with the apprenticeship strategy as a means by which we will ensure that people are increasingly trained to the high level required by businesses and other organisations.

Mrs Dobson: These are more consultations, Minister, on an issue, especially in relation to people with disabilities, where action is long overdue. The Minister is aware of my support for organisations such as One Eighty Restaurant in my constituency of Upper Bann, which helps to provide employment opportunities for young people with disabilities. What reassurance will be provided to them and others that, rather than a consultation followed by another consultation, they will get the help and support that they desperately need?

Dr Farry: I dare say that the Member makes some rather spurious comments. On the one hand, she asks me to reassure an organisation that its interests will be taken on board, and then she damns the process of consultation, which is designed for that very purpose. Organisations come forward with their points of view; the first draft of a strategy is published; and then we hear the feedback and make whatever adjustments are required. We have not had multiple consultations about any of these things. We have a disability employment strategy that has gone out to public consultation. There is a requirement on us to do that; if we do not, we will be judicially reviewed. That is how government does business. I am committed to delivering the strategy before I leave office, and it will be delivered before then. We have had action, not talk — we have had real action on the issue.

Magee Campus: Update

4. Mr Diver asked the Minister for Employment and Learning to outline the plans his Department has before 30 March 2016 to expedite the revised business case for the expansion of Magee campus of Ulster University. (AQO 9583/11-16)

8. Mr McCartney asked the Minister for Employment and Learning for an update on the proposed expansion of Magee campus. (AQO 9587/11-16)

Dr Farry: With your permission, Mr Deputy Speaker, I wish to group questions 4 and 8.

My Department received the latest version of the outline business case on 22 January 2016. My officials are reviewing it and looking at the extent to which previous comments provided on 1 July 2015 regarding the version submitted in June 2015 have been addressed, as well as considering any additional information provided. A formal response will issue on the latest case as soon as possible.

Mr Diver: Minister, thank you for your answer. Given the previous false dawns in relation to the expansion of the Magee campus, oversight and stewardship of the business case will be critical in the uncertain context of moving from one Department to a new one. Will the Minister assure the House that the same team will work on the business case and that it will be followed up assiduously?

Dr Farry: The same unit of officials will work on this when it transfers to the new Department. There may well be some change in personnel, as is the case in every aspect of government, but there will be no more or less continuity in this than in anything else.

I take issue with the Member's point on "false dawns". I certainly have not been involved in any false dawns in all of this. I have made it clear all along that I support the expansion of Ulster University at Magee and would like it to happen. It is clear that we need to produce more graduates, particularly those linked to the needs of our economy. However, I have also been very clear all along that we cannot expand the University of Ulster at Magee unless, collectively, the Assembly is prepared to ensure that more resource is allocated to higher education. We have to fix the current structural deficit in higher education. We have to fix the foundations before building more investment. Members should be very clear on what that involves: we have to reverse the £16 million of cuts from the 2015-16 financial year, and we have to address the £40 million structural deficit. Then we can look to the recurring cost of around £30 million to proceed with the expansion of student numbers at Magee.

I say to the Member, his party and others that it is not good enough simply to talk about this and make rhetorical commitments to the expansion. We have to show a coherent approach to public finances in Northern Ireland that will allow us to do such projects, which are very much in our interest. We have not had that collective approach across the parties for some time.

Mr McCartney: Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as an fhreagra sin. I thank the Minister for his frank answer and welcome his continuing support for the expansion of Magee. As we take the business case forward, can he indicate what the timeline will be? Can a centre of excellence, perhaps based at the Magee campus, assist in the process of ensuring its expansion?

Dr Farry: At this stage, I cannot give a reliable answer on the timeline. That is subject to the ongoing scrutiny of the business case by my officials. If the economists in the Department are content with it, they will pass it to DFP for its consideration. In a context where my officials are not happy with the business case, they will have to refer it to the strategy board for further comment and amendment.

You will appreciate from my original answer that we have gone down that road before. Issues were raised about what was produced in the summer of last year, and it was quite some time before the revised business case came back to the Department. Whether this is the final stage of the process or whether we will have to go through another iteration depends on the point made about scrutiny.

I reiterate to the Member that this is not about the capacity of the city council, the consultants or the university to produce a business case. Whether Magee expands depends on how it is resourced by the Executive. The resources have to be found in a sustainable way. I spelt out the costs involved in addressing our wider higher education system in Northern Ireland. You cannot expand Magee unless you fix the wider problems first, and you then have the platform on which provision can be expanded. The case for more graduates is clear, but we have to make sure that we do that in an appropriate and orderly manner. We need a commitment from all parties to resource higher education properly to the level that is required to support our economy.

Mrs Overend: I thank the Minister for his response. Does he agree that the expansion at Magee, which we all support, should not come at the expense or threaten the viability of other university campuses in Northern Ireland?

Dr Farry: Absolutely. I very much concur with the Member's comments. Indeed, when I met a delegation from Causeway Coast and Glens Borough Council yesterday, it made exactly that point; I am not sure whether a woman from the delegation was in communication with anyone. Let me be very clear: we have been able to expand Magee over the past five years and have found some resource to do that. To an extent, that has been undermined by recent cuts, but, overall, the Magee campus is bigger than when I took office in 2011, notwithstanding my zero budget at that time for its expansion. It has been the policy of the university all along to consider any additional places awarded to it for allocation to the Magee campus. To be very clear: the expansion of Magee cannot come at the expense of or by undermining existing provision; it cannot come at the cost of displacing students into Derry out of existing campuses, whether Ulster University or Queen's. We need to ensure that any expansion at Magee is additional. There is a clear case for more graduates in Northern Ireland, and it is in that spirit that we should approach the expansion, subject, of course, to the Executive making money available.

Student Support Payments

6. Mr Milne asked the Minister for Employment and Learning when he will announce the results of his consultation on the frequency of student support payments. (AQO 9585/11-16)

Dr Farry: At present, higher education students from Northern Ireland receive their maintenance support payments in three instalments, roughly at the beginning of each term of the academic year. This tri-annual payment system supports students with any upfront costs that they might face at the beginning of term, while also allowing them to budget ahead accordingly.

Concerns have been raised in recent times that large and infrequent payments can heighten the risk of financial mismanagement and, by extension, financial hardship amongst students. It was in response to those concerns that I launched a consultation in August last year to consider options to change the frequency of maintenance payments. The consultation closed on 27 September, and a summary of responses is available on my Department's website.

There was no clear consensus amongst respondents about which option was preferable, and many expressed concerns over the potential cost of implementing more frequent payments, particularly if that were to detract from other areas of higher education funding. Any decision to invest in a more frequent payment system will, therefore, have to be considered within the context of the overall higher education budget and competing priorities, including, for example, our ambitions to expand student places.

As to the timing of a decision, it has emerged in recent months that the Student Loans Company has become overburdened by the demands of other Administrations — that is, England — and the earliest year in which changes could possibly be implemented will be 2017-18. In principle, I am open to change, but the timelines are such that it will fall to a future Minister to take a final decision on the matter, and he or she will have to do so within the context of the overall higher education budget.

Mr Milne: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Mo bhuíochas leis an Aire as na freagraí a thug sé go dtí seo. I thank the Minister for his very comprehensive and detailed response. In his final deliberations, will he ensure that students' best interests will be at the heart of his decisions?

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Try to be brief, Minister, please.

Dr Farry: Very briefly. The Member needs to define what he means by students' best interests. Some will say that it is more frequent payments, and others will say that it is more places being available locally, because we are displacing too many students outside of Northern Ireland, where they pay more in fees. We have to take it in the round. Is that quick enough?

2.30 pm

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): That ends the period for listed questions. We will now move on to topical questions.

University Finance: Further Cuts

T1. Mr McKinney asked the Minister for Employment and Learning, returning to the issue of university finance, to outline the extent to which Ulster University and Queen's will face further cuts under the proposed Budget. (AQT 3461/11-16)

Dr Farry: I thank the Member for his question. We are still working through the figures from the Budget at this stage on exactly what is going to happen with the teaching and research grant for the universities in the forthcoming financial and academic years. At this stage, not least because we have had the additional £20 million that is due to be forthcoming and allocated officially for skills to the new Department for the Economy in the June monitoring round, we should be in the position where we can avoid any further cuts to the teaching and research grant on the road ahead. However, I caution the Assembly and, indeed, stress to the Member that the cuts from the 2015-16 financial year of £16 million to higher education are still in the system. We have seen only the first third of those implemented on September 2015 entry. As things stand, those are still in the system for September 2016 and September 2017 entry. There may be some scope to mitigate them to a small extent, but, as things stand, the vast bulk are set to go ahead. So, by no means are we out of the woods yet. Even if we were at a standstill, we would have to be investing further in our higher education because we have to ensure that we are meeting the needs of a high-skilled economy.

Mr McKinney: While, of course, the focus is on that strategic level and the headline finance, my further focus is on the students themselves — the customers, if you like. Can the Minister give an assurance that grants, especially for those from a vulnerable and poor background, will not be cut?

Dr Farry: Yes, I am happy to give that assurance. The House will well know that, right across the piece, we have been ensuring that the student support system has remained in place, despite all the tribulations that we have had with budgets in recent years. Some, of course, are demand-led interventions, and sometimes we may not spend our full budget allocation, but the levels of entitlement and the amount of money available as part of those entitlements have not been affected.

Student Accommodation: Belfast

T2. Mr A Maginness asked the Minister for Employment and Learning to comment on what appears to be a frenzy of planning applications for accommodation for university students in north and south Belfast and the fact that it appears that the universities are simply allowing these applications to develop in a free market without any plan or control. (AQT 3462/11-16)

Dr Farry: First, I think it is important to acknowledge that, in one respect, the fact that we are having this interest in student accommodation is a very positive sign. It is a sign that our universities are still flourishing, despite all they have been through with cuts. They are attracting students, and international students, in particular, are very much on their agenda. That is important for openness and diversity in plugging into the rest of the world. I stress that that does not come at the expense of opportunities for local students at the same time.

In terms of accommodation, we are seeing different approaches, depending upon which of the universities we are talking about. Queen's has moved ahead with its own projects and its own managed accommodation. Ulster University is adopting an approach where the private sector is responding. I would not say it is fair to say that there is no control over that, because obviously what happens is controlled by planning for land use and the regulation of individual applications. In that respect, Belfast City Council is the lead authority with responsibility. You are seeing the council go through its own processes. In some cases, it is granting approval and, in other cases, it is not. The overall level of applications that comes forward for housing is probably going to be in excess of the need itself, but that process is working its way through the system.

Various working groups and interventions have also been organised, primarily through Belfast City Council but also under the auspices of the Department for Social Development, about how we best manage a whole host of issues on university expansion. Housing is one of those, but transport and parking are equally important.

Mr A Maginness: I thank the Minister for his answer, but, in a sense, he is avoiding the real issue: in the overall structure, this is an unplanned series of developments, which could have negative impacts, as well as positive ones, on local communities. Is it not necessary for both universities to get together, along with Belfast City Council and any other planning authority, to work with your Department and satisfy the needs of students?

Dr Farry: I assure the Member that that process is already happening and those structures exist. Indeed, they are being revamped and are giving much stronger input. We are having discussions between Departments at ministerial and permanent secretary levels. Those discussions are focused on housing, transport and parking issues. Let me be clear: I am the Minister with responsibility for universities. Universities do not exist in a bubble; they have to take account of the context in which they exist. However, other Departments also have responsibilities in relation to this piece. Obviously, the Department for Social Development has a very clear role with respect to housing and urban regeneration powers. The Department of the Environment, of which the Member's colleague is the Minister, has responsibility for some planning powers, as does the council. The Department for Regional Development is responsible for transport, including public transport. It has to be a multi-Department and multi-agency approach. The structures exist. We need to see people bringing to the table solutions to some of the problems that still have to be addressed.

Higher Education Green Paper

T3. Mr Lunn asked the Minister for Employment and Learning for his assessment of the implications for Northern Ireland from the Department for Business, Innovation and Skills (BIS) higher education Green Paper. (AQT 3463/11-16)

Dr Farry: I thank the Member for the question. It is another example of where policy has been set by the UK Department to meet, on the surface, the needs of England but where there are various spillover effects on what happens in the other jurisdictions. In higher education, we are seeing a major divergence of policy between England, on the one hand, and the three devolved Administrations, on the other. In England, they are going for a very much deregulated system. They have fee levels of £9,000, with the potential to go beyond that. They are opening up their market to all sorts of providers, including some very small ones. They are trying to put in place a new teaching excellence framework that will allow judgements to be made over what can be funded or not, which perhaps does not really address the needs of what happens in Northern Ireland. There is some potential threat towards the Higher Education Funding Council for England (HEFCE). On the surface, that is a funding council for England, but it performs some research functions for the entire UK and its existence is under threat.

There are also some positive things happening around the widening participation agenda, where England has some very positive lessons to learn from Northern Ireland.

Mr Lunn: I thank the Minister for his answer. What action is he taking to represent the interests of Northern Ireland and the local universities in that process?

Dr Farry: First of all, in Northern Ireland, my Department has coordinated a response from all our higher education institutions (HEIs), to which we made our views known as part of the formal consultation exercise. The three devolved Ministers have also had discussions on how we can formulate a common approach to trying to address some of the issues, particularly those with the greatest impact through spillover issues. I have spoken already to Jo Johnson, the Minister for Universities in BIS. In the very near future, I expect that the three devolved Ministers will sit down with him to have a quadrilateral discussion on those issues.

Brexit: Horizon 2020

T4. Ms Hanna asked the Minister for Employment and Learning to outline the impact that the loss of the Horizon 2020 fund would have on local universities in the event of the UK withdrawal from the EU. (AQT 3464/11-16)

Dr Farry: That sounds almost like a planted question. It would be quite catastrophic. As the Member will know, we are talking about a fund that amounts to close to €80 billion over the next seven years. That is a Europe-wide intervention and provides added value to what can be done through the quality-related research (QR) funding that we give domestically to our universities.

We have other pots of international funding that we can also access, but Horizon 2020 provides new openings and the opportunity for partnerships to be built across national boundaries. That is very important in the modern world of research, where things do not exist in a bubble. Particularly on some very sophisticated research projects, you need to have that scalability and be able to bring a lot of partners in from different institutions. That would not happen to the same extent if the UK was going alone. Some people may argue that additional funding would be made available to research, but you would lose the added value that comes from the potential for international collaboration between academics from different jurisdictions.

Ms Hanna: I thank the Minister for his answer. I assure Members that that was not a planted question, and neither is this one. Has the Minister's Department done a wider audit of the funding and opportunities that would be lost in the unfortunate event of a Brexit, and of how that funding shortfall or deficit would be met by departmental resources?

Dr Farry: There really is no plan B. If we lose the European money, we lose the European money, and we will suffer as a consequence. That will be very much to our detriment. In addition to Horizon 2020, my Department probably avails itself of more pots of European funding than any other Department. Obviously, we would lose ERASMUS+, which, again, would not just be an issue of funding; it is also about opening up opportunities for our young people to experience learning in different parts of the European Union and elsewhere, which is incredibly important. That programme has been extended to apprentices, so we can have exchanges outside the context of university students.

Obviously, we have the European social fund, which makes an enormous difference and allows us to do things that we simply could not do within our mainstream budgets. We cannot simply recoup that money, and anyone who thinks that we are going to get a big pay cheque from the UK Treasury to make up the shortfall for the European money that we would lose is in la-la land.

Reskilling Initiatives

T5. Mr D McIlveen asked the Minister for Employment and Learning for an update on the reskilling initiatives for people who have either lost their jobs or who will lose their jobs as a result of the closures of JTI Gallaher and Michelin in Ballymena. (AQT 3465/11-16)

Dr Farry: The Member will know that there was a meeting yesterday of the task force, which the council is coordinating with a view to addressing a range of different points on manufacturing and skills. Obviously, my Department plays a role within that, as do DETI and some other Departments.

Beyond the broader issues, there are particular points around JTI Gallaher and Michelin. Obviously, as the Member will appreciate, the two processes are at different points. The JTI Gallaher announcement is well advanced, and we have been investing, with my Department funding some very particular interventions around courses that are not otherwise available. Also, there have been some particular interventions around essential skills for some of the staff. The process is at a different stage with Michelin, because the 90-day consultation period on the collective redundancies has not formally come to an end. That will happen at the beginning of March. At that stage, the nature of the engagement will change gear quite significantly.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Before I call Mr McIlveen to ask a supplementary, I ask him and the Minister to be reasonably brief.

Mr D McIlveen: Thank you, Mr Deputy Speaker. I will try my very best. As we come to the dawning of the age of the Department for Employment and Learning, there is obviously an opportunity for reflection. Whilst the Minister has been very good at delivering initiatives, some may say that he has not been so successful at delivering reform. Will the Minister update the House on the reform that he is most proud of in his five years as Employment and Learning Minister?

Dr Farry: This is slightly separate from the original topical question but, in one word, the apprenticeship strategy.

Some Members: Hear, hear.

Dr Farry: Two words. [Laughter.]

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Order. Time is up.

Enterprise, Trade and Investment

Renewable Energy

1. Mr McCarthy asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment how he will ensure a stable regulatory environment for the local development of renewable energy. (AQO 9595/11-16)

3. Mr Givan asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment for an update on the renewables obligation for small-scale onshore wind. (AQO 9597/11-16)

11. Mr Kennedy asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment for an update on the closure of the Northern Ireland renewables obligation for onshore wind power. (AQO 9605/11-16)

Mr Bell (The Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment): With your permission, Mr Deputy Speaker, I will answer questions 1, 3 and 11 together. Our renewables record has been very successful to date. That has been due to a combination of being able to harness our natural resources whilst ensuring that the support costs are spread much more widely than our Northern Ireland consumer base. However, this means that we are also unavoidably influenced by national policy decisions, as borne out by the proposed early closure of the renewable obligations across the United Kingdom to onshore wind. I am mindful of the uncertainty that has been created around early closure to wind. My priority, at present, is to ensure that we have a timely and managed closure of the existing scheme in Northern Ireland. I want to provide the certainty that delivers the most renewable deployment for the least cost to Northern Ireland consumers.

Mr McCarthy: I thank the Minister for his reply. Will he tell the Assembly what he plans to do during the next six months, under the moratorium on the new grid connections?

Mr Bell: There have been significant difficulties with the grid connections and grid connection offers. The Member is correct; NIE had to set aside its normal 90-day period for making grid connection offers due to the surge in applications that followed the regulator's determination that NIE could not require planning permission before making a grid connection. The grid simply could not accommodate the level of increase. It requires specialist analysis and, potentially, significant investment, which would have to be paid for by consumers. NIE is already committed to connecting projects which will almost double our installed renewable capacity. That is a huge challenge. I do not have powers to intervene. I cannot direct NIE or the Systems Operator for Northern Ireland (SONI) to prioritise one technology over another.

Mr Givan: In discussions with the Department of Energy and Climate Change (DECC), has it outlined what the proposed backstop power, which is now included in the Energy Bill, will mean and what the consequences of that could be for the Northern Ireland renewables obligation certificate (ROC)?

Mr Bell: DECC has included a backstop power in its proposed Energy Bill, as the Member said, to protect GB consumers should Northern Ireland take a different approach to the Northern Ireland renewables obligation (NIRO) closure than that taken in GB. The backstop power will give DECC powers to prevent GB suppliers redeeming Northern Ireland ROCs from projects that accredit from 1 April 2016 and do not meet the closure eligibility criteria that were equivalent to those in GB. This provides little comfort for those projects and has the potential to have wider implications for the whole renewables industry here.

Mr Kennedy: I am interested in the ministerial responses thus far. How does the Minister intend to deal with the ongoing uncertainty created by his decision on the NIRO issue last summer? Does he accept that the delay since his closure consultation last October has created all sorts of problems for the renewables sector here? Does he have any plans to support the development of the industry after the NIRO ends? Will he bring, and how will he bring, certainty for investors, including many in my constituency?

Mr Bell: I want to bring certainty as soon as possible. I am considering a range of options. I think that the Member will agree that DECC changed the policy. Yes, we can do what we choose to do where we have devolved powers, but DECC changed the policy, not once but a number of times. I have spoken to the Secretary of State for Energy and Climate Change. I went to London and I said, "Look, under the coalition Government, the previous Minister agreed with you a line which was then put out to the industry. The Conservative Party then came into power as a single party and moved the goalposts for onshore wind". They moved the goalposts, not me. They then changed their position at different times.

I want to assure the House that I will always look at what delivers the best value to Northern Ireland. Unfortunately, I have had to deal with changing positions from DECC, and that has led to the uncertainty that we have. I will try to bring it to a conclusion as quickly as possible to allow people to go forward; however, let no one misunderstand that the changing position has come from the Department of Energy and Climate Change.

Mr Ó Muilleoir: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Mo bhúochas fosta leis an Aire as na freagraí go dtí seo. We all have some sympathy with the Minister in that these decisions have emerged from London, but I want to move on past the ROC to the renewable heat incentive (RHI). This morning, we spent two distressing hours in the Committee for Enterprise, Trade and Investment listening to officials tell us that another bombshell has been dropped on the renewable industry sector and that the RHI is to be removed.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Order. Can we have a question, please?

Mr Ó Muilleoir: Can the Minister guarantee that he will give us clarity on that issue, work in collaboration with the sector, and include the Committee as he reaches a decision? Let the date not be next week, Minister.

Mr Bell: At the end of last year, there was an increase in demand for the renewable heat incentive scheme. My Department faces a huge budgetary pressure, given the Chancellor of the Exchequer's decision to limit the amount of money paid to Northern Ireland out of the UK pot for renewable heat. That is why, last week, I signalled my intention to ease that financial pressure, which could amount to over £27 million, by announcing the immediate closure of the scheme and bringing forward an order to suspend the scheme as soon as possible. I want everyone to know that I am listening to the industry and to individuals who are installing renewable heat boilers. I will come back to try to give that clarity at the earliest possible date.

Mr A Maginness: Unlike the previous questioner, I really do not have very much sympathy with the Minister in relation to his summary decision on the renewable heat initiative. It is not acceptable. It will impact adversely on many small installers. Will he review his decision or take remedial action to strengthen those small tradesmen?

Mr Bell: I think that the Member has misunderstood what the Chancellor of the Exchequer has done with regard to renewable heat and the fact that the goalposts have been moved and that a limit has been put on Northern Ireland. If we go beyond that limit, we have to bear the costs ourselves. It was introduced in November 2012 to the non-domestic sector and in 2014 to the domestic sector, and it has been taken up very successfully. To date, over 3,500 renewable heating installations have been incentivised. Uptake has been higher than in GB. We have exceeded the Northern Ireland Executive's 2015 target, which was 4%. About 6% of Northern Ireland's heating needs is now provided through renewable heating technologies. The Member would do well to look at the Chancellor's autumn statement and what follows it and also consider the costs to Northern Ireland.

Broadband: North Antrim

2. Mr Frew asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment for an update on the delivery of superfast broadband in North Antrim. (AQO 9596/11-16)

Mr Bell: In February 2014, my Department contracted BT to deliver the Northern Ireland broadband improvement project. That is primarily aimed at rural areas and seeks to extend the availability of, primarily, basic and, where possible, superfast broadband to those who have limited choice across Northern Ireland with a target of 45,000 premises. The project was scheduled to be completed by 31 December 2015. However, there was engineering complexity, and that date has been extended by three months to 31 March 2016.

Improvements have already been carried out to over 40,000 premises across Northern Ireland, including almost 5,000 in postcode areas in the North Antrim constituency.

On 22 January 2016, I announced the introduction of a satellite broadband support scheme, which falls under the auspices of the Northern Ireland broadband improvement project. It seeks to provide residents and businesses that are still experiencing speeds below two megabits per second with the option of applying for a subsidy of up to £350 towards the cost of installing a satellite broadband connection.

Mr Frew: I thank the Minister for his answer. Is he aware of my constituents' concerns? It seems to be the case that BT is degrading its copper system and its other old systems. What can he do to make sure that BT meets all its obligations and does not let people wither on the vine with a copper system? People are experiencing even lower speeds than they were at Christmas.

Mr Bell: I am aware of a lot of problems, particularly in rural areas. A number of months ago, people from west Tyrone spoke to me. A number of people raised complaints with me that, if there is congestion on the system — the beam and different things — that effectively causes them not to have a service.

Not all areas will be able to access superfast broadband once the Northern Ireland broadband improvement project is completed. We awarded the contract for the second project to BT. That was the superfast broadband roll-out programme.

I will take up those specific issues with BT on behalf of the Member. I had a very detailed meeting with its senior officials last week at which I raised a number of concerns. It is unacceptable, particularly when, first, I have people coming to me whose children have either to be taken back to school or driven to the library just to get their homework done. Secondly, other children are experiencing extreme difficulties just managing against the curriculum, and we are raising that issue with BT. Thirdly, we have some hugely successful businesses in the area of computer-aided design (CAD). They must submit their programmes to tender, so people are literally leaving their machines on at night in the hope that, when they get up the next morning, their CAD or specific design, which they must use to tender for business, has come through. I will emphasise to BT that we cannot condone that set of circumstances into the future.

Mr Boylan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I welcome the Minister's answer, but I put this to him: why, after spending millions of pounds on assisting BT to provide broadband, do we still have major gaps right across the North, particularly in Newry and Armagh?

I ask that question on behalf of Matthew Nugent of 58 Tievenamara Road, Carnagh, BT60 3JA, who lives 90 metres from a box that was upgraded last year and is one of a number of people in rural Armagh and south Armagh who has no broadband provision, after we have spent millions of pounds of public money on it.

Mr Bell: Those are important points. If the Member wants to send me details of that specific case, I will certainly look at it.

We continue to make broadband services widely available via a mix of technologies. Almost £64 million, as the Member says, has been invested since 2008 to encourage private sector upgrade to networks, particularly in rural areas. Seventy-nine per cent of households are currently accessing the Internet. I find that a very difficult figure when I compare it with the UK figure of 85%, and 72% of those who are accessing the Internet are doing so through a broadband connection. The number of premises that are connected to a broadband service offering speeds of 2 megabits per second or higher is continuing to increase, and now stands at 94%. Owing to the extensive next-generation access network put in place by my Department's investments, there have been over 239,000 fibre-based, high-speed broadband connections to date. Although we acknowledge that download speeds in Northern Ireland are continuing to increase, the average download speed stands at 28.3 megabits per second, and that is below the UK average of 29 megabits per second. We will continue to pursue how we can get that to a more level playing field.

3.00 pm

Mr Dickson: Thank you, Minister, for your answers thus far with regard to BT. I declare a personal interest in that BT totally and utterly failed me in my service for nearly two months. As a result of that, I discovered that BT has set aside only 60% of the capacity of the green cabinets that it has installed to deliver its so-called superfast broadband. So, in any one area, not everyone, even if they wished to purchase superfast broadband, can have it. Is the Minister satisfied that 60% capacity per cabinet is a reasonable commercial decision by BT?

Mr Bell: I will raise that particular case with BT. I am not satisfied with broadband provision across Northern Ireland. I do not think that anybody who has a genuine interest in seeing all of Northern Ireland develop could be satisfied, knowing how much depends upon a broadband connection, particularly for business. The rules are changing. Businesses in rural areas are saying to me, "We have to present it in this way. We need the connection to actually do this." So, we will have to continue to work to what is a difficult system, but, as Minister, I accept that nobody in the House could be satisfied with the level of complaints and dissatisfaction that we have, particularly in the rural community.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): I call Mr Paul Givan for a question.

Mr Givan: Mine was joined to the first question, Deputy Speaker.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): I call Mr Ross Hussey.

Gross Value Added Growth

4. Mr Hussey asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment for his assessment of gross value added growth in the economy as set out in the Northern Ireland Statistics and Research Agency composite economic index to quarter 3, 2015. (AQO 9598/11-16)

Mr Bell: I thank Mr Hussey. The latest results from the Northern Ireland composite economic index, which measures economic activity, show that we experienced growth in three of the last four quarters, with an annual increase of 1.6%. Despite those positives, the figures for the latest quarter were negative. Those findings are disappointing. Most economists who are advising me are saying, "Don't get too fixated on just one single quarter's data." Northern Ireland is relatively small and quarterly statistics, as the evidence shows, can be inherently volatile. There have also been substantial improvements in the local labour market during this time, with unemployment continuing to fall and private sector jobs at their highest level ever. We cannot be complacent about that, but I think that everybody in the House would like to celebrate the fact that unemployment is falling and the private sector is growing and at its highest number ever.

Mr Hussey: Is the Minister not concerned about output? For example, Ulster Bank says that we grew in economic terms by between 1.5% and 2% in 2015, whilst the rest of the UK grew by 2.3%, and the Republic grew by over 5% for the second successive year. Is he not concerned that we may be stagnating?

Mr Bell: I am always concerned when it appears that other parts are performing better. We can look at statistics in a range of ways. We have massive challenges in our manufacturing sector but it is posting 3% annual growth and added 4,000 jobs over the past year. While we look at experiencing a relatively modest recovery since the local downturn, our biggest sector, the services sector, has posted 1% annual growth, with jobs at an all-time high.

There is a big issue for me and many in the House from constituencies that depend on construction. Our construction sector was the most impacted during the downturn but, even there, we are seeing what appears to be very real signs of recovery. Output is up 14% on an annual basis and the sector added 870 jobs over the latest year of data.

If you look at the quarterly figures, I do see concerns. I take the advice to look not only at those but to note the volatility. Looking at the annual change, in services we are 1% up, in manufacturing output we are 2.9% up, and in construction output we are 13.7% up.

Mr Dunne: I thank the Minister for his answers. As Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment, your job entails marketing Northern Ireland throughout the world, and I think that we all admit that you do that enthusiastically. What economic levers can you use as you travel to attract new business into Northern Ireland?

Mr Bell: The big one that we have been taking forward in this last particular period is the game changer of corporation tax. That is when we asked the independent research to come to us on the rate of 12.5% that we will have from 1 April. The independent advice was that we should be looking at creating 30,000 additional jobs and that we should be growing our economy by almost 10% over 15 years. In the last short period, I have taken, I think, 13 companies across three cities in China. Two weeks ago, I was with 15 of our companies that have a particular focus on technology, and we went from San Francisco right through to New York.

I can tell you that there is major interest in Northern Ireland. I estimate that a huge percentage of what I do I cannot tell you until the ink is dry on the contracts because they are commercially sensitive. There is huge interest in Northern Ireland because we have three unique things. We have business costs that are about 84% or 85% of the rest of the United Kingdom. We have a talent pool and a very low attrition rate. In fact, 80% of all the businesses that have invested in Northern Ireland have subsequently reinvested, and, when I bring in new investors, I am grateful to those businesses for telling a success story. And then we have the attraction of corporation tax, giving us the most competitive corporation tax rate in western Europe.

Mr Lyttle: Given the key role played by our manufacturing sector in economic growth in Northern Ireland, why is there no manufacturing strategy currently in place with long-term commitments and targets on key issues like rates, energy and infrastructure?

Mr Bell: I think that the Member knows the answer to that question because his party was party to the economic strategy. His party agreed that we would put all of our strategy into one specific strategy, which was the economic strategy, which his party at Executive level agreed to. Manufacturing is a very important sector for Northern Ireland. I do not take away from anybody who has lost their job. Anybody who grew up in the 1970s and 1980s in Belfast, as I did, and who watched their family and other people lose their jobs knows how devastating that is. Equally, the manufacturing sector is telling me of the successes that it is having, and it has been performing well. Over the past year, it has added 4,000 additional jobs. The manufacturing output is up by nearly 3%, and that is more than the UK average.

We want to ensure that we continue with a strong recovery. That is why I have done specific things for manufacturing. Look at what I did to try to help Bombardier address its energy costs. We also had a proposal on the table with Michelin. We will never know what would have happened if it had taken that up. Last week, I spent time at Montupet with about 15 companies from the manufacturing sector that are all high energy users. We spent quite a bit of time looking at where the strengths, the weaknesses and the opportunities were coming from. Also, as the House knows, I have established the manufacturing energy task force. It is being chaired by a person who, as I understand it, is the fifth-largest energy user in Northern Ireland. I await the outcome of that, and I intend to give very due diligence to that to see how we can further support the sector.

Mr Allister: The Minister describes the reduction that is pending in corporation tax as a game changer. Can he explain why it did not change the game in my constituency for either JTI or Michelin, which are leaving our shores, sadly, approximately at the time when the reduction in corporation tax will come? Clearly, it did not impress them as something causing them to make it worthwhile to stay, so is it really the game changer that the Minister proclaims it to be? Experience to date in my constituency does not suggest so.

Mr Bell: I think that the Member raises some very important points about Michelin specifically. Not only have I spent several hours trying to ensure that we get that workforce all the qualifications so that the employees are in the best place to get new jobs, but I have spent quite a bit of time with the Michelin management.

I asked them whether there was anything more that the Government could have done, and they said no. When I asked them to list the reasons why Michelin left north Antrim, they explained that there was a glut of thousands in the truck tyre market — it made a very specific product there. They talked about fluctuations in the euro and Asian imports costing £130 against the vastly superior Michelin product that cost over £500.

I can tell the Member that there is huge interest in Northern Ireland. Companies like Allstate say to me, "Jonathan, we came for the costs; we stayed for your people". Other companies like Citi come to provide hundreds of jobs and now provide in the region of 2,000. The likes of Randox and Wrightbus, which is in your constituency, are tripling their profits and talking about what they can do into the future. If we present a collective message of low cost, low tax and an excellent workforce, we have a winning message for the economy in Northern Ireland.

Jobs: West of the Bann

5. Mr Milne asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment to outline the action he has taken regarding a targeted job investment programme west of the Bann. (AQO 9599/11-16)

Mr Bell: Invest Northern Ireland's role is to support companies that bring forward investment projects on the basis of merit, irrespective of where they are based. Through local government reform and the process of community planning, councils can shape job investment in their region by tailoring a subregional proposition to drive investment into, and set relevant targets for, their respective areas. Invest Northern Ireland will assist in the development of those council-led subregional strategies to help to drive economic development on an equitable basis throughout Northern Ireland.

Mr Milne: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Mo bhuíochas leis an Aire as na freagraí a thug sé go dtí seo. I thank the Minister for his answer. Will he detail his Department's success or otherwise in securing investment in Mid Ulster, which I represent, and, in particular, the south Derry end?

Mr Bell: From 2011-15, Invest Northern Ireland support totalled £118 million. That contributed to planned investment of £673 million in areas west of the River Bann and helped businesses to promote 9,679 jobs. During the same period, businesses in that area created some 7,416 jobs. Those figures include assistance and investment totalling £15 million and £20 million that was offered to external delivery organisations and universities, which promoted six jobs. The number of jobs promoted and created is directly proportional to the adult population of each area. Twenty-seven per cent of the adult population resides in the west, and that is directly comparable to the 26% of jobs promoted and 27% of jobs created by businesses with Invest Northern Ireland support.

Mr Diver: Minister, your description today of prosperity and jobs coming forward is, I think, as someone from the constituency of Foyle, almost like Harold Macmillan saying that we have "never had it so good." The Executive's north-west ministerial group met only twice in the last year. Is that appropriate action given the level of disadvantage that we face? Should we be looking at a bespoke measure like a city deal for Derry?

Mr Bell: I can understand the Member needing a sound bite, but he should not talk down the area that he represents. He will know, if he has been following this for the last 12 months, what I have done publicly in that area specifically. I have also been in the area privately on a number of occasions, and I want to see fruit grow from that. He will know from the announcements about OneSource Virtual, ModSquad and Nu Print Technologies that we have created, with Invest support, hundreds of new jobs in his area.

If he does not know that, he should.

When I addressed the Chamber of Commerce and spoke to the skills sector and people involved with the universities, I sensed that there is an upbeat, can-do nature. I want to facilitate that, from small businesses such as Oakgrove, which is creating a quality, premium product for export, right through to those big job announcements such as that from ModSquad, which has created hundreds of jobs in the area. We will build on that. Come with me and I will support you 100% in trying to bring business into the area and telling people that they have 84% of the business costs of the rest of the UK, they have very well educated people, and, on 1 April 2018, they will have the most competitive rate of corporation tax. That should be a winning message.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): That ends the period for listed questions.

3.15 pm

Economic Inactivity

T1. Mrs Cochrane asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment whether he acknowledges that the levels of economic inactivity represent a structural problem within our economy that must be tackled. (AQT 3471/11-16)

Mr Bell: Yes, I do. I have had tremendous support in the one year that I have been in office, and I have seen what Mr Farry did as Minister in trying to ensure that we address long-term economic inactivity. It is reducing but only by percentage points, and we want it to reduce further.

Mrs Cochrane: I thank the Minister for his answer and for the fact that he acknowledges that there is an issue. What steps can be taken in the coming months to identify the financial resources to begin to implement the Executive's economic inactivity strategy that his Department co-produced with DEL?

Mr Bell: We have been trying to ensure that that budget delivers against the strategy that we set out. The Minister for Employment and Learning had discussions with the First Minister when she was the Finance Minister, as most of us did in our Departments, and extra money was allocated directly to skills. None of us got everything that we wanted, but it was recognised that we have a wonderful opportunity in front of us.

Minister Farry was with me in the States when we went to a number of specific companies to look at what we can do together to address economic inactivity. He is doing excellent work in bespoke training for companies. The training is taken through, and the person has only to be interviewed by the client at the end, and they are delivering real success. That is the right model: go with the business model and then back it up with training. In a new Department for the Economy, we will try to align the skills to factor in the jobs that we can and will have.

Brexit: Business and Industry Concerns

T2. Mr Dickson asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment to outline the representations he has received from business and industry about the concerns around the negative impact of the United Kingdom's exit from the EU. (AQT 3472/11-16)

Mr Bell: I should correct the record, as I made a mistake last week when I talked about not knowing the nature of the "question". I should have said the nature of the "terms", so I will correct the record.

Businesses have spoken to me but have not done so exclusively with one voice. Different approaches are being made. We have commissioned Oxford Economics to provide the best information so that people can examine what may or may not come next week.

Mr Dickson: I thank the Minister for his answer. With the First Minister leaning towards out of the EU, is it likely that you will be the only Enterprise Minister in the United Kingdom who is anti-EU and will lead the charge against industry and business in Northern Ireland?

Mr Bell: I support 100% the position adopted by Mrs Foster as First Minister, by our MEP and by our parliamentary leader. What I have asked people to do is look seriously at the information that we are commissioning from Oxford Economics on the range of options and examine it against the terms that come through.

Tourism: Potential and Promotion

T3. Mr Lyons asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment for his assessment of Northern Ireland's tourism potential and to state the actions his Department has taken to promote tourism here. (AQT 3473/11-16)

Mr Bell: Tourism in Northern Ireland is going from strength to strength. I think that the last set of figures that I looked at showed that it is worth £751 million, and we intend to grow it to a £1 billion industry by 2020. I get very encouraged when I hear about 81 cruise ships coming into Northern Ireland and when I see statistics saying that 2.53 million people are visiting Titanic Belfast. I am also very encouraged to hear that, as I announced on Friday, 100 major Chinese tour operators are coming to visit Northern Ireland in the next number of weeks. The potential of that is absolutely huge. I had them down at Mount Stewart, and they were, quite frankly, blown away with what they could offer. They were telling me that they could surely attract significant numbers of Asian tourists, who are in one of the biggest markets in the world, to Northern Ireland.

Of course, I know that the Gobbins cliff path is in the Member's constituency. That is a feature. When you put it alongside Titanic Belfast, the Geopark in the west and Mount Stewart and combine them, you see why we have a unique tourism offering in Northern Ireland and why I am confident that we should achieve our target of a £1 billion industry by 2020.

Mr Lyons: I am very pleased that the Minister highlighted the Gobbins cliff path as one of the attractions in our constituency. It is great to hear that so many good things are happening within tourism at the minute, but we do have a slight problem. An awful lot of people go to Titanic Belfast and then perhaps up to the north coast. Would it not be a good idea for more tourists to go via the east Antrim coast to visit Carrickfergus, the Antrim coast road and the Gobbins cliff path? Will the Minister agree to work with and meet Mid and East Antrim Borough Council so that we can work out how we can maximise the tourist potential of that area?

Mr Bell: I will, of course, meet the council. The Member was with me the previous occasion we met the council specifically on the tourism initiative. I will continue to work with the council because I want all of Northern Ireland to benefit from the tourism that comes in.

We have found that, when people come and visit us, they like it. They come back and want to bring their family and friends. Part of our challenge is to make sure that they come and visit us specifically. The whole Causeway coastal route is worthy of international appeal, and it has been identified as an area for growth for visitor numbers and for spend.

When you add the other things that are going on on the periphery, you can see things like the huge success of 'Game of Thrones' tourism. The Irish Open in 2015 had 107,000 paying spectators, and we will get the Irish Open back in 2017. We will also have one of the biggest tournaments in the world, The Open, in 2019. You can compare those with things like the Women's Rugby World Cup. My Department is putting a lot of strength into trying to attract the Rugby World Cup to Ireland, which has the potential to bring some 350,000 rugby supporters here, and into working on how we can maximise that benefit for Northern Ireland. When you look at that, you will see that we can all be encouraged by the tourism offering.

Renewable Heat Incentive Scheme: Closure

T4. Mr Patterson asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment when the closure of the renewable heat incentive scheme will take effect, considering that legislation passed on 18 November 2015 clearly stated to the sector a closure on 31 March 2016. (AQT 3474/11-16)

Mr Bell: I welcome the Member to the House. I said that there was a huge increase in the demand for the renewable heat incentive scheme at the end of last year. That has given not just my Department but Northern Ireland a huge budgetary pressure. As the Member should know, the Chancellor of the Exchequer decided to limit the amount of money that was paid to Northern Ireland out of the UK pot for renewable heat. That is why I signalled my intention last week to ease that financial pressure, which could amount to over £27 million.

Mr Patterson: I welcome the comments of the Minister, and his welcome to the House.

The Minister announced the sudden closure of the renewable heat initiative last Friday, after 6.00 pm, in a press release. In his press release, he mentioned that around 6% of Northern Ireland's heating needs are now provided through renewable technologies. The Executive's Programme for Government renewable heat target is 10% by 2020. Has the Minister abandoned that target? Does he still have an incentive policy for renewables? A lot of firms have invested money into this and need answers from the Minister.

Mr Bell: The reality is that we have exceeded the current target. I now want to listen specifically to the industry. I have been listening to individuals who are currently installing the renewable heat boilers. I think it is important that we, as politicians and everyone in this House, listen and do all that we can to help as many people as possible. I will reflect on what is being said to me, and I will examine ways in which I can help those who have been affected by my decision from last week. I also want to say that, inevitably, there will be an investigation into why we have found ourselves in this position. I have, as a matter of urgency, asked my own officials to ensure that the scheme is running to the letter and spirit of the law. I will be keeping a very close eye on that.

I think the Member also needs to understand that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has limited the amount of money being paid to Northern Ireland out of the UK pot as regards renewable heat, and that puts challenges on every Member of this House.

Employment Law: Inward Investment

T5. Mr Ross asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment, who will be aware that the Employment Bill is working its way through the House today in order to reform employment law in Northern Ireland, and in light of his previous answer in which he listed business costs, the talent pool and corporation tax as three of the main drivers to get investors to come to Northern Ireland, to state how important the employment law environment is when he is talking to investors who are thinking about coming here. (AQT 3475/11-16)

Mr Bell: Any investor will want to consider the employment legislation against the backdrop of putting a significant amount of investment into Northern Ireland. I have to say that in all my discussions, from Asia through to America and Europe, I have learned that when they look at Northern Ireland they are looking specifically to a talent pool with a very low rate of attrition; I think that, in some cases, it is less than 7%. Investors are looking to save business costs and are attracted by us having, in the future, the lowest rate of corporation tax in Western Europe. I think all of that has helped us to reduce our unemployment figures to approximately 6%. This stands against a European average of above 9%, and, the last time I looked, the Irish figure was 8.9%. So we are in a very competitive position. We cannot rest on our laurels. We have the unique opportunity of there being 30,000 jobs in front of us. The challenge is for us to ensure that we have young people with the skills to rise to that challenge and also to ensure that, as people progress, we see a decrease in economic inactivity.

Mr Ross: The Minister has talked about the competitive nature of attracting investors to Northern Ireland. One of the elements of the Employment Bill going through today is an amendment that will allow Northern Ireland's qualifying period for unfair dismissal to be the same as that in GB. Would he share my concern that, if Northern Ireland has a different employment law environment than, perhaps, Glasgow or Liverpool, we would be at a disadvantage, in terms of investment, if we did not keep in step with change in the GB employment law?

Mr Bell: Yes. Let me answer the question in the following way: one of the groups that I was with came here to create hundreds of jobs and is now in a position where they have created thousands of jobs. Their chief executive told me that one of the things specific to Northern Ireland is that, on an international market basis, people love the fact that, in terms of compliance, law and regulation, we are on the same page as the rest of the United Kingdom.

You could have all the advantages of United Kingdom business, with lower costs and, I would say, a very attractive employment pool to work from — one of the best educated — and, into the future, the lowest rate of corporation tax in western Europe. However, it has been mentioned to me that that compliance across the United Kingdom, and particularly the regulation across the United Kingdom, has led to further investment in Northern Ireland.

3.30 pm

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Mr Gregory Campbell is not in his place. I invite Mr Paul Girvan to ask a very short question.

Air Passenger Duty

T7. Mr Girvan asked the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment, in light of Belfast International Airport's recent job announcements, what measures he has taken to ensure that this region gets some help with air passenger duty (APD), given that we are competing with Dublin — 100 miles down the road — which offers 0% APD, and the Scottish islands, which have had some flexibility, albeit that we are tied to the UK system, has he lobbied for the abolition of APD. (AQT 3477/11-16)

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Minister, can you answer that in a few seconds?

Mr Bell: Yes. First, I congratulate Graham Keddie and his marvellous team for the success that they have had, not just in job creation but in increased passenger numbers. I believe that the UK as a whole should address air passenger duty, and we lobbied very strongly for that to happen. That does not take away from the fact that it should happen on a UK-wide basis to drive tourism in Northern Ireland. I will continue to work with all our airports; I have been to City of Derry Airport and I have seen the success of Belfast City Airport in increased passenger numbers and the boost to the economy. There is a really good news story in the Member's constituency, and I will look at every avenue that I have, not just in lobbying the UK on air passenger duty but seeing what we can do around air route development funds and marketing strategies that could lead to continued further success.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Time is up.

Mr Ó Muilleoir: On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. Is it in order, despite our many differences, to commend the Minister on the Alert Logic job investment in Belfast yesterday, which, incredibly, he did not mention? I think that the House should congratulate him on that.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): I am sure that that is not a point of order, but the Minister will have heard it.

Mr Bell: Thank you very much. Unfortunately, I could not announce it myself because I was on other business that, I hope, in the long term, will deliver for the economy of Northern Ireland.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): I invite Members to take their ease while we change the top Table.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Beggs] in the Chair)

Executive Committee Business

Employment Bill: Consideration Stage

Clause 14 (Protected disclosures: reporting requirements)

Debate resumed on amendment No 9, which amendment was:

In page 10, line 28, after "Assembly" insert

"or to the Secretary of State for laying before both Houses of Parliament".— [Dr Farry (The Minister for Employment and Learning).]

The following amendments stood on the Marshalled List:

Amendment Nos 10-17.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): We will now return to the debate on the second group of amendments in the Consideration Stage of the Employment Bill.

Mr Flanagan: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I am going to speak on amendment Nos 10, 14 and 15. Amendment Nos 10 and 15 are in my name and those of my two colleagues Bronwyn McGahan and Fra McCann and amendment No 14 is in the name of Mr Basil McCrea.

Amendment No 15 deals with the issue of zero-hours contracts. There is widespread acknowledgement in the House that it is an issue that needs to be dealt with. There is still no consensus on this issue, as the Minister and others have said. The Minister brought forward policy proposals to the Executive last February for consideration but, unfortunately, he could not get political consensus on those proposals and withdrew them.

Zero-hours contracts are one of the biggest issues —

Dr Farry (The Minister for Employment and Learning): Will the Member give way?

Mr Flanagan: I certainly will, Stephen, go ahead. You are at it early.

Dr Farry: Just for the record, I did not withdraw the proposals because I was not getting political consensus; that hope still lies before me. I withdrew them because we were effectively out of time to draft the complex clauses that would have put the Executive paper into effect.

Mr Flanagan: I thank the Minister for his intervention. He has taken all the blame now instead of trying to blame Sinn Féin for a change, so that might be a positive development.

Zero-hours contracts are one of the biggest issues facing this generation of working people. They have a deeply negative impact on workers' rights and protections and on employment practices. The Minister engaged in a very extensive and laudable public consultation on zero-hours contracts, and I think that the feedback he got was that such contracts are bad for the 28,000 workers who have them. They are also bad for their families, wider society and, indeed, the economy. Zero-hours contracts disproportionately affect women and unskilled workers and, therefore, have an impact on human dignity and self-esteem. It is very important that we take this opportunity to address zero-hours contracts.

During his public consultation and his presentation to the Employment and Learning Committee afterwards, the Minister acknowledged the negative impact that zero-hours contracts have for many workers, yet the proposals he brought forward to address that were, in my view, totally inadequate. I believe that the best solution for dealing with zero-hours contracts is to ban them, and that is why we have tabled this amendment today. If we allow zero-hours contracts to continue as they are, it will create a further unequal balance between workers' rights and employers' obligations, and, at the minute, that seriously disadvantages workers.

Dr Farry: Will the Member give way?

Mr Flanagan: Certainly, Stephen.

Dr Farry: Does the Member, therefore, feel that his colleague the Minister of Education has been guilty of exploiting workers, given that he, his predecessor and the Sinn Féin Minister before that presided over a system where supply teachers were used in schools? That is a form of zero-hours contract.

Mr Flanagan: I thank the Minister for his intervention. I had intended to return to his allegations that the health and education services would be put into crisis overnight if this amendment were passed. The fact is that casual worker contracts have been in place for generations. It is my view that, with those types of contracts, people were seen as workers rather than employees, because there is a very clear legal difference between the two. It actually suits having people as bank nurses and substitute teachers much better than having them as employees. I do not think that bank nurses and substitute teachers should be seen as employees; I do not think that they should be on a zero-hours contract. I do think that giving staff zero-hours contracts seems to be the new fad that all employers are doing. It is an excuse for lazy, ineffective and bad management. Instead of figuring out what staff you will need to run your business, people put everybody down for zero, even if they work 35 or 40 hours every single week. That is an issue that has been raised time and again with me as an MLA, and I am sure it is the same for the Minister and other colleagues in the House.

We cannot have a situation where the health service is being run by staff and nurses on zero-hours contracts. There is a reluctance in the health service to give nurses a proper full-time job. The over-reliance on as-and-when staff — or bank staff, as they are called — is a serious problem in the health service. This amendment would not make it worse. It would actually discourage the health service from using those types of contracts for people who are, in effect, full-time staff but who are down as zero-hours contract staff or employees. This amendment would force people who need casual workers to hire casual workers, instead of hiring employees and giving them zero-hours contracts. What we are seeing is that people are being punished — having their hours put down to zero — if they are not available for work, join a trade union or exercise any rights at all. The employer then has every right to punish them by moving them from a regular 30- or 40-hour-week basis of employment and putting them down to zero. Then, there is no mechanism for an employee to take a case for unfair dismissal or to take it to a tribunal because it is not covered. That is one of the big issues with zero-hours contracts.

I think it is important to remember that, when the Minister appeared before the Committee, after his consultation closed and I put to him the prospect that zero-hours contracts should be banned, he, more or less, said “We can't do that, because employers would find a new way of treating employees badly”. I agree with him; that would be the case. A small minority of employers who want to treat their staff badly, abuse them and not give them any rights as workers or employees, or give them any dignity as human beings, will find a way to circumvent the law.

Mr B McCrea: Will the Member give way?

Mr Flanagan: I will, Basil.

Mr B McCrea: I want to ask the Member whether he has identified these really rogue employers, these really bad people who are absolutely outrageous to those whom they employ. Does he think that we should ban them altogether? Does he think that we should tell them to sling their hook, leave Northern Ireland and not be part of us because we do not want that type of employer here? That is where the logic takes us — if these people are so bad, so heinous and so wrong, there is no saving them. Let us get rid of them all.

Mr Flanagan: I thank the Member for his intervention. I do not necessarily agree that we should force all those employers to leave. However, we are a legislative Assembly, and we should introduce legislation that they have to comply with that affords dignity and self-respect to workers. I do not think that we should ask Sports Direct to close all their shops and move out just because they treat their staff badly. However, it is a fairly basic requirement that employers operate within the law, and what we propose to do is implement and introduce a law that ensures that workers are treated with a bit of respect and dignity.

I do not think that the Member's intervention is rational, and I certainly do not agree that we should ask those who are over-reliant on staff with zero-hours contracts to up and leave. We should bring in a legislative framework that protects workers. That is a fairly basic requirement, and I do not think that it is asking too much.

What we are seeing at the minute with workers' rights — the Minister referred to it in his opening remarks — is an increase in casualisation. Staff are now being hired increasingly on zero-hours contracts. We are told that everything is rosy in the garden, that unemployment is going down and that more and more people are in work, but, in reality, how many of those jobs are zero-hours contracts? How many of them are low-paid? How many of them are for people in underemployment, where people who want to work full-time or want to work more hours cannot get them? The amendment would prohibit —

Mr Ross: Will the Member give way?

Mr Flanagan: I will, Alastair, yes.

Mr Ross: The Member has posed a series of questions about how many of the employed are on zero-hours contracts. Has he any answers? We need evidence-based policymaking. Has he specific answers to the questions that he has posed?

Mr Flanagan: I have, and it is good to hear a Member on the opposite Benches arguing for evidence-based policy. It is certainly a far cry from some of their previous policies and the Member's support for extending the qualifying period for unfair dismissal. It is clear that there is no evidence to support that policy proposal.

The Minister's public consultation highlighted that there were 28,000 people here on a zero-hours contract. You cannot tell me that every one of those 28,000 people wants to have no surety about what hours they work this week, next week or the following week or that they can land into work today at 4.00 pm and be told, "We do not need you; go on home" and not be compensated for that at all. I do not think that that is acceptable. I accept that there is a need for flexibility in the workplace for employers and employees, but, at the minute, the pendulum is far too much in favour of employers, and, unfortunately, a minority of employers is abusing that right.

If we do not take this opportunity to tackle the scourge of zero-hours contracts, it will be a missed opportunity. To be fair to the Minister, he tried to bring forward some pragmatic solutions that would have dealt with the worst aspects of zero-hours contracts, particularly exclusivity contracts, where somebody works for an employer exclusively and is not allowed to work for another employer. That might be the case or might be justified in some high-end employment places where an extremely rare set of skills is required and confidentiality is required between one employer and another. However, I do not think that that is necessarily the case in a restaurant, a high-street store or a job where people are not even paid the living wage.

Mr B McCrea: Just before the Member moved off the issue of evidence-based policy, he quoted in response to Mr Ross the figure of 28,000. Is he aware that that is a simple pro-rata estimate for Northern Ireland? It is just plucked from the air. We have no real idea what the number is. It is a simple pro-rata estimate, where 4% to 5% gives 28,000 to 35,000. In other places, we say that it is only 1-2% of the employment of Northern Ireland. Before we pass any legislation, would it not be better to get some evidence base?

Mr Flanagan: The Minister engaged in a public consultation to identify the scale and extent of the problem and find out directly from people on zero-hours contracts how they were being treated as employees and whether a zero-hours contract was the right employment contract for them. I think that all of us, as MLAs, received many pieces of correspondence from people who had responded to the public consultation and copied us into their response. Some of the practices of employers who routinely employ people on zero-hours contracts are very alarming. Zero-hours contracts are not illegal. They are not illegal because we have not dealt with them as a legislative body and a case has not been successfully taken through an industrial or fair employment tribunal to make them illegal, but that does not mean that they are ethical or right. Employers should not be allowed to treat employees in such a way.

3.45 pm

The difficulty with the Minister's argument about the health and education services running into crisis overnight is the different legal status of a worker and an employee. There would certainly remain flexibility for employers of all sorts to have casual workers on the books, including a medical ward that needed to bring in agency or as-and-when staff to cover staff sickness. However, I do not think that it is acceptable to give a health and social care trust carte blanche to hire a significant proportion of its nurses as bank or as-and-when staff —

Dr Farry: Will the Member give way?

Mr Flanagan: — and move away from having full-time, permanent nurses.

Dr Farry: It is important that the Member be aware that supply teachers, who were previously regarded as agency workers, are now regarded as employees with zero-hours contracts. There are good reasons for that shift having taken place. Casualisation, which, as the Member implies, can occur on an agency basis, would be an even more retrograde step, not just because of its impact on staff rights. It also opens up issues around inefficiency. For example, one area is child protection and how schools would engage with people who are even more at arm's length from them if they were on a de facto supply teacher list as opposed to a de facto zero-hours contract.

Mr Flanagan: I largely accept what the Minister says, but I still do not accept that teachers and nurses have to be employed on zero-hours contracts. There has to be some way of getting casual worker contracts — not necessarily through an agency — to meet the need for flexibility in the public sector. However, the target of the amendment is not the health service, the education system or the public sector generally, and I do not think that either service would be negatively affected.

I accept, once again, that flexibility is required by some employees and some employers, but the problem is that a small minority of employers are abusing the system, generated in recent years, of zero-hours contracts. It was not a concept that existed 10 years ago. You had full-time and part-time members of staff and casual workers to come in to do a piece of work when required. The situation now is that employees are called in whenever the employers want. They are not given any notice of when they will be working or when their shift will be cancelled. They are not compensated if the work is cancelled at the last moment, even when they have turned up. There is a vast amount of documentary evidence about the abuse, particularly by employers such as Sports Direct, whose whole business model is based on employing staff on zero-hours contracts. That needs to be addressed. We cannot bury our heads in the sand and say that we are not going to do anything.

The debate on zero-hours contracts has gone on long enough, and I accept that, at this stage, we do not have consensus on an outright ban. I accept that, but that is my party's position on the matter. It is a missed opportunity, however, not to address the issue now when there is an opportunity through the Employment Bill for us to put in place at least some measures to protect employees from abusive employers who base their whole business model on zero-hours contracts and do not understand that people need surety. We are told about the needs of our housing market, but how can people get a mortgage if they are on a zero-hours contract?

When the Minister brought forward his proposals to tackle zero-hours contracts, one of the issues that Mr McCann and others put to him was the ability of people in low-paid jobs to access benefits and working tax credits.

The Minister assured us that his Department and the Department for Social Development were working on a joint departmental approach. A year later, we have not had any kind of update on how the benefits system will be changed to meet the need for flexibility of employees who one week may get 30 hours and the next three or four weeks get none and, because that is the case, do not get any benefits at all. That is another issue to be sorted. It does not appear to be a legislative barrier, and it is something that Departments can work on together.

I will now move off zero-hours contracts and on to the other two amendments. The question that I want to pose to Members is this: do we want to return to a system of employment where workers turn up at the gates of the docks or the workhouse on a Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday and Friday morning to see whether they are lucky enough to get pulled in the gate for a day's work?

That, in effect, is what is happening with zero-hours contracts. People are turning up at their workplace in the morning or afternoon and either being told that there is work for them or sent home. The employer has absolutely no duty to organise their workplace effectively. It is being done not only to completely erode workers' rights but to cover up for lazy and ineffective management within organisations.

I will move on to Mr McCrea's amendment No 14 about extending the qualifying period for unfair dismissal. There is absolutely no justification to warrant this legislative change. Extending the qualifying period for unfair dismissal does not make any sense. The CBI, the FSB and employers' representatives of that nature will tell you that it makes it easier to hire staff. It does not make it one bit easier to hire staff; it makes it easier to fire staff. My understanding is that the whole purpose of having a one-year period in which you cannot take a claim for unfair dismissal is so that the employer has a chance to figure out whether the employee is capable of doing the job and to give the employee a chance to become skilled up and able to do the job so that the employer can make a determination as to whether or not they are capable of doing it. If, after one year, an employer cannot figure out or does not know that an employee is not fit to do that job or that they are not performing, they are never going to know. A full year, 12 months, is enough for an employer to know that that employee is not cutting the mustard.

Mr B McCrea: Will the Member give way?

Mr Flanagan: Yes.

Mr B McCrea: Given that the Member is so keen on evidence-based assessment, how long does he think that it would take an employee who is joining work, having been unemployed in the past, to get up to speed so that he is fully protected? Does he have any figures?

Mr Flanagan: I do not have any figures but I will come on to a piece of evidence in a moment that will explain why there is no economic or social justification for this policy. I make the point to the Member that anybody who has applied for a job in recent years will have seen that, when you apply for a job, one of the criteria states that employees will be on probation for the first six months. I do not understand why employers give a probationary period of six months, yet there is a full 12 months in which an employee cannot take a case for unfair dismissal. Some Members want to extend that qualification period to two years. You go into a job and you get a six-month probationary period. So, the employer is saying, "After six months, I will know whether or not you are fit to do this job." However, a minority of Members here want to extend that to two years. Really, all that would do is deny people the right to go to a tribunal.

The whole purpose of the rule where you cannot take a claim within one year — I think that one year is probably a bit too long, given that most employers put people on probation for six months — is to allow people to bed in. It is not to allow businesses to downsize and get rid of staff without having to make redundancy payments. No matter what you have been told or what you think, it is not to bring additional flexibility into the workplace. The whole point of it is to allow employers to establish whether employees are fit for the job and to allow employees to figure out how to do the job before an assessment is made of whether or not they are fit for it. Moving to two years does not make any sense.

The only evidence that exists in this regard in recent years was the move, within the first year of the coalition Government in England, from a one-year qualification period to a two-year period. We stayed the same and kept the one-year period. We will be told that that is a massive barrier to inward investment and that no companies would come and base themselves here because they could not sack their staff within a year. I do not think that companies come here to hire staff so that they can sack them. What actually happened in that year when employers in England could sack staff within up to two years without any legal recourse and employers here could only do it within 12 months was that we had record levels of inward investment and job creation facilitated by Invest NI. So, the only evidence that exists highlights that this actually does not present a barrier to job creation at all.

As I highlighted to Mr Buchanan earlier, I was really interested to hear the comments from Mr Hilditch at Second Stage when he said that he supported the idea of not following suit with the rest of the UK by deciding not to increase the qualifying period for unfair dismissals from one year to two years. In the same debate, Mr Anderson outlined that he was in favour of extending it to two years. It appears that there is a difference of opinion within the DUP, and it is hard to know why that has changed. I accept that Mr Ross is a long-time advocate of the proposed change and has raised it consistently since 2012. It may well be the case that employers are raising it with him, but I do not think that it is a barrier to job creation or growing our economy. If we made the change, all it would do is erode workers' rights, with no tangible benefit in return for employers.

Amendment No 10 is about putting a statutory duty on companies to publish information on the extent of differential levels in pay between male and female employees. It is important to highlight the fact that, as the Minister said, it is largely based on legislation that exists in Britain that was enacted in 2010 but which has never taken shape here. The legislation enacted in Britain was slightly different, and I will highlight some of the differences that exist. Forty-six years after the introduction of the first Equal Pay Act, women can still expect to earn significantly less than men over their entire career as a result of differences in caring responsibilities, clustering in low-skilled and low-paid work, the qualifications and skills that women acquire and outright discrimination. Thankfully, discrimination, in that sense, has been made illegal, but that does not mean that it is not happening. The whole premise of the amendment is to shine a light on where women are being paid less than men for doing similar jobs.

Recent evidence indicated that, at a macroeconomic level, women here earn more than men. However, if you drill down into those statistics and look at them in some detail, you will see that that could be explained by the higher proportion of females employed in the public sector and the fact that jobs in the public sector tend to be better paid than those in the private sector. It is also the case that those statistics were gathered after the complete collapse of the construction industry. The fact is that so many men across the North lost their jobs in a well-paid, skilled trade. As a result, they are unemployed, they emigrated, or they have opted for less-well-paid or even part-time employment. I meet men who have left the construction site and are now stacking shelves in shops on a zero-hours contract. There is a reluctance amongst those people ever to go back into construction.

In the gender pay gap, even though the difference in Britain is, I think, 13.9%, women are actually paid more here than men, but there are some unique explanations for that. However, there is no information as to whether men and women carrying out the same job are being paid differently in the same organisation. Many groups that campaign to eradicate the gender pay gap acknowledge that the first thing we need is accurate information on the scale and extent of the problem to allow it to be addressed. As I said, the British Government introduced similar legislation, but they made it applicable only to organisations that have more than 250 employees. If we were to follow that course of action and go with 250 employees, that would be the minority of employers and employees. I would have been minded to go for companies with 10 employees or more, but, in the interests of getting maximum political support, 50 is a happy medium.

In England, it was largely done in the same way: the 2010 Act was an enabling piece of legislation that allowed the British Government to bring forward regulations to enact it. However, we are still waiting on those regulations to be brought forward. That is why the amendment includes the date of 10 November 2016 by which the first regulations must be made. That date, of course, is Equal Pay Day, which is the day on which, women argue, they stop being paid for the rest of the year in Britain because they are paid 13.9% less. The Minister indicated that there may be some difficulties for his Department in meeting that deadline. I do not necessarily agree with him, but I accept that maybe he has a better understanding of how his Department works than I do. The officials in it certainly have a better understanding. The information that will be published will apply only to companies with 50 or more employees. It will have to set out the extent of the pay gap in each organisation. They also have to carry out an equal pay audit. I have left it up to the Minister to set out much of the detail required, but I have set out some parameters that need to be included in such a report, including a demonstration of the methodology used to calculate any differential in pay between male and female employees.

4.00 pm

One of the biggest criticisms of the legislation in England is that there is no mechanism for employees or recognised trade unions to get sight of the information about their employers, so we need the Bill to include a requirement for the information to be shared with company employees and any recognised trade unions. The legislation in England refers to the publication of a report, but what does that mean and where does the report go? It needs to be shared with employees and trade unions.

Finally, the amendment would also require the Executive to introduce a strategy to tackle the gender pay gap within 18 months. Another big difference between this Bill and the legislation on the statute books in England is that the proposed sanction for non-compliance is capped at £5,000 in England. We have decided to apply a cap of £5,000 per employee because many people feel that a penalty of £5,000 for a large company with 5,000 employees is not much of a sanction, not much of a deterrent and not much of an incentive for companies to comply. A sanction of £5,000 per employee would mean that companies were extremely reluctant not to comply with the legislation.

It is clear, even though we do not have the information to the extent that we need it, that there is no one clear cause of the gender pay gap. There are important factors, such as discrimination and the fact that roles predominantly done by women are undervalued by many. Men tend to dominate the best-paid positions, and there is an inequality in the level of caring responsibilities. The gap appears to be wider for older women, women from ethnic minorities, women in certain occupational sectors, such as skilled trades, and women on higher earnings. If we got the information, it would give us a much better insight into the scale of the problem and allow the Department to produce a much more informed strategy on how to deal with it.

The Minister said that the timeline was not realistic. Although I do not necessarily agree with him, other Members seem to share his concern, so I am prepared not to move the amendment on the gender pay gap and work with the Minister and other colleagues to find an amendment that meets the Department's needs. The Minister also has concerns about the responsibility for this being put on his Department as opposed to OFMDFM, which currently has responsibility for equality. I am happy to discuss those issues with the Minister and, at this stage, am minded not to move the amendment. Hopefully, we will return at Further Consideration Stage with an amendment that meets the approval of the Assembly. Go raibh maith agat.

Mr Diver: I am grateful for the opportunity to speak to the group 2 amendments. There are three issues that I want to touch on: the gender pay gap information; amendment No 14, tabled by Mr Basil McCrea; and amendment No 15, which seeks to introduce a new clause on zero-hours contracts.

Amendment No 10 would introduce a new clause on gender pay. I take on board that its proposer has decided not to move it, but it is still appropriate to speak to it. It would be a welcome step towards fully investigating the extent of the gender pay gap in Northern Ireland. There can be no doubt that it is a matter of concern and that such inequality still exists

Last year, the Office for National Statistics (ONS) said that there had been relatively little change in the gender pay gap over recent years. In the UK, the gap between women and men's pay for full-time workers was 9.4% in April 2015 compared with 9.6% in 2014. Even with the legislation in England that Mr Flanagan referred to, the pay gap is still a considerable issue. That was the narrowest difference since figures were first published in 1997, but there has been little change overall.

It is positive to say, and Mr Flanagan touched on this, that there has been better news in Northern Ireland about our ability to address the pay gap. It has lessened here, with full-time female workers often earning more per hour than their male counterparts in 2014-15. That, as Mr Flanagan said, is due to the propensity of people here to work in the public sector. There is, however, a concern about that, with tensions in the public sector and the possibility of its shrinking, and the feeling that, mainly due to cuts in the public sector, people will increasingly be working in the private sector. I accept that many people think that that is the way that our economy should be going, but that seems to be where the greatest risks of pay differentials are. Nevertheless, it is good protocol to investigate gender pay gaps and collect employment information.

The SDLP suggests that it would have been positive to include the Equality Commission in the monitoring and reporting section of amendment No 10.

Mr Flanagan: I thank the Member for giving way. We had considered that, but, unfortunately, due to the amendment being proposed at Consideration Stage, there was not enough time for the British Secretary of State to grant approval for its inclusion in the Bill, and I certainly did not want to do anything to jeopardise the passage of Minister Farry's flagship Employment Bill.

Mr Diver: Thank you very much for that, which I accept. Obviously, it is a matter of concern. I take on board the fact that the timescales may not have allowed it to happen.

I turn now to Mr McCrea's amendment No 14. I was perplexed, as were my party colleagues, by the amendment. I spoke to Mr McCrea about it, and he explained the rationale behind it. I look forward to hearing an extended explanation, but it will probably not come as any great surprise to him that, as members of a social democratic and labour party, we will not support it. We believe that the amendment would effectively diminish an employee's rights to extending the qualifying period of employment by one year in relation to a written statement of reasons for dismissal. That would be a backward step. I understand the arguments for the embedding period for people in employment, but, speaking as somebody who, in a previous life outside the House, was directly involved in training people for employment, I had a lot of exposure to people, at all sorts of levels, in the early stages of their jobs. In my view, the risk in extending that period by two years would be not so much about its being used to see whether somebody worked out or was an errant employee, for instance, but, in extreme cases, an employer using it as an opportunity to get rid of people if their face did not fit or the employer was not comfortable with them. We are concerned about that. Not all employers adopt that approach, but it has happened.

Mr B McCrea: I appreciate the Member giving way. I have always wondered about this argument: if an employer takes that action at 11 months, why would he not take it at 23 months or at some other time? If employers are unscrupulous, surely they will just say, "You're gone". You could argue, controversially, that a two-year extension is better, because at least someone got two years before they were unfairly dismissed.

The Member mentioned his expertise, so I want to ask him another question. I asked this question of Mr Flanagan, but he did not know the answer. I have information on how long, on average, it takes an employee who comes in off the street to get up to speed and be a fully functioning employee so that his or her suitability for the business can be assessed. In your experience, how long would it take for someone to get up to speed?

Mr Diver: The answer to that question is extremely complex, because it depends on the nature of the job that the person is carrying out, what is expected of him or her and the nature of the organisation that he or she is working for. There are variations. I am not satisfied that extending the period to two years is justified in this case. In most cases, employers are able to come to an opinion within normal probationary periods for jobs, which are usually three to six months. I do not think that extending the period to two years is acceptable. The SDLP is not prepared to support that under any circumstances.

I now turn to amendment No 15 on zero-hours contracts. A lot of information on these contracts has come across in the debate, so I do not want to overplay it. The SDLP has been raising the plight of those working on zero-hours contracts for some time at a number of levels: in the House, in Committee and in councils. We are extremely concerned about the issue, as we are about the potential exploitation of people.

I know that Mr McCrea challenged the accuracy of the figure of 28,000. I have to be honest and say that I do not care whether it is 28,000, 24,000 or 15,000, the fact is that we have significant numbers of people in zero-hours contracts at the moment. A lot of those people are under 25. They are young people in the very early stages of their career. Is it right for this society to be exploiting people in that way, where they have uncertainty day and daily, week in and week out, not knowing how to plan for the future or what money they will have at the end of the month?

Ms Sugden: Will the Member give way?

Mr Diver: Yes, I will give way.

Ms Sugden: I was at university not so long ago. In one of the first jobs that I had to pay my fees whilst I was working through university, I actually had a zero-hours contract. It worked quite well for me because it meant that I was able to prioritise my studies and work my job around those. There was no obligation on me to work set hours. I did actually appreciate the flexibility there. Does the Member have any thoughts on that?

Mr Diver: I thank Ms Sugden for her intervention. I am glad to hear that it worked out very well in her particular case, but I have to say that, for other people, that has not been the anecdotal experience that I have heard about. People have told me that, with zero-hours contracts, it is very difficult for them to plan for the future and almost impossible to get any sort of mortgage or significant loan from the bank on the basis of uncertain income. I am willing to accept that, in some instances, it will work for people, but I think that, generally, it presents a lot of challenges for people.

Dr Farry: Will the Member give way?

Mr Diver: Yes.

Dr Farry: Surely the logic, therefore, of what he is saying is that we need to devise a system that allows us to tackle abuse where it exists and to devise a system that allows the flexibility that benefits people to continue. That way, everyone wins. Surely an outright ban, as the Member is potentially about to endorse, would prevent us from having that ability to adapt to the particular circumstances that people find themselves in.

Mr Diver: I understand that that is a perfectly logical approach to the issue. I have to say that, ideologically, I disagree with it. I think that part of the problem here is that we have bought into some sort of neo-liberal view of how people should work. What we need to do is go back to the blackboard, back to scratch, and try to recalibrate things in a way that is fair and by which we can create proper employment opportunities, particularly for our young people. I think we have a responsibility as a community to try to create appropriate employment opportunities and to have them presented in such a way that means that those young people are treated fairly and, even if they are on a relatively low salary, they can at least have some dependency on their likely income month in, month out.

In my and my party's view, zero-hours contracts are a way that can be used by some unscrupulous employers in some cases to avoid paying employees properly and to avoid giving them other reasonable employment rights. A study by the Chartered Institute of Personnel and Development found that over 60% of those in zero-hours contracts wanted more hours and could not get them from their employers. I do not think that is a satisfactory situation.

As regards the Minister's remarks about the likelihood of creating chaos in the health and education sectors, again, I think that goes back to how we calibrate these things and look at creating employment opportunities in those sectors. I do not believe it would actually create chaos. I think there is a need to look at the HR needs in those sectors and at how they can be dealt with and managed properly.

Mr Ross: Will the Member give way?

Mr Diver: Yes, I will.

Mr Ross: The Member mentioned that the survey found that 60% of those in zero-hours contracts wanted more hours and could not get them. Does he acknowledge that that is not actually evidence that those people are being exploited? There are plenty of people on part-time contracts who want more hours and cannot get them. There are others who are on full-time contracts who want additional hours or promotions and cannot get them either. That is not actually evidence that those people are being exploited.

Mr Diver: I am sorry, but I think that, for somebody is in a situation where they are on a zero-hours contract and they have been offered three or four hours a week, if that is the only work that they can get, and they have to take it because they have no alternative, in a way, that is, in my considered view, a form of exploitation because the employer decides. The power resides with the employer to decide the number of hours they are willing to give the employee. The employee needs the work and must work to eat and take their lives forward. In my view, there is an element — potentially at least — of exploitation in that.

Mr Ross: I thank the Member for giving way. He is now using the example of four hours a week. That is not the example that he gave. He talked about 60% of those on zero-hour contracts. He did not say how long those people were contracted to work each week. That is not actually any evidence that those people are being exploited.

4.15 pm

Mr Diver: I do not accept that, I am sorry. We will have to agree to disagree on that one.

Mr B McCrea: Will the Member give way to the back here?

Mr Diver: Yes.

Mr B McCrea: I just want some clarity. Are you calling for a right to have whatever hours you want to work? Are you saying that if you are on a zero-hours contract, you can say, "I will work 36 hours a week and you must provide it"? You could take an extension to that. Are we putting into a bill of rights that you have to have full employment in Northern Ireland as an absolute right?

Mr Diver: I hear what the Member is saying, but, in some respects, he is being facetious by giving that example. It is not unreasonable that people should expect some minimum threshold of hours, no matter what arrangement they have with an employer, whether it is part-time or full-time. In some instances, in certain sectors, when people have zero-hours contracts, they literally do not know how much they are working from one week to the next. They may present themselves at their place of work to find out that they have work or do not have work that week. I do not think that any employee will be able to dictate to their employer what hours the employer will be able to offer them, but it is not an unreasonable expectation to have some sort of minimum threshold. I accept that that has to be debated in the future. The principle of zero-hours contracts is something that, as a society, we all have to be concerned about.

As I said, the SDLP is against zero-hours contracts and is supportive of the Sinn Féin amendment. That said, we would have liked to have seen greater detail on how the prohibition of zero-hours contracts will be carried out. I accept that, in view of the proposer of the amendment not moving it today, there is potential to flesh out many of these ideas.

We retain some concerns about the Bill. The provisions in group 1 may make tribunal proceedings more onerous for the claimant. We welcome the review amendment submitted at Consideration Stage. We support the Sinn Féin amendments on gender pay equality and zero-hours contracts, and we are extremely concerned about Mr McCrea's amendment to extend the employment qualifying period to two years. That concludes my remarks on the group 2 amendments.

Mr Easton: Of the group 2 amendments, I will support amendment Nos 9, 11, 12, 13, 14, 16 and 17.

Amendment No 10 will not be moved, but it would have allowed for information to be published by employers on differences and pay gaps between women and men and for employers to give reasons for that. That would have made sure that all employers had to give reasons why, and, if they had not adhered to that, they could potentially be fined. I understand that the Member will not move that amendment and will work with the Minister and the Department. We might see that at a later stage as the Bill progresses.

Amendment No 14, which is Mr McCrea's, would basically allow anyone to take an appeal after one year and extend it to a two-year period. When receiving evidence from the Department, it was pointed that it had consulted quite widely on the issue. Certainly, the CBI and Federation of Small Businesses were in support of two years. On balance, because of that evidence, I tend to support that amendment.

Amendment No 15 is on zero-hours contracts. I believe that that amendment would do untold damage to those who want to work flexible hours and the number of hours. It would do untold damage to the hospitality industry and to nurses because the employer requires flexibility be able to bring in staff when needed for those jobs. I think that it is a badly worded amendment, and I will not support it.

Mr B McCrea: Nobody but nobody in the Chamber will, I believe, stand up to advocate for rogue employers who are doing bad things to employees. I do not think that anybody would try to make that argument. The argument from a number of people is, "Show me the evidence" or, "The evidence that you have is not correct".

I want to make it clear that in proposing my amendment, I am not seeking to attack workers' rights. One thing that was missed in the debate, but which perhaps came out on the periphery, is the impact of zero-hours contracts in certain circumstances, which people are rightly concerned about. However, there was little discussion about agency working, except when the Minister, in an intervention with Mr Flanagan about teachers, said that this gives even less protection. The problem is that when you start to get over-tightening of labour legislation, people move to other areas. They go into zero-hours contracts or agency working, or they take steps to avoid it.

Why is that important to us? Look at our regional employment statistics. Here is where we rank: the UK employment rate for the three months ending November 2015 shows that the lowest is Northern Ireland with 68.8%. The UK unemployment rate was highest in Northern Ireland at 5.9%. The UK economic inactivity rate is highest in Northern Ireland at 26.7%. The highest UK claimant count was in Northern Ireland at 4.3%. Our economic employment statistics are not good.

The Member from Sinn Féin proposing this took great delight in quoting views from different parties, and asking, "Did you really agree this?", so let me return the favour. Apparently, at least 40 people are leaving County Tyrone per week. The high rate of unemployment means that many are looking for jobs in Australia and elsewhere. I wonder if Mr Flanagan would support his colleague the Sinn Féin MLA Barry McElduff in calling for the Government to address the issue of emigration and create jobs where they are most needed — in Tyrone and, presumably, Fermanagh as well. Those are areas where we need to do that.

Mr F McCann: I thank the Member for giving way. I understand what you are saying in terms of emigration. Going back to the days when you were in the Chair of the Committee for Employment and Learning, that was something we discussed widely. Are you now saying that we should be looking at zero-hours contract, agency and other jobs to try to keep people from emigrating?

Mr B McCrea: Actually, Mr McCann, quite the contrary.

Mr F McCann: It does not sound like that.

Mr B McCrea: Well, you see, what is sometimes missing in this place is an articulate argument, where you set out certain bits of information and come round and say, "But let's look at the alternative". I do not want to upset people. In fact, I was saying to Mr Diver that I am sorry that my contribution seemed to have moved him from, "I'm interested in what Mr McCrea has to say" to "Under no circumstances will we ever support it". Maybe it was not one of my best interventions. My intention is to say it is entirely reasonable for us to be looking for ways to protect people who are exploited by unscrupulous employers. Mr Flanagan made that point, and I agree with it. The point I am making, however, is that when you tighten down information or legislation, you force people to go in the opposite direction.

This is just information. People say, "Would you like evidence?", so here is some evidence about the length of time it takes to get up to speed if you have just started a job. As Mr Diver said, it does depend, but an HR report says:

"The report reveals that new workers joining from the same sector reach optimum productivity in 15 weeks".

For SMEs, it is 24 weeks. For workers joining from another sector, it is 32 weeks. For new graduates, it is 40 weeks, and those coming from unemployment or inactivity take the longest time at 52 weeks. Part of the problem we are looking at here —

Mr Ross: I thank the Member for giving way. It is a useful statistic to have, but for those going into sales jobs, not only does it take time for them to be trained, there is also a period of time for their performance in sales to be assessed adequately. In many jobs, it takes perhaps six or seven months to train somebody, and you also need a longer period of time to assess how they are performing in that job. That is why the two-year qualifying period is beneficial to employees. They are given adequate time to prove their worth to that employer.

Mr B McCrea: I am grateful for the argument, and I think that it should be put. I take the argument. You could use a similar argument when Mr Flanagan talks about how good we were for inward investment when the UK changed its rules. There is a lag between performance and outcome. We are trying to argue here on emotion. We are trying to talk here from a philosophical point of view rather than looking at the information. One of the things that I thought that Mr Diver's contribution highlighted is this philosophical stance of, "I am socially democratic, so I think that we should take this response". That is not necessarily the correct logical position, and I think that the word "logic" was in there. We are all trying to look to see what would make things better and how we would get more employment. I read out a list of statistics to show how poor things are in Northern Ireland, and I am going to talk about how poor things are in certain constituencies.

Mr Diver: Will the Member give way?

Mr B McCrea: Yes.

Mr Diver: The Member is talking about how we can make things better, but it seems to me that the thrust of what he is talking about is how we can make things better for employers rather than employees. Obviously, we need to have effective employers who are able to create jobs, but we need to protect the interests of the employees who are being exploited.

Mr B McCrea: Let me just take that argument. I had a very good meeting with the Irish Congress of Trade Unions (ICTU), which came to me a little bit alarmed about my amendment and asked to talk about it. We had a very good discussion. We agreed on many, many things, including the need to invest in skills and that we want to get early resolution and conciliation. We agreed that the independent assessor was a good idea, and it said, as a union, that it would not support taking anybody through a tribunal case if there was not a reasonable prospect of success. We agreed on all those issues. The representatives even said to me that the current workers' rights are relatively weak and that all that an employer has to do to get rid of anybody is to go through the process. You just go through the process, have the meeting, and do all of that. These are issues that are an existing position. I thought that this was an entirely constructive position for the union because it said that maybe the qualifying period is not the big deal and is a sort of headline figure that we can just ignore.

It may be what the Minister was talking about when he said that you have to be hard on some things and get a negotiation on others. I do not know, but he will maybe say when his turn to speak comes back around. It seems to me that the argument over whether the qualifying period is one year or two years does very little to affect the unfair dismissals claim. In fact, that is what people have said in evidence. They have said that it makes no difference. Mr Flanagan, in earlier contributions, was saying that the numbers went up and the numbers went down, but, actually, it makes no difference.

I will tell you where it does make a difference — not to the employees but to the people who are looking to employ people. Here is our position, which we should all be particularly worried about. About a year ago, a 'Belfast Telegraph' poll focusing on young people showed that 67% of them see their future as being outside Northern Ireland and that 70% of them think that our politicians are incapable of agreeing a joint vision for the future of the country. That is the problem facing us all. The biggest tragedy in Northern Ireland, often not spoken about, is our young people who have to leave to get a job.

Mr Flanagan: Will the Member give way?

Mr B McCrea: I will give way in just a moment.

This is the issue that I am trying to address. When you do not have a job, you cannot get experience. Therefore, you cannot get another job.

What you want is a mechanism whereby you are given an opportunity to show what you can do. That is key to my amendment. It is not trying to deprive people of rights; it is trying to create an environment in which we will get more jobs for our young people.

4.30 pm

Mr Flanagan: Excellent. I thank the Member for giving way because that is exactly the point that I want to ask him about. Can he please outline to the House how allowing employers to sack staff after up to two years without recourse for any rights for that member of staff leads to the creation of one more single job in our economy? It might well displace jobs and allow some staff to be sacked so, then, somebody else can get that job, but it does not create a new job. You are talking about people wanting or needing to emigrate for employment. They will not stay if they have to get a zero-hours contract or if they face the prospect of being sacked at any stage within the next two years, regardless of the rights or wrongs of the reason for sacking them.

The Member's argument does not make any sense; it does not stack up, and it does not wash. It is based on an illogical position: that giving employers more rights will somehow lead to a position where they will not abuse those rights. I do not accept his narrative or his arguments.

Mr B McCrea: That would be a no, then?

Mr Flanagan: Maybe.

Mr B McCrea: I am just checking.

I am not afraid — you probably know this — to stand here on my own and say what I think. I did not know whether anybody would support this amendment. I brought it forward because I thought that we should have the debate. I have already made the point about us ducking the issue by moving it to affirmative procedures rather than negative resolution and about how that will set in stone what will happen. I am open to debate and argument. What I will say to each and every one of you is this: expect me to return the argument. If you make an argument, expect me to challenge it. That does not mean that I disrespect you or that I do not think that you have good points. The proper role of scrutiny is to ask questions.

Mr Flanagan, you have stated quite often that there is no evidence. In fact, I think that even the Minister, in his Civil Service-speak, said that there is no evidence to suggest such and such. You could also have said, however, that there is no evidence to the contrary. In the absence of any research, you might ask yourself why there is no research to inform the debate, given that we started in 2012, if memory serves me, when I was Chair of the Committee, but there is research. If you want research, it comes from the Federation of Small Businesses — a very respected organisation that, I think, many Members in the Chamber have attended and supported.

It talks about small businesses, not the big multinationals, not the ones that have HR committees and not the ones that you can say, "Yes, they have to go and do these procedures". What you find out from the Federation of Small Businesses is that there are 118,000 small businesses in Northern Ireland, but only 32,000 actually have employees. The survey that it brought back says that most of those businesses have between one and five employees. They were asked what problem they faced. If you want to get jobs for our young people or even, dare I say it, for those who are not so young and are having to get a new job after being made redundant, you have to persuade somebody to take them on. Here is the unpalatable truth and the words that maybe you should not say but which should be said, if that makes sense: the world does not owe you a living. People demand a job as a right, but, in the employment world, you have to negotiate with your employer: I will do certain work, and you will give me a certain amount of money. What everybody wants is a chance.

Mr Agnew: Will the Member give way?

Mr B McCrea: Yes.

Mr Agnew: I take on board the Member's point to an extent. However, if you are in a negotiation where one side has the opportunity to sack the other, there is no level playing field or negotiation. The employer calls the shots.

Mr B McCrea: The point that I made earlier, Mr Agnew, was that you can do that at 11 months as well, because what you get at the moment is churn. Most of the people who are showing up for further employment have been made unemployed after 13 weeks. Look at the casual staff that are taken on over Christmas. What could be worse than turning up for a job and being asked, "In the past five years, how often have you been employed?" and having to say, "Five times for 13 weeks". What you actually want is to get a bit of continuity of experience. You want to work in the one job and get a chance to show what you can do, and, frankly, if it takes you a bit of time to get up the learning curve, so be it. Let us give you the chance to do it. Perhaps it is counter-intuitive, but that is why a one-year constraint does not help anybody. It almost forces employers that are so minded — I am not saying that I agree with them — to act in one year and not two. You would benefit if you could move to doing two years. That is what the Federation of Small Businesses says.

Mr Swann talked about his position. The FSB, I am quite sure, is a reputable organisation in his constituency. In Ballymena, which, I believe, is close to his abode, 1,230 firms employ fewer than 10 people. Many of them replied to the survey. They are saying to him, "We would like to take on more people, but we do not have the HR department to take them on. We are worried about this. Give us a chance, and we will employ your local people — your constituents".

I say to Mr Diver that, in Derry, the figure is 2,500. It is slightly lower, I have to confess, than the economic metropolis of Lisburn. The issue is that you are trying to encourage those people who have work to take on more people, and they are telling you in evidence that they will not do it because they fear the employment law.

Some people in ICTU came forward and said that it is not such a big issue. I think that it said that it was nineteenth on the list, but you have to remember that it is comparing with what happens in GB. It is talking about a country where an SME is fewer than 250 people. Our economy is not like that. Our economy is made up of microbusinesses — businesses that employ fewer than 10 people. They are owner-driven, and you want them to employ people. Just think what would happen if we could encourage each one to take on one person. The real challenge for us is how you make such a thing happen.

There is some discussion about zero-hours contracts, and there was a really good intervention on that issue that they are not bad for everybody. Some people like zero-hours contracts. Of course you do not want people to be exploited, but I was struck by the Minister's proposals for dealing with zero-hours contracts. They were produced about a year ago, and I heard Mr Agnew say to the Minister, "Tell us what your proposals are for this zero-hours business", but the proposals, as I understood them, were that, if you were working for six months or whatever, you would be entitled to a contract. In fact, employers would be forced to state why they were not giving you a contract. All of that works only if you are not working for an agency. I can tell you that, if you make it too difficult to employ people, as is currently happening, people will not take the chance of employing anybody. There is no bigger challenge for our economy or us as legislators in the Assembly than to find a way of getting gainful, local employment.

Mr Flanagan: I thank the Member for giving way. Once again, he talks about how extending the qualifying period for unfair dismissal makes it easier to hire people. It does not make it easier to hire people; it makes it easier to fire people. Does he accept that the actual outworking of increasing the qualifying period for unfair dismissal does not help employers to create a single job? All that it does is make it easier for them to fire people within two years.

Mr B McCrea: We are going to go over this again. I am not an expert in employing people, but I will tell you who is: the Federation of Small Businesses, the CBI and engineering employers. Those are the people who actually employ. What you are going through at the moment is shedding labour from the Civil Service. That is our big process. You are going to have to find a way in which to get those people work or else put them on the scrapheap.

Unless you can come up with better information for me or some other alternative evidence, all that I can go for is what people have said. The employers have said that they would like to recruit more people but that they are afraid of the legislation.

Mr Diver: The Member said that employers have a fear of employment law. Part of the question is why we have employment law. We have employment law and protections so that people cannot be exploited as they were in the past. Any employer that treats their employees with dignity and has that fundamental relationship where they work and they are paid in return for the work that they do should not have anything to fear from employment law.

Mr B McCrea: Mr Diver said that he had some expertise in matters of recruitment. I have here the costs associated with recruiting somebody. It is from an established HR report, which states that, on average, it costs £30,614 to recruit somebody, per employee. You can argue about how they got to that methodology. Part of it includes work loss because of an inefficient process and having to put mentors in or whatever else. Those are the statistics that I gave earlier about how quickly it takes to come up to speed. I can also tell you that it costs about £6,000 in management time, recruitment fees, advertising and whatever. No employer in their right mind will try to waste money; that is not their purpose. They should be trying to recruit people who are right for their job and give them time to show what they can do. Occasionally, those things do not work.

I will tell you this straight off: when I was the Chair of the Employment and Learning Committee, there was an initiative from the Department to try to encourage people to take on workers and to go through a scheme. I went to a very respected organisation in my constituency and said, "Listen. I am really interested in this. I would like you to take people on". You can tell me that it does not happen in your constituency, but they told me that they were also interested but the problem was that, when they take on people who are forced to them on a scheme, they do not really want to work and that the first thing that happens is that they cut their hands on saws or something like that and put in a claim. They told me that they prefer to hire them as agency workers for a couple of years and, if they are OK, they then take them on. That is the point I am making. You cannot look at that one issue in isolation. If you want employment law that encourages employment but also looks after the rights of individuals, you have to look at it as a whole.

I sometimes get a little frustrated when I make these arguments. I get the feeling that people adopt a position that is based on ideological thought processes rather than a rational, logical evidence-based process. All the evidence from those who employ suggests that, if you do the right thing by giving employers some encouragement to take on employees, they will do so. Northern Ireland needs to do that because our employment performance is not good enough.

I put the challenge to those parties that are going to reject my amendment. When you look to those in your constituency, they will ask you whether you do not support those who are trying to create wealth. Are you saying that no members of the FSB are good employers? I heard a lot a lot of talk about Michelin, the tobacco factory and all those people. Are you saying that there are no responsible and reputable employers? I see that most people are trying to do a good thing because it is in their interests to do so.

When you come back to the numbers and to the evidence, the number of people who may be on zero-hours contracts is somewhere between 1.2% and 4%. I would like to know what that figure is before I pass any legislation. I am not saying that I am opposed to zero-hours contracts that are properly regulated. Of course there are abuses and issues, and I am interested to hear more about what the Minister has to say on the matter, but I want it to be evidence-based. When you do not address agency working at all in an employment Bill, there is a huge chasm in the arguments being put forward.

So, when I come to a conclusion on this, I realise that the style of debate that I have had and the challenge that I put out to people does not engender them to go, "Ah what a good fella. Let's go and vote for his amendment after all — you know, it's not so bad". I get all of that. But sometimes you just have to take a stand and say, "You are trying to push this through without considering the full effects".

I do not know if you are part of it or whatever, but I say to you, Minister, that I saw immediately what the procedural moves were about in moving to affirmative action on this. In my opinion, it was not that you might worry about some rogue Minister — heaven forbid we would have rogue Ministers in this place and we would have to go and stop it. I mean, if we had rogue Ministers or rogue employers, where would it all end? Rogue politicians?

This is a procedural thing. I think that we should be having this debate, and I am not trying to tell anybody here that they are wrong. I understand that there are heartfelt feelings on all sides and that people want to see what is best for their constituents. That includes looking after the employers that will employ them. Those are things that we have to deal with. But what I really think is good, even though it has been a bit fractious in this debate, is that at least we have got it out in the open. At least the amendment was put, and we put our position and had our chat, and we can stand on it when it comes to the next election. This is what I believe. But if you really want to know what I think would be good for Northern Ireland on this issue — from a non-partisan position — it is that we could agree to do everything possible to create jobs for our people. Jobs are what it is all about. It is about the economy, stupid. And on that, I will sit down.

Mr Ross: I will try to keep my comments relatively brief. I only want to talk to amendment Nos 14 and 15. I do so because they were two areas that I was particularly interested in when I served on the Employment and Learning Committee for two and a half or three years at the beginning of this mandate. The debate has not moved on an awful lot since then. I remember sparring across the table with Mr McCann, who often rehearsed some of the arguments that we have heard today about whether it was to do with standing up for employers or employees. Unfortunately, that is the kind of debate that we have had again this afternoon; that somehow it has to come down to a competition between employers or employees. Actually, what we want to do — I agree with Mr McCrea on this point — is to get to a position where both benefit, and both benefit from having a productive workforce who are in employment. That is the circumstance that we want to create in Northern Ireland.

All politicians are great at posing for photographs with the FSB, the CBI or other business organisations. Politicians are great at talking about how they want to see more jobs created in their constituency. They are great at calling for the Enterprise, Trade and Investment Minister to get more jobs created in their constituencies. But when it comes to actually creating an environment in Northern Ireland that is business-friendly and job-creation-friendly, I am afraid that some fail to live up to the expectation.

Employment law is important. Earlier, I listened to the Enterprise, Trade and Investment Minister talking about the key components involved in bringing investors to Northern Ireland, and he talked about our skills force. We have a highly skilled population in Northern Ireland. Our universities and further education colleges are excellent, particularly in how they work with employers in making sure that they provide appropriate training. Northern Ireland has a lower cost base than other countries, and that lower wage and office cost base attracts investors.

However, employment law is important, particularly when you think of the bigger companies from the Middle East and the States that are looking at a range of different environments across Europe. The most restrictive employment laws, seen in places like France, turn away investors. So, we need to make sure that we are cognisant of that and have a business-friendly approach. When it comes to a decision about whether to set up their company in Glasgow, Liverpool or Belfast, an employer will look to an area where they have the greatest level of flexibility. That is a significant thing. In 2012, the Government — I think that it was Vince Cable, a man hardly renowned for being a mad right-winger — introduced the employment law reforms and moved the qualifying period for unfair dismissal back up to two years.

Of course, as Mr McCrea pointed out, over the last number of decades, it has continually flipped between two years and one year, back and forth without any significant evidence that it caused any upsurge in employees being treated badly. At that time, Vince Cable and the coalition Government tried to create an environment in which employers were given the confidence to take on additional staff. When employers are telling us that it would give them more confidence, the litmus test is whether they take on more staff or train more people and whether they continue to grow as businesses.

The evidence from Great Britain over the last three years is hardly that the roof has fallen down and, suddenly, people are being abused right across Great Britain. It is simply not the case. What is the case is that Northern Ireland now looks like it is a step behind the rest of the United Kingdom in reforming employment law, and that, I am afraid, concerns me. It is a point that I made three years ago to the Minister and repeatedly made to him in questions for written answer: I asked him when he would follow the lead of Great Britain by reforming our employment law on unfair dismissal. I understand that he has all sorts of difficulties in getting proposals through the Executive and that there are difficulties in getting cross-community support. However, I am disappointed that we talked about it at the very beginning of the mandate, yet only today are we seeing the Bill. That is disappointing, given that the Executive keep talking about doing everything possible to help to create jobs. I am afraid that the Minister has not pushed this agenda forward anywhere near strongly enough, and that concerns me. I support Mr McCrea's amendment and have consistently done so. If Members are serious about ensuring that we are competitive, particularly against countries across the United Kingdom, they should also move towards that position.

I want to touch briefly on Mr Flanagan's amendment on zero-hours contracts. I remember arguing on the Employment and Learning Committee about the merits of zero-hours contracts in a flexible workforce. We want a flexible workforce and an economy that works for employers and employees. In an intervention, the Minister made the point, as did Mr McCrea, that nobody is talking about exploiting employees. If there are circumstances in which employees are being exploited, of course we should take action against the employers — of course we should.

Mr Agnew: Will the Member give way?

Mr Ross: Yes.

Mr Agnew: Does he not see how someone being on an exclusive zero-hours contract is a form of exploitation and that we have no proposals to do away even with that?

Mr Ross: That is not what we are discussing today. The amendment does not mention exclusive zero-hours contracts; it deals with all zero-hours contracts. There would need to be a very strong argument and a highly specialised justification for having exclusive zero-hours contracts. One of their benefits is that they give people the flexibility to turn down hours, take on hours or look for work elsewhere. Mr Flanagan made the point that there may be some areas — where someone has a particular skill set or works in a highly sensitive environment — in which certain commercial confidentiality could not be breached. It would be quite rare, I must say, for someone with a particularly high skill set to be on a zero-hours contract — that is unlikely. I do not see how employers would argue that there should be exclusive zero-hours contracts, but that is not what we are discussing today. We are discussing a blanket ban on zero-hours contracts.

Mr Flanagan said that the contracts were bad for workers and bad for the economy. They are not bad for the economy. The fact is that all the major employer organisations say that they give flexibility to and help the job market, and he should listen to them. In a very real example, Ms Sugden said that, when she was trying to get work and was on a zero-hours contract, it worked for her. It works for many students across Northern Ireland who do not want or cannot work regular hours, or perhaps they are busier in one week with university work than in another. They have the opportunity to turn down work if they are too busy but take it on another weekend. That is what a flexible workforce and a flexible labour market are about, and it helps our economy. The same goes for people who may have been out of work for a long time and want to return to the labour market gradually. It is a perfect opportunity for them and gives them the flexibility and control over their hours to do that.

Many Members asked this question: what if you want a mortgage or regular hours? In that case, a zero-hours contract is not for you. You will not take a job on a zero-hours contract if you need a mortgage. It is not suitable for everyone, but nobody is arguing that it is. My argument is that it has to be part of the mix in a flexible labour market. We talked about how zero-hours contracts benefit employers, and bigger employers use them as well. If they get a big order in, they take on more staff and, once the order is complete, they lay off those staff.

I have a real-world example from my constituency. When this was first discussed two or three years ago, a former Member, Mr Ramsey, talked about the potential of tabling a private Member's motion. People came to me and said it would be absolute madness for small businesses in certain industries. The example that I was given was of a small catering company based in Carrickfergus. It had no idea what its order sheet would look like a month in advance. It often took orders on a Monday for the following weekend or the weekend after that, so how busy it would be depended on a very short-term order book. Zero-hours contracts allowed that company to take on such work, knowing that it had a list of people who could come in at short notice to help with a catering job. If the company did not have a big order for the following week — it might have a small order — it would not have as many staff in. However, if a small family company were to keep all those people on a paid salary contract, it could not do business.

Zero-hours contracts are important for a flexible labour market, and they very much help small companies. I really take exception to Mr Flanagan saying that employers who use zero-hours contracts are lazy, inefficient managers. I can tell him that the people from that catering company who came to me work incredibly hard, long hours to ensure that they make a living, and there is nothing lazy about entrepreneurs who go out and try to set up their own companies and strive to get business and employ more people. It is a disgrace that Mr Flanagan used that language here today, but it does not surprise me: he has form.

I will leave it at that. I suggest to the House that, if people are serious about a flexible labour market that creates jobs and helps our economy, they will reject Mr Flanagan's nonsense amendment on banning zero-hours contracts. I endorse Mr McCrea's amendment.

Ms Sugden: I welcome the opportunity to speak on the second group of amendments at the Consideration Stage of the Employment Bill. I congratulate the Minister on getting the Bill this far. I also thank the Committee staff for turning the Committee Stage around in such a short time, although it is regrettable that the time was so short. I am no different to other Members in that my focus is drawn towards amendment Nos 10 and 15, which have been tabled by Phil Flanagan, Bronwyn McGahan and Fra McCann, and amendment No 14, which has been tabled by Basil McCrea.

I turn to amendment No 10. The bulk of my contribution will be on the gender pay gap, but I understand that the Members are not seeking to move that amendment. It is important, however, that we have an opportunity to discuss the issue, and I agree in general with the intentions of the proposed new clause. However, I do not agree with the amendment and the wording that has been put forward.

As I said, the proposers are correct to table the amendment, if only to raise the debate and encourage the Minister, the new Minister or, indeed, the Minister of another Department in the new mandate to seek an opportunity to address inequality realistically. As Members said, across the UK, although gender pay equality is improving, it has not changed dramatically over four years. It is thought that pay parity for men and women will take 50 years. In fact, the Prime Minister seems really enthusiastic about getting it within the next generation, so I certainly look forward to my grandchildren having the same opportunities as their male counterparts. In the UK, we are behind by 20%, so that is not a great figure. The figure also varies by occupation. The pay gap is probably biggest in the skilled trades, processed plant machine operations and for managers, directors and senior officials.

I am more than sympathetic to Sinn Féin's proposal, but it is complicated. It deserves more attention than a last-minute amendment that has not been analysed or consulted on properly. According to 2014 figures, as Members said, we do not have a gender pay gap in Northern Ireland, and, in fact, men are behind women. Although that may indicate that, for once, Northern Ireland is at the forefront on progressive issues, it actually highlights a symptom of a huge public sector compared with a small private sector. I am interested in up-to-date figures, particularly in light of the recent voluntary exit schemes, to see whether that gap has widened any more. Typically, gender pay gaps exist in the private sector, and I imagine that most businesses do not realise that a problem exists until they are forced to look at it. That is why today's debate is helpful.

While the amendment is unlikely to pass, it is important and needs to be considered as we move forward. I think that, particularly as we seek to grow our private sector and shrink the public sector, unless we address this, we could have an unwelcome situation where, as our private sector grows, the gender pay gap also grows. That will mean that we will actually be going backwards.

5.00 pm

The detail of amendment No 10 has led me to oppose it. It will not apply to employers who have fewer than 50 employees. England, Scotland and Wales are proposing equal pay legislation for employers who have more than 250 employees as a first step. Whilst I appreciate that Northern Ireland's economy is significantly different from those across the water, with SMEs making up the majority of our private sector, I am unsure about the figure of 50 that has been put forward in the amendment. I cannot come up with a figure because I am as uninformed about it as anyone else in the House. Again, I think that that is due to the lack of consultation and something like this not being proposed sooner.

(Mr Principal Deputy Speaker [Mr Newton] in the Chair)

The amendment also sets out regulations for this to be in effect by 10 November 2016. The Member said that that was because that was Equal Pay Day. Whilst that is quite a nice concept that seems to tie in everything nicely, it seems a little soon to me. I hope that those who tabled the amendment are mindful of the realistic difficulties with implementing legislation that will cost businesses more in the same year as we implement the living wage. Unless the amendment comes alongside government proposals to support private businesses in implementing it, we could be putting pressure on our small businesses.

I do not want to misrepresent myself. Gender pay parity and the living wage are absolutely the right things to do, but we need to be mindful of the current economic climate, particularly in Northern Ireland. Missing from the amendment is something that I hope will inform the debate moving forward: there has been no consideration of the bonus gaps between men and women. That contributes greatly to the figures that seem to show so wide a gap. There are many reasons why men get paid more bonuses than women, and a lot of it is not down to performance. I will not go into the details, but we need legislation that addresses that as well.

For all the reasons above, I will not support the amendment. I do not think that it is the right vehicle. I will not support it at Further Consideration Stage either because I do not think there will be an opportunity to do that. The Bill has been rushed at the end of the mandate, and I feel that there has been no time to consider it properly. I encourage the Government to ensure that it forms a part of the new Programme for Government.

I will not go into too much detail about the other amendments, as other Members have said much of what I feel about zero-hours contracts and increasing the qualifying period of employment from one year to two. Briefly, zero-hours contracts need reform because they are open to abuse. We all know what that looks like. I do not think that an outright ban, however, is appropriate. As I said, in my experience, a zero-hours contract satisfied me to an extent because it allowed me to prioritise something that was more important in my life. I was able to work and earn something to pay for any bills that I had. Equally, it was a bit of a struggle because I had a hire purchase agreement at the time, and I was hoping that I would get enough hours every week to pay for it. Fortunately, the employers were biting the hand off me to work for them as much as I could. That flexibility is important, and, as Mr Ross said, we cannot lose it. As Mr McCrea said, employers will seek other opportunities to get the flexibility they want, again squeezing out the people who maybe would have taken a zero-hours contract in the process.

As others have said, there is the case of teaching staff and lecturers. My partner is a lecturer in the Northern Regional College (NRC) — I declare that interest — and he started his role with NRC on a zero-hours contract. That enabled him to build up experience while he studied and got the qualification that enabled him to have a full-time permanent job. I see the pros and cons of the zero-hours contract, but, as for amending the Bill, our wings are clipped within the lifetime of this Assembly mandate.

In amendment No 14, Basil McCrea proposes increasing the qualifying period from one year to two. To be honest, I think that this is quite an interesting amendment, and I am willing to understand it and explore it further. To be honest, I feel entirely uninformed about it. Just hearing about it in a nutshell before lunch was not enough to convince me that we might not put people at a disadvantage by giving employers more opportunities to sack their staff by extending the period to two years. I recognise the arguments — others have said that industry is quite behind it — but I need more information to consolidate them in my mind. However, I am willing to look at that again as we move into the next mandate.

Mr Agnew: Like other Members, I plan to speak to amendment Nos 10, 14 and 15. I start with amendment No 15 on zero-hour contracts. There has been considerable debate about it already. We face a stark choice between Mr Flanagan's proposal to ban zero-hour contracts and doing nothing. At Committee Stage and in other public discourse, there has been an acceptance that there is a problem with zero-hour contracts. The difficulty is that the Minister has made no proposals to address that problem. I am open to proposals, and the talk, up until now, was that there needed to be some form of regulation. I thought that there was growing consensus that there needed to be some regulation, starting from the very minimal form, outlined in the Minister's consultation, of banning exclusivity contracts. If that were before us today, I would certainly be attracted to it as the minimum that we should do on zero-hour contracts. It is not in front of us.

We are left with the option of a ban or doing nothing, which means completely unregulated zero-hour contracts. That leaves the opportunity to exploit workers, and I believe that there are exploitative zero-hour contracts. As has been pointed out, if that was not the case, a lot more highly skilled, highly paid professionals would seek the flexibility of zero-hour contracts. Maybe they would like to take three months to travel the world and then come back to their job. The reality, however, is that we do not see it at the high end of the labour market; we see it at the low end. We see unskilled, low-paid workers employed on zero-hour contracts. It touches on Mr McCrea's amendment about the balance of power between employer and employee. Unfortunately, the demand for jobs in our economy is much higher than the supply, and that gives the employer power. The employee, particularly the lower skilled, has very little power. As Mr McCrea said, there is very little negotiation to be had. It boils down to, "Do you want the job? These are the conditions. Take it or leave it".

I have to come back to why we have no proposal from the Minister when there has been so much talk about the issue in the media and in Committee. Indeed, he has consulted on it. The speculation has been that even the minimum regulation — a ban on exclusivity contracts — was too much for the Executive and could not be agreed.

Dr Farry: Will the Member give way?

Mr Agnew: Certainly.

Dr Farry: I will save the Member from five minutes of speculating erroneously. The context is that we have had a significant paper, which I mentioned in my opening statement on this group of amendments, before the Executive since February 2015. It made a number of proposals, including a ban on exclusivity. Frankly, the Executive and the Assembly agreeing to ban exclusivity would just be a drop in the ocean. Something like 2% of zero-hour contracts are exclusive, so it would be scratching the surface. We were looking for a statutory code of practice and an expectation that an employer would have to justify not giving someone who has fulfilled a normal working pattern over a set period a regular contract. Those proposals were rejected by the Executive not because they went too far but because Sinn Féin — no doubt, Mr Flanagan can respond to this in due course — did not feel that they went far enough. They wanted an outright ban. We have been locked into a situation where it has been an outright ban versus the proportionate reforms that I have been trying to get through the Executive for the best part of a year.

Mr Agnew: I appreciate the Minister's clarification. He probably did save me going off on one particular tangent, so I will go off on a different one, but on a similar point. I ask this question: what is the Minister's role? I have questioned him on a number of issues, including this one. The reforms that he is seeking seem reasonable, but he has not been able to get them through the Executive to be debated here today. I have seen other reasonable reforms proposed by the Minister, such as those trying to make teacher training colleges more efficient and more integrated, not getting through the Executive. At the other end, when I questioned him on what he can do in relation to universities — for example, as regards modern languages at Ulster University — he said that the universities are independent and that, while he funds them, they run their own affairs. I will ask a question that Mr Attwood is fond of asking about knowing the difference between being in government and being in power. The Minister is clearly in the Government, but is he in power? It seems to me that every —

Dr Farry: Will the Member give way?

Mr Agnew: — change that he proposes is blocked at the Executive. I will certainly give way.

Dr Farry: OK. I am not sure if the Member has been paying attention over the past five years, but we have a higher education strategy, a widening participation strategy, an FE strategy, an apprenticeship strategy, a youth training strategy and a NEETs strategy. We have additional STEM places, and we have doubled the number of PhDs. I can go on at length if the Member so wishes. I am in a position to address a large amount of things. I also stress to the Member that he is coming very close to advocating political interference in how universities do their business. I urge caution on that. I am sure that that is not really where he intends to go.

Mr Agnew: I thank the Minister for his intervention. He talks about a higher education strategy but, as he does not want to interfere in the universities' business, I wonder if it is worth the paper that it is written on. My point was more about his role within the Executive. If he cannot even get simple reforms through the Executive to be debated — not passed, as the Executive parties can vote against them if they wish, but even debated — I question what his role in the Executive is. That is part of the crux of why we are here debating one extreme, which is to ban zero-hour contracts, and the other extreme, which is to do nothing. As the Minister has outlined, there are other stages in between, but we are left with this stark choice. Given the stark choice that we have, I am, as I have said, more minded towards Mr Flanagan's approach. The labour market already benefits the employer in the sense that the demand for work is much greater than the supply —

Mr Ross: Will the Member give way?

Mr Agnew: — particularly at the lower-skilled end. I will give way.

Mr Ross: It strikes me that the Member is almost saying, "We have an opportunity to either wait and see if we can get amendments brought forward on this and take away the problem area of zero-hour contracts, or we can just have a scorched-earth policy." It seems to me that the logical and rational position would be to say, "Let us see if we can work on getting some agreement on tackling exclusive zero-hour contracts and make sure that we have tight enough regulation over their usage." He seems to be taking the other position of, "Let us not go for the logical thing. Let us just get rid of them all, and to hell with the consequences for the labour market." Why on earth is he taking that approach?

Mr Agnew: I thank the Member for his intervention. The obvious thing to do would have been to agree that at the Executive and bring it forward in the Bill. That has not happened, and I have no confidence that we are going to see something better at Further Consideration Stage. If he is telling me that he is going to bring that forward —

Mr Weir: Will the Member give way?

Mr Agnew: I will when I make this point. If the Member chooses not to move the amendment today and something is going to be brought forward from the Benches opposite, I will be willing to look at it. I stated that there was a stark choice. I do not envisage the same problems if we ban zero-hour contracts that he does. There may be better options, but I do not see it as the worst-case scenario. The worst-case scenario is what we have. I will give way.

Mr Weir: I am a little bit perplexed. The Member seems to indicate that we are stuck with two extremes, that he is choosing the lesser of two evils, and, essentially, that it is all the Minister's fault for not being able to get this through the Executive. What was to stop the Member, if he has a particular issue, bringing forward an amendment himself? I have not seen him submit any.

Mr Agnew: I thank the Member for his intervention. As he well knows, I have brought forward plenty of amendments to plenty of Bills. I am one MLA. I brought forward my own private Member's Bill. It was passed and is now an Act. I have done my work in the Chamber. This is a Bill. I am not on the Committee, but I am seeking to provide a contribution, and I will stand over my record happily. Indeed, I will go up against the Member and the Minister in the forthcoming elections and I will put my record to the people. I have no fear in that regard. I am making a contribution on the proposals we have in front of us. There is only so much that you can do, as one MLA, which is why I look forward to my party having more MLAs in the next Assembly. We will contribute further through amendments, questions and holding the Executive to account.

5.15 pm

The point has been made that zero-hour contracts work for some people. Ms Sugden gave her own example, but she qualified it — and I am happy to give way if I misrepresent her — by saying that she was under pressure, and, because her particular employer happened to provide a lot of work, that worked for her. I was a student. I needed time to study. I had an eight-hour-a-week contract. That worked for me. I do not see why that was particularly onerous on my employer when, perhaps, there was not so much work available. That was the minimum commitment to me as an employee. I had holiday pay with that, which you do not get with zero-hour contracts. I had the flexibility to take those holidays when I needed time to study for exams. I was fortunate that, when business was up, I got extra hours, which helped fund me throughout the rest of the year. My employer made that minimum commitment to me. They gave me those minimum rights of holiday pay and breaks etc when I was working. If we banned zero-hour contracts today, as some fear, I do not see any reason why low-hour contracts cannot still be a flexible mechanism that give employees some of the basic rights that they should be entitled to.

The issue of the gender pay gap has been debated and discussed. I commend the Members for bringing it forward and bringing it to light. As has been clear in the debate, we have the evidence that there is a gender pay gap. We, perhaps, do not have sufficient evidence as to why that is. The proposal to require employers to look at, monitor and report on the issue is one of the ways in which we could get the data. We need to tackle the issue. There is an assumption among many that gender inequality issues have somehow been resolved and that our employment laws etc provide sufficient protection. The evidence is that we still have a gender pay gap. We should be debating how we tackle that issue.

Amendment No 14 concerns the two-year qualifying period. Mr McCrea said a lot of things that were hard to disagree with, such as wanting to create more jobs and stop emigration. We are back in the situation where more people are leaving Northern Ireland than are coming to live here. That is regrettable. However, I did not hear how his proposal addresses that issue. He said that it gives more power to employers, and so that can only be a good thing. That is not necessarily a good thing. There should be a balance between the employer and employee in terms of rights and roles. Mr McCrea talked about the different scenarios and how long it takes an employee to get up to the optimum level of working. His worst-case scenario, where somebody was coming from unemployment and had not worked in that particular role before, was that it would take 50 weeks to get to the optimum level. I do not see the rationale for saying, "Well, you should have another year, then, in which you can sack that person at will". A year is more than sufficient, as Mr Flanagan pointed out. We give six-month probationary periods. Those time frames are reasonable.

Mr Ross: I thank the Member for giving way. In the circumstances where it takes 50 weeks — we are talking theoretically rather than about a real job — to train somebody and they have not yet been assessed on whether they are good at the job, are you seriously saying that the employer should not have the opportunity to get rid of that staff member if they are not doing their job well after the training period? He seems to be suggesting that once you have gone in you should not be sacked, but that is not how the labour market works. An employer has a right to have productive employees working under them. We want to make sure that we have a fair enough period to allow the employee to prove their worth to their employer. That is the point that I tried to make to Mr McCrea. It is not just about the training period; it is also potentially, in some jobs, the time to prove your worth. So, the two-year period in those circumstances would benefit the employee because they could prove their worth to the employer in that time.

Mr Agnew: I thank the Member for his intervention. Maybe we are interpreting differently what Mr McCrea presented. I have not read the document, but it seems to me that the time taken for an employee to get to the optimum level of productivity would not include the training period. I do not see that as being the same as the training period; it is about experience and growing in a role not about being productive and contributing. So, I would not equate it with a training period. That is not how I interpreted what Mr McCrea said, although he is not here to answer.

Mr McCrea rightly asked, "If not this, then what?". As I said, I do not feel that he provided a compelling argument for how his amendment will create employment. It gives more flexibility to the employer but fewer rights and less security to the employee.

If we look at the evidence, skills have been mentioned. I do not think that anyone will disagree with that, so I make the point that getting a well-trained workforce is one of the best things that we can do. The other evidence is on the living wage and shows that the better you treat an employee the more you get from them. The living wage is one example of that. The Oxford Economics report showed that if we paid a true living wage — not the Chancellor's proposed increased minimum wage — net employment in Northern Ireland would go up. When you pay people at the lower end of the labour market more, they spend more in the local economy, and there is a greater multiplier effect. The evidence also shows that a worker who is valued by their employer has higher productivity. Those are some of the things that we can do to boost employment. It starts with looking after your employees.

Mr McCrea talked about emigration. One way to stop a person leaving is to pay them well. It is very rarely the low-skilled worker who leaves; it is usually the educated and those with university degrees. It is not because there are not jobs here; it is because there are not jobs with good pay and conditions, or at least such jobs are not in sufficient number. It is normally those with degrees or master's degrees and those who have the family support to travel and take opportunities abroad in the first place who leave. It is not the low-skilled and low-paid workers who leave: unfortunately, they stick around, left with the zero-hours contracts, which, in some cases, are their only options. It is the higher skilled who leave; the brain drain, as it is referred to, is the problem. I see nothing in amendment No14 to address that. It would only add to the problem by saying to graduates and the skilled, "There are other countries and other employers providing better pay and conditions. Chase those jobs, because the jobs are not here in Northern Ireland." For those reasons, I will oppose amendment No14.

Dr Farry: This debate has been an interesting one and certainly took longer than the debate on the group 1 amendments. Obviously, most of the interest has come on the amendments that were not processed by the Department or the Committee. Those amendments came in from Members at the eleventh hour. It is their right to do that, but it brings the disadvantage of there not being proper scrutiny of them or a full understanding of the consequences that would flow from them, deliberate or otherwise. Sometimes, the unintended consequences are the ones that people may not necessarily be aware of. It is important that people bear that in mind when they come to support, or otherwise, the proposals that are before us. It is one of those instances when you could say, "Legislate in haste, repent at leisure". Therefore, we need to be rather careful around some of the points.

I will take the amendments in the order in which they appear in the Marshalled List. First, we have the issue of the gender pay gap. I commend Mr Flanagan for what I gather he is going to do, which is to pause and not necessarily move the amendment today at Consideration Stage but consider bringing it back at Further Consideration Stage. I think that that is a wise approach and is very much in the spirit of where the Assembly is today. I appreciate that some Members have said today that they do not believe that we should be addressing the issue at all at this time. I, and probably my officials, have considerable sympathy for that point of view. However, we are where we are. If there is the ambition that we do it at this time through the Employment Bill, not moving and re-presenting the amendment at Further Consideration Stage is the more responsible thing to do.

The amendment does not directly impact on my ministerial responsibilities at this stage, although it may do so in due course, so I do not take a formal view as Minister. Wearing my own hat, may I say that my party colleagues and I would be sympathetic to supporting a revised amendment in principle, subject, of course, to seeing its wording and ensuring that it is something that is going to be viable? Without putting words in other people's mouths, I detect that there would be a similar viewpoint from other corners of the House. Therefore, there is certainly something for the Member and his colleagues to work on.

If I may be so bold as to suggest, in this format, some of the issues that the signatories to the amendment may wish to reflect on, and the reasons that they should wish to reflect on them, I will do so. I think that it would be productive to do so. The first point that I will make is that a balance has to be struck between what is said in the actual wording that goes into primary legislation and what aspects may be left to regulations. Ms Sugden made a valid point about the rationale for the thresholds for the number of employees. Obviously, in Great Britain, they are talking about 250 employees, and the proposer of the amendment discussed a point around 50. That is an issue that may be better left to the public consultation by whatever future Department would be responsible for engaging on the regulations. That is an issue that may well be better determined after that public consultation. Therefore, a future amendment could make reference to a responsibility to bring forward regulations, state that regulations must consider points a, b, c and d and state that point a, for instance, is the threshold for the number of employees.

Mr Flanagan: I thank the Minister for giving way. The economy in Britain is somewhat different from the economy here. Siphoning off only companies that have more than 250 employees may well deliver a considerable number of companies to present a picture of the extent of the gender pay gap, allow some information to be delivered on why it exists and maybe present solutions for how to tackle it. However, if we were to adopt a situation here of trying to get information only from companies that have more than 250 employees, you would be looking at a very small information base. That is the rationale for choosing 50. If we went only for companies that have more than 250 employees, the number of companies that you would be looking at would be very small, and the level of information and detail that you would get might not be enough to shine a light on the true extent of the problem.

Dr Farry: I make this very clear to the Member: I fully accept that the premise of what he is saying is that we may wish to do something different in Northern Ireland from what is being done in Great Britain, so a threshold of 250 in Great Britain does not necessarily have to be carried across into Northern Ireland. The point that I was making is that the rationale for 50, as he outlined, is nonetheless an arbitrary threshold. It could be 40; it could be 60; it could be 100; it could be 10. Those are the sorts of issues that would be best considered through the public consultation around the regulations. Therefore, no violence would be done to the ambitions that the Member and his colleagues have by simply putting less detail into the amendment and giving more scope for the consultation around any regulations that a future Department will bring forward. That way, you will have much more buy-in from stakeholders, address your policy outcome and have full capacity to do something different from what the case is in Great Britain, but you will also have a much stronger confidence base that what you are doing is something that is going to be workable in the Northern Ireland context.

5.30 pm

In a similar light, it is important that the Member reflects on which Department he gives the responsibility to. I am not sure whether it was deliberate or otherwise but, as the amendment stands, it refers to "the Department". Clause 25, I think, defines the Department as being the Department for Employment and Learning. That power would subsequently transfer to the new Department for the Economy. While, in the eyes of some people, that may well be the logical place to do it, we have a situation where equality responsibility currently lies with OFMDFM and that is transferring to the Department for Communities. We may not want to see a situation where we fragment equality responsibility and give one small sliver of equality issues, particularly in relation to sex discrimination, to the Department for the Economy as opposed to keeping it alongside other aspects of sex discrimination under the Department for Communities. As the Member reflects on that, he will probably see that it is best that equality is kept together. Certainly, the Executive, of which his party is a primary member, would no doubt wish to see equality powers consolidated together rather than split in different areas. Again, that may well be something that the Member wishes to reflect on.

We need to be realistic about the timescale. That is not me wishing to argue that we need to take our time on it or drag our feet; we simply have to be realistic about the fact that an election is coming up and a new Department is coming on stream. There will have to be public consultation on the regulations. No matter how much or how little detail goes into the primary legislation, when you have a requirement for regulations where there has been no policy work done in Northern Ireland, there will need to be a formal public consultation. Any Department that tries to bring forward regulations without that public consultation will be successfully judicially reviewed. That consultation has to occur. Any new Department has to do the necessary policy work. It has to have the opportunity to have the public consultation, consider the implications of the consultation and then bring it through the normal processes in the House. The prospect of that being done by the middle of November are fairly remote; it is ambitious. I give those points to the Member more as potential suggestions, but they are constructive suggestions on how he may find that he is able to garner what may well be, in the main, cross-party support in the Assembly for the way forward on that point. I commend him for at least showing the initiative to bring it forward and for his wisdom in potentially waiting a fortnight or so and reflecting on how the amendment could maybe be crafted somewhat differently.

On the issue of unfair dismissal, I reiterate that I will certainly retain an open mind and encourage other Members to do so as well. What we are asked to do today is take a final decision on the issue in the context where the evidence base is not yet established for change. If people wish to go back and review the documentation from my Department on the employment law review, they will see that we have made a request for organisations to bring us evidence and that we have not received conclusive evidence from those organisations to justify change. We have also done some comparative international analysis that, again, at this stage does not back up the case for reform. People are making what are essentially anecdotal comments around our competitive base to justify the change in policy. When the change occurred in Great Britain, they essentially moved on the basis of anecdotal instinct as opposed to a solid evidence base. Members are perfectly entitled to take a decision to move on that basis, but it is important that they understand the basis on which they may or may not take a decision today.

Looking ahead, the issue can return to the Assembly. Any future Minister for the Economy can bring forward regulations to the Assembly to change the qualifying period from one year to two years. The existing law says that that is done through the confirmatory procedure. That means that there has to be a vote in the Assembly. The amendment that is before us changes that to the affirmative procedure. That, in no way, shape or form, changes the balance of voting: there will need to be a vote in the Assembly. It cannot be slipped in through the back door. It could not previously be slipped in through the back door. All we are doing is moving from a situation where there will be a short period in which a Minister could act unilaterally with the prospect of being overruled by the Assembly. That, in itself, would create chaos in our employment law. We have a situation where the Minister and Assembly would have to act before the change could be made. I have outlined where I could see that change happening in the future if the evidence base was there. It could be part of a wider package of reforms. People viewed that as worthy of consideration.

I had other ambitions on changing the collective redundancy notice when more than 100 employees were affected, which is a bigger issue for us in terms of our competitive position in attracting investment. That would require primary legislation, and, unfortunately, due to a lack of agreement on that, that will not be immediately available to us.

That brings me to the issue of zero-hours contracts, which probably generated most of the discussion on group 2. I stress that my preference is that we have a proportionate regulation. We have to move with the times. Those contracts are becoming an increased feature of our labour market, and it is important that regulation keeps up to speed with the casualisation of the labour market. In doing so, we have to recognise that we have a responsibility to address abuse as far as we can, at the same time as ensuring that where flexibility works for employers and employees we allow that to happen. We also have to ensure that whatever we do is credible and will address the problem. To be perfectly frank, leaving aside the wider impacts of the proposed amendment, it would be very easy for employers to circumvent the current definition of a zero-hours contract with a different form of casual contract that would add very little protection. The proposed way forward would not actually deliver much in terms of its wider policy intent.

At the same time, we need to be very conscious of where this could lead us. Some people seem to be operating under the illusion that, if we were to ban zero-hours contracts and, in doing so, had a definition that was sufficiently watertight and covered similar contracts or variations of that, we would maintain the same level of employment and employers would keep all their existing staff who are on zero-hours contracts and put them on a different contract. In some cases, that would happen; in other cases, people would lose their job. Employers may choose not to put people on a different contract. They may choose not to employ those people because, for whatever reason, it is not consistent with their business model, for better or worse.

My ideal situation is very clear: I want proportionate regulation, but the Executive have not been able to agree on that. Today, we have a choice between the status quo and an outright ban. Some people seem to be suggesting that an outright ban is probably the lesser of two evils. Let me put it the other way round and make the point extremely clearly: in the context that the Assembly puts through an outright ban on zero-hours contracts, I would not feel in a position to continue with the Bill. Such violence would be done to the Bill that we would have to stall the process. I, for one, am not prepared to stand over a situation where, through lazy legislation and not fully considering the implications, we inadvertently put the jobs of tens of thousands of people in Northern Ireland in jeopardy. That is the implication of what we are talking about.

Leaving that aside, there are wider implications that would flow for our health and education sectors. To suggest that we can simply flick a switch and the health and education sectors would reorganise their workforce plans overnight is extremely naive. There would be massive disruption. There would need to be renegotiation on how the systems of supply teachers and bank nurses were delivered. We are talking about a period of months in which the current systems would be de facto illegal and people could take cases to industrial tribunals for breaches of the law.

It is important that we are conscious of the implications of what is before us. I point out to those who tabled the amendment that their Ministers have been presiding over the use of zero-hours contracts. They talk about a ban today, but, unilaterally, any of their Ministers could have acted to ban them in their area of responsibility. Why were those opportunities never taken up? I am happy to give way if someone wants to clarify that.

Let us be clear: today is more about grandstanding than about a realistic approach to how we address a serious problem. I am deeply frustrated that we have not been able to get consensus. Over the past year, we have wasted the opportunity to do something far more radical than Great Britain and the Republic of Ireland, and we will now be forced into the situation of being left with nothing on the statute book on zero-hours contracts.

Mr Agnew seemed to have more interest in my position as an individual than the policy issues. I am not quite sure what was going on there, but I am sure that we can speculate on what was going on in his mind. The simple fact that this did not get through the Executive does not mean that I am without power or influence. In a multi-party Executive, we all have difficulties in getting consensus. I wish that that was not the case. We need a lot more outcome and delivery. However, the deadlock and division in our Executive have affected every Department, and we need to reflect on that. We need to reflect on the way in which we approach business and how we can move forward on areas where there are disagreements, even minor disagreements, to stop them becoming blockages. Once we are in a constructive place, we can get the issues moving.

I rather fear that the zero-hours contract has become the victim of how our Executive work. That was a plea for reform, not a plea for me to abandon all hope and leave things to other parties to get on with. It is an Alliance Minister who has been trying to reform the context of zero-hours contracts, but, in cooperation with the Committee, we have taken forward other reforms that will make the system of employment law in Northern Ireland better and, indeed, the envy of the world.

I remind Members that what we are proposing today is about making our employment relations system in Northern Ireland much more efficient and effective in the interest of employers and employees. This does not have to be a zero-sum game of setting one off against the other. The unions and employer organisations support what is in the Bill. Much of what we are doing in alternative dispute resolution is world leading. We are not simply copying what happens in other jurisdictions. We are the people showing leadership and doing things with a degree of creativity and innovation that will set the standard for others to follow.

Budget Bill: Second Stage

Mr Storey (The Minister of Finance and Personnel): I beg to move

That the Second Stage of the Budget Bill [NIA 77/11-16] be agreed.

Accelerated passage of the Bill through the Assembly is needed in order to ensure Royal Assent before the end of March. That is necessary to obtain legal authority for the Departments and other public bodies to spend the cash and use the resources included in the Bill in 2015-16 and to ensure a smooth continuation of public services into 2016-17. Preparation of the detailed Estimates and the related Budget Bill under consideration today was a challenging undertaking, given the timetable involved. The Bill and the Estimates made must reflect the latest financial monitoring position, which concluded in January, yet the Bill requires Royal Assent prior to the end of this financial year. I am therefore grateful that the Committee for Finance and Personnel has confirmed, in line with Standing Order 42, that it is satisfied that there has been appropriate consultation with it on the public expenditure proposals contained in the Bill and that it is content that the Bill may proceed by accelerated passage. I welcome and appreciate the assistance of the Committee on the matter.

I shall now briefly outline the purpose of the legislation before us today and draw attention to the Bill’s main provisions. The debate follows the Bill’s First Stage yesterday, which followed the debate and approval of the two associated Supply resolutions. The Bill’s purpose is to give legislative effect to the 2015-16 spring Supplementary Estimates and the 2016-17 Vote on Account. Copies of the Budget Bill and its explanatory and financial memorandum should have been made available to Members today. I do not intend to repeat the detail provided to Members at First Stage. In fact, Standing Order 32 stipulates that the debate should concern itself with the narrow content of the Bill, a point that I hope Members will remember during this evening’s proceedings.

For the benefit of Members, and in accordance with Standing Order 32, I will summarise the main features of the Bill. Its purpose is to authorise the issue of £15,770,704,000 from the Northern Ireland Consolidated Fund in 2015-16. The amounts for each Department are detailed in schedule 1 to the Bill. That is £359 million more than was authorised in the June Main Estimates. That cash is drawn down on a daily basis, as needed, from the Northern Ireland Consolidated Fund, which is managed by my Department on behalf of the Executive. The Bill also authorises the use of resources totalling £17,135,765,000 by Departments and certain other public bodies. That is some £389 million more than was authorised in the June Main Estimates. Those amounts are detailed by Department in schedule 2 to the Bill.

In addition, the Bill revises the 2015-16 limit on the amount of accruing resources that may be directed by DFP to be used by Departments. That limit includes operating and non-operating accruing resources — in other words, current and capital receipts — and amounts to £2,628,155,000. A breakdown by Department is shown in schedule 2 to the Bill. Under section 8 of the Government Resources and Accounts Act (Northern Ireland) 2001, a direction on the actual use of the accruing resources will be provided by way of a DFP minute, which will be laid before the Assembly in March following the Bill's Royal Assent.

Therefore, not only does the Bill authorise the use of resources but it authorises accruing resources, bringing the total resources for use by Departments and other public bodies to almost £19.8 billion. The amounts now requested for 2015-16 supersede the Vote on Account in the Budget Act (Northern Ireland) 2015, which was passed this time last year, and the Main Estimates provision in the Budget (No. 2) Act (Northern Ireland) 2015, which was passed by the Assembly in June 2015.

The Bill also authorises the 2016-17 Vote on Account for cash of almost £7,899,052,000 and resources of £8,680,276,000. That is to allow cash and resources to flow to public services in the early months of 2016-17 until the Main Estimates and the related Budget Bill are approved in June this year. The cash and resources are to be appropriated and used for the services and purposes set out in column 1 of schedules 3 and 4.

Clause 5 authorises temporary borrowing by the Department of Finance and Personnel at a ceiling of £3,949,526,000 for 2016-17. That is a normal safeguard for any temporary deficiency arising in the Consolidated Fund. I stress that clause 5 does not provide for the issue of any additional cash out of the Consolidated Fund or convey any additional spending power. Instead, it enables my Department to run an efficient cash management regime.

Finally, the Budget Bill authorises the Public Prosecution Service to use an additional £6,032,000 in 2013-14, by way of an Excess Vote. This issue has arisen due to a fair employment tribunal ruling against the Public Prosecution Service on an equal pay and indirect discrimination case. The necessity to make provision for these costs at year end then breached the Public Prosecution Service annually managed expenditure budget for 2013-14. The Public Accounts Committee recommended that the Assembly provide the additional resources through an Excess Vote.

At this stage, there is little more that I can usefully add on the Budget Bill. I look forward to the debate and will endeavour to respond to as many issues raised by Members as possible.

Mr McKay (The Chairperson of the Committee for Finance and Personnel): Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. As we have heard, the Budget Bill before us provides statutory authority for expenditure as set out in the spring Supplementary Estimates 2015-16. The Bill also includes the Vote on Account, which allows Departments to incur expenditure and use resources in the early part of 2016-17 until the Main Estimates are voted on by the House in June.

Standing Order 42(2) states that accelerated passage may be granted for a Budget Bill, provided that the Committee for Finance and Personnel is satisfied that it has been appropriately consulted on the public expenditure proposals in the Bill. At its meeting on 3 February, departmental officials briefed the Committee and answered questions on the Bill being debated today, including on issues relating to a range of Departments. In addition to that evidence, the Committee has scrutinised each of the monitoring rounds during the current financial year, which, in this case, took place in June and November 2015. In both instances, the Committee considered the overall outcome across Departments and the position for DFP as a Department. In view of this evidence-gathering exercise throughout the year, the Committee was content to grant accelerated passage to the Bill. I therefore wrote to the Speaker, informing him of the Committee's decision.

As I pointed out in yesterday's Supply resolution debate, the scale of the cumulative changes resulting from the normal reallocations through monitoring rounds, combined with the in-year technical changes, will, in some cases, have resulted in significant differences between the opening and closing resource and capital allocations of Departments.

As I have said, the Vote on Account is on the basis of the current structure of 12 Departments. However, the Main Estimates in June will reflect the new structure of the nine Departments agreed by the Executive. In this regard, the Committee noted that four Departments — DSD, DETI, DRD and DEL — will be allocated more resources under the Vote on Account than normal. This is to ensure allocations to cover their existing functions as well as the new functions that will be transferred when the restructuring takes full effect. This practice will, hopefully, minimise the financial risks as a result of the transfer of functions.

I have previously emphasised to DFP officials the importance of ensuring transparency in the restructuring process over the coming months in the budgets that will transfer along with functions.

Undoubtedly, the process will present challenges, but the Assembly and, in particular, the Committees in the new mandate will need to be provided with the information necessary to scrutinise the budgets associated with the transfer of functions as they occur.

There will also be a need for a clear and accessible reconciliation between the moneys allocated on the existing basis of 12 Departments, through the Vote on Account in this Bill, and those allocated on the new basis of nine Departments in the Main Estimates in June. In that regard, it will be important that the applicable statutory Committees engage with their respective Departments to ensure that the budgetary requirements of transferring functions have been identified and settled as applicable. Furthermore, at the meeting on 13 January, DFP officials pointed out to the Committee that Ministers would be given significant discretion in the June monitoring round to reallocate resource and capital budgets and:

"to take on board the representations that are made, for example, from the various Committees."

Therefore, this is an opportunity that the outgoing Committees may wish to pick up on in their legacy reports to the successor Committees in the new mandate.

I am hopeful that we will also see improvements to the overall Budget process in the next mandate. As I have reminded Members already, a solution to some of the difficulties and flaws in the current process could be found by the Assembly and Executive agreeing a memorandum of understanding on the Budget process. I have written to the Minister recently to reflect on the progress made in developing the MOU, and I am hopeful that the Department will work with the new Committee for Finance to see this brought to fruition. It would establish a framework for improved cooperation between the Executive and the Assembly in respect of budgetary matters and facilitate Members and Committees in fulfilling their scrutiny and advice functions, which, in turn, will assist in overseeing the effective and efficient delivery of the Executive's strategic priorities. Importantly, the MOU would help to front-end the Assembly's input to draft Budgets and afford scope to influence key issues in advance of future Budgets being agreed by the Executive. That in turn could provide scope to rationalise and streamline the latter stages of the financial process, in particular the duplication of effort that we face between yesterday's Supply resolutions debate, today's Second Stage debate and the subsequent stages of the Budget Bill. Given the need for greater oversight and closer scrutiny of our public expenditure, coupled with the recurring difficulties experienced by Committees in the time and information available for meaningful scrutiny of budgets, an agreed memorandum of understanding between the Assembly and the Executive is essential going forward.

On behalf of the Committee, I support the motion. I will now make a few comments as an individual Member and on behalf of Sinn Féin.

Recently, I went round local businesses. It is important to put some of the issues in a local context, because moneys in the Budget are used for rate relief. I welcome the work of the Department in consulting on the rate reliefs currently in place. There is certainly a need to put in place new reliefs and perhaps remove some of the old ones. I went door to door around businesses in Ballymena to discuss rates. The main issue that was raised was not rates; it was the roadworks on the main streets through Ballymena. We would make the suggestion — it was raised with me by my local councillor, Paul Maguire — that we introduce what they have in Wales for when there is flooding or serious roadworks. I do not know exactly how that is measured, but it is something that the Department should look at. Businesses showed us their turnover figures, and there is a clear correlation between major works in the town and a reduction in profits. Those businesses were under pressure as a result of the works carried out in the town.

6.30 pm

Mr Storey: I thank the Member for giving way and apologise to other Members that this may become a bit of a discussion about what is going on in Ballymena. I listened to what the Member said. However, I spoke to traders when I was in the town on Saturday, and some told me that, as a result of the rally on Saturday, their business was down — in some cases by a third. There are always challenges for our businesses for a variety of reasons. However, as the former Minister for Social Development, I still believe that the investment of £4 million in the public realm works in the centre of Ballymena is vital. There are issues with how that is managed. When I was Minister for Social Development, I came very close to suspending the contract because I was not content with the way in which some elements of it were being progressed. However, we always have to strike a balance between how we deliver and ensuring that that is done in a way that does not have a negative impact on the continuance of a business. I would be interested to hear the examples from Wales.

Mr McKay: I thank the Minister for his intervention, and he is right: it is about getting the balance right. The end product of the works being carried out will no doubt be very beneficial to those businesses, but there is a transition period. Also, changes in the market and in the economy in the past five years mean that it is sometimes hard to distinguish whether this is a result of the economic downturn or the work taking place. It is worth looking in greater detail at the effect of works being carried out in a town over a prolonged period. The Committee and individual parties have looked at the small business rate relief, and there is a view that it does not have that great an effect. However, we believe that it should stay in place until we find something more targeted. Perhaps this is one example of businesses struggling to make a profit being affected by an outside factor. The Department should look at it in greater detail.

Other issues were raised. I know one businessperson in Ballycastle — we passed this to the Department as part of the consultation response — who believed that he was doing the right thing by filling out the survey on turnover figures and matters relating to his business and returning it to Land and Property Services (LPS). However, the response rate to those surveys was only something like 50%. He felt that it was unfair that rates estimates, which increased by a few hundred per cent in his case, were based on the figures that he had provided, whereas the rates for businesses that did not provide figures were based on some other formula that was perhaps not as precise as the one used for his. Brian McClure took that point on board in our meeting in Ballymena. Perhaps it should be made mandatory. If the Department or LPS are to survey businesses for their figures, all businesses should return the survey or none, rather than having a situation that appears unfair to certain businesses.

Increasingly I believe that there is an appetite among the business community and the local economy for the Assembly and the Executive to take hold of further fiscal levers. Outlined in the Budget Bill are figures relating to the powers that we have on revenues and spend. Of course, across the water, they have had Smith, Calman and Silk; there have been so many reports about adding to the suite of fiscal levers that the Scottish and Welsh Administrations have. We have not had that here in Belfast. We need to look at that again for the new Assembly for the next five years. We have made significant progress on corporation tax and should look at income tax as another possible example. I have also been highlighting air passenger duty for a considerable period. I welcome the progress that the Executive have made on the air connectivity fund. I look forward to seeing how the ETI Minister progresses that in the weeks ahead. The more you learn about such matters, the more likely it is that politicians around the table will seek their devolution. The new Executive will finally have to come to grips with it in relation to further powers.

The JTI and Michelin sites in Ballymena must be an Executive priority. Invest NI is getting significant funds in the Budget. As I said yesterday, a strategy that goes beyond Belfast is needed for rural towns such as Ballymena. There is certainly a sense that more could be done. Do not get me wrong: Invest NI has secured significant investment. Even this week, we have seen significant job creation in Belfast and elsewhere, and that needs to continue. However, the new Executive and the new Department for the Economy — I certainly welcome the fact that the Executive have taken the decision to have an economy-based Department — need to get to grips with the focused problems in Ballymena. We have two excellent sites and an excellent manufacturing skills base.

Manufacturing benefited many families in north Antrim; it benefited my family over 20 to 30 years. We all realise the value of manufacturing jobs, and we need to ensure that those jobs are recreated.

There are always global factors such as the slowdown in the Chinese economy and oil prices. Our skills base trumps some of the lower-wage economies that some companies feel are more attractive. We need to sell that skills base more effectively on the international stage. Some SMEs and indigenous companies have been taken over by larger international companies, and, in some cases, that is welcome. Invest NI has ensured that Wrightbus received significant support in recent years. We have secured big contracts from San Francisco through to the London buses. There are a lot of successes, but we can always do better. We can sell ourselves better. When we have that skills base, there is absolutely no reason why we should not go out there with confidence to sell the skills base in Ballymena and our manufacturing tradition in that part of County Antrim.

Mr Storey: I thank the Member for giving way. When Invest goes out across the world to sell Northern Ireland, a big issue is ensuring that it has a suite of products for potential customers. Corporation tax will play an important role in that. Some of the comments made by some of the Member's colleagues on the issue raise a concern about their commitment. Given the issues that he rightly raises about the sites in Ballymena, does the Member agree that part of the overall suite in selling is the date and the rate that we have now secured for corporation tax? When we visit the United States in March, every effort must be made to ensure that that is a key component of the sell for Northern Ireland.

Mr McKay: Absolutely. I agree with the Minister. The deputy First Minister and others, including my party colleague Máirtín Ó Muilleoir, have greatly trumpeted the benefits of getting the corporation tax rate correct and selling it to the United States and to the many economies that we are looking inward investment from. However, I have to say — I said this yesterday — that we need to get it right by having a fair deal from Westminster. If we are to reduce the corporation tax rate, we need to ensure that Westminster gives us a fair deal. Scotland has raised the issue of getting a fair deal, and I use the party opposite's slogan extensively these days about getting a fair deal, but it is absolutely right because we need to ensure that we get the rate of corporation tax right and that we are not short-changed by Westminster, especially the Treasury.

The Treasury is a secretive organisation that gives us some quite woolly figures about the revenues that come out of this part of the world. That needs to be a priority. There needs to be more transparency from the Treasury, and I think that the new Executive need to ensure that we take a magnifying glass to the revenue figures that come out of Belfast and the North and to ensure that Treasury is providing us with the full detail. The centralised nature of the Treasury has caused great frustration amongst all the devolved Assemblies — here, in Wales and in Scotland — and I think that we need to strengthen our challenge function. Certainly, the Finance Committee has not been found wanting in exploring that and looking at matters such as the Barnett formula, but I believe that is something that the Executive and the new selection of Ministers need to prioritise.

I am very conscious that we are in for another late night, so I look forward to the debate, and I support the motion.

Ms Hanna: I will try to be reasonably brief as well, as I know that people like to check in with their families a couple of times a week.

We outlined some of the concerns that we have at the first stage of the Budget and during the debate on the spring Estimates yesterday. I think it is worth pointing out that a symptom of the failures in the process, as I referred to yesterday, is that we have had two debates on the Budget in a couple of weeks but, at the same time, have had very little time for the Ministers to bring forward their estimates and there has been very little scrutiny of those estimates.

In response to my point about that flaw yesterday, Minister, you pointed out that this is a one-year Budget to reflect the stretching of the mandate, but we do not think that that negates the overarching need to reform the budgetary process. In the Opposition Bill, we suggested a budgetary Committee, which was, inexplicably, opposed.

Suffice to say, we are not confident that this Budget has either the imagination or the detail to respond to the very many challenges that we have here, including rebuilding the economy and giving confidence to investors, not just through a cut in corporation tax, and giving confidence to young people to stay. I am glad that the Member for North Antrim is also looking across to Scotland for ideas, but I am afraid that I do not see very many of them reflected in this Budget. I peek over the pond quite often to see how Scotland is using devolution to its best advantage, and it makes my heart sink a wee bit when I see the fiscal opportunities over there and the missed opportunities for using devolution here.

We do not think that the spirit of power-sharing and of possibility that gets and has got Northern Ireland through bigger problems than a few Budgets is evident in this Budget. We do not think that there is, as I said, the required level of accountability. In what other Parliament would one scrutiny session per Committee be justified for a Budget of £16 billion? I highlighted particularly the deficit in the scrutiny of the Education portion of the Budget in that regard.

Respectfully, I think that the response to our criticism has mainly been to deflect and talk about the lack of alternatives provided by the other parties, but without the detail, all we are able to look at are the bulges and the contractions in the numbers. We are not really able to fairly scrutinise the priorities and set out alternatives, and I am not sure whether that is done intentionally.

The life story of the Budget began with the disagreement over welfare and the failure, we think, to engage with reasonable proposals; you would not have agreed with all of them, but there was a failure to even engage with them. There was also the rejection of the ideas of other parties during the talks process, and then there was the presentation of the Fresh Start Agreement to parties like ours about half an hour before it was published. This Budget then followed. As I said, it is not about opposition to the money going to the various Departments. There is a lot of talk about mandates and the size and use of mandates, but it wipes out and ignores the mandates of all of the other parties.

6.45 pm

Mr Ó Muilleoir: Will the Member give way?

Ms Hanna: The Member will be happy to give way.

Mr Ó Muilleoir: I am not suggesting that you are running out of steam, my fellow colleague from South Belfast. Last night, you were good enough and bold enough to give us examples of things that the SDLP would do. Now that we are debating the Budget, I think that, despite the special and, perhaps, rushed, circumstances, it would be helpful if you were to give us an opportunity to see some of the alternative ideas that the SDLP has about spending.

Ms Hanna: I will. I pointed out some last night, and colleagues will point them out. As I said, we are not opposed, but if you would be more specific and tell us exactly what you are spending the money on, as other Parliaments and Houses do, it would be easier to set out the alternatives. What are the big ideas? If you can tell me what the big, creative ideas in the Budget are, and provide the detail of those, it will allow us to more effectively scrutinise them. The fact is that you are giving us figures like £1.9 billion, without the detail. How can we set out the alternative without knowing what your alternative is and what exactly you are going to do with that money?

I want to pick up, briefly, a couple of the points that I raised yesterday, and which you responded to, Minister, in winding up the debate. We are still not sure about the £5 million added and the £10 million off skills. You also mentioned a potential £20 million in the June monitoring round. We still do not understand why there is all of that shuffling about. If that money is for anything other than departmental use and getting used to the changes in Departments, why is it not being allocated now?

I also raised the increased funding for the Strategic Investment Board and was told that £2.5 million of it was for Together: Building a United Community (T:BUC) and the Urban Villages project. In the absence of further detail, I took to Google, this afternoon, and learned that:

“SIB are creating an Urban Village team that will support OFMDFM and DSD in the development of the Urban Villages ... enabling early momentum projects and identifying projects for capital investment”.

I am open to correction, but that sounds a lot like administration, coming in an OFMDFM budget which, as we know, is quite administration-heavy; the administration budget of which, as I pointed out yesterday, has gone up, year on year. Yesterday, I also pointed out a better use for that money. Some £880,000 could support the women's centre childcare fund. Adequate childcare would unlock a lot of possibilities for families, women and working people. As I pointed out yesterday, Scotland, and even the Conservative Party in London, are providing a lot better for working families in that respect.

We also expressed our dismay about the decision to spend more on redundancies and the failure to create conditions for creating jobs, as well as the failure to give security of funding on flagship projects like the A5 and the A6 and an explanation as to how those projects are going to be funded during their lifetime. I will defer. My colleagues will outline those specific projects, and I guarantee that they will be clearer than I am on the locational differences between Crawfordsburn and Castledawson in relation to that project.

Mr Lyons: Will the Member give way?

Ms Hanna: Thank you.

Mr Lyons: Will you give way?

Ms Hanna: If I am allowed.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Have you given way?

Ms Hanna: I have sat down. You can come in.

Mr Lyons: I will come in, anyway. Thank you very much, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker. I am genuinely perplexed, because the Member has said why she is opposed to the Budget, but she has not set out any detail whatsoever. It is as if she is saying, “You show me yours, and I'll show you mine”, but she has given us no detail of anything that she would do differently. Give us something; tell us what it is.

Ms Hanna: That is exactly the point. In any other Parliament, anywhere else in the world —

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Can I ask —

Ms Hanna: Am I allowed back up? In any other Parliament, that is —

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Will the Member resume her seat?

Ms Hanna: I do not know. He was —

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: For clarification, had the Member finished her speech when she sat down?

Ms Hanna: No.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Member has the right of reply then.

Ms Hanna: That is exactly the point. The House's job is to scrutinise the Budget. My point is that you have given us almost nothing to scrutinise. You have rushed this through. We appreciate that there were reasons for the rushing through. I gave the potted, disappointing life story of the Budget, but, in many cases, there has been one Committee session for each Department. I have referred to the allocation for Education and the total lack of scrutiny. We are not able to scrutinise the priorities that you are setting out, because you have not set them out. Despite the ideas that parties will set out in their manifestos, they will not present an alternative because you basically have not given us your opening gambit on it. That is the point. I have finished.

Mr Cree: I hope that I can get a few laughs tonight, but I am not so sure. Again, I am pleased to be able to speak on the Second Stage of the Budget Bill. It is funny; we all seem to set off by putting out the main parameters. I noticed that the Minister did it and the Chair did it, and I see that I am doing it now as well. I will stick to convention.

The Bill covers the 2015-16 financial year and provides legal authority to spend for the early part of 2016-17. The Main Estimates will not be considered until June, but it remains crucial that Committees continue to monitor the spending of their respective Departments so that underspends are minimised and the return of funds to the Treasury is avoided.

We are told that the 2016-17 Budget is predicated on the full drawdown of available reinvestment and reform initiative (RRI) borrowing. I understand the logic of capital projects which support economic growth, but in the same paragraph of the Budget, reference is made to the Executive's considering mechanisms for capping RRI borrowing. I am just wondering whether the Minister can develop that thinking so that the apparent contradiction may be explained. There is a figure of £8 million to be held centrally for distribution as a result of the joint investment with Atlantic Philanthropies. In 2014, £58 million was agreed. Can the Minister advise what balance of the fund is as yet unspent?

The Stormont House Agreement has provided for up to £350 million of additional borrowing to support important capital investment projects. Again, for clarification, will the Minister confirm that the first £100 million was used in the year 2015-16? What is envisaged for the £100 million in 2016-17? It would be interesting to know whether there is a strategy in place to cover that additional borrowing.

I will turn to European funds. I know that we can expect income from the various European programmes which are at closure stage. Do we know how much that is likely to be, and is the sum included in the Budget detail? If not, is it available for allocation? The change fund figure is reduced to £7.1 million and includes £1.5 million for estate rationalisation. How much resource has been released from the sale of assets, and how will these have been dealt with in the Budget?

I have to say that I am pleased to see that manufacturing rates will continue to apply a 30% liability for the next year. If we are serious about developing the economy, we need to support our manufacturers in a tangible way. It is also important to extend the small business rate relief scheme, the empty shops concession and the rural ATM exemptions for a further period. However, there are still issues with the recent non-domestic rate review. Is the Minister in a position to update us on the current situation? I know that, for many, there is concern from businesses and indeed clubs right across the Province. The Chair referred to that as well.

Much hope appears to be placed on the June monitoring round to make easement changes and redistribute resources. June is a long way off, but I ask the Minister what assurance he has, if any, that significant resources will be there as a result of the year-end movements, Barnett consequentials and underspends.

To finish, corporation tax has been touched on. Indeed, it was touched on last night as well. I remember speaking about it a month ago. It is very important that we publicise that availability because, as the Minister said last night, there is a gestation period for new businesses setting up and moving on to another country, so we need to get that message out now. I see some reference to the promotion of corporation tax. Maybe that sort of promotion is included in that, but we need to do that.

Air passenger duty (APD) is certainly a punitive tax. It started off as a green tax, but that is no longer the case. Several countries in Europe have just scrubbed APD because it worked directly against their interests. I certainly support that idea.

This evening, again, we have had the call to look at the devolution of further taxes. I hear that every so often, but in the Budget report we have a reference to the taxes that are generated in Northern Ireland and how they weigh against what comes from the Westminster Treasury.

I think that I trotted this one out about a month ago: the fiscal deficit is £9.2 billion. It says here that taxes generated in Northern Ireland are considerably less than that. I do not know whether it is fair to ask the Minister whether we have any idea of how close it is to that, but my feeling is that it is light years away from £9.2 billion. I will leave it at that.

Mr I McCrea: Given that we have had quite a few debates on the Budget, we will probably hear a lot of repetition of what people either like or dislike about it. Indeed, some will maybe take credit for things that they oppose in the Budget and, when writing their manifestos, they will try to take credit for them. Nonetheless, time will tell.

So far, we have heard from the SDLP, which has expressed nothing other than negativity about the Budget. We have heard that the party is against it because of the lack of scrutiny. That is fair enough. My colleague said that he is perplexed, and we are all perplexed, that, so far, we have not heard any real alternatives as to how the SDLP would do the Budget any better. All we hear are sound bites. I believe that it is time that the SDLP, which reminds us —

Mr McKinney: Will the Member give way?

Mr I McCrea: The reality is that it is still a party that is in the Government. It is time that it acts responsibly as a party in the Government or does the honourable thing. I will give way.

Mr McKinney: Will you take a point of clarification? Is the Member saying that it is fair enough that the allegation was made that there was a lack of scrutiny or that it is fair enough and that there is not a lack of scrutiny?

Mr I McCrea: I am saying that it is fair enough for the SDLP to believe and state that that is why it believes that this is a bad Budget. No one is even suggesting that not having a longer period to scrutinise Budgets is the best way forward. The reality is that we are debating the Budget today, and there is no point in a party, just because it wants to be seen to be opposing the Budget, whining that it has not had the opportunity to properly scrutinise it. It really is time for the SDLP to either put up or shut up on those matters.

I have a number of issues from a constituency perspective. Whilst I have mentioned some of them in previous debates, it is important to again put on record the £130 million that the Budget provides for the Minister for Regional Development to deliver the Randalstown to Castledawson dualling. That project is long overdue. Whilst there are some difficulties with land — and I know that work is ongoing in dealing with the landowners — it is, all in all, a long overdue project, and hopefully it will deal with the large volume of traffic that travels that way on a daily basis, especially in the morning. For many years, the residents who live along that road have had difficulties. Whilst other Members and colleagues of mine will demand that the rest of the road up to Dungiven is delivered, I think that the announcement made is very good and very welcome. That is on top of the around £35 million that was allocated previously for the Magherafelt bypass, the work on which is ongoing. These are certainly good news stories for my constituency.

Yesterday, the leader of the Ulster Unionist Party continued on his hobby horse of attacking the social investment fund. I was delighted that the Minister was able to outline that £58 million had been committed for social investment fund projects. A total of £1.4 million of that is in my constituency, and has been committed, and I have spoken to those who are working through the process and are trying, at this stage, to get contractors put in place. Anyone whom I have spoken to about this has said that this is a good news story and that they are certainly glad to see it coming.

I certainly will not take the negativity from Mr Nesbitt about the social investment fund, and I have no apology to make for ensuring that, when it was being discussed, I made representations to the First Minister. I am glad that the Executive have agreed to widen it. This is a good news story not just for my constituency but for the whole of Northern Ireland. Those who continually snipe from the sidelines should remember the impact that it will have on our communities.

The Department of Education's minor works project has been a good scheme to allow schools to benefit from minor capital works funding. In my constituency, a number of schools have benefited, so I hope that that funding will continue. Mind you, I have a list of schools that probably need new builds. I had the Chair of the Education Committee in my constituency recently to see some of the needs. I hope that more capital money is put into the education budget.

With corporation tax, it is great to see that the Chair of the Finance and Personnel Committee is now coming over to this way of thinking and referring to the fair deal. I said to one of my colleagues that he could change his name back to David and maybe join, but we will maybe not go that far. [Laughter.] Nonetheless, it is a good news story for Northern Ireland. As APS to the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment, I know full well the efforts that have been put into delivering corporation tax and the debates on trying to get a date and set the rate. Many are calling it a game-changer, but what we have in reality are the levers for Invest NI to travel across the world selling Northern Ireland as a place that is open for business.

Those who oppose the Budget will, no doubt, take credit for being part of an Executive that have delivered those financial levers. I, for one, make no apology for supporting the Budget. The Minister has done an excellent job in the short time that he has been in post to bring forward the Budget — as did his predecessor. This is a good Budget and something that the House should support.

Mrs Cochrane: I welcome the opportunity to speak on the Budget Bill. I will endeavour not to do the parrot impression that I did last night and cover the points that everybody else had covered.

Members will be aware that the Alliance Party opposed the Budget at the Executive and when the Budget resolution came before the Assembly in January. That was the time when there was still an opportunity for an alternative to be agreed. However, now that these democratic decisions have been taken for better or worse, we have a duty to support the measures to put in place the finance for our Departments and public agencies.

We recognise that 2016-17 is a transitional year and is to be followed by a four-year Budget. Therefore, I still have some hope that, when the rationalised Departments are in place and a new Programme for Government agreed, we will see a more strategic approach. No more circulating a Budget the night before an Executive meeting with the two largest parties displaying a disregard for the views of other parties represented on the Executive but a properly consulted-on Budget that effectively aligns with the strategic priorities for all our Departments across the period to 2021.

Whilst I still have hope, it does not mean that we should simply brush over the 2016-17 proposals that, I believe, missed the opportunity to begin to lay any groundwork for the radical reform needed to deliver better outcomes for everyone in Northern Ireland. I ask the Minister how the proposed spending in front of us will begin that process of making our public finances more sustainable? Perhaps I missed it.

Does he believe that the Budget will assist in reforming the health sector? Will it ensure that necessary action is taken on education? Will it feed into addressing the cost of a divided society and investing in the economy?

Looking at the Department of Health. Yes, the 2016-17 Budget, compared with that for 2015-16, has allocated an extra £128 million, and, of course, that is welcome news. However, even with that increase, the cost pressures facing the Department are extremely worrying. Our population is increasing in size and getting older, and more people are living with chronic conditions. Unhealthy lifestyles are creating more demand for services, and new developments in medical technologies and drugs are increasing demand and adding to the cost pressures. The focus of the Department of Health therefore needs to be on reform, not simply on using the resources to cover gaps here and there by way of a sticking-plaster approach. We need to rationalise the way in which services are provided and invest in further prevention measures.

Mr Storey: I appreciate the Member giving way. It is easy for Members to come to the House and use general phrases, but when the Member uses a phrase such as "rationalise services", which I have heard other Members use and no doubt will hear other Members repeat later, that is the same as saying that we need more tax-raising powers. Does that mean that we are going to support water charges? Does the Member mean that she can identify those locations where health provision is currently but that will have to close? That is the issue for us all, given the debate that there has been this week about the Manchester experience. Can the Member be specific about what is meant by "rationalisation of services"?

Mrs Cochrane: I thank the Minister for his intervention. I was going to come to that in my speech. Of course, I am not the expert who can tell you exactly what needs to be there, but I do know that an independent panel has been put in place, and I believe that there needs to be serious public political commitment to see through changes that may be brought forward by that panel. We cannot expect people to come forward with ideas and then respond with, "Not on my doorstep". We have seen that so many times before. I am calling for that political leadership from all parties, and I welcome the Health Minister's apparent commitment to reform and the fact that he has put a panel in place. I am just hoping that any necessary changes that are proposed by the panel will be realised.

On a previous occasion in the Chamber, I think that there was a mention of a transformation fund for some of the cost-saving initiatives that may come about. I ask the Finance Minister to confirm that he will be supportive of that type of investment being prioritised. I hope that there will be a focus on using improved IT solutions, as communication in the health sector really seems to be one of the biggest challenges and one of the biggest wastes of resources. Just yesterday, I had to make three separate phone calls to secondary care providers to find out one simple piece of information about an arm injury that I have. I was eventually told to phone my GP, who would be able to access the records and provide the information. That bounced the responsibility back to primary care, which is already under pressure. It is clear that there are processes crying out for reform in our health sector, so it is not just about closing services in different places. It is about really, really reforming those processes.

Even through high-level benchmarking of costs compared with other jurisdictions, we can see that efficiencies need to be made in education, yet the large degree of protection that has again been given to the Department of Education seems to create less incentive for that reform. The Alliance Party of course supports investing more resources directly in schools, but we believe that that can be achieved by better use of the Department's budget in the first place.

More money is already spent on education in Northern Ireland than in neighbouring jurisdictions, but less money is being invested directly in the pupils. Part of that is due to our divided system, and another part of it is to do with our high administrative costs. We therefore also need a more meaningful approach to area planning to reduce the number of empty desks and leadership — again, from all our political parties — so that, when difficult decisions have to be made about mergers, amalgamations or closures, people face up to them, are honest with the public and say, "This is what needs to be done". However, I welcome the budgetary allocation for capital expenditure, which Mr McCrea also mentioned. I am hopeful that, in this incoming year, capital resources will finally be allocated to Strandtown Primary School in my constituency of East Belfast for the badly needed modernisation of the accommodation.

I would like to make some comments on the budgetary allocation for economic development. We know that the new Department for the Economy will be established in this incoming financial year. That is good news, as it will bring together the further and higher education sectors alongside our business community and should help to strengthen the economy and drive it forward. However, Alliance has concerns that the 2016-17 Budget has prioritised Health and Education at the expense of the economy. It is a fact that we have disinvested in higher education for a number of years. The cynic in me might say that that is because it fell under an Alliance portfolio. Nevertheless, it is an issue that needs to be addressed.

Reskilling and upskilling our people is essential to give everyone the opportunity to realise their full potential and to make a valuable contribution to society. It is one of the challenges that our Budget really needs to focus on and properly address if we want people to be ready for the devolution of corporation tax. If we need more resources in that area, perhaps we should reconsider the total allocation under the Delivering Social Change banner. That funding is being maintained as per previous allocations, but I am not confident on delivery given the previous failings of the social investment fund, which I know some have referred to as the "pet projects fund".

I apologise if I have come across as completely negative this evening; I genuinely have tried not to. Alliance will accept the democratic process that has agreed this Budget but, going forward, I urge the Minister to enter into full consultation and discussion on meaningful reforms, including considering some revenue-raising such as prescription charges, which could be taken forward quite quickly, and exploring some other medium-term options as well. I also ask him to include a commitment to publish the independent audit of the cost of division that was part of the Stormont House Agreement.

Our Budget process is difficult as we continue to live in difficult times for public services. Responsible leadership is therefore needed, and that means being honest with the public and taking the difficult strategic decisions that will ensure the best outcomes for Northern Ireland as a whole. We support the passage of the Bill.

Mr Weir (The Chairperson of the Committee for Education): I will be speaking as Chair of the Education Committee, so obviously it would be totally wrong and remiss of me to mention that, in terms of any budgetary allocations particularly to Education, priority should be given to the Holywood schools project in my constituency, which would impact on Priory College, Holywood Primary School and Holywood Nursery School. It would be equally remiss of me to indicate the need for new school builds at St Columbanus' College and Bangor Central Integrated Primary School, given the high pressures there and the fact that both are in dire need of long overdue capital investment. So, I will not mention those in the speech.

Although speaking as Chair of the Education Committee, I must admit that I have some sympathy with what Mrs Cochrane, Ms Hanna and others have mentioned. There is always a slight sense of déjà vu with finance debates, particularly those on the Budget, because we quite often have the Budget debate on the back of the debate on the Supply resolution. As somebody who spent many years in different guises on the Finance Committee, probably as punishment in the first mandate and possibly as closer to a reward in latter days, I totally empathise with the sometimes frustrating difficulty when you are effectively dealing with the same subject for the second or third time but are trying to find a new and novel spin on it. I congratulate Members on doing that.

On a broader level, one of the challenges of this Budget is the readjustment of Departments, which makes any degree of read-across difficult. Therefore, it is very difficult to compare like with like. To be fair, there is at least some opportunity for that in Education and Justice, because the changes to those Departments are very minimal. There is a de minimis type approach to Education, so you can look at a degree of read-across there. There is clearly some difficulty in going too much into the detail of the Education budget because, as with other Departments, we are awaiting the detail. I think that there will be key issues for the Minister to look at in terms of the prioritisation within that budget.

As such, all we can really do is look at the overall Budget position. What some others would see as a criticism of partial protection of Education would be seen by the Education Committee as having at least some level of virtue.

When we look at the Education budget or, indeed, any of the other departmental budgets, we have to realise the constrained circumstances that we are in. Looking around the House, I do not see anybody who has been here since 1998, but I am one of the few people who, as if in some sort of latter-day Canaan, lived through the days of milk, honey and plenty in the early days of the Assembly under the high level expenditure under Gordon Brown, where revenue budgets went up each year by a considerable amount. In many ways, it was a relatively easy job for any Assembly to decide how to spend that money if you were looking at a 5% rise in real terms. The task of dividing up that revenue is perhaps easier than when you are looking at what are effectively real-terms reductions. It is in that context that we need to look at the overall Education budget. Undoubtedly, there will be pressures in that budget. I suggest that they may not be quite of the nature that, at times, has been suggested by the Department, but, undoubtedly, there are pressures on the budget. One looks, for instance, at the pressures of an additional £30 million for National Insurance changes, which will impact on the departmental budget.

In actual figures, the revenue budget for Education sits now at just under £2 billion. One of the things that needs to be welcomed within that is that at least we have seen a small overall increase in the budget in actual terms but possibly not in real terms. The budget compared with last year is up £40 million. A lot of that is due to the fact that problems arose last year when money had to be found to meet additional teacher pensions. It was welcomed at that stage that not only was the £35 million found for that but that has now been put in the baseline of the Department. That, at least, relieves a degree of pressure in the Department.

In addition to the money that has been made available, it should be noted that, when some of the redundancies, particularly teacher redundancies, were met last year in the Department of Education, some of that effectively had to be found from the pre-existing Department of Education budget. The fact that that is not having to be found this year creates a degree of relief of pressure because you are not necessarily comparing like for like. There is the removal of a certain level of pressure, which gives a little headroom to the Department.

With regard to the transformation fund, the Department of Education, through a number of schemes, is the largest single beneficiary, with three schemes totalling around £72 million. Part of that — probably been the most controversial aspect — has been the proposal from the Minister of a £33 million scheme for teachers who are over the age of 55 on the condition that schools employ someone who has under three years' experience. At the bottom end of that, there has been a level of controversy about that. It is true to say that there is some concern in the Education Committee about whether the balance on that has been got right, but, undoubtedly, in respect of the £33 million, there are also figures that suggest that that will generate a certain level of savings for schools. That also needs to be taken into account, but I think that the Committee will want to hear more on that scheme. Hopefully, we will soon have the opportunity to quiz the Minister on that. The Committee will want to assure itself as to whether the detail of that has been got right.

The focus at times has, therefore, been so heavily on the £33 million that what has been ignored is the other £39 million in the budget for changes in redundancy. Some £14 million of that is directly for the potential redundancies of 300 teachers, and £25 million has been set aside for non-teaching staff. In certain respects, that will ease some of the pressures in the overall Education budget. Before Mrs Cochrane left, she referred to efficiencies. We should look at the non-teaching side of the Department of Education, where there is an opportunity for a level of reduction. In recent years, there has been a 6% increase in staff and a 10% increase in savings, so perhaps we are not starting from a position of the highest efficiency.

Last year, the Committee expressed concern about cuts made to the Curriculum Advisory and Support Service (CASS), the promotion of STEM and home literacy programmes such as the Book Trust. We wait with interest to see what the Minister prioritises in his budget. Perhaps it would be wrong to comment in too much detail at this stage. Suffice it to say that the desire is that there will be as much protection as possible for the aggregated schools budget to ensure that the money is spent on the front line. That would find resonance across the Chamber.

Finally, I want to touch on capital spend, and there is, potentially, a good news story, particularly in education. I will explain why. The capital budget reduced from £182 million in 2014-15 to £145 million this year, but it will move up to £193.7 million next year, which is very welcome. Mr McCrea and others referred to schools in their areas, and I suspect that we could all have a long list of schools, as is often the case with a capital budget. I suspect that the Minister will want to announce prior to dissolution how that money will be allocated among schools, and work on that is ongoing in the Education Authority. We all hope that the money will be spent in the best possible fashion, in the right place and in an equitable and equality-proofed way.

I sound a small note of caution. Mention was made of the very good work done on minor works, but we should put that into context. During this Assembly term, 56 major works have been announced. For a variety of reasons, including planning and procurement issues, work on the ground has started on only 21. The Committee will want to ensure that, when capital builds are announced, there is a quicker follow-up. Some minor works, which are welcome in and of themselves, arose because the capital budget could not be spent in-year. That money was diverted, so there was a shift. Nevertheless, with those caveats, we should all welcome an increase of about £48 million or £49 million for capital works. We look forward to drilling down with the Minister and his officials, hopefully in a relatively short time, on what the priorities and allocations are in the Education budget, and the Committee will very much take a watching brief.

Speaking as a DUP Member, I welcome the Budget, which comes before us in the difficult circumstances of wider financial pressures. I believe that the Minister and the Executive have done the best that is possible with the resources that they have. Therefore, I commend the Budget to the House.

Mr Ó Muilleoir: Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. Tá áthas orm páirt a ghlacadh sa díospóireacht seo inniu faoin cháinainéis. Mr Weir brings good news: I did not know that we had an extra £50 million for capital build.

I want to speak in favour and in defence of the Budget. It is a Budget of which we can be proud. These are tough issues and tough times. Despite that, we have come up with a Budget that will serve our people well. It does not have everything in it that I would like, and there are areas in which I would have liked to see additional expenditure. However, being in government, sharing power with others and having to come to agreed settlements mean that you do not get everything that you want. Despite that, there are many things in the Budget that the electorate will be grateful for. In particular, I am proud of the fact that we have set aside over half a billion pounds for welfare top-ups. No other place in these islands has managed to match that in any way at all. It is testimony to the generosity of the political parties that lead the Executive and to our constituents that they have agreed that we should set aside such a monumental sum of money to ease the effect of Tory welfare cuts.

I am also proud of some local things in the Budget. The school of law at Queen's will get £10 million. I really hope that the social investment fund prospers in the year ahead and that the money allocated to it is spent. I think of the Markets tunnel project, a magnificent project to link the Markets to the city centre. I hope that that will be realised —

Mr Weir: I thank the Member for giving way. One tends to think purely of departmental budgets, but it is important to acknowledge that a number of projects in SIF have an educational focus. It was remiss of me not to mention them when I was covering education. Hopefully, that will make for a very positive intervention, particularly with our young people and the issue of underachievement.

Mr Ó Muilleoir: Absolutely. Some of the projects-in-waiting are in the inner city. Some parties here do not have a lot of support in inner-city areas and are caustic about the social investment fund. In my view, however, the Sandy Row enterprise hub is a project that can transform Sandy Row. We need to put our shoulder to the wheel to make sure that these things happen. I am very proud of the fact that the A5 and A6 are now up and running. I salute those who convinced the Irish Government to put in their £75 million against our money. I welcome the fact that, through this Budget, we will start the north-west gateway between Derry and Donegal, as mentioned in the Fresh Start Agreement, with £1.5 million set against it.

I am enormously proud of the fact that we are spending £4.8 billion on our health service and well over £2 billion on our education service. Those who criticise and snipe at what we have done need to tell us what they would take from the health budget or the education budget and where they would put it. That is what has been absent. There have been attempts to denigrate the Budget, but there is no suggestion of where those people would take money from and where they would replace it.

In my view, not enough money is being set aside for economic development, but you can never have enough money. What we have done amounts to a good day's work: £170 million for Invest NI, £27 million for Tourism NI, £11 million for our friends in Tourism Ireland and £3 million for InterTradeIreland, with the last two being doubled by the Irish Government. That puts us on a strong footing as we move towards the introduction of corporation tax, making it affordable and ensuring that our people are skilled up and that we can grasp the full opportunity. Those are key achievements in the Budget of which we can be proud.

We can be very proud of the fact that we have capped student fees. Voices in the Chamber have said, "Heap more pain on students. Make them pay more for the liberation of a third-level education". We have said no to that. We have resisted calls in the Chamber to introduce water charges, which would be another tax on working families. We have stood by our senior citizens and refused to introduce fares for pensioners, and we will keep that free of charge. We have kept prescriptions free of charge. We can be proud of all those things. We have managed to deliver on those because of the leadership of the parties in the Chamber, in the Executive and in the main parties.

The only alternative that has been put up to the Budget is a suggestion from the SDLP that we take £800,000 from the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister and give it to women's centre kindergartens for childcare. Minister Morrow spoke positively last week, and I hope that he will find the £800,000 this week that we need for those hard-pressed women's centres and thus resolve the issue. But who will go into the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister in the morning and tell them that they are losing £800,000 from their budget? Who will hand out the 20 P45s to the 20 workers? Who will go to the Victims and Survivors Service and say that we are going to take away its entire budget of £800,000? It is my belief that they have not looked at the figures. They say that OFMDFM administration costs are going up at 23%, but they have not looked at the complexities or the programmes that it has taken on board since 2012-13 and the logical reasons for that. The reasons why administration costs have increased have been spelt out and are on the record. If we allow for the additional work and contingencies that OFMDFM has taken on — for example, responsibility for advertising and other things from Departments — like every Department, OFMDFM has reduced its administration budget between 2012 and 2015-16.

7.30 pm

So, from my point of view, does this Budget deliver everything and is it a wish list for everyone? No, it is not. Is it a good day's work? It is a very good day's work. When I listen to Eileen Evason and others who are at the coalface of delivering change and a fair deal for those who are on the dole, those who are seeking work and working families, I think it is a good day's work. I support the Budget, and I am proud to support it. I think that we have done well, and we will do better in the time ahead, especially as we unite to build the economy.

Mr Irwin (The Chairperson of the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development): I will speak on behalf of the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development. The fact that the Budget for 2016-17 relates to the newly restructured Department for Agriculture, Environment and Rural Affairs, or DAERA, has muddied the waters a little for our Committee. As Members know, DAERA will not have responsibility for the Rivers Agency. However, it will have absorbed a number of other functions, including environmental and marine responsibilities from the Department of the Environment and inland fisheries responsibilities from the Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure. It will also take policy responsibility for sustainable strategy from OFMDFM.

What we do know is that the budget for DAERA will be subject to a 5.7% cut to its resource. As a result, the new Department has been allocated a total of £197.9 million resource and £48.8 million capital. Departmental officials informed the Committee that that 5.7% resource cut will be applied pro rata across the three areas that are joining together to form DAERA. That equates to a cut of £10 million for DARD, £1.7 million for DOE functions and £0.3 million for inland fisheries.

The Committee has taken its duty to monitor DARD's financial performance and its delivery of key services very seriously. However, it is important to note that it has been difficult for our Committee to anticipate or assess the true impact of the 5.7% cut to those areas that were previously under the remit of DOE and DCAL and, indeed, to the sustainable development functions under OFMDFM. Over the past year, DARD officials have told the Committee that there will have to be major changes in the services that are delivered and in how they are delivered by the new Department. We have heard that, to meet ongoing budgetary pressures, DAERA will have to be a more modern, leaner and digitally focused Department. The Committee is concerned that that might result in a reduction in the quality and availability of key services. However, Members also believe that the formation of the new Department presents an opportunity for efficiencies to be made. The streamlining of inspection regimes is an obvious example of that, and the Committee will certainly call for these types of savings to be realised as quickly as possible.

The Committee repeats its call for front-line services to farmers and the rural population to be protected from the worst of these cuts. In particular, the timely administration of CAP payments must remain a priority for the new Department. I am sure that all Members are aware of the falling farm-gate prices and ongoing struggles that are faced by farmers in Northern Ireland. Many of you will have read last week that farmers in Northern Ireland suffered a very significant drop in their incomes in 2015. That means that they rely more than ever on these direct payments as their major source of income.

The Committee acknowledges the work of DARD in the past year to ensure that over 96% of eligible farm businesses received their basic payment by January 2016. The Committee is anxious to see that record maintained and surpassed by DAERA, but that may prove challenging in the face of the cuts imposed by the Budget and the loss of over 300 staff to the recent voluntary exit scheme. On voluntary exit, the Committee was told last week that DARD expects to make savings of almost £5 million in staff costs in 2015-16. The first two groups left under the VES before the end of last year. The third tranche of staff left only at the end of January 2016, and the fourth group will not leave until the end of March 2016. DARD has chosen not to avail itself of a fifth tranche of voluntary exits. This means that the full impact of 300 staff leaving has not yet been felt in service delivery. The Committee feels very strongly that the departure of so many staff should not be allowed to impact the administration of all the EU payments that farmers and rural communities depend on so much.

I would now like to specifically reference the issue of TB compensation. The TB scheme costs DARD in the region of £30 million a year. This amounts to almost 15% of the resource allocation for the new Department. At a recent meeting where we discussed finances with DARD officials, the Committee was informed that there is still an outstanding pressure of £4 million for this scheme. It is alarming that DARD has not yet managed to get both the disease and the costs under control. Indeed, there are actually signs that TB rates are increasing again, which, in turn, means an even bigger call on the purse of the Department.

The funding of TB compensation has long been a concern for the Committee. DARD continues to make monitoring round bids in order to top up the funding for the scheme; this is not sustainable. Members have repeatedly called for the mainstreaming of TB compensation funding, which is, after all, a statutory obligation. We understood that this had been done, so it is very disappointing to see that DARD has had to make use of the monitoring rounds for this funding.

The Committee expects the new rural development programme (RDP) to play an important role in improving the lot of those who make their living in farming. Under the 2016-17 Budget, £5 million has been allocated to RDP. Officials confirmed to us that this will be used to fund the farm business improvement scheme, which they plan to launch in the 2016-17 financial year. This includes a capital investment element called the business investment scheme, which will provide capital support to farmers. However, the Committee has a number of outstanding concerns in relation to this scheme. For example, it has not been made clear to Members whether DAERA has received the necessary funds under Budget 2016-17 for the business investment scheme. We are also aware that DFP approval is required before any RDP-funded programmes can open. However, we have yet to be updated on the status of the business investment scheme business case. The Committee is certainly very eager to see the details of this scheme announced as soon as possible.

The Committee recently received a briefing on a major DARD IT project, the new Northern Ireland food animal information system. We were glad to hear that the procurement exercise for this is finally approaching completion. We were also reassured to hear that the project costs are likely to be less than originally estimated. The Committee was previously told that resource costs between 2014-15 and 2019-2020 were estimated to be £14.8 million. Capital costs for the same period would amount to £19 million. However, as a result of the tendering process, it seems that these projected costs can now be revised downwards.

Finally, I would like to make some brief remarks about funding to the Agri-Food and Biosciences Institute (AFBI) in the 2016-17 budget. AFBI plays a key role in Northern Ireland in providing research to our farming and agrifood industries. The Committee has received several briefings on AFBI in the past year. Members have repeatedly voiced their concerns about how budget cuts will affect the delivery of services. It is crucial to the industry that the institute's capacity to carry out agricultural research is maintained. The plan to end several research programmes as part of AFBI's Shrink to Grow strategy has certainly caused us concern. However, I will finish on a positive note. The Committee has been assured that AFBI's R&D budget will be more protected in the future as a result of a change in Treasury rules. The Committee has always recognised that the success of the agrifood industry is dependent on research and development. As a result, we welcome this change.

Ms Maeve McLaughlin (The Chairperson of the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety): Go raibh maith agat, a Phríomh-LeasCheann Comhairle. I welcome the opportunity to address the House as Chair of the Committee for Health, Social Services and Public Safety and to contribute to this debate. I wish to make a number of points, and maybe develop a number of points flowing from the spring Estimates debate last evening. Looking at the Budget, and it has been mentioned by colleagues, the Executive have allocated the Department of Health £128 million additional to its 2015-16 position, and that is very welcome news, right across the services sector and the wider constituency.

There are, however, ongoing cost pressures, which have been referred to. Costs continue to rise each year, and they are running roughly at about 5% to 6%. Typically, they are linked to pay and non-pay inflation. Obviously, they are linked to meeting the healthcare needs of an ageing population and continuing developments in technologies and treatments. That trend is expected to continue as we move forward into 2016-17 and beyond. In order to meet those pressures and supplement the baseline budget allocation, the Department is attempting to identify savings from trusts. It is attempting to look at other arm's-length bodies and its own administration costs, and that is an important point. From what we have heard, that will prove difficult, given the savings that it has already attempted to make in previous years.

Mr McKinney: I thank the Member for giving way. She will probably recall a Public Accounts Committee report, published last week, which alludes to a £131 million trust deficit. Has she any idea, in that case, where the £128 million increase will go, given that this is a one-year Budget? Will it go into that trust black hole? Is that something which Mr Ó Muilleoir can be proud of?

Ms Maeve McLaughlin: I thank the Member for his intervention, and I will develop the points around the real challenge in health: where current spend actually goes. There is no doubt that all of us, collectively, can stand behind the need for a reform agenda which will, I believe, if done properly, address some of the core issues. On the one hand, we have a Department that says it wants to protect front-line services; on the other, it allows trusts to cut the very same services that are required. I will develop that point further.

Of key concern to the Committee is the very point that I refer to. How will the Department allocate this budget for 2016-17 across a range of spending areas? It is an important point. When the officials were in front of us in January, we asked directly for that information. We asked directly for the Minister's priorities. That information is crucial because, obviously, spending decisions should be informed by ministerial priorities. The Member who previously spoke knows that officials were only able to provide us with a very broad-brush picture of the Minister's priorities. I will quote the officials, because they told us that the overall aim and vision is to build a world-class health and social care service, obviously. That should be the collective aim of all of us: to drive up the quality of health and social care for patients. Nobody in this House or beyond would disagree with those high-level objectives, but that does not provide us with the detail of how the £4.88 billion will be spent in 2016-17.

We were further advised that information on the Minister's priorities would be set out in the commissioning plan. I make the point that we were told that a draft of that would be forwarded to the Committee for comment by late January/early February. That document has still not been received for consideration by the Committee. That is disappointing, because the commissioning plan is really the key document setting out the services that the Minister wishes to fund in the coming year. For example, Members are very keen — as I am sure that wider society is — to hear how the Department will tackle the significant waiting times for elective care appointments. Again, officials were not able to advise us how much money would be allocated to that issue. They said that it would depend on what savings could be found in other areas. In the Committee's eyes, the rationale for that approach is really not clear. Surely, if something is a priority, money should be allocated to it. It should not be rocket science, but we need a set of clear priorities in order to do that.

Committee members have also been concerned about the areas where savings would be made. There has been a tendency to look for quick savings rather than take a long-term strategic approach. The Committee was firmly of the view that it does not want trusts to cut back on things like domiciliary care packages as a quick fix to balance the budget for 2016-17.

7.45 pm

There are key questions about the spending plans for 2016-17 that remain unanswered, questions that are of vital interest to Members, healthcare professionals and the wider community. I make reference to one such question. When will we find the pay award for nurses? A total of £28 million is required out of the 2016-17 budget to fund the 1% pay increase.

I will make a number of comments as an individual MLA —

Mr Ó Muilleoir: I thank the Member for giving way. As we work out how to spend this £4.8 billion, do you agree that it would be beneficial to the community if the Minister, in conjunction with the Minister of Education, found a way to tackle the long waiting lists for autism assessments? I know that there is a gathering this week in Stormont — maybe it was today — on that issue. Many of my constituents are in limbo: they are unable to get a child assessed and are therefore unable to source the correct educational route for the child.

Ms Maeve McLaughlin: I thank the Member for his intervention. Indeed, as we move radically to reform the delivery of our health system, we need to do so on the basis of targeting the need that exists. It was very apparent, and I am conscious that I am also a member of the Education Committee, that the responsibility for delays in processing special educational needs assessments lay at the door of the health trusts. There needs to be a direct intervention.

I want to make a number of comments in concluding. The system needs radical reform, and we very much welcome the Minister's reform agenda in that regard, but we need to get the meat on the bones. We need to get a sense of what that clear, costed, time-lined action plan will be. The real issue in the delivery of our health service is where current spend goes. There is a huge debate, and I do not think that anybody in the Chamber or beyond could, hand on heart, say that current spend is having the right or maximum outcome, so a radical reform agenda is needed.

We need to look at the opportunities that the streamlining of commissioning will bring. We need to appeal to the Minister's better judgement in and around the better GP prescribing programmes, which have been well documented in the Audit Office reports. We need to stop wasting public money on legal cases, over the ban on blood donations from members of the gay community, for example.

Finally, we need to look at the genuine removal of clinical excellence awards: £55 million has been paid out in the last five years, at a time when we cannot pay an extra 1% to our front-line nurses. There needs to be a radical overhaul of how we deliver health, and we in our party are up for that challenge and for the political leadership required to deliver.

Mr McKinney: I have to say that I am deeply worried — I would not say aghast — by some of the contributions. It is not the contributions themselves but the contradictions in those contributions that I am hearing. The last speaker was absolutely right in just about everything she said. She was right to be critical of the commissioning plan. She was right to be disappointed at not seeing targets in the overall Transforming Your Care plan. She was right to point out that waiting times are in disarray and that we are getting quick savings and quick fixes. She was right to say that there are key unanswered questions in the overall healthcare system. She was right to point to the fact that nurses are not getting a 1% pay rise.

Her colleague was also right in his point, although he did not go into the details of it — and I will give him some of them — that some waiting lists for autism assessments are two years long. The children are nearly grown up before they get a diagnosis.

Yet, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker, we have to be proud of all that. We are hearing two voices from Sinn Féin today, one that is deeply proud; and I am trying to work out what the pride is here. Are we deeply proud that we took a whole load of numbers, however many billions, added them up, shared them out, and they added up on the bottom line? The underlying stories are what we really should ask questions about. Those are questions that my colleague from Derry rightly asks and which I will now continue to focus on.

As the Finance Minister and all of us are aware, there are many genuine pressures on the health service, which eats into nearly 50% of our overall Budget. The SDLP has expressed concern over the last number of years, and I think that colleagues agree that questions need to be asked. A lot of it emerges from fiscal shortfall, and the result is intolerable pressures on the Health and Social Care service. I do this in all my contributions because I think that it is important to reflect on it, but those pressures are felt by nearly 65,000 dedicated, professional staff who work to the highest standards, often in difficult circumstances. Their commitment, energy and compassion must receive the highest praise. I think that we should acknowledge that.

I am glad that the Minister has moved to introduce a well-deserved pay rise for staff, although the scale is criticised by unions. Nevertheless, nurses are still not getting what they deserve, and I do not think that that is something to be proud of. It remains worrying that the Minister is still embroiled in a dispute over junior doctors' contracts, while the same issue is to arise over consultants' contracts. We have to be aware of the implications of that, not just for the delivery or ultimately, if they move away, lack of delivery and the overall effect that it could have on the system. Those workers are an integral part of it. It is vital that any changes do not put patients' lives at risk and do not deter health staff from working here.

As we entered 2016, the Northern Ireland public again felt the cold face of the health service crisis, with seemingly insurmountable pressures on A&E and colossal queues for elective care. There are 400,000 people on waiting lists in the health system in Northern Ireland. Can we honestly stand in the Chamber today and say that we are proud of that? Over 20% of Northern Ireland's population is on a health waiting list. We have to start to think differently about how we deal with this. We have home closures followed by the stripping of home domiciliary care services. Maybe we should be proud of that. This is not about arriving at a figure and saying that we should be proud of allocating that over there, a little bit of that over there, or a big bit of that over there. It is about the delivery from what we spend. We need to hear in the Chamber that we are delivering for people, particularly vulnerable people. However, given that we are reaching figures of 400,000 people, this is extending beyond what we would normally think of as vulnerable people living in poverty. This is extending into a much wider circle that has grown over five years.

The system could be said to be at breaking point. Patients and staff are suffering on the front line. It is our responsibility, in the Chamber, to point that out. That is not just being negative; it is what a good Budget is about. It is about allocating the right amount of money to achieve the right outcome. Against that backdrop, the latest winter hospital statistics are not surprising. We have been pointing that out for months. What continues to shock the public and others is that the Minister and the Department have continually failed to implement a robust and coherent long-term strategy to deal with increased demand on the system.

Another fact is that Northern Ireland now has the worst record in the UK on the 12- and four-hour waiting targets for emergency care. That is reflected in emergency departments across the North of Ireland.

Patients are being put at risk, with hospitals continuously breaching targets that were put in place to ensure speedier diagnosis and treatment. Are we to be proud or critical of that? When I say "critical of that", I mean not just negative criticism. I think that the Minister understands that. If I interpret him rightly, he comes from a background that likes to see a sufficient allocation, outcomes for people, and money spent well and properly so that we get the maximum return from it. I do not think that we will disagree on that issue. That is a very important aspect of what we are arguing about.

We have seen a massive crisis in elective care. Once again, we shifted money away from one area to A&E and created a new crisis. As I said, it now extends to 400,000 people. That is worrying on two fronts. First, some of the £40 million that was allocated to elective care operations could not be spent, because the administration was too bloated and the photocopiers could not deal with the system. Secondly, we heard that a number of cancer operations were cancelled, so it is not just elective care but emergency care.

Mr Storey: Will the Member give way?

Mr McKinney: Yes.

Mr Storey: I have listened to the Member raise genuine issues about concerns that are out there. He rightly acknowledges the work of our healthcare professionals. I did that in the House even yesterday. That is the right thing to do. Is the Member telling us, however, that his party would now reverse its position on welfare, for example, and say that the money that was negotiated for the mitigation measures and the money that we will spend on welfare should be put into our health service? Let us remember that his party voted against the Budgets, so is he saying that we should not have allocated an additional £133 million resource DEL to the Department of Health or provided £40 million before Christmas to help with waiting lists? Is he saying that those are things that we should not have done?

I take his point that I like to see outcomes, but I realise that the sad reality of the House — I have said this time and again — is that we have political wish lists longer than the length of the Chamber. Collectively, parties are going to have to say, “Yes, we would like to be able to do that, but our priority is our health service and delivering for that”. It is time that his party stopped making the case for some of the things that it has advocated. We would then have the resources to deal with the issues.

It also comes down to another issue, and I said this to Mrs Cochrane the Member for East Belfast. When we talk about rationalisation, tell us where you want the services to end. Tell the people. In my constituency, does it mean that we have to tell people that the Causeway Hospital should close? Is that the sort of rationale and rationalisation that the Member and his party support?

Mr McKinney: I will give a very short answer: no. That is not what I am proposing at all. In fact, as I go through my speech, I will point out areas in which we could save money in the system, because there is enormous waste in the health system.

I will deal with this now, given that the Member elaborated on it extensively and asked me directly about it. The reality is that it is not just about money. I have not so far said anything about wanting more. The one point on which I intervened concerned the trust money — the £128 million — that you pointed out. My worry is that, because this is a one-year Budget, that is going into a black hole. At the time of the conclusion of the PAC report, the trusts were sitting with £131 million of debt. Of course, the PAC report was published some time back — somebody can tell me when it was — so it could be £160 million now. In other words, we are pushing money at problems and we are not solving them, which gets me to my core point.

8.00 pm

The Minister asked me a question in a particular way, and I hope this answers it: this was foreseen in ‘Transforming Your Care’. There was a sentence in ‘Transforming Your Care’ that was very good and summed it all up; it said that a failure to plan would lead to “haphazard change”. We have got haphazard change now by any measure, and it is wasting good public money. The wastage in the system is the issue.

If the then Minister of Finance and Personnel, the then Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety, the then First Minister and the then Minister for Social Development — I am pointing to four DUP Ministers — had even sat round their own kitchen tables, they might have got some consensus on this. They did not have to reach out to everybody else, because there was a consensus in 2011 that we needed to deal with the issue in terms of flow.

Like a business, what flows through the system is what is important. It would have taken some money, and if the Minister is saying to me what I think he is, he too will back our proposal to put health at the very top of the Executive’s priorities so that we can begin to sort this problem out once and for all. That will entail investing some money at the start to alleviate the problems at the Causeway Hospital and in Ballymena on the community side. We need to take the pressure off the expensive accident and emergency side and the elective care side so that we are dealing with people and giving them a service in their own areas — not necessarily a hospital service, because we could shift the context —

Mr Storey: Will the Member give way?

Mr McKinney: Yes.

Mr Storey: That is already being done in Ballymena with the new centre that will be opened. The Member is almost arguing against his own point. At Altnagelvin, a huge investment has been made in a service that will be of immense benefit to people who have particular issues and challenges due to cancer, which is something that far too many households face. Let us not try to paint a different picture.

The difficulty I have had since coming into this job in recent weeks — this was mentioned by the Member opposite — is that it is almost as though we have not been spending almost half of Northern Ireland’s Budget allocation on health. Sometimes, we focus on specific problems. As the son of a father who has spent almost nine months under the care of the health service, I know all too well the huge amount of money that that has cost our system but, as a family, we appreciate everything that has been done, and there are many other thousands of families like mine.

Mr McKinney: I get that. I have also had experience, and I refer to it in every contribution. If we were properly dealing with the community side, we would not have had 791 patients in hospital over Christmas who could not get domiciliary care packages. Somebody needs to do the maths. There were 124 of those people who stayed in hospital for more than two months. Those were people who did not need to be in hospital but stayed there. Depending on the part of the system they were in, it might be more or less expensive than domiciliary care, but my guess is that, when we do the maths, we will find that it was significantly more expensive than the adequate provision of a home-care package in the first place.

Mr Ó Muilleoir: Will the Member take a point?

Mr McKinney: Yes.

Mr Ó Muilleoir: Thank you. I was waiting with bated breath to hear about the prosperity plan. I am happy to have a health debate. I do not know whether the Member is proud of the fact that we have set aside £4.8 billion for health, but I am. If he thinks that anyone on this side of the Chamber or the other side of the Chamber is not going to demand and insist on delivery, he has not been listening to what we have been saying today when we challenged the Economy Minister on some of the problems within DETI. We will insist on proper delivery and excellence in every Department.

However, I am still waiting to hear what the SDLP would do.

The only suggestion so far is that you will take £800,000 from OFMDFM, perhaps closing down the Victims and Survivors Service — that is £800,000 — or making 20 people redundant. You want to give that to the women's centre childcare unit, which, in fact, is being sorted out. However, you make a fair point: you have suggested that, out of a huge budget, you will take £800,000 from one Department and put it into another.

After all of the talking tonight, are you saying that you have laboured long and hard over this but will not tell us how you would move money between Departments? Do you want to spend more on health? You seemed to be saying that in your earlier suggestions. If it is more than £4.8 billion, where is it coming from? If it is to come from savings, that is interesting because, then, the SDLP's position is that the only thing that should be different in the Budget is that there should be more efficiencies. I think that everybody would sign up for that. If there is to be a bold — we heard that word used earlier — ambition behind the prosperity plan, which we are still waiting for, let us know what it is, because we would like to see an alternative. There is no monopoly on budgets, so tell us where you would remove the money from. Would it be from the Culture Department, from DOE, from DRD or from the economy? Where will you take money from to give you that additional spending power, or is there no additional spend intended? I do not know whether that will be in the prosperity plan, when we see it, but, to me, raiding £800,000 from OFMDFM and making 20 people redundant is kindergarten economics.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Before Mr McKinney speaks, I draw Members' attention to the fact that, although this is an important debate about legislation, interventions ought to be short, sharp and focused.

Mr McKinney: Thank you, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker. I will get to addressing some of the issues. The Member said that Sinn Féin would interrogate the issues: where was the interrogation of the failure to implement Transforming Your Care? There were 99 targets, but little was done. The Department produced a report, but I did not see much interrogation of that. I have to laugh: Sinn Féin's economic plan includes paying off everybody's credit card debt, and he wants to hear from me about my plan. Maybe you should come and join the SDLP, Máirtín. That would be the answer. We will give you plenty to talk about and chew over. You do not have any plans. All that you have is a plan to say that you are proud of adding up figures on one side and not on the other.

I talked about the prospect of investing to save, but I said that in the context of making that we make health the top priority in the Executive. If we do that, it will involve Departments other than the Health Department seeing health outcomes as a priority for them. In other words, let us begin to deal with the core issues and get to the root of the debate: the real issues that cause problems in our health service — not just the flows through it but the issues that cause the logjams. They emerge from long-term unemployment and long-term deprivation in communities such as west Belfast, and you know all about that. Statistics show that west Belfast, north Belfast, my colleague's West Tyrone constituency and Derry and places like it still top the UK league tables for deprivation and long-term unemployment. If we were to begin to tackle those issues strategically, we would have a different approach, but Máirtín is stuck on the figures. He is just adding up figures and saying that he cannot think beyond that. He says that we are asking to move money on the abacus from here to there and back again: that is not what I am talking about, and that is not what the SDLP is talking about. The SDLP is talking about beginning to make Northern Ireland work, be self-sufficient —

Mr Ó Muilleoir: Will the Member take a short intervention?

Mr McKinney: No. I think that you have had enough.

Mr Ó Muilleoir: I think that a short intervention would be in order, if I were allowed.

Mr McKinney: You have made it clear that Sinn Féin is bereft of ideas and is reaching out to ask the SDLP. I am explaining the prosperity process, and he is not listening. It is about making Northern Ireland work, once and for all. We have had 40 years of people destroying this place and imposing the very deprivation and long-term unemployment that led, for example, to the long-term mental health issues that my colleague continues to refer to. We, across the Chamber, know that only too well, and we know how much it costs the Health Department. We have to wake up. We have an election in three months' time. The Programme for Government negotiations have to include those elements at its core, or we will have forgotten what we are about.

Mr Storey: I thank the Member for giving way. I listened to him and thought that he had a copy of the Ulster Unionist Party's 'Vision' document, because it seems as though they are using the same script. It talks about wanting to make Northern Ireland work. Hold on: let us remember that the SDLP stayed in the Executive and voted against everything, and the Ulster Unionist Party walked out of the Executive. They had their opportunity to make Northern Ireland work and, clearly, were not capable of doing the job. Either they do what the SDLP does, which is stay in and snipe from the sidelines, or they do what the Ulster Unionist Party does, which is pack up your school bag and leave.

Mr McKinney: I am sorry, Mr Speaker, the one thing that I was not doing and have not done during the debate is snipe from the sidelines. I am trying to come up with constructive answers to some of the bigger long-term problems that this constituency has. The Minister did not refer to the chronology of when he heard whatever, but, if he is suggesting that Sinn Féin is looking for our ideas on the one hand and the UUP has stolen our ideas on the other, I will be entirely happy with his intervention.

I want to ask the Minister a question directly. I have referred to it, but I want an answer if possible. It also refers to the nature of that. The budget rise is £128 million, but the trusts' deficit is £131 million. We need to know where that money is going. Is it going to future provision? Could it go to transformation or current pressures? Is it merely going into that black hole? For us, that is deeply worrying.

I take issue with the repeated concept that we are sniping. Neither I nor the SDLP is sniping. We see an opportunity going into the election and beyond, starting in this mandate and potentially going across mandates, to begin to deal fundamentally with some of the big issues that affect this society. These are societal issues, and that is what we are here for — at least, that is what I understood we were here for, not merely adding up numbers and claiming to be proud of that as an active act in itself.

The Health Minister pointed to a transformation fund aimed at encouraging reform and innovation. Given the earlier comments, I cannot see anywhere where that has been fleshed out in the Budget. It may form part of Professor Bengoa's deliberations or analysis — I am not sure what to call it — but I look forward to his proposals. We have had reports — I have referred to the Transforming Your Care report — and we have had reports on reports. Donaldson came in and said, "Get on with implementing Transforming Your Care, and that might get you off the starting blocks". My worry is that we will simply, through these other processes, have activity disguised as movement. As I have been arguing, now is the time for action, not analysis. We had consensus on reform, as we have said, and very little in outcome through implementation.

I touched on the TYC plan momentarily, but maybe I will flesh it out because it was the plan. Even the Department's analysis has shown that it has barely moved on its update. Proposal 9 dealt with domiciliary care and the home being the hub of care, which is a key provision. What do we end up with? The report states:

"analysis of current models of delivery and options for service redesign [will] inform future regional commissioning and procurement activities."

In other words, the homework has not been done.

8.15 pm

We also need a direct answer on this. The Minister released £1.6 million for the independent sector, and if the homework has been done and if that sector has been in touch with the Department, the Department will know that, in fact, that sector is saying that it needs £36 million between now and April and another £9 million annually thereafter. Recipients of those care packages are some of the most vulnerable and frail people in society, and the Chamber owes it to them to ensure that their care needs are adequately met. I will make the point again that it is as a result of the failure of delivery of those care packages or the weakness of the care packages that, very often, our old people are presenting in accident and emergency because they cannot get the proper service or are not getting the GP service that they need. Their presenting at A&E is causing the crisis. The logical conclusion is not just about moving money around; the logical conclusion is that it is a systems failure and that the system needs to be fixed.

I could go through much more of the detail, but I am glad that we have had the debate and that it has widened out to some of the issues that I referred to. We need to make a health and social care system that is fit for the 21st century. We have an opportunity to do that. I reiterate: we can allocate money from now until the cows come home, but we need to do it with a plan that delivers for the people of Northern Ireland.

Mrs Overend: I am pleased to speak as the Ulster Unionist education spokesperson on the Budget agreed for 2016-17 by the DUP and Sinn Féin. My focus is on the future generations of Northern Ireland. Education is a key Department and one that we, as elected representatives, need to get right. Our young people deserve our focus and attention.

As we look ahead to the new financial year and a new mandate for the Assembly, we know that Education is one of the Departments that will remain largely in its current state. All the Department's current functions will be carried forward, with some additional responsibilities in the new Department. Last month, in presenting the DUP/Sinn Féin Budget for 2016-17, the Finance Minister announced an extra £40 million for the Department of Education. At £1,948 million, the opening baseline resource budget for Education in 2016-17 is almost identical to the 2015-16 figure. That represents 19% of the non-ring-fenced DEL. That appears to be a very placid situation compared with the recently recurring annual crises over school budgets, but we know that schools are having to deal with other costs and with inflationary costs, which I will refer to later.

It seems like only yesterday that savage cuts to the Department of Education were being proposed. Last year, it was suggested that up to 1,000 teachers and 1,500 support staff could lose their jobs. Whilst that doomsday scenario never came to pass, very worthwhile schemes were cut and discontinued, such as the primary-school modern languages programme, the Sentinus programme and, particularly regrettably, the signature programmes in numeracy and literacy.

I would like to turn to the Youth Service. Given that the Education Minister announced his decision to dissolve the Youth Service and subsume the responsibilities into the Education Authority, I question whether cost savings are foreseen in that regard and whether there is evidence that money will be saved. I have concerns that our Youth Service may lose out on much-needed funding for the sector, since the Youth Service Northern Ireland multiplied the funding that it received fivefold.

Focusing on schools, I reiterate something that my colleague and predecessor as education spokesperson, Danny Kinahan MP, used to call for, and that is a joined-up education plan for the future so that schools know what is happening and have some degree of certainty about their annual budget allocation. I have been speaking to numerous schools, and they are frustrated with the lack of information and the lack of the stability that the Budget system brings them. They want to be able to be more proactive rather than reactive when it comes to figures that are given to them. I acknowledge that we are in a unique situation because of the one-year extension to the Assembly's mandate, but surely a better and more certain budgetary process can be worked out for schools. The Chair of the Committee referred to the aggregated schools budget, and I agree that it could be better secured from one year to the next. After the election, the Minister will be able to make a budget over the period of the mandate, yet there will be fluctuations year on year within the aggregated schools budget.

The Department of Education faces significant funding pressures going into 2016-17. The funding of shared education in the incoming year and further years deserves careful consideration. Over a year ago, £500 million of new capital funding for shared education over a 10-year period was announced in the Stormont House Agreement. However, the DUP/Sinn Féin Fresh Start Agreement states that that money can also be used for mixed housing projects. It is time that we had clarity on this issue, and I would appreciate that.

More widely on shared education, and being conscious of the Bill going through the Assembly, it is time that questions over the financial viability of that policy were explored. Option 4 in the business plans for shared education would cost £44 million annually, which, after four years, will apparently be absorbed into the mainstream schools budget. I wonder whether that is realistic or sustainable. I hope we can get answers to these questions.

The Programme for Government has a commitment to creating 10 shared campuses by 2018. The total cost of implementing these sorts of infrastructure projects could approach £1 billion, yet there is no funding secured for that. It is assumed that the EU Peace IV might be a possibility, even though the EU has already spent a total of £2 billion in Northern Ireland since 1994. So there is considerable uncertainty about funding for shared education, both in 2016-17 and into the future.

More immediately pressing, and referred to earlier, are the pension scheme revaluations. Those are likely to result in additional employer contribution costs and increase operating costs by 4.1%. With the single-tier pension scheme in place from April this year, schools will also face an increase of 3.4% in National Insurance contributions. In the current financial year, the Department received additional in-year funding to address the pension-related pressures. I would like to hear from the Minister where those costs will be covered in 2016-17.

The teaching workforce scheme was announced by the Minister but is going through an equality impact assessment only now, and we are not clear at this stage where that is going. It is not clear how the scheme will be allocated funding and what savings — if any — will be realised. It has been mooted that savings made through the scheme will remain with individual schools. I would appreciate clarity on that. What has been announced is a £33.1 million investment for the early retirement of 500 teachers over the age of 55 years, replacing them with recently qualified teachers. That proposal is causing considerable unrest on equality grounds, but a financial question has not been addressed: the £33.1 million quoted is at variance with the £47.3 million allocated to the teaching workforce in the Executive Budget for 2016-17 under the public sector transformation fund. I would appreciate clarification on that matter.

There are unanswered questions with regard to the Budget in respect of education. I can tell you that principals are worried. They are concerned about the future of their schools and the education of the children in their care. I share their concern, but I am sure that this is not as good as it gets.

Mrs Cameron: I rise as the DUP lead on the Committee for the Environment, and I will be brief.

Much of what is being discussed is based on the restructuring of the Department of the Environment and the transfer of functions following the reduction in the number of Departments from 12 to nine as outlined in the Stormont House Agreement. The Department of the Environment will cease to exist and its powers will transfer to three new Departments in the hope that the work will become more efficient and streamlined, and its functions more cohesive.

Whilst work is ongoing as to how those functions will be delivered, it is hoped that the priorities for the new Department of Agriculture, Environment and Rural Affairs will include improving waste management, protecting our ecosystems and improving water quality. Powers that will transfer to the Department for Infrastructure will, amongst others, aim to reduce the number of people killed or seriously injured on our roads through improved road safety and better regulation of the transport sector, with the new Department for Communities working towards supporting the economic benefits of vibrant and diverse communities in a manner that protects our built heritage.

As the Budget is based on the new nine-Department model, I have concerns as to how these extremely wide-ranging functions will be met, particularly given that there will be a further budgetary reduction of 5.7%. Whilst a huge saving has been made in the current Department of the Environment through the voluntary exit scheme, I fear that, once the scheme has been exhausted, we will be faced with a gaping hole in funding for environmental schemes, road safety and historical protection.

The unprecedented flooding that many areas have experienced over the last number of weeks is a stark reminder of the danger posed to our ecology and how changes in our weather systems can have a devastating effect on communities. We must be working towards protecting our environment, and my concern is that further stretching of an already overextended budget will mean that the departmental functions will become so watered down that they will fail to provide the protections that we so desperately need.

I welcome the opportunities for greater departmental cooperation and the financial economies that this may bring, for example in the transfer of built heritage, which will see greater partnership with National Museums and public records to improve public viewing and ease of access, or in sharing departmental staff with roads, rivers and emergency response units. Also, the opportunity for greater collaboration on air quality, wildlife regulations and agriculture will provide a common-sense approach to working, and I look forward to seeing the efficiencies that this will bring.

In closing, my primary concern is in protecting our environment, both natural and built, for future generations. I hope that we can continue to identify where efficiencies can be made and that this does not come at the expense of our ecosystems and heritage.

Mr Lyons: I welcome the opportunity to take part in the debate this evening. Perhaps interesting is not the word I will use, but we have certainly heard a number of things from a number of different Members. I think that there are two things that we need to bear in mind as we consider this Budget and, indeed, any Budget that comes before us. The first is that we are still heavily dependent on funding from Her Majesty's Treasury. It has already been said that our fiscal deficit is in the region of £9.2 billion. That is over £5,000 per person. Secondly, and as a consequence of that, if we want funding for a particular area or project, we either have to take money away from another area or project or we need to raise revenue. We have heard a lot of criticism of the Budget, but we have heard very little that has been volunteered on areas in which we would cut spending to compensate for increases elsewhere, and we have heard very little about the revenue that others would like to raise. I think it is important that we consider these things as we approach this Budget. We are dependent on the Treasury and the block grant, and that is something that we need to keep in mind.

I very much support the Budget that is in front of us, and I do so for a number of reasons. First, there is the priority that it places on certain issues. I think that the priorities in this Budget reflect those of the people of Northern Ireland. If you go onto the streets and ask people what they think needs protecting and where we should be spending most of our money, I am sure that on nearly every occasion they will tell you that they want to protect health and education. I think it is right that, although we are in a very difficult and constrained environment, we have still been able to offer a degree of protection to those Departments. I think that that is welcome.

8.30 pm

Mr McKinney: Will the Member give way?

Mr Lyons: I will indeed.

Mr McKinney: The Member is critical of others who have not come up with ideas yet, and he pointed to a £9.2 billion black hole in our finances. Can the Member outline his plans for reducing that and for making Northern Ireland more sustainable?

Mr Lyons: I thank the Member for his intervention. Of course, it is not a black hole in our finances in so far as we have the money coming towards us. What the Member perhaps means is that we get more from Westminster than we raise in taxation, and that is absolutely right. One of the ways in which we fix that problem, or try to improve it, is by growing our economy and the private sector. It will be exceptionally difficult for us to completely bridge that gap, because when you have a capital city the size of London, where, I think, £1 out of every £7 in taxation comes from, with the growth that is there, it will always be difficult for other regions. I think that only London, the south-east and the eastern region are net contributors to the UK economy whereby more money is brought in through taxation than is spent on public services. We need to fix that. We also need to make sure that we grow our private sector and that we have more jobs and opportunities, which I will come to later, so that we can also reduce the size of the welfare state, take people off welfare and make sure that they are in work instead.

One of the reasons why I support the Budget is that I believe that it is a continuation of the positive policies that have helped us in Northern Ireland over the last number of years. What have the Executive been able to do? Let us first look at rates. The Executive have used the lever that we have for rates to help our economy and business here: 4,437 properties have benefited from industrial derating. Business regional rates here have increased at a much lower rate than in the rest of the UK, and 35,600 properties have benefited from the small business rate relief scheme. That is to be welcomed because it has helped our small businesses, and I am glad that we will continue it.

What else have we done? We have used the rates tools available to us, but we have also invested in infrastructure. As a Member representing East Antrim, I am absolutely delighted at what the Executive have delivered on infrastructure. If you now want to visit Larne or Carrickfergus, you will be able to get there in a very short time, thanks to the massive investment that we have had in those projects. Of course, we see that in other parts of the Province as well since devolution returned. The road to Dungannon, which is, I think, the A4, the A5 and the A6 are other transport corridors that will benefit from Executive investment. So, we need to continue that investment in infrastructure.

In addition, look at what we have been able to do on tax with some of the powers that we have. It is good that we have devolved corporation tax, as it is another tool that we now have. We can say that we have a date and a rate, and we can go out there and sell that to businesses and investors.

On air passenger duty, I have used the United service from Belfast to Newark a number of times, and it is good that we have been able to maintain that service because of the devolution of air passenger duty on long-haul flights. I would say to the Minister and his successor, the next Economy Minister, that it is imperative that action be taken on air passenger duty across the whole of the UK. I do not believe that we can sort out that issue ourselves, but it would be of benefit not only to us but to the whole of the United Kingdom if the Westminster Government realised that that is a tax that we should not have.

I look at the example of the Netherlands. It brought in air passenger duty for, I think, only a year or two. It raised over €300 million as part of that duty, but it is estimated to have cost its economy €1.2 billion. I therefore urge the next Executive to ensure that we push the Government to get rid of that tax across the whole of the United Kingdom, because I believe that that would be of benefit to the whole of the United Kingdom. We need a hub airport in the UK, and we need to increase our aviation capacity in the south-east, and that should not be going to Amsterdam, Frankfurt or anywhere else.

Mr Storey: I thank the Member for giving way. I concur with his comments. He will be aware that I was recently in front of the Northern Ireland Affairs Committee, which is holding an inquiry into the issue, and I think that there will be interesting conclusions as a result of that inquiry. He will also be aware that Willie Walsh made some comments today on the issue. Mr Walsh also referred to the air route development fund that we are seeking to bring into existence. I inform the Member that I intend to meet the Minister of Enterprise, Trade and Investment tomorrow on that, because, in the absence of any movement on APD in the United Kingdom, we will need to pursue the air route development fund, which has already received some good comments from Mr Walsh.

Mr Lyons: I thank the Minister for his intervention. It is good to see that the issue is a priority for him and, I hope, the Executive. I completely concur with what he said about the air route development fund. We should be unashamedly trying to attract new routes and to grow the number of air routes that we have. Yes, it is good for business, but it is also good for tourism, which is obviously a priority for us. As a Member who represents a very beautiful coastal constituency, I want to see —

Mr Storey: North Antrim.

Mr Lyons: No, I do not represent North Antrim. It is one step better: East Antrim. I think that we have a much longer coastline than North Antrim does. George Robinson, who is sitting beside me, mentions East Londonderry as well. We have beautiful places all over Northern Ireland, and we want to make sure that we attract as many people here as possible.

The Executive have done a very good job of using the tools that are at their disposal to help our economy. If we are looking for some figures to prove that, in the year to September 2015, 12,000 private-sector jobs were created in Northern Ireland. That does not happen by itself. Those jobs were not created because we did nothing; rather, they happened as a result of the policies enacted by the Executive. That is to be very much welcomed.

Therefore, I support the Budget because of its priorities, and I support it because of the continuation of positive policies that have delivered so much for Northern Ireland. I also support the Budget because I believe that it is forward-looking. Some have criticised it for a lack of vision, but that is completely ill-founded criticism.

The new Department for the Economy is covered from page 55 onwards, and I am very encouraged by what I see there. We have an Executive that understand where we need to be. We cannot do things in the way in which we have always done them. We cannot continue to do what we have done in decades past, because our world has changed and the economy has changed. Recent job losses in Northern Ireland have demonstrated that, as a result of the globalised economy in which we now operate, we need to be more competitive than ever. Our workforce needs to be of the highest quality, with the best skills, and we need to be out there ensuring that we have that type of workforce so that we can attract jobs for our people. I read the document, and I see that the Minister has indicated the importance of stimulating:

“research & development, innovation and creativity”.

It is also very clear that he has indicated that we need to prepare for the skills implications of the introduction of the lower rate of corporation tax, and that is absolutely right. Corporation tax is a very important tool that we have at our disposal, but we cannot just cut the rate and wait for the jobs to come. We have to prepare for it, and that is something that the Executive are taking seriously.

Investing in economic infrastructure, working with others and investing in innovation, research and development are all really important so that we can have the jobs for our people in the 21st century. That is very welcome.

We have before us a one-year Budget. I know that there has been a bit of discussion about that, and some people think that we should perhaps have had a longer period. As we come to the end of a mandate, it is right that we do not set a Budget that ties the hands of the next Executive. What we have is a road map for the way forward for the next 12 months. It will then be up to the new Executive and the new Assembly to decide their priorities.

I very much welcome the Budget. It is a springboard for us to move forward, and I thank the Minister for his work on it. I challenge the other parties: if you are going to vote against the Budget, you need to say very clearly where you will take money from and where you will put it. Otherwise, you are just doing a disservice to the people we represent. I support the Bill.

Mr Dunne: I welcome the opportunity to speak on the Second Stage of the Budget Bill as a member of the Enterprise, Trade and Investment Committee. Our economy must continue to be a central priority for us all as we move forward. Over the last 12 months, our economy has seen challenges and opportunities. It is important that Northern Ireland continues to be positive about being open for business and a place that is welcoming and supportive of new business. We recognise the need to support Invest NI, which will continue to target inward investment, promote domestic growth, provide trade support, support the private sector in investment in R&D and grow our export base.

The planned reduction in corporation tax from April 2018 provides us with a real opportunity to grow our economy. The Ulster University estimates that the 12.5% rate could create up to 32,000 additional jobs and help to grow our economy by an additional 10% over 15 years. However, we need to be prepared for the new rate. We need to ensure that Invest NI is given adequate resources and the budget required to ensure that we open the proper doors across the world, wherever they may be. The work needs to start now to maximise the potential for our economy and ensure that the skills needed are in place to support any new jobs. We need to invest now to ensure that we get it right on foreign direct investment to really grow our economy. It is crucial that the right skills budget is in place to align the work of DEL and DETI in attracting foreign direct investment as we go forward with the Department for the Economy, particularly the £5 million that is needed for the skills agenda.

Invest NI's mid-year performance for 2015-16 highlighted positive developments, and a £550 million investment in R&D reiterates the value of attracting jobs to Northern Ireland. There is no doubt that the 7.1% reduction in Invest NI's resource budget will present challenges. However, I believe that it is best equipped to deliver for Northern Ireland and, with the right support from the Executive, I have every confidence in Invest's ability to deliver.

Energy costs continue to be a challenge to growing our economy, no more so than in the manufacturing sector. We need to see real progress on the North/South interconnector to help reduce energy costs across the sector. That has been kicked around the Assembly for years. The extension of the gas network to other parts of Northern Ireland is also vital to keep energy costs competitive for all our customers.

8.45 pm

As has been mentioned by a number of Members, tourism is another key aspect of our economy, and I believe that it is a sector that has not yet reached anywhere near its full potential. The overall visitor figures confirm that Northern Ireland is now a must-see destination, with overall visitor numbers increasing by 9% in the 12 months to June 2015 along with other encouraging signs in external and business visitor figures. Northern Ireland is fast becoming a real destination for top sporting events. Funding streams such as the tourism events programme are crucial in helping to run top-class events locally. The value of international events, such as the North West 200, the Circuit of Ireland and the Irish Open, should not be underestimated. They all attract many international competitors, spectators and their families, bringing people to these shores for the first time. They get a real sense of what this place is about and cannot wait to return.

The Budget presents real challenges as we seek to grow our economy. Last night, I welcomed the Finance Minister's commitment when he stated in the House that skills investment was vital to our economic development. I note that, in addition to the £5 million being made available to the new Department for the Economy as part of the 2016-17 Budget, £20 million will be made available for the area as part of the June monitoring round.

It is crucial, as we move forward into the new mandate with the new more streamlined Executive that came through the Fresh Start Agreement, that the economy remains our number one priority. There is an opportunity for the new Northern Ireland investment fund and the economic strategy to bring real benefit, as we seek to make Northern Ireland the number one place to do business.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: As this is Mr McCrossan's first opportunity to speak as a private Member, I remind the House that it is the convention that a Member's maiden speech is made without interruption — that is, if you choose not to express views that may provoke an intervention; otherwise you may be likely to forfeit that protection.

Mr McCrossan: I welcome the opportunity to make my maiden speech in the Assembly. I am proud to do so as MLA for West Tyrone and in my new role as SDLP spokesperson on infrastructure.

Before I turn to the Budget for 2016-17, I pay tribute to Joe Byrne, the man whom I have replaced. Joe steadfastly served the constituency of West Tyrone since his re-election in 2011, having previously been a Member of the House from 2003 to 2007. A man of great party standing, Joe served in a multitude of roles in the SDLP and remains the party treasurer. During his time in the Assembly, he served as agriculture spokesperson and tirelessly stood up for the rural constituency of West Tyrone and its people. Mr Byrne has given me the opportunity to carry on the great work that he has conducted over a long number of years for the people of that area, both when elected and unelected. I can only hope that I can serve West Tyrone with the dignity and diligence that Mr Byrne showed. He is, truly, a great loss to the House.

The Budget for 2016-17, as outlined to the House in January, is unique as a one-year budget that has been put together in the aftermath of the Stormont House Agreement. This Budget has left no time for my colleagues and me or, for that matter, anyone else in the House to properly scrutinise the amounts contained for each Department. There is no doubt that the infrastructure budget faces serious challenges, and coming from West Tyrone, I can speak very clearly on that. There is a serious need for major investment in that part of Northern Ireland.

The average spend on our roads over the previous mandate has been roughly £70 million per annum. What is it this year? Twenty million pounds. I do not see this as a forward-looking Budget. I can only imagine that rural constituencies such as my own will be the first to fall foul of that budget decrease. Furthermore, we were promised real progress on the A5 and A6 in this Budget, which is laughable, given the allocation of a mere £100 million. That is a significant shortfall on what it is expected will be needed to complete the overall project.

The people of West Tyrone are not filled with optimism by this allocation. They are very depressed and have lost faith in the parties and politicians of West Tyrone and Northern Ireland, because they have failed to deliver time and again. All that have been delivered are false and broken promises about these major flagship projects. I sincerely hope that this is not — I repeat not — another empty promise about the A5.

The theme of empty promises is not alien to the people of West Tyrone. Last year, 17.7% of my constituents were in receipt of at least one disability-related benefit. A higher proportion of people who live in West Tyrone were in receipt of at least one disability-related benefit when compared to the Northern Ireland average of 13.7%. West Tyrone has the third highest proportion of disability-related benefit recipients. Last year, around 2,800 people in West Tyrone were claiming income support, of whom around 2,680 were of working age. That equates to 4.6% of working-age people claiming that benefit.

My home town of Strabane has fallen foul of chronic unemployment and underinvestment for decades. The people whom I meet each day in my constituency office relay their struggles to find work. Young people are desperate for opportunities and for a direction from the House on how they can better their lives, improve their lives, and survive and sustain themselves in their own home area. Some are stuck in a cycle of poverty and others are leaving to avoid it. Strabane is consistently highlighted as an area where deprivation is rife and little has been done to rectify that fact. This Budget will not rectify that fact.

Our young people are leaving in droves to find greater economic opportunities. It is often highlighted that they go to England or Australia; I know many of them, and many are family members. Often in West Tyrone, the reality is that younger people are migrating to Belfast. This is a glaring indicator of the extent of regional disparities in the North. We were told last year that Ministers here were taking responsibility for the generational neglect of the north-west by the Northern Ireland Assembly. The ministerial subgroup on economic inactivity in the north-west has met twice since then; the second meeting was called only 24 hours before it took place. That does not inspire much confidence.

It is not just job opportunities that are lacking in the west. One of the big disappointments in many rural areas across Northern Ireland is the vexed question of no, or poor, broadband services. We heard a significant debate in the House today about that. West Tyrone has terrible broadband services. Some areas are completely cut off and isolated, and businesses are suffering from poor connections. This greatly impedes existing small- and medium-sized enterprises from developing, and it discourages start-ups and enterprising activity. Many people who are trying to run small rural businesses in places such as Gortin, Greencastle in mid-Tyrone, Castlederg, the Glenelly valley and even in the glens of Antrim, Fermanagh, south Armagh and the Mourne have not seen broadband improvement in many years. I have come to understand that DETI has been spending a significant amount of money to rectify this problem, but it has not reached West Tyrone, or at least not in a tangible way just yet.

This Budget has within it many more problems than infrastructure. There is no breakdown of the education budget of £1.9 billion, of which some state they are very proud. There are cuts to student support, library services, museums and public services across the North. The west will ultimately feel the brunt, once again, of these cuts. In West Tyrone, the past 10 years have ushered in the closure of rural schools, urban schools, post offices, and rural banks and businesses — the shutdown and isolation of rural communities.

In health, social care services have been dwindling to such an extent that 15 care packages for the elderly have become the norm. People are concerned about this gradual erosion of services and neglect of the west.

Therefore, returning to the Budget, it is important that those services are given appropriate consideration by the Executive because it is clear that, so far, they have not. The Budget before us today does not offer that support. It adds to the depressing reality in my constituency, and although there is the promise of this big flagship project of the A5, which my party is in total support of, will it really happen beyond this election? Is it another election promise by some parties? That is the question on the doorsteps. People have lost faith in this House. It is a one-year Budget not properly scrutinised and passed; it has been passed by accelerated passage. This is not the budgetary system that will restore economic balance between the west and the rest of the North.

Mr Allister: I begin by congratulating Mr McCrossan on his maiden speech, not just because it is the proper tradition to do so but because it was a particularly well-crafted and equally well-delivered speech, and he spoke with very tenacious affection for his constituency. I think that many of us recall the service of his predecessor, Mr Joe Byrne, in his unassuming way. I think that many of us would like to join in wishing him well in his retirement.

Turning to this Budget, when I pick up a Budget Bill and read through it and look for some of the headline figures, there are always some things that strike me. One of the figures that struck me again was in clause 2(2) of this Budget, where we read that, in this current financial year, Northern Ireland has the benefit of resources of over £17 billion. It always causes me to pause and to ask: where does that money come from? Of course, the answer to that question, that some would rather not hear or face up to, is that that £17 billion comes as a direct consequence of our membership of the United Kingdom. It is because we are an integral part of the United Kingdom, entitled to share in its burdens and its riches, that we have that quantity of money at our disposal. For those who chase various constitutional moonbeams about alternative constitutional arrangements, one fact that they never like to face is where the money would come from. It is patently obvious that the benefits to Northern Ireland of being part of the United Kingdom, as reflected in the monetary settlement year-on-year, are colossal. I think that all citizens in Northern Ireland should reflect on that and be grateful.

I carried out a little exercise by looking at last year's Budget Bill because I wanted to see just where the variations were; where the uplifts were; and whether there were any telltale signs of why the uplifts were in respect of different Departments. The one that particularly caught my eye was DRD. In schedule 3 of this Budget, we have the sums granted for the upcoming year, 2016-17. If we go back and compare that to the comparable figure in last year's schedule 3, we discover that the Department for Regional Development has had a whopping 33% increase — £134 million extra. If you go to schedule 4, you will discover that resources for this year are an extra £107 million. How, or why, would that be?

Is it the hand of politics in this Budget? Could it be that, now that courtesy of IRA murder the DRD is held by the DUP, the idea of starving another Minister of funding is no longer appropriate and that, suddenly, largesse is the order of the day? Could it be that an upcoming election could also be a contributor to that? I find it rather striking; when you compare last year's Bill with this year's, that is something that jumps out at one quite significantly.

9.00 pm

Other things that are obvious in this Budget include the extra money poured into welfare and to attain the so-called Fresh Start Agreement. Yes, of course, it was indeed a very significant climbdown by Sinn Féin from its promise that no one, whether a new or existing claimant, would ever suffer under welfare, but also a very significant diversion of funds that would otherwise have been available for health, education and other necessary expenditures. It was a very significant diversion from other aspects of the block grant into supporting welfare supplements, so that the Minister could sing off the same hymn sheet as Sinn Féin on welfare. Not everyone will know this, but the Minister has some claim to accomplishment in the singing stakes himself. He is not unknown for his singing talents and, indeed, he has, I understand, an O level in music. That is more than I have, I have to say, but he is well equipped to sing off the same hymn sheet on this particular issue.

Where it really strikes me as bizarre is that there is money for that, but when you look at the issue of economic inactivity in Northern Ireland, as we heard earlier today — I think it was from Mr McCrea — we are the worst performing region. We have the highest level of economic inactivity. Last March, the Employment and Learning Minister, Dr Farry, brought forward a strategy to tackle economic inactivity. Here we are, 12 months on and looking forward to another 12 months, and that strategy remains unresourced in this Budget. So we are finding money to prop up, sustain and supplement welfare benefits, but when it comes to the idea of dealing with our high level of economic inactivity and encouraging more people from being economically inactive to being economically active, there is not a penny piece in this Budget for the strategy to address economic inactivity. That, I think, is a gross failing.

Mrs D Kelly: Will the Member give way?

Mr Allister: Yes.

Mrs D Kelly: Does the Member agree with me that the words "economically inactive" could also be described as "gainfully unemployed", as some of them are, I think, on the OFMDFM Committee? One looks at all the strategies that remain on the shelf — the racial equality strategy, the sexual orientation strategy and, another example, the childcare strategy. I am sure that he heard the earlier scaremongering tactics of Máirtín Ó Muilleoir, who suggested that all those people would be unemployed under OFMDFM if the SDLP had the audacity to suggest that £880,000 could come from their very well-resourced administration budget to pay for childcare costs.

Mr Allister: I do not know how gainfully unemployed they are, because I am not quite sure what they are gaining — or, certainly, what the community is gaining — in consequence of their contribution, but, yes, there may be many strands to that. It is a flaw that there is this lack of focus on dealing with economic inactivity and that it is not thought important enough to resource in this Budget. That is a major failing, and it maybe tells us quite a lot.

We all understand that Budgets set down figures and that, as the year progresses, those figures become quite flexible and are adjusted as we go through various phases. However, it is instructive, towards the end of the financial year, after the exercise that was done yesterday on the spring Supplementary Estimates, to look at how some funding has been supplemented. I found it interesting, for example, that the North/South Ministerial Council required an uplift of 21·5% over the original money set aside for it. I looked for, but of course did not find, what the British-Irish Council, the poor relation, might have required. It seems to run on fresh air; but not the North/South Ministerial Council. Here is another 21·5% over what we were going to give it.

Then, I looked at the Maze/Long Kesh Development Corporation. If ever there was a quango that seemingly does nothing because of the dysfunctional logjam in OFMDFM — where Sinn Féin blocks any development of the opportunity that is the Maze site — this is it. Yet, this year it required a 21·5% uplift in its allocation. Why? What is it doing? More of the economically inactive or the gainfully unemployed, perhaps. What is the Maze /Long Kesh Development Corporation actually doing to warrant more money than it was ever intended to have in that year?

I notice that InterTradeIreland needed a 23·7% uplift. Yet, the resources for skills were reduced, effectively. Of course, in the rush to devolve corporation tax, we have had tunnel vision, as if reducing corporation tax was the answer to all our economic woes. However, very little parallel attention has been given to the very important matter of skills — not just skills for the economically inactive, but skills, generally, for our workforce. This, to me, is a Budget with no vision in that regard.

Then, of course, it is a Budget built upon higher borrowing than ever before in the history of these institutions, to the point where we now have indebtedness of £2·1 billion for this small part of the United Kingdom — a debt burden, not just for this generation, but future generations, growing, and presently at £2·1 billion.

That speaks to me of profligacy and mismanagement in the financial affairs of Northern Ireland.

Mr Lyons: I thank the Member for giving way. He refers to the debt that the Executive have accrued over recent years: does he not concede that a large proportion of that is a direct result of the voluntary exit scheme? Does he not see the benefit that:

“Each £100 million of borrowing will cost between £3 million and £4 million a year in loan repayments, but will yield annual savings in excess of £50 million”?

Is it not a good thing to have that money available for investment?

Mr Allister: I hear what the Member says. He is ever to be relied on to ride to the defence of the Executive. Time will tell whether the voluntary exit scheme turns out to be so beneficial. We certainly know that it is costing a huge amount of money; whether it makes those savings remains to be seen. In the short term, the outlay is very considerable. However, that is only a portion. Long before the voluntary exit scheme or anything else, the graph of the borrowings of this Executive was on a huge upward drive. It has now reached the point where no one seems to care that we are now the most heavily indebted region of the United Kingdom. That is not something to be proud of, and nor is this Budget.

Mrs Dobson: I welcome the opportunity to speak at this stage of the Budget Bill. No one will have missed the fact that our health service has had a very difficult year. Indeed, the last 18 to 24 months have seen a total collapse of even the most routine health waiting targets and key performance indicators. Yesterday, the Assembly approved the Vote on Account and the adjustments through the in-year allocations, and I am glad that the stalemate on welfare reform has at last been resolved. We must not allow some Ministers, however, to fall back on their own propaganda and forget that, while the funding shortfall that ultimately resulted in the disastrous in-year cuts in 2014-15 was £212 million, the welfare penalty accounted for only £87 million of that: the rest came down to the sheer mismanagement of the Executive Budget.

Whilst I welcome the allocation of £40 million emergency funding for elective care for the remainder of this financial year, the Health Minister, not for the first time, got somewhat caught up in his own hysteria by making exaggerated claims about kick-starting the local health service. I have cautioned him before, so I will do it again. His expectation of kick-starting a system that is effectively on its knees needs to be considered with the wider knowledge that, in the 2014-15 financial year, his Department received over £80 million of additional funding but the situation continued to get worse. Indeed, the DUP's first Health Minister of this mandate ended 2013-14 with a deficit of £13·1 million, despite receiving £100 million in monitoring rounds in that year.

The 2011-15 Budget has left a lasting legacy of rushed financial decisions and an abject lack of leadership or strategic planning. It is ironic that the DUP and the current DUP Health Minister were so keen to boast about the Budget deal, even claiming that it was a good deal, with their former leader warning that it was obscene of my colleague Michael McGimpsey to seek additional funds under that agreement. It was stated that no resource expenditure bids in monitoring rounds should have been tabled by the Department of Health at all unless in the event of major and unforeseeable circumstances.

9.15 pm

We all know that hundreds of millions of pounds were bid for and received, but it was less a case of unforeseen circumstances and more a case of politicking and stubbornness getting in the way of a fair allocation in the first place. Nevertheless, I accept that the £40 million allocation this year was better than nothing. The fact that official publications from the Health Department confirmed that nearly 400,000 people across Northern Ireland are waiting for treatment, a hospital appointment or a diagnostic test should have been enough to shame the Executive into action. I am sure that I am not alone in the House in writing to the Health Minister daily, on numerous occasions; indeed, I do not envy his mail bag of correspondence on behalf of constituents and their families who have been caught up in the waiting time cycle. I have said in the House before that statistics often mask the pain, fear, hurt and worry that our constituents feel. They have elected us to serve their best interests.

I am sure that none of us needs to be reminded that the longer a patient is forced to wait for a diagnosis or treatment, the more harm they are likely to come to. There is no greater issue facing the Executive or the Assembly right now than the horrendous situation of our hospitals and the inexcusable stress that that puts on patients. That is not even to mention the excellent staff, who are operating in extremely strained circumstances. It is regrettable that it took so long and so many patients to wait in pain for successive Health Ministers to realise that there was a problem and the extent of it. The plain truth is that £40 million will barely make a dent in our current unprecedented waits. However, I hope that it is followed in the next year, hopefully under a new Minister, with a recognition of what needs to be done. I have major concerns in the short term that the savings that the Department is demanding of trusts are putting an already stressed health service under even greater pressure. Those savings put pressure on services, including domiciliary care, that can and will lead to long-term pain and greater long-term financial costs for patient care for our most vulnerable. It is my —

Mr Lyons: Will the Member give way?

Mrs Dobson: Yes. It is as expected. I was waiting for you.

Mr Lyons: I am glad to hear that, and I am grateful to the Member for giving way. I absolutely agree with her: there are huge challenges in our health service. Obviously, she has been waiting for me to intervene, so she knows the question that I will ask: what steps would she take or where would she get the funding from to address the huge issues that she talks about?

Mrs Dobson: I thank the Member for his intervention. You have had three Health Ministers: if they had manned up, constituents of yours and mine would not be waiting in pain.

Mrs D Kelly: Will the Member give way?

Mrs Dobson: Yes.

Mrs D Kelly: The Member opposite should accept that OFMDFM has failed spectacularly to spend £80 million of the social investment fund. That could have gone into Health. Your previous colleagues roared across the Chamber at Michael McGimpsey, when he was Health Minister, that he had to live within his budget and could not tackle the cost of administration in the health service. When you are pointing at people, you should look at the three fingers pointing back at you.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Member is an experienced parliamentarian. I ask her to address all remarks through the Chair rather than across the Chamber.

Mrs Dobson: I thank the Member for the intervention and for giving an unelected Member a lesson on the OFMDFM SIF, which I continually raise —

Mr Lyons: Where is the answer to the question?

Mrs Dobson: Excuse me. I just hear noises from my left.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I ask the Member not to barrack from a sedentary position the Member who is speaking at the moment.

Mrs Dobson: Thank you, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker.

It is my sincere hope that the Department and trusts will be able to work together to deliver the savings in a way that does not compromise the safety of our patients. Of course, as well as approving changes to allocations in this financial year, the Assembly is being asked this week to effectively sign off on a significant proportion of next year's allocation. I understand that essential services need to continue and wages need to be paid, but the fact that, as we stand here today, we know little of the detail is indicative of a Health Department and Minister who believe that they are above scrutiny and accountability.

With an annual budget of almost £4.9 billion, it is simply unacceptable that the Assembly is being asked to approve this without any meaningful detail whatever. It is my fear that, given the obvious failure to address the crisis across our hospitals, we will be standing here this time next year making the same points and expressing the same bitter disappointment on behalf of the constituents who have elected us to serve in their best interests. Before the Minister talks about the additional allocation for next year, which I of course welcome, I ask him not to, because he and I both know that it does not come anywhere close to addressing the increase in demand and other inflation-related increases. So far, from what little we have been able to gather, the Budget does nothing to address what is undoubtedly this Executive's biggest failure.

Before I draw my remarks to a conclusion, I ask the Finance Minister to take on board the will of the House. Just last month, we debated changes to the Fire and Rescue Service. Following that debate, the Assembly resolved that the Health Minister should “seek Executive approval to ring-fence the NIFRS budget consistent with its front-line service function.”

— [Official Report (Hansard), Bound Volume 111, p157, col 1].

When we talk about patient safety, it is important to remember the service that responds to critical incidents across Northern Ireland every day. They prevent injury and save lives, and without that financial support that critical service is placed at risk and even greater pressure is placed on our health service, not to mention the increased risk of loss of life.

I appreciate that we can often focus on the numbers on the spreadsheet and the statistics on a sheet of paper, but the central argument I make to the Minister, in all sincerity, is this: behind the numbers lie our constituents. They feel and bear the ultimate outworkings of budgets — the successes and the failures — and I ask the Minister, as I know he appreciates the point, to take that on board.

Mr Storey: Mr Principal Deputy Speaker, I have just checked with you and your staff about the time that I have to speak and have been informed that there is no limit. So, Members, you are in for a longer sit. However, I will try to be brief.

I want to make one point as I commence. I have heard a lot of criticism about there not being an opportunity to scrutinise. There are Members who could scrutinise it from now until the end of this year, and it would not matter: they would still come up with no solutions or ideas on what they would do differently. They do themselves a disservice. We are in the House for this debate, we were here yesterday and we will be back again as the Bill progresses: that is the process of scrutiny. It is not perfect — I see that the Member is perturbed by that comment — given the circumstances, but Members have been able to raise their concerns in relation to the Budget over the last number of hours.

I want to try to make some progress with responses to those issues that, I trust, will give some clarity to Members. I will not dispel all their concerns, worries and fears, but, as Minister of Finance and Personnel for the Northern Ireland Executive, I am glad that we are in this position as we progress the Budget, compared with where we could have been a number of months ago. We all need to take some cognisance of the fact that we are in a better place. However, there is much more to be done.

As I said last night, it will be interesting for the electorate and the voters who are watching this debate and the debates in the days to come to see what happens with the parties that have said we should have spent the money on this or that issue. We will see whether those parties are in government or in opposition. I have to say, however, that I read some of the comments that were made in the document that was published yesterday by the Ulster Unionist Party. They still have not made up their mind about whether they will be in government or in opposition, and they say that good government does not mean that everyone has to be part of the Government. I am sure that that will go down well when they go to canvass at the doors in the next number of weeks and months.

Let me move on to what the Members have raised, beginning with the Chair of the Committee. Again, I thank the Committee for the help that it has given in the process. I welcome the positive contributions that it has made to the Budget process. I am aware of the correspondence that the Member, rightly, raised — the memorandum of understanding between the Assembly and the Executive on the Budget process. I want to make it very clear that we are making progress. I am keen to ensure that that progress is continued so that we have something of substance, even before the end of this mandate. That is a commitment that I want to honour. I want to get to a place where we have a satisfactory conclusion to the matter. It has gone on for a period, and I would like to see some progress being made on it.

The Member also raised the business rates review. The review has concluded, and we are now considering what is to be the way forward. I will comment further on that when I meet representatives from the CBI later this week. I want to ensure that we begin to have a debate around the best way in which we can move the process forward. I will listen to the concerns. In my previous role as Minister for Social Development, I was always very conscious that a consultation should not merely be a process of going out to hear having already agreed a predetermined outcome, and I reiterate that as the Minister of Finance. If a consultation is to mean anything, it will genuinely take on board the issues that are raised on the matter that is being consulted on, and the issues will be listened to and responded to in a positive way. I look forward to trying to bring some clarity to that issue in the next number of days and in the weeks ahead.

The Chair also raised the issue of wider fiscal powers. Of course, the Executive's top priority has been to seek an agreement, which we have secured, on the transfer and use of rate-setting powers for corporation tax. That remains the Executive's top priority in relation to the devolution of additional fiscal powers. In that regard, the Executive's intentions are clear. They are committed to introducing to Northern Ireland the corporation tax regime from April 2018 at a rate of 12.5%.

Of course, Members will also be aware that we are considering the case for devolving other fiscal powers where doing so would deliver a clear economic or social benefit for Northern Ireland. The impact that devolution would have on the Executive Budget and, therefore, the provision of public services is also a key factor there. You will recall that we recently sent correspondence to the Finance Committee about the issue. I reiterate the comments of my predecessor, Mr Hamilton, that preface that document. He set out two key conditions in considering whether the devolution of additional taxation powers should be sought by the Executive. The first was affordability: the devolution of a tax or duty and the change from the UK policy must not impose a disproportionate burden on the funding available for public services. Secondly, the devolution of a tax or duty and a change from UK policy should be expected to result in a defined economic and social benefit to the people of Northern Ireland.

Those remain the issues for me on how to address wider fiscal powers.

9.30 pm

That, of course, covers a point that was made by a Member, which is that we need to preface all this by saying, "Let us, as Members of the House, remember where our funding comes from". There are Members who want to cut off any association with Her Majesty's Treasury. When it comes to convincing the people of Northern Ireland, since its creation in 1921 until the present day, that we should move anywhere other than the United Kingdom, they have failed to do so. That money comes from the Treasury. That needs to be a reality check for all of us because the amount of money that would come from any other source is not available and is certainly not forthcoming within the current arrangements.

The Member also raised the issue — rightly so — of our constituency of North Antrim and the ongoing employment challenge with the loss of Michelin and JTI. Those are concerns for us as local representatives, for me as the Finance Minister and also, I trust, for the Executive. They remain a challenge and issue not only for Ballymena but for other areas across Northern Ireland. We outlined that we are always aware of the impact of job losses on individuals. It is very clear. It is very easy to come to the House and just repeat words. We always need to remember that, behind every announcement of job losses, there are individuals, families and communities who suffer.

As far as corporation tax is concerned, research suggests that the potential benefit to the economy of Northern Ireland would be the creation of well in excess of 30,000 additional jobs and economic growth of an additional 10% over 15 years. Those figures cannot be ignored or just set aside. That is why our attention should focus on this tool to ensure that we put Northern Ireland in the best place to be the beneficiary of the introduction of corporation tax.

Mr McKinney: I thank the Minister for giving way. Clearly, there is not one of us who would not welcome the prospect of 30,000 new jobs, but the quality of those new jobs is important. That goes to the very point that he makes about sustainability. In that context and with this Budget, surely it is a contradiction that we are not funding the education places that would provide us with more highly skilled people to attract higher-paid jobs to fulfil the corporation tax ambition as he outlined.

Mr Storey: Yet again, the Member is selective in what he wants to deal with. He has completely ignored the fact that an additional £25 million is going into skills. He just ignores the fact that we recognise the skills issue and are trying to deal with it with that £25 million. Let me also say this: he overlooks the fact that the economy of Northern Ireland is now becoming diverse, with a focus on new skills, technologies, opportunities and job creation. In fact, yesterday, in his constituency, we were able to announce the creation of an additional 88 jobs, with an average salary of £44,000. The Member can try to be dismissive of that, but I have to say that, yesterday, when I was speaking to the company's chief executive, who is from Houston in the United States of America, a story was relayed of a student who left Northern Ireland, went to England to be educated and, as a result of the company's locating in Belfast, had come back to south Belfast, to their home and to their local community, and is now employed. We want to encourage more of that and want to see it develop. The Member clearly wants to pick and choose what he focuses his attention on, and he dismisses the fact that £25 million for skills to prepare us for lower corporation tax is no small investment.

His colleague Claire Hanna referred to the women's childcare centre. I do not want to take away from my colleague the Minister for Social Development, but all that I will say is watch this space. We will not be doing what was suggested by her party and taking £800,000 out of the victims' sector and putting it into that.

Ms Hanna: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Storey: We have listened to the argument. Mrs Kelly knows that, when I was the Minister for Social Development, I took the decision to extend the funding for another year. I said that there was a challenge to the funding. However, we will see about that very soon.

If I continue to speak for this length of time and we go past midnight, we might be into tomorrow, and you never know what tomorrow will bring on that issue. I do not want to steal the thunder. The two Members are getting very exercised. Ms Hanna can go first and then Mrs Kelly.

Ms Hanna: I am sure that you have other points to respond to. Does the Minister agree that, as I said, one Committee session is not sufficient to provide scrutiny? The Member asked for alternatives. We have proposed one, and, if you check the record, you will see that it was not to remove £800,000 from the victims and survivors fund. I pointed out that OFMDFM's bloated £14 million administration fund was more than that provided for victims and survivors in total and said that that is the fund from which we hope you will take money to put into childcare. Does the Minister agree that it is not appropriate for us to provide this scrutiny live in the Chamber just before the Budget is being voted on and that it would have been more appropriate to provide that level of detail for all sections of the Budget?

Mr Storey: I remind the Member that this is a political process. This is the Chamber that we are elected to, and, therefore, I have no difficulty having the conversations and the debate on these issues. I think that that is where we should have the debate. Would I want to have more information? Yes. Would we have liked to have been able to have done this without using accelerated passage? Yes. However, for the reasons that we have repeated again and again and again, we have had to do what we have had to do. It seems as though some Members want to ignore that and still say, "But you should have more time, more scrutiny and more attention given to the detail".

Mrs D Kelly: I thank the Minister for giving way. There is absolutely no way that I doubt his sincerity about the childcare fund. He did put his hand in his pocket last year, but that should not rely upon emergency funding year-on-year.

On your latter point, Minister, I do not want to let it pass without saying that the reason why we will have to have such late sittings over the next few weeks is because Sinn Féin stopped the Executive from meeting for three years over Maze/Long Kesh and the DUP then had a go-slow for several months after the murder of Mr McGuigan. The Minister has —

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Can I draw the Member back to the debate on the Budget?

Mrs D Kelly: This is about scrutiny of the Budget, Mr Principal Deputy Speaker. I note that, in recent answers, the Minister of Finance and Personnel said that even he cannot get a good answer from the Minister of Education on how he is finding and spending his money.

Mr Storey: I thank the Member for her intervention. It is quite obvious that the election campaign has begun. The Member clearly wants to make her point. However, I will reiterate what I have said about the women's childcare fund. I listened when I was Minister for Social Development. I believe that the current Minister has listened. I have listened as Minister of Finance, and I urge Members to wait to see what will happen in the next number of hours.

I thank Mr Cree for the way that he approaches these issues. He raised a number of questions, and I want to try to deal with them. He mentioned industrial derating. In 2015-16, 4,437 properties have benefited from industrial derating as of 31 December 2015, and I have given a commitment about that continuing. A total of £59.7 million has been allocated to date in 2015-16.

That, again, is a delivery commitment that we welcome. My colleague referred to the empty shops rate concession. A total of 525 properties have benefited from that since it was introduced in April 2012. Over that period, £2.2 million was allocated as at 31 December 2015.

He queried the use of RRI borrowing. An important point is that the Executive can borrow up to a limit. We do not necessarily have to borrow the full amount, which means that we will draw down only the RRI borrowing that we actually need. In 2016-17, for example, the Executive have an additional £200 million of borrowing available for the voluntary exit scheme. That issue was raised and explained very well by my colleague from East Antrim. However, the Executive did not believe, on current projections, that the full amount will be required. That is why, in the Budget for 2016-17, we allocated £25 million of that facility for capital projects instead. Of course, my officials will keep the position under review and suggest changes if required during the next year's monitoring process.

He also raised Atlantic Philanthropies' £55 million investment, which was announced by the First Minister and deputy First Minister in 2014. That joint investment will deliver improved services to parents, shared education, and support for people with dementia and their carers. I am pleased that the Executive were able to make an allocation of £8 million in the 2016-17 Budget towards those very worthwhile interventions. Further funding requirements will be considered as part of the next Budget process.

Mrs Cochrane and other Members commented on the reform of the health service, and they continue to be critical of issues. My colleague the Health Minister is endeavouring to undertake a very difficult and challenging role. I do not think that any Member would take away from the real challenges to our health service. However, the Health Minister is seeking to address some of those problems. He announced a number of key reforms on 4 November in terms of structural changes and the creation of a panel to make recommendations on the configuration of services. He also gave a commitment to the transformation fund. The review of commissioning concluded that Northern Ireland's commissioning system is not as effective as it should be. The Health Minister is, therefore, seeking to delay the system to remove the complexities in a way that brings greater accountability and responsiveness.

The Minister also announced a panel to lead on the debate on the best configuration of health and social care services in Northern Ireland. Those all continue to be issues that Members will welcome. In the debate in the public domain in the last number of days, we were told that that issue was depoliticised, although I am not so sure that it was in Manchester. You have to remember that there was a legal challenge, so it was not just as clean-cut as maybe some were trying to make out.

We had an opportunity, as a five-party mandatory coalition, to show political consensus. But what happened? Well, one party decided, "Enough of that. It's getting too close to the election and we'll decide to do the best possible Pontius Pilate exercise and get out of the tent." Another party decided, "It doesn't suit us now. We'll vote against the Budget." Then we have another party that decided, "We're never going to accept any Budget but we'll still stay in the Executive and still be beneficiaries." So, we had an opportunity to have collective responsibility in determining health budgets but it seems as though three parties — two that are still in the Executive and one that has left — decided, "No, that's not a good idea but we'll still say it's what we want to do." It is time that they made up their mind.

9.45 pm

Mr McKinney: I thank the Minister for giving way. Will he accept that, yes, we did have a consensus and that, yes, we did have an opportunity to maximise the political will that existed around the House over the future of health but that that was in 2011 when the DUP took over Health and also had Finance and was also in OFMDFM but failed singularly to put sufficient funds behind the Transforming Your Care plan, which would have made a huge difference to our overall health service if fundamentally implemented? You had the consensus and you failed.

Mr Storey: Again, I think that the Member needs to be reminded that almost half of the Budget in Northern Ireland goes to Health. He does the service a disservice, and other Members do the health service a disservice by the way, sometimes, they continue to talk it down. I am a recipient of the health service in that I use it. We all are beneficiaries of a service that is free at the point of delivery. It is something that we have continued to protect and have continued to cherish, and I think that we cannot just talk about this in a glib way — and I know that the Member is not being glib, so I will not use that word — or in a way that sometimes does not give due respect to the fact that we spend 50% of the Budget on our health service. I will give one more intervention because I know that Members want to get home.

Mr McKinney: I thank the Minister for his indulgence. I go back to the point I made earlier. This is not just about the maximum amount of money or the percentage of the money that is allocated to Health. It is about how that money is spent, and we know that there is massive wastage in the system. There is £50 million spent on bank and agency staff, and there is £40 million spent on sickness. Major percentages can be saved out of overprescription. Those are the issues that are at the heart of this system.

I appreciate that the Minister has made the point that I am not being glib, because I have drilled down into this issue for two-and-a-half years. It all comes back to the point that the DUP failed fundamentally to invest in a Transforming Your Care plan that wanted money shifted left so that there would be investment in the community and we would not have what Transforming your Care predicted, which was haphazard change. Unfortunately, the failure to plan has led to that haphazard change, which is why we are experiencing the huge queues in elective care, with 400,000 people waiting for operations and appointments.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I am being very liberal.

Mr McKinney: I do appreciate that.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: I ask the Member to come to his point.

Mr McKinney: I will leave it there. I have made my point.

Mr Storey: In response, despite all our efforts and despite all the agreements that we sought to have on the Budgets, the SDLP still sought to have a position where it voted against every Budget. I think that that is what the people of Northern Ireland need to remember, and that is what they need to keep a focus on when it comes to determining who were the best custodians of public finances in Northern Ireland.

Let me move on to other comments and try to make progress on some other issues that Members raised. The issue of the A6 Randalstown to Castledawson upgrade and the other flagship projects was raised. Like Mr McCrea, I am pleased to see that the Executive are committed in their 2016 Budget to taking forward the upgrade of the A6 road linking Belfast and Londonderry, including the dualling of the Randalstown to Castledawson section. The A6 Randalstown to Castledawson dualling scheme is a significant project that will help to remove a very major bottleneck and so improve safety and journey times on what is a strategic and very important route in Northern Ireland.

Ms Hanna asked about the A6 and the other flagship projects. She wanted to know how they would be funded over their lifetime. If she looks at the Executive Budget for 2016-17, a document that I know she has a copy of, she will see that it sets out the Executive's funding commitment to all seven flagship projects right up to 2021. This was done specifically to provide Departments with funding certainty for that period.

So, I do not think that we can be accused of doing little on the commitment given to the flagship projects. We have not been making false promises. Those projects have been clearly committed to, and moneys have been set and allocated alongside them. So, I do not see how you can interpret that as yet another false promise that will not be delivered.

I know that the issue of the A5 was raised, and I may come back to it. The Member will hear very soon about progress on the A5; in fact, maybe I will deal with it now. I concur with what some others said about the Member's maiden speech. It is always a daunting task to speak in the House on any occasion, no less for the first time, and I commend the Member for that. As I have already said to him, I look forward to working with him as a Member of the House. I think that we need to be clear about the figures so that there is no confusion. The Executive have committed to invest £230 million in the A5 and a further £260 million in the A6 over the next five years. I have to say that, if that is not a commitment on a substantial capital project, I do not know what is.

The Member mentioned broken promises. I think that we also need to remember that a judicial review stopped the process, which the Member will be well aware of. He should also take some heart from the investment made in the Lisanelly project in Omagh. A substantial amount of money is being invested in the education of young people in that locality, and we look forward to seeing the benefits as the project is rolled out.

My colleague the Chair of the Education Committee Mr Weir made some comments about the Department of Education. There is clearly cause to ramp up skills through investment. We have raised the issue of corporation tax, and a key component part of that is our education system. I have already put on record my support for an additional £20 million to address pressures in our schools, which, I think, will be welcome. I want to pay tribute to our education providers who do an outstanding job. I see that the Minister is in the House. He should not take that as an endorsement of him because he knows that, at this time of night, my generosity might not extend that far. I have listened to the concerns raised about the pressures that are there, and I have no doubt that the Minister, under my good guidance, will make an announcement on that in some detail shortly.

Mr O'Dowd: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Storey: Yes.

Mr O'Dowd: I thank the Minister for his engagement and that of his officials on the matter. Indeed, I thank the Executive parties that are engaging on Budget issues. This shows that, when you commit yourself to engagement on the Budget, you can make real change, even at this late stage. So, I want to put on record my thanks to the Finance Minister and to the Executive for the additional £20 million for Education.

Mr Storey: Members should take note that the Education Minister and I started out as members of the Education Committee, so if you want to succeed in your political career, maybe you should go onto the Education Committee. Maybe Dolores Kelly, who is now on the Education Committee, can look forward to returning to the Executive if the SDLP decides that it does not want to go into isolation — sorry, opposition. Maybe those two things are one and the same; I do not know.

On a serious note, I believe passionately, as, I think, all Members do, in the importance of our education system, but let us be under no illusion that there will not be challenges ahead as we look at our school estate and at the way in which we continue to provide for education. We are all precious about our local schools and other areas in which education is being provided. We have to address certain pressures that are in the system at the moment, but the new Minister of Education, whoever it will be, will face particular challenges for a number of reasons, no less than the issue of our school estate. There will be somewhat more capital available. The situation with capital may not be in the best place, but there is more focus on capital than there is on resource.

Let me move on to dealing with the particular issue that the Chair raised about taking forward a number of the exit schemes. The Department of Education received and approved 195 teacher redundancy applications in 2015-16. The cost associated with those applications was £3.2 million, and the costs were met through funding accrued by the education and library boards — the employing authority — from the 2014-15 Budget. A further 127 applications were approved, at a cost of £5.2 million, which was funding that the Department of Education received from the public-sector transformation fund.

As at 6 January 2016, the Department of Education had received and approved 248 non-teaching, school-based redundancy applications, at a cost of £2.9 million, which was funded from the public-sector transformation fund. The Education Authority initiated its voluntary severance programme in May 2015, and it projects the number of redundancies before the end of the financial year to be 262. The Department of Education has allocated £14 million, which will be funded from the public-sector transformation fund.

The Council for the Curriculum, Examinations and Assessment (CCEA) also initiated a voluntary exit scheme in 2015-16, and the Department of Education has allocated £1 million for it, which will be funded from the public-sector transformation fund. That, again, is an indication that an attempt is being made to try to address the issue. It has all come about as a result of the public-sector transformation fund, and the Budget document gives some detail on that.

I move on to an issue that was raised by the Chair of the Agriculture Committee, my colleague Mr William Irwin. He mentioned the 5.7% reduction in the budget of the new Department of Agriculture, Environment and Rural Affairs. The overall level of funding available to the Executive means that it is inevitable that many of our Departments will face resource DEL reductions in 2016-17. I want to say something on that issue, because it is easy to forget why we are in the position of having to make reductions in the first place. I noticed in today's 'Belfast Telegraph' that we have been given some advice by Mr Johnny Andrews, who is the economy spokesman for the Northern Ireland Conservatives. He tells us all about the problems and challenges, but he never once mentions the fact that it is because of his party that we now have this situation in which there have been reductions. It is all very well to sit in splendid isolation as a member of the Northern Ireland Conservatives and tell us all about what we need to do and the difficulties that we are all going to have, but he makes no reference to the fact that it was his colleagues in Westminster who brought about the situation that created the challenges that we now face. However, we have had to deal with those challenges, and I accept that the budget outcome for the new Department of Agriculture, Environment and Rural Affairs means that some difficult decisions will need to be taken.

I welcome the steps that the Minister has already taken to generate efficiency savings across the Department, but Mr Irwin raised the matter of the £48.8 million capital budget that will be available to the new Department. I am pleased that the Executive were able to make that allocation, which will allow the Department to deliver on its key priorities, including the farm business improvement scheme.

We look forward to seeing that in the future.

10.00 pm

He also raised concerns about the cost of bovine TB and the difficulty that that poses to our local economy. I am committed to the vision of a competitive and sustainable livestock sector in Northern Ireland, which, along with the rest of our agriculture sector, helps to support the resilience of the entire food chain. While we cannot lose sight of the negative impact that bovine TB has on our local farmers, we must be cognisant of the cost to the taxpayer, particularly given the current budgetary position. The total cost of TB compensation payments to the end of January 2016 was £13.4 million. There is a clear need to explore all means of eradicating bovine TB, including the modernisation of our compensation regime.

He also referred to Going for Growth, the farm business improvement scheme that I have referred to. In supporting the implementation of the Going for Growth strategy, the Executive have recognised the importance of the agrifood sector. That is a vital sector for the future of the Northern Ireland economy. We all know from our constituencies, and from Northern Ireland plc, the importance of that sector to our economy. The £48.8 million capital allocation provides funding for the Department to implement the farm business improvement scheme, as I have mentioned.

I turn to comments that were made by the Chair of the Health Committee about waiting times and elective care. As I said, my colleague the Health Minister has advised me that the £40 million that he secured in the November monitoring round is being directed at tackling waiting lists, which have been an issue of concern. No one in the House would in any way try to be dismissive of the concerns that we are all well aware of with the challenges in relation to waiting times and the health service. That £40 million was secured in November, and it will benefit some 60,000 or 70,000 patients who would otherwise be waiting. It covers a range of particular specialities including orthopaedics, neurology and ENT. Since November, significant efforts have been made across the health system within a very tight framework to secure additional outpatient clinics and treatments within the trusts and to put in place appropriate arrangements with independent-sector organisations to transfer suitable patients for assessment and treatment. It is not the case that that issue is being ignored. We are endeavouring to do what we can to help to deal with the particular challenge that we face.

Mr McKinney raised the issue of the health black hole and asked where the budget allocation for health will be spent. The Health Minister has clearly stated that the additional money for health in 2016-17 will be directed towards front-line health and social care services. Reform across health and social care is ongoing, and I remind Members — I have said it repeatedly — that Transforming Your Care is not about reducing our investment in health and social care services; it is about making the best use of the resources available. That is the point that the Member was encouraging us to make about the overall Budget in how we address that issue. The Member criticised the delivery of Transforming Your Care, but we need to be reminded that, of the 99 recommendations in TYC, 50 have been completed and 46 are ongoing. It is not a case of it being yet another document that is sitting around and nothing being done with it, which is a point that I will come to in a moment or two in relation to comments made by Mrs Kelly. Proactive action is being taken.

I want to respond to the issues that were made by Mrs Sandra Overend, a member of the Education Committee. She asked about the public-sector transformation fund, and I have given some detail on that in response to my colleague the Chair of the Committee. I can confirm that the Department of Education was allocated a total of £70.7 million for the exit schemes, broken down as £47.3 million for the teaching workforce and £23.4 million for the non-teaching staff. There is no further funding for these schemes, and, if the Minister wishes to fund any further schemes, he will need to find that money from his own baseline.

The Member also asked how pension and National Insurance pressures will be funded. I can confirm that the pension pressures were covered in the financial year through allocations in the June monitoring round. These allocations will be baselined to carry through to future years, so it is not a case of them being a one-off. The additional National Insurance pressure will have to be covered from within the departmental budget. There is no funding set aside at the centre to cover it. I trust that that gives some clarity.

I want to comment now on an issue raised about funding for the environment. Again, I have to say to Members that, going through all these comments, it is clear that we have a wide variety of issues and significant demand on the public purse to try to cover as many as we find to be important. As a member of the Environment Committee, Pam Cameron expressed the importance of funding for that sector. With the exception of built heritage, the Environment function will transfer as one block to the new Department. The Member will remember that, at the start of the 2015-16 financial year, the Minister of the Environment slashed funding to a lot of environmental groups, unnecessarily as it turned out, only to reinstate it in the latter part of the year. Maybe we all need to learn that lesson on how not to deal with your budget. I believe that the consolidation of the environment function with other rural matters in the new Department will be good for Northern Ireland's environment.

In conclusion, I want to —

Mr Ó Muilleoir: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Storey: Yes. No doubt, it will have to do with South Belfast.

Mr Ó Muilleoir: In eight hours of Budget debate, we have had only one proposal from our colleagues in the SDLP on what they would do differently: they would raid the Office of the First Minister and deputy First Minister of £800,000. They are telling us tonight that they would not take that from the Victims and Survivors Service. As Minister of Finance, can you tell us how many jobs would go if we were to take £800,000 out of the OFMDFM budget and whether the unions have been consulted on that? It seems that there are to be no redundancy payments for this as there are no costs attached. Is that unprecedented, and have you any idea where this idea came from? Unless I missed something, it just does not add up. Are there any other great ideas about what they would do differently?

Mr Storey: This just confirms my earlier comment that the election campaign has begun. The Member raises a particular issue that may need to be addressed by his colleagues sitting alongside him on the other side of the House. If that amount of money had been taken out, it would undoubtedly have resulted in a reduction in employment and other pressures. We were in a position in which it was not tenable to do that in that way, so the economics of the party that suggested it have been proven to be flawed. I will allow Mrs Kelly the opportunity to respond.

Mrs D Kelly: Thank you, Minister, for allowing me to come back to explain to Mr Ó Muilleoir where the money would come from and how we would do it. It looks like it is a very sore point with Sinn Féin that it was prepared to let the women's childcare centres close so that it could unnecessarily inflate the administration budget of an already over-inflated Department under a Sinn Féin/DUP authority.

Mr Storey: That is more material, no doubt, for manifestos and quotes.

I want to address Mrs Kelly's point. [Interruption.] You are all starting to get very exercised. It seems as if you have no homes to go to. I want to reiterate something. I hope that it was down to confusion on the Member's part when she talked about documents that have not seen the light of day and that these documents have been produced, and we do not know where they are. She mentioned the racial equality strategy, but it has been agreed and published, and it is on the Department's website. That is not being secretive; that is not trying to hide anything. The children's strategy has also been published. I do not mind being criticised when we have not done something, but, when we have done something that is out there in the public domain, maybe the Member should give some credit and think about whether she got it wrong on this occasion.

Mr McKay: I thank the Minister for taking an intervention. I know that he is probably in a rush to get home to watch 'Spotlight' as soon as he can. [Laughter.] The problem is that the SDLP has no alternative Budget. Most oppositions have an alternative Budget to put before the people. Indeed, I long for the days a couple of years ago when the SDLP came forward with a proposal to sell an airport that we did not even own. Perhaps that is the real reason why we are not seeing an alternative Budget, because, the last time the SDLP brought one forward, it had proposals to sell assets that we did not even have.

Mr Storey: No doubt that is more material for manifestos, press releases and all that. That is an issue for the Member.

I will conclude by addressing an issue — [Interruption.] — do not encourage me — which is that we ignored young people who are not in full-time employment or training. Again, we do ourselves a disservice in that we ignore the fact that some €37 million has been secured from DEL and from ESF match funding, which will aim to provide 10,000 places. That is significant and is an investment in our unemployed and economically inactive. It should not be dismissed.

We were accused of playing politics with the Budget. Would it not be an awful thing if politicians did something political? Would it not be awful that we would be involved in such a thing? Let me explain — I think that I did explain, but the Member who made the allegation was not listening or was not present, and he is not present now. The reason for the increased Vote on Account for the Department for Regional Development is to provide it with the cover to take on the additional functions that it will inherit when it becomes the Department for Infrastructure in May after the elections. The Member implied that that is something to do with the party to which the Minister belongs.

As I explained, a number of Departments will take on new functions because of the reduction from 12 Departments to nine, where a similar increase has been needed, and the amounts are being made available in the Vote on Account, including for DARD, which is not a Department that any of my colleagues lead. I need to reiterate that the Vote on Account does not set a Department's budget for the year; it is simply a mechanism to allow a Department to keep carrying out its functions until such time as the Assembly considers the Main Estimates and the Budget Bill for 2016-17.

I am glad that I can recommend the Budget to the House, and I ask that the Assembly approves the Budget that is before it tonight.

10.15 pm

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: Before we proceed to the question, I would advise Members that, as this is a Budget Bill, it requires cross-community support.

Mr Principal Deputy Speaker: The Business Committee agreed that the House would not sit late into the night but should suspend and resume at 10.30 am tomorrow, if necessary, to finish business on today's Order Paper. This would seem to be a convenient moment at which to suspend. The first item of business when we return tomorrow will be a statement from the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development followed by the Consideration Stage of the Justice Bill.

The sitting was suspended at 10.32 pm.

Ministerial Statement

North/South Ministerial Council: Agriculture

Mrs O'Neill (The Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development): Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. With your permission, I will make a statement, in compliance with section 52 of the 1998 Act, regarding the twenty-fifth meeting of the North/South Ministerial Council (NSMC) in agriculture sectoral format, which was held in Armagh on Wednesday 20 January 2016. The Executive were represented by Minister Hamilton MLA and me. The Irish Government were represented by Simon Coveney TD, the Minister in the Department of Agriculture, Food and the Marine (DAFM); and Ann Phelan TD, Minister of State at the Department of Environment, Community and Local Government (DECLG). I chaired the meeting, and I have agreed my statement with the accompanying Minister, Simon Hamilton.

Ministers discussed the recent floods and the steps being taken in both jurisdictions to deal with the problems created for farmers and rural communities. We discussed recent price volatility issues being experienced by all sectors of the agriculture industry and measures to help farmers and the food industry cope with volatility. We welcomed the establishment of the new Agricultural Markets Task Force to look at market transparency, access for farmers to financial instruments and the scope to establish futures markets to hedge price risks for dairy products, all with a view to improving the position of farmers in the food chain. Ministers also discussed the ongoing difficulties around cross-border livestock trade owing to country-of-origin labelling and resolved to continue their efforts to agree a resolution to that anomaly.

The NSMC welcomed the presentation by Dr McNamee, the Deputy Chief Veterinary Officer in the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development. Her presentation outlined the cooperation between both jurisdictions on dairy product certification, which underpins and facilitates third-country market access for dairy products from across the island. Ministers recommended that the North/South group, which works to deliver consistency in approach to dairy product export certification, should meet on a more formal basis. The Council noted the current work programme and agreed that it remains current and enables practical and effective cooperation for mutual benefit in the agriculture sector. It also agreed that the work programme will be kept under review.

The NSMC welcomed the ongoing collaboration between DARD and DAFM aimed at maximising drawdown of EU funding under Horizon 2020 Societal Challenge 2 and the EU's competitive programme for research and innovation, which is seen as a means to drive economic growth and create jobs. It also welcomed the fact that a total of €16.8 million of funding had been secured to date in successful applications from both jurisdictions, including three collaborative applications. Ministers noted that officials are examining other opportunities for funding collaborative research projects, including those under the US-Ireland research and development partnership.

The Council noted that the Department of Agriculture, Food and the Marine and the Department here are united in their commitment to improving farm safety in support of the Health and Safety Authority (HSA) and the Health and Safety Executive (HSE), with a view to minimising the risk to those working on farms, thereby reducing the incidence of injury and death on farms. Ministers welcomed the ongoing significant sharing of information on farm safety between officials from both jurisdictions and the formation of a new North/South farm safety group (NSFSG) on 3 September 2015, comprising officials from both jurisdictions. The group will meet biannually to discuss areas of collaboration on farm safety. It will seek opportunities to develop new joint initiatives and continue to work together to increase further farmer awareness of the dangers on farms, with a view to reducing fatalities and serious injuries in the farming industry. Ministers noted that the NSFSG has agreed to share intelligence on farm safety, such as research material and grant scheme development specifications, and that a very successful all-island farm safety conference took place on 5 November 2015 in Monaghan. The Council agreed that officials will provide an update on the work of the North/South farm safety group and the farm safety partnerships at a future NSMC agriculture meeting.

Ministers noted the significant progress made by DARD and DAFM on the implementation of the common agricultural policy reforms agreed in 2013, including the current position on rural development programmes that were adopted by the European Commission during the summer of 2015, as well as the determination of DARD and DAFM to implement European Commission proposals for CAP simplification and to push for further simplification where appropriate. The Council also noted the continuing close contacts between officials from DARD and DAFM on the new area of natural constraint (ANC) provisions and a range of CAP reform implementation issues.

The NSMC welcomed the work done on the delivery of the all-island animal health and welfare strategy action plan since the previous NSMC agriculture meeting, held in February 2015. Key points that were noted included the granting of officially brucellosis free (OBF) status by the EU Commission. Both jurisdictions now have OBF status.

Ministers in charge of DARD and DAFM announced the abolition of pre-movement test requirements in September 2015. Arising from that decision, routine on-farm testing has been discontinued in the South. In the North, the age at which animals are subject to routine tests increased from 12 to 24 months in October 2015. In November 2015, the frequency with which dairy herds are tested decreased to some 20% of herds each year for the next five years, although bulk milk testing will continue. Biennial testing for beef herds will continue for another two years and, over the subsequent three years, approximately a third of beef herds will be tested each year. From 1 February 2016, brucellosis pre-export testing will no longer be required for animals moving to Britain and other member states.

Ongoing cooperation continues between both jurisdictions, as evidenced by the cooperation during the investigations into the BSE case in County Louth in 2015, enhanced cooperation on contingency planning for disease outbreaks, liaison on EU animal welfare legislation and animal identification, and progress on the data-sharing project.

It was noted that officials from DAFM had attended meetings of the TB strategic partnership group and that cooperation and information-sharing on strategies and actions to eradicate TB continues. Agreement has recently been reached on a joint tender for CO2 for whole-house gassing in the event of an avian disease outbreak on any part of the island. The introduction of legislation from March 2016 will implement a compulsory bovine viral diarrhoea (BVD) scheme in the North.

Ministers noted that the DARD and DAFM plant health subgroup had made significant progress on the plant health policy review and development. Working within the context of the all-Ireland chalara control strategy, progress has been good since the last NSMC meeting, resulting in improved joint policy development. Progressive dialogue and joint working on contingency plans, pest risk plans and the development of the TreeCheck app have all contributed to a shared strategic approach to plant health.

The Council also noted that DARD and DAFM commissioned a targeted review of the pest risk analysis report to further investigate the role of wood as a means of spreading the disease. Key conclusions of the report indicate that the eradication of ash dieback in both jurisdictions is not possible. It recommends a policy change from eradication to containment and management. That policy change is being jointly progressed.

The Council welcomed the continued significant cross-border cooperation in dealing with tree and plant health, the regulation of the use of pesticides and the joint approach in the areas of EU funding and future sharing of science and diagnostic capability.

The NSMC noted the adoption by the European Commission of DARD's rural development programme for 2014-2020 on 25 August 2015 and of the Twenty-six Counties' rural development programme for 2014-2020 on 26 May 2015. Those programmes provide for investments in general rural development activities, under the social inclusion, poverty reduction and economic development priorities, of £80 million and €250 million in the respective institutions.

Ministers also noted the increased level of meaningful cooperation across both jurisdictions and agreed that DARD and DECLG should organise a LEADER cooperation event to be held in 2016 to encourage cooperation between local action groups. Ministers welcomed the opening of a new social farming support office in Cookstown to complement the support office in County Leitrim and noted the progress on the CEDRA-funded social farming grant scheme.

The Council noted DARD's involvement in the EU northern periphery and arctic programme through the RYE Connect project and welcomed the transnational opportunities it offers to young rural entrepreneurs in both jurisdictions who wish to start, or have already started, their own business. The Council agreed to hold the next agriculture meeting in the autumn of 2016.

Mr Irwin (The Chairperson of the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development): I thank the Minister for her statement. I refer her to paragraph 5 of the statement and the discussions on the difficulties around cross-border trade in livestock and country-of-origin labelling. The Minister noted a resolve to continue efforts to agree a resolution. Will she expand on what efforts have been made and what successes they have had?

Mrs O'Neill: Yes. I have continued to raise that issue with Minister Coveney, and I am very keen that we have the issue resolved, given the traditional pattern of trade across this island. I have spoken to the Food Standards Agency (FSA), which is content with the label that I have proposed. I have spoken to DEFRA in England, which is content with the approach that I have proposed, and I have spoken to the European Commission, which is also content.

The onus is now on us, as political leaders, me and the Minister in the South, to move forward and show leadership for the industry. The issue can be resolved when there is the political will to resolve it. I have argued our case very strongly, and I believe that we have a solution. I look forward to that being taken forward over the months ahead.

Mr McAleer: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I thank the Minister for her statement. Has she had discussions with her counterparts on farm safety?

Mrs O'Neill: Yes, farm safety is a significant area of concern for not just the farming industry here but the farming industry worldwide. Minister Coveney and I have recognised that and agreed that better cooperation between our Departments would strengthen and enhance the work of the farm safety partnerships through the sharing of information and working together at an official level. The new North/South farm safety group, which was established in September of last year and comprises officials from both jurisdictions, will meet biannually. It will discuss how we can take forward a collaborative approach to farm safety and seek opportunities to develop new initiatives and joint initiatives. It is important that we continue to work together to further increase the awareness of farmers of the dangers on farms, with a view to reducing fatalities and serious injury in the industry.

Mrs McKevitt: I thank the Minister for her statement. I would also like to highlight farm safety. I am delighted that the group is coming up with new initiatives. The hard-hitting TV campaign has been a great success. Sometimes, it is hard to watch, and people turn away from it, but it has been a success, as have the programmes held in rural schools that highlight to children the dangers on farms. With that new group, will the Minister push for more programmes to come into schools, particularly our rural schools, in advance of bringing in new programmes to highlight farm safety further and support the farm safety and health awareness days?

Mrs O'Neill: I welcome the fact that the Member recognises that there has been a successful advertising campaign and that the Farm Safety Partnership is looking at all of the avenues through which it can best get its message out. CAFRE ensures that the farm safety message is front and centre of all its courses, but schools are a good venue for getting that message into the minds of young people from a very early age. We have done some initiatives with schools, and we will continue to do so. As I said, sending out that early message, so that young people grow up with farm safety awareness front and centre in their mind, is very positive, and I want to be strongly associated with that.

Mrs Dobson: I thank the Minister for her statement. I note the presentation from the Deputy Chief Veterinary Officer. Given the cooperation between Departments on preventing the spread of swine flu, was that issue part of the discussion? Was she aware that about 150 cases have been reported in Northern Ireland in the last four weeks?

Mrs O'Neill: My veterinary staff are acutely aware of any animal safety issues, animal welfare issues and disease issues. One of the ongoing discussion items on the NSMC is the all-island animal health and welfare strategy. That looks at all of the major diseases, including swine flu, which is an ongoing topic of conversation between Minister Coveney and me. You mentioned the conversation that we had at the NSMC on dairy exports, and we have formalised that approach, which is to work together across the island on looking to new markets and how we can break into them. That is positive work, but front and centre of the work of the NSMC and an issue that Minister Coveney and I identified as a work programme is animal health and welfare, with swine flu being one issue that is continually monitored and kept under review because of its impact on the local industry.

Mr McCarthy: I thank the Minister for her statement. I have a number of questions, but I will ask only one, and it relates to paragraph 22. Will the Minister further explain the role of the social farming support service in Cookstown? Will it help farmers in my constituency — in all constituencies — who are not receiving sufficient prices for their goods? Farmers in my constituency, for instance, are getting very low prices for Comber spuds and turnips, as I mentioned to you previously. Is the service to help to alleviate the problems associated with people involved in that industry?

Mrs O'Neill: It is not. The social farming project works with young people who would normally take up day opportunities in health trusts. Social farming is an opportunity for young people to go onto a farm setting, be part of farm life and contribute to the work done on farms. It is a fabulous project, and I am happy to provide the Member with more details. Over the last number of weeks, the group was here presenting to MLAs on the positive work that it does. I am certainly a big supporter of the service. It has just established a base in Cookstown, and I want the service to be established right across the board.

This is an opportunity for the farming community, which wants to be involved in assisting young people, particularly those who have learning difficulties, for example, and helping to provide them with opportunities and alternatives to day opportunities in the health trusts. For me, it is very much a cross-departmental opportunity to make a real and positive difference to those young people's lives.

That, however, is not relevant to the Member's point about the issues and difficulties in the supply chain and farmers receiving a fair price for their product. As I have told the Member on numerous occasions, it is always a key priority for me to challenge the supply chain to ensure that it works for all the people involved in it. As I said, I am happy to provide the Member with more information on the social farming project.

10.45 am

Mr McMullan: I thank the Minister for her detailed report. What benefits does she expect from the new formalised arrangements on dairy products certification?

Mrs O'Neill: It will be a good opportunity for us. Whilst it was an ongoing topic of conversation at the NSMC, this is an opportunity for us to put it in place formally, so that the two Departments would work together to make sure that we look towards new market opportunities and meet the certification standards of the countries that we are trying to break into. We all recognise that the dairy industry is going through a significantly challenging time and has been for some time. We continue to send out the message that, with a growing world population, the demand for dairy products and our products continues to rise. With that in mind and looking towards the future, it is important that we ensure that we break into whatever markets we can and that we are fit for purpose on this island and work collectively and collaboratively to break into those new markets and market what we have, which is a strong, green, positive image and a fully traceable product. Formalising that ensures that we keep it high on the agenda and that officials continue to work on breaking into those markets.

Mr McCrea: I welcome the opening of the new social farming support service in Cookstown and hope that what the Minister outlined, certainly for young people associated with the industry, actually happens.

Paragraph 4 of the Minister's statement refers to the discussion on the recent floods and the steps being taken in both jurisdictions. Will she outline whether the Executive have considered a compensation payment to businesses and farmers. If so, has the amount been agreed?

Mrs O'Neill: That discussion is ongoing. We hope to finalise it over the next number of weeks and to get the payment out to the businesses and farmers who were affected as a result of the flooding. The Member knows that the Executive took a number of initiatives, in particular investing in rural roads and infrastructure, which stops people from being cut off. We also took a decision to invest in some Rivers Agency surveys and work, which may help to identify problem areas where we can make improvements. He will also be aware that there is an ongoing review of the recent flooding and how it was responded to and an engineering review of the levels of the lough. All those things are being taken into consideration.

As regards the ask and the work that the Executive have tasked a number of Ministers to take forward, we have said that we are minded to bring forward a hardship payment for businesses and farmers. We are working our way through the detail of that to ensure that we can get it out the door as quickly as possible.

Mr Allister: I refer the Minister to paragraph 5. I assume that the agricultural markets task force that is referred to is that established by the EU Commission. When is that task force due to report? The statement refers to for dairy farmers. Has the Minister a view of what the possibilities are there? Is that task force also looking at the legal possibilities of organising farmers' collectives? Has the Minister a view on that?

“the scope to establish futures markets to hedge price risks”

Mrs O'Neill: Yes. You have asked three questions. You will remember that we went to Europe and argued strongly for a review of the intervention price. The Commission did not deliver on that, but it set out that it would establish the agricultural markets task force and take a very high-level look at the market, the opportunities for the supply chain and the opportunities at a European level to support the industry. I am glad to say that David Dobbin, who is a local industry person, has been appointed to that task force and will be a strong articulator of the needs of our local industry. That is a welcome development. They will look at access for farmers to financial instruments. That is an initiative that the Commission has set out. They will scope the establishment of futures markets to hedge prices. We need to scope that out more keenly because there will always be peaks and troughs in the dairy market; that is the nature of it. Our farmers need to be equipped with the information to decide whether they want to be part of a futures market or a hedging scheme that will allow them to offset the troughs and perhaps even out their income. We need a lot more information about that. The more we scope that out, the better. The supply chain forum identified that issue and will focus on that. We intend to meet over the next number of weeks, and that will be one of the issues that we focus on. There is a large body of work to do to help mitigate, when we can, the volatility that will always exist in the dairy market.

Justice (No. 2) Bill: Consideration Stage

Mr Speaker: I call the Minister of Justice, Mr David Ford, to move the Bill.

Moved. — [Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice).]

Mr Speaker: Members will have a copy of the Marshalled List of amendments detailing the order for consideration. The amendments have been grouped for debate in my provisional grouping of amendments selected list. There are five groups of amendments, and we will debate the amendments in each group in turn. The first debate will be on amendment Nos 1 to 30, 32 to 36 and 74 to 79, which deal with fines and enforcement. The second debate will be on amendment Nos 31, 58 to 60, 69 to 73, 82 to 86 and opposition to clause 45 stand part, which deal with procedural arrangements and technical matters. The third debate will be on amendment Nos 37 to 51, 80, 81 and opposition to clause 38 stand part, which deal with the Prison Ombudsman. The fourth debate will be on amendment Nos 52 to 57, which deal with offences and penalties. The fifth debate will be on amendment Nos 61 to 68, which deal with the termination of a pregnancy in exceptional circumstances.

I remind Members who intend to speak during the debates on the five groups of amendments that they should address all the amendments in each group on which they wish to comment. Once the debate on each group is completed, any further amendments in the group will be moved formally as we go through the Bill and the Question on each will be put without further debate. The Questions on stand part will be taken at the appropriate points of the Bill. If that is clear, we shall proceed.

Clause 1 (Application of Chapter)

Mr Speaker: We now come to the first group of amendments for debate. With amendment No 1, it will be convenient to debate amendment Nos 2 to 30, 32 to 36 and 74 to 79. Those amendments relate to fines and enforcement. Amendment No 5 is consequential to amendment No 6. Amendment No 14 is consequential to amendment Nos 11, 12 and 13. Amendment No 17 is consequential to amendment No 16, and amendment No 18 is consequential to amendment Nos 16 and 17. Amendment No 19 is consequential to amendment Nos 16 and 17. Amendment No 25 is consequential to amendment No 24. If all that is clear, I will call the Minister of Justice, Mr David Ford, to move amendment No 1 and to address the other amendments in the group.

Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice): I beg to move amendment No 1: In page 2, line 1, leave out subsection (3).

The following amendments stood on the Marshalled List: Nos 1-30, 32-36 and 74-79.

Thank you, Mr Speaker. Before dealing with the group, perhaps I could crave your indulgence a little to speak briefly about the progress of the Bill to date and, in particular, given that there are few other Members in the Chamber at present, to thank the members of the Committee for their assistance in progressing the work. In particular, I thank the Chairman and Deputy Chairman — Mr Ross and Mr McCartney — who have, as ever, displayed a significant commitment to ensuring that a complex Bill with a significant number of amendments has been scrutinised by the Committee and dealt with in a very positive way. It is also notable that this is the second successive detailed Bill in which the policy content at introduction and the significant number of amendments proposed by the Department have survived the Committee's scrutiny without significant impact. I am grateful for the Committee's support, although it is never without an element of challenge, which is exactly as it should be. Whilst the Committee is supportive of the Bill and my amendments, certainly in this group, it has tabled two amendments of its own: one in relation to the facility for clearing a fine through addiction or mental health treatment and the other in relation to the creation of an offence of disclosing private sexual photographs and films with intent to cause distress. I am sympathetic to the Committee's thinking on those and look forward to debating them.

Amendment No 1 is a consequential amendment arising from my new clause 12A, the subject of amendment No 22, which I will speak to shortly. Instead, given the complexity of this section, I will speak to the amendments by policy topic, beginning with my changes to the vehicle seizure provisions. I will then proceed to the amendments tabled by Mr McCartney and colleagues and by the Justice Committee.

Amendment No 8 to the vehicle seizure provisions at clause 6 introduces an additional safeguard to ensure that a vehicle seizure order should be made only if the value of the vehicle, if sold, is sufficient to discharge the sum owed, including the likely charges and costs of the sale. On that topic, further adjustment to the vehicle seizure provisions is made by amendment Nos 27 and 29 to address comments made to the Committee by the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission and the Examiner of Statutory Rules on the regulation-making powers in clause 18. The amendments insert subsection (3A) to provide that:

"Before making a vehicle seizure order, the responsible court must, in satisfying itself that the order would be justified, reasonable and proportionate in all the circumstances of the case, have particular regard to the likely effect of the order on the debtor's ability to earn a living."

As a consequence, paragraph (b) of clause 18(6) is omitted. Finally in respect of vehicle seizure, a minor and technical amendment to correct a small drafting issue in clause 6 is offered by amendment No 7.

Amendment Nos 16, 17 and 18 introduce new clauses 9A, 9B and 9C to allow the court to issue an arrest warrant for individuals who do not turn up for their fine default hearing. Currently, the fine default hearing process, under which offenders can be returned to court to have their default reviewed, can be frustrated by defaulters simply not turning up for the hearing. If the court is not satisfied that notice has been served, the case must sit in abeyance. The Bill will strengthen that process by moving from a notice-to-attend procedure to a summons process. To further strengthen attendance at fine default hearings, I propose a power to issue an arrest warrant in circumstances of non-attendance so that, when police encounter an offender whom they know to be in default, they will be able to arrest them and bring them to court forthwith or bail them to appear at a future default hearing.

There are safeguards attached to the use of the power that ensure that an arrest warrant can be issued only in certain circumstances. There are four factors: that there is no proof of service of the summons, nor that the defaulter is evading service, but the court is satisfied that a reasonable attempt has been made to serve the summons on the debtor; when the court is satisfied that the defaulter knows of the penalty and the possible consequences of not paying; when the court is considering the possibility of committing the defaulter to prison for failure to pay; or when the court is satisfied that issuing a warrant for the debtor's arrest, instead of reissuing the summons, is proportionate to the objective of securing the debtor's appearance before the court.

At the end of the new collection process, which will already have seen a series of collection options considered, the number of non-attenders at fine default hearings should be low. However, the power, should it be needed, ought to be available to maintain the integrity of the fine collection and default hearing process as a deterrent to those who are aware that they have to pay but might seek to frustrate the process and cannot be dealt with otherwise. My amendment Nos 16, 17 and 18, together with consequential amendment Nos 10, 15, and 26, will enable that to occur.

Amendment No 19 introduces new clause 9D to allow for the recovery of the costs of default hearings. Current practice is that fine default notices are served by post in the first instance before progressing to personal service by a summons server if postal service has been unsuccessful.

It is considered that existing provisions do not allow for the recovery of these summons server fees, currently set at £13 per summons. The costs are, instead, incurred by the Department, and, in the 18 months since default hearings have been implemented, costs have exceeded £350,000. Given the cost associated with personal service, I believe that the fee should be recoverable against the defaulter in appropriate circumstances. New clause 9D will allow the court to order the recovery of the costs of bringing a person back to court for the purpose of dealing with his default, where the court considers that that is appropriate.

11.00 am

I now move on to amendment No 22, which introduces a new clause 12A to provide for information sharing by the Department for Social Development with a court to support the provisions in the Bill that require offenders to provide income information to collection officers, so that the most appropriate collection option can be chosen. This amendment, together with consequential amendment Nos 1 and 30, will help avoid the situation whereby a collection officer can be frustrated in their attempts to secure income details where the debtor has failed to engage with the court or collection officer. It will allow the Department for Social Development to share social security information with the court or a collection officer so that the best and most appropriate use can be made of the power to make an application for deduction from benefits.

We intend to bring forward similar legislative provision to allow Revenue and Customs to share financial information with the court or collection officer for the purpose of deciding to make, or the making of, an attachment of earnings order. It was not possible to bring such a provision forward in this Bill because, as the Commissioners for Revenue and Customs Act 2005 is a reserved matter, conferring power on HMRC to share information cannot be done through Assembly legislation and so we must do it through Westminster. My officials are, therefore, working with their counterparts in the Ministry of Justice to progress a similar amendment through Westminster with a view to having the necessary provisions in place to coincide with the coming into operation of the relevant parts of this Bill.

My next amendment in this group is amendment No 79, which makes an adjustment to schedule 2 to the Bill to bring the prosecutorial fine provisions created by the Justice Act 2015 into the new fine collection and enforcement arrangements. This amendment will allow prosecutorial fines to be enforced in the same way as other fixed penalties and penalty notices already included in the schedule and reflects my original policy intent. Prosecutorial fines could not be included in the Bill at introduction, however, as the Justice Act (Northern Ireland) 2015, which created the new disposal, had not by then received Royal Assent.

Amendment Nos 33 and 77 to clause 24 and schedule 2 respectively then address omissions from the Bill at introduction to ensure that a supervised activity order cannot be considered as an option in default of a confiscation order given that, under clause 3(2), a confiscation order is outwith the proposed new collection and enforcement arrangements and to ensure that a warrant of commitment for default under the Bill is treated the same as a similar warrant under the Magistrates' Courts (Northern Ireland) Order 1981. Finally in respect of Part 1 and associated schedules to the Bill, amendment Nos 4 to 7, No 21, No 23, No 32, Nos 34 to 36, Nos 74 to 76 and No 78 are all minor and technical amendments to correct and improve the drafting of the Bill. That concludes my amendments to Part 1 and schedules 1 and 2 to the Bill.

I now wish to address first those amendments tabled by Mr McCartney, Mr Lynch and Ms McGahan and then those tabled by the Chair of the Committee for Justice. The first set of amendments are, I understand, designed to introduce protections to ensure that the fine collection arrangements cannot be outsourced to private agencies and to ensure that payment of a fine by deductions from benefits, bank account order or by vehicle seizure will not adversely impact on children or adult dependants of a debtor or extend the sanction to dependants of the debtor. I believe that the significant number of safeguards inherent in the provisions of the Bill already, supplemented by the amendments I am bringing forward today, make those Members' amendments unnecessary. It is important to note that the new fine collection arrangements will be administered by collection officers in the fine collection and enforcement service. Under clause 2 of the Bill as it stands, collection officers must be civil servants from the Department. I do not intend to outsource these functions to any other body and, therefore, I am happy to give Mr McCartney and his colleagues that assurance. On that basis, I do not think that the proposed amendment to clause 2 is necessary.

Under clause 4, when making a collection order, a court may, if it thinks it appropriate, having first considered other available options such as granting time to pay or payment by instalments, order the collection officer to make an application for a deduction of benefits from the debtor. Subsection (2)(b) of clause 4, however, provides that that may only be done with the debtor's consent. I understand the intention behind the proposed amendment to clause 4, but I hope the fact that the debtor's consent is required in that instance, together with the fact that a court would, as a matter of course, consider any representations made by, or on behalf of, a debtor in deciding whether an application for deductions is the right option, provides Mr McCartney with some reassurance. Again, I suggest that the amendment is unnecessary.

More generally, on default, collection officers will liaise with debtors to explore the person's income status, including living costs, other outgoings and number of dependants, as well as employment and/or benefits status, bank accounts and vehicle ownership and, in the first instance, will be able to grant extensions of time to pay or facilitate payments by instalments. If those measures do not prove successful, the collection officer can select an appropriate enforcement action, including exploring an application for deductions from benefits. Again, the intention is that deductions will be progressed with the offender's consent in the first instance, although consent will not be required if it is clear that they are not engaging with the collection process.

Those are not novel proposals, as provision for fines and other financial penalties are simply being added to the list of debts or charges that are already capable of being collected from benefits through the statutory third-party deduction scheme operated by the Department for Social Development. There are a number of safeguards in that scheme that ensure that essential living expenses are protected; place limits on the number of deductions that can be taken at any time; and establish a maximum financial limit that can be deducted per week. The provisions in the Bill do not alter any of those safeguards. The collection officer will not be able simply to impose on the debtor a deduction from benefits. Rather, the collection officer will apply to DSD, and an application may be rejected if DSD determines that an offender's income is too low for a deduction for payment of a fine or other penalty to be made or if the offender already has the maximum number of deductions in place.

The Members' proposed amendment to clause 10 would require the court or collection officer to make a judgment on the debtor's benefit status and on the effect of a deduction, the level of which the court or collection officer is not responsible for setting, before making the application to DSD. That does not sound terribly practicable to me. A better solution is that set out in the Bill: that DSD, rather than the court or the collection officer, is best placed to determine whether to grant an application on the basis of the debtor's relevant benefit status.

In addition, clause 11 provides for detailed regulations to be made by DSD in relation to deductions from benefits that will include further safeguards by ensuring that payment from deductions for fines and other penalties will be placed sixth in the priority list for collection, behind housing and heating needs, for example, and only from certain income-related benefits. Those are income support, jobseeker's allowance, state pension credit and employment support allowance. For those reasons, I cannot support the amendments to clauses 4 and 10.

I have already outlined some of the protections around the use of the vehicle seizure powers. I imagine that such orders will be made rarely and, before doing so, a court must consider all the circumstances to be satisfied that making the order is justified, reasonable and proportionate in all the circumstances of the case. There will be full judicial oversight of the use of the order, and I believe that that is most important. The court will, as a matter of course, hear any representations made by, or on behalf of, the debtor and is likely to take into account the impact of making the order on the debtor's children or adult dependants.

I fully understand the intention behind the proposed amendments to clauses 6 and 18, but I do not believe that they are necessary. Nor do I think that the Members' amendments to clauses 15 and 17, which relate to the making of bank account orders, are needed. Where, rarely, an interim order is imposed under clause 15, only the amount of the outstanding fine will be frozen in the person's account. We do not want, nor will we seek, to have an offender's full assets frozen. Where an interim order is in force, in cases of hardship, clause 16 enables the debtor to make an application to have moneys released for essentials. Only the court will be able to impose a full bank account order, under clause 17, and an order will also only be made in respect of an account in the offender's own name; joint accounts will not be frozen.

I expect that the impact of the making of a bank account order on a debtor's dependants would be a relevant consideration. I, therefore, oppose the amendments.

I also note the Committee's amendments to create a power to allow an offender to clear a fine through addiction or mental health treatment through the creation of a work development and rehabilitation of debtors scheme and work development and rehabilitation of debtors orders. Unlike community-based sentences, by which a court may include requirements as to treatment for drug or alcohol dependency or as to mental condition, the imposition of a fine by a court is not designed to have a rehabilitative aspect. It is, rather, a pecuniary penalty imposed on an offender on conviction.

I am aware that arrangements exist in New South Wales, whereby persons who are suffering from mental health or drug or alcohol addiction problems can engage in certain courses or treatment as a means of satisfying the fine, but that is not an aspect that is associated with fine enforcement arrangements elsewhere in the United Kingdom or Ireland or, indeed, in any other jurisdiction of which I am aware.

While I understand the rationale behind, and have some sympathy with, the proposal, particularly as I share the Chair's belief that there are benefits in tailoring court disposals to the individual's particular circumstances, I believe that further research and considerable policy development and consultation would be required to evaluate the merits of that approach and to identify any resource implications. Given the time available for the Bill's remaining stages, it would not be possible to undertake and complete such preparatory work and make appropriate provision in regard to the Bill. I am, however, very interested in broader problem-solving and community approaches, and I know that the Chair is too. He is at least as interested in the new opportunities as I am, and, for example, he spoke of it during my Justice Committee appearance last week when we were discussing court estates.

Problem-solving approaches are in place in other jurisdictions, including other common law jurisdictions, and I know that the Chair paid particular interest to those points. I welcome that interest from the Chair and the Committee, and I would like to see more work done in the future to explore the benefits of such an approach for our justice system. However, I doubt if any existing problem-solving system can be applied here without great thought and very significant political commitment. I say that because, as the amendment recognises, many of the problems in society that bring people into the justice system will require commitment from Health, Education and, sometimes, other partners as well. The development of a Programme for Government for the next mandate is the opportunity to think strategically about the outcomes that we want for society, and I believe that problem-solving approaches will have a role to play in that.

I am not coming to this from a standing start. At the Justice Committee last week, the Chair referred to opportunities to look at different delivery models. While that is most welcome, it was a pressing need anyway, and the forthcoming OECD report, also referenced in the Fresh Start deal, will, I trust, have some interesting things to say to all of us. I have asked my Department to be involved in the OECD study, and I was grateful that one of the case studies in that process has looked at problem-solving approaches for justice. We should await the publication of that report, but I can say to the Chair and to members of the Committee that it is very much in line with my thinking and progress being made in the Department. If the political will is there to work differently for better outcomes, Justice will play its role in that.

I agree with Alastair Ross that there are many different ways forward that we should explore. We can be more creative, and we can look to community and problem-solving solutions. I will be keen to hear the comments that he will make during the debate today, following up the comments that he has made in other circumstances and, indeed, comments made at some of the series of seminars that have been run by the Committee. I trust that the assurances that I give of work being progressed in the Department, building on the OECD report, will ensure that he does not feel the need to press his amendment today, on the basis that the principle is accepted, and we need to work to see that better.

That concludes my comments, at this stage, on the first group of amendments.

Mr Ross (The Chairperson of the Committee for Justice): Just before addressing the amendments, with your indulgence, Mr Speaker, I will make some more general comments about the Committee's approach during Committee Stage. First of all, I will say that it is perhaps unfortunate that, I suspect, today's media coverage of this Bill will centre on the group 5 amendments. It is disappointing because of the considerable work that members of the Committee, departmental officials and other stakeholders have put into the Bill to try to make reforms that will make a real difference. There is a lot of good stuff in the Bill that, unfortunately, will be lost in the media coverage today.

Nevertheless, the Committee supports the Bill and, in particular, the improvements it seeks to make to the current arrangements for the collection and enforcement of financial penalties, which are clearly not working and are creating excessive costs across the criminal justice system. The Committee welcomes the improvements that are anticipated by the Department, which include an increase in the current level of payment rates from 70% to closer to 80%, savings in police resources, which can be focused on other priorities, and a reduction in the committal rate to prison due to the non-payment of fines, with the resultant cost savings, assuming that the Bill completes its legislative journey and the new fine collection and enforcement arrangements are, indeed, implemented.

11.15 am

As well as the main clauses and a wide range of related amendments, the Committee considered proposals for a range of new provisions that are unrelated to the areas covered in the Bill. Those included proposals by the Department for changes to firearms legislation relating to fees; a new banded system to enable firearms dealers to exchange a firearm for a licence holder; the age of young shooters; proposals by the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development to increase the statutory maximum penalties for a range of animal cruelty offences under the Welfare of Animals Act (Northern Ireland) 2011; and a proposal originally made by Lord Morrow to enhance protection for the emergency services by covering attacks on front-line ambulance staff who are responding to emergencies. That proposal is similar to that for attacks on police officers and that is already on the statute books. The Committee also considered possible legislative changes to improve online protection for children following issues that were raised during its successful conference on justice in a digital age in October 2015, and a new offence that we are proposing on what is commonly referred to as revenge porn.

Given the various policy areas that are covered by the Bill and the proposed amendments, the Committee spent some time undertaking detailed scrutiny and sought a wide range of views to assist its deliberations. Written evidence was sought from interested organisations and individuals, as well as from the Department of Justice, the Department of Health, the Public Prosecution Service and the PSNI. The Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development and the Committee for Social Development also assisted the Committee in considering proposals specific to their respective Departments. The Committee received 21 written submissions, took oral evidence from a range of organisations, as well as officials from the DOJ and the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development, and commissioned several research papers to assist its consideration of Part 1 of the Bill, which covers a new fine collection and enforcement system and possible legislative changes to improve online protection.

I thank the members of the Committee for their contributions to the discussion on and consideration of the Bill during the Committee Stage. I think that the detail in the Committee report demonstrates that we considered all aspects of the Bill and the range of proposed amendments in a full and thorough manner. I also thank all the organisations and individuals that provided very useful written and oral evidence and the departmental officials who provided additional information and clarification throughout the process.

Looking at the fine enforcement and collection element in Part 1 of the Bill and the related amendments that the Minister outlined in his speech, they will create an entirely new regime for the collection and enforcement of financial penalties. It has been clear for some considerable time, as I mentioned, that the current fine system is not fit for purpose.

A judgement delivered by the divisional court in March 2013 in five judicial reviews relating to the arrangements for imposing and enforcing fines and other monetary penalties in Northern Ireland ruled that the long-established practice for dealing with non-payment of fines and other monetary penalties was unlawful and that a fine defaulter must be brought back to court for a further default hearing before any penalty for default could be imposed. As a result, revised arrangements had to be adopted to address those defects.

Subsequently, a Public Accounts Committee report published in January 2015 on the Northern Ireland Courts and Tribunals Service trust statement for the year ending March 2013 outlined that the value of unpaid financial penalties was significant and that the Comptroller and Auditor General raised concerns about the fine collection and enforcement measures and the system for dealing with fine defaulters. The PAC found that, despite the significant levels of outstanding debt, the Department of Justice had failed to coordinate a joined-up approach to fine collection, and, as a result, governance arrangements were unacceptable. That had contributed to a number of failings, including 6,682 paper warrants with a value of £1.1 million going missing, as well as suspected fraud.

Figures provided by the Department to the Committee in early 2015 indicated that the total outstanding debt at 31 March 2014 was £22.684 million, of which it was estimated that £7.335 million was impaired and unlikely to be collected. The costs associated with enforcing the current system are also significant, as it takes up substantial police time and results in a large number of very short terms of imprisonment, with the associated costs to the Prison Service and, ultimately, of course, the taxpayer. In these times of financial constraint, those are wasted funds that could be put to very good use, and it is unacceptable. It was therefore within that context and recognising the need to address the ongoing issues in the current system as soon as possible that the Justice Committee considered Part 1 of the Bill and associated amendments that it had sight of during the Committee Stage.

Prior to the commencement of the Committee Stage of the Bill, the Department advised the Committee of its intention to bring forward amendment Nos 1, 22 and 30, which will improve information access and sharing in the fine collection process, and amendment Nos 10, 15, 16, 17 and 18, which will provide a police power of arrest in circumstances of non-attendance at fine default hearings. That enabled the Committee to seek views on both proposals when requesting evidence on the Bill's provisions.

The Committee accepts the need for collection officers to have access to relevant employment, earnings or benefits information in certain circumstances to enable the fine enforcement and collection system to operate as envisaged. It was noted that the Department for Social Development was working with the Department of Justice to agree the level of access required to benefits information. An individual assessment will be carried out in each case, and it will be an offence for a person to whom the information has been disclosed to disclose it to another person or to use it for another purpose. The Committee agreed that it was content with the information access and sharing amendments.

The Committee is also content to support amendment Nos 10, 15, 16, 17 and 18, which will enable the police to arrest offenders whom they know to be in default, if they encounter them and either bring them to court forthwith or bail them for a future default hearing appearance. The original proposal has been amended so that it does not include a PSNI power of entry and search for such arrests. The amendments before us today are now a proportionate approach to dealing with those who may seek to ignore a call back to court.

During Committee Stage, the Department also provided information on and the text of other amendments to Part 1, and those are before the Assembly for consideration today. Most of them are minor and correct or improve the drafting of the Bill. Others, such as amendment No 19, which creates a power for the recovery of the fee for the cost of personal service by a summons server from the defaulter in appropriate circumstances in which the postal service is unsuccessful, amendment No 33, which ensures that a supervised activity order cannot be considered as an option in default of a confiscation order, and amendment No 79, which provides for prosecutorial fines created as a result of the Justice Act 2015 to be treated in the same way as the fixed penalties and penalty notices already included in schedule 2, make more substantive but necessary changes to ensure that the future fine enforcement and collection regime operates as intended.

I turn to amendment Nos 3, 20, 24 and 25, tabled by Mr McCartney and his colleagues. The written and oral evidence that the Committee received was supportive of the primary aims of the provisions to improve the fine collection system, particularly the move to a more civilian-based collection service, which will free up police resources so that they can focus on more strategic priorities, benefiting communities and the general public. Some issues were raised on the options available to secure the payment of fines through deductions from benefits, attachment of earnings orders, interim bank account orders and bank account orders and, in particular, on the potential impact on the families and dependants of fine defaulters.

When discussing with the Committee how deductions from benefits would operate in practice and the safeguards in place to ensure that dependants were not adversely impacted on, departmental officials said that the collection officer would request information on a debtor's financial circumstances by way of a means enquiry form, and that will cover income, outgoings and dependants. Deductions from benefits will be operated by the Department for Social Development under its existing third-party deduction scheme, which includes safeguards to protect the vulnerable and an appeal system through the social security appeals tribunal. The Department for Social Development controls include a limit on the number of deductions that can be in place and a maximum amount of 15% of the benefit being deducted at any one time. The collection of a fine will also sit sixth on the priority list for collection so that housing or fuel arrears and so on will be collected first and essential living expenses protected. The Department also said that deductions for fine payment would be restricted to income support, jobseeker's allowance, state pension credit and employment and support allowance and that benefits such as disability benefits, carer benefits, child benefit, child tax credit payments and other benefits provided to the vulnerable could not be accessed for the purpose of recovering a fine.

On interim bank account orders, the Department stated that they would freeze only the amount of the fine, and a requirement to notify the debtor of the possibility of an interim bank account order will be covered in regulations and guidance. A bank account order can be made only at a judicial hearing, and both interim and bank account orders will be made only for bank accounts held solely in the debtor's name. Joint bank accounts will not be frozen or accessible. The option for the debtor to make an application for a hardship payment will also be included in correspondence sent from the collection officer to the debtor.

The Committee, noting the safeguards in place, agreed that it was content with the provisions relating to deductions from benefits, attachment of earnings orders, interim bank account orders and bank account orders as drafted. The Deputy Chairman of the Committee, however, expressed reservations about the wider impact of the provisions and indicated that he and his colleagues would seek further assurances and commitments from the Minister today regarding safeguarding and protecting families, dependants and vulnerable people. While Mr McCartney will, no doubt, outline in detail the rationale for his amendments, it appears that they are a belt-and-braces approach to ensure that children and adult dependants of fine defaulters are not adversely affected by the fine enforcement methods adopted. I understand the rationale for the amendments and have sympathy for the motivation behind them, but, hopefully, the assurances that have been provided by the Minister today will reassure Mr McCartney and his colleagues.

I move on to the provisions and amendments relating to vehicle seizure orders. The Committee sought the advice of the Examiner of Statutory Rules regarding the range of powers in the Bill to make subordinate legislation. The Examiner drew the Committee's attention to the regulation-making powers in clause 18 and indicated that subsection (6)(b) was either intended to cover a matter of substance and import, in which case it should be fully set out in the Bill, or it should simply be left to the discretion of the court by omitting the regulation power from the Bill entirely. The Committee referred the matter to the Department for consideration, and amendment Nos 26 and 27 now provide for the issues that a court should take into account before making a vehicle seizure order to be included in the Bill. They include a recommendation from the Human Rights Commission that account should be taken of the impact of a vehicle seizure order on an individual's employment to ensure that an individual is not deprived of their source of income in order to comply with the right to work and an individual's right to employment and protection of income. The Committee is content with that approach and supports the amendments. Indeed, it would be somewhat self-defeating if we were to impede a person's ability to get to work.

Having noted that regulations will be made and detailed guidance provided in relation to vehicle seizure orders that will set out the built-in protections for vulnerable people and having received clarification from the Department of how the scheme will operate to ensure that the cost of it does not exceed the value of the seizure, the Committee agreed that it was content to support the provisions in the Bill and amendment No 8, which ensures that a vehicle seizure order will be made only if the value of the vehicle, if sold, will discharge the sum owed, including the likely charges and costs of the sale. Again, the Deputy Chairman expressed some reservations about the possible impact of vehicle seizure orders on families and dependants. I note that he has tabled amendment No 9 today, which seeks to ensure that this protection exists.

Finally, I want to outline the amendments that have been tabled by the Committee and the rationale for them. The Bill provides for the imposition of a supervised activity order that will require an individual to complete activities tailored to their needs and based on a personal assessment carried out by the probation service. The introductory sessions will include citizenship and money management modules. To assist in its consideration of Part 1 of the Justice (No. 2) Bill, the Committee commissioned research on fine collection and enforcement systems in other jurisdictions, including England and Wales, Scotland, the Irish Republic, Australia and New Zealand. That research highlighted that, in New South Wales in Australia, a pilot project that allowed certain disadvantaged people to clear their fine by undertaking unpaid work, courses or treatment for drug or alcohol addiction or mental health problems with the support of an approved organisation or registered health practitioner had provided an effective response to the offending behaviour. An evaluation of that pilot project by the Attorney General and the Department of Justice found that the scheme had helped to reduce reoffending in the fine enforcement system and secondary offending in the broader criminal justice system. It also engaged the individuals in appropriate treatment or activities such as mental health, drug or alcohol treatment that they might not have otherwise engaged in. The Department, therefore, recommended that the scheme should be rolled out across that jurisdiction.

Given the positive outcomes of that scheme, the Committee raised with the Department the possibility of extending the powers of the court to enable suitable offenders in Northern Ireland to be required to satisfy a fine by undertaking appropriate courses to address offending behaviour such as treatment for drug or alcohol addiction or mental health treatment as an alternative to supervised activity orders. While the Department indicated that it envisaged some difficulties with mandatory health solutions at that level of disposal, it undertook to consider the matter further. It subsequently advised the Committee that, while the court may include requirements on treatment for drug or alcohol dependency or for a mental health condition in community-based sentences, the imposition of a fine is a pecuniary penalty and is not designed to have a rehabilitative aspect, as the Minister has outlined.

The Department stated that the arrangements in New South Wales were unique in the sense that they can engage persons who are suffering from mental health, or drug or alcohol addiction problems, in certain courses or treatments as a means of satisfying the fine, which is not an aspect associated with fine enforcement arrangements in Great Britain or the Republic of Ireland. The Department was of the view that considerable policy development would be required to evaluate the merits of this approach and identify any resource implications. While this would not be possible within the timescale of the Justice (No.2) Bill, the Department stated, as the Minister reaffirmed today, that it would be happy, in principle, to consider the proposal in more detail. It stated that it was willing to give an undertaking to do so and work with a view to potentially enhancing the fine collection arrangements at some point in the future.

11.30 am

The Committee believes that requiring offenders, in suitable circumstances, to satisfy a fine by undertaking appropriate courses or treatment to address the causes of offending behaviour such as drug or alcohol addiction, or mental health problems, is helpful to the Department's stated aim of addressing offending behaviour and preventing reoffending. It also represents a form of the problem-solving model of justice, which aims to address the root causes of the offending behaviour rather than just punishing the crime, a model proven to assist in reducing reoffending and the associated costs to the justice system. It is one of the areas, as the Minister said, that the Committee examined during the innovation seminars that it held. Indeed, a representative from the Centre for Justice Innovation in London came over to talk about problem-solving in justice and how it would work by reducing the cost to the taxpayer and, crucially, improving outcomes for communities, victims and those who come into contact with the criminal justice system.

Mr Douglas: I thank the Member for giving way. He mentioned the justice innovation seminars, and I think that all agree that they were excellent and one of the best decisions taken by the Justice Committee. Is it realistic to look at implementing the policy suggestions and recommendations in the next mandate?

Mr Ross: I think so. We have tried to look at examples happening elsewhere in the world that have realistic potential to be implemented in Northern Ireland. I listened to the Minister's comments, and I agree with what he said about many of the issues requiring cross-departmental support, particularly if we are getting to a point at which we believe that not all offenders need a criminal justice outcome. If, for example, and I made the point about this case in particular, an offender has a history of mental health issues, alcohol dependency or drug addiction, perhaps a health-based outcome or response is more appropriate in those circumstances. Mr Maginness, Mr Kennedy and I looked at that kind of system in operation in Brooklyn, where it gets support not only from across the political spectrum, republicans and democrats, but from the New York Police Department, the governor's office and the office of the district attorney. The reason for that is that it works. It works because it reduces reoffending and is improving outcomes in the system. It also reduces costs because it prevents people being sent to prison for short sentences.

Mr A Maginness: I thank the Chair for giving way. On foot of the Member's point, it was, indeed, a very interesting and successful visit to Brooklyn in New York, where the problem-solving approaches were being successfully undertaken, and we could learn an awful lot from that. It is true to say that even the likes of Donald Trump would support this type of approach. The Chair has raised an important issue. I note what the Minister said previously, but it is very important that we pursue this and pursue it vigorously.

Mr Ross: I thank the Member for that, and, of course, he is right in saying that Donald Trump is a supporter of this. For anybody with an interest in the current debates in the United States, whether on the Republican or Democrat side, the interesting thing is that everybody is talking about justice reform. When people talk about justice reform, they all talk about exactly the same thing: introducing problem-solving models into justice. That means that, rather than seeing justice as something that sits on its own somewhere, it becomes much more aligned and intertwined with healthcare and education systems, as the Minister said.

Justice systems right across the world are now looking at early intervention in education and appropriate medical intervention for offenders who have other addictions that are the underlying cause of offending. The US — in New York and Miami in the 1980s and 1990s — has undoubtedly been a pioneer in this area. Some of the judges whom we met — Judge Calabrese and Judge Ferdinand — were pioneers of this sort of work. It is working, and I note that, at Westminster, Justice Secretary Michael Gove is particularly interested in this, and I listened to some of the Prime Minister's comments in recent days as well. Momentum seems to be gathering, even here in the United Kingdom, to move towards that model of justice.

I listened to the Minister's assurance that the Department is keen to work on this. I hope that he is keen and that the Department, whoever the Minister is come May, is true to that and that we will see progress on this early in the next mandate. If that is the case, the Committee is agreed that it will not move amendment Nos 11, 12, 13 and 14 at this stage. I hope that, whoever the Committee Chair is come May, the Committee will also continue with this work and continue to press the Department. It is a valuable area that the justice system needs to go into, and it can improve outcomes.

On that basis, I conclude my remarks on the group 1 amendments. I will not be moving the amendments tabled in the Committee's name.

Mr Lynch: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I will speak on behalf of my party on the group 1 amendments. I thank all those who gave evidence to the Committee on behalf of organisations and the Department, and I also thank the Minister.

As the Chair said, there is good stuff in the Bill, and we broadly support its principles, but we have a number of concerns. I want to outline our firm belief that defaulting on a fine imposed for a minor or civic matter should not result in imprisonment if it can be avoided. We want a robust system to be put in place to protect the most vulnerable, because it is often the most vulnerable people who find themselves in custody as a result of a fine default. There are alternatives to custody, and, indeed, fine defaulters going to prison are often costly to the public and the criminal justice system, as the Chair outlined. Again, it is often the most vulnerable who end up in custody. We must realise the impact on families of imposing fines. We support the main thrust of the Department's intention to seek alternatives to sending people to prison for fine defaults.

Some 14,300 prison sentences have been given for fine default since the beginning of 2006. Non-payment of fines for not having a television licence resulted in 728 people receiving a custodial sentence. As the CEO of NIACRO stated, it is simply not a proportional response to this type of offence. Those people do not pose a threat to public safety and have not committed what could be termed a serious offence. The number of people going into custody for non-payment of fines is not sustainable and is at odds with a fairer justice system. Fine defaulters have made up one third of the prison population here. Clearly, change is needed and, indeed —

Mr Ford: Will the Member give way?

Mr Lynch: Yes.

Mr Ford: On a point of accuracy: at times, fine defaulters may have involved one third of admissions, but, given the relatively short time that they spend in custody, they have never been one third of the prison population.

Mr Lynch: Thank you. I accept the Minister's clarification. We welcome the Bill in the context of the numbers going to prison, but, as I said, we have concerns. The Bill contains proposals to recover fines by deducting moneys from benefit payments through a number of orders and the seizure of vehicles. We have proposed a number of amendments to ensure that family members and dependants are not unfairly impacted by that process. It must be understood that benefits are provided to give a minimum standard of living to families. Benefits are often the bottom line for many families. Without robust protection, these measures could result in further financial burden and distress for family members. Any deduction from an already low income may exacerbate the situation.

Mr Barry McMullan from NIACRO gave evidence at Committee Stage, and he said that people default on fines because they do not have the money. If you are a single person in receipt of £73 a week in jobseeker's allowance, it would be ridiculous for a court to impose a £300 fine and expect the person to pay it within 28 days.

As we all know, the person will often take the option of going to prison for a few days, at a heavy cost to the public and the criminal justice system. I acknowledge that the numbers going to prison have already decreased and are now down to a couple of hundred.

This brings me to our amendments. I want to acknowledge the Minister's letter of clarification. Indeed, he has reaffirmed it this morning with regard to amendment No 2 to clause 2. I accept the Minister's intentions. However, not all future Ministers in the Department may have the same intent. If, for example, a profit margin were to be realised in the future, a Minister might legislate to outsource to a private company. We cannot go on the assurance from the current Minister, even though I believe in his sincerity.

We ask for support for amendment No 3 to clause 4. The court is in a better place to make the decision than the debtor concerned. People who may have issues with budgeting and finance may not be in a frame of mind to make this kind of decision, which could have an impact on their dependants. They could be vulnerable or have substance abuse issues. Their desire to pay may not reflect their capacity to pay. The consent people give may not be informed consent.

We will not move amendments Nos 9 and 28 to clauses 6 and 18, respectively, on the basis that the Minister, following advice from the Human Rights Commission, will bring forward amendments to these provisions at Further Consideration Stage.

The Minister referred to clause 11, on regulations that may be made by DSD, in connection with clause 10. As yet, we have not seen these regulations. Basically, the Minister is asking us to take it in good faith that they will be fit for purpose. I ask the House to support our amendment.

The Minister's comments on clause 15 do not resolve the issue for us. As I said earlier, the total outstanding fine may not differ much from the debtor's total balance.

We argue that our amendment to clause 17 is needed to introduce consistency.

Just to finish, we are not moving amendment Nos 9 and 28 and ask for support on amendment Nos 2, 3 and the others.

Mr A Maginness: In group 1, there are two sets of amendments, one brought by Sinn Féin and the other by the Committee. I think that the Committee amendments are very appropriate and timely. They highlight the need, which the Chair has led on vigorously, in and out of Committee, to develop a new strategy for offending, a strategy that involves problem-solving, where you take the individual not simply isolated in the criminal justice system but at large in society. That is an innovative approach. It is to be welcomed, and we have to do more work on it. The Minister has properly recognised that and that it is probably the direction in which the Department will go.

The Committee has been very supportive of the approach. These amendments reflect the Committee's consensual thinking on problem-solving. Let us take, in particular, those who are addicted to drugs or are alcohol dependent. It is very important that we look at them and see how we can help them. How can we rehabilitate those unfortunate enough to have these dependencies? Therefore, this has been a very valuable exercise. I understand that the Chair, having been reassured by the Minister that the Department will do further work on this, will not move these amendments. I think that that reflects the view of the Committee. The Committee sought to try to push the Department, so this has been a worthwhile exercise. I think that most Committee members are in agreement with that. My party and I certainly are.

The visit to the United States, in particular to Brooklyn, to try to see and understand the actuality of how another jurisdiction deals with these issues was a very worthwhile undertaking. Of course, we look at the American criminal justice system and see it as heavily punitive, and, of course, it has been. I do not know how many millions there are in prison in the United States, but certainly it is a very substantial number of people. With those pressures and the expense and so forth, people in the United States are looking for a different approach and solution to criminality. Therefore, the United States is now innovative in its approach to criminal justice. I do not want to go on any further; it is probably more appropriate simply to highlight the issues that have been raised by the Committee under the imaginative chairmanship of Mr Ross.

The amendments brought by Sinn Féin are worthy amendments. I would call them belt-and-braces amendments, because the Minister has included within the Bill safeguards in relation to fine defaulters to protect their families and dependants and so forth. I understand what the Minister said about the safeguards in the Bill, as it currently is, being sufficient protection. However, if we are serious about protecting people and the dependants and families of those who are affected, I think that it is helpful that we write those protections into law more clearly. That is, in essence, what the Sinn Féin amendments are attempting to do and, therefore, my party and I support them. I understand the Minister's assurance that collection officers will be civil servants and that he has no intention of outsourcing the collection process and having private companies as collection officers carrying out that process. However, I am not content with that, because I think that it should be in law. Of course, there will be regulations in relation to the collection officers, and those regulations will be governed by what we put into statute.

Mr Ford: I appreciate the Member's giving way. Clause 2(1) says:

"The Department of Justice may designate civil servants in the Department to be collection officers".

So it is not merely a matter of whether a future wicked right-wing Minister, unlike the good liberal Justice Minister that we have at present, changes the regs. It would be the Assembly —

Mr A Maginness: Are you delusional?

Mr Ford: I was merely quoting Mr Lynch, more or less. [Laughter.]

This is primary legislation, which can be changed only by the will of the Assembly to move away from collection officers being civil servants in the Department. Therefore, there is no prospect of that change happening without the will of the Assembly changing. I suspect that the Members sitting to my right in the Chamber imagine that they would have a veto over such changes and, indeed, those sitting behind me would also wish to oppose such changes.

Mr A Maginness: I understand what the Minister has said, but clause 2(1) states:

"The Department of Justice may designate civil servants in the Department to be collection officers for the purposes of this Chapter".

It does not mandate; it does not say "shall". This is the problem when we try to develop law and bring about good legislation: sometimes, we are not zealous enough in writing in protections.

Mr Ford: Will the Member give way?

Mr A Maginness: Yes indeed.

Mr Ford: I will try not to be like a jack-in-the-box. Whilst the provision says that the Department "may designate civil servants", there is no provision for anybody other than a civil servant to be designated.

Mr A Maginness: I understand that point, too. I accept the Minister's assurance that, if he were to become Minister again, he certainly would not outsource collection officers, but another Minister might say, "Well, I'm going to save some money here. I'll outsource". Therefore, civil servants would be replaced by private companies. That is a real possibility under the Bill as drafted.

Mr McCartney: Will the Member give way?

Mr A Maginness: Yes.

Mr McCartney: As a general principle, when any Minister, be they liberal or otherwise, says that something is not necessary, there is no cost to put it into legislation. That is the general principle. The Minister might be right, but if you write it into legislation very clearly that this cannot be outsourced, it is clear and unequivocal.

Mr A Maginness: Mr McCartney has very succinctly described what I was attempting to explain, so I will not deliberate any further, save to say that we will support Sinn Féin on that aspect of things. We have great sympathy with Sinn Féin in relation to the other amendments. It is a belt-and-braces exercise, but, in the circumstances, it is necessary to give those protections and reassurance to the public.

This is a good section of the Bill. It deals with fine defaulters, which has been a constant problem. It was highlighted by the Public Accounts Committee and others, particularly the Prison Service, whose resources are stretched because it has to accommodate fine defaulters. Quite frankly, sending fine defaulters to prison is an archaic way of dealing with them. It is a waste of public resources. We fully support the intention of the Department and the Minister in relation to this part of the Bill and welcome, in general terms, the provisions.

Mr Kennedy: I am pleased to have the opportunity to address issues in the Bill. I am a fairly recent new member of the Justice Committee.

This is worthwhile and important legislation, but I share the view expressed by the Chairman: much of the very good legislation that we are scrutinising today will be lost in later debates on more emotional/controversial issues. Nevertheless, I pay tribute to the work of the Minister and his Department, the Chair and members of the Committee and the Clerk and those who service the Committee and provide essential advice.

Other Members have covered the issues in some detail. We have even seen a degree of political movement here today, which is no bad thing of course from a liberal Justice Minister. [Laughter.] The group 1 amendments look at the arrangements for the collection and enforcement of financial penalties. It is clear that work is required in that area, given the considerable financial cost involved. There is much importance attached to trying to improve a system that is in clear need of reform.

On amendment No 2 and Sinn Féin's concern about the private outsourcing of collection, I have listened closely, as other Members have, to the Minister's comments. I am satisfied that he has given a clear commitment that there will be no privatisation or outsourcing on his watch. I understand the points made by Mr Lynch and Mr Maginness, but in the legislation it is clear who the collection officers should be, and that will remain the case for the foreseeable future.

On the Sinn Féin amendments concerning the impact on the dependants of a debtor should benefits be deducted, my party is not persuaded that they are necessary. There are sufficient protections built in that cover a range of criminal justice matters, so we are not inclined to support the amendments tabled by Sinn Féin in that area.

The Chair of the Committee set out very accurately the original intention of amendment Nos 11 to 14, which is to address reoffending by satisfying the debt of a debtor who has a drug or alcohol addiction and agrees to a programme of counselling. I join with what others have said on that, particularly the Chair and Mr Maginness. I was part of the visit to the Brooklyn area of New York and saw at first hand the very innovative and creative work being done to address relatively low-level crime being committed in conjunction with drug and drink addictions. There is much that we can learn from the work that is happening there and in other places. I know that the Chair is particularly interested in that. I welcome very much the fact that the Minister has indicated that that is something that the Department will want to carry forward in the new mandate. Simply, there has to be a better way of dealing with people who find themselves, for whatever reason, in a situation where relatively low-level criminal behaviour is taking place to satisfy either a drug or drink addiction. That can be better addressed by government and other agencies working together with the Criminal Justice Agency.

So I hope very much that the clear signal has been sent to the Department, whoever is the Minister, that that is what the direction of travel should be.

12.00 noon

Amendment No 22 was tabled by the Minister. It relates to the disclosure of social security information. I am happy to support amendment No 22 and amendment No 27. They are sensible changes and improvements to the current legislation.

As the debate progresses, and as we move through the various stages, I hope that we will see the level of consensus shown in the work of the Committee as it scrutinised that of the Minister and his Department. That was very welcome. It is an example of the Committee working well with the Department and the Minister to the benefit and improvement of legislation that needs to be in place.

Mr Dickson: I thank the Minister for bringing forward this legislation and for the way in which he and departmental officials worked with the Committee to do that, and I place on record my thanks to the Chair of the Committee and my Committee colleagues for the way in which we have worked in respect of this matter. These are very complex and difficult areas of the law for each and every one of us to work with, and we have taken a very businesslike approach to it. As others have said, and I concur, the Chair has been innovative in the way in which we have done our business. That was welcome; indeed, it is potentially a model for other Committees to look at for how they do business. It may well be an important legacy that the Chair leaves to the Assembly in respect of these matters.

Most of the amendments in group 1 are of a technical nature and seek to tidy up the Bill in certain areas. So I do not think that it is necessary to talk for particularly long about this group, as others have said. Many of the amendments are in direct response to the consultation with the Committee and from the very good communications and working relationships that, as I have said, existed between the Committee and the departmental officials. Again, I place on record my thanks to our Committee officials who worked tirelessly and very long hours to help us in the production of reports and the procurement of witnesses. They do so in all the activities that they undertake, not only those in respect of this Bill. As we come to the end of the mandate, it is vital that we place on record a word of sincere thanks to Committee officials and departmental officials for the work that they have done.

Amendment No 7 ensures that the seizure of property must make a return to meet the debts of an individual. That is a sensible approach. I particularly welcome amendment No 27, which requires the court to consider whether the seizure of a person's vehicle may disproportionately impact upon the debtor's ability to earn a living. There is not much point in taking away your car, van or some other vehicle, if it is your only means of doing your work. The justice system must always look forwards to rehabilitating offenders. Making it more difficult for debtors to earn a living would clearly be counterproductive, so that is a welcome change. In addition, the aim of the police being given the power to arrest someone who has failed to attend a default hearing is to improve attendance rates at such hearings, and amendment No 19 will help ensure the recovery of costs of hearings. We have heard some of the figures in the Chamber today. In economically difficult times, it is only appropriate that the Department recovers the cost of such administration, whether that be a small amount or a large amount, because it all adds up.

Information sharing is another area that was referred to this morning. I believe that it will be greatly facilitated by the passage of the Bill, particularly between DSD and collection officers. That is the most appropriate means of collection, whether officials can ascertain the information. I welcome the Minister's announcement that the DOJ intends to bring forward provision to also allow information sharing with HMRC.

I will move on to the amendments that have been proposed by Mr McCartney and Sinn Féin. There is a great deal of interest in them. Indeed, at first glance, they might appear to be perfectly sensible. However, in reality, I do not believe they are applicable to the Bill. I understand the Members' concerns about outsourcing collection, but I genuinely do not believe that, as the Minister stated, the employment to do so would be by anybody other than civil servants. I think the Bill, in designating the Civil Service and Department to be collection officers, makes that very clear. Therefore, I do not think that it is necessary to make the changes that are proposed in amendment Nos 2 and 3.

The remaining Sinn Féin amendments are, again in my opinion, unnecessary, although, again, I understand the concern regarding dependants of claimants who may have benefits deducted or assets seized. There is also provision to avoid such conflicts of interest. For one, benefits may be deducted in the first instance only if the claimant directly agrees, as set out in clause 4. In the end, the court already needs to consider the ability of the debtor to continue their lives and not to be disproportionately affected by deductions, which, as the Chair stated, are maximised at 15%. I would very much expect dependants to be considered an unavoidable living expense.

Moving on to the amendments that were proposed but not moved by the Chair of the Committee for Justice, I welcome the Minister's openness in pursuing, as ever, innovative means of rehabilitation in the justice system. I welcome the comments that Members brought back from the visit that they made to look at those, but it is not just in the criminal justice sector where there are innovative ways to improve and streamline justice. Coming as I do from a background in employment law, I think it is important that alternative dispute resolution is available across the spectrum. Obviously, on the civil side, I think that there are immense savings to be made through those areas of innovation. I have absolutely no doubt that our current Minister is innovative, forward-thinking and very content to look at, examine and, where appropriate, bring forward many of those alternative ways to deal with the criminal and civil justice systems through innovation and rehabilitation.

I welcome the Department's amendments, as well as their intention, which is to tidy up the Bill, and the response to comments that were made by the Committee, which has helped us to get on with the job of reforming this important part of our justice system. I do not believe that anything should be lost in today's debate in commending the work of the Committee, the Department and the Minister, who is delivering justice for everyone.

Mr Ford: I was not sure that I was quite accurate, but clearly I was prescient when I started off my remarks by referring to the significant agreement on the measures that were introduced by the Department — at least, in this group of amendments — and the acceptance that there had been in the Committee of the amendments that were put forward by me to tidy up matters, particularly as they were raised during Committee discussions. It is very noticeable that hardly anything was said about the substance of the original proposals or the amendments that came forward to them from the Department. It is clear that that reflects the good work that was done by my officials, before they got to Committee Stage and in conjunction with the Committee and its officials. I really do not think there is anything that needs to be said in response to add to what the Chair and I said at the start of the debate.

There is clearly a very significant issue in the amendments that were outlined by Mr Ross and the very specific support for the concept of problem-solving and finding different ways of courts operating.

I certainly welcome the support that came from all sides of the Chamber.

It was noticeable in particular that Messrs Ross, Maginness and Kennedy all took the opportunity to tell us how impressed they were by their trip to Red Hook community court in Brooklyn. I am afraid that I will have to upstage them slightly and say that, three years ago, I had the opportunity to sit in Red Hook community court and speak to some of the staff there. I also visited the Midtown Community Court in Manhattan and, indeed, the court in Washington DC, and I saw similar work being done in all three. Given the snow that was around at the time that the three representatives of the Committee visited, if they had gone to Washington, they might never have got back, so it is probably as well that they did not. The most fascinating bit for me was that I had the opportunity to sit on the bench in Manhattan. I am not sure what court rules on allowing strangers to sit on the bench are like in New York, but I sat beside the judge as the judge dealt with a string of relatively minor offenders and did detailed case management. That was supporting the work being done by others — the equivalent of our probation service — who were managing the day-to-day work with offenders through a regular review and by ensuring that matters were not left to go wrong. That is an excellent example of how judicial case management can add significantly to work being done and how problem-solving has a part to play.

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way. I am slightly intrigued to know why, if he was there three years before us, he did not bring forward some of the ideas and put them into action sooner, given that we now have to wait for a new mandate.

Mr Ford: Nice try. I appreciate the point that the Member makes. The reality is that work has been ongoing in the Department of Justice and, indeed, by some of our partners across the justice system. I suspect that there may well be announcements in the fairly near future, including some that are based on discussions that I had with one of the justice agencies last week on that point. If you can calm your exuberance a little, Mr Kennedy, we may be able to show something moving on. It is not easy to reform the system in that direction. It requires considerable input from the judiciary, from a variety of agencies and from the management of the Courts and Tribunals Service, and it costs money to make some of the changes. I absolutely accept the Chair's point that we need to look at the practical effect of reducing reoffending to save costs in the future. That is why we are seeking to make that innovation.

I also had a conversation a couple of years ago with a district judge from inner London who is responsible for family courts there. The judge was specifically developing a problem-solving model to look at the needs of those with alcohol and drug dependencies in the context of the family courts. That is a massive challenge that includes significant input from people on the health and social care side as well from those in the justice system.

Mr Douglas: I thank the Minister for giving way. I would also like to talk about my travels and what I have learnt over the past year. The furthest that I got was Magilligan, where I went to look at some of the issues. On a serious note and given what my colleague Danny Kennedy has said, are any of the issues that you looked at three years ago linked to what we are doing at the moment with the justice innovation seminars?

Mr Ford: I appreciate Mr Douglas's point. The reality is that there are a variety of approaches in many areas of the justice system that build on broadly similar concepts that are applied slightly differently in different places. It is a bit like some of the early intervention work that is done by a number of agencies with young people who are in danger of getting involved in the justice system. In one month, I remember seeing three projects in three different areas of Northern Ireland run by three different organisations. They were all built on the concept of establishing personal relationships, and that was what was helping young people. In the same way, there is almost an element of a personal relationship with the judge in the case management of some of the processes, and that is very significant. We have examples that are being developed, but it is not always easy to get them done. That work is being done in the Department and with partners across the justice system.

12.15 pm

In this Building and in this Chamber, we may be fixated on the end of a mandate and a new mandate, but I assure Members that those who work in the Department of Justice will not be fixated on the mandate; indeed, when the Assembly ceases its present term, they will have six weeks entirely free of us to get on with necessary policy work without interruption by questions, Assembly debates and all kinds of things. I trust that whoever is sitting in the Department of Justice and on the Committee for Justice will see that a lot of good work has been done. The key issue for the next mandate —

Mr Ross: I thank the Minister for giving way. We asked him in Committee last week what were his big ideas in making a pitch to the Executive for the next Programme for Government or Budget arrangements. If a lot of preparatory work has been ongoing for the next Programme for Government, is he suggesting that, in that Programme for Government, there should be a problem-solving approach and that Health and Justice will come together to fund that model to improve outcomes for offenders?

Mr Ford: I never cease to be amazed by the ability of some Members to read my scribbles from across the Chamber, but Mr Ross is absolutely right on that point. I cannot give a commitment on what will be in the Programme for Government, particularly when it is an issue of joining up matters, but I highlighted in my opening remarks the work that was being done in the context of the OECD report. It is absolutely clear that that is not a Justice-alone issue; it is an issue that requires joining up.

If we are to have an Executive who will function in a better joined-up way, it will be necessary to look at some of the early intervention work and ensure that we use the opportunity presented by a difficult budgetary situation to build partnerships and find better ways of joining up so that we get the outputs that we need and recognise the benefits that one Department's work can achieve for another. There are real opportunities, but, if anyone in the Chamber at the moment is representing their party in the discussions on the Programme for Government that will take place after the election, I hope that they bear in mind Alastair Ross's words about the need to make specific improvements in how things move forward. I will give way.

Mr Dickson: Continuing, Minister, on the theme of how you deal with drug and alcohol courts in particular and delivering services quickly, it is all about the joined-up nature of it. While I listened with great interest to the experience in New York, it seems that, in other parts of the United States — I have some experience of this — the need for swift justice and the need to assist the person with the issue quickly are important and are recognised. However, if the services that the person is being sent to get are not there, this is just an exercise in sweeping the problem under the carpet. The situation in many states in the United States is no different from here in that mental health and alcohol and drug rehabilitation services are stretched, sometimes more stretched than ours. There is a genuine need in any future Programme for Government to require not just that the Department of Justice delivers at the front end but that, much more importantly, the Health Department delivers at what is, essentially, not the back end but the most important element of this.

Mr Ford: I appreciate the point, although I am a little cautious about giving a commitment on behalf of the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety. We have seen examples, specifically in the listing of domestic violence cases at Londonderry court, where the district judge has made listing arrangements in such a way as to ensure that support services are available. There are clearly issues in how perpetrators are referred to appropriate programmes as well as in how victims are referred to the support provided by groups like Women's Aid. Those are key issues to ensure that we get a joined-up approach, but, at this stage, those are for the Department of Justice and its associated bodies and are not those that apply across the justice system, as the Member said.

Mr Ross: I thank the Minister for giving way. I know that we have spent more time on this than, perhaps, anybody had anticipated. He talked about the pilot project that Judge McElhone is running in Londonderry — with mixed results, to be perfectly honest. The support required from other agencies is not quite there yet, although we are definitely moving in the right direction with that.

May I make a suggestion? Following his announcement earlier this week about closing courthouses, the Ballymena courthouse would provide an excellent opportunity for a pilot drugs court, given that the Railway Street facility is there and there may be a particular problem around that area. He could think innovatively about what we use the remaining court estate for.

Mr Ford: I will certainly take note of that suggestion. I accept that it is a perfectly serious suggestion, although I have to be cautious about how buildings are used. The key issue, however, is one for the judiciary, and the key point is that he has specifically named the district judge in Londonderry. Mr McElhone's efforts have been very significant, and I have had recent discussions about how we replicate and build on that kind of work in different parts of Northern Ireland. Progress is being made, but, as ever, perhaps not as fast as we might wish.

Having disposed at considerable length of the points on which everybody seemed to be agreed, I will refer to the amendments that Mr Lynch spoke to and which stand in his name and those of Mr McCartney and Ms McGahan. I note also that Mr Maginness supported much of what was said by Mr Lynch. I have a significant concern about some of the points made, and I go back, in particular, to some of the terminology used. Clause 2 specifies that collection officers will be civil servants. If there were to be any attempt to change that, the future mythical, wicked Tory Minister could just as easily amend the proposed addition, which is unnecessary, as what is already in the Bill. Such an amendment could go through only with the support of the House, and I have no doubt that Members of the SDLP and Sinn Féin, probably joined by Members from Alliance and other parties, would, if necessary, table a petition of concern. Indeed, I did not sense any enthusiasm for that, even from those who cited Donald Trump in support of other aspects of the Bill. I see no prospect whatever of that change being made, but the reality is —

Mr McCartney: Will the Member give way?

Mr Ford: Half a second.

When the protection is in the Bill anyway, putting it in twice achieves nothing. I give way.

Mr McCartney: That is the precise point: if there is no prospect of it happening, why oppose the amendment?

Mr Ford: If it has no prospect of happening, why table it? That is the reality. I believe that it is unnecessary and without benefit. Having been criticised in the past by the Committee for adding unnecessary legislation, I will fire that back at its Deputy Chair: why propose something that is unnecessary and merely spells out, in slightly different words, what is already there?

Other issues raised about protections are covered by the points that I made about existing DSD regulations. An amendment to DSD regulations makes it clear that fine collection would come in at the end of the list of other issues that need to be covered. It seems that, for some — I accept that Mr Lynch did not quite say this — there cannot be any question of taking deductions from benefits at a lower level because of the potential impact. At times, there is also a significant impact on those imprisoned for fine default. We are looking at ensuring that fines are paid on a lengthened timescale and with reduced amounts each week or whatever provision can be made to assist people to pay. This does not seek to take a punitive and excessive sum instantly. We are looking at how we can do this in the most reasonable way, providing protection for dependants at the same time as ensuring that, if fines have to be levied, fines are levied and can be paid.

I accept why Members from Sinn Féin and the SDLP seek to make changes, but I believe that they are not adding anything to the existing protections. Whilst I have sympathy with their desire to be seen to be protecting vulnerable people, I believe that the views expressed elsewhere by Mr Ross, Mr Kennedy and Mr Dickson are accurate and the provisions are not needed. Therefore, I welcome the Chair's assurance that he will not press his amendments, on the basis of the work that is being done. I believe that the Committee and the Department are working in partnership on innovative methods that seek to ensure that the justice system works more effectively. I welcome his assurance that he will not press those amendments. I commend to the House the amendments that stand in my name, which I believe are entirely agreed by the Committee. I am afraid, however, that I must ask the House to reject the amendments that stand in the names of Mr McCartney and his colleagues.

Amendment No 1 agreed to.

Clause 1, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 2 (Collection officers)

Amendment No 2 proposed:

In page 2, line 14, after "officers" insert

" , however, regulations under this provision may not provide for the outsourcing of those functions to agencies or private companies".— [Mr McCartney.]

Question put, That the amendment be made.

The Assembly divided:

Ayes 37; Noes 57.

Clause 22, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Members, take your ease for a moment.

Clause 23 (Minor and consequential amendments)

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): We shall continue. We now come to the second group of amendments for debate. With amendment No 31, it will be convenient to debate amendment Nos 58 to 60, 69 to 73 and 82 to 86 and opposition to clause 45 stand part. These amendments deal with procedural arrangements and technical matters. Opposition to clause 45 is consequential to amendment No 31, and amendment Nos 70 and 72 are consequential to amendment No 31. Amendment Nos 73 and 83 are consequential to amendment No 52. Amendment No 82 is consequential to amendment No 59. Amendment No 84 is consequential to amendment No 58. Amendment No 85 is consequential to amendment No 59, and amendment No 86 is consequential to amendment No 60. As some of the amendments in the group are minor, technical and consequential, I propose, by leave of the Assembly, to group them for the Question according to the clause that they affect. I call the Minister of Justice, Mr David Ford, to move amendment No 31 and address the other amendments in the group and his opposition to clause 45.

Mr Ford: I beg to move amendment No 31: In page 17, line 9, at end insert

“(2) The Department of Justice may by order make such consequential, supplementary or incidental provision as it considers appropriate in consequence of, or for giving full effect to, this Chapter.

(3) An order under subsection (2) may amend, repeal, revoke or otherwise modify any statutory provision.”.

The following amendments stood on the Marshalled List: Nos 58-60, 69-73 and 82-86.

I begin by speaking to amendment No 59, which closes a potential lacuna in the direct committal for trial provisions in section 9 of the Justice Act (Northern Ireland) 2015. Section 9(3)(b) and (c) of the 2015 Act provide that the direct committal arrangements do not apply where the court is to proceed summarily with an offence under article 45 of the Magistrates’ Courts (Northern Ireland) Order 1981 or under article 17 of the Criminal Justice (Children) (Northern Ireland) Order 1998. There is, however, a question over whether section 9 of the 2015 Act will enable offences caught by article 45 of the 1981 Order and article 17 of the 1998 Order to attract the direct committal arrangements where the prosecution decides to proceed on indictment. My policy intention was that those cases should be capable of being directly transferred where it is decided to proceed on indictment, and I therefore believe that there is merit in amending section 9 of the 2015 Act to put the matter beyond doubt.

I move on to my amendments — amendment Nos 59 and 82 — which introduce new clause 44B and new schedule 4 to the Bill. I am sure that Members recall the amendments tabled at Further Consideration Stage of the previous Justice Bill by Mr Frew, Mr Poots and Mr McGlone that sought to make changes to the Firearms (Northern Ireland) Order 2004. The Members’ amendments were subsequently withdrawn in response to a commitment that I would table departmental amendments to this Bill. I am pleased now do so in the form of new schedule 4, which makes changes to the 2004 Order that have been consulted on with stakeholders and considered and agreed by the Committee for Justice.

The first changes are in the form of amendments to young shooter provisions that will permit a person of 12 years of age or older to be in possession of a shotgun in a police-approved clay target range while under the supervision of a person who has held a shotgun on certificate for at least five years. That will enable young people to have access, from a sensible age, to shotguns and to learn clay target shooting in a controlled environment.

Other changes will allow the Chief Constable to grant a firearms certificate to a 16- or 17-year-old for the acquisition and possession of a firearm, be that an airgun with a kinetic energy in excess of 1 joule or a shotgun, for sporting purposes or for pest control under supervision. A further reform to the current arrangements for 16-year-olds and 17-year-olds will allow them to have access to a shotgun in the same circumstances as an adult can at present. Even without a firearm certificate, they may shoot for sporting or pest control purposes so long as they are under appropriate supervision by a person aged at least 21 who has held a firearm certificate for that type of firearm for at least three years.

The amendments introduce a new system to enable a firearm certificate holder to exchange a firearm for another firearm within a band or group of firearms covering air rifles, small quarry rimfire rifles, fox calibre centrefire rifles and larger centrefire calibre deer rifles through a firearms dealer. A licence holder will also be permitted to trade in a firearm without replacing it, which is sometimes referred to as a “one-off transaction”, and dealers will be authorised to carry out such transactions, which they cannot currently do.

Schedule 4 also includes a new schedule of fees that has been the subject of extensive stakeholder consultation and replaces schedule 6 to the 2004 Order. The new schedule of fees sets out the recent revision of the existing fees as well as some new fees for clarity purposes. The new fees include a new fee for existing arrangements for one-on/one-off exchanges of shotguns and exchanges of firearms of the same type and calibre, for example, and a new fee for the variation of a firearm dealer’s certificate. The fee, however, is set at nil until further work has been carried out to cost it. Finally, an amendment is made to reciprocate an arrangement whereby a Great Britain firearm certificate is recognised in Northern Ireland in the same way as a Northern Ireland certificate is recognised when the holder travels to Great Britain to shoot.

1.15 pm

Given the sweeping changes being brought in by schedule 4, some old and irrelevant provisions in sections 103, 104 and 105 of the Justice Act (Northern Ireland) 2011 are repealed by new clause 44B in amendment No 59.

That is an overview of the changes to the Firearms (Northern Ireland) Order 2004 that my new schedule 4 provides for, but the summary nature of my description should not take away from the work involved in bringing forward those changes. I am grateful to the stakeholders, the Committee and the Members who have a particular interest in shooting for their positive engagement on my proposals and for their continued assistance in developing this agreed suite of changes.

Amendment No 60 will enable my Department, by order, to fix fees to be taken by the accountant general for the recovery of the costs of administering funds in court. Having the authority to fix fees will mean that the Department can satisfy a key recommendation of the Public Accounts Committee, namely that the Court Funds Office establish:

“fair and equitable arrangements for recovering its costs from clients.”

Given that the clients of the Court Funds Office are among the most vulnerable in society, it is important to ensure that those with a small fund do not contribute a disproportionate amount towards the administration of their fund. In addition, the introduction of a fee regime will result in a sustainable cost-recovery mechanism that is not dependent on external economic factors. Therefore, the amendment to the Justice (No. 2) Bill will enable the Department to introduce a cost-recovery mechanism that is fairer for Court Funds Office clients and is sustainable during periods of low interest rates.

I will now speak to amendment No 31, which relates to the ancillary provision-making powers in the Bill. Members will remember, some in great detail, the debate about the supplementary, incidental, consequential and transitional provisions in the previous Justice Bill, now the Justice Act (Northern Ireland) 2015, and, in particular, the order-making powers in what was clause 86, which the Committee thought were too broadly drafted. Clauses 45 and 46 of this Bill, as drafted at introduction, raised similar issues, and, being fully alert to the Committee’s concerns in that regard, I stated my intent at Second Stage to table amendments at Consideration Stage to reflect the agreed way forward and the revised construction that was secured for the last Bill. I will, therefore, oppose the Question that clause 45 stand part of the Bill at the appropriate point in proceedings, while amendment No 31 inserts a more tightly drawn power to clause 23 to ensure that the ancillary provision-making powers can only be operated in much more restrictive circumstances and only in relation to the fines and enforcement provisions in Part 1 of the Bill. That amendment, together with additional consequential amendment Nos 71 and 72 to clause 46, follows the model developed with the Committee’s assistance and accepted by the House at the Further Consideration Stage of the 2015 Act. I trust that these adjustments will, therefore, meet with similar support today.

Amendment No 69 is a consequential amendment to the regulation- and order-making provisions in clause 46 arising from the new Prison Ombudsman’s near-death investigation powers, which are due to be discussed in the debate on the next group of amendments, and two consequential amendments to the commencement provisions in clause 47 so that any order made under amended clause 23 and the animal welfare provisions in new clause 40A can be commenced by order. Amendment Nos 72 and 73 will allow that to happen.

Last and somewhat oddly, given that we still have so much business still ahead of us today, I will speak to amendment Nos 83, 84, 85 and 86, which would amend the long title to reflect the new provisions regarding animal welfare, direct committal for trial, firearms and the Court Funds Office.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Dallat): Order. The Business Committee agreed that the sitting should suspend for lunch, and this seems a suitable time to do that. I propose, therefore, by leave of the Assembly, to suspend the sitting until 2.00 pm, when the next Member to speak will be Alastair Ross, the Chairperson of the Justice Committee.

The debate stood suspended.

The sitting was suspended at 1.19 pm.

On resuming (Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Beggs] in the Chair) —

2.00 pm

Mr Ross (The Chairperson of the Committee for Justice): First, I will cover the Minister's intention to oppose clause 45, which enables the Department, by order, to make any supplementary, incidental, consequential, transitional or other provision necessary to give full effect to the provisions of the Act, and to replace it with amendment No 31, which the Committee for Justice supports. When speaking on the first group, Mr Maginness, who is not in his place, mentioned that, sometimes, we are not zealous enough in making sure that legislation does not go too far. I am quite sure that all members of the Committee — I know that Mr Kennedy missed this the last time with the Justice Bill — would agree that we were incredibly ferocious in making sure that the Department was not given too much power. I know that the Minister will remember that; there was almost a showdown at one stage between the Committee and the Minister.

The Committee, when scrutinising the Bill, raised its concerns about clause 86 in that Bill and the wide-ranging powers that it provided. The Committee was of the view that powers should be provided for an exact purpose rather than being broad and general in nature and, at that point, we agreed to oppose its inclusion. During the passage of that Bill through the Assembly, the clause was removed and replaced with one providing much narrower and more specific powers following a robust and, at times, heated debate with the Minister. He will, I am sure, be glad to know that we will not rehearse all the arguments against such a clause today.

In light of the Committee's position on clauses such as clause 45, the departmental officials, when briefing the Committee on the principles of the Justice (No. 2) Bill, indicated that they intended to revisit clause 45 with a view to bringing forward an amendment to reduce its scope. They subsequently advised the Committee that the intention was to remove clause 45 from the Bill in its entirety and to replace it with a power to make ancillary provisions under more restricted circumstances limited to Part 1, which covers fine collection and enforcement.

When considering the proposed amendment, the Committee sought clarification from the Department on the extent of the powers it provided and examples of when such powers are likely to be needed. The Committee welcomed the confirmation provided by officials that the amendment will provide the power to make consequential, incidental and supplementary changes by way of secondary legislation only to Part 1 and will not enable the Department to bring in anything new or different. The Committee noted the type of circumstances in which the Department will be allowed to use the powers.

Given the Committee's opposition to such clauses, we certainly welcome and support the intention to remove clause 45 and introduce a much narrower power to make ancillary provisions restricted to Part 1, as provided for through amendment No 31. That replicates the model developed in the previous Justice Bill and addresses the Committee's fundamental concerns with such clauses.

Turning to amendment No 58, the Department advised the Committee of its intention to bring forward an amendment to address a possible gap in the direct committal for trial provisions in section 9 of the Justice Act (Northern Ireland) 2015. It had received advice that section 9 of the Act may not be sufficiently explicit to enable offences that are caught by article 45 of the Magistrates' Courts (Northern Ireland) Order 1981 and article 17 of the Criminal Justice (Children) (Northern Ireland) Order 1998 to attract direct committal arrangements where the prosecution decided to proceed on indictment. Given that the policy intention was that those cases should be capable of being directly transferred where it is decided to proceed on indictment, the Committee is content to support amendment No 58, which will put the matter beyond any doubt.

Turning briefly to amendment No 60, back in December 2015, the Department provided the Committee with the results of a consultation that it had undertaken on fee options to enable the Northern Ireland Courts and Tribunals Service to introduce a new full cost recovery charging model for 2016 to ensure that the cost of administering the Court Funds Office is met by fees charged to service users rather than the general taxpayer and advised that a change to the relevant legislation by way of an amendment to this Bill will be required to introduce the required authority. The Committee agreed that it was content for the change to be made to the fee structure for the Court Funds Office and therefore supports amendment No 60.

I will now cover amendment Nos 59 and 82, which deal with changes to the firearms legislation. This issue has been in the sights of the Committee for some time, so I am glad that it has been brought to the Chamber today. Indeed, the Committee has been considering proposals from the Department to increase firearms licensing fees and to make a range of other amendments to the firearms legislation that applies in Northern Ireland, including the age of young shooters, since as far back as May 2012 and has invested considerable time and effort in scrutinising that policy area. Whether that is the silver bullet that solves everyone's concerns is still questionable, but the Committee has had its resident experts on the matter, none more so than Mr McGlone, although it is fair to say that all the Committee members now know a lot more about the various guns and calibres than we ever thought we could or perhaps will ever need to know.

At this point, I will pay tribute to Mr McGlone. I know he has left the Committee, and I thank him for his contribution, not just on this issue, but it is always easier to defer to somebody who knows considerably more about a subject than you do. Mr McGlone, along with Mr Frew and Mr Poots at times, has certainly led the Committee in dealing with and resolving the issue, hopefully to the satisfaction of most of the organisations. We are most grateful for that. He has also made a wider contribution to the Committee, and I just want to put that on record.

I do not intend to cover the amendments in detail, particularly the new banded system that will enable firearms dealers to exchange a firearm for a licence holder within a band as long as certain conditions are met, as I am sure that Mr McGlone, Mr Frew and others will do that. However, I think it is important to set out the background to the Committee's decision to support amendment Nos 59 and 82.

During the three and a half years that the Committee has been considering the proposals to change the firearms legislation, it has taken a wide range of written and oral evidence from all the key firearms stakeholder organisations, including the British Association for Shooting and Conservation, Gun Trade Guild Northern Ireland, Countryside Alliance Ireland, the Ulster Clay Pigeon Shooting Association, the Federation of Shooting Sports and the Northern Ireland Deer Society. The Committee also discussed the proposals with the Department of Justice and PSNI officials on numerous occasions.

From the outset, it was clear that there was a wide divergence of views on the proposals, and the Committee encouraged the Department to engage with the various stakeholders and to undertake meaningful dialogue with a view to presenting an agreed set of changes. Following a protracted period during which little progress appeared to have been made, in June 2015 several MLAs tabled amendments to the Justice Bill at Further Consideration Stage on firearms fees, the age of young shooters and a banded system. That shot across the bows brought matters to a head, and officials advised the Committee that, following further discussions, a level of agreement had been reached between the Department and the main firearms stakeholder organisations on fees and bands. As a result, the Members did not move the amendments to the Justice Bill to enable the Department to bring forward legislative amendments as part of the Bill that is in front of us this afternoon, hence the amendments that have been tabled.

The Committee received a range of written submissions on the firearms amendments and took oral evidence from representatives of the British Association for Shooting and Conservation (BASC), the Gun Trade Guild Northern Ireland and Countryside Alliance. While some issues required further clarification, there was broad agreement on the proposed new banded system and the fee structure. However, those organisations remained opposed to the Minister's intention to reduce the minimum age for supervised shooting with a shotgun to 12 years of age for clay target shooting only in a club approved by the PSNI, and they suggested that that should apply to shooting clay targets and any other lawful quarry.

They also considered the proposed introduction of shotgun clubs as creating a totally unnecessary level of bureaucracy. As the Minister outlined, he does not agree with that position and believes that the amendment on the age of young shooters that is before the Assembly today is appropriate and is accepted by a number of other firearms stakeholders. Whilst there is still opposition from some of the firearms organisations to the proposed change to the age of young shooters, the Committee is pleased that an accommodation has been reached regarding the banded system and the fees and is content, therefore, to support amendment Nos 59 and 82.

The rest of the amendments in this group are largely consequential to other changes to the Bill. The Department advised the Committee of most of those amendments and provided the draft text of them before scrutiny of the Bill was completed. The Committee had no other issues to raise.

Mr McGlone: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. Gabhaim buíochas leis an Aire as na dlíthe a thabhairt os ár gcomhair. Thanks very much, Mr Deputy Speaker. I thank the Minister for bringing the legislation before us today. I also thank the Chair of the Committee for Justice for his very kind remarks. An expert is not something I would ever associate myself with being just because I do something, but thank you for giving me the title momentarily today.

I, too, will speak in support of amendment Nos 59 and 82. Specifically, I place on record my thanks to the Gun Trade Guild Northern Ireland, BASC and, indeed, Countryside Alliance for their expert input. Without them, we would not have been where we are. We could probably have been here much earlier, had the course of dialogue and the practice of working together been adopted, but, anyway, we are where we are, and we have made considerable progress.

I thank those officials who engaged positively with the Committee for their efforts in presenting the amendments to accommodate shooters; people of the shooting fraternity and those involved in shooting sports. The contribution of those sports to the local economy should be clearly put on record. The shooting fraternity and those involved in shooting sports in the countryside input £28 million directly to the local economy. We have heard from a range of stakeholders, including clay pigeon shooters, at the Committee.

Specifically with regard to the amendments, I see that paragraph 2(2)(b) of the new schedule 4 to the Firearms (Northern Ireland) Order 2004 makes a change for a person who has attained the age of 21 and has held a firearms certificate for three years. I raised that issue in the Committee. I asked for clarity around that specifically, as it may apply to the supervision of a young person on a clay pigeon shoot or, as has been mentioned, in a shotgun club. Maybe the Minister would put on record that, in fact, there are people who are specialists — experts, if you want to call them that — and known coaches who come from the UK and will not have a firearms certificate but will have a shotgun certificate. In the UK, you do not need a firearms certificate to possess a shotgun, but you obviously require a shotgun certificate. We do not want a situation. All that I am asking for is clarification from the Minister that, in fact, that firearms certificate for a shotgun does include someone who comes into the country, say, from England, and is an expert shot and may be an expert coach in clay pigeon shooting and that, in fact, that phrase covers them in their supervisory capacity.

The other items include the category bands applicable to firearms. Those have been worked out well. Eventually, we got there. Some of them have made a whole lot of common sense before now and it is good to see those bands there. The one wee thing — and, again, perhaps, the Minister would advise us on this — is that some firearms dealers whom we spoke to thought that the bands were already in place. There is a wee bit of confusion out there, among a small number of people. There is the whole issue of training for those firearms dealers in what the new legislation will be, how it will work and how, in fact, they will work it with, for example, one-off/one-on transactions. The fees with that will be very important to ensure that it does not get a wee bit glitchy. It is common sense to us and all that, but those firearms dealers will require training.

There is very little need to say anything further. The Minister has introduced the capacity for young shots to be introduced on clay pigeon shoots. The issue has been raised with us as to whether the situation with regard to young shots — particularly game shots, who are outside the remit of clay pigeon shooting but are nevertheless very enthusiastic about their sport and commencing their sport — should be kept under review with a view to potentially extending the scheme for young shots to people who are not engaged with or associated with clay pigeon shooting but are engaged with normal country sports, as we would know them, in the fields and out in the countryside. I ask that the Minister would clarify whether, in fact, that would be kept under review with a view to potentially extending and expanding it further.

Again, I wish to place on record my thanks to the officials at the Committee, the Clerk and all the staff who have been very helpful to me personally over the last while. I appreciate that, at times, trying to keep me right is a big task. Thanks very much to Christine and all the staff and, latterly, on this scheme, to the officials from the Department for their cooperation and assistance in drafting this legislation.

2.15 pm

Mr Kennedy: I am minded of the phrase, "It's all been said, but it hasn't been said by everyone". I will attempt to be brief yet constructive. Generally, a lot of the action from the top guns and hotshots happened before I came to the Committee. Clearly, the measure on firearms legislation was a targeted one.

I acknowledge and pay tribute to the detailed consultation with stakeholders. I accept that, while some are not completely satisfied, I think that everyone will acknowledge good progress. That has been very helpful. I am happy to indicate that we will support amendment Nos 59 and 82. I am also content to support amendment No 60, which is in relation to issues of cost recovery.

The Chair very well outlined the original problems with clause 45. At one stage, I think that it was referred to as the "Henry VIII amendment", one of whose most famous sayings was, "I don't intend to keep you very long". That was to one of his unfortunate wives. I inform the House that it is not my intention to dwell here. I do not underestimate the work that has gone on between officials in the Department and the Committee to arrive at satisfactory outcomes so that progress can be made on this batch of amendments.

Mr Dickson: Again, I will be brief. I support the Minister in the actions that he has taken. I commend, once again, officials, particularly those in the Department, for the very complex work that they undertook. I also acknowledge the work of Mr McGlone in respect of these matters. Nevertheless, while supporting the Minister, I still have concerns about the age of young shooters; my personal preference would be to see it being older rather than younger.

With regard to cost recovery, given all the pressures on budgets, particularly police budgets — much of the time in respect of licensing is carried out by the PSNI — it is important that we give serious consideration to how we can maximise the recovery of costs for what is a sport for many and vermin control and farming issues for others. I am happy to support the Minister in the proposals that are made today.

Mr Frew: I will concentrate on amendment Nos 59 and 82. Before I do that, I refer Members to the European Commission directive 91/477/EEC on control of the acquisition and possession of weapons. That should be in our sights today is because it could do harm to some of the amendments that we are putting through. We have worked hard and done well on those amendments.

This is a good example of how government and politics should work alongside stakeholders. Once everybody got to grips with that issue and saw where their place was, you got an effective partnership, which came up with these amendments. I commend everyone who took part in that, including the Minister and his officials. Whilst it came kicking and screaming, the PSNI has a massive part to play too. We have always wanted a more agile system with common sense in it. That is important as we go forward. This can be used as an example of how it should be done in future, not only in the Department but throughout government. I refer the Minister to the directive. I am sure that he knows where it was born out of and the measures contained in it.

The problem, I believe, is not so much to do with licensed firearms but with firearms that are on the black market having been brought in from eastern European states. It is those firearms that do harm with regard to terrorist actions and individuals who wish to do harm to persons.

I suppose that the trigger for all of this came in the Justice Bill, when Patsy McGlone, Edwin Poots and I made the bold step of tabling amendments. We met the stakeholders, who desperately wanted to resolve the issue that had plagued their industry for many, many years. I believe that we are at the point where the stakeholders — the firearms dealers and the enthusiasts who take part in the sport — are in a far better position for it. When you look at the controversial nature of gun law in some states and countries around the world, you can understand why any Minister would want to apply the safety catch. It is not required in this regard because, in Northern Ireland, there are approximately 59,500 firearm certificate holders, with roughly 2% of them being female. The average age of a firearm certificate holder in Northern Ireland is about 53. I know that some Members showed concern about the age at which you will be able to shoot under supervision here, but I reassure the House that I do not see that as an issue at all; in fact, I would like to go further and make it younger. There are roughly only 35 firearm certificate holders between the ages of 16 and 18. We are dealing with a very specialised group of young people who take this sport very seriously and could well wish to compete in competitions throughout the world, including the Commonwealth Games and the Olympics. It is important that their skills are honed and that they can use them in the appropriate manner to practise and compete where they can to bring back silverware for Northern Ireland. We should be proud of our young sportspeople and give them as much encouragement as possible.

Schedule 4 is technical, and some members of the Committee either were not interested or left it to people who were interested or maybe it just went over their head. Sometimes, when the officials came to the Committee, only three members were talking, and, other than that, you could have heard a pin drop. It is an important issue for us, the three Members who took this on board. We worked with the officials, and we put pressure on when we had to. When we had to be constructive, we were, and I believe that we have a very good piece of legislation. It is not all that we want, and it is not all that the stakeholders want, but they realise more than anyone that nothing can be achieved unless we all work together.

On schedule 4, whilst we would like to have gone further on the age, we recognise the position that the Minister is in and where he has moved to. We also recognise where the stakeholders and the clubs and dealers were and where they have moved to. There has been compromise on both sides. Some of the wording in the amendment has come from the stakeholders and specialists, and one phrase that I want to place on record is “appropriate supervision”. That should reassure Members, because you have to attain the age of 21 and have held a firearm certificate for a shotgun for at least five years. That is you getting to a suitable age, and it means that you are through the vetting process twice. I think that that has tightened the law and helped with supervision, and I welcome the fact that anomalies on the other side of the legislation have been corrected.

The amendment on the banded system is common sense. When you talk to firearm dealers, especially, and firearm holders, you hear that this could have been done years ago. I am glad that it is being done now. Common sense has been injected into the system. I believe that it will free up police time and that the burden that it places on firearm dealers is one that they will be able to cope with. As long as the amendments and changes are made and put through the system to the PSNI, this will be a system that works very well for people who hold firearms.

These are positive changes. I welcome the work that has been done over the last number of months, and I welcome the spirit in which the Minister and officials came to meet stakeholders and produced the legislation. We wish that we could have gone further, but, alas, we are where we are, and everyone is in a much better place. Issues relating to fees have plagued this country for too long. They are being resolved, along with these changes. There has been agreement and compromise: some fees have increased, some have changed and, in some cases, there are no fees. It is in a much more fit-for-purpose state, and I think that everyone will welcome the changes. I do not wish to speak on any of the other amendments. The Chair of the Committee has outlined the position of the Committee very well, so I will finish.

Mr Ford: As is frequently the case with some of the complex Bills in the justice system, a lot of detailed work is done and, once the Committee has done its work, nobody, apart from me, as Minister, referencing it at Consideration Stage and the Chair of the Committee responding, wishes to say anything about it. That is a sign of the good work being done through our processes, which differ from other places, and it leaves us with only two issues to be discussed today: clause 45 and firearms.

As was the case with clause 86 in the previous Bill, the opposition to clause 45 is not so much firing shots across my bow as the Committee feeling it necessary to give me a good mugging, like a gang bludgeoning me with blunt instruments. As the Chair has acknowledged, in fairness, I have accepted the Committee's view on this. However, in case there is too much agreement, I have to repeat that clauses like this are not inserted for no good reason. They appear in all kinds of Bills from Departments, including Bills that are much less significant in their consequences on other legislation. I give Members the gentle reminder that, in the last Bill, it was necessary to include an amendment to Lord Morrow's private Member's Bill — the human trafficking Bill — to allow national charities to do work in support of trafficked children. Those national charities were not on the Northern Ireland charity register, so, due to the way in which the legislation was originally passed, they would not have been allowed to act. Had we not had that Bill coming forward, we would have implemented clause 45-type provisions in Lord Morrow's Act, as, indeed, others occasionally have to do. Even in previous Justice Acts, we have never had to use those provisions for anything that emanated from the Department, but that does not mean that there is not a need for some precaution. Having been suitably blunt at the Committee, I have no doubt they will find some way of resurrecting that point for the next legislation, wherever that may emanate from.

It was noticeable that two of the three key proponents of the views of some with firearms interests spoke in the debate and made their points, as they always do. Unlike the Chair, however, I did not attend every Committee meeting at which they made those points, but I am well aware of the lengthy detail sent on to my officials. I believe that what we have now is a reasonable and workable compromise.

It accepts the fact that there are different views amongst stakeholders on this issue, including different views amongst those who regard themselves as representing the same shooting interests. After all, the entire issue of how we deal with young shooters, which appears to be where most of the contention came from, started over the issue of young people from Northern Ireland competing in clay pigeon shooting competitions.

2.30 pm

A couple of years ago, I had the pleasure of meeting a young man who had won a competition for people from different areas on these islands when it was held across the water but who was unable to defend his title a year later in Northern Ireland, because, although he was a year older, he was still younger than 16. I accept that that was an issue, and those points were made to me, shall I say, in a very generous and open way but, nonetheless, with reasonable force by representatives of the Ulster Clay Pigeon Shooting Association, and those points were quite understandable. So, I took them on board.

I also had to take on board concerns about safety issues and, in particular, concerns raised by the Chief Constable. In specific response to one of Mr McGlone's points, those issues will be kept under review, because all our legislation is kept under review; but that is not a commitment that there will be an early and immediate move to change things. It is a commitment that we will keep matters under review in order to protect public safety while recognising the points made by so many stakeholders about young people, in particular, in those controlled and well-supervised atmospheres.

On a specific second point, which was made by Mr McGlone, my understanding is that the Committee received a letter stating quite clearly that those who hold the appropriate shotgun certification in GB would be counted as qualifying for supervision in Northern Ireland. That is my understanding. I do not have a copy of the letter despite the voluminous papers I have in this folder; but, if that is not the case, I will see that it is sent very speedily to the Committee and to the former member of the Committee who has just raised the issue. However, I think it is currently available.

The issue of people thinking that the bandings have already been changed is, unfortunately, a result of the way that so much of the business in this place gets reported. An issue is raised at Committee, and somebody makes a suggestion. Departmental officials say they will look into it, and it then gets reported not just as, “This is going to happen”, which is perhaps presuming the will of the Assembly, but as, “This has already happened”, which is definitely presuming the will.

The Department can make sure that dealers, who are the ones that need to know, are informed of the status, on the presumption that this amendment is likely to go through fairly soon. Although, I must say that there is one particular small firearms dealer who, any time I meet him, tends to have a copy of the legislation with him to ensure that the Minister does not bluff him with anything that is being said. So, I am not sure how many of the dealers will need anything more than a copy of the legislation, but I think it is right that the Department should do its best to ensure that people are well informed, because we are placing some additional duties on dealers, which are of benefit to them in running their business but are also an obligation regarding the duties they have to perform on behalf of the justice system. So, we need to ensure that we support them in that respect.

Mr Frew also made a specific point about the current draft EU directive. This issue has been discussed between my officials and the Home Office. Indeed, the Home Secretary has written to me, and I have written back to her. It clearly is an issue. As Mr Frew said, we are all well aware of why there is concern across Europe about tightening up firearms legislation. We need to ensure that we do not obstruct legitimate trade and activity by farmers and sportsmen in the interests of public protection, but we also need to ensure that we get public protection right. That was the tenor of the letter that I wrote to the Home Secretary on the issue, and I wait to see what emerges from her engagement at the Council of Ministers and with the Commission.

We all agreed that the initial proposals from the Commission went somewhat wider than was a reasonable interpretation in the jurisdictions that already have a good regime. However, this is a point I made previously in the Assembly and in press releases: I see far too many appeals in firearms cases in which the PSNI remove a firearms certificate and firearms from holders because of carelessness in the way in which the firearms are being looked after. As far as I am concerned, there are significant issues and obligations on those who hold firearms to show that they will adhere to the conditions of their firearms certificate, that they will secure all their firearms properly when they are in use or not, that they will secure ammunition properly and that they will not, as sometimes happens, leave guns or ammunition accessible to burglars or whoever. I find it amazing the incredibly large number of people who always put their shotgun away in the cabinet, except on the one occasion that their house got burgled. It really is amazing the frequency with which that is the case.

I repeat that this is a task that falls to the police, with appeals then falling to the Minister of Justice. Each case is discussed on its merits, but, as a general rule, I do not believe that there is any excuse for people not adhering to the conditions of the firearms certificate. I urge those who have contacts with those who engage in shooting to put out that message. That is the argument that we need to deploy if we are to follow Mr Frew’s argument that we do not need to go as far as, in some respects, the EU directive goes. We need to show that those who hold firearms in Northern Ireland are looking after them properly, are securing them properly, are not misusing them and are living up to aspects of the law. It is then much easier to make the argument that we do not need every aspect of the directive. However, if people are being careless and weapons are being stolen, it is very easy for people to say that conditions need to be much tighter.

Another point in that area that attracted relatively little attention, although it did attract a lot of attention early on, concerns fees. We are obliged to operate on the basis of cost recovery, and I accept that the other side of that is that people who are paying for a service have a right to expect it to be a proper and efficient service. Changes are being made in the PSNI that are improving that service, but it is appropriate that those who hold firearms are the people who should pay for the necessary systems of licensing and who should ensure that that work is done properly and efficiently. The cost should not fall to the general taxpayer. We have reached a reasonable compromise there, as we have done with other aspects.

Having mentioned none of the other amendments in the group, I commend them all to the House.

Clause 28 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): We now come to the third group of amendments for debate. With amendment No 37, it will be convenient to debate amendment Nos 38 to 51, 80 and 81, and opposition to clause 38 stand part. This group deals with the Prison Ombudsman.

Amendment No 43 is consequential to amendment No 42. Amendment Nos 46 and 51 are consequential to amendment No 45. Amendment No 48 is consequential to amendment No 47. I call the Minister for Justice, Mr David Ford, to move amendment No 37 and to address the other amendments in this group.

Clause 29 (Main functions of Ombudsman)

Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice): I beg to move amendment No 37: In page 22, line 14, at end insert

“or on the Ombudsman’s own initiative (see sections 35A and 35B)”.

The following amendments stood on the Marshalled List: Nos 38-51 and 80-81.

Amendment No 37 one of a small set of amendments that will allow the Prison Ombudsman to instigate investigations on his own initiative. Before addressing those amendments in more detail, I wish to speak on amendment Nos 39 and 41, which adjust existing clauses 30 and 32. Those clauses deal with investigations into complaints and deaths in custody.

The amendments reflect a suggestion by the Attorney General and add a general power to defer investigations where the ombudsman considers it appropriate to do so. Originally, the Bill limited deferral of investigations to when there was a related criminal or health and safety investigation. The purpose of the amendments is to ensure that all the grounds on which deferral might reasonably take place are covered. Such grounds for deferral may include an ongoing criminal investigation, a health and safety investigation, where a matter under investigation is the subject of a pending application for judicial review, or for any other reason.

Amendment Nos 40 and 44 adjust clauses 30 and 34, allowing the ombudsman to inform the police of a suspected criminal offence in relation to any investigation that he is conducting. Members will note the current draft of the amendments stipulates that the ombudsman “may” draw to the attention of police any matter requiring criminal investigation. My policy intention is to standardise this requirement across all the functions of the ombudsman. Accordingly, I intend to introduce a small technical amendment at Further Consideration Stage to change “may” to “shall” so as to require the ombudsman to draw to the attention of the police any matter relevant to any criminal investigation. That was the policy intention in developing these amendments and is entirely consistent with the ombudsman’s current practice.

While conducting an investigation to which clause 30 applies, the ombudsman will be required to draw to the attention of the police any matter which, in his opinion, is relevant to any criminal investigation. The ombudsman will also be required, during an investigation, to draw to the attention of any body or person any matter which, in the ombudsman’s opinion, calls for action to be taken by that body or person. This requirement will also apply to investigations requested by the Department of Justice under clause 34.

Amendment No 49 adjusts clause 37 to add the Attorney General to the list of bodies to which protected information may be disclosed for the purpose of directing inquests.

I return now to the aspect that I opened this group with, clause 29, which, together with amendment Nos 45 and 46 to insert new clauses 35A and 35B, and a consequential amendment to clause 40 by amendment No 51, will allow the ombudsman to instigate, on his own initiative, certain investigations in defined circumstances. These amendments are in response to a recommendation by the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission (NIHRC), which was subsequently supported by the Justice Committee during their helpful scrutiny of the Bill, and which I too am happy to support.

The provisions on own-initiative investigations will apply to those matters about which prisoners and/or visitors to prisons may complain. This would, for example, allow the ombudsman to initiate an investigation where he considers that the number or frequency of events of a similar nature requires investigation. However, such investigations would not be limited to cases where an eligible complaint has been made to the ombudsman. These provisions are intended to reinforce the independence of the ombudsman, who would be empowered to instigate his own investigation in situations where he has concerns. In such circumstances, he would be required first to raise the issue with the Department. This will ensure that no duplicate investigations are planned or under way so as to ensure best use of the available resources.

2.45 pm

I now wish to speak to amendment Nos 42 and 43 to clause 34, which provides for investigations in cases of near-death that meet agreed criteria. Those amendments are in response to Justice Committee deliberations on the clauses that I support. The intention is to place a duty on the Justice Minister to request the ombudsman to conduct an investigation in defined circumstances. Such circumstances will be set out in regulations and will be subject to affirmative resolution in the House. The process of developing the regulations will allow time to reflect on some of the detailed considerations that will be needed, such as the need to clearly define near-death. At present, my officials are working to identify appropriate legal definitions that might assist in this regard. The clear policy intent is that the Bill and subsequent regulations will require the Minister to request the ombudsman’s assistance in cases of near-death.

Finally, on my amendments in this group, I offer two very minor changes to clause 37 and schedule 3 to change references to the Public Services Ombudsperson to Ombudsman. That reflects the change in title agreed on 30 November 2015 during the Consideration Stage of the Public Services Ombudsman Bill.

I now wish to speak to the amendments to the Prison Ombudsman provisions that have been tabled by Mr McCartney, Mr Lynch and Ms McGahan, the first being their amendment to clause 29, which is also about own-initiative investigations. While I am sympathetic to the Members' thinking, I am concerned that this proposed amendment would expand the role of the ombudsman without providing any necessary safeguards. A future ombudsman could treat this as carte blanche to investigate any aspect of the prison experience, which has never been the role envisaged for this office, either in the past or at present.

The amendment I brought forward contains important safeguards by limiting that power to those matters within the ombudsman's complaints remit, happening within 12 months of commencement of the Bill, which form part of a concerning pattern of events. An own-initiative power was not included in the original proposals, as it is not part of the "as is" arrangements. Indeed, the current office holder has stated that that is not a power he would seek. I note that the current provisions will allow the ombudsman to approach the Department with concerns and that those concerns can be addressed by an investigation requested by the Department under clause 34. As the amendment from Mr McCartney and colleagues does not contain the safeguards provided for in my new clauses, I do not support this amendment.

Let me now turn to those Members' amendment to clause 36, which will compel a person to assist in any investigation and make it an offence to refuse to assist an investigation. I understand the Members' intentions, but I do not believe that their amendment will actually enhance the arrangements. Including such a power in legislation would not necessarily ensure that any unwilling witnesses would provide useful evidence, even when faced with the threat of a level 3 fine — currently £1,000 — for their non-compliance. The Prison Ombudsman himself considers that such a power would be cosmetic and, as it is not a power that he seeks, I do not support this amendment.

I now wish to speak to the stated intention, again of Mr McCartney and his colleagues, to oppose the Question that clause 38, "Guidance to Ombudsman in relation to matters connected with national security", stand part of the Bill. The Secretary of State has a legitimate interest and role in matters relating to national security in Northern Ireland. This is not a devolved matter and is not, therefore, in the Assembly's gift to determine. The issue is not unique to this Bill; it has been reflected in other recent legislation, including the Reservoirs Act (Northern Ireland) 2015 and the Public Services Ombudsman Bill. Indeed, the Reservoirs Act (Northern Ireland) 2015 confers significantly greater powers on the Secretary of State, stating that she may direct the devolved Department not to include information on national security grounds. We can contrast that with the rather more modest provision in this Bill, which states that the Prison Ombudsman has only to "have regard to" the national security guidance. "Have regard to" means exactly that: the ombudsman must "have regard to", but need not comply with, such guidance.

The Public Services Ombudsman Bill provides that the Secretary of State may give written notice to the Public Services Ombudsman about any document or information saying that, in her opinion, disclosure of that document or information would be prejudicial to the safety of the United Kingdom. The ombudsman, then, cannot disclose that document or information. This is also a much more sweeping power than is proposed in this Justice Bill. The proposal in the Bill is consistent with the current arrangements, which have been in place since devolution and which stand in prison rules. Omitting it from the Bill would result in poor legislation, with no change in significance in working. I therefore strongly support that the clause remains part of the Bill.

Mr A Maginness: I thank the Minister for giving way. The Minister says that the power is within the prison regulations. Does that mean that the power subsists within the prison regulations? Why is the Minister adding this to the current Bill, if the power already subsists?

Mr Ford: I appreciate Mr Maginness's point. The power currently subsists in prison rules on the basis that there is no statutory basis for the Prisoner Ombudsman at present. Since we are putting the Prison Ombudsman into statute, I believe it is appropriate that the powers should be defined in statute, and not rely on prison rules, which are a separate area that are largely about the running of prisons, rather than the role and function of the ombudsman that we are setting up in this Bill. So I believe that there is a specific reason why, in the Bill, we should have the functions and powers defined properly.

I turn now to the Members' last amendment in this group, which concerns powers in schedule 3 of the Bill and state that a person holding office as ombudsman may, and I emphasise the word "may":

"be removed from office by the Department, if the Department is satisfied that the person ... has been convicted of a criminal offence".

This part of the schedule permits removal rather than requiring it, and in assessing such a situation, relevant factors would be considered, which would have to include a robust risk assessment by the Department. These powers would be exercised proportionately, and only after due consideration of the particular circumstances and factors. We can clearly give examples in our own heads where something would be so minimal as to not make it appropriate to consider removal, and something would be so significant as to effectively require removal. The important issue is that the power exists without a specific direction, so that appropriate consideration can be given to the particular circumstances of the case. In light of this, I do not believe that the Members' amendment is necessary and I do not, therefore, support the inclusion of amendment No 80 in the Bill.

Other than those amendments that I have highlighted my opposition to, I commend the rest of the amendments in the group to the House.

Mr Ross (The Chairperson of the Committee for Justice): I will briefly speak on Part 2 of the Bill, which creates the office of Prison Ombudsman and sets out the main functions of the office, which are to deal with complaints, death in custody investigations and investigations requested by the Department, and the proposed amendments.

There was a clear divergence of views in the evidence received by the Committee on the proposed model, remit and appointment arrangements, to place the Prison Ombudsman on a statutory basis. The current Prisoner Ombudsman supports the provisions in the Bill, but the Northern Ireland Ombudsman, the Ombudsman Association and NIACRO all raised issues regarding the proposed model. Concerns were raised regarding the cost implications of establishing the office as a separate entity, with the Northern Ireland Ombudsman proposing that the role of the Prisoner Ombudsman in relation to prisoner complaints could be combined with that of the new office of Northern Ireland Public Services Ombudsman. All three organisations also raised concerns regarding whether the office of Prison Ombudsman, as provided for in the Bill, meets the required standards of independence given that the Minister of Justice will appoint the office holder, the salary will be paid through the Department of Justice and the Department has a role in approving the terms and conditions of staff in the office. Suggestions were therefore made that the office should be created under separate statutory arrangements which ensure the appointment is not made by a member of the Executive.

The Committee discussed the concerns with the current Prisoner Ombudsman, who indicated that he strongly welcomes the proposals to place the office on a statutory footing, which he believes will be of benefit in a range of ways, including demonstrating the independence and impartiality of the office and increasing the confidence of other statutory bodies, such as the Police Service and the South Eastern Health and Social Care Trust, in relation to sharing information. He noted that the Bill legislated for the "as is" position, which he views as the correct approach to take, and stated that since he took up post over two years ago, no one has ever tried to interfere with his independence. As far as he was aware, the proposed arrangements are not much different from ombudsman offices in the UK and other western European jurisdictions.

Having considered the issues raised, along with the views of the current Prisoner Ombudsman on how the office operates in its current form, the Committee agreed that it was generally content with the provisions that will place the Prisoner Ombudsman on a statutory footing by creating the office of Prison Ombudsman for Northern Ireland and set out the main functions. Some members, however, outlined reservations with several of the provisions, and I turn to those now.

In relation to the power to compel witnesses, amendment Nos 47 and 48, which Mr McCartney has tabled, provide a power to enable the Prison Ombudsman to compel a person to assist any investigation and make it an offence, liable to a fine not exceeding level 3, if that is refused. That issue was raised with the Committee by the Human Rights Commission, which considered that the effectiveness of the ombudsman's investigations would be augmented by empowering the office to compel witnesses for interview.

When we discussed the proposal with the current Prisoner Ombudsman, however, he believed that it would be a cosmetic change and would affect very few deaths in custody or complaints that he investigated. In fact, he stated that 99% of prison staff voluntarily assist with his investigations and indicated that, even if he had this power, a person could turn up and say nothing or add no value to his investigation. In his view, the powers to obtain and disclose information already provided for in the Bill are rigorous, given that the office will have the statutory authority to obtain documents, enter premises and require people to cooperate, and the legislation creates an offence of intentionally obstructing an investigation.

When pressed by members of the Committee on whether the lack of a power to compel witnesses could limit investigations in the future, the ombudsman stated that he did not think that the power was necessary at present, but it could be useful in the future. Whilst the Committee agreed that it was content with the provisions as drafted, Mr McCartney advised members of his intention to bring forward an amendment to provide the ombudsman with the power to compel witnesses.

In relation to the guidance on national security matters, some members of the Committee raised reservations about clause 38, which requires the Prison Ombudsman to have regard to guidance issued by the Secretary of State in relation to any matter connected with national security, and they have indicated their intention to oppose that clause. The Committee raised the matter with the current Prisoner Ombudsman, who was clear that he does not believe that the Secretary of State has the power to prevent him carrying out an investigation. He further added that, whilst national security guidance has been in place since the devolution of justice powers in 2010, it has never been invoked in any way. He is content with the guidance indicating that, while he must have regard to it, his view is that it does not impede or shackle him or any future Prison Ombudsman from carrying out any investigation. The Committee, therefore, agreed that it was content with clause 38.

The Committee also considered a range of amendments that the Department indicated it intended to bring forward and which members viewed as potentially enhancing the arrangements provided for in the Bill. In terms of the power to defer investigations where the ombudsman considers it necessary to do so, the Committee agrees that this is a sensible proposal and therefore supports amendment Nos 39 and 41.

The second amendment aims to standardise the requirement of the ombudsman to inform the police of a suspected criminal offence as part of any investigation he is conducting, rather than just as part of an investigation into a death in custody, as is currently required by the Bill. That anomaly was brought to the attention of the Committee by the Human Rights Commission, and we are content to support amendment Nos 40 and 44, which standardise the requirement for the ombudsman to inform police of a suspected criminal offence as part of any investigation he is conducting.

(Mr Speaker in the Chair)

The third amendment allows for the arrangements to provide for investigations in cases of near-death in custody which meet agreed criteria. When the issue of extending the Prison Ombudsman's statutory functions to include investigations into near-deaths in custody was raised, the Department stated that the Prisoner Ombudsman currently investigates near-deaths in custody at its request, and it considered that such investigations could be addressed in the future by a request from the Minister to carry out an investigation under clause 34.

However, having considered the matter further, the Department subsequently advised that it was proposing to bring forward an amendment that would place a duty on the Minister of Justice to request the Prison Ombudsman to conduct an investigation in defined circumstances which will be set out in regulations that will be subject to the affirmative resolution procedure. Given that it has been recent practice for the ombudsman to investigate near-deaths in prison custody, the Committee is content to support amendment Nos 42 and 43 and will scrutinise the detail of the arrangements when the secondary legislation is drafted.

In the written evidence received by the Committee on Part 2 of the Bill, a suggestion was made that the Prison Ombudsman should be provided with the power to carry out investigations on his or her own initiative, similar to what is proposed in the Public Services Ombudsperson Bill. Noting that, under the current provisions, the Prison Ombudsman has to receive a complaint or a request from the Minister of Justice before he can undertake an investigation, the Committee agreed that it would be appropriate for the ombudsman to be able to initiate investigations of his own volition.

This will emphasise his independence and enable him to investigate if there appears to be a systematic problem. The Minister subsequently indicated that he would table amendments to provide for this. I know that Mr McCartney has also tabled an amendment on this, and I will be interested to hear the difference, as he sees it, between the two sets.

On other minor amendments, the Committee is also content with amendment No 49, which adds the Attorney General to the list of bodies to which protected information may be disclosed, and the minor drafting amendments as proposed by the Minister.

3.00 pm

Mr McCartney: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. First, I welcome the fact, as I think everybody does, that the Minister has taken the opportunity to put the Prison Ombudsman on a statutory footing. We all recall that, in times past, a Prisoner Ombudsman left his post, and one of the reasons he cited for no longer being able to continue was the fact that it was not on a statutory footing, which, he felt, limited his ability to carry out a particular piece of work. The two subsequent ombudsmen have both reiterated that the office should be put on a statutory basis. I do not think that anybody will question the integrity of any of the people who have carried out the role. The incumbent was in front of the Committee and talked about it being satisfactory in his experience, but I think that when we frame legislation we should not do so on the basis of the experience of a particular person at a particular time. We have to look to the future. That is why I believe that some of the amendments that we propose will tighten the office and make it better as we take it forward.

Amendment No 38 is obviously similar to amendment Nos 37 and 45 tabled by the Minister. I believe — this is where there is a slight parting of the ways — that the ombudsman should have the power to initiate their own investigations. I do not think that we should limit the scope of that power. The Minister, in amendment No 45, says that the matter should be within the previous 12 months; I do not see why it should be time-bound.

A good way of showing why it is necessary for the ombudsman to have this power is the recent fire in Erne House. There would have been no investigation carried out, had the Criminal Justice Inspection not done an unannounced inspection. Obviously, the investigation is ongoing, but the report will highlight other issues relating to the current state of relationships in Maghaberry. The Department did not see fit to call an investigation; nor did the Prison Service or the management of Maghaberry. In my opinion, that is where this power would be of great significance, and it is not just about the ability to call an investigation. Many issues will come into the public domain as a result of the independent investigation, and we would have been better served if the ombudsman had had the power to do that. It will be interesting to hear the Minister reflect on those issues. For me, this is the opportunity to give the ombudsman the capability to carry out investigations, to deal with complaints and to ensure that there are good accountability mechanisms in our prisons.

I turn to the idea of compelling someone to give evidence. I heard Tom McGonigle's evidence. He said that there were no issues, and that is fine; I would not question that in any way. It is a good state of affairs when people are cooperating with all investigations. However, the powers of investigation will widen, even under the Minister's terms, and none of us can predict the future. That is why it is best that we provide for the ombudsman to have that power to use if he or she sees fit. All other similar types of ombudsmen in other situations —

Mr McGlone: Will the Member give way?

Mr McCartney: I will surely.

Mr McGlone: I hear what the Member is saying, and I have looked at amendment No 48. However, to deal specifically with amendment No 47, how do you compel someone to assist? I am looking for a bit of elaboration on that. It has not been unknown for people to sit there absolutely silent and say nothing when they are under investigation. How do you compel someone to assist if they simply refuse to do so? How do you determine that they are not assisting you? I agree entirely with the thrust of your second amendment, but, on the first one, I want to hear how that would be done.

Mr McCartney: If someone is of a mind that they are not going to cooperate, that is fine. I have heard Alban Maginness talk previously about normative behaviour; in other words, a person who does not have to cooperate now might not come forward. They might feel that they have information and, if they are asked to come forward, they will come forward, but, if they are not asked, they might just sit back and allow things to happen. If there are 12 people and only six come forward, the ombudsman will invite the other six to come forward, but they may say, "We do not have to, so we are not going to do it". If you compel them, you at least create a situation that allows him to come to conclusions, and we have heard before about conspiracies of silence.

Mr McGlone: With respect to Mr McCartney, the compulsion is not for them to come forward; the compulsion is for them to assist. That is the bit that I am not sure of.

Mr McCartney: I accept that you cannot compel anyone to cooperate, but you can compel them to be part of the investigation process. Say, for talk's sake, it is a prison officer. If a prison officer refuses and is fined, I am sure that there will be disciplinary procedures that might affect his or her career. At least there is some sort of incentive or weight put on them so that they do not just feel, "I do not want to cooperate, so I do not have to do it". That is why this is important as we go forward. The power may never have to be used, but, if you are carrying out an investigation and there are people who do not want to come forward, it is good that you can say, “I want you to come forward. I need you to answer these questions, and, if you do not, you might be charged and subsequently fined, and it will have an impact on your career”.

Mr McGlone: I might be picking this up wrongly, Mr McCartney, but, as I read it, that bit is covered by your amendment No 48. There is that power to do whatever is required with the person who refuses to assist. We are probably talking about two slightly different things there. I absolutely agree with amendment No 48; it is just amendment No 47 that I am not clear on.

Mr McCartney: Perhaps that is something that we can clear up at Further Consideration Stage. Before you can indict someone, you have to have the power to call them forward. You cannot convict someone of not assisting if you have not got the power to bring them forward in the first instance. That is the lead-in from amendment No 47 to amendment No 48. That is why we feel that it is necessary.

I want to turn to amendment No 80 before I go to clause 38. I know that the Minister has said that amendment No 80 is not necessary. I will say to him what I said in the earlier part of the debate: if it is not necessary, why stand in its way? It would send a clear message on the wider departmental policy on desistance. It would say very clearly that you are legislating that, if a person in post is convicted, it has to be something that would prevent that person from doing the job, rather than a blanket approach. If you are convicted of an offence that has no relevance to the job that you do and does not impede or in any way call into question your ability to do that job, that should not be a reason to lose your job. I accept that the Minister says that that is not the intention of the way that this is framed, but I just think that this not only makes it tighter but sends a clear message on desistance.

Clause 38 is on guidance on matters connected with national security, as it is written here. It is interesting that, when we have questioned the ombudsman and prison officials about this in the past, they have always found it very difficult to spell out exactly what the powers are and what they will do.

Interestingly, when opposition was initially raised in Committee — by Alban Maginness, I think — we were struck by the fact that Tom McGonigle said that it was not an issue and had not been an issue. Therefore, you are saying that, if it has not been an issue, why does it have to be put into legislation? The Chair mentioned this when he spoke, and I do not want to misquote Mr McGonigle, but he certainly gave us the impression that he was more or less saying that, even if he was given guidance, it would have no substance or bearing and nor would it prevent him from carrying out an investigation.

The Bill states:

“must have regard to any guidance”.

None of us can second-guess what would happen if that was taken to court. I could make the case that, if guidance was issued not to carry out a particular investigation, the ombudsman said no and the Secretary of State challenged that and took it to court, a judge would be in a good and proper position to say, “You must have regard”. That you must have regard is clear.

Mr Ford: I appreciate the Member giving way. My understanding of this is quite simple: “must have regard to any guidance” is a long way short of “must follow directions”. You have to consider the guidance and weigh up the factors. However, the very fact that it is couched as “have regard to” is a clear statement that it is not a direction that you must follow. If you must follow, it says — as, dare I say it, the Reservoirs Act says — you “must follow”.

Mr McCartney: I am not over the detail of the Reservoirs Act, but you can understand that if, when drawing a map, someone asks you not to include a particular installation. You can see a logic to that.

I am making the point that, in relation to this issue, the British Secretary of State would have the power, perhaps, to go to court outside the purpose of this legislation. However, we are legislating, therefore we have the right to question whether or not this is necessary. We are told that it is not, but, if guidance was offered to the ombudsman that said, “Do not investigate this because there are British national security interests involved”, and that went to court and a judge read that “you must have regard to”, to me there is only one interpretation of what that regard would be, namely that you do not carry out that investigation.

Mr Ford: I appreciate the Member giving way again. You actually have the two issues the wrong way round. In the context of reservoirs, you said, “Please do not” but that is not the import of the way that the Reservoirs Act is written, which is the specific direction, “you shall not”. In this case, we are talking about guidance, and guidance cannot say, “Do not do something”. It is guidance. The Bill states specifically that somebody “must have regard to”. It does not say that they have to follow it, because if it was the case that they had to follow it, it would say that they must follow it. It says they, “must have regard to”, and that means they must consider it carefully and seriously and weigh it up against all the factors, but they do not have to go with the guidance on the basis of their judgement.

Mr McCartney: I was not giving the Reservoirs Act as it is legislated. I said that you can understand a case being made why, if you were asking someone to do something, “shall” would enter into it literally. Neither you nor I, nor anybody in the Assembly, can ever say that we are going to second-guess what a judge would say. You may have a view what guidance means. I might have a view, but I have absolutely no doubt that, if guidance were to be given to the ombudsman that says, “You should not carry out this investigation”, you cannot say that that is not guidance. I could give guidance to you that says, “You should not cross the road without looking left and right”. That is a clear instruction. If you have to have regard to that, it is difficult for you to sit and say that a judge in a court would not interpret that in a way that would instruct the ombudsman not to carry out an investigation because of British national security interests. We cannot have a situation, whether it pertains to death in custody or anything else, in which anyone would have the power to say to anyone that they should not be investigating in those circumstances.

3.15 pm

We have had this discussion on numerous occasions, because when people ask the question: “What is Britain’s national interest?” they are told, “We can’t tell you, and why we cannot tell you is because it is in Britain’s national interest to not tell you.” We cannot have that circular argument going on. This is why, if the ombudsman is quoted, as he has been quoted by you today, as saying that it has never been used and does not need to be used, then, in our opinion, it should be legislated for. Go raibh míle maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle.

Mr A Maginness: I will try to be as brief as possible. The SDLP welcomes placing the office of the Prison Ombudsman on a statutory basis. It is something that we have sought for quite some time, and it arose specifically out of the Hillsborough Agreement in 2010. So, it is good that we have made progress in relation to that and that there is a consensus on the issue. It is right and proper that his office is put on a statutory basis. The ombudsman welcomes it, and his predecessors also sought to achieve it.

The own-initiative aspect of the Bill is also to be welcomed. The Minister introduced that aspect, and we are very supportive of it. It is important that the ombudsman can look at an overall situation and see whether there are patterns developing or a systematic issue that needs to be addressed. It is right and proper that this particular power be introduced by the Bill. So, we welcome that and believe it to be an important step forward.

Amendment No 47, which is Mr McCartney’s amendment, is allied to amendment No 48. The House will understand the points that Mr McGlone made in relation to amendment No 47, which seeks to:

“compel a person to assist in any investigation under this Part.”

We are not convinced that this is a right and proper amendment in relation to these matters. It is very difficult to conceive of a situation where you could compel a person to assist in an investigation. You might be able to compel someone to attend somewhere or arrive at some office, or whatever, but you could not compel a person to assist, as Mr McGlone said. I am grateful to Mr McCartney for responding constructively to the points raised by Mr McGlone. So, we are not supportive of that amendment.

However, amendment No 48 does add something to clause 36(4). The Minister has quite properly included in clause 36(4):

“A person who intentionally obstructs the Ombudsman in the carrying out of an investigation under this Part commits an offence and is liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding level 3 on the standard scale.”

I hope I am quoting that accurately. The addition that Mr McCartney is seeking to make is:

“A person who refuses to assist an investigation under this Part”.

We think that there is merit in this, and we are therefore supportive of the amendment. It is important, however, to note that, throughout the contribution of the Prisoner Ombudsman — as he is known, although he will not continue to have that name — he said that 99% of people cooperated with him and that he was happy enough.

Nonetheless, I think that there might be some merit in the additional aspect that Mr McCartney has raised.

In relation to that point, we are unhappy with the inclusion of clause 38. It does not seem necessary to us to include it in the Bill if, in fact, the power already subsists in the Prison Act. We are very wary of the whole issue of using national security as a broad brush and restricting or, effectively, obstructing investigations. We are very wary when we see those references in any legislation. Maybe that is just because we are politically neuralgic about national security, but we have seen national security used in the past as an umbrella and in a fairly blanket fashion. Despite the Minister’s persuasive observations on clause 38, it seems to us that they are not totally persuasive — I will put it that way — and we feel that we must oppose the clause and support Sinn Féin’s opposition to it. I am not sure if there is any —

Mr Ford: Will the Member give way?

Mr A Maginness: Yes, I will.

Mr Ford: I appreciate the Member giving way yet again. I could understand you having the concerns that you have just expressed about clause 38 if there were a specific direction. I really do not understand why it is of such concern to you in the context of merely having regard to guidance. That seems to me to be the fundamental issue: it is a low test. Those of us on this side of the House should be concerned not to get entirely caught up with the problems that arose at Stormont House before last Christmas over other aspects of national security creeping, multilayered, into a proposed Westminster Bill. This is a very different situation at a much lower level than what was being suggested there. That is why I might be tempted to suggest to you that perhaps you are getting just a little neuralgic.

Mr A Maginness: Well, we need a doctor to decide that, do we not? Is there a doctor in the House? [Laughter.] I hear what the Minister says, but experience leads us to the conclusion that, wherever national security issues arise, even in an arcane way, there is some usage made of them, which we believe negatively impacts on transparency and proper investigation. I remain to be totally convinced, no matter how persistent the Minister may be on the issue. I think that I have covered all the points that I should have covered, so I will conclude.

Mr Kennedy: I join others in giving a broad welcome to the legislation that we are considering in that it will place the office of the Prison Ombudsman on a statutory footing. Other Members, including the Minister, have covered the points at issue. It is not my intention to linger on them except to provide commentary on our view on the various amendments and clauses.

Amendment No 37 relates to clauses 35A and 35B and is linked to amendment Nos 45 and 46. We will support the Committee view on that. Amendment No 38 is a Sinn Féin amendment and is in competition with the Minister’s amendment No 45. We think that amendment No 38 is more widely drawn, and we will oppose that and instead support amendment No 45, which deals with own-initiative investigations. Amendment Nos 39 to 44 are relatively non-contentious and can be supported. We have said that we will support amendment No 45.

We will oppose amendment Nos 47 and 48, which are Sinn Féin amendments. Amendment No 47 would:

“compel a person to assist in any investigation under this Part.”

Mr Maginness drew attention to one of the weaker points of amendment No 47, which is that you can compel someone to attend, but it is enormously difficult to see how you can compel a person to assist. We will also oppose amendment No 48, which states that anyone:

“who refuses to assist an investigation under this Part or a person who intentionally obstructs an investigation under this Part commits an offence and is liable under summary conviction to a fine”.

The ombudsman is on record saying that he does not require those powers, and, in many ways, what is proposed in the amendment is a cosmetic change — I think that that was the Minister’s description of it.

On the opposition to clause 38, we are back to issues of national security and the allegations of spooks and other influences. We will oppose Sinn Féin on that.

Amendment No 80 would enable someone convicted of a criminal offence to remain in the post of ombudsman pending a risk assessment and an adjudication on the relevance of the offence to the post. Obviously, our preference is that an ombudsman would not have a criminal conviction, but we believe that it can be handled through the existing provisions and, therefore, will oppose the amendment.

Mr Dickson: I will be incredibly brief. I simply want to indicate my support for what the Minister said. I will support and oppose the amendments in accordance with the Minister’s recommendations to the House.

Mr Douglas: The group 3 amendments are about the Prison Ombudsman. A lot of things have been said, and I will try to keep this as short as possible. First, I thank the Chair and Deputy Chair for their leadership through this process. I also thank other Committee members. Stewart Dickson said earlier that it has been a good process and that there has been good engagement on the Justice Committee. The way that we have conducted the business is a good model for other Committees. I also thank organisations such as the prison review oversight group, which spoke to us about a range of issues, and the independent visitors, who helped to feed into some of the recommendations and amendments. Finally, I thank the Minister and his officials, as well as the Justice Committee officials led by Christine and her team. They have done an excellent job.

We have a small number of amendments.

I want to speak generally, first of all, if that is OK, Mr Speaker.

3.30 pm

The Bill places the ombudsman on a statutory footing, as has been said. Since the first appointment in 2005, the ombudsman has, I believe, operated very effectively and efficiently on a non-statutory basis. I think that we are getting a continuation of the role. As a Member said earlier, there have been difficulties in the past. I do not think that they have been related to that office but maybe to some outside interference.

I believe that the Bill further enhances the standing of the office. The ombudsman is a recognised brand and also has that reputation of 10 years of continuous work. Independence will be reinforced. That is a key aspect of the Bill. Maybe I will say a few words about that later.

It is worth noting that the ombudsman works neither for prisoners nor against prison officers. Sometimes, we get confused over that because the ombudsman’s role is to act as an honest broker. If you are an honest broker, people respect you. An honest broker examines the facts and reports on them as he sees fit. I see that as the role of the ombudsman.

The ombudsman is more than just a complaints handler or someone for people to whinge to. The office is established to help to ease tensions in the prison and provide a way for prisoners to deal with the problems that they face. Certainly, the discussions that we have had with prison visitors and oversight people have indicated that there are tensions within some of the prisons, particularly Maghaberry. The role of the Prison Ombudsman is to try to ease those tensions when there are difficulties and, in many ways, people need that independent voice and ear. I have visited a number of prisons over the past number of years. Last year, 90% of my experience was very good. To be quite honest, 10% was bad at times.

I just want to highlight a couple of amendments. I will turn to amendment No 37 to clause 29. I want to try to link it, as Danny Kennedy has done, to amendment No 45 and new clause 35A. Amendment No 37 inserts the words “the Ombudsman’s own initiative”. The Bill introduces a duty and obligation on all parties to cooperate with the ombudsman. I certainly agree that it should be an offence if anyone intentionally obstructs an investigation by the ombudsman.

The oddminsman — sorry, ombudsman. It is getting a bit late in the day for me: three days in a row. As I said before, I know another big word, “delicatessen”. [Laughter.] It has nothing to do with this, but anyway.

The ombudsman has the right of entry to prison premises and the juvenile justice centre. He also has powers to access documents for investigations. As he has told us before, that has not been a big problem in the past, but I think that that will give him added power if it comes to the point when he needs to access documents for those investigations.

Currently, the ombudsman is appointed under prison legislation. The change in arrangements further demonstrates his independence from those he has the power to investigate. I think that it has to be completely separate from the prison structure and departmental hierarchy. A very important point is that he will enjoy the same independence from the Department because the Minister appoints people to the Policing Board, the Probation Board and Criminal Justice Inspection, and they have that sense of independence. That is an important point.

Amendment No 45 creates new clause 35A on own-initiative investigations. The clause includes not just prisoners but persons visiting a prison. I had a very poor experience recently while visiting a prisoner. As an MLA, I was a bit disappointed with how I was treated. I did not go to the Prisoner Ombudsman; I went straight to the governor, but not everybody has direct access to a governor. To be honest, the governor was able to reassure me, and we got the problem sorted out. It was a bit of a blip, but it was an unfortunate situation for him. It is good that the Prisoner Ombudsman can investigate the situation where families and others are visiting a prison.

The Prisoner Ombudsman can also investigate facilities, or, I should say, the lack of them, at a prison. That is very important. The Bill will also enable the ombudsman to investigate health and education, which are a very important part of prison life. Those of us on the Justice Committee who went to Maghaberry prison saw some of the education facilities that people were able to access, but others were not able to access them. We heard from the prison review oversight group — I have spoken to prisoners as well — about the major problems that many prisoners find in prison. Additionally, there are mental health issues. The Chair alluded to that earlier. It is another important aspect.

I could not stand here today without quoting the Bible. There is a verse that says that it is “the little foxes, that spoil the vines”. I say that because the ombudsman will be able to investigate not just major issues but other issues that many people would term “insignificant” but which are vital for prisoners. I went to see a prisoner who was distraught because he was expecting a Father’s Day card, but it did not arrive until a week later. It is unacceptable that someone in prison is looking for a Christmas card or a Father’s Day card and it is late. Those things create tension between prisoners and prison staff. Part of it is because of the reduced numbers of prison staff and the difficulties that they had with manning the prison. To be fair to the prison staff, that situation, from what I know, has been addressed; they took prison staff off letters etc and placed them on the landings.

In conclusion, we support the Minister’s amendments, and we will be opposing the others. We were told at the Committee that the changes will not require additional staff and that the cost will be minimal. I think that people mentioned to us that it may be done through websites and literature or whatever. Maybe the Minister, in his winding-up speech, will address those points.

Mr Ford: Again, there is significant agreement on the issues covered in this group of amendments. What is particularly welcome is that everybody who spoke welcomed the fact that the Prisoner Ombudsman is now to be put on a statutory basis. The role of the Prisoner Ombudsman to date has not been limited in any respect. I have not had any complaints from the current ombudsman, Tom McGonigle, or his predecessor, Pauline McCabe — the two who have been in post during my time as Minister since devolution — to suggest that limitations were being placed on their role. Pauline made very clear her belief that it was important that, as soon as possible, that should become a statutory role, with a full statutory underpinning of the basis on which the Prisoner Ombudsman would work.

I do not know whether Pauline and Tom are glued to ‘BBC Democracy Live’ watching this at the moment, but they probably ought to be because the input from the two of them has been significant through the work that they have done and what they have done to make the case for what we are doing in the Chamber this afternoon as we progress the issue of a statutory basis.

Alban Maginness reminded us that this was part of the Hillsborough Castle Agreement in 2010, and you might say that it has taken rather too long to put it in place. I do not think that there is any difference between what the ombudsman has been doing since and what will be done in the future, but the statutory basis makes it absolutely clear what the function is. There will be no prospect of the future mythical, wicked Minister, who was referred to earlier and is not nearly as nice as me, coming along and getting in the way.

Mr Kennedy: Self-praise is no recommendation.

Mr Ford: I was quoting other people praising me. [Laughter.] Sammy Douglas made the point that it is vital to ensure that the independence of the Prison Ombudsman is recognised in statute, not just in practice by the Department of Justice and the Prison Service. I can confirm to him that, to the best of my knowledge, given the way that the office functions currently, any additional costs will be minimal. The same team will continue to do the same work in the same way to the same high standards, but they will have a firm basis in law on which to do that work. I am pleased that, even though we are about to have a bit of a discussion and, potentially, a vote or two on factors on which we disagree, at least we have got to this point and there is widespread recognition. The important issue is that the principle is agreed, and, indeed, the principle has been agreed for a significant period. Mr Douglas visited Maghaberry recently, and his comments on that experience were a significant reminder of what we all need to do. To aid rehabilitation and reform, we need to ensure that everybody who visits a prison and everybody who is incarcerated in a prison has the best experience possible in the circumstances

Let me turn to the less-agreed points in what we have just been discussing. First, I suspect that the relatively easy point is the removal from office. I appreciate the efforts of Mr McCartney to tie down the precise basis on which that would happen, but I do not believe that those details are required. The arrangements for the terms of office and potential removal are exactly the same as those that apply to other bodies and to other individuals, such as the Police Ombudsman and the Chief Inspector of Criminal Justice. The test in the law, as it is drafted and as it stands for them, is that it has to be a reasonable test to ensure that all relevant considerations have been taken into account. I do not see any great benefit in spelling that out, given that it is the same test as applies to others.

I think that Mr Kennedy made the point about compulsion. He has just been rude to me, so maybe I should not praise him. His point was that you may compel somebody to attend for interview, but you cannot compel them to assist. It is almost the same as the fundamental concept of a criminal investigation and the right to silence, so it is incorrect to suggest that you can compel somebody in this context when you clearly cannot do so in other contexts. You can certainly make somebody attend, but to what point? This was also an issue in regard to the role of the Police Ombudsman, and it arises in criminal investigations by the police every day. We would need to be very assured of how one would do that, as well as of the justification for doing it. At the moment, I do not see anything. There is a measure in the Bill on penalties for those who seek to obstruct the investigation, and that is absolutely right, but that is very different from pretending somehow that you can compel somebody to give useful information if they are unwilling to do so. Therefore, I can see no benefit in the amendment. I accept that we would all wish to ensure not just 99% cooperation but 100% cooperation, but, if the 1% do not wish to cooperate, even forcing them to attend would not make them do so.

The other key concern raised by those sitting on my right was on national security guidance. I must say again that I really cannot understand how representatives of a party whose Minister acceded to national security direction can have such concerns about national security guidance. Direction means that the Secretary of State says, "You must". There are no ifs and no buts; it is the Secretary of State directing a devolved authority. That is exactly the case with the Reservoirs Act. In this case, all that we are talking about is a replication in the legislation that puts the ombudsman on a statutory footing of that which already exists in prison rules and will continue to exist in prison rules whatever decision is taken in the House this afternoon. That is the well-known, regular formation of "having regard to" guidance, which is a vastly lower test than the ability of the Secretary of State to issue a direction. Members suggest that somehow this is a massive intrusion into the work, yet it has existed for six years since devolution and has not ever been used. I am tempted to requote Mr Maginness. If he thinks that, because it exists, it will somehow be used, why has it not been used for six years? The power is there anyway.

3.45 pm

I will make the position absolutely clear: that the ombudsman shall have regard to guidance and, having considered all the issues, shall decide whether to go with that guidance is not the test that Sinn Féin Ministers and MLAs accepted in the Reservoirs Act. It is utterly bogus to pretend that this is somehow some massive intrusion by the NIO, when the test is at a significantly lower level than that which they have accepted with regard to the Public Services Ombudsman and with regard to reservoirs. People ought to grow up, accept the reality of life and stop pretending that something is significantly worse than it is.

I made this point to Mr Maginness, and I will make it again: I had significant concerns about what the NIO was seeking to do when it was looking at new legislation to deal with legacy institutions for the past. That was a ludicrous intrusion, overlaying the will of devolved bodies with national security. This is no such thing: it is guidance. "Have regard to" is the lowest possible standard. Therefore, to suggest that this is somehow a major problem is simply nonsense. People should accept the reality that this exists in prison rules. If we are putting the Prison Ombudsman on a statutory basis, we should get the statute right in the Bill and reflect the reality of life.

Mr Speaker: We now come to the fourth group of amendments for debate. With amendment No 52, it is convenient to debate amendment Nos 53 to 57, which deal with offences and penalties. Amendment Nos 54 and 55 are consequential to amendment No 53.

Mr Ford (The Minister of Justice): I beg to move amendment No 52:

New Clause

Before clause 41 insert

"Animal welfare

Penalties for animal welfare offences

40A.—(1) In section 31 of the Welfare of Animals Act (Northern Ireland) 2011 (penalties), in subsection (1) (summary-only offences), omit "8(3)," and "33(9), 40(7)".

(b) section 33(10) (disqualification);

(c) section 36(1) (destruction in interests of animal).

(6) In each of the following provisions of that Act, for "8(1) or (2)" substitute "8"—

(c) section 38(1) (reimbursement of expenses relating to animals involved in fighting offences).

(7) In Article 29(1) of the Magistrates' Courts (Northern Ireland) Order 1981 (right to claim trial by jury subject to exceptions), after sub-paragraph (o) insert—

"(p) section 4 or 8(1) or (2) of the Welfare of Animals Act (Northern Ireland) 2011 (unnecessary suffering; fighting).".

The following amendments stood on the Marshalled List: Nos 53 to 57.

Mr Ford: Amendment No 52 makes changes to the Welfare of Animals Act (Northern Ireland) 2011 by increasing the maximum penalties for the most serious offences of animal cruelty; changing the mode of trial for three animal welfare offences, from summary only to hybrid; and extending the use of a range of court orders in the 2011 Act, such as disqualification orders, to apply in cases where someone has been convicted of possessing or supplying images of an animal fight. The amendment has been included following a request from the Minister of Agriculture and Rural Development in order to give effect to a recommendation arising out of the joint review carried out between DARD and DOJ on the implementation of the 2011 Act.

Mr Weir: I thank the Minister for giving way. I suppose, very specifically in relation to amendment No 52, I welcome the very positive and detailed work which led to this amendment, which was undertaken, as the Minister has indicated, by DOJ in conjunction with DARD in the report on the implementation of the Welfare of Animals Act. That was a very productive process, which led to amendment No 52 being brought forward by the Minister today. Will the Minister give an assurance that, as we move forward, he will ensure that the legislation remains fit for purpose and that, if problems arise with implementation, it will be subject to further review?

Mr Ford: I was not expecting an intervention so early, nor one so positive about the work that has been done. I could recommend to Members that they be equally supportive. As Mr Weir says, the joint review by DOJ and DARD was a very useful exercise, especially as it followed the relevant legislation relatively speedily. The input from the animal welfare organisations into that review was very significant, and both I and Mrs O'Neill want to ensure that we have an ongoing working relationship with them over this issue, which lies between the two Departments.

As a result of the review, a number of improvements have been agreed, and we are considering specifically the improved sentencing arrangements today. While that legislation properly belongs to the Agriculture and Rural Development Minister, we are both aware of the considerable public interest, as shown by Mr Weir's speedy intervention, in ensuring that we have robust arrangements to protect and enhance animal welfare in this jurisdiction.

I believe that our joint response in the form of these new sentencing arrangements and the other measures being taken forward by DARD demonstrate a very significant commitment to animal welfare on the part of the two Departments and, indeed, this House. If we find ourselves in a position where this new legislation requires further thought — we have ongoing engagement with animal welfare organisations and the all-party group — I am sure that careful consideration will be given. That is an indication of the positive work being done. We have had a very thorough review by the two Departments, and I hope that we are now in a strong position and will look at any further issues that we had not noticed before, as they arise, to take things forward.

Mr Weir: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Ford: Yes.

Mr Weir: Obviously, I am keen to build on that positive exchange with the Minister, which I am sure will lead tomorrow's headlines on the Justice Bill. The whole House would agree on the need to ensure that animals are not placed in the ownership of those with convictions for animal cruelty offences. Will the Minister give an assurance that he will work closely with the animal rehoming charities and organisations to ensure that there are practical solutions and mechanisms that provide them with reassurance on this issue?

Mr Ford: I am very happy to give that commitment. I will continue to work with the Minister of Agriculture. I know that she shares my view that we should continue to work with rehoming charities to explore areas of best practice. The issues that have been highlighted are practical ones. I understand that a date for that meeting is in my diary; at least, so my officials tell me. I think that we are extending an invitation to at least the chair of the all-party group, who happens to be Mr Peter Weir. I have no doubt that he will add to the good work that Michelle O'Neill and I are doing, and we will ensure that we continue to provide the best possible arrangements in this jurisdiction.

Mr Lyttle: I thank the Minister for giving way. As vice-chair of the all-party group on animal welfare, I add my welcome to the increased maximum sentence for animal cruelty. Will the Minister continue to work with the Minister of Agriculture to ensure that better information is available to the public about the reporting of animal cruelty offences?

Mr Ford: I hope that not every member of the all-party group is going to get up. Perhaps we could stop at the two officers. Yes, it is a perfectly valid point on how we provide and enhance the information. Of course, these days, we do not have vast budgets for advertising campaigns, but there are ways of getting messages out via social media and the media generally, particularly in areas with decent local newspaper coverage. We need to ensure that we not only get the law right but continue to work with the voluntary animal welfare and rehoming groups to get the message out to the public about how we are going to do things right in future and that we will not allow others to engage in practices of animal cruelty, which, sadly, come to the courts of this jurisdiction too often.

I hope that these measures in the Bill will be introduced at an early stage so that we see the significant enhancement of sentencing provided for and send out a clear message.

Let us be clear that we are seeking to increase the maximum sentence for cases heard in the Crown Court from two years to five years, and the maximum sentence in the Magistrates' Court for offences of unnecessary suffering and causing or attending an animal fight from six months' to 12 months' imprisonment. The maximum fine that a Magistrates' Court can impose for these offences will increase from £5,000 to £20,000.

The three offences that will change from summary only to hybrid and therefore also be triable in the Crown Court are possession or supply of images of an animal fight, breach of a disqualification order and selling an animal pending the outcome of an appeal against a deprivation order. This, as I say, will allow the most serious offences to be taken in the Crown Court where they properly belong. The amendments will ensure that Northern Ireland has amongst the toughest penalties for these types of crime of any jurisdiction in these islands. That is something that we should seek to build on, and we should be proud of it if we can get it in place.

Having finished on the issue of animal welfare, I turn to the Committee's amendments to create a new offence of disclosing private sexual photographs and films with intent to cause distress, generally known as "revenge pornography". We are looking at the creation of an offence similar to that created in England and Wales by the Criminal Justice and Courts Act 2015. Such behaviour is, of course, already totally unacceptable. It should be recognised that there are existing laws in Northern Ireland to prosecute offenders for offences such as harassment, the improper use of a communications network and even blackmail.

I have not been made aware of particular or noticeable gaps in the law that have resulted in charges not being possible for this objectionable behaviour. As a result, given the time constraints and other pressing issues for the Department, it was not possible to give appropriate policy consideration to this new offence in time for a proposal to be considered for this Bill. I had planned, instead, to include the proposal in a proper policy consultation for future legislative change, as part of a wider review of related areas covering certain sexual offences and child protection.

It seemed sensible to deal with the issue in the round to ensure that the law in this important area was developed in a coherent and logical manner. However, given the clearly stated support for the introduction of a similar provision to the offence that already exists in England and Wales, I am content to support the Committee's amendment, subject to a minor amendment that I intend to table at Further Consideration Stage to clarify the level of fine for a summary offence. At present, clause 42A(9)(b) does not precisely define the level of fine for a summary conviction, and that would need to be corrected. The other point is that the usual period on summary conviction would be imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months, a fine or both. However, that is a detail, which is what we have Further Consideration Stage for. I am happy to accept the will of the Committee that we should proceed to make this amendment today.

A further amendment is proposed specifically by Mr Paul Frew regarding the introduction of a domestic abuse offence to capture patterns of coercive and controlling behaviour in intimate relationships, an issue that arose during the discussion on the last Bill. Both Mr Frew and Mrs Kelly have shown considerable interest in this aspect of tackling domestic violence. In this specific instance, I will not support amendment No 56; indeed, I am opposing it. It proposes, in effect, to replicate section 76 of the Serious Crime Act 2015, which was commenced in England and Wales on 29 December last, following an extensive public consultation process. Members will be aware that, during consideration of the last Justice Bill, I gave an undertaking to consult on the introduction of a similar offence in Northern Ireland. The Justice Committee has considered and approved a draft consultation paper, covering not just this offence but the introduction of a domestic violence disclosure scheme in Northern Ireland on 28 January. The public consultation was launched just last week on 5 February and will close on 29 April.

(Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Beggs] in the Chair)

In developing and bringing forward the consultation paper, I sought the views of the Police Service of Northern Ireland, which will have a key and significant role in determining and obtaining evidence for the offence. Acknowledging that the offence has only recently been introduced in England and Wales, the police believe that it would be prudent to await feedback from England and Wales on the efficacy of the new offence in criminalising the unseen aspect of abusive relationships. I support the view of the police that feedback from the introduction of the offence in England and Wales would be very beneficial in shaping future legislation in Northern Ireland. Furthermore, I believe that the feedback from the ongoing public consultation exercise will greatly assist and strengthen how best we legislate for the offence in Northern Ireland.

4.30 pm

Just a few weeks ahead of us, on 22 December last year, Scotland launched a second public consultation on the draft offence of domestic abuse. That consultation closes on 1 April, and we can benefit from its outcome, particularly as it deals with a slightly wider construct in the definition of domestic abuse, dealing with the physical and psychological aspects.

Whilst acknowledging the work done by Mr Frew and Mrs Kelly previously, I believe that the consultation is the right place to address things to ensure that, in slightly slower time, we get this aspect of the legislation absolutely right. Therefore, I request the Member not to move the amendment at this time, to await the outcome of our public consultation, to learn the lessons of the application in England and Wales and to see the Scottish consultation concluded. I believe that that would be the best way forward.

If the amendment were to be pressed, amendments would be required at Further Consideration Stage. However, we should get the entire process right — the issues that Mrs Kelly and Mr Frew highlighted — and ensure that we have robust legislation, rather than doing something today that would potentially have to be changed in the early years of the next mandate.

Mr Frew, I acknowledge, has been busy on the Bill as an individual. He also has amendment No 57 seeking to create an offence of assaulting and obstructing certain emergency workers. I believe that we all agree that attacks on public services should not be tolerated. All public servants have the right to go about their service to the community free from abuse and the threat of violence. However, I raise a slight concern that a precedent could be set if there is a suggestion that the role of some should be prioritised.

I am not aware of any problems or shortcomings with existing legislation, which allows for assaults on all public servants, including paramedics and other ambulance workers, to be prosecuted under the Offences Against the Person Act 1861. In addition, I ask the House to note that attacks on public servants or attacks that damage emergency equipment may already be treated as aggravating factors in sentencing. Indeed, DHSSPS, which is responsible for healthcare staff and has an obvious interest in the amendment, has previously considered the introduction of legislation that would create a specific offence of assaulting or impeding a healthcare worker in the execution of their duties. That consideration acknowledged that it was not apparent how an additional offence would increase the protection afforded to Health and Social Care staff over and above the offences already available under the Offences Against the Person Act and the Protection from Harassment Order 1997. It was also considered unlikely that an assailant would be deterred by a separate criminal offence related specifically to the assault or abuse of Health and Social Care workers. I understand, however, that the Health Minister is content in principle that the creation of this offence is welcome. Therefore, I will not oppose Mr Frew's amendment, although definitional issues would need to be picked up at Further Consideration Stage, if the amendment is agreed today, to ensure that the legislation is as good as it can be.

Let us be absolutely clear: we should all believe that all public servants should be free to go about their service to the community free from abuse and the threat of violence.

Whilst the current legislation provides adequate scope for effective prosecutions in those despicable instances when emergency staff are abused or, regrettably, attacked in the course of their efforts, I am content to accept the amendment if that is the will of the House.

Mr Ross: I will cover the amendments in the group tabled by the Minister of Justice and my colleague Paul Frew before setting out the detail of the Committee's amendments.

In relation to penalties for animal welfare offences, amendment No 52 will, as the Minister outlined, increase the statutory maximum penalties in the Welfare of Animals Act 2011. In November 2015, the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development advised the Committee for Justice that the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development was intending to make these changes by way of amendments to the Justice (No. 2) Bill as, whilst it has policy responsibility for animal welfare, it did not have a suitable legislative vehicle to bring forward the amendments before the end of the mandate.

The changes have arisen from joint departmental work between Agriculture and Justice and the review of the implementation of the Welfare of Animals Act 2011, following the Assembly debate on animal cruelty.

The Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development welcomed the proposed increase in penalties but had ongoing concerns regarding enforcement and whether some individuals were circumventing the Act.

The Department of Justice indicated that the Minister had considered the proposed amendments in the context of the wider sentencing framework and the penalties available in neighbouring jurisdictions for animal welfare offences. It indicated that the Minister believed that increasing the maximum penalties in that way was appropriate and would send out a message that animal cruelty will not be tolerated. The Minister also agreed in principle to add animal cruelty offences to the unduly lenient sentencing scheme, which would further strengthen the law around animal cruelty.

The Committee explored a range of issues with officials from the Department of Justice and DARD, including whether there are clear sentencing guidelines available for animal cruelty offences, whether the proposed amendments are adequate and will achieve the desired effect, and whether stronger enforcement measures are required considering the number and length of custodial sentences that have been handed down for cases brought under the 2011 Act.

Committee Members are very aware of the public concern about some of the sentences that have been handed down for convictions for animal welfare offences, particularly those involving extreme cases of animal cruelty, under the 2011 Act. We have all received representations for changes to be made to the sentencing regime, either through the Committee or as individual MLAs. The Committee therefore welcomes and supports amendment No 52, which will increase the penalties available for such offences, thereby reflecting the serious nature of them and providing some of the toughest penalties for animal cruelty offences of any jurisdiction in these islands.

In relation to the domestic violence amendments, Mr Frew has tabled an amendment to introduce a new offence relating to controlling or coercive behaviour in an intimate or family relationship. The Committee has not had an opportunity to consider and reach a position on that, although I was grateful to Mr Frew for explaining the amendment at our Committee meeting last Thursday and for his offer to members who wanted more information to go to him. The Committee does, however, fully appreciate the need to address domestic violence in all its forms and provide the best protection possible to victims.

The Committee is aware that the Department is undertaking a consultation on the creation of a specific offence of domestic abuse that captures patterns of coercive and controlling behaviour in intimate relationships in line with the proposed new definition of domestic violence and abuse contained in the draft 'Stopping Domestic and Sexual Violence and Abuse' strategy document. That appears to be what Mr Frew is aiming to achieve with his amendment.

It is clear that there is growing frustration among Members about the length of time it is taking the Department of Justice and the Health Department to finalise, publish and implement a new domestic and sexual violence strategy. There are, therefore, opportunities being taken by Members in this Bill, as happened with the previous Justice Bill, to try to move ahead with particular issues, such as the offence that Mr Frew highlighted.

Given that there is no such specific offence, and it would make it clear that unacceptable behaviours such as those outlined in the amendment are criminal, I suspect that the Committee would have some sympathy with Mr Frew's amendment. If Mr Frew were agreeable, perhaps a better way of dealing with the issue would be to ensure that the Committee has an opportunity to look at the consultation responses and, as with the issue that Mrs Kelly raised during the passage of the previous Justice Bill, allow us to take evidence from organisations that represent victims of domestic violence and look at potential unintended consequences.

When Mrs Kelly made her proposals around Clare's law, there were some charities that were concerned that they could give women a false sense of security. For example, if a woman has a check done that finds that their partner is clear, they might think that they are not at risk, which is not always the case. Others see it very much as a way of empowering women to understand what their partner has been potentially convicted of. I was grateful to Mrs Kelly for not moving her amendment at that time, and, if Mr Frew were similarly minded, it would benefit the Committee's scrutiny role.

The Committee has had an opportunity to consider the issues relating to amendment No 57, which creates an offence of assaulting or obstructing a person employed in the provision of ambulance services whilst they are responding to emergency situations. Lord Morrow had advised us of his intention to bring forward a similar amendment. We invited him along to the Committee to discuss that.

Over the past 14 or 15 months, since assuming my current role, if a Member has said that they intend to bring forward an amendment to the Justice Bill, I have afforded them the opportunity to come to the Committee. I was grateful that Lord Morrow came to the Committee to explain the intention behind his amendment. Likewise, Mr McCrea had proposals for an amendment that he has not moved forward with. Whilst the Committee was not in agreement with what Mr McCrea proposed, I was grateful that at least he came along, explained it to us and took questions on it. It allowed us as a Committee to then ask the Department, the Police Service and the PPS whether it was workable and achievable. It helps us as a Committee when those amendments are brought to the House, and it allows the whole House to look at the Committee scrutiny. Of course, this issue has been raised previously, and I know that the Minister shares the Committee view. During a debate on the Criminal Justice Bill in 2013, he said:

"Last-minute amendments on substantial issues with direct effects on people, even on small numbers of people, are not the way to do good government and not the way that we should operate in this place." — [Official Report (Hansard), Bound Volume 83, p75, col 2].

His colleague Mr Dickson agreed. He asked:

"What message will we convey, therefore, about the importance of every stage of the legislative process if we make major changes to the law that have not been discussed in the prescribed way of scrutiny in all our relevant Statutory Committees?" — [Official Report (Hansard), Bound Volume 83, p21, col 1].

I agree with him, and that is why I tried to invite Members who had amendments to the Committee. It allows the Committee to discuss and seek advice on them.

On Mr Frew's second amendment, let me say from the outset that the Committee fully appreciates the difficult and often dangerous work undertaken by the emergency services, including paramedics on the front line. We also recognise and are sympathetic to the intention of his amendment. It is fair to say, however, that it is a complicated area, and the Minister referred to that. A number of issues were raised in correspondence to the Committee from the Department of Justice, the Public Prosecution Service and, in particular, the Minister of Health, Social Services and Public Safety.

The approach taken by Mr Frew in the amendment differs from that which was originally proposed by Lord Morrow and goes some way to addressing some of the issues raised, particularly around the practical implications outlined by the PPS. There is, however, an argument about whether a specific offence is necessary and whether other staff who undertake front-line duties with the public should also be included. Perhaps that warrants further discussion.

Both the Department of Justice and the PPS outlined that, where there is evidence of an assault on an emergency worker, the PPS can prosecute under existing assault offences, and, where the victim was serving the public at the time, prosecutors will consider that as an aggravating factor when deciding whether, for example, an offender should be prosecuted in the Crown Court, where greater sentencing options are of course available. Attacks on public servants may also be treated as aggravating factors when passing sentence in such cases. The Judicial Studies Board for Northern Ireland's sentencing guidelines for the Magistrates' Court state:

"Where an offence is committed against such a person the courts will treat this as a substantial aggravating factor when determining the seriousness of the offence.”

The Health Minister advised the Committee that previous consideration had been given to the introduction of legislation that would create the specific offence of assaulting or impeding a healthcare worker whilst that worker was carrying out their duties and provide that anyone found guilty would be liable to possible imprisonment or a fine. He indicated that those considerations had identified a number of practical problems with such legislation, including the fact that it was already an offence to assault or abuse a health and social care worker, and the need to establish who would be covered by the legislation and in which physical locations the protection afforded would have effect.

Mr Frew's amendment focuses on protecting persons employed in the provision of ambulance services while responding to emergency circumstances. When the Committee discussed the initial proposal with Lord Morrow, two issues were raised: the inclusion of other staff, including other front-line medical staff in accident and emergency departments, nursing staff, social workers undertaking home visits and members of voluntary organisations, such as Lagan Search and Rescue, which the Committee visited last year; and whether the proposal would protect paramedic staff if they were assaulted in an accident and emergency department or only when out on call.

The Committee was sympathetic to the intention of the proposal, and that early engagement allowed Mr Frew to taper his amendment to make it as fit for purpose as he possibly can. It is my expectation, therefore, that Members will want to support it. Of course, it is an awkward situation, in that Mr Frew has not had the opportunity to outline his amendment to the House yet.

I turn now to amendment Nos 53, 54 and 55, which the Committee for Justice tabled. Online crime is becoming more and more prevalent. The Committee has been considering whether current criminal law is equipped to deal with the new type and range of offences being committed or whether legislation needs to be changed and updated to provide the necessary tools for the police, the Public Prosecution Service and the courts to tackle these emerging threats properly.

4.45 pm

As part of our work programme over the last year, the Committee held a hugely successful conference on “Justice in a Digital Age” back in October. We covered a wide range of issues, including cybercrime, social media and online protection and the legal response to changing technologies. A number of areas for possible legislative change were highlighted at that time on improving online protection, particularly as there was a focus on protecting children online. Following that conference, the Committee decided to give further consideration to three possible changes proposed by Jim Gamble, who was one of our speakers at the event, with a view to bringing forward amendments using this Bill as the vehicle. The Committee also decided to give consideration to creating a new offence to cover what is commonly referred to as revenge porn.

The first proposed change related to amending current law so that a child or young person under the age of 18 who takes, makes, distributes or possesses a sexual image of themselves will commit no criminal offence unless it is done with malicious intent. Mr Gamble believes that the law as it stands and under which it is an offence for a person below the age of 18 to take, make, show, distribute or possess a sexual image of themselves discourages young people from coming forward quickly when they have shared such an image with another person and fear it may be shared with others for fear of prosecution. In his view, decriminalising that, unless it occurs with malicious intent, will encourage children who find themselves in circumstances of crisis to come forward to the relevant authorities.

The second proposal related to an amendment to the Protection from Harassment Order or the creation of a new law to deal with the aggravated impact when an individual or individuals use the anonymity provided by the Internet or the ability to create multiple online accounts to harass another person. Mr Gamble indicated that there were not a substantial number of individuals being prosecuted for such harassment despite, for example, the high number of people involved in trolling online, which, in his view, demonstrates that the law as currently configured is not working.

The third proposal would create a new law to prohibit an individual of 18 or above who masquerades as someone below that age and engages online with an individual whom they know or believe to be under the age of 18. An individual who did so would commit a criminal offence unless they could prove that they did so with reasonable cause or lawful authority. In reasonable cause defences, the burden of proof would shift to the alleged offender. Mr Gamble highlighted that many people already think that this is an offence and expressed the view that, if an adult goes online and masquerades as someone below the age of 18 for the purposes of talking to or engaging with someone below 18, this question has to be posed: why would they do that? There is unlikely to be a lawful excuse or authority.

The Committee then took the views of the Department of Justice, the Police Service of Northern Ireland, the Public Prosecution Service and the Human Rights Commission to assist its consideration of the proposals. Whilst all the organisations recognised the prevalence of online crime and the need to ensure appropriate measures are in place to tackle it robustly, they highlighted a range of issues on the proposals that, in their view, would require further detailed consideration.

The Justice Committee is very aware that the development of the Internet has created challenges for the criminal law. It believes that it is essential that the law responds and adapts to those challenges and that the law enforcement agencies are provided with appropriate and robust tools to tackle new and emerging types of criminal behaviour.

The Committee is supportive of the proposals but recognises that this is a complex area of law and that any changes will require careful consideration to ensure that there are no unintended consequences. The Minister of Justice, in correspondence to the Committee, asked us to support the inclusion of the proposals in a policy consultation for future legislative change to be undertaken by his Department as part of a wider review of related areas covering certain sexual offences and child protection, rather than bringing forward amendments as part of this Bill. Given the very limited time available in the context of the Bill, the Committee reluctantly agreed to adopt that approach, as we want to see these issues progressed as soon as possible. We have requested a briefing on the proposed departmental consultation at the earliest opportunity. I also ask the Minister to provide an assurance today that the consultation will be prioritised and any necessary legislative changes brought forward as early as possible in the next mandate.

As I indicated, the Committee recognises that times and technologies have changed and will continue to change. There is a need to adapt the legislation to meet those new challenges. It has therefore decided to table amendment Nos 53, 54 and 55 to create the new offence of disclosing private sexual photographs and films with intent to cause distress. That offence already exists in England and Wales through the Criminal Justice and Courts Act 2015 and has been widely welcomed. Therefore, there are unlikely to be the same issues regarding unintended consequences. A person found guilty of such an offence will be liable on conviction by indictment to a term not exceeding two years or a fine or both and on summary conviction to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 12 months or a fine or both. I am sure Members are aware of the distress, devastation and humiliation that is caused to victims when intimate photographs or films they have shared with another individual, often someone who at the time they trusted implicitly, are then shared widely, most often on the Internet, without their consent and with the intent of causing distress.

The Minister outlined the potential to bring prosecutions under existing legislation, but the difficulty is that, when that legislation was drafted, nobody envisaged the world that we live in today. We all now have smartphones capable of taking photographs and videos, all of which can be shared online almost instantly. Therefore, I think that the law needs to keep pace with technological changes and recognise the world that we live in today. The Committee believes that introducing a specific offence to deal with revenge porn will assist the police and the Public Prosecution Service in tackling this obnoxious crime. It will also send a clear message to potential perpetrators that such behaviour will not be tolerated, and, hopefully, it will provide some assurance to victims that this type of crime is being taken seriously by legislators and the law enforcement agencies.

I was pleased that the amendments were welcomed in the media yesterday by Nexus and by members of the legal profession who have done much work in the area. Unfortunately, it is an area that causes increasing concern to the legal community. I have spoken to solicitors who deal with similar issues, particularly those involving young people. Sharing sexual images of themselves seems to be a cultural thing among young people. It is all too commonplace across schools, and children as young as 12, 13 and 14 are doing this. This is a real problem out there, and we need to make sure that we have the right legislation in place to ensure that people have confidence to come forward and that we can convict those who maliciously share this material.

When the Committee suggested the proposal to the Department, it indicated that, given time constraints and other pressing issues, it was not possible for it to give the appropriate policy consideration to include it in the Bill. The Department said that it intended to include the proposal in the policy consultation on a broader review of sexual offences. The Committee, aware of the increasing incidence of this behaviour, wanted to table the amendment today and ensure that Northern Ireland people had the same protection as people in England and Wales. We believe that this is the opportunity to make sure that our law keeps pace, and, therefore, we ask the House to back the Committee amendment.

Mr McCartney: Go raibh maith agat, a LeasCheann Comhairle. I will speak briefly on each of the six amendments in group 4. The Minister and, indeed, the Chair outlined the animal cruelty issues and explained that amendment No 52 is just a tightening up and a coming together of the two Departments to ensure that a gap in legislation about which there is public concern is filled. We are fairly supportive of that.

The Chair correctly outlined the broad view of the Committee on amendment Nos 53, 54 and 55. The Chair mentioned the conference in W5, which is what opened up this area to all of us. We had been aware of pieces of it, but the conference not only brought everything together but showed us that there were gaps in legislation on issues to do with the Internet, particularly on what people call "revenge porn". The Minister accepts the amendments and has agreed to take on work to deal with other aspects of this as we go forward. That is important because the many people who are subjected to this feel vulnerable and isolated. Then, there are the people who use it for the purposes of control, bullying and coercion, and they need a very clear signal that that will not be tolerated. The Chair mentioned the intervention by Nexus and referred to people in legal circles, including those dealing particularly with young people, who work on this and have other impacts. We have seen in recent media reports that young people who have been subjected to this have gone on to self-harm, and, worse than that, some have taken their own life, so the amendments are to be welcomed.

Amendment No 57 relates to the blue-light services. All of us are supportive; indeed, we all would say that people in public service, particularly those in the blue-light services, deserve protection from attack. The refinement of the amendment is welcome. There was a discussion, and I think the Health Minister's letter and, indeed, issues from the Department and the PPS showed us that we need to be careful that we do not over-define it and that it does not creep into other aspects that are not necessary. Again, I welcome the Minister's comments. He is right: there are laws and sentencing guidelines around aggravation, but I think everybody is broadly supportive of the terms of this.

The last amendment is amendment No 56. I am not saying that this is one of those issues that comes at you out of the blue, but there was certainly not much discussion. Following what Dolores Kelly said the last time, there is an acceptance that this is an issue that we need to examine and something that we need to do. The Minister's intent, today, is to have a look at this. New laws have been passed elsewhere. We have to look at the impact of those and at whether they are doing what they were designed to do. That should be in the in tray for the new Minister after the election, come May. We will wait to hear what Paul Frew has to say in relation to the amendment's intention. He outlined it last week at the Committee, but we will hear his response to the Minister.

Mrs D Kelly: I thank the Minister for living up to the commitment that he made during the passage of the last Justice Bill on the consultation on coercive and controlling behaviour and the disclosure process. I very much welcome the intervention of Mr Frew in tabling the amendments. They ensure that we have not lost sight of the necessity to improve protections for people who are subjected to domestic violence — men and women, who are, of course, the primary victims.

I also welcome the comments by the Chairperson of the Justice Committee, Mr Ross, on how the Committee is spending quite a bit of time, forensically examining the pros and cons of the disclosure process or what is known as “Clare’s law”. I welcome that. It is prudent to learn from other jurisdictions and to look at the implementation of the law to — I paraphrase Mr McCartney — see if it does what it says on the tin. I certainly have no objection to that.

I welcome the cross-community consensus on giving the police more powers to better protect victims of domestic violence. I look forward to the next mandate, when, hopefully, the incoming Justice Minister will be able to put the provisions into law.

Mr Kennedy: I join others in giving a broad welcome to the measures outlined in the group. The Minister of Justice has outlined the changes in the approach that has been adopted in respect of amendment No 52. I know that a considerable amount of work has taken place with the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development. Obviously, that is important work, and it is important that it has brought us to this stage. All in the House agree that it is long past time that proper penalties were put in place for those who indulge and engage in animal cruelty. I think that that will be broadly welcomed, not only in the House but in the wider community.

I move to the amendments tabled by the Chair of the Justice Committee in relation to what is described as revenge porn. We have all been horrified to hear of the very bad experiences that people, some young and some older, have had with that. It seems to be a modern-day evil, so I very much welcome the fact that we are at least bringing our legislation into line with England and Wales. I know that it is probably not ideal from the Minister’s point of view that more research or whatever has not been conducted by the Department into the impact in Northern Ireland terms, but, nevertheless, there will be widespread public support for the measure.

5.00 pm

It may well be that the amendments will play nicely into or at least link into the cyberbullying provisions in the anti-bullying legislation that is currently being considered by the Education Committee, having been brought forward by the Education Minister. There are very clear links. It is therefore important that the Assembly is reactive to the needs and the dangers that are out there, particularly for our young people.

Mr Frew’s amendment No 56 seeks to tackle controlling behaviour and domestic violence. He will have heard previous contributors indicate their support for the intent behind the measure, but we all need to see how practicable the amendment is and how it can be brought into legislation. I am interested in hearing from Mr Frew on his present thinking on the measure.

Amendment No 57 is another measure from Mr Frew. It is aimed at giving more protection, in particular, to paramedics. Again, the intent behind the amendment can be supported, but there are all manner of blue-light workers who, unfortunately, face real dangers in carrying out their important work. The amendment as currently framed is not an exhaustive list, but we can support it in principle.

That completes my review of the group 4 amendments on behalf of the Ulster Unionist Party.

Mr Dickson: In supporting the Minister, I will be brief. There is some value at this stage in commending the Chair of the Committee for the leadership that he has given, particularly with the “Justice in a Digital Age” conference, which the Committee organised and for which he was the catalyst. That has opened up for us, the wider public and the Department of Justice, as we narrow it down in today’s debate, the importance of the issue.

The other side of that coin is the incredible work that officials in the Department do on a very wide range of issues. In this group, we are looking at everything from animal welfare to revenge pornography to the protection of blue-light workers. Those are very diverse areas of work, all of which require intensive research and a great deal of effort from officials. Sitting over all of that is a Minister who is genuinely trying to deliver change and a fairer, more effective and more modern justice system.

Without going over the top, I genuinely have to say, for the record, that I believe that the Chair and the Minister have clearly demonstrated where the Assembly and legislation like this could and should be going. Each of the items is vital, and there is everything from animal welfare to revenge pornography and the protection of workers in very vulnerable situations. I accept that, with regard to the issue of vulnerable workers in the health system, we have seen security staff having to be employed in hospitals and A&Es. We also need to address the important issue of lone healthcare workers who maybe go to a place they have never been before, perhaps late at night, and meet people with difficulties. I am aware of an incident in my constituency, which I do not wish to expand on, in which healthcare workers were attacked — not for any offensive reason, but because of the state of the client with whom they had to work. It would not be appropriate to use this type of legislation for that, and we need to ensure that we can discern all the elements. I am content to support all the items that have been raised and commented on by the Minister.

Mr Frew: I will speak on the two amendments that have been tabled in my name. The first is amendment No 56, which will insert a new clause to deal with domestic violence. I have listened very intently to what the Minister and other Members have said about that.

I begin by paying tribute to the work that Mrs Dolores Kelly has very ably done on that subject, especially in the Justice Act 2015. That began as another miscellaneous Bill that we were able to hook on to and really push forward agendas and our thoughts and objectives in a very considerable way. Dolores Kelly should be applauded and acknowledged for the work that she has done overall on domestic violence and in trying to relieve the pressure on victims. I commend her and place on record my praise for the work that she has done to date.

Everyone has the right to feel safe and secure at home. If you cannot feel safe at home, where can you feel safe? We hear it all the time. We hear phrases like, “You can do whatever you want behind closed doors; it will not bother or annoy me.” We use that term so loosely on so many different subjects. It is not all right to do whatever you want behind closed doors if you are committing a crime. For so long, in years gone by, domestic violence was one of those crimes that no one talked about and that people, dare I say it, even ignored. People felt pity, even distress, but they would have gone home and that would have been the end of it.

Even in this day, we worry and wonder about definitions of domestic violence crimes. What is domestic violence? What does it mean? Who is affected? Who is the offender? Who is the victim? It is very important to thrash those out and use best practice from around the world as quickly as we can to protect those people — those vulnerable people — who see no other way to turn and are victims of domestic abuse.

I have deliberately used the term “domestic abuse”. We all talk about domestic violence. We can all see bruises, cuts and damaged limbs, but we do not see the psychological damage that is being done. There are words in the English language that we use: threats, control, coercive behaviour, psychological abuse, verbal abuse, sexual abuse, financial abuse, emotional abuse. Most of that will be criminal behaviour, but some will not. Most of it should be, and it is very important that we get to grips with this issue.

What does “coercive behaviour” mean? Since I tabled the amendments, people have asked me what it means, what it looks like and what it is. Here is a definition:

“An act or a pattern of acts of assault, threats, humiliation and intimidation or other abuse that is used to harm, punish, or frighten”

That is very important. As I said, we can all see bruises, cuts and damaged limbs.

The trends in domestic violence over the last 10 years are alarming. ‘Trends in Domestic Abuse Incidents and Crimes Recorded by the Police in Northern Ireland 2004-05 to 2014-15’ was published on 6 August 2015. Over that period, there were 11 female victims of domestic abuse crimes aged 18-plus per 1,000 females in the population and five male victims of domestic abuse crimes aged 18-plus per 1,000 males in the population. This is not a gender thing; it does not happen just to women. There were 11 female victims per 1,000 and five male victims per 1,000. The majority, 61%, of domestic abuse victims aged 18-plus were female and 26% were male. Surprisingly, and worryingly, 13% of the total were under the age of 18. That should shock and worry us all.

In 2014-15 alone, 28,287 domestic abuse incidents were recorded — the highest number recorded since the data series began in 2004. There were 13,426 domestic abuse crimes reported in 2014-15. This is a serious issue in our society that we must get to grips with — not only must we get to grips with it, we must protect and support the victims who are suffering at this precise moment. As I speak, there will be people at home who feel fearful and threatened, who have low self-esteem and are depressed, going through all sorts of turmoil and telling no one at all.

Over the course of my work on this amendment, I spoke to groups such as Women’s Aid and the Men’s Advisory Project. In 2014-15, 932 women and 689 children were supported in Women’s Aid refuges. Some 71 women were supported through pregnancy in refuges. Outreach services from Women’s Aid were accessed by 5,962 women, and 34,420 calls were managed by the 24-hour domestic and sexual violence helpline. I could go on and on. I could talk all night about numbers and statistics, but we do not have all night — or maybe we do, because this is a serious issue. I can talk about numbers and people will hear them, but they will go in one ear and out the other. Let us talk about people. Of course, the names that I will mention are not real names.

5.15 pm

I want to talk to you about Sally. From a very young age, Sally’s father told her that she was worthless. She was not allowed to go out and mix with other children. She had a brother, and she recalls that they were treated very differently. He was allowed to go to people’s houses and play, while she was not. Sally was told that she was stupid and that there was no point in her even in going to school, as she would never make anything of herself. She was made to dress in unfashionable clothes that made her peers laugh at her. Sally was told in no uncertain terms, from a very young age, that her opinion was not worth listening to.

Her mother experienced that same abuse and worse. Her mother fell ill, but the father would not let her go to get checked out. The mother died of cancer, which left Sally on her own with her father and her brother. Sally tried everything to keep things running smoothly, but her father would find flaws and mistakes in everything that she did and would blame Sally for anything that went wrong in the home. Some days, things were OK for Sally, but, most days, they were not.

I could go on about Sally and the things that her father called her, but Sally plucked up her courage, saved up a bit of money and left home. She became homeless and slept in a tent in a doorway in another town in the UK. Somehow, by chance, someone who knew her and her father came across her and told the father. The father went to that town and brought her home. She then ran away and now lives safely in Northern Ireland, but she is heart-fear that her dad will find her again. What sort of life has Sally had up to now? How dare anyone tell someone that they are worthless and that their opinions do not count? How dare anyone say that to another human being, especially one who should have loved and cared for Sally and supported her? How dare any human being treat someone else like that?

I also work with the Men’s Advisory Project, which is based in Northern Ireland and has sister organisations in mainland UK. Its members tell me stories about men who suffer not violence so much, although it does happen a lot, but psychologically through sleep deprivation. I heard that term a lot in my twenties when I was a member of the Territorial Army (TA), so I know what sleep deprivation feels like. However, it was my choice to be in the TA. Some people in this country go home at night and cannot sleep. Why can they not sleep? It is not because of illness or a condition that they have; it is because their partner will not let them go to sleep. Is that not amazing? Can we even believe that your partner will not let you go to sleep at night, even though you have to get up the next day to go to work? They keep themselves up to keep you up. Is it not incredible that that happens in this day and age and we cannot do anything about it? We cannot help, we cannot support and we cannot protect. That is why we need new and different laws and why our laws have to change to suit our times and the knowledge that we have. Once you hear these things, you cannot unhear them.

I was a foreman electrician for many years. I knew a young lad who was a “spark” — an electrician — who was quiet enough and very sensible. He came in one time with a facial injury, and the boys on the building site said, “What happened to you? Did your wife hit you?”. It was a bit of a joke that caught on, and the boys latched onto it. Maybe it was the response that the young lad gave, but it caught on. It became a daily occurrence. As foreman, I got wind of it. You want to be one of the guys when you are on a building site and build up a rapport, but you also have to be very aware of what is happening and look through people as much as look at them. I saw that it was having an effect and not just a bullying effect, although that is bad enough — constantly getting the same joke over and over again.

I got that man to a quiet part of the site and said to him, “Look, is everything OK? I know that the boys are hassling you and I’ll deal with them, but is everything OK at home?”. It took courage for me to do that as his foreman. He broke down in front of me. I am talking about a building site, one of the great bastions of being a man, so to speak. He broke down and told me that he was having a horrid time at home. What could he do? He was married. Is that not what happens when you are married? People get cross. Tempers and patience fray. He told me, “I just said the wrong thing. It was my fault”. That put me in an awful position too, of course. I tried to advise that man as best I could, but I knew that whatever I was telling him was never going to be enough. Then, that man, under his own steam and in his own time, came in one day and said to me, “I’ve decided that I’m going to leave my wife”. Imagine the courage that that man had plucked up to come and tell me that he was prepared to leave his wife. You do not really want to get involved in someone else’s disputes, but I said, “Look, if you think that’s the right thing, you must do it”. He went home that night, and, when he came in the next day, I asked him how it went. The man told me that, before he could speak, his wife told him that she was expecting a child. That changed everything for him. He felt that he was trapped, he could not do anything and that he was stuck in that situation for ever and a day.

I have lost track of that man. I do not know what happened. I do not know what happened to the family unit, to him or his wife or what happened to their baby. Maybe there are more children; I do not know. It is people like him I think about and want to help. I want to make a difference, and, if I cannot make a difference in this place, there is something badly wrong. That is my motivation for tabling the amendment.

There is another story that the Men’s Advisory Project told me. It started after two years of marriage when the wife started to kick, slap and shove. Again, she fell pregnant, and she made it clear that, if they did not stay together, he would not see the child at all. Remarkably, when the child was born, the kicking, slapping and shoving stopped. But the threats carried on. He had to keep his clothes, which were torn and dirty, in the car or the shed because he was not allowed to keep them in the house. He was not allowed to have the heating on if he was the only person in the house. His relationship with his child was seriously affected because of the way that his wife talked to him. All his finances, everything that he had, was tied up in that house: the mortgage, the electricity bill, the heating that he could not turn on if he was in the house by himself — he paid for it all.

These are the things that happen on a day-to-day basis, and they have to stop. I am realistic enough to know that cases like this will always happen. People will always act in certain ways, and that is why it is important, at that point, that we somehow step in and inform and educate those victims that they are indeed victims. Of one thing you may rest assured: there are many victims out there who believe that it is their fault and that there is nothing they can do about it. “I have made my bed, and I have to sleep in it”. You do not. There is help out there. There is Women’s Aid, the Men’s Advisory Project and people who will help. Please contact those people and tell your story. That may be the only way that the abuse will stop.

People use children as a weapon: “You will not see the kids any more if you leave. Do not be thinking that you will come down here one day a week to see the children; you will not be here at all”. There are also very serious cases. A man actually got his children out of bed in the middle of the night and performed sexual acts on his wife in front of them. That only happened once, but it only had to happen once, because he threatened it every other time. What would a mother do in such a situation?

People are faced with such pressure every day. We think that we have pressure. We go to work, and we have to talk to the media, and we worry about it for a minute or two. However, there are people living in this country — our constituents — who are suffering in silence. They are hiding the bruises. In many cases, there are no bruises, and it is just as painful. It is just as dangerous, and it has a devastating effect on those people.

I have said enough on this now. I have got the point across, and I hear what the Minister says. Because of the consultation launched last Friday, I will not move the amendment. But I ask everyone in the Assembly to encourage people out there to inform themselves about the consultation, to consult and to actually put something down on paper and get it to the Minister. There is a job of work to do here. It could have been done today, but it is right to take time to reflect on what the law here should be. A law has been passed in England: the Serious Crime Act 2015. Part 5 is on the protection of children and others, and, under domestic abuse, section 76 is “Controlling or coercive behaviour in an intimate or family relationship”. We do not really know how it has worked yet, so I agree with the Minister that it is right to hold off and do things right. We do not want to do harm. That is the last thing that I want to do, and the last thing the Assembly should do is do harm through legislation that will make things worse.

We have to take into consideration another issue. If we have a law on controlling and coercive behaviour, how can we be assured that the perpetrator does not use it against the victim? It is notoriously hard to prove some of this stuff. That has to be thought out well and ironed out. I hope that that is teased out in the consultation. Victims’ groups are worried that such a law might just become another tool or pressure point that the perpetrator uses against the victim: “If you go to the police because I hit you, I will go to the police to say that you are controlling me”. These are things that we have to be careful of, and we must worry out.

5.30 pm

Of course, we have to make sure that the PSNI is up to speed with this. I believe that PSNI officers who attend houses with domestic abuse issues see this day in and day out. Maybe even they do not know how to react or how to work it out or whether it is a crime or not. They will sometimes walk away, not knowing what to do. We need to make sure that the PSNI is fully informed of and briefed on the new law, whatever it is, and knows how to apply it appropriately. I will not move the amendment in the good faith that the Minister has delivered on what he promised to Dolores Kelly at the time of the previous Justice Bill in bringing forward a consultation.

Some of the questions in the consultation were things like, "Is it right for people to be able to ask if a new partner has a history?". Absolutely. In the previous Justice Bill, I brought forward the child protection disclosure scheme. Why is it that people out there, the public, are the last to know? Why should that be the case? Every agency in officialdom may know something about someone, but the very person who ends up closest to them knows nothing. Not only should they have the right to ask; they most definitely should have the right to know. PPANI arrangements already allow for someone to be told that they are at risk if their new partner has committed sexual offences against children or vulnerable adults.

Mr Ross: Will the Member give way?

Mr Frew: Yes, I will.

Mr Ross: I have been listening intently to what the Member has been saying. Would he agree, however, that one of the dangers with some disclosure systems is that, when you have asked about your partner and the answer comes back that there is no record of complaints or convictions, you then falsely think that you are safe? That is the worst scenario for someone who is in legitimate danger. There is a real task in getting any disclosure system right.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): I ask that remarks be made through the Chair for the benefit of Hansard.

Mr Frew: Does the Member want to continue? He is finished.

I agree with him 100%. A false sense of security is an issue. That can be countered by the way that the information is distributed. The answer can be worded to make sure that someone does not walk out of a police station, GP surgery or anywhere else with a false sense of security.

The advantages outweigh the negatives, because it will also work as an early detection system when the person has never been detected. If you say to the police, "This is happening to me, and I am starting to get really concerned. Can I have disclosure on this person?". That person should be entitled to disclosure, but the police or whoever it is should be taking note of what they have said, because they will realise straight away that they are a victim, and then the support mechanisms should kick in. This is not just about enforcement; this is about protection. It is also about awareness and education, and I believe that they are important. Fear and terror are primary weapons for a perpetrator of domestic violence. I will leave it there.

I move on now to amendment No 57, the new clause on ambulance workers. I acknowledge straight away that the wording can and will be tidied up. I am determined to do that at the next stage. It is important that I outline my thoughts on the wording, even though it is my own. It is my intention to amend it to make the Minister of Justice, as well as the Health Minister and the House, more secure.

I believe that I have support for the amendment in the House.

It would be helpful if I mentioned the adjustments now. I intend to remove the references to obstruction of paramedics. We know that there is already adequate law in the Emergency Workers (Obstruction) Act 2006. I picked up the wording, description and definition of the relevant NHS body from that legislation. I recognise that, in that law, there is already the crime of obstruction. I do not want to do harm by creating two competing legal provisions on obstruction, as that may well undermine any judicial process. So, I am prepared to lift out "and obstructing" so that the title will read:

"offence of assaulting certain emergency workers".

Clause 42B(1) will then begin:

"A person who without reasonable excuse assaults another while that other person is".

That takes obstruction out of it. Obstruction is already covered with penalties and fines. It will then become a law on assaulting ambulance staff. The clause will focus on creating a specific offence of assault and ensure greater parity with other blue-light workers.

I will also need to look at whether focusing the clause on emergency situations will add unnecessary complexity. I believe that it may do so. The way that clause 42B(2) on responding to emergency circumstances reads means that, if you assault somebody responding to emergency circumstances, you commit an offence. I believe that it has to be tighter. The key intention is to provide additional protection for paramedics in line with their police and fire colleagues and to send a signal that assaulting paramedics is not to be tolerated. Limiting this to emergency situations may be too restrictive.

I will be looking at whether the clause should focus on situations where paramedics are assaulted on duty, as on duty is more important than emergency circumstances. We have all been to events — I have been to Windsor Park to see Ballymena United lift silverware — where you see paramedics parked. They are not necessarily responding to an emergency, but it is no more acceptable for someone to step out of the crowd — someone supporting the opposing team, of course — and attack a paramedic. It is completely unacceptable. I would not want anyone to get off on a technicality just because that paramedic was not responding to an emergency.

I also need to look at the best way to define paramedics for the purpose of this clause. I will look at the wording on the maximum penalty to make sure that it reads consistently with Northern Ireland law. That is not to say that I am going to change the penalty. The amendment reads:

"on summary conviction, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 6 months or to a fine not exceeding the statutory maximum".

That is level 5; we know that it is level 5. Maybe we should use the term level 5 instead of "statutory maximum". I do not want to put a figure in there because, sooner or later, the maximum will change. I would not want then to have to go through and amend all the bits of legislation, so I believe that that will become level 5 as opposed to the statutory maximum. I believe that, with those minor adjustments, the amendment does no harm or damage to the clause or the intentions of the clause. I hope that it makes it more workable and more acceptable to the House. It was important that I started off by telling people the amendments that I wish to make at Further Consideration Stage, if the Bill gets passed today.

Why do we need this law? Why do we need to protect ambulance staff and paramedics? They work alongside the police and firefighters oftentimes. Section 66 of the Police (Northern Ireland) Act 1998 refers to any person guilty of attacking or wilfully obstructing a constable in the execution of his duty. If it is good enough and reasonable enough for us to have legislation to protect police officers, it is right to protect paramedics. If article 57 of the Fire and Rescue Services (Northern Ireland) Order 2006 provides that it is an offence to assault or obstruct a fire and rescue officer or a person assisting them, it is right and proper that we have the same level of protection for a paramedic or ambulance staff member.

People will say that we already have protection and laws. We have the Offences Against the Person Act 1861 and the Justice Act (Northern Ireland) 2011 but why not specifically state in legislation the protection for paramedics and ambulance staff in the same way that we do for firefighters and the police, when they go to the same emergency, fire, car crash or riot.

At this point, I would like to pay tribute to Lord Morrow. It was Lord Morrow who decided to do something about this. It was Lord Morrow who came to the Committee to speak to his amendment. I was simply the one who picked it up, so the credit must go to Lord Morrow. We all know Lord Morrow, but I do not think that we actually really appreciate Lord Morrow. Lord Morrow is one of the great reformers of this House. We will not appreciate it now, but when the annals of this place are written, Lord Morrow should feature greatly because of the work that he has done around human trafficking and issues like this. Lord Morrow deserves a place in those annals. It was his work and experiences as a constituency MLA that prompted and motivated him to start this job of work. I only follow. I only continue the good work that he started.

He would tell you of occasions when police and ambulance staff at the same scene were attacked and, in most cases, the paramedic came off worst. Yet when that went to court, the police officer's wounds were considered the greater offence and caused the greater sentence to be handed down. That is not right or fair. Paramedics deserve the same treatment and protection.

I would have liked to have gone further with this amendment. I would have loved to have included A&E workers. On many occasions, nurses have come to me after having been attacked in the accident and emergency rooms — not only attacked but pinned down for minutes on the floor with no help. One went off sick and never returned to work. Subsequently, there was a muck-up with sick pay, return to work and pension. That person suffered mental illness due to that attack and could never return to work, but she did not leave with even the right pension because the authorities and organisation messed it up. That lady would not have experienced any of that trauma or mental illness if not for that attack that one night with that one drunk. We need to do a job of work to protect hospital and accident and emergency staff.

5.45 pm

The problem that I had was, "Where do I stop?" The Emergency Workers (Obstruction) Act 2006 also defines people like the coastguard and even those who transport organs. Are they not doing a service? Why is it that we protect the blue-light people? We protect the blue-light services because they are going to help someone. After they help that person, they go and help someone else, and someone else after that. If they are attacked and prevented from doing their job, not only do they become a casualty themselves but they cannot help anyone else. If you beat up or assault a paramedic, firefighter or policeman, you could be putting somebody's life at risk. Someone could die because you have attacked a paramedic. That is why we need it to be defined in legislation. That is why these people need to be treated differently.

That is why I struggle with where to stop. If someone is transporting an organ for transplantation and is attacked, is that not a serious offence too? If someone is making their way to get a boat for the coastguard, is that not a serious offence, too, that could risk someone's life? I struggle with that. If I am brought back to this place in the next mandate, I will look at doing something, even if it is through a private Member's Bill, to protect, in some way, hospital staff in A&E.

Here is my other dilemma: what if a wage clerk happens to walk through A&E and is attacked? What if a doctor in the gynaecology ward goes to help out in A&E and is attacked? Will they be covered? Those are things that I have to tease out in the weeks and months ahead. That is why I have plumped for paramedics. The difference is that they leave the hospital setting and travel in ones and twos to an event, not knowing what will happen or what will unfurl. In many cases, it will be a volatile situation. There may be drunkenness, riotous behaviour and people panicking. All sorts could happen.

There is another reason why I struggle to extend it. Does a nurse on a mental health ward really want to penalise someone who strikes out at them when they may not be in their full senses? Home helps are vulnerable too, as they go out in ones and twos. What happens if they go to an elderly person's home and that person is in an agitated state and strikes out? There is much more work to be done in that regard. That is why I have kept it to and capped it at paramedics now. That is true to Lord Morrow's objectives. I am happy enough for it to be left there.

I hope that I have the support of the House for the amendment. I believe that it is the right course of action. It is the right way to go. I put the amendment to the House.

Mr Weir: I will keep my remarks fairly brief. There will be a number of areas and amendments to the Justice (No. 2) Bill where there is genuine and sincere disagreement in the House, but I think that, with this group of amendments, we have a collection that is virtuous in nature and, I believe, the House can unite around. What is particularly significant within this set, which, I think, was referred to by the last Member, is that we are told, and I think that all of us can agree, that what we really need to concentrate on is outcome rather than process. Here we see in the way in which various Members have approached that and the subject matters within it a sign that outcome is put ahead of process.

What do I mean by that?

When talking about the amendment, Mr Frew referred to the important subject of domestic violence. He is less worried, if you like, about whether the amendment was his or whether the Department's. What matters to him, rightly so, is the end result. Similarly, with some aspects of amendment No 52, which we touched on, if there is a way the same result can be achieved either through primary legislation, regulations or specific practical arrangements, that is where we as an Assembly need to focus. Indeed, the last speaker indicated that there may well be certain things put forward that will need some amending and tidying up before Further Consideration Stage or that are effectively forerunners of what can be built on in the future. All those are possible on the basis of trying to have some outcome, rather than process.

I welcome all the amendments in the group. As I indicated, I appreciate that one of Paul Frew's amendments will not be moved, but, in the spirit of moving forward, it could be done in cooperation with the Department of Justice as we look at the serious issue of domestic violence. That is an appropriate way to deal with it.

I commend not only Mr Frew and, indeed, Lord Morrow, who was the instigator of the amendment on the attacks on the emergency services, but the Committee for the amendments that it has brought forward. I will come in a bit more detail to the Minister's amendments, including amendment No 52, in a moment. Mr Kennedy, I think, made the point — we have seen it on a couple of fronts — that the Education Committee has been looking at how we tackle bullying. While there is obviously not direct read-across, there is a degree of overlap in the issues that have been raised on domestic violence and revenge porn. While both can be directed towards children, they are primarily and most frequently aimed at adults. There is resonance with those issues in some of the dilemmas that we in the Committee have faced and in some of the evidence we have seen when discussing the Bill on bullying. Mr Frew made reference to a desire, which, I think, is commonly held, to go as far as we can to cover as much as we can and to balance that with what is practical. We have seen the same with bullying when deciding what scope a school realistically has. That is the same with some of these amendments: how far can we go?

The other area where there has been some resonance is in the thinking that bullying, like domestic violence, is purely physical. As we have seen, the psychological impact and torture, either through domestic violence, bullying, which is covered in the other Bill, or revenge porn, is every bit as important as direct physical violence. I am sure this has happened with most MLAs, but I have dealt with constituents who have been victims of domestic violence or, in some cases, revenge porn. We see the massive detrimental impact that it has on people's lives. It is right that the Assembly is stepping forward on those issues by whatever route and is taking these measures to deal with them.

I know that Mr Frew added a number of caveats in relation to the attacks on blue — the paramedics — and it is crucial that emergency workers, who provide such a vital service to our society, are also given maximum protection. Again, as with a number of aspects of this, it is difficult for many of us to get our head round the reason why people who provide such an important service become victims of attack and the kind of mentality that would lead anyone to attack someone in those circumstances.

I am speaking principally in my role as chair of the all-party group on animal welfare, particularly where amendment No 52 is concerned. The amendment has a virtuous genesis. If you trace the origins of amendment No 52, you will find that it initially came from a private Member's motion that was brought to the House on the issue of concern about the implementation of the Welfare of Animals Act, which itself was triggered by at least two horrendous cases of animal cruelty, which, again, across the House I think we would unite to condemn. George Robinson and others were involved in the Justice for Cody campaign. The particular trigger for the motion, which eventually led to this amendment, was the court case in east Belfast. I will not go into detail, but there was horrendous cruelty by one family towards animals, and this provoked, rightly, a degree of anger. It led to a motion that the House united around. I pay tribute to the Department of Justice and DARD because, since then, they have worked assiduously in bringing forward a very detailed and, I think, very worthy report on the implementation of the Welfare of Animals Act. Indeed, arising out of some of the recommendations of that, we are starting to see action. In particular, amendment No 52 derives directly from that, and I commend all those involved.

As I indicated, it is also the case that things can happen through different routes, so I welcome the Minister's remarks on intervention. While I think that very thorough work was done on that implementation, I think that both the Department of Justice and DARD will keep it in mind for the future and try to make sure, therefore, that gaps do not emerge. Also, particularly regarding the issue of reassurance on animal cruelty, there will be close work with the rehoming charities. That, again, is a very worthwhile step.

I will mention one other aspect of this. A statutory rule that goes very much hand in hand with amendment No 52 will be brought before the House in the near future in relation not only to animal cruelty issues but to a range of other issues. That will enable a referral to appeal on the grounds of lenient sentences on a range of issues, including, in particular, animal cruelty offences of causing unnecessary suffering, which is covered in section 4 of the Welfare of Animals Act. While that is not before us today, I understand that it is due to come up in February and will be laid as a rule. I think that it is seen as the other side of the coin of amendment No 52.

I turn briefly to amendment No 52 itself. As indicated, we are seeing that there are measures in it that will increase maximum sentences in the Crown Court. The maximum sentence in the Crown Court will increase from two years to five years, and, sadly, despite all that has been done in recent years, there are still horrendous acts of animal cruelty in this country. It is important that we have something that can act as some level of deterrent, so I welcome that. In the Magistrates' Court, for the offence of causing or attending an animal fight, there will be an increase of the maximum sentence from six months to 12 months and an increase in the maximum fine from £5,000 to £20,000. Those are very much to be welcomed, as we need as a society to bear down on animal cruelty.

Alongside that, there are many things that the Assembly can do and is doing on the issue of animal cruelty. It is important also that, if we are increasing sentences, the judiciary follows suit and imposes greater sentences as well. To be fair, I think that the signals that were sent out a couple of years ago, when we saw a number of very lenient sentences and, indeed, the public outrage that was then sparked as a result of that, have had a degree of impact. In the last three years, we have seen 15 custodial sentences handed down for animal cruelty offences. Indeed, the ongoing impact of that was such that, in the last year of recording of that, which was 2014, 10 of those 15 occurred. That shows that at least some in the judiciary are beginning to take the issue seriously, but there are wider implications not just for the judiciary and for this House but for society as a whole. We need to ensure that we take all action in society to foster respect — I am not referring on this occasion to the First Minister — for the animal kingdom to ensure that that is something that pervades society as a whole. In the same way as we foster that level of respect, we should have a zero-tolerance approach to those who would inflict unnecessary cruelty on animals. It is with that that we can start to turn the corner.

I welcome the remarks that were made earlier today by the Justice Minister, particularly on amendment No 52. It is an important step forward in the fight against animal cruelty. I commend the amendments in the group.

6.00 pm

Mr McKinney: At the outset, I commend the passionate and often personal contribution by Paul Frew in relation to the issues that he raises in amendment No 56. We were all moved not just by the personal story but by the fact that the issues raised were to do with definition, sensitivity, the person and people's interaction with each other. I also commend his leadership at this stage in offering to withdraw his amendment in favour of a consultation about the wider issues that he raised, at length, in his contribution. Even at this late stage, I appeal to the Alliance Party, who have listened to that approach, to take that approach in relation to further amendments coming up in the other group.

I will be brief, as I am conscious of time. I will restrict my remarks to amendment No 57. I welcome the Minister's approach of not opposing the amendment. I understand that some of the issues are being finessed much more, but I will speak on some of the context and the need for this with regard to how front-line staff are affected. Their contribution is around improving outcomes for people and finding themselves attacked, in any sense, only adds further stress and undermines the job that they seek to do on our behalf. Very often — we have to remember this — when attacked, they can find themselves out of work for a long time. That costs by way of their unavailability and the need to replace them.

The amendment does not go far enough. While it is right to provide for tougher sentencing for attacks on front-line staff who are out in blue-light mode, we should remember the extent to which all healthcare staff are affected. In that sense, it is important to remind the House that, last year, there were over 6,200 attacks on healthcare workers in Northern Ireland. Unions and staff say that the figure, in fact, could be much higher. My colleague reminds me that she has found evidence of that in the trust area that she represents too. Staff feel that they cannot come forward, for an array of reasons. We need to find a way to extend beyond the nature of the blue-light narrative that has been reflected in amendment No 57.

A recent 'Belfast Telegraph' article outlined a lot of the issues and showed that an array of people were affected. It mentions auxiliary nurses being attacked, social workers, a female worker having her hair ripped out etc. The narrative of how people are finding themselves attacked in their place of work is horrendous. We should say that it is totally unacceptable. Of course, it does not happen just in hospitals or to ambulance staff; it affects fire brigades as well. It is hugely important to remember that time is of the essence in relation to any intervention by staff. Of course, that is also the case with fire.

Mrs D Kelly: Will the Member give way?

Mr McKinney: I will, of course.

Mrs D Kelly: Will the Member join me in commending those staff, who, after having suffered a physical assault or attack, very rarely put in a claim against the trust or, indeed, the patient?

Mr McKinney: Yes, and that against the backdrop of the incident being able to happen in the first place. There are questions to be asked about not just penalties in the event of a crime but what we as a society are doing to protect those workers in the first place.

I promised the House that I would be brief, so I will conclude my remarks. We should allow amendment No 57 to go forward. I accept that Mr Frew believes that his amendment should be further refined. I encourage him to think beyond just blue-light workers and about extending it to healthcare workers. There has to be zero tolerance.

Mr Deputy Speaker (Mr Beggs): It seems an appropriate time to take a short break. I propose therefore, by leave of the Assembly, to suspend the sitting until 6.30 pm.

The debate stood suspended.

The sitting was suspended at 6.06 pm.

6.30 pm

On resuming (Mr Deputy Speaker [Mr Dallat] in the Chair) —

Mr Poots: I welcome the opportunity to speak on the issues to be addressed in this group. First, I want to deal with the amendments that relate to animal welfare and sentencing. I give a warm welcome to the proposals therein. I would have been keen to have gone a bit further and looked at mandatory sentencing. However, we have been working through it in the Committee for Justice and the Committee for Agriculture and Rural Development — I sit on both — and I accept that the proposals, in and of themselves, should be a considerable help, provided that the judiciary sentence in an appropriate way.

The Assembly is sending out a very clear message to the judiciary. When people flagrantly and blatantly abuse, attack and cause harm to animals in a most cruel, senseless and wicked way, the public of Northern Ireland, through the House, are saying that they want custodial sentences and severe custodial sentences for those who engage in severe cruelty. They do not want them to be given a slap on the wrist. I want that message to go out very clearly to our judiciary that that is expected of them. We would not find it acceptable if we passed the legislation and the judiciary gave a slap on the wrist to people like those who have engaged in and got away with some of the obscene acts that we have witnessed over the past number of years. It is very important that we put that marker down. The legislation is there to give the judiciary the opportunity to put people who engage in such vile actions away for a decent length of time.

Mr Frew raised the issue of domestic abuse and has indicated that it is not his intention to move that particular amendment because a consultation process is taking place. Nonetheless, it is an incredibly important issue and one that I hope that we revisit in the new mandate to ensure that we give more support to people in situations of domestic abuse.

The final issue that I wish to speak about is the attacks on ambulance staff — on our paramedics and support personnel in our ambulances. That is a critical amendment, and I welcome it. During the three and a half years that I served as Health Minister, I regularly raised with Minister Ford and others the need to give greater support to those we expect to serve us. We are asking people to go out and provide a front-line service for us, be it in the Ambulance Service, our emergency departments or a whole series of other areas across the Department of Health. I understand that the amendment is a starting point and that we are just dealing with ambulance staff at this stage. However, I would very much like us to look at extending it further at a later stage. On some occasions and in some circumstances, ambulance staff are the only ones who are called — and they can be the most difficult circumstances. It may be just the ambulance staff who are called to the scene of domestic violence, because the individuals are afraid to call the police but require hospitalisation. They are never going to report the person who perpetrated the abuse, but the ambulance staff have to go into that house. Just two people — two individuals — with someone who has engaged in domestic violence.

Over the past number of years, we have seen considerably more attacks that are unprovoked and unpredictable. For many years, people could see the signs that an attack was imminent and, therefore, be more prepared to take evasive action. People were very often heavily intoxicated, and the warning signs were all there. However, we are now in a period where people are taking cocktails of drugs and concoctions, and their behaviour is wholly and totally unpredictable. Our staff are being put in the front line in those circumstances. Recently, a member of ambulance personnel was thrown down stairs and quite badly injured. In other incidents, ambulance staff have been headbutted, hit, kicked or punched. All those things have happened. Therefore, we need to give them the support that we give to the other blue-light services.

Why should a police officer, prison officer or fire officer receive greater levels of support going to those difficult scenes than ambulance staff? I do not believe that it can be justified. I think that they should get equality on this particular issue. The Minister was a little begrudging in his acceptance of it, and Mr Frew has very kindly indicated that he will continue to work on the wording for Further Consideration Stage. However, this is a significant step forward in providing better safety for our front-line healthcare workers, starting with ambulance staff. I trust that, in the new mandate, we will be able to do considerably more work in identifying a better means of providing that support for other healthcare workers. I would like to see fixed penalty notices being available for lesser attacks — sometimes it is verbal abuse — but it is absolutely and totally wrong that people who serve in our emergency departments or on our ambulance staff should have to take foul-mouthed abuse or worse from individuals. Therefore, it is important that we demonstrate to our staff that we support them and want to ensure that they have greater security in the workplace than is currently the case. Consequently, it is incumbent on this House to support the amendment proposed by Mr Frew.

Mr Agnew: I want to speak primarily on amendment No 52, but I will touch briefly on Mr Frew's amendment and domestic violence. I will keep it brief, because he stated that he does not intend to move it. I commend the Member for his work, and, indeed, further to his comments, I commend Dolores Kelly for her work around the issue of domestic violence. It is a horrendous crime. Like Mr Frew, I could share a number of stories — some, unfortunately, in my own family. I will not do that, because I do not have permission from those people to do so, but I appreciate the efforts that he has made in bringing these amendments and, indeed, the work that the Minister is doing in consulting on how best we can improve the legislation to get justice in cases of domestic violence, but also, hopefully, working collectively to prevent domestic violence.

I wish to speak particularly on amendment No 52, not because I see it as more important than the other issues but because it is an area of work that I have campaigned on for many years. I welcome the Minister's amendment to provide for increased sentencing and, indeed, the ability to appeal sentences handed down for animal cruelty offences. I am encouraged by the consensus that there seems to be on animal cruelty and the passion with which some Members spoke of their abhorrence of animal cruelty. Unfortunately, that has not always been the case, but I welcome it today.

We have seen a change. I campaigned on animal welfare issues long before entering this Chamber. There was a small coterie of us in Northern Ireland, and a number of things happened to change that. In particular, there was the Justice for Cody campaign, which came about as a result of a particular act of cruelty on a poor dog. The Agnew family — no relations — were drawn into a campaign that was not of their own making but was the result of the huge public support that came in behind them. They raised vast sums of money, and I was able to host them as they presented a cheque to Guide Dogs to train a guide dog in Cody's honour; indeed, the dog was named after Cody. That was the beginning of organising on animal cruelty in Northern Ireland to a level that I had never seen before.

I commend the Minister — it is right to do so — but also those campaigners, whether it was those in the Justice for Cody campaign, or Northern Ireland Says No To Animal Cruelty, the Animal Rights Action Network (ARAN), the League Against Cruel Sports, or, indeed, as has been mentioned, the rehoming charities, including the Assisi animal sanctuary in my constituency. In the relatively short period since the Welfare of Animals Act (Northern Ireland) 2011 was enacted, we are reforming it and increasing penalties, and it is because of those campaigns and because of that grass-roots action that we are here today, speaking to amendment No 52.

It is a step forward that we seem to have a consensus in the House that animal cruelty is wrong. I hope that, most likely in a future mandate, we will get a consensus that it is about all animals and all types of cruelty by all peoples, and that that has to include fox hunting, which can no longer be justified in our society. I welcome this step forward today and look forward to amendment No 52 being passed by the Assembly.

Mr Ford: Thank you very much, Mr Deputy Speaker. I understood that another Member wished to speak, but he has obviously decided not to at this point.

There seemed to be two general themes in this group of amendments. The first was the high level of agreement, even if there was not full agreement, on precise terminology and on the principles of the amendments in the group. The second seemed to be the amount of work noted as being required in the next mandate or, frequently, for the next Minister. I am not sure whether that was a reaction on the part of some Members to the praise that was being heaped on the Minister when we discussed group 1, but I may have to take the hint.

On the point relating to animal welfare issues, which were highlighted at the beginning by the intervention that Mr Weir made in my opening statement and which were concluded at the end by Mr Agnew's remarks, it is clear that there was a significant agreement that, although the Welfare of Animals Act (Northern Ireland) 2011 is not yet five years old, there was an issue of looking at proper penalties for the offences covered by that Act. There was surprisingly little discussion except that which was initiated by Mr Weir and followed through by Mr Agnew.

I noticed in particular the references that Mr Weir made, which got some backing from Mr Poots, about the need to build on amendment No 52, looking at a number of issues. Certainly in response to some of the points that Mr Poots made, the fact that we are also considering the issue of unduly lenient sentencing on animal welfare issues may address, in a way which a Minister can respond to rather than in the precise way in which Mr Poots expressed his concern about the judiciary, means that there are issues there that can be moved forward on. Clearly, those were sorts of issues that were highlighted by Mr Weir about work with rehoming charities, but I suspect that that is probably in policy terms rather more for DARD than for DOJ.

There was a fair amount of debate on sex offences, specifically revenge porn. It was noticeable that much of that debate referred to the digital age conference initiated by the Committee. That, too, shows the valuable work done by the Committee, and it is appreciated by the Department. I should also point out that, although the Committee initiated it, as on most of these occasions, it is the Committee staff who do all the hard work while the members take the glory. Nonetheless, it was because of the initiative of the Chair that that happened, and it clearly looked at a very significant issue.

Undoubtedly, there are other issues that need to be looked at, and I hope that there will be speedy consultation on those in the next mandate. Whether or not I have any influence, depending on the remark just made about the "next Minister", I believe that there are significant issues that require early consideration. On the specific issue of revenge porn highlighted by these amendments, it is entirely appropriate that we proceed to look at the lessons that can be learned from England and Wales, and that we move speedily on that. A number of Members made links to, for example, bullying, and mentioned the dreadful effects that that kind of activity can have on young, and very young, people.

Mr Frew managed to put forward some extremely good arguments on why he should push his amendment on domestic abuse and then announced that he would not do so. I appreciate his recognition, and that of Mrs Kelly, of the work being done in the current consultation process, and I echo their hope that the Department will get a good response. Not everybody in the world will be entirely taken up with an election campaign between now and late April, so, hopefully, Members will encourage those whom they are in contact with to take that opportunity. In particular, we would all do well to remember that abuse is significantly more than just physical violence, as was highlighted. That is where coercion and controlling behaviour come in, and they are of great significance.

The second amendment that Mr Paul Frew spoke on was about attacks on public service workers. The discussion was significantly wider than the precise wording of the amendment as is, and clearly there is an issue. However, I have concerns, even with the amendments that he suggested. Even if we said "blue-light workers", it would not cover organisations that provide blue-light volunteers who are not technically employees of any of the statutory bodies but work in association with them. We have only to think of the recent vandalism of the Lagan Search and Rescue boat. Although, thankfully, it did not involve a physical attack on any person, it was an indication of the dreadful things that happen to some who provide public service as volunteers, in many cases putting their life at risk, whether in water, mountain or cave rescue. A number of other bodies also have policy links to the Department of Justice. I think that this issue, whether or not it is finally addressed at Further Consideration Stage, may well merit wider consideration at a future stage.

Mr Dickson made a significant point about lone healthcare workers. Yes, many paramedics work in ones and twos, but so do others in the healthcare field. I think of my past practice as a social worker, when I was on standby duty late at night or in the early hours. Sometimes, I was in parts of the country that, if you are on your own, are not the easiest places to enforce a court order relating to childcare or mental health. There are significant issues there across a range of services, not just the social workers whom I am most concerned about from my past life but a range of others in the professions allied to medicine, nursing and so on. I have no doubt that we will continue to look at that, and I welcome the acknowledgement that, although this amendment makes a useful statement, there is more detailed work to be done in future.

Mr Frew: Will the Minister give way?

Mr Ford: I will.

Mr Frew: I take on board exactly what the Minister says. I think that we have all grappled with the issue. I struggled with refining the amendment, and I came to the conclusion that I could not bite off more than the House could chew at any given time. That is why I plumped for ambulance workers. I will bring forward amendments at the next stage that will define clearly what organisations, bodies and groups of people are to be covered by the amendment. I agree with the Minister that there has to be more thought given to what we can do to protect other people.

Mr Ford: I thank Mr Frew for that point. It is clearly an issue that will be difficult to resolve, but, nonetheless, it is one that requires attention in the future. With that point made, and I thank Mr Frew for his indication that he will not be pushing the amendment on coercive behaviour while there is a consultation out, I think that we can expect the House to accept all the other amendments in the group without difficulty. I commend them to the House.

(a) a pregnancy is terminated by a registered medical practitioner where a diagnosis has been made of a foetal abnormality which is likely to prove fatal, and

(b) the diagnosis was made by two suitably qualified registered medical practitioners who are of the opinion, formed in good faith, that—

(i) the condition of the foetus is likely to cause death either before birth, or during birth, or,

(ii) if a live birth should occur, there is no medical treatment which could be offered to alter the fatal nature of the condition or improve the chances of survival.

(6) The right to object on grounds of conscience will not affect any duty to participate directly in such a procedure which is necessary to save the life, or to prevent permanent or long-term injury to the physical or mental health, of a pregnant woman.”.

The following amendments stood on the Marshalled List: Nos 62-68.

Mr Dickson: I appreciate being given the time and the opportunity to propose amendment No 61. The amendment seeks action on the issue of fatal foetal abnormality.

Today, I am asking Members to take a decision based on this debate and on how all the circumstances and history preceding it have influenced their conscience. Sadly, there are those who will make their decision owing to the influence of party Whips rather than through free expression of their conscience. I have to say that I find that regrettable. Nonetheless, I implore any Members whose conscience guides them to support this very limited change to the law to follow me and colleagues through the Lobby to support the amendment.

(Mr Speaker in the Chair)

There are those who will say that the amendment lacks consultation. I think that I heard someone quote me earlier on that. However, I believe that it has been adequately consulted on. It has been consulted on by the Department, and I believe that, in those circumstances, there has been adequate consultation.

In starting, I want to reflect, Mr Speaker, on a very personal story — the story that has prompted us to this point today. That is the story of Sarah Ewart. In 2013, Sarah was recently married and looking forward to having her first child. She then received the heartbreaking news that her baby had a fatal foetal abnormality (FFA) and would not survive outside the womb. At that time, an atmosphere of fear was pervading the health service, as it still does today. When Sarah asked about her options, including termination, little could be said to her for fear of falling foul of current legislation. Indeed, one consultant abruptly declared, “I’m not going to prison for anyone”.

Sarah had to turn elsewhere for healthcare advice. She had to face both the understandable mental and physical trauma of continuing the pregnancy. She sought a termination in London after taking advice outside Northern Ireland. This was at her own cost — a cost of some £2,100. Add to that the ordeal of travelling to an unfamiliar clinic far from home. No one who heard on the Stephen Nolan programme the heartbreaking story that Sarah related to him and his listeners and viewers could have anything but a heart for what happened to her.

I would like to pay tribute to the way in which that programme, which does not always get plaudits, handled Sarah Ewart’s story.

7.00 pm

Since then, Sarah and her mother, Jane Christie, have been incredibly brave in speaking out. They were not content to suffer in silence. They wanted something better for Sarah, as she faces an uncertain future. They wanted something better for other women in Northern Ireland. They wanted access to healthcare and all the options for women facing fatal foetal abnormalities. That is despite receiving some of the most appalling abuse, both online and in person. I can certainly give testament to that, having seen some of it recently. They have received many unkind and unsympathetic comments, sadly not least of all from a previous Health Minister.

Before 2013, few, if any, people dared to speak about this issue in Northern Ireland. It was ignored; it was swept under the carpet. We hoped that we would not get asked our opinion on what we were going to do about it. I am pleased that, today, the Northern Ireland Assembly can talk openly about this issue, an issue that is an important development for women’s healthcare. It has been a very long road for Sarah. Many other women have been in the same situation, and Members will have received correspondence from women telling those stories. In 2014, the Justice Minister consulted on changes to the law on medical termination of pregnancy. However, so far, the Executive have refused to progress any of this.

Abortion and the termination of pregnancy is an issue of conscience for my party, the Alliance Party; that is why this amendment is in the name of me and one of my colleagues and not in the name of our party. Freedom of conscience to bring an amendment like this, and to support or not support it, is common among many political parties. My colleague Mr Lunn and I have brought this forward as individual MLAs. We have sought to word it extremely cautiously and strictly, ensuring that it will apply only in cases where a woman is carrying a baby with a fatal foetal abnormality and medical intervention cannot change the outcome. Further to this, as you will see in the proposed amendment, we have sought to introduce into statute safeguards that do not currently exist in Northern Ireland for the limited number of cases where termination is permitted. In cases where termination is permitted in Northern Ireland, current guidelines suggest that it is best practice to obtain the medical opinion of two doctors on the necessity of a termination. Mr Lunn and I propose in our amendment that we make this a statutory requirement for termination in the case of a fatal foetal abnormality.

Mr Lyttle: I thank the Member for giving way. The Member will be aware that the position of the Royal College of Obstetricians, set out in response to the DOJ consultation, is that abortion should be permitted as a statutory option if two registered medical practitioners are of the opinion that a foetal condition has been assessed as lethal and that continuation of the pregnancy would be likely to have a detrimental impact on the health of the mother. Does the Member agree that his amendment proposes this type of statute, save the reference to the health of the mother? Is he open to considering the viability of such a reference to the health of the mother in a further amendment to the clause at Further Consideration Stage? Does he agree that there is ample scope for wider consultation and consideration of this issue during the course of the Bill?

Mr Dickson: I readily agree with my colleague about that addition to the amendment. I also say to all Members in the Chamber that my colleague and I are completely open to a discussion on that between now and Further Consideration Stage. This is not about us being prescriptive; this is about us wishing to be inclusive of everyone who has been touched not only by Sarah’s story but who wishes to move this issue forward in Northern Ireland. He is absolutely right: the considered medical opinion of two professionals can assure that the condition of the baby is fatal and that the mother can, therefore, access a safe termination in a hospital setting in Northern Ireland.

Our guidelines in Northern Ireland also, interestingly, do not permit clinicians to refuse to undertake a procedure on the grounds of conscientious objection. We felt that that was an important area, and our amendment would provide an opt-out for professionals in such cases if a termination is sought for a fatal foetal pregnancy. Therefore, they will be protected from acting contrary to their beliefs.

Mr Agnew: I thank the Member for giving way. Would he be open to a further amendment should we get there at Further Consideration Stage that would add that no judgement should be communicated to the woman, as exists in England? If a clinician chooses not to carry out a termination, he or she will not communicate that directly to the woman but that alternative provision will be sought.

Mr Dickson: That is an area that we would certainly be willing to consider.

I have heard increasingly in the past few days that some have been saying that the guidelines, if we had them, would do the job. However, a quick look at previous guidelines and the law as it stands would tell anyone otherwise. It is true that, in the past, latitude was permitted to medical professionals. However, political and ideological interference has destroyed any latitude that permitted such interpretations of the law, and it now cannot be undone without the certainty of this amendment.

There are those who expressed concern to us about the use of “likely” in the proposed amendment. As I said to my colleague Mr Lyttle, and to Mr Agnew, should the House this evening allow this to proceed, at Further Consideration Stage I am prepared to carefully assist in the crafting of words that will be as inclusive as they can be to allow this matter to proceed with certainty.

I note with dismay the proposals by one party — the DUP — to kick this proposal into the long grass, directing their own Minister at the Department of Health to form a commission to look into the matter. I cannot in all seriousness understand how that would provide any progress on the matter. The Department has already examined the law, it has produced draft guidelines, and the Executive have, at this point, refused to move on it.

There is room and time for a commission, but that will be after the passing of the amendment in order to provide clarity to our clinicians and to provide basic women's healthcare to the citizens of Northern Ireland in the drafting of appropriate guidelines that would give full effect to this amendment. If we are to continue to fail women in Northern Ireland in this area, we are abdicating from our duties as representatives.

The traumatic journey to England for many young women is becoming a shame on Northern Ireland. To force women with a fatal foetal pregnancy to look elsewhere for support and help makes that worse. Sarah Ewart was left in debt to pay for a private procedure. I believe — I know that many of you here agree — that she should have had that care and her medical intervention in a hospital in Northern Ireland free of charge, close to home, with a clinical team that she could trust, and where she herself would be valued.

Not everyone can get that loan at short notice. We have a system that forces the poorest and most vulnerable women to continue a fatal foetal pregnancy despite the associated distress and physical complications that that may cause.

I also recognise that, for many, the amendment does not go far enough. There is a wide spectrum of public opinion in Northern Ireland. Some people advocate abortion in the case of sexual crime, whereas there may be many who advocate free access to abortion. The amendment goes nowhere near such proposals. For some, that may be disappointing. I want to say clearly and loudly that I am proposing an amendment in respect of fatal foetal abnormality. Personally — it is a matter of conscience — I cannot see where I would be supporting much beyond that.

I want to say that I recognise such views, but I do not share them entirely. The amendment is not an attempt to shut down debate, but it is an attempt to ensure that we legislate for one discrete area. As ever, politics is the art of the possible. The amendment has been worded carefully to garner the greatest support possible in the Assembly.

Mr B McCrea: Will the Member give way?

Mr Dickson: Yes, I will.

Mr B McCrea: I realise that it is a personal choice that the Member has expressed about how far he could go with the amendment. Has he considered the High Court's recent announcement on the case of Sarah Ewart, which talks not just about fatal foetal abnormalities but of the victims of sexual crimes and how, in the judge's opinion, we are inconsistent with European law?

Mr Dickson: I thank the Member for his intervention. I understand what he says. I understand the concerns that have been expressed in respect of that judgement. I understand that it is the matter of a court case. It will take us where it takes us. Where we are tonight is trying to legislate for fatal foetal abnormality.

Mr McCarthy: I am grateful to the Member for giving way. Can he tell the House how certain he would be, if the amendment were made, that it would prevent the doors being opened to further creeping of the Abortion Act 1967 into Northern Ireland?

Mr Dickson: I will be as clear as I can. I have said that, if this were to proceed to the next stage, I would be happy to work with those who have much greater resource and legal mind on my proposition. The very point that Mr McCarthy makes is what we would like to see encapsulated in the amendment that we propose this evening. I need to be clear about this: as far as I am concerned, our amendment does not and should not open the door to anything else.

As with other issues, the public is clearly ahead of us on this; indeed, opinion polls show that there is about 60% support for terminations in cases of fatal foetal abnormality. We are a representative system of government, so we cannot make all our decisions on the basis of opinion polls, but it gives us an idea of the feeling that there is out there, especially with people making comments like, "The majority of people in Northern Ireland are opposed to change": I do not believe that to be true.

Many of you here have indicated your support personally to Sarah Ewart. Today is your chance to make good on those pledges of support. I made her a promise when I spoke to her that I would try to do something, and this is me trying to do that something. The decision that we have to take is undoubtedly a considerable one, but it pales into insignificance compared with the decision that Sarah Ewart was forced to make.

My plea is that, today, we put aside party interest and vote according to our conscience and what we believe to be right. It is for that reason that I have to express my disappointment at the position taken, for example, by the SDLP, a position that, I am sure, would make many of its sister parties blush. I recognise that this is not the position of all MLAs on the Benches right around the House. I think the late president John F Kennedy was right when he said:

"Sometimes party loyalty asks too much."

I understand discomfort, and I understand the pressure that we are all under when considering this matter, but we should not go against what our consciences tell us. I ask everyone to stand up and be counted today or, at the very least, to abstain. We must take action. We need to provide certainty to our clinicians. We need to provide access to healthcare and options for women facing the mental and physical trauma of a fatal foetal abnormality in pregnancy.

I ask you to support the amendment. If your conscience challenges you and if you have given your promise, now is the time to act.

7.15 pm

Mrs Pengelly: I speak on behalf of the Democratic Unionist Party on what is an emotive and poignant issue for many. It is an issue that touches on individuals, couples and families in a deeply personal way. I respectfully say to the House that this is not an issue for politicking or insults or to be used to inflame. It is especially not an opportunity to cause further hurt or distress. Our approach to the issue is based on compassion. We are compassionate about the tragic situation that some parents unexpectedly and without wanting to find themselves having to deal with. Any suggested change of law on this issue, which reaches fundamentally to core ideological views and values and touches directly on issues of life and death, must be carefully and fully considered.

Mr Stewart Dickson, who has moved the amendment, has previously robustly rejected proposals on what he described as “major changes to the law” for the very reason that trying to do so by way of amendment was:

“disappointing ... populist and to the detriment of the House and society as a whole.”

That is a direct quotation. He outlined clearly that any major change to the law should not be done that way and that we, as legislators, in dealing with any proposed major changes:

“have a responsibility to do that diligently and in a way that is structured and allows us to take evidence and have thoughtful reflection.” — [Official Report (Hansard), Bound Volume 83, p59, col 1].

It is, therefore, a matter of some surprise and disappointment that he is now attempting one of the most significant changes to the law of Northern Ireland in decades by way of an amendment.

The DUP opposes the extension of the 1967 Act to Northern Ireland. The issue before us today is somewhat separate from that but is no less important. It requires — it demands — careful consideration from the medical professionals, practitioners, families and ethics and legal experts to ensure that sufficient and proper clarity and guidance are the hallmarks of the way forward. That is absolutely essential to ensure that the arrangements are fully grounded in compassion, good law, support and the protection of our integrity and to ensure that our societal values and rights are properly and carefully balanced and maintained.

The intervention of Mr Lyttle in the previous speech about a potential amendment and Mr Dickson’s comments on what is perhaps the ambiguity of the word “likely” in his amendment only supports our view that we should take the time to fully consider and listen to the experts in the field.

It is wrong that an issue of such gravity should be pulled together and thrust on Northern Ireland by way of a last-minute amendment, stapled awkwardly onto a miscellaneous Bill. [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order.

Mrs Pengelly: This is not the way to conduct business. This issue is much too important and much too complex. The debate thus far has not been —

Mr Lyttle: Will the Member give way?

Mrs Pengelly: Sorry, no.

Mr Dickson: The mask has slipped now.

Mr Speaker: Order.

Mrs Pengelly: Given the very personal and solemn issues that we are discussing, I do not believe that it would be appropriate to engage in any kind of heated debate across the Chamber.

The debate thus far has not been an informed one. Mistakes have and are being made. Medical experts advise that there is no such term as “fatal foetal abnormality”. The test and balance of proof is not clearly articulated in this amendment. Key voices of expertise are missing. This is evidenced by the contribution by the chair of the Royal College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists in Northern Ireland stating clearly, just this morning, that any decision must be based and dependent on the effect of the pregnancy on the health of the mother. This is absent from the proposed amendment. He cautioned in the strongest terms that to do otherwise, to accept an amendment without that, risks entering the dangerous territory of eugenics: picking and choosing who should live and who should die based on genetics and characteristics.

Mr Dickson: Will the Member give way?

Mrs Pengelly: I have already outlined that I will not.

There are some who will be comfortable with that, but I know that many, not only in this Chamber but across Northern Ireland, particularly those of faith and strong values, will not be comfortable with that. Tread carefully. That is why the DUP is rejecting the amendment but outlining a road map to a sensible, informed and appropriate way forward. The Minister of Health has been asked to establish, by the end of February, a working group that will include clinicians in this field and legally qualified persons to make recommendations on how this issue can be addressed, including, if necessary, bringing forward draft legislation. We have asked that all interested parties should be consulted and that the group will be tasked to report within six months. We all need to hear more fully the views of the Royal College and others. We all need the opportunity to ask those vital questions to get the appropriate advice. That is why the working group is the best and most appropriate way forward.

I have not had the beautiful privilege to have brought a child into this world, but I can empathise with all my heart that the wished-for and the longed-for can turn so quickly to tragedy. The way forward that we are proposing is a compassionate one. It is a sensible one, and it is a common-sense one that will leave all of us in a much better and informed position to chart a loving and kind way forward and give the necessary clarity to those dealing with these issues.

I look around me, at the Benches and my colleagues, and I see very many mothers and fathers, some of whom have suffered the devastating loss of a child, through miscarriage, illness or premature death. That loss is painful and acute. It is a loss that will never fully dissipate, but I know that our collective experience is what shapes our approach of compassion and kindness. I urge Members here today to stop, step back and search your heart and your mind. If ever there was an issue to take time and be fully informed about, this is it. It is indeed a matter of life and death.

I urge Members to vote against the amendment and for the proposed way forward that we are outlining — a sensible way that is based on expertise, evidence and careful, thoughtful consideration. Support a way forward that is based on love, compassion and hope.

Ms Ruane: Go raibh maith agat, a Cheann Comhairle. I welcome the opportunity to debate this very important issue in the House today. Like others who have spoken, I am very conscious, as I speak, of the wide range of opinions and emotions around termination of pregnancy. I, like many of you, have received letters, met delegations and talked to women about their experiences. What I do know is that enormous hurt and anger are felt by women who feel let down by the state in which they live when they are forced to travel abroad for a procedure that they felt they should have been entitled to at home.

I thank Stewart Dickson, Trevor Lunn, Anna Lo and Steven Agnew for the considered amendments that they have brought forward. I will begin by outlining Sinn Féin's position. Sinn Féin has opposed and voted against the extension of the 1967 Act to the North of Ireland when it was proposed in the Assembly. Sinn Féin believes that, in cases of rape or sexual crime, or when a pregnant woman's life is in danger, the option of termination should be available. At its last ard-fheis, Sinn Féin amended party policy, which now reflects the view that termination of pregnancy should be available to those who choose to avail themselves of it in situations of fatal foetal abnormality. At our ard-fheis 2015, delegates voted in support of motion 122 which reaffirms party policy and further acknowledges:

"that the issue of fatal foetal abnormalities is a very serious and complex aspect of the abortion issue that requires compassion.

Notes that the law, North and South, prevents women with fatal foetal abnormality pregnancies from accessing legal abortion services in Ireland should they wish to do so; notes the further stress that can result from having to travel to access services; that many women cannot afford to travel to access these services; and that others do not have the required immigration status that allows them to travel.

Calls for legal frameworks to be introduced North and South that would allow women to access abortion services under these limited circumstances.

Believes in cases where a woman wishes to continue with the pregnancy she should be fully supported in that decision and all efforts should be made to ensure appropriate care and consideration.

Calls for the introduction of an all-Ireland protocol on pre-natal diagnostic screening in pregnancy."

That position reflects international minimum human rights standards and the Horner judgement. Judge Horner has stated that, as it stands, the law is not compatible with human rights. We, as legislators, should, first and foremost, provide legislation that is human rights-compliant. On 30 November 2015, the Human Rights Commission in the North won its judicial review of termination of pregnancy laws. The court held that article 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights, the right of women to family and private life, was breached in the North by the general prohibition on abortions in cases of fatal foetal abnormalities and pregnancies that are a consequence of sexual crime.

I have listened today to Members arguing that there should be full public consultation and that we need to take time. I do not believe that anyone in the House can argue that there has not been enough time or consultation on this serious issue.

Mr Agnew: I thank the Member for giving way. The point was made that we should listen to the experts. Whilst it is right that we consult experts on medical advice on fatal foetal abnormality, surely the expert in the choice of whether to have a termination is the woman herself.

7.30 pm

Ms Ruane: I thank the Member for his intervention. I am coming to that. I was on the point about consultation. I do not think that anyone can argue that there has not been consultation, debate or litigation. It has been widely consulted, debated and litigated ad nauseam. There is probably no other issue where so much debate has taken place, except maybe equal marriage. Eventually, the majority of the House agreed that there should be equal marriage, and I hope that the same happens here today.

I believe that some politicians are behind the public in relation to this issue. Recent polling commissioned by Amnesty International indicated that a significant majority of people are in favour of changes in the law on these narrow grounds. There is no suggestion that the option of termination will be the appropriate response for all women who are faced with pregnancy arising from sexual crime or where a pregnancy has been determined to have abnormalities that are incompatible with life. However, coming to Steven Agnew's point, in each of those instances, it is, nevertheless, only the woman herself who is best placed to determine an appropriate response. We must acknowledge women as competent and conscientious decision makers in our own lives.

That is the question before this House today. Are we prepared to trust women to determine what is best for them in the case of fatal foetal abnormalities or a pregnancy as a result of sexual crime, or will we withhold from women the right to make the decision on our own behalf? The key relationship here is between the woman and her clinician during those very distressing times.

I have been present at four births: two of my own, one of a friend's child, and my grandchild. There is no place at births for politicians; we are supposed to make the law. It is the clinician, the woman and her family who should decide. That is key here today.

The DUP has said that it supports a commission that will report in six months. What about the plight of women in the here and now? What about the women who are pregnant as a result of rape or women who are faced with fatal foetal abnormalities? Is the DUP going to tell them, "We are having a commission in six months and then we will see where it goes"? I am sorry, but putting it on the long finger does a disservice to women. It is all very well talking about compassion. Compassion is not putting decisions on the long finger.

Mr Dickson: Will the Member give way?

Ms Ruane: Yes.

Mr Dickson: Does the Member agree with me that there might have been more validity and the proposal might have been more genuine had it been a commission that the Assembly would set up, which would be time-limited and to which the Assembly would agree to accept the outcome of its recommendations, based on agreed terms of reference? That would take us towards something that is genuine. That is my concern about the proposals that have been made.

Ms Ruane: I thank the Member for his intervention. I note that some commentators are calling the commission a red herring to get the DUP past the election. I believe that it is a failure of leadership on its part. Some in the SDLP would have you believe that the debate is about the extension of the 1967 Abortion Act. Any such claim is misleading. The SDLP's approach in relation to this debate is very similar to the way that it approaches the equal marriage debate. Its position changes depending on who it is talking to, and differing factions in the party have differing positions. So much for the new progressive leadership of Colum Eastwood.

The Human Rights Commission wrote to us all today, and it rightly challenges all of us when it says:

"We would welcome the outstanding issues being resolved politically. However, if the Northern Ireland Assembly fails to act today in accordance with the court judgement, then our elected representatives will have missed an opportunity to address ongoing human rights violations. They will have neglected the fundamental rights of vulnerable women and girls facing the most difficult circumstances, when they could have resolved the situation. Human rights are often relied on in political debates. Today will be measure of how committed our politicians are to protecting human rights in practice."

We all need to think very carefully about the challenge posed to us by the Human Rights Commission today.

Sinn Féin takes its role as legislators very seriously. Our entire team is here tonight. We will support amendment Nos 61 and 68, and we urge every individual in the House to do so.

Mrs D Kelly: It would be remiss of any of us to contribute to tonight's debate without putting on the record our sincere compassion and heartfelt sympathy to Sarah Ewart and the other families who have been faced with such life-changing decisions. But there is an old legal maxim that hard choices do not make good legislation. We are being led to believe by Sinn Féin, Alliance, the Green Party and NI21 that this is not about the extension of the 1967 Act. Those people quite clearly —

Mr Dickson: Will the Member give way?

Mrs D Kelly: I will perhaps later, but I am just getting into the flow.

The 1967 Act has grown quite considerably in Great Britain.

At the outset, I say that, as a member of the SDLP, along with my SDLP colleagues, I have always been in a pro-life party. I do not think that we will be taking any lectures regarding violence against the person, unborn or otherwise, from Sinn Féin. There has never been any difficulty in relation to the sanctity of the life of the unborn child when the IRA planted bombs that blew up pregnant women. I will leave it there, because I do not want to be diverted from the main topic.

My values as a member of the SDLP are not just formed by the values of the SDLP and it being a pro-life party, nor indeed is our decision this evening to vote against these amendments. Our decision tonight is also based on the advice that we have received from clinicians and legal experts. Clinicians are very clear that the guidelines need to be amended. There needs to be greater clarity around the guidelines. That is why we call upon the DUP Health Minister to publish those guidelines without delay. We welcome the initiative of First Minister Arlene Foster in setting up a working group that will listen to the people at the coalface, to the women having to make those difficult choices, informed by clinicians and by legal experts. We will play whatever role we have to play in assisting that working group to come to the right conclusions.

Mr Agnew: Will the Member give way?

Mrs D Kelly: I told Mr Dickson that I would give way first.

Mr Dickson: I appreciate your giving way. Apologies for trying to stop you when you had just started. Just by way of correction — I think that this is vital because it casts the difference between the Alliance Party and the SDLP — this is a matter of conscience in the Alliance Party. We do not have a policy on this matter. This is a proposal by me and Mr Lunn, and it does not reflect the views of the Alliance Party. That is unlike the SDLP, which seems to be a homogeneous, anti-fatal-foetal-abnormality party.

Mrs D Kelly: That is pretty ridiculous. We are all old enough and wise enough to know that, in the past, clinicians made decisions around the survival of the mother in terms of her physical and mental well-being. It was never about the choice of whether to carry on with a pregnancy. It was based on the mental and physical well-being of the mother. That is one of the key differences in the interpretation of these amendments, which we have been advised on by clinicians and legal experts.

I will share with you some concerns that people have raised in relation to the 1967 Act, which some are portraying is not what these amendments reflect. The effect of the 1967 Act in Great Britain has been to vastly increase, in a manner not intended by legislators, the number of abortions carried out there. It is noteworthy that the Act is predicated on the basis that two medical practitioners have formed the opinion that continuance of the pregnancy would involve injury to the physical or mental health of the pregnant woman, or that the child would suffer from a serious handicap. In reality, the opinion of the doctors has become, in most cases, an administrative exercise, and one can legitimately state that Great Britain permits abortion on demand.

Mr Agnew: Will the Member give way?

Mrs D Kelly: I want to finish my point; I will give way shortly. Legislators may believe that these proposed amendments to the Justice (No. 2) Bill are a discrete and minor development of the existing law, but they introduce a critical difference to the underlying philosophy of abortion legislation, which will undoubtedly be focused on by those who seek greater change. I refer in particular to the introduction, for the first time in UK law, of the choice of the woman who is facing a diagnosis of fatal foetal abnormality, bearing in mind, of course, that there is no such definition; there is no such condition. That represents, by any standard, a fundamental philosophical departure in abortion legislation.

For all its many problems, the language of the 1967 Act is predicated on the mother's physical and mental health or on the child having a serious handicap. The language of choice is absent from that legislation. In contrast, the proposed amendment places the mother's choice, at proposed clause 44A(2), as the central and deciding factor, assuming that she is given a diagnosis of fatal foetal abnormality. I give way to Mr Green.

Mr Agnew: Mr Agnew. [Laughter.] I thank the Member for giving way. She seems to be outlining why she believes the 1967 Act is wrong. I do not believe that that is what we should be debating but, to take on her point, I accept that she believes the law to be wrong. Does she believe that the women who chose to have abortions were wrong?

Mrs D Kelly: I was a health professional, and one of the key standards and ethics that I was trained in, and which I hope I have lived my life by, is to be non-judgemental. I am not going to judge anyone because, thankfully, I have never had to make those decisions or choices. If the Member is trying to suggest that I have somehow got confused about what we are debating this evening, what I am trying to explain to Mr Agnew and the proposers of these amendments is that it is they who are confused. What they are proposing tonight in their amendments goes far beyond the 1967 Act because it places in statute the element of choice, rather than the mental or physical well-being of the mother. To the parties whose Members are proposing the amendments, I ask those who are going to support the amendments to reflect very carefully on the arguments that I and others have made in our contributions to the debate this evening.

Mr Lyttle: Will the Member give way?

Mrs D Kelly: Just you, and that is it.

Mr Lyttle: I thank the Member for giving way. She asked us to reflect on the points that she put forward, but is she willing to reflect on my previous intervention, which was on the very grounds of the need to perhaps consider the viability of inclusion of reference to the health of the mother?

Mrs D Kelly: Sorry, I missed that point a bit because I thought that my whole argument was based on the premise of the physical and mental health and well-being of the mother.

This is a debate about which many people can get very passionate and emotive.

I commend the parties for being very measured in their contributions thus far. As I said at the outset, I think that all Members want to show compassion to those who have had to make difficult choices. Let us be very clear: the choices need to be based on informed decisions given by the experts in the field. The experts in the field are the clinicians and the legal experts who will help to guide them. I hope that the First Minister, Arlene Foster, will set that out very clearly in her terms of reference. I know that the public in Northern Ireland have stood against the extension of the 1967 Act to Northern Ireland for decades. People should be clear what the amendments would mean in practice.

7.45 pm

I do not want to add much more. I just want to say that, yet again, the families and Ms Ewart have brought the debate to the fore, and that is quite right. It is right that we should get clarity on the guidance and, for that, we owe her a debt of gratitude.

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful for the opportunity to speak in this section of the debate on the Justice (No. 2) Bill. I remind the House, as I remind myself, that I speak as an individual Member of the House rather than a Member of the Ulster Unionist Party or, indeed, a member of the Justice Committee.

Like all Members, I have been in receipt of many representations on the issue from both sides of the debate. I thank all those who have written, emailed, telephoned, texted or spoken to me directly, irrespective of their view. I am particularly grateful to organisations such as Christian Action Research and Education (CARE) in Northern Ireland, the Christian Medical Fellowship, the Christian Institute and the Presbyterian Church in Ireland, whose research and conclusions I will reference.

The House will know that the Ulster Unionist Party regards these issues as matters of conscience, thereby leaving Members free to speak as they feel led.

The amendment raises complex and sensitive issues about the lives and well-being of women, their families and the unborn. They need to be handled with compassion and grace in the context of affirming the value of human life. As a member of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland, I hold to a strongly pro-life position, whilst recognising that there are situations in which medical abortion might be necessary to protect the life or well-being of the mother.

The current law requires that the very difficult decisions that are taken in those exceptional cases are based on risk to the mother's life and/or long-term health. Ethically and morally, that is extremely important, as it ensures that the termination of pregnancy is viewed as a life-preserving measure. In contrast, if the proposed amendments were passed, they will apparently allow pregnancies to be terminated solely in light of the condition of the foetus. That represents a significant shift in principle, the implications of which do not appear to have been fully explored. Legislation of such importance requires detailed consideration. However, the stage at which the amendments were tabled did not allow for scrutiny by the Justice Committee, nor the submission of evidence by interested groups and individuals.

Mr Agnew: I thank the Member for giving way. I appreciate his point about the current law being about the health and well-being of the woman. Does he find it acceptable that, in the case of something like anencephaly, we have to wait until the mother's life is at immediate risk and that, when there is a likelihood of risk to the women's life, we cannot act in Northern Ireland?

Mr Kennedy: I am grateful to the Member for his contribution. Clearly, these are very complex and sensitive issues that need to be treated very sensitively. I am seeking to do that in my contribution, as I recognise others will as well.

While I, of course, recognise that, on many occasions, it is appropriate to introduce amendments at Consideration Stage, and the earlier groups of amendments did that, I do not believe that this is such an occasion. This is an issue of enormous sensitivity, involving deeply held moral beliefs about the nature of life and the care of women. This series of amendments proposes a major change to the law.

Changing the law in this area, if it is to be done, needs to proceed with great care and widespread engagement with relevant stakeholders. On this occasion, that simply has not happened.

As public debate on the issue continues, the need to provide excellent perinatal care in every part of Northern Ireland for every woman facing a pregnancy crisis must feature more prominently. Indeed, practical, emotional and spiritual support for women and their families is absolutely essential if we are truly committed as a society to life, well-being and human dignity. I believe that every human life is valuable and must be protected. It should not matter how profoundly disabled a baby is, or whether that condition will ultimately limit the ability to survive outside of the womb, or how the child was conceived. All human life is equal and worthy of protection. Unborn children in these instances require no less protection and respect than any other unborn child. Indeed, they are some of the most vulnerable in society. I note that the preamble to the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child states that each child:

“needs special safeguards and care, including appropriate legal protection, before as well as after birth”.

We should invest in care for all our children by treating those we can, and caring for those we cannot treat. The amendments in relation to rape and incest, in my view, would deprive a child of life when that child had no influence over the circumstances of its conception. It would be wrong to deprive a child of life because of the character of its father. Abortion is not an easy solution to rape, and cannot alleviate or undo in any way the crime committed. It does not bring healing to rape victims, and creating a second victim never repairs the damage to the first. It is of great importance that women in this situation are offered every support, psychologically and in all ways physically, and obviously given the option of putting their child up for adoption if that is right for them.

For the reasons that I have outlined, I will be opposing all the amendments being put forward today. I hope that this debate will continue to be conducted in a gracious and respectful manner, and that the review to be initiated by the Health Minister will be helpful in dealing with these very complex issues.

Mr McKinney: I share the hope that this debate continues in the way described by Mr Kennedy. My colleague Mr Maginness, in preparing us for this Justice Bill, prepared a piece of paper that talked about what, in fact, the ambition of this Bill was in the first instance. It dealt with things like fines and defaulting, the Prison Ombudsman and DARD proposals. If you like, it was a gathering up of issues — something to be concluded towards the end of a mandate. A catch-all, if you like. So how have we ended up here tonight? With that backdrop and context, how have we ended up with these amendments, which touch on the issues that Ms Pengelly, Ms Kelly and others so eloquently reflected on?

Mr Agnew: Will the Member give way?

Mr McKinney: I would just like to get into the debate.

I saw Mr Dickson nodding at some of Mr Kennedy's remarks. I refer Mr Dickson to his own comments in 2013, during the Further Consideration Stage of the Justice Bill. I have to quote it to you:

“As a legislative Assembly, we have” — [Official Report, Bound Volume 83, p59, col 1].

Mr Dickson: It has already been quoted.

Mr McKinney: Pardon?

Mr Dickson: It has already been quoted.

Mr McKinney: I want to quote it. I want to repeat it, and, if you do not hear it and understand it, I will repeat it again. [Interruption.]

Mr Speaker: Order, order. [Interruption.] The conduct of this debate has been exemplary so far.

Mr McKinney: Sorry, Mr Speaker. I understand.

Mr Speaker: All remarks —

Mr McKinney: At the same time —

Mr Speaker: Sorry, I am speaking. All remarks should be addressed through the Speaker. I think that is important so that we maintain the present level of decorum.

Mr McKinney: I apologise to you, Mr Speaker, and the House, but I think that it is important to repeat these matters. It is a different quote from 2013:

“As a legislative Assembly, we have a responsibility to consult and engage properly with the public on major changes to the law, and today's amendment, by any definition, is a major change.” — [Official Report, Bound Volume 83, p59, col 1].

I would argue that tonight's amendment is also a major change:

“Indeed, in the few short weeks since the amendment has appeared, the strength of feeling and lobbying, and the hundreds of interviews, conversations, blogs, articles and debates have demonstrated the absolute necessity for formal consultation so that all voices can be heard and all opinions expressed in a structured and meaningful way.” — [Official Report, Bound Volume 83, p59, col 1].

Mr Dickson: Will the Member give way?

Mr McKinney: I will give way to Mr Agnew first.

Mr Agnew: I thank the Member for giving way. He asked why these amendments have come forward in this way to this Bill. The background is that the Minister held a public consultation and, particularly around the issue of fatal foetal abnormality, polls suggested that there was considerable public support. My understanding — the Minister can correct me because I do not speak for him — is that, while he would have liked to bring the FFA issue forward in the Bill, he could not get that through the Executive. That is why we are here now.

Mr McKinney: Perhaps the Member has read a different consultation from the one that I read. I understood that there was considerable opposition on the issue of fatal abnormality; in fact, resounding opposition. As I recall, so much was the opposition to it that the Minister dropped the issue around the rape and abuse — the issues that you have brought to the Chamber tonight.

Mr Ford: I appreciate the Member giving way, but we can at least be factual on the consultation. The consultation made specific recommendations to allow for termination in the case of fatal foetal abnormality. It highlighted issues around rape and incest but made no specific recommendations. On the back of that consultation, it was clear that there were no specific recommendations to make. Please do not suggest that something was dropped that was being pushed; that is simply not the case.

Mr McKinney: I welcome the intervention but, at the outset, we need to understand what the context of the consultation was, and where you, Minister, said that you were going to. You sought to consult on the issues of fatal abnormality and to consult, originally, on the issues of rape and incest. All I am following is the facts; there are and were no Justice Department proposals on those latter issues. Mr Agnew has, if I am getting him right, criticised me for making a point when he has put forward an amendment on matters to which there was sufficient opposition for the Justice Minister not to come forward with them. I will take Mr Dickson's intervention.

Mr Dickson: I believe that the Minister has adequately commented in the direction that I wished to go in, which was to point out that there was a consultation. Therefore, it rather negates the reading back of comments that I made in respect of a previous Bill when there was no appropriate consultation.

Mr McKinney: I accept that you have put your view, but I do not accept it.

Mr Lyttle: Will the Member give way briefly?

Mr McKinney: I would like to make one comment about your intervention, which is reflective of earlier comments. Had there been proper consultation, we would not have had from my colleague here such an early proposed amendment, consistent with what he believes is the existing law.

Mr Lyttle: I thank the Member for giving way. I am not sure that my proposal was precisely about the existing law; it was a reference to the position of the Royal College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists, which was about the desirability of a reference to the health of the mother. It was not a direct quotation of the existing law. I am not sure what the Member's exact words were, but I think that he said that there was widespread opposition to proposals that were put forward in the robust Department of Justice consultation on this issue. The Minister can correct me if I am wrong, but my recollection is that reputable bodies like the Royal College of Midwives, the Royal College of Nursing and the Royal College of General Practitioners supported the attempt to deal with the unique case of fatal foetal abnormality in their responses to that consultation. The Member's characterisation of the response to that consultation needs to be addressed.

8.00 pm

Mr McKinney: Perhaps I will address it by referring to Mr Robin Ashe, Chair of the Royal College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists (RCOG) in Northern Ireland, who, only as recently as this morning, reflected on these very issues when he said:

"As far as we're concerned, we regard it as unreasonable to consider termination of pregnancy for fatal foetal abnormality, as long as the continuation of the pregnancy would have a detrimental effect on the health of the mother."

Now that is extremely important. We are not advocating it, and it should not be advocated that this is a choice item. It is not a choice item. It is dependent on the effect of the abnormal pregnancy on the health of the mother. If we were to consider that fatal foetal abnormality in itself would be a reason for termination of pregnancy, then that is not a satisfactory situation. He was then asked why not. He added:

"It would border on eugenics."

It would border on eugenics. That was the view of the Chair of the Royal College of Obstetricians —

Mr Lunn: Will the Member give way?

Mr McKinney: I will.

Mr Lunn: I have sat here quietly, determined not to intervene, because I will have plenty to say at the end of the debate, but really. Dr Ashe is perfectly entitled to make comments like that, but I would like to know, because it is the second time that it has been mentioned, do you actually agree with that? Do you agree that this is bordering on eugenics? Do you understand what eugenics is? How can you compare that to what is before you here?

Mr McKinney: I do agree. And I have to say that I am quoting in response to Mr Lyttle, who made a comment referring to other professional bodies. I am referring to the leader of a professional body who has arrived at a considered opinion on this matter. I am not going to reject that, in this context, given the nature of his most recent comments.

I just want to make a couple of comments in relation to this particular issue in amendment No 61:

"A pregnancy is terminated by a registered practitioner where a diagnosis has been made of a foetal abnormality which is likely to prove fatal."

Clinicians tell us that they cannot make that judgement. They do not know if it is going to be an hour, a day, a week, or a month. They simply do not know.

Mr B McCrea: Will the Member give way?

Mr McKinney: No, I think that I have been generous in allowing interventions and that I should be allowed to proceed. I will consider you coming in at a later point.

Subsequent to that, as a further definition:

"If a live birth should occur, there is no medical treatment which could be offered to alter the fatal nature of the condition, or improve the chances of survival."

Clinicians tell us that, in almost all cases, they can actually extend life by a ventilator, for example. That is within their gift. So, in actual fact, this is contrary to the intent of Mr Dixon's overall clause, to begin with.

I would like to proceed. We must deal with any debate relating to such complex and sensitive issues in a measured, and considered manner. We must strive to have a framework that protects women, and the rights of unborn children, regardless of any complications. And in this context, and it has been outlined by Mrs Kelly, we are consistent, and have been consistent, that we oppose the extension — any extension — of the 1967 Act to Northern Ireland. In my later remarks, I will reflect on the unintended consequences of what has been proposed, which will have the net effect of us extending the 1967 Act, which, in fact, could produce worse outcomes; if it could be worse.

Obviously, these amendments deal with that particular question in the debate about abortion: fatal foetal abnormality. I think I have dealt with that by virtue of the interventions, and I would like to make the point that, overall, this raises questions. The clinicians tell us that fatal foetal abnormality is not a medical term. It is an umbrella term, if you like, but it does not prescribe the exact conditions or illnesses that could meet the criteria for an abortion. It is important to remember that, under this amendment, fatal foetal abnormality is not limited to anencephaly; it is not limited to Trisomy 13 or any other conditions. So we have to ask, are there unintended consequences?

Could it be used, for example, to abort fetuses with Down's syndrome or spina bifida?

Mr Ford: Will the Member give way?

Mr McKinney: I will.

Mr Ford: It has been made absolutely clear in everything that has been said, in the Department's consultation and in the way that the amendment is written that we are talking about a fatal abnormality. Let us not add further trauma to women who are suffering with such an issue or indeed to those who have children who suffer from Down's or some other limiting issue that is not fatal. By making that comparison, you stray into extraordinarily dangerous territory, and you will add to the distress that some people feel.

Mr McKinney: I disagree. I merely ask the questions that others will ask about this very short process that has been foisted upon Members of the Assembly without proper consideration. These things should have been considered. I am making a process argument, as I have done from the start, that, as well as the fundamentals around the clauses, insufficient time has been given to this. They are reasonable questions that reasonable people are asking about what is being proposed.

Mr B McCrea: I am grateful to the Member for giving way. On the point — it seems to be at the centre of an argument — about fatal foetal abnormalities, Justice Horner had this to say:

"The doctors know when a foetus has an FFA. This is primarily a medical diagnosis not a legal judgment."

Will we not trust doctors to diagnose a fatal foetal abnormality? Does he want to add to his list of things that are fatal foetal abnormalities? In addition to anencephaly, you can have renal agenesis, neural tube defects, the brain open right through to the meningeal sac or caudal regression. There is a list of medical conditions that doctors are able to diagnose. If they diagnose a fatal foetal abnormality, that is a medical decision and not something to do with cleft palates or any other argument.

Mr McKinney: I do not think, Mr Speaker, you heard that from me. That was from Mr McCrea's lips, not mine.

I quote, this time, from the contribution to the consultation, section 16 of the Royal College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists's response to Mr Ford's consultation.

"It is simply a fallacy to assume that all fetuses with lethal abnormalities will die in utero or immediately after birth. If they do not, the babies will be treated with compassion and palliation should until they succumb... it is not therefore possible to draw a line in relation to survival time"

That is a very important point to make.

Mr Dickson: Will the Member give way?

Mr McKinney: I give way one more time.

Mr Dickson: OK. It is just in relation to the use and the terminology of "fatal foetal abnormality". There is a very good reason for using it: it is the list that Mr McCrea has given us, and I do not believe that it is an exhaustive list. Medical science — we should all praise it — is constantly improving, and it is the case that some of those conditions can be dealt with and some may ultimately be very amenable to medical intervention. That is why the term has been used, rather than a prescriptive list that might fall behind.

Mr McKinney: I return to evidence from learned colleagues, particularly the obstetricians. Dr Jim Dornan, who has served this community well for many years, stated on a recent BBC programme, 'The View':

"I want to make it very clear in our submission" —

— he was talking about the royal college submission to you, Mr Ford —

"We make it clear that we are not happy with the term fatal foetal abnormality. There is no textbook that I know of, and no doctor knows exactly what it means."

That comes from the clinicians.

There are also issues around the upper gestational limit. The amendments do not prescribe a maximum time limit for when a foetus with a fatal abnormality can be legally aborted, and that is of further concern. Does it mean that a foetus can be aborted up until birth? There are other questions that, I think, my colleague Mr Maginness will touch on later, around disability discrimination.

I touch now on the further amendments on rape and incest. Let me say at the outset that these crimes are heinous and the perpetrators deserve the full punishment of the law. I cannot imagine the enormous distress and trauma that they cause to the women who are victims. However, rape and incest as grounds for abortion present their own conceptual challenges. Mr Agnew, Mr McCrea and Ms Lo, who tabled the amendments, should be aware of the challenges in convicting someone of rape and, indeed, incest crimes in our judicial system. Rape is historically under-reported in Northern Ireland, and conviction rates for these heinous crimes are not high, due to the burden of proof facing prosecutors. The time for such cases to progress through the criminal justice system would surely go beyond the 28-week limit for abortions. Have Members thought about those issues? Are we to permit abortions when the burden of proof has not been met and there is no conviction for rape? How does domestic violence impact on these issues? Like my colleagues, I have been lobbied on behalf of others who support the amendments. I have heard the extent of the horror that is visited on people through domestic abuse, but is the only answer to that type of domestic abuse to seek an abortion?

We need — the Assembly and the health and justice authorities need — to start stitching together sufficient resources in finance and personnel to allow people to seek other answers and to get advice. My colleague Mr Frew talked eloquently about the scale of that type of abuse. One of the other ways is giving women access in a much more open-door way to facilities and advice rather than having to go to accident and emergency or for an abortion. The wider conversation that is being proposed by the DUP should include those discussions.

The SDLP cannot support this group of amendments. They have been hastily put forward by the Alliance Party and others. We have not been given adequate time to consider them in detail. In fact, this debate and the number of interventions by those who have made the proposals suggest to me that we have not been given adequate time. I urge you to vote no.

Mr Nesbitt: I commend the Members who have spoken so far for the tone of the debate. As you are aware, I am relatively new to elected politics — it is still my first mandate — but I am not so new to observing elected politicians in this country. As a broadcast journalist for many years, I was in the privileged position of getting to observe quite close up our politicians and their motivations — maybe not as closely as their closest friends and family but enough to know that the motivation for most, if not all, is much purer than I think the public give them credit for. There is a lot less self-interest and a lot more public spirit in the engine of the Members of this Assembly. However, the clue is in the title: it is a legislative Assembly. When Justice Horner made a ruling, as he did, that we are in contravention of rights, we have an obligation to react, and I thought that tonight would have been that night. I thought that we would each have stood up, made our case and told each other, “This is what we believe and this is why we believe it”, and then made our way through the appropriate Lobby to cast our vote, not necessarily feeling comfortable about it.

I certainly do not feel comfortable standing here as a man discussing what a woman should do with her body. I am not going to look a woman in the eye and say, “You must go full term, even though you have been told that there is a fatal foetal abnormality in your womb”. I am not going to say that to a woman, any more than I am going to tell her, “You must abort because there is a fatal foetal abnormality”.

8.15 pm

What we all agree on, I trust, is that this is a horrendous choice for those women and their partners and families and that it is about more than access to abortion. If the decision is to go full term, having listened to women over the past weeks and months, it is clear that we do not have the facilities, resources and the backup for them. The perinatal, hospice and palliative care is not there as it should be. We have to address that if we are going to allow women who choose to go full term to go full term. I want to support them if that is their choice. However, we also have to discuss what happens if, after an informed decision, we are told that the woman would rather abort.

Today should have been the day when we had that debate, explained ourselves and had our vote. It is not happening. I believe that this legislature has been undermined by a device thought up by Members to my left. The DUP is kicking this down the road, past the elections, and setting up a working group. That is a petition of concern by any other name. What fresh information is going to come forward? Whose views have we not heard? This should have been the day when we decided. As democrats, there would have been a majority vote and a minority vote, and I would have accepted that. This should have been the day, but no, this day is about obfuscation —

Mrs Foster: Will the Member give way?

Mr Nesbitt: — and a petition of concern by any other name, a less toxic name.

Mrs Foster: Will the Member give way?

Mr Nesbitt: The junior Minister set the precedent for giving way by Members of the Democratic Unionist Party, but I am confident to give way to the Member for Fermanagh and South Tyrone.

Mrs Foster: I thank the Member for giving way. Perhaps he could explain to the House how, if there is no petition of concern, this will not be a majority/minority outcome tonight. Perhaps he could explain that to us all, because I am a little bit confused as to how that is not going to happen tonight.

Mr Nesbitt: The First Minister knows very well that her party has put in place a mechanism that ensures that there will be a majority to vote down the amendment and bring forward the working group, which will kick the decision to the far side of the election. I say to the First Minister that this delay is cruel to the sufferers. It is Dickensian. This is ‘Bleak House’ that we are in today, in the Chancery Courts, waiting day after day after day after day for a decision that never comes. How cruel to those campaigning because they want relief from us. I make no specific comment on the two very high-profile campaigners, who we all know. However, as a former victims’ commissioner, I tell you that it is cruel to make promises to people and to leave people waiting and waiting and waiting, and not deliver a decision for them, whether positive or negative. It is the lack of the decision that is ‘Bleak House’ on the Stormont Estate today.

Justice Horner has made his ruling, a very thoughtful one, I think. For those who think that this is some sort of thin end of the wedge or back door to something worse, like the 1967 Act, let me quote what he says:

“There should be equality of treatment between, on the one hand, the foetus which will develop into a child without physical or mental disability and, on the other hand, the foetus which will develop into a child with a physical and/or mental disability which is non-fatal.”

OK. There should be equality between those things, so this is not about eugenics. He says:

“It is illegitimate and disproportionate to place a prohibition on the abortion of both a foetus doomed to die because it is incapable of an existence independent of the mother’s womb and the viable foetus conceived as a result of sexual crime.”

So, it is not about eugenics. It is about the fact, as Justice Horner put it, that there is no life to protect. So, it is not about a balance between the rights of the mother and the baby: there is no life to protect.

It is, of course, also about rights. Mr Justice Horner said that, in forcing the mother to go elsewhere in the United Kingdom to secure an abortion, we impose an intolerable financial and mental burden on those potentially least able to bear it. He pointed out:

“The protection of morals ... should not contemplate a restriction that penalises the impoverished but can be ignored by the wealthy”

— the wealthy who can afford to travel. That is not the sort of society that I want to create and bequeath. I will support the amendment, not least because the authors said that they recognise the imperfections of the wording and will work on that for when we come back to this debate in this House.

I appreciate the intent to support women in their decision and to support medical practitioners who have a conscience. However, this is a petition of concern by another name, so, in protest, while I will vote to support this amendment, I am taking no further part in this debate, and I will not be voting on any other of these amendments because it seems to me that electoral politics has infected this debate and that is a shame. [Interruption.]

Ms Lo: I am speaking as an individual MLA, not representing the Alliance Party, which has no set policy on abortion.

I wonder whether anyone in this Chamber has seen a woman who has just been raped. I have. Many years ago, when I was a sessional interpreter for the RUC, I was involved in a rape case — an experience that has never left me. Imagine a woman who has just been sexually violated. She is traumatised, exhausted and feels dirty. She is experiencing a mixture of emotions: anger and disgust towards the perpetrator, not to mention helplessness and humiliation. Imagine, a month or two later, she discovers that she is pregnant. The consequence of the violation is growing inside her body. The state now tells her that she must continue with a pregnancy where, every day for the next eight months, she will be reminded of that act of violence that was forced upon her.

Traumatised and re-traumatised. How barbaric is that?

It could happen to your daughter, your wife, your niece or your neighbour. Yet, as legislators, we have allowed this restriction from an arcane 1861 law to continue. Now is the time to bring Northern Ireland into the 21st century and meet international human rights standards.

Violence against women is a violation of fundamental human rights. Those include the right to health, life and the right to be free from torture and other ill-treatment. The United Nations says that individuals should be able to:

“exercise control over their sexual and reproductive lives”.

That includes reproductive decision-making. UN treaty monitoring bodies agree that abortion should be legal when a pregnancy results from rape, and they have urged countries to amend their laws to allow that.

The United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW), last year, made clear that access to termination of pregnancy must be made available in Northern Ireland in circumstances of fatal foetal abnormality, rape or incest.

In the case where abortion was denied to a suicidal young girl who had been raped, CEDAW recommended that the state take measures to ensure access to abortion in cases of rape. It also said that the life and health of a pregnant woman or girl must be prioritised over the protection of the foetus. Under human rights law, a state can decide to provide an unborn child with protections. For example, a state may restrict a woman's access to termination of pregnancy. Any such restriction must not, however, violate a woman's human rights. The European Court of Human Rights found that:

“it is neither desirable, nor even possible as matters stand, to answer in the abstract the question whether the unborn child is a person for the purposes of Article 2 of the Convention”.

The World Health Organization (WHO) has clearly indicated that women who become pregnant as a result of rape should have access to safe abortion services. To allow access to abortion services in such cases, the WHO advises that the state should update standards and guidelines for police and healthcare providers, and that includes referrals to abortion services.

At least 1,000 women and girls from Northern Ireland travel to hospitals in Britain for terminations every year. Official figures for 2014 state that 837 Northern Irish females had abortions in Britain, although that number is regarded as an underestimation. Among them was a 13-year-old who became pregnant through incest.

The only law applying to abortion here is the Offences Against the Person Act 1861, which contains a life sentence for anyone convicted of carrying out a termination, even in cases of rape or incest. It has some of the most severe penalties in Europe.

This is a health matter, not a criminal justice issue. Women should not be criminalised. Of the 47 member states of the European Council, just six do not permit termination of pregnancy on grounds of rape, incest and foetal abnormality. Even Brazil, a repressive, religious regime whose abortion laws are among the most stringent in Latin America, allows for abortion in the case of rape or incest. Its law simply says that, in order to access a termination, a woman must put in writing to a medical doctor that she has been raped.

Largely based on the Termination of Pregnancy (Medical Defences) Act 1995 in the Isle of Man, my amendment stipulates that a woman may have a legal abortion if she has made a complaint to the police alleging that the pregnancy could be caused by rape, incest or indecent assault. The pregnant woman must then provide evidence to the surgeon and/or medical practitioner that the pregnancy could be caused by rape, incest or indecent assault. A police reference number will suffice. In addition to that, the hospital surgeon and/or medical practitioner must believe that there are no medical indications which contradict the allegation that the pregnancy could be caused by rape, incest or indecent assault. No evidence or matter connected with the abortion shall be admissible in any criminal proceedings relating to the alleged rape, incest or indecent assault except with the leave of the court. It is a given, of course, that this has to be done within 24 hours, in line with current legislation.

8.30 pm

We must trust women. Those who make false allegations of rape are in a tiny minority, and in doing so, they are committing a crime and can also face possible charges for wasting police time. Women should be provided safe, legal abortion services based on their complaint of the rape and should not be compelled to undergo unnecessary added stress by having to report a sexual crime to the police.

I acknowledge that this is not an ideal amendment. For some, it is too restrictive. I and most human rights organisations would much prefer that we allowed women to have an abortion based on their word. However, I understand that some Members might object on the basis that rape is too difficult to prove and women may lie to get an abortion. Therefore, my amendment requires women to have reported this crime to the police.

I am also concerned that, in arguing that it is too difficult to verify a rape case, we are sending out a dangerous message. If we are saying that we are incapable of proving a rape case, what is the point in women reporting it? Regardless of where you stand on abortion, sending that message to people who are most likely already very reluctant to report a rape should be a concern for us all. It is vital to stress that this amendment is about choice. No one is saying, "If you are raped and get pregnant as a result, you must have an abortion". It simply means that you can assess what options are open to you.

Justice Horner's recent judgement found that Northern Ireland's almost outright ban on abortion breaches the human rights of women and girls, including rape victims. He also highlighted how women having to travel is not only distressing for them but is very much a class issue. His judgement states:

"The protection of morals, as I have observed, should not contemplate a restriction that penalises the impoverished but can be ignored by the wealthy. It is surely not controversial that requiring women in these exceptional categories to go to England, that is those carrying FFAs and those pregnant as a result of sexual abuse, will place heavy demands on them both emotionally and financially."

It is also important to consider how our current legislation, or lack thereof, impacts our refugees. We have quite a lot of new refugees who have come here or who are arriving fairly soon. If a woman was raped prior to arriving in our country and then discovered she was pregnant, would she have access to funds to travel to England? Would she be allowed to leave with her documentation? It is not only Justice Horner who thinks our abortion law needs to change. Just last year, Amnesty International commissioned a Millward Brown Ulster poll that told us that seven out of 10 people back changes to the abortion law in Northern Ireland; 66% of people think abortion should be allowed in the case of fatal foetal abnormality; 69% think that the law in Northern Ireland should make access to abortion available where the pregnancy is the result of rape; and 68% think the law in Northern Ireland should make access to abortion available where the pregnancy is the result of incest.

Like others, I have been contacted by a number of constituents urging me to vote yes to amendment Nos 61 to 68. One constituent pointed out that even Sierra Leone has repealed its outdated abortion laws but that Northern Ireland has not.

Another constituent wrote:

"I am asking you to vote yes because I trust women to make these decisions, because I believe in human rights and because ultimately the state should not make these difficult situations worse for those families and individuals involved."

I do not think that I can put it better than that. With incest, it is unlikely that there will be a need for a police investigation, because of the probable involvement of social services or because the perpetrator is generally known to the victim. It is something that can be genetically verified as well.

This is not an abstract debate. Our restrictive law is making people's lives very difficult. I have heard examples from the Abortion Support Network. It helps local women facing crisis pregnancies, which are truly depressing and distressing. It has helped women who did not want to report a rape because they were afraid that, if the rape made them pregnant, they would be forced to carry the pregnancy to term.

Research has shown that the rate of abortions is higher where it is illegal. Generally, that is in places where people do not have access to sex education and contraception, and so what we find is that criminalising abortion does not stop it, and it certainly does not lower the rate. We live in an imperfect world, one in which violence is common and in which sexual abuse and sexual violence against girls and women does happen and can result in pregnancies that are life sentences of damage to the victims. A victim of rape or sexual abuse needs assistance, compassion and options, yet, as legislators, we offer none of those, just judgement. For how long will we export the problem? For how long will we ignore the fact that it is a class issue? How long will we subject women to such inhumanity? We have done so for far, far too long.

I know that this is an emotive subject, and I know that there are those who will rise and speak against my amendment with passion and conviction, yet I urge Members to consider this carefully from a health perspective rather than purely as a moral issue. I hope that this will be a debate that is informed by evidence. As politicians, we have failed to prioritise women's healthcare. By not supporting amendment No 68, we very much risk being on the wrong side of history. We must not miss this opportunity.

Mr McCarthy: I am grateful to the Alliance Party of Northern Ireland for recognising the importance of the issue that we are deliberating this evening. The party has recognised that the issue is a matter of individual conscience, thereby allowing a free vote in the Assembly.

I am totally and absolutely opposed to abortion, and I have always resisted and always will resist the introduction of the 1967 Act into Northern Ireland. I am grateful to hear other voices around the Chamber saying the same thing. I sincerely hope that all our public representatives will continue to oppose this obnoxious Act being brought into our country now or in the future. I have always been a supporter of the pro-life lobby and, for many years, was a member of the all-party group on pro-life. I remain a staunch pro-life supporter. I have always said that I will oppose abortion being brought into Northern Ireland through the front door or the back door.

I want to acknowledge the sincerity of my colleagues Mr Trevor Lunn, Stewart Dickson and, indeed, Anna Lo, on bringing the amendments to the Bill. Not once in the amendments is the dreaded A-word used. The amendments deal with the medical termination of pregnancy, only in totally exceptional circumstances — nothing else.

I wish to express absolute sympathy with women and, indeed, their partners — because it is not only women who are involved; there are partners, and partners play a very important role — who are faced with such devastating news about their unborn baby. These amendments do not force anyone to adopt any particular way forward, but they offer hope, love, compassion and help for those parents to have the best professional help at a time when it is most needed.

Any person and, I am sure, everyone in the Chamber who followed the experience of Sarah Ewart and her family could not have been anything but almost ashamed at the journey that that young Northern Irish woman and her family were forced to make. There are, unfortunately, too many Sarah Ewarts in Northern Ireland. It is time to see those circumstances change for the good of everyone in this region.

We also had the horrendous case, some time ago, of a beautiful young lady who was a guest — a visitor — to our wonderful island and residing in County Cork. She was a girl called Savita Halappanava. Savita and her husband were expecting a baby, but, unfortunately, complications set in, and, despite Savita's request for compassion and help, she was, in my opinion, denied medical assistance and was allowed to die. That was shocking. It was a totally unnecessary loss of life, and, unfortunately, to our eternal shame, it made worldwide news. It happened in the South of Ireland. Nevertheless, it was something that made me totally ashamed, at that time, to say that I was Irish or had anything to do with this island. Here was a family in desperate need, and the Southern authorities turned their back on our guest. That is totally unforgivable. It is time that authorities on both sides of the border showed some compassion, charity and love not only to our visitors but everyone on this island.

At the start of my speech, I said that I would not accept any shape or form of abortion into Northern Ireland. That is where I stand. That is the position of my two colleagues, Stewart and Trevor. I am not so sure about Anna, but she can speak for herself. Trevor and Stewart do not want wholesale abortion brought into this country. I am delighted that I can stand shoulder to shoulder with them on that.

We have many highly professional people in Northern Ireland; we have some of the best medical practitioners in the world. You only have to see their work — brilliant, almost superhuman work, saving lives in our hospitals and practices up and down the country. I have no doubt that those professionals are anxious to help in circumstances where there are fatal foetal abnormalities and other cases. It is up to us as legislators to ensure that no obstacles are put in their way.

Finally, I wish to thank everyone who took the trouble to correspond with me on this issue. I may not have acted in the way they will have wished, but my conscience tells me that, in circumstances in which highly qualified medical professionals have the ability to save life and prevent mental breakdowns for mothers and families, they must be permitted to help and prevent further tragedies occurring in Northern Ireland.

8.45 pm

Mr Allister: This is, undoubtedly, a sensitive and emotive issue, and, as I rise to speak, I caution myself in the circumspect language that I should use. These amendments require to be addressed with some rigour because, behind the emotional appeal, there is a fairly fundamental change to our criminal law. That requires to be examined, as I said, with rigour.

When we take Mr Lunn and Mr Dickson's amendment, there are one or two things that are quite striking about it. It says that a pregnancy can be terminated:

“by a registered medical practitioner where a diagnosis has been made of a foetal abnormality which is likely to prove fatal”.

So, straight away, it sets the bar at the lowest possible level in decision-making. All it has to persuade is the two doctors, and we do not know whether they are the first two doctors asked or the twenty-first or twenty-second doctors asked. All it has to do is to persuade two doctors that the abnormality is likely — not that it will and not that it is beyond reasonable doubt, but that it is likely — to prove fatal. The language of the amendment then goes on to say that the diagnosis has to be made:

“by two suitably qualified registered medical practitioners who are of the opinion, formed in good faith”, — and we are not told how that is to be tested; and:

“that—

(i) the condition of the foetus is likely to cause death either before birth, or during birth, or”,

— and here we come to a critical part of the amendment:

“(ii) if a live birth should occur”.

So, here we have this amendment anticipating termination in circumstances where a live birth may well occur. It says:

“(ii) if a live birth should occur, there is no medical treatment which could be offered to alter the fatal nature of the condition or improve the chances of survival.”

So what this amendment is saying is that if two doctors are persuaded that the condition of the foetus, as the amendment wants to call it, is such that the abnormality is of such an extent that the child born is unlikely to survive for some unspecified period — it may well be born alive, but if its chances of survival are not adequate — it can be aborted.

Mr Agnew: Will the Member give way?

Mr Allister: In a moment.

Here is the key in relation to this amendment: it does not anticipate abortion for an able-bodied child but anticipates abortion for a severely disabled child. In doing that, it crosses the line as to what I believe this Assembly lawfully can do, because it takes us into territory where, because the child is severely or likely to be severely disabled and only have a very short life, it, unlike the able-bodied child, can be aborted. What is that doing in terms of the disabled? That is saying that a child likely to be severely disabled has fewer rights, is less important and can be killed through abortion. That flies wholly in the face of international obligations that this Assembly has.

Section 6 of the 1998 Act says that we cannot legislate in breach of certain, specified international laws. One of those is the requirement set out in the United Nations Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities (UNCPRD). That is part of our law that we have to respect as a devolved institution. The convention says that the disabled must not be discriminated against and must have the same rights, liberties and attentions as the able-bodied. Therefore, this amendment, premised upon distinguishing a human being on the basis of their disability is, I believe, totally outwith the legislative capacity of the Assembly.

Mr Agnew: I thank the Member for giving way. I would like to understand whether the Member is saying that he is sympathetic to Mr Dickson's amendment but feels that it is badly drafted, in which case we could potentially not move it and bring it back amended at Further Consideration Stage. Or is he saying that he is opposed to it, and, if that is the case, surely its detail is irrelevant as the Member has made up his mind?

Mr Allister: Let me disabuse Mr Agnew of any idea that I harbour any support for this amendment: none whatsoever. I am pointing out the audacity of this amendment in the brazen way in which it would discriminate against people on the basis of their severe disability. That, I think, goes to the very heart of this matter. That is why the Attorney General in this country has gone on record to make this very point. When asked whether there were compatibility issues with this amendment and our statutory obligations, the Attorney General has, in a five-page letter, spelled it out. Yes, we are subject to the United Nations Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities; yes, that convention sets out principles of which the focus is on the equal protection of the right to life for those with disabilities and those without. He says that those articles operate, as far as we are concerned, in respect of our domestic law.

Mr Ford: I appreciate the Member giving way, Mr Speaker. I fear that he is coming perilously close to criticising you for having accepted this amendment. I am also well aware, because the Attorney General has written to me on this topic and, similarly, has cited the UNCPRD. I must say, however, that Mr Allister's continual use of the term "severely disabled", as opposed to "a lethal or fatal abnormality", appears to me to somewhat misrepresent the intention.

The Attorney General has a specific constitutional function, which he has outlined, and he is absolutely entitled, if he believes that the Assembly has passed legislation that is outwith its powers, to refer it to the Supreme Court of the United Kingdom. I have no doubt that that would be his intention if he believed that to be the case, because he would believe that it was his proper duty. However, it is entirely proper for the Assembly to pass what it believes to be within its competence, on advice presumably given by the Speaker's legal advisers and certainly given by my legal advisers, and then allow referral to the appropriate body — the Supreme Court of the United Kingdom — to which, with due respect to Mr Allister, I would defer more than I would defer to him or to the Attorney General, because it is the Supreme Court.

Mr Speaker: I just want to make it clear that I detect no direct challenge to my decision. There may be issues as the Assembly makes decisions, some of which may indeed merit referral or testing against wider legal implications, including international law. However, when legislation or amendments are put before me, I allow them to go forward on procedural grounds only, not competency. In fact, I have written to the Attorney General to point that out.

Mr Allister: For the total avoidance of doubt, I have made and make no criticism of the acceptance of the amendment for debate. I am fully aware that, if the Assembly were to pass the amendment and it becomes part of the Justice (No. 2) Bill, then, under the 1998 Act, the Attorney General has the power — one would expect that he would exercise it — to refer that provision to the Supreme Court. However, if the Minister has been in touch with the Attorney General on this issue, is it not rather surprising that he has not taken the point that the Attorney General is making to him, namely that this amendment appears to be beyond that which we can do because of its infringement of the UN convention?

Mr Ford: I appreciate the Member giving way again. The position is not that I sought advice from the Attorney General, but that the Attorney General proffered his advice to me. I have access to other advice, and the best advice that I have is to suggest that, if the appropriate mechanism is that the Supreme Court should be asked to decide on a measure such as this, that is the appropriate place to test conflicting legal opinions.

Mr Allister: I do not know how far the Minister has shopped around for his legal advice, but it sounds as if he kept going until he got something that suited him. It is the Attorney General who is saying this. The two proposers of the amendment had as much access to the Attorney General as I did to ask him these fundamental questions. It appears that they chose not to ask, maybe because they did not want to hear the answer. The answer is here now, and it is a very severe warning of a belief that this is heading in the direction of incompatibility, for the very understandable —

Mr A Maginness: Will the Member give way?

Mr Allister: Yes.

Mr A Maginness: I thank the Member —

Mr Speaker: Can I ask you to address the Chair so that we can all join in the conversation?

Mr A Maginness: Apologies. Leaving aside the Attorney General, if one refers to paragraph 64 of Mr Justice Horner's judgement in relation to abortion, which is now under appeal, he refers to the United Nations Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities. He confirms in his judgement that the convention is specified as one of the EU treaties under the Definition of Treaties Order. He says of the Attorney General:

"He says quite correctly that the Assembly under Section 6(2)(d) of the 1998 Act is not permitted to make laws contrary to this. This Convention proceeds on the premise that if abortion is permissible, there should be no discrimination on the basis that the foetus, because of a defect, will result in a child being born with a physical or mental disability."

That confirms the very point that Mr Allister has raised and that he believes the Attorney General has referred to in his letter.

Mr Allister: The Member is spot on; that is exactly what Mr Justice Horner said. He reminded us of our limitations in our legislative powers. The Attorney General puts that on record in his letter. It says:

"Given the clear text of the UN Convention, legislating to provide that abortion will be available to a woman as a result of foetal abnormality would be to act in contravention of articles 1 to 4 and 5 and 10 of the convention.”

It is pretty clear.

9.00 pm

Mrs Foster: I thank the Member for giving way. Through you, Mr Speaker, is it not the case that, if the amendment passes and the Attorney General decides to refer it to the Supreme Court, the entirety of the Bill will go to the Supreme Court and not just the single provision? Therefore, the whole Bill would have to go to the Supreme Court, thereby delaying it from being implemented.

Mr Allister: I am trying to recall the exact wording. I think that it is section 11. I stand to be corrected, but I think that it refers to a provision of a Bill being referred. You would certainly have the dichotomy of a Bill —

Mr Speaker: Mr Allister, as far as we are informed, it is the provision that would be referred, not the entire Bill.

Mr Allister: You would have the difficulty of a Bill being passed — If I recall correctly, there would be four weeks for the Attorney General to make the reference, which would probably stymie Royal Assent. We are coming to the end of the legislative programme, and it may not be possible within the time frame. By one means or another, it is conceivable that more than this amendment would be jeopardised as far as the Bill’s content is concerned.

I turn to some of the other —

Mr B McCrea: I am grateful to the Member for giving way. We have had an interesting debate on the legality, and the thrust of the Member’s argument, as I understand it, is that the amendment would open the door for fetuses with disabilities and that they would be denied their legal protection. I ask him to comment on section 160 of Justice Horner’s judgement, where he stated:

“As discussed, a normal foetus does not have an Article 2 right to life, although it does have some statutory protections.”

Those have been commented on. His central argument is:

“But in the case of an FFA, there is no life to protect. When the foetus leaves the womb, it cannot survive independently. It is doomed. There is nothing to weigh in the balance. There is no human life to protect.”

The argument that the Member has spent the last 10 minutes putting forward may well be accurate, but it is irrelevant to what has been put forward. The judgement is:

“There is no ... life to protect.”

That is what the people who have tabled the amendments are about. It is not right that a woman should be expected, against her wishes, to carry to term a baby that is dead.

Mr Allister: Well, I think Mr Justice Horner was injudicious when he talked about a foetus being “doomed”. That was inappropriate. He was wrong in his conclusion in failing to carry through the import of the United Nations convention, and I am sure that that will be a key part of the appeal in the unfinished business of that case.

The amendment could not be clearer; it is emphatic. It is contemplating abortion in circumstances where there could be a live birth. It is contemplating that a live child could be born and could live for some unspecified time, yet, according to this amendment, it could be terminated. That is what the amendment says. The language is couched in those terms.

For Mr McCrea’s scenario to be valid, you would have to have infallible doctors who are able to say that a child is incapable of being born alive. We do not have infallible doctors; we will never have infallible doctors. We only have doctors who are capable of giving an opinion, and the ambit of that opinion can go to the extent that the child may be born alive, but, ultimately, it will not live.

That is another way of saying that that severely disabled child does not really matter — it does. That child should matter to us. I think that it is appalling that there should be a proposition that a child of that nature, because it is severely disabled, should not be allowed to live. That is the core issue.

Mr B McCrea: Will the Member give way?

Mr Speaker: It may be appropriate to remind Members — those making speeches and those making interventions — that this debate has attracted widespread attention from our community, including people who are going through terrible trauma. Can we just choose our words very carefully and sensitively?

Mr B McCrea: Absolutely, Mr Speaker. I am sure that we are all mindful of people looking in, and I think that we have tried to deal with matters in a judicious manner.

Let me just say this to the Member who has spoken: in response to Mr Agnew’s intervention, the challenge was that, if there is a flaw in the drafting of the amendment because you feel that it does not sufficiently tighten it down, it can be changed. You say that doctors are not infallible. This is a key point. Let me read out what anencephaly is, and I apologise if it offends anybody. This is the medical condition that Sarah Ewart’s baby had. It is a condition that is characterised by the absence of the brain and the cranium above the base of the skull. There is absolutely no prospect of life. It is not something for conjecture. It is not a severe disability. They cannot survive on a ventilator. This is the absence of life, and there are a number of other conditions that are medically adjudicated to mean that the baby will not survive — it is not live. On that condition, given the trauma that some mothers go through, surely we should have a degree of sympathy and say that, in those circumstances, however you want to draft the amendment, we should do what is kind and humane for the mother.

Mr Allister: I only regret that Mr McCrea obviously did not take the opportunity in the Long Gallery some months ago to come and hear the testimony of parents who had given birth to children of that description who did live for minutes or hours and to hear, despite the obvious and, ultimately, life-taking condition that they had, of the preciousness, valued by those parents, of being able to hold that child and to part with it from this world in their arms. I only wish that Mr McCrea had taken the opportunity to come and listen to such parents. If he had, I suspect that he would not have sought to make the point that he has just made to unilaterally declare that none of those children can ever live at all. They can; they have; and this amendment says that they should not.

Ms Lo: I thank the Member for giving way. The reality is that many women who get a diagnosis that they are carrying a child with fatal foetal abnormality choose to go to England — are forced to go to England — to have an abortion, and they cannot even bring the foetus back to Northern Ireland. The airlines will not allow them to carry their dead baby back to Northern Ireland for burial. That is very, very cruel.

Mr Allister: No doubt there are many hard cases and many heart-rending cases on all sides of this argument but, as someone said at the beginning of this debate, you do not make good law on the basis of hard cases. You make the law according to principles, and, particularly in circumstances where we are told this is all a conscience matter for ourselves, we as legislators are told to make the law according to our conscience. If our conscience says, as mine says to me, that I should not lend any support to circumstances of terminating a pregnancy because the child could be born severely disabled and may only live a short time, I am not going to do that, and I do not think that any legislator should do that. If legislators have done that in other circumstances in other places and have opened the floodgates as they did, that is a matter for them, but that is a road that this Assembly, particularly bound as we are by the UN Convention, should not begin to tread. I urge the Assembly to reject this amendment.

I want to turn to those other amendments that are based on rape and incest. The remarkable thing about these amendments is that not one of them addresses this rather fundamental question: how do you satisfy yourself that it was rape? Probably more than most, I have been involved in my time in a lot of rape trials, and 95% of the time, the question for the jury is whether the sexual intercourse was consensual or not. How do you determine that there was rape, within the window of abortion, where you have no recourse to the due process of the law? How do you possibly determine that the label that you need to put on this as the passport to abortion is rape?

Ms Lo's amazing answer in her amendment is that all you need to hear is an allegation and that an allegation, whatever the motive, is enough to sign you off on an abortion. The tests in Ms Lo's amendment are that:

“the pregnant woman has made a complaint to the police alleging that the pregnancy could be caused by rape, incest or indecent assault, as soon as was reasonable”, or that she:

“has produced to the hospital surgeon and/or medical practitioner”,

— not to the police —

“evidence suggesting that the pregnancy could be caused by rape, incest or indecent assault”, and that:

“the hospital surgeon and/or medical practitioner are of the opinion, formed in good faith”

— whatever that means —

“that there are no medical indications which are inconsistent with the allegation that the pregnancy could be caused by rape, incest or indecent assault.”

Then, to crown it all, this allegation can never be used in bringing someone to justice, because the amendment adds that:

“No evidence in respect of, or any matter connected with, the termination of a pregnancy in accordance with this section shall be admissible in any criminal proceedings relating to the alleged rape, incest or indecent assault, except with the leave of the court.”

What a charter for abortion on demand, effectively. All you have to do is to allege indecent assault, it seems, or rape —

Ms Lo: Will the Member give way?

Mr Allister: — and you are entitled, on the nod of a medical practitioner, to an abortion. Yes, I will give way.

Ms Lo: The Member, I am sure, is aware that we in Northern Ireland are the exception in the world. Forty-seven countries in Europe all allow abortion on the grounds of rape. How do the other countries do it?

Mr Speaker: Through the Chair, please. I am not sure how many other Members heard that contribution, because I could not hear it. I am not inviting you to repeat it. [Laughter.] Through the Chair — you should know.

9.15 pm

Mr Allister: The Member suggested to me that 47 other countries in Europe — I am not sure about the accuracy of that — allow abortion on the basis of rape. Of course, there are many countries in Europe that allow abortion on demand, and, no doubt they are included in that figure. However, what other countries do is a matter for them. The question tonight is, “What is this Assembly going to do?”. What does the conscience of this Assembly inform us that we should do? And I trust that the conscience of this Assembly collectively informs us that we should not follow the path laid out by Ms Lo, Mr Dixon, Mr Lunn, Mr Agnew or Mr McCrea.

Mr Agnew: We are debating the proposal to provide exceptions, in exceptional circumstances, to our current law on abortion. There has been some discussion about whether or not this Bill is the appropriate place to have this debate, and whether doing it through amendments is an appropriate mechanism. I would be much happier having this as part of a health debate. This is a health issue, and that is how it should be treated, but, unfortunately, the law on abortion is one of criminal justice. The threat of life imprisonment is in place should someone procure an abortion except in cases where the mother's life is at risk. Of course, we know that, even in those very exceptional cases, it can be hard to get a medical practitioner to take that risk, unless they are absolutely certain that the mother's health is at risk.

Every week, approximately 20 women from Northern Ireland will travel to Great Britain for an abortion. The circumstances of each of those women will, of course, vary. But, they will include those who have received the devastating news of a fatal foetal abnormality, and they will include those who have been the victims of a sexual crime, including rape. Our current laws compound the trauma for many of those women by denying them access to healthcare locally. Those who have the means to travel, potentially do so alone; potentially get into debt to acquire those means; and will receive their treatment in a strange place, away from their friends, away from their family, potentially away from their other children, because our laws choose to deny them that treatment here. They may pay up to £2,000 to access that treatment, and of course there are those who cannot afford that option, who have no choice — not even this regrettable choice.

Members are well aware of the story of Sarah Ewart, who bravely came forward to tell her story, and who put a face and a human dimension to the statistics that I have heard for many years. I suppose, she put a name and a story to the case study and really gave life to this issue. I think she really did change the landscape in Northern Ireland. I have met with her on a couple of occasions now, and I have said that to her. I commend her for what she has done. I do not think we would even be having this debate, were it not for her coming forward. Sarah has made it a safer space for us all to have this conversation because people have empathy with her and, therefore, for the many other women who find themselves in similar circumstances.

Sarah has publicly expressed that she wanted to have a baby and that the diagnosis of anencephaly was devastating to her. I am delighted to say — she has met each of the parties here and Members will know this — that, since first telling her story, she has had a pregnancy that went to term and has a healthy baby boy. I am delighted for her, but she lives in the knowledge that, in any future pregnancy, there is a risk of a similar diagnosis. As she outlined, her grandmother went through a similar situation. She outlined to us her experience and what her circumstances were. I quote from the letter which, I believe, she has written to all of us:

“Unfortunately, instead of having compassion, respect, dignity and support from my own consultant and midwives in my own hospital and country, with my family and friends to support me, I was left to go away to a clinic to have this medical procedure. And let me tell you, being there at a clinic for a termination and losing a baby you very very much wanted — it was just awful and made it so much worse for me, my husband and family to try and deal with that, on top of losing our very very much wanted baby girl, Ella.”

My concern is that, tonight, we may make a decision that will determine a similar outcome for many more women because, whilst we have given sympathy to Sarah and empathised with her, we have not chosen to make a positive change to ensure that other women do not have to go through the experience that Sarah went through. That is what she has asked of us, but it appears from the choices of many in the Chamber tonight that we are going to say to Sarah, “No. We find the circumstances as they currently exist in Northern Ireland acceptable, and we will not make a change”. I think that that is a shame and an opportunity wasted.

A court has ruled that the law in Northern Ireland denies women their human rights as enshrined through international law. The amendments proposed here are about putting in place the minimum changes that are required to bring our law within the international human rights standard. The proposal is to give women in exceptional circumstances — cases of fatal foetal abnormality or sexual crime — a choice. The proposal is simply to enshrine in our law the minimum required to uphold a woman’s human rights.

I am disappointed that a party or parties in this House that have campaigned for a bill of rights and to defend the Human Rights Act say on this issue of human rights, “No. This is one human right that we do not wish to extend to Northern Ireland. This is a woman’s right that we do not wish to uphold”. I find that disappointing, and I question that party. I make particular reference to the SDLP. In the future, when it campaigns for human rights and for a bill of rights in Northern Ireland, people will question what that bill of rights will look like. Will it afford us the international human rights standards to which we should adhere or will it be something less? To oppose these amendments is to suggest that, in Northern Ireland, we should have something less.

I will make specific reference to the amendments.

I have spoken to some of you and I have been clear that I want those of us who support change to get behind an agreed amendment. For that reason, I do not propose to move my own amendments, but to support the amendment of Stewart Dickson and Trevor Lunn in relation to fatal foetal abnormality and the amendment of Anna Lo in relation to sexual crime.

As I pointed out to Mr Allister, we can, if we make the choice, have a debate at Further Consideration Stage, or a discussion between now and Further Consideration Stage, about an agreed wording if the amendments proposed this evening are not acceptable. However, I think it is clear that that is very much a side issue for those who chose to pick holes. They do so knowing full well that no draft of these amendments will satisfy them and that they will not legislate for women who face fatal foetal abnormality or are the victim of sexual crime. In no circumstances will any draft of amendments be supported by some Members. I am disappointed; that is regrettable.

We have seen the court ruling. We have seen opinion polls. We had the consultation from the Minister. We have seen the evidence that came forward from that. The evidence seemed to be overwhelming in the case of fatal foetal abnormality, but we have not chosen to follow it. Opinion polls have shown a public desire for change. No opinion poll can be perfect, but I have yet to see an opinion poll that suggests that the public in Northern Ireland do not want change. If you do not accept the Millward Brown poll, there is the current ‘Belfast Telegraph’ poll, which, the last time I looked, was at 80% in favour of change. I do not think that you could accuse the readership of the ‘Belfast Telegraph’ of being radical or in any way outwith public opinion. Many would see it, on the whole, as a conservative readership, but those who are voting in that poll are voting for change.

I believe that it is time we trusted women to make a choice, and that is all that is being proposed; that we give women, in these limited circumstances, a choice. Some would like to go further, but the proposal this evening is that, in those limited circumstances, we give a choice. It is time that we listened to women, trusted women and acted for women. Our laws in Northern Ireland should be compassionate and meet the minimum requirements of international human rights standards.

It is well known that there are those in this House who have one opinion when their party may have another. There was a lot of discussion about whether there would be a petition of concern from the DUP. I acknowledge that it has made a big step by not petitioning this issue and in considering exploring it further through the working group. I hope that, if that option is chosen, it will be a genuine exploration of the issue and that we will see proposals for change come out of it. However, I fear, and I regret, that the decision to delay its report until after the election is a strategic one. We have had consultation, and the evidence is in. I fear that that is simply a delaying tactic to keep the electorate guessing.

9.30 pm

I question the SDLP's position. In the DUP and the SDLP, there are those who support the principle of the amendments. I call on those parties not just to trust women but to trust their Members to vote without the Whip and with freedom of conscience. We have this opportunity to make real change, and I really do not want to see it wasted.

Mr McNarry: We have faced many challenges in this Assembly term, and none more so than the issue that we are discussing today.

Let me say this: we cannot do this. We just cannot support these amendments. The matter is not a contest. It is unedifying to hear some — from outside, may I say — attempting to turn it into a winner-takes-all prize. We recognise that this is about legislation of meaningful consequence for the unborn child and the mother who is carrying the baby. It cannot be about the yesterdays when our vote is deciding about the tomorrows.

The question in my mind, which I resolved in formulating what I was going to say in the debate, is this: what has altered in the passage of time during which this law has operated? It has not required, and still does not require, a new meaning, as some would want to give it today. What has altered? It is emotional, and, at times, that is understandable. Emotions have sadly been drawn into it. However, let us admit that the floodgates have opened, and the scaremongering gushing from some parts has led us to this debate.

Were the babies of five, 10, 15 or even 50 years ago and their mothers worse or thought less of because of the law? Were the rights then regulating the birth of a baby wrong? No, they were not, nor are they wrong today or are they likely to be wrong tomorrow. The law has served us well. If change persists and is reflected somehow in a vote tonight, I believe that we are heading for the slippery slope of manipulation by petition. That is where amendment No 61 could point us. Let me caution that, if the vote is to agree the amendment and introduce the new clause now, once the rush to manipulate on the back of such changes has taken place, it will be turned into abortion on demand.

This bit is a bit personal, so indulge me my emotions if they arise. This step, if we take it today, will, without a shadow of doubt, be manipulated and make it easy — and I emphasise “easy” — to terminate babies known to be born as, in the assessment of some, imperfect. In my opinion, putting the assessment of clinicians in the frame as judges and arbitrators in the decision and advice stakes of what is a perfect or imperfect baby cannot be done.

Who becomes the lawful decision-taker in the determination and definition of imperfection? Are we deciding this evening for the unborn baby? A baby was born 73 years ago who may be called imperfect today. She is alive and very well. She would be described as disabled — the point my colleague Mr Allister made earlier. She would be described as having serious and severe difficulties in speech, mobility, decision-taking and general function. She is my 73-year-old sister-in-law, and I have known her for over 50 years. I love her and care for her despite what some would call her imperfections. She is very much alive. She is a character. To me and her family she is very much also a real person. Seventy-three years ago she was given the opportunity to live her life. Her parents did that. We have all benefited, in this family of ours, through knowing and living with this very dear person.

I worry where this will take us. Go with this amendment and you put the law on the slippery slope of termination of babies as I have described. This is where the fancy-worded tampering amendments like this, and others that will surely follow if we pass this, will end up.

Mr Speaker, just digressing for a moment, with your indulgence, it is close to the subject for the Health Minister's proposed task team, which I welcome. I asked him to include the other misfortunates: the devastating and distressing impact that stillbirths have on parents. We are told that nearly 4,000 babies are born dead in the United Kingdom each year. No figure is given for Northern Ireland, but I fear that we do not escape here. Here we have mothers and fathers not thinking for any reason, and far less considering termination, finding that their baby has survived until birth, only to be born dead. Those are parents determined to give their baby a life. Unlike some, those parents, knowing fine well what the opportunities may have been for their baby but nevertheless facing the shock of stillbirth, wanted to give their baby a chance. We have no right to bestow on ourselves as legislators the making of laws that promote terminations, as listed in this amendment. We cannot support such promotion. We cannot take it upon ourselves to deny a baby life, even for minutes, and we cannot offer the parent that early disposal of their baby through termination without seriously offering them that precious moment of holding the baby they have given birth to. It is just not right.

I ask the House to vote against the amendment not just in our name as legislators but, if I may presume, in the name of all babies, who deserve the right to live and to be loved, no matter for how long. We must not take upon ourselves the decision of deeming an interpretation of imperfection to mean terminating a baby.
